So two fair twins, whoſe features were deſign'd
At one ſoft moment in the mother's mind,
Show each the other with reflected grace,
And the ſame beauties bloom in either face;
The puzzled ſtranger which is which inquire;
Deluſion grateful to the ſmiling ſire.
From that fair * hill, where hoary ſages boaſt
To name the ſtars, and count the heavenly hoſt,
By the next dawn doth great Auguſta riſe,
Proud town! the nobleſt ſcene beneath the ſkies.
O'er Thames her thouſand ſpires their luſtre ſhed,
And a vaſt navy hides his ample bed,
A floating foreſt. From the diſtant ſtrand
A line of golden cars ſtrikes o'er the land:
Britannia's peers in pomp and rich array,
Before their king triumphant, lead the way.
Far as the eye can reach, the gaudy train,
A bright proceſſion, ſhines along the plain. [ways
So, haply, through the heaven's wide pathleſs
A comet draws a long extended blaze; [frame,
From eaſt to weſt burns through the ethereal
And half heaven's convex glitters with the flame.
Now to the regal towers ſecurely brought,
He plans Britannia's glories in his thought;
Reſumes the delegated power he gave,
Rewards the faithful, and reſtores the brave.
Whom ſhall the muſe from out the ſhining throng
Select, to heighten and adorn her ſong?
Thee, Halifax. To thy capacious mind,
O man approv'd, is Britain's wealth conſign'd.
Her coin, while Naſſau fought, debas'd and rude,
By thee in beauty and in truth renew'd,
An arduous work! again thy charge we ſee,
And thy own care once more returns to thee.
O! form'd in every ſcene to awe and pleaſe,
Mix wit with pomp, and dignity with eaſe:
Though call'd to ſhine aloft, thou wilt not ſcorn
To ſmile on arts thyſelf did once adorn:
For this thy name ſucceeding time ſhall praiſe,
And envy leſs thy garter, than thy bays.
The muſe, if fir'd with thy enlivening beams,
Perhaps ſhall aim at more exalted themes,
Record our monarch in a nobler ſtrain,
And ſing the opening wonders of his reign;
Bright Carolina's heavenly beauties trace,
Her valiant conſort, and his blooming race.
A train of kings their fruitful loves ſupplies,
A glorious ſcene to Albion's raviſh'd eyes;
Who ſees by Brunſwick's hand her ſceptre ſway'd,
And through his line from age to age convey'd.

AN IMITATION OF THE PROPHECY OF NEREUS.

As Mar his round one morning took,
(Whom ſome call earl, and ſome call duke)

* Mr. Flamſteed's houſe.

And his new brethren of the blade,
Shivering with fear and froſt, ſurvey'd,
On Perth's bleak hills he chanc'd to ſpy
An aged wizard ſix foot high,
With briſtled hair and viſage blighted,
Wall-ey'd, bare-haunch'd, and ſecond-ſighted.
The griſly ſage in thought profound
Beheld the chief with back ſo round,
Then roll'd his eye-balls to and fro
O'er his paternal hills of ſnow,
And into theſe tremendous ſpeeches
Broke forth the prophet without breeches.
Into what ills betray'd, by thee,
This ancient kingdom do I ſee!
Her realms unpeopled and forlorn!
Wae's me! that ever thou wert born!
Proud Engliſh loons (our clans o'ercome)
On Scottiſh pads ſhall amble home;
I ſee them dreſt in bonnets blue
(The ſpoils of thy rebellious crew);
I ſee the target caſt away,
And chequer'd plaid become their prey,
The chequer'd plaid to make a gown
For many a laſs in London town.
In vain thy hungry mountaineers
Come forth in all thy warlike gears,
The ſhield, the piſtol, durk, and dagger,
In which they daily wont to ſwagger,
And oft have ſally'd out to pillage
The hen-rooſts of ſome peaceful village,
Or, while their neighbours were aſleep,
Have carry'd off a lowland ſheep.
What boots thy high-born hoſt of beggars,
Mac-leans, Mac-kenzies, and Mac-gregors,
With popiſh cut-throats, perjur'd ruffians,
And Foſter's troop of raggamuffins.
In vain thy lads around thee bandy,
Inflam'd with bag-pipe and with brandy,
Doth not bold Sutherland the truſty,
With heart ſo true, and voice ſo ruſty,
(A loyal ſoul) thy troops affright,
While hoarſely he demands the fight?
Doſt thou not generous Ilay dread,
The braveſt hand, the wiſeſt head?
Undaunted doſt thou hear th' alarms
Of hoary Athol ſheath'd in arms?
Douglas, who draws his lineage down
From Thanes and Peers of high renown,
Fiery, and young, and uncontroul'd,
With knights, and 'ſquires, and barons bold,
(His noble houſehold band) advances,
And on the milk-white courſer prances.
Thee Forfar to the combat dares,
Grown ſwarthy in Iberian wars:
And Monro, kindled into rage,
Sourly defies thee to engage;
He'll rout thy foot, though ne'er ſo many,
And horſe to boot—if thou hadſt any.
But ſee Argyll, with watchful eyes,
Lodg'd in his deep entrenchments lies!
Couch'd like a lion in thy way,
He waits to ſpring upon his prey;
While, like a herd of timorous deer,
Thy army ſhakes and pants with fear,
Led by their doughty general's ſkill,
From frith to frith, from hill to hill,

Is thus thy haughty promiſe paid
That to the Chevalier was made,
When thou didſt oaths and duty barter,
For dukedom, generalſhip, and garter?
Three moons thy Jemmy ſhall command,
With Highland ſceptre in his hand,
Too good for his pretended birth,
——Then down ſhall fall the king of Perth.
'Tis ſo decreed: for George ſhall reign,
And traitors be foreſworn in vain.
Heaven ſhall for ever on him ſmile,
And bleſs him ſtill with an Argyll.
While thou, purſued by vengeful foes,
Condemn'd to barren rocks and ſnows,
And hinder'd paſſing Inverlocky,
Shall burn the clan, and curſe poor Jocky.

AN EPISTLE

From a Lady in England to a Gentleman at Avignon.

To thee, dear rover, and thy vanquiſh'd friends,
The health, ſhe wants, thy gentle Chloe ſends.
Though much you ſuffer, think I ſuffer more,
Worſe than an exile on my native ſhore.
Companions in your maſter's flight you roam,
Unenvy'd by your haughty foes at home;
For ever near the royal outlaw's ſide
You ſhare his fortunes, and his hopes divide,
On glorious ſchemes, and thoughts of empire dwell,
And with imaginary titles ſwell.
Say, for thou know'ſt I own his ſacred line,
The paſſive doctrine, and the right divine,
Say, what new ſuccours does the chief prepare?
The ſtrength of armies? or the force of prayer?
Does he from heaven or earth his hopes derive?
From ſaints departed, or from prieſts alive?
Nor ſaints nor prieſts can Brunſwick's troops withſtand,
And beads drop uſeleſs through the zealot's hand;
Heaven to our vows may future kingdoms owe,
But ſkill and courage win the crowns below
Ere to thy cauſe, and thee, my heart inclin'd,
Or love to party had ſeduc'd my mind,
In female joys I took a dull delight,
Slept all the morn, and punted half the night:
But now, with fears and public cares poſſeſt,
The church, the church, for ever breaks my reſt.
The poſtboy on my pillow I explore,
And ſift the news of every foreign ſhore,
Studious to find new friends, and new allies;
What armies march from Sweden in diſguiſe;
How Spain prepares her banners to unfold,
And Rome deals out her bleſſings, and her gold
Then o'er the map my finger, taught to ſtray,
Croſs many a region marks the winding way;
From ſea to ſea, from realm to realm I rove,
And grow a mere geographer by love:
But ſtill Avignon, and the pleaſing coaſt
That holds thee baniſh'd, claims my care the moſt:
Oft on the well-known ſpot I fix my eyes,
And ſpan the diſtance that between us lies. [pair,
Let not our James, though foil'd in arms, deſpair,
Whilſt on his ſide he reckons half the fair:
In Britain's lovely iſle a ſhining throng
War in his cauſe, a thouſand beauties ſtrong.
With unthinking victors vainly boaſt their powers;
Be theirs the muſket, while the tongue is ours.
We reaſon with ſuch fluency and fire,
The beaux we baffle, and the learned tire,
Againſt her prelates plead the church's cauſe,
And from our judges vindicate the laws
Then mourn not, hapleſs prince, thy kingdoms loſt;
A crown, though late, thy ſacred brows may boaſt;
Heaven ſeems through us thy empire to decree;
Thoſe who win hearts, have given their hearts to thee.
Haſt thou not heard that when, profuſely gay,
Our well-dreſt rivals grac'd their ſovereign's day,
We ſtubborn damſels met the public view
In loathſome wormwood, and repenting rue?
What Whig but trembled, when our ſpotleſs band
In virgin roſes whiten'd half the land!
Who can forget what fears the foe poſſeſt,
When oaken boughs mark'd every loyal breaſt!
Leſs fear'd than Medway's ſtream the Norman ſtood,
When croſs the plain he ſpy'd a marching wood,
Till, near at hand, a gleam of ſwords betray'd
The youth of Kent beneath its wandering ſhade?
Thoſe who the ſuccours of the fair deſpiſe,
May find that we have nails as well as eyes.
The female bards, O prince by fortune croſt,
At leaſt more courage than thy men can boaſt:
Our ſex has dar'd the mug-houſe chiefs to meet,
And purchas'd fame in many a well-fought ſtreet,
From Drury-Lane, the region of renown,
The land of love, the Paphos of the town,
Fair patriots ſallying oft have put to flight
With all their poles the guardians of the night,
And bore, with ſcreams of triumph, to their ſide
The leader's ſtaff in all its painted pride.
Nor fears the hawker in her warbling note
To vend the diſcontented ſtateſman's thought,
Though red with ſtripes, and recent from the thong,
Sore ſmitten for the love of ſacred ſong,
The tuneful ſiſters ſtill purſue their trade,
Like Philomela darkling in the ſhade.
Poor Trott attends, forgetful of a fare,
And hums in concert o'er his eaſy chair.
Mean while, regardleſs of the royal cauſe,
His ſword for James no brother ſovereign draws.
The Pope himſelf, ſurrounded with alarms,
To France his bulls, to Corſu ſends his arms,
And though he hears his darling ſon's complaint,
Can hardly ſpare one tutelary ſaint,
But liſts them all to guard his own abodes,
And into ready money coins his gods.
The dauntleſs Swede, purſued by vengeful foes,
Scarce keeps his own hereditary ſnows;
Nor muſt the friendly roof of kind Lorrain
With feaſts regale our garter'd youth again.
Safe, Bar-le-Duc, within thy ſilent grove
The pheaſant now may perch, the hare may rove:
The knight, who aims unerring from afar,
Th' adventurous knight, now quits the ſylvan war:
Thy brinded boars may ſlumber undiſmay'd,
Or grunt ſecure beneath the cheſnut ſhade.
Inconſtant Orleans (ſtill we mourn the day,
That truſted Orleans with imperial ſway,)

Far o'er the Alps our helpleſs monarch ſends,
Far from the call of his deſponding friends.
Such are the terms, to gain Britannia's grace!
And ſuch the terror of the Brunſwick race!
Was it for this the ſun's whole luſtre fail'd,
And ſudden midnight o'er the moon prevail'd!
For this did heaven diſplay to mortal eyes
Aërial knights and combats in the ſkies!
Was it for this Northumbrian ſtreams look'd red!
And Thames driv'n backward ſhow'd his ſecret bed!
Falſe auguries! th' inſulting victor's ſcorn!
Ev'n our own prodigies againſt us turn!
O portents conſtrued on our ſide in vain!
Let never Tory truſt eclipſe again!
Run clear, ye fountains! be at peace, ye ſkies!
And, Thames, henceforth to thy green borders riſe!

To Rome then muſt the royal wanderer go,
And fall a ſuppliant at the papal toe?
His life in ſloth inglorious muſt he wear,
One half in luxury, and one in prayer?
His mind perhaps at length debauch'd with eaſe,
The proffer'd purple and the hat may pleaſe.
Shall he, whoſe ancient patriarchal race
To mighty Nimrod in one line we trace,
In ſolemn conclave ſit, devoid of thought,
And pole for points of faith his truſty vote!
Be ſummon'd to his ſtall in time of need,
And with his caſting ſuffrage fix a creed!
Shall he in robes on ſtated days appear,
And Engliſh heretics curſe once a year!
Garnet and Faux ſhall he with prayers invoke,
And beg that Smithfield piles once more may ſmoke!
Forbid it, heaven! my ſoul, to fury wrought,
Turns almoſt Hanoverian at the thought.

From James and Rome I feel my heart decline,
And fear, O Brunſwick, 'twill be wholly thine;
Yet ſtill his ſhare thy rival will conteſt,
And ſtill the double claim divides my breaſt.
The fate of James with pitying eyes I view,
And wiſh my homage were not Brunſwick's due:
To James my paſſion and my weakneſs guide,
But reaſon ſways me to the victor's ſide.
Though griev'd I ſpeak it, let the truth appear!
You knew my language, and my heart, ſincere.
In vain did falſehood his fair fame diſgrace;
What force had falſehood, when he ſhow'd his face!
In vain to war our boaſtful clans were led;
Heaps driv'n on heaps, in the dire ſhock they fled:
France ſhuns his wrath, nor raiſes to our ſhame
A ſecond Dunkirk in another name:
In Britain's funds their wealth all Europe throws,
And up the Thames the world's abundance flows:
Spite of feign'd fears and artificial cries,
The pious town ſees fifty churches riſe:
The hero triumphs as his worth is known,
And ſits more firmly on his ſhaken throne.

To my ſad thought no beam of hope appears
Through the long proſpect of ſucceeding years.
The ſon, aſpiring to his father's fame,
Shows all his fire: another and the ſame.
He, bleſt in lovely Carolina's arms,
To future ages propagates her charms;
With pain and joy at ſtrife, I often trace
The mingled parents in each daughter's face;
Half ſickening at the ſight, too well I ſpy
The father's ſpirit through the mother's eye:
In vain new thoughts of rage I entertain,
And ſtrive to hate their innocence in vain.

O princeſs! happy by thy foes confeſt!
Bleſt in thy huſband! in thy children bleſt!
As they from thee, from them new beauties born,
While Europe laſts, ſhall Europe's thrones adorn.
Tranſplanted to each court, in times to come,
Thy ſmile celeſtial and unfading bloom,
Great Auſtria's ſons with ſofter lines ſhall grace,
And ſmooth the frowns of Bourbon's haughty race.
The fair deſcendents of thy ſacred bed,
Wide-branching o'er the weſtern, world ſhall ſpread,
Like the fam'd Banian tree, whoſe pliant ſhoot
To earthward bending of itſelf takes root,
Till, like their mother plant, ten thouſand ſtand
In verdant arches on the fertile land;
Beneath her ſhade the tawny Indians rove,
Or hunt, at large, through the wide echoing grove.

O thou, to whom theſe mournful lines I ſend,
My promis'd huſband, and my deareſt friend;
Since heaven appoints this favour'd race to reign;
And blood has drench'd the Scottiſh fields in vain,
Muſt I be wretched, and thy flight partake?
Or wilt not thou, for thy lov'd Chloe's ſake,
Tir'd out at length, ſubmit to fate's decree?
If not to Brunſwick, O return to me!
Proſtrate before the victor's mercy bend:
What ſpares whole thouſands, may to thee extend.
Should blinded friends thy doubtful conduct blame,
Great Brunſwick's virtue ſhall ſecure thy fame:
Say theſe invite thee to approach his throne,
And own the monarch, heaven vouchſafes to own:
The world, convinc'd, thy reaſons will approve;
Say this to them; but ſwear to me 'twas love.

AN ODE,

Occaſioned by his Excellency the Earl of Stanhope's Voyage to France, 1718.

" Idem
" Pacis eras mediuſque belli." HOR.

FAIR daughter once of Windſor's woods!
In ſafety o'er the rolling floods,
Britannia's boaſt and darling care,
Big with the fate of Europe, bear.
May winds propitious on his way
The miniſter of peace convey;
Nor rebel wave, nor riſing ſtorm,
Great George's liquid realms deform.

Our vows are heard. Thy crowded ſails
Already ſwell with weſtern gales;
Already Albion's coaſt retires,
And Calais multiplies her ſpires:
At length has royal Orleans preſt,
With open arms, the well-known gueſt;
Before in ſacred friendſhip join'd,
And now in counſels for mankind:

Whilſt his clear ſchemes our patriot ſhows,
And plans the threaten'd world's repoſe,

They fix each haughty monarch's doom,
And bleſs whole ages yet to come.
Henceforth great Brunſwick ſhall decree
What flag muſt awe the Tyrrhene ſea;
From whom the Tuſcan grape ſhall glow,
And fruitful Arethuſa flow.

See in firm leagues with Thames combine
The Seine, the Maeſe, and diſtant Rhine!
Nor, Ebro, let thy ſingle rage
With half the warring world engage.
Oh! call to mind thy thouſands ſlain,
And Almanara's fatal plain;
While yet the Gallic terrors ſleep,
Nor Britain thunders from the deep.

PROLOGUE

To the Univerſity of Oxford, 1713.

What kings henceforth ſhall reign, what ſtates be free,
Is fix'd at length by Anna's juſt decree:
Whoſe brows the muſe's ſacred wreath ſhall fit,
Is left to you the arbiters of wit.
With beating hearts the rival poets wait,
Till you, Athenians, ſhall decide their fate;
Secure, when to theſe learned ſeats they come,
Of equal judgment, and impartial doom.
Poor is the player's fame, whoſe whole renown
Is but the praiſe of a capricious town;
While, with mock-majeſty, and fancy'd power,
He ſtruts in robes, the monarch of an hour.
Oft wide of nature muſt he act a part,
Make love in tropes, in bombaſt break his heart:
In turn and ſimile reſign his breath,
And rhyme and quibble in the pangs of death.
We bluſh, when plays like theſe receive applauſe;
And laugh, in ſecret, at the tears we cauſe;
With honeſt ſcorn our own ſucceſs diſdain,
A worthleſs honour, and inglorious gain.
No trifling ſcenes at Oxford ſhall appear;
Well, what we bluſh to act, may you to hear.
To you our fam'd, our ſtandard plays we bring,
The work of poets, whom you taught to ſing:
Though crown'd with fame, they dare not think it due,
Nor take the laurel till beſtow'd by you.
Great Cato's ſelf the glory of the ſtage,
Who charms, corrects, exalts, and fires the age,
Begs here he may be try'd by Roman laws;
To you, O fathers, he ſubmits his cauſe;
He reſts not in the people's general voice,
Till you, the ſenate, have confirm'd his choice.
Fine is the ſecret, delicate the art,
To wind the paſſions, and command the heart;
For fancy'd ills to force our tears to flow,
And make the generous ſoul in love with woe;
To raiſe the ſhades of heroes to our view;
Rebuild fall'n empires, and old time renew.
How hard the taſk! how rare the godlike rage!
None ſhould preſume to dictate for the ſtage,
But ſuch as boaſt a great extenſive mind,
Enrich'd by nature, and by art refin'd; [bring,
Who from the ancient ſtores their knowledge
And taſted early of the muſes' ſpring.
May none pretend upon her throne to ſit,
But ſuch as, ſprung from you, are born to wit:
Choſen by the mob, their lawleſs claim we flight:
Yours is the old hereditary right.

THOUGHTS

INSCRIBED TO GEORGE CLARKE, ESQ.

" ——Animum pictura paſcit inani
" Multa gemens, largoque humectat flumine
" vultum." VIRG.

Can this be he! could Charles, the good, the great,
Be ſunk by heaven to ſuch a diſmal ſtate!
How meagre, pale, neglected, worn with care!
What ſteady ſadneſs, and auguſt deſpair!
In thoſe ſunk eyes the grief of years I trace,
And ſorrow ſeems acquainted with that face.
Tears, which his heart diſdain'd, from me o'erflow,
Thus to ſurvey God's ſubſtitute below,
In ſolemn anguiſh, and majeſtic woe.
When ſpoil'd of empire by unhallowed hands,
Sold by his ſlaves, and held in impious bands;
Rent from, what oft had ſweeten'd anxious life,
His helpleſs children, and his boſom wife;
Doom'd for the faith, plebeian rage to ſtand,
And fall a victim for the guilty land;
Then thus was ſeen, abandon'd and forlorn,
The king, the father, and the ſaint to mourn.
How could'ſt thou, artiſt, then thy ſkill diſplay?
Thy ſteady hands thy ſavage heart betray:
Near thy bold work the ſtunn'd ſpectators faint,
Nor ſee unmov'd, what thou unmov'd could'ſt paint.
What brings to mind each various ſcene of woe,
Th' inſulting judge, the ſolemn-mocking ſhow,
The horrid ſentence, and accurſed blow.
Where then, juſt heaven, was thy unactive hand,
Thy idle thunder, and thy lingering brand!
Thy adamantine ſhield, thy angel wings,
And the great Genii of anointed kings!
Treaſon and fraud ſhall thus the ſtars regard!
And injur'd virtue meet this ſad reward!
So ſad, none like, can time's old records tell,
Though Pompey bled, and poor Darius fell!
All names but one too low—that one too high:
All parallels are wrongs, or blaſphemy.
O power ſupreme! How ſecret are thy ways!
Yet man, vain man, would trace thy myſtic maze,
With fooliſh wiſdom, arguing, charge his God,
His balance hold, and guide his angry rod;
New-mould the ſpheres, and mend the ſky's deſign,
And found th' immenſe with his ſhort ſcanty line.
Do thou, my ſoul, the deſtin'd period wait,
When God ſhall ſolve the dark decrees of fate,
His now unequal diſpenſations clear,
And make all wiſe and beautiful appear;
When ſuffering ſaints aloft in beams ſhall glow,
And proſperous traitors gnaſh their teeth below.
Such boding thoughts did guilty conſcience dart,
A pledge of hell to dying Cromwell's heart:

Then this pale image ſeem'd t' invade his room,
Gaz'd him to ſtone, and warn'd him to the tomb.
While thunders roll, and nimble lightnings play,
And the ſtorm wings his ſpotted ſoul away.
A blaſt more bounteons ne'er did heaven command
To ſcatter bleſſings o'er the Britiſh land. [Spain,
Not that more kind, which daſh'd the pride of
And whirl'd her cruſh'd Armada round the main;
Not thoſe more kind, which guide our floating towers,
Waft gums and gold, and made far India ours:
That only kinder, which to Britain's ſhore
Did mitres, crowns, and Stuart's race reſtore,
Renew'd the church, revers'd the kingdom's doom,
And brought with Charles an Anna yet to come.
O Clarke, to whom a Stuart truſts her reign
O'er Albion's fleets, and delegates the main;
Dear, as the faith thy loyal heart hath ſworn,
Tranſmit this piece to ages yet unborn.
This ſight ſhall damp the raging ruffian's breaſt,
The poiſon ſpill, and half-drawn ſword arreſt;
To ſoft compaſſion ſtubborn traitors bend,
And, one deſtroy'd, a thouſand kings defend.

A FRAGMENT OF A POEM ON HUNTING.

" Dona cano divûm, lætas venantibus artes,
" Auſpicio, Diana, tuo——" GRATIUS.

HORSES and hounds, their care, their various race,
The numerous beaſts, that range the rural chaſe,
The huntſman's choſen ſcenes, his friendly ſtars,
The laws and glory of the ſylvan wars,
I firſt in Britiſh verſe preſume to raiſe;
A venturous rival of the Roman praiſe.
Let me, chaſte queen of woods, thy aid obtain,
Bring here thy light-foot nymphs, and ſprightly train:
If oft, o'er lawns, thy care prevents the day
To rouſe the foe, and preſs the bounding prey,
Woo thine own Phœbus in the taſk to join,
And grant me genius for the bold deſign.
In this ſoft ſhade, O ſooth the warrior's fire,
And fit his bow-ſtring to the trembling lyre;
And teach, while thus their arts and arms we ſing,
The groves to echo and the vales to ring.
* * * * * * * * * * *
* * * * * * * * * * *
Thy care be firſt the various gifts to trace,
The minds and genius of the latrant race.
In powers diſtinct the different clans excel,
In ſight, or ſwiftneſs, or ſagacious ſmell;
By wiles ungenerous ſome ſurpriſe the prey,
And ſome by courage win the doubtful day.
Seeſt thou the gaze-hound! how with glance ſevere
From the cloſe herd he marks the deſtin'd deer!
How every nerve the greyhound's ſtretch diſplays,
The hare preventing in her airy maze;
The luckleſs prey how treacherous tumblers gain,
And dauntleſs wolf-dogs ſhake the lion's mane;
O'er all, the blood-hound boaſts ſuperior ſkill,
To ſcent, to view, to turn, and boldly kill!
His fellows' vain alarms rejects with ſcorn,
True to the maſter's voice, and learned horn.
His noſtrils oft, if ancient ſame ſing true,
Trace the ſly felon through the tainted dew:
Once ſnuff'd, he follows with unalter'd aim,
Nor odours lure him from the choſen game;
Deep-mouth'd he thunders, and inflam'd he views.
Springs on reſiſtleſs, and to death purſues.
Some hounds of manners vile (nor leſs we find
Of ſops in hounds, than in the reaſoning kind)
Puff'd with conceit run gladding o'er the plain,
And from the ſcent divert the wiſer train;
For the foe's footſteps fondly ſnuff their own,
And mar the muſic with their ſenſeleſs tone;
Start at the ſtarting prey, or ruſtling wind,
And, hot at firſt, inglorious lag behind.
A ſauntering tribe! may ſuch my foes diſgrace!
Give me, ye gods, to breed the nobler race.
Nor grieve thou to attend, while truths unknown
I ſing, and make Athenian arts our own.
Doſt thou in hounds aſpire to deathleſs fame?
Learn well their lineage and their ancient ſtem.
Each tribe with joy old ruſtic heralds trace,
And ſing the choſen worthies of their race;
How his ſire's features in the ſon were ſpy'd,
When Die was made the vigorous Ringwood's bride,
Leſs ſure thick lips the fate of Auſtria doom,
Or eagle noſes rul'd almighty Rome.
Good ſhape to various kinds old bards confine,
Some praiſe the Greek, and ſome the Roman line;
And dogs to beauty make as differing claims,
As Albion's nymphs, and India's jetty dames.
Immenſe to name their lands, to mark their bounds,
And paint the thouſand families of hounds:
Firſt count the ſands, the drops where oceans flow,
Or Gauls by Marlborough ſent to ſhades below.
The taſk be mine, to teach Britannia's ſwains,
My much-lov'd country, and my native plains.
Such be the dog, I charge, thou mean'ſt to train,
His back is crooked, and his belly plain,
Of fillet ſtretch'd, and huge of haunch behind,
A tapering tail, that nimbly cuts the wind;
Truſs-thigh'd, ſtraight-ham'd, and fox-like form'd his paw,
Large-leg'd, dry ſol'd, and of protended claw.
His flat, wide noſtrils ſnuff the ſavoury ſteam,
And from his eyes he ſhoots pernicious gleam;
Middling his head, and prone to earth his view,
With ears and cheſt that daſh the morning dew:
He beſt to ſtem the flood, to leap the bound,
And charm the Dryads with his voice profound;
To pay large tribute to his weary lord,
And crown the ſylvan hero's plenteous board.
The matron bitch whoſe womb ſhall beſt produce
The hopes and fortune of th' illuſtrious houſe,
Deriv'd from noble, but from foreign ſeed,
For various nature lothes inceſtuous breed,
Is like the ſire throughout. Nor yet diſpleaſe
Large flanks, and ribs, to give the teemer eaſe.
In ſpring let looſe thy pairs. Then all things prove
The ſtings of pleaſure, and the pangs of love:

Æthereal Jove then glads, with genial ſhowers,
Earth's mighty womb, and ſtrews her lap with flowers.
Hence juices mount, and huds embolden'd, try
More kindly breezes, and a ſofter ſky:
Kind Venus revels. Hark! on every bough,
In lulling ſtrains the feather'd warblers woo.
Fell tigers ſoften in th' infectious flames,
And lions, fawning, court their brinded dames:
Great love pervades the deep; to pleaſe his mate,
The whale, in gambols, moves his monſtrous weight,
Heav'd by his wayward mirth old ocean roars,
And ſcatter'd navies bulge on diſtant ſhores.
All nature ſmiles; come now, nor fear, my love,
To taſte the odours of the woodbine grove,
To paſs the evening glooms in harmleſs play,
And, ſweetly ſwearing, languiſh life away.
An altar, bound with recent flowers, I rear
To thee, beſt ſeaſon of the various year;
All hail! ſuch days in beauteous order ran,
So ſwift, ſo ſweet, when firſt the world began,
In Eden's bowers, when man's great fire aſſign'd
The names and natures of the brutal kind.
Then lamb and lion friendly walk'd their round,
And hares, undaunted, lick'd the fondling hound;
Wond'rous to tell! but when, with luckleſs hand,
Our daring mother broke the ſole command.
Then want and envy brought their meagre train,
Then wrath came down, and death had leave to reign:
Hence foxes earth'd, and wolves abhor'd the day,
And hungry churls enſnar'd the nightly prey;
Rude arts at firſt; but witty want refin'd
The huntſman's wiles, and famine form'd the mind.
Bold Nimrod firſt the lion's trophies wore,
The panther bound, and lanc'd the briſtling boar;
He taught to turn the hare, to bay the deer,
And wheel the courſer in his mid career:
Ah, had he there reſtrain'd his tyrant hand!
Let me, ye powers, an humbler wreath demand.
No pomps I aſk, which crowns and ſceptres yield,
Nor dangerous laurels in the duſty field;
Faſt by the foreſt, and the limpid ſpring,
Give me the warfare of the woods to ſing,
To breed my whelps, and healthful preſs the game,
A mean, inglorious, but a guiltleſs name.
And now thy female bears in ample womb
The bane of hares, and triumphs yet to come.
No ſport, I ween, nor blaſt of ſprightly horn,
Should tempt me then to hurt the whelps unborn.
Unlock'd, in covers let her freely run,
To range thy courts, and baſk before the ſun;
Near thy full table let the favourite ſtand,
Strok'd by thy ſon's, or blooming daughter's hand.
Careſs, indulge, by arts the matron bribe,
T' improve her breed, and teem a vigorous tribe.
So, if ſmall things may be compar'd with great,
And nature's works the muſes imitate,
So, ſtretch'd in ſhades, and lull'd by murmuring ſtreams,
Great Maro's breaſt receiv'd the heavenly dreams.
Recluſe, ſerene, the muſing prophet lay,
Till thoughts in embryo, ripening, burſt their way.
Hence bees in ſtate, and foaming courſers come
Heroes, and gods, and walls of lofty Rome.

TO APOLLO MAKING LOVE.

FROM MONSIEUR FONTENELLE.

I AM, cry'd Apollo, when Daphne he woo'd,
And panting for breath, the coy virgin purſued,
When his wiſdom, in manner moſt ample, expreſs'd
The long liſt of the graces his godſhip poſſeſs'd:
I'm the god of ſweet ſong, and inſpirer of lays;
Nor for lays, nor ſweet ſong, the fair fugitive ſtays;
I'm the god of the harp—ſtop my faireſt—in vain;
Nor the harp, nor the harper, could fetch her again.
Every plant, every flower, and their virtues I know,
God of light I'm above, and of phyſic below:
At the dreadful word phyſic, the nymph fled more faſt;
At the fatal word phyſic ſhe doubled her haſte.
Thou fond god of wiſdom, then, alter thy phraſe,
Bid her view the young bloom, and thy raviſhing rays,
Tell her leſs of thy knowledge, and more of thy charms,
And, my life for't, the damſel will fly to thy arms.

THE FATAL CURIOSITY.

MUCH had I heard of fair Francelia's name,
The laviſh praiſes of the babler, fame:
I thought them ſuch, and went prepar'd to pry,
And trace the charmer, with a critic's eye.
Reſolv'd to find ſome fault, before unſpy'd,
And diſappointed, if but ſatisfy'd.
Love pierc'd the vaſſal heart, that durſt rebel,
And, where a judge was meant, a victim fell:
On thoſe dear eyes, with ſweet perdition gay,
I gaz'd, at once, my pride and ſoul away;
All o'er I felt the luſcious poiſon run,
And, in a look, the haſty conqueſt won.
Thus the fond moth around the taper plays,
And ſports and flutters near the treacherous blaze;
Raviſh'd with joy, he wings his eager flight,
Nor dreams of ruin in ſo clear a light;
He tempts his fate, and courts a glorious doom,
A bright deſtruction, and a ſhining tomb.

TO A LADY;

WITH A DESCRIPTION OF THE PHOENIX.

LAVISH of wit, and bold, appear the lines,
Where Claudian's genius in the Phœnix ſhines;
A thouſand ways each brilliant point is turn'd,
And the gay poem, like its theme, adorn'd:
A tale more ſtrange ne'er grac'd the poet's art,
Nor e'er did fiction play ſo wild a part.
Each fabled charm in matchleſs Cælia meets,
The heavenly colours, and ambroſial ſweets;
Her virgin boſom chaſter fires ſupplies,
And beams more piercing guard her kindred eyes.
O'erflowing wit th' imagin'd wonder drew,
But fertile fancy ne'er can reach the true.

Now buds your youth, your cheeks their bloom disclose,
Th' untainted lily, and unfolding rose;
Ease in your mien, and sweetness in your face,
You speak a syren, and you move a grace;
Nor time shall urge these beauties to decay,
While virtue gives, what years shall steal away:
The fair, whose youth can boast the worth of age,
In age shall with the charms of youth engage;
In every change still lovely, still the same,
A fairer Phœnix in a purer flame.

A DESCRIPTION OF THE PHŒNIX.

FROM CLAUDIAN.

In utmost ocean lies a lovely isle,
Where spring still blooms, and greens for ever smile,
Which sees the sun put on his first array,
And hears his panting steeds bring on the day;
When, from the deep, they rush with rapid force,
And whirl aloft, to run their glorious course;
When first appear the ruddy streaks of light,
And glimmering beams dispel the parting night.
In these soft shades, unpress'd by human feet,
The happy phœnix keeps his balmy seat,
Far from the world disjoin'd; he reigns alone,
Alike the empire, and its king unknown.
A godlike bird! whose endless round of years
Outlasts the stars, and tires the circling spheres;
Not us'd like vulgar birds to eat his fill,
Or drink the crystal of the murmuring rill;
But fed with warmth from Titan's purer ray,
And slak'd by streams which eastern seas convey;
Still he renews his life in these abodes,
Contemns the power of fate, and mates the gods.
His fiery eyes shoot forth a glittering ray,
And round his head ten thousand glories play;
High on his crest, a star celestial bright
Divides the darkness with its piercing light;
His legs are stain'd with purple's lively dye,
His azure wings the fleeting winds outfly;
Soft plumes of cheerful blue his limbs enfold,
Enrich'd with spangles, and bedropt with gold.
Begot by none himself, begetting none,
Sire of himself he is, and of himself the son;
His life in fruitful death renews his date,
And kind destruction but prolongs his fate:
Ev'n in the grave new strength his limbs receive,
And on the funeral pile begin to live.
For when a thousand times the summer sun
His bending race has on the zodiac run,
And when as oft the vernal signs have roll'd,
As oft the wintery brought the numbing cold;
Then drops the bird, worn out with aged cares,
And bends beneath the mighty load of years.
So falls the stately pine, that proudly grew,
The shade and glory of the mountain's brow.
When pierc'd by blasts, and spouting clouds o'erspread,
It, slowly sinking, nods its tottering head,
Part dies by winds, and part by sickly rains,
And wasting age destroys the poor remains.
Then, as the silver empress of the night,
O'erclouded, glimmers in a fainter light,
So, froz'n with age, and shut from light supplies,
In lazy rounds scarce roll his feeble eyes,
And those fleet wings, for strength and speed renown'd,
Scarce rear th' inactive lumber from the ground.
Mysterious arts a second time create
The bird, prophetic of approaching fate.
Pil'd on a heap Sabæan herbs he lays,
Parch'd by his fire the sun's intensest rays;
The pile design'd to form his funeral scene
He wraps in covers of a fragrant green,
And bids his spicy heap at once become
A grave destructive, and a teeming womb.
On the rich bed the dying wonder lies,
Imploring Phœbus with persuasive cries,
To dart upon him in collected rays,
And new-create him in a deadly blaze.
The god beholds the suppliant from afar,
And stops the progress of his heavenly car.
" O thou, says he, whom harmless fires shall burn,
" Thy age the flame to second youth shall turn,
" An infant's cradle is thy funeral urn.
" Thou, on whom heaven has fix'd th' ambiguous
" doom
" To live by ruin, and by death to bloom,
" Thy life, thy strength, thy lovely form renew,
" And with fresh beauties doubly charm the view."
Thus speaking, 'midst the aromatic bed
A golden beam he tosses from his head;
Swift as desire, the shining ruin flies.
And straight devours the willing sacrifice,
Who hastes to perish in the fertile fire,
Sink into strength, and into life expire.
In flames the circling odours mount on high,
Perfume the air, and glitter in the sky,
The moon and stars, amaz'd, retard their flight,
And nature startles at the doubtful sight;
For, whilst the pregnant urn with fury glows,
The goddess labours with a mother's throes,
Yet joys to cherish, in the friendly flames,
The noblest product of the skill she claims.
Th' enlivening dust its head begins to rear,
And on the ashes sprouting plumes appear;
In the dead bird reviving vigour reigns,
And life returning revels in his veins:
A new-born Phœnix starting from the flame,
Obtains at once a son's, and father's name;
And the great change of double life displays,
In the short moment of one transient blaze.
On his new pinions to the Nile he bends,
And to the gods his parent urn commends,
To Egypt bearing, with majestic pride,
The balmy nest, where first he liv'd and dy'd.
Birds of all kinds admire th' unusual sight,
And grace the triumph of his infant flight;
In crowds unnumber'd round their chief they fly,
Oppress the air, and cloud the spacious sky;
Nor dares the fiercest of the winged race
Obstruct his journey through th' ethereal space;
The hawk and eagle useless wars forbear,
Forego their courage, and consent to fear;
The feather'd nations humble homage bring,
And bless the gaudy flight of their ambrosial king.
Less glittering pomp does Parthia's monarch
Commanding legions to the dusty field; [yield,
Though sparkling jewels on his helm abound,
And royal gold his awful head surround;

Though rich embroidery paint his purple veſt,
And his ſteed bound in coſtly trappings dreſt,
Pleas'd in the battle's dreadful van to ride,
In graceful grandeur, and imperial pride.
Fam'd for the worſhip of the ſun, there ſtands
A ſacred fane in Egypt's fruitful lands,
Hewn from the Theban mountain's rocky womb
An hundred columns rear the marble dome;
Hither, 'tis ſaid, he brings the precious load,
A grateful offering to the beamy god;
Upon whoſe altar's conſecrated blaze
The ſeeds and relics of himſelf he lays,
Whence flaming incenſe makes the temple ſhine,
And the glad altars breathe perfumes divine.
The wafted ſmell to far Peluſian flies,
To cheer old Ocean, and enrich the ſkies,
With nectar's ſweets to make the nations ſmile,
And ſcent the ſeven-fold channels of the Nile.
Thrice happy Phœnix! heaven's peculiar care
Has made thyſelf thyſelf's ſurviving heir;
By death thy deathleſs vigour is ſupply'd,
Which ſinks to ruin all the world beſide;
Thy age, not thee, aſſiſting Phœbus burns,
And vital flames light up thy funeral urns.
Whate'er events have been, thy eyes ſurvey,
And thou art fixt, while ages roll away;
Thou ſaw'ſt when raging Ocean burſt his bed,
O'ertop'd the mountains, and the earth o'erſpread;
When the raſh youth enflam'd the high abodes,
Scorch'd up the ſkies, and ſcar'd the deathleſs gods.
When nature ceaſes, thou ſhalt ſtill remain,
Nor ſecond chaos bound thy endleſs reign;
Fate's tyrant laws thy happier lot ſhall brave,
Baffle deſtruction, and elude the grave.

VERSES TO MRS. LOWTHER

ON HER MARRIAGE.

From Menage.

The greateſt ſwain that treads th' Arcadian grove,
Our ſhepherds envy, and our virgins love,
His charming nymph, his ſofter fair obtains,
The bright Diana of our flowery plains;
He, 'midſt the graceful, of ſuperior grace,
And ſhe the loveliеſt of the loveliеſt race.
Thy fruitful influence, guardian Juno, ſhed,
And crown the pleaſures of the genial bed:
Raiſe thence, their future joy, a ſmiling heir,
Brave as the father, as the mother fair.
Well may'ſt thou ſhower thy choiceſt gifts on thoſe,
Who boldly rival thy moſt hated foes;
The vigorous bridegroom with Alcides vies,
And the fair bride has Cytherea's eyes;

TO A LADY;

WITH A PRESENT OF FLOWERS.

The fragrant painting of our flowery fields,
The choiceſt ſtores that youthful ſummer yields,
Strephon to fair Eliza hath convey'd,
The ſweeteſt garland to the ſweeteſt maid.
O cheer the flowers, my fair, and let them reſt
On the Elyſium of thy ſnowy breaſt,
And there regale the ſmell, and charm the view,
With richer odours, and a lovelier hue.
Learn hence, nor fear a flatterer in the flower,
Thy form divine, and beauty's matchleſs power:
Faint, near thy cheeks, the bright carnation glows,
And thy ripe lips outbluſh the opening roſe:
The lily's ſnow betrays leſs pure a light,
Loſt in thy boſom's more unſullied white;
And wreathes of jaſmine ſhed perfumes, beneath
Th' ambroſial incenſe of thy balmy breath.
Ten thouſand beauties grace the rival pair,
How fair the chaplet, and the nymph how fair!
But ah! too ſoon theſe fleeting charms decay,
The fading luſtre of one haſtening day.
This night ſhall ſee the gaudy wreath decline,
The roſes wither, and the lilies pine.
The garlands fate to thine ſhall be apply'd,
And what advance thy form, ſhall check thy pride;
Be wiſe, my fair, the preſent hour improve,
Let joy be now, and now a waſte of love;
Each drooping bloom ſhall plead thy juſt excuſe,
And that which ſhow'd thy beauty, ſhow its uſe.

ON A LADY'S PICTURE.

TO GILFRED LAWSON, ESQUIRE.

As Damon Chloe's painted form ſurvey'd,
He ſigh'd, and languiſh'd for the jilting ſhade:
For Cupid taught the artiſt hand its grace,
And Venus wanton'd in the mimic face.
Now he laments a look ſo falſely fair,
And almoſt damns, what yet reſembles her;
Now he devours it with his longing eyes;
Now fated, from the lovely phantom flies,
Yet burns to look again, yet looks again, and dies.
Her ivory neck his lips preſume to kiſs,
And his bold hands the ſwelling boſom preſs;
The ſwain drinks in deep draughts of vain deſire,
Melts without heat, and burns in fancy'd fire.
Strange power of paint! thou nice creator art!
What love inſpires, may life itſelf impart.
Struck with like wounds, of old, Pygmalion pray'd,
And hugg'd to life his artificial maid;
Claſp, new Pygmalion, claſp the ſeeming charms,
Perhaps ev'n now th' enlivening image warms,
Deſtin'd to crown thy joys, and revel in thy arms:
Thy arms, which ſhall with fire ſo fierce invade,
That ſhe at once ſhall be, and ceaſe to be a maid.

PART OF THE FOURTH BOOK OF LUCAN.

Cæſar, having reſolved to give battle to Petreius and Afranius, Pompey's lieutenants in Spain, encamped near the enemy in the ſame field. The behaviour of their ſoldiers, at their ſeeing and knowing one another, is the ſubject of the following verſes.

Their ancient friends, as now they nearer drew,
Prepar'd for fight the wondering ſoldiers knew;
Brother, with brother in unnatural ſtrife,
And the ſon arm'd againſt the father's life:
Curſt civil war! then conſcience firſt was felt,
And the tough veteran's heart began to melt.
Fix'd in dumb ſorrow all at once they ſtand,
Then wave, a pledge of peace, the guiltleſs hand;

To vent ten thousand struggling passions move,
The stings of nature, and the pangs of love.
All order broken, wide their arms they throw,
And run with transport, to the longing foe:
Here the long lost acquaintance neighbours claim,
There an old friend recalls his comrade's name,
Youths, who in arts beneath one tutor grew,
Rome rent in twain, and kindred hosts they view.
Tears wet their impious arms, a fond relief,
And kisses, broke by sobs, the words of grief;
Though yet no blood was spilt, each anxious mind
With horror thinks on what his rage design'd.
Ah! generous youths, why thus, with fruitless pain,
Beat ye those breasts? why gush those eyes in vain?
Why blame ye heaven, and charge your guilt on fate?
Why dread the tyrant, whom yourselves make great?
Bids he the trumpet sound? the trumpet slight.
Bids he the standards move? refuse the fight.
Your generals, left by you, will love again
A son and father, when they're private men.
Kind Concord, heavenly born! whose blissful reign
Holds this vast globe in one surrounding chain,
Whose laws the jarring elements controul,
And knit each atom close from pole to pole;
Soul of the world! and love's eternal spring!
This lucky hour, thy aid fair goddess bring!
This lucky hour, ere aggravated crimes
Heap guilt on guilt, and doubly stain the times.
No veil henceforth for sin, for pardon none;
They know their duty, now their friends are known.
Vain wish! from blood short must the respite be,
New crimes, by love enhanc'd, this night shall see:
Such is the will of fate, and such the hard decree.
'Twas peace. From either camp, now void of fear,
The soldiers mingling cheerful feasts prepare:
On the green sod the friendly bowls were crown'd,
And hasty banquets pil'd upon the ground:
Around the fire they talk, one shows his scars,
One tells what chance first led him to the wars;
Their stories o'er the tedious night prevail,
And the mute circle listens to the tale;
They own they fought, but swear they ne'er could hate,
Deny their guilt and lay the blame on fate;
Their love revives to make them guiltier grow,
A short-liv'd blessing, but to heighten woe.
When to Petreius first the news was told,
The jealous general thought his legions sold.
Swift with the guards, his headstrong fury drew,
From out his camp he drives the hostile crew;
Cuts clasping friends asunder with his sword,
And stains with blood each hospitable board.
Then thus his wrath breaks out. 'Oh! lost to fame
'Oh! false to Pompey, and the Roman name!
'Can ye not conquer, ye degenerate bands?
'Oh! die at least; 'tis all that Rome demands.
'What! will you own, while ye can wield the sword,
'A rebel standard, and usurping lord?
'Shall he be sued to take you into place
'Amongst his slaves, and grant you equal grace?
'What? shall my life be begg'd? inglorious thought!
'And life abhorr'd, on such conditions bought!
'The toils we bear, my friends, are not for life,
'Too mean a prize in such a dreadful strife;
'But peace would lead to servitude and shame,
'A fair amusement, and a specious name.
'Never had man explor'd the iron ore,
'Mark'd out the trench, or rais'd the lofty tower,
'Ne'er had the steed in harness fought the plain,
'Or fleets encounter'd on th' unstable main;
'Were life, were breath, with fame to be compar'd,
'Or peace to glorious liberty preferr'd.
'By guilty oaths the hostile army bound,
'Holds fast its impious faith, and stands its ground;
'Are you perfidious, who espouse the laws,
'And traitors only in a righteous cause?
'Oh shame! in vain through nations far and wide,
'Thou call'st the crowding monarchs to thy side,
'Fall'n Pompey! while thy legions here betray
'Thy cheap bought life, and treat thy fame away.'
He ended fierce. The soldier's rage returns,
His blood flics upward, and his bosom burns.
So, haply tam'd, the tiger bears his bands,
Less grimly growls, and licks his keeper's hands;
But if by chance he tastes forbidden gore,
He yells amain, and makes his dungeon roar.
He glares, he foams, he aims a desperate bound,
And his pale master flies the dangerous ground.
Now deeds are done, which man might charge aright
On stubborn fate, or undiscerning night,
Had not their guilt the lawless soldiers known,
And made the whole malignity their own.
The beds, the plenteous tables, float with gore,
And breasts are stabb'd, that were embrac'd before:
Pity a while their hands from slaughter kept.
Inward they groan'd, and, as they drew, they wept.
But every blow their wavering rage assures,
In murder hardens, and to blood inures,
Crowds charge on crowds, nor friends their friends descry,
But sires by sons, and sons by fathers die.
Black, monstrous rage! each, with victorious cries,
Drags his slain friend before the general's eyes,
Exults in guilt, that throws the only shame
On Pompey's cause, and blots the Roman name.

THE FIRST BOOK OF HOMER'S ILIAD.

THE DEDICATION.

When I first entered upon this translation, I was ambitious of dedicating it to the Earl of Halifax; but being prevented from doing myself that honour, by the unspeakable loss which our country hath sustained in the death of that extraordinary person, I hope I shall not be blamed for presuming to make a dedication of it to his memory. The greatness of his name will justify a practice altogether uncommon, and may gain favour towards a work, which (if it had deserved his patronage) is perhaps the only one inſcribed to his lordſhip, that will eſcape being rewarded by him.

I might have one advantage from ſuch a dedication, that nothing, I could ſay in it, would be ſuſpected of flattery. Beſides that the world would take a pleaſure in hearing thoſe things ſaid of this great man, now he is dead, which he himſelf would have been offended at when living. But though I am ſenſible, ſo amiable and exalted a character would be very acceptable to the public, were I able to draw it in its full extent, I ſhould be cenſured very deſervedly, ſhould I venture upon an undertaking, to which I am by no means equal.

His conſummate knowledge in all kinds of buſineſs, his winning eloquence in public aſſemblies, his active zeal for the good of his country, and the ſhare he had in conveying the ſupreme power to an illuſtrious family famous for being friends to mankind, are ſubjects eaſy to be enlarged upon, but incapable of being exhauſted. The nature of the following performance more directly leads me to lament the misfortune, which hath befallen the learned world, by the death of ſo generous and univerſal a patron.

He reſted not in a barren admiration of the polite arts, wherein he himſelf was ſo great a maſter; but was acted by that humanity they naturally inſpire: which gave riſe to many excellent writers, who have caſt a light upon the age in which he lived, and will diſtinguiſh it to poſterity. It is well known, that very few celebrated pieces have been publiſhed for ſeveral years, but what were either promoted by his encouragement, or ſupported by his approbation, or recompenſed by his bounty. And if the ſucceſſion of men, who excel in moſt of the refined arts, ſhould not continue; though ſome may impute it to a decay of genius in our countrymen; thoſe, who are unacquainted with his lordſhip's character, will know more juſtly how to account for it.

The cauſe of liberty will receive no ſmall advantage in future times, when it ſhall be obſerved that the Earl of Halifax was one of the patriots who were at the head of it; and that moſt of thoſe, who were eminent in the ſeveral parts of polite or uſeful learning, were by his influence and example engaged in the ſame intereſt.

I hope, therefore, the public will excuſe my ambition for thus intruding into the number of thoſe applauded men, who have paid him this kind of homage: eſpecially ſince I am alſo prompted to it by gratitude, for the protection with which he had begun to honour me; and do it at a time when he cannot ſuffer by the importunity of my acknowments.

TO THE READER.

I MUST inform the reader, that when I began this firſt book, I had ſome thoughts of tranſlating the whole Iliad: but had the pleaſure of being diverted from that deſign, by finding the work was fallen into a much abler hand. I would not therefore be thought to have any other view in publiſhing this ſmall ſpecimen of Homer's Iliad, than to beſpeak, if poſſible, the favour of the public to a tranſlation of Homer's Odyſſeys, wherein I have already made ſome progreſs.

ACHILLES' fatal wrath, whence diſcord roſe,
That brought the ſons of Greece unnumber'd woes,
O goddeſs, ſing. Full many a hero's ghoſt
Was driven untimely to th' infernal coaſt,
While in promiſcuous heaps their bodies lay,
A feaſt for dogs, and every bird of prey.
So did the ſire of gods and men fulfil
His ſtedfaſt purpoſe, and almighty will;
What time the haughty chiefs their jars begun,
Atrides, king of men, and Peleus' godlike ſon.
What god in ſtrife the princes did engage?
Apollo burning with vindictive rage
Againſt the ſcornful king, whoſe impious pride
His prieſt diſhonour'd, and his power defy'd.
Hence ſwift contagion, by the god's commands,
Swept through the camp, and thinn'd the Grecian bands.
For, wealth, immenſe the holy Chryſes bore,
(His daughter's ranſom) to the tented ſhore:
His ſceptre ſtretching forth, the golden rod,
Hung round with hallow'd garlands of his god,
Of all the hoſt, of every princely chief,
But firſt of Atreus' ſons he begg'd relief:
"Great Atreus' ſons and warlike Greeks attend,
"So may th' immortal gods your cauſe befriend,
"So may you Priam's lofty bulwarks burn,
"And rich in gather'd ſpoils to Greece return,
"As for theſe gifts my daughter you beſtow,
"And reverence due to great Apollo ſhow,
"Jove's favourite offſpring, terrible in war,
"Who ſends his ſhafts unerring from afar."
Throughout the hoſt conſenting murmurs riſe,
The prieſt to reverence, and give back the prize;
When the great king, incens'd, his ſilence broke
In words reproachful, and thus ſternly ſpoke:
"Hence, dotard, from my ſight. Nor ever more
"Approach, I warn thee, this forbidden ſhore;
"Leſt thou ſtretch forth, my fury to reſtrain,
"The wreathes and ſceptre of thy god, in vain.
"The captive maid I never will reſign,
"Till age o'ertake her, I have vow'd her mine.
"To diſtant Argos ſhall the fair be led:
"She ſhall; to ply the loom, and grace my bed.
"Begone, ere evil intercept thy way.
"Hence on thy life nor urge me by thy ſtay."
He ended frowning. Speechleſs and diſmay'd,
The aged ſire his ſtern command obey'd.
Silent he paſs'd, amid the deafening roar
Of tumbling billows, on the lonely ſhore:
Far from the camp he paſs'd: then ſuppliant ſtood;
And thus the hoary prieſt invok'd his god:
"Dread warrior with the ſilver bow, give ear.
"Patron of Chryſa and of Cilla, hear.
"To thee the guard of Tenedos belongs;
"Propitious Smintheus! Oh, redreſs my wrongs.
"If e'er within thy fane, with wreathes adorn'd,
"The fat of bulls and well-fed goats I burn'd,
"O! hear my prayer. Let Greece thy fury know,
"And with thy ſhafts avenge thy ſervant's woe."

Apollo heard his injur'd ſuppliant's cry.
Down ruſh'd the vengeful warrior from the ſky;
Acroſs his breaſt the glittering bow he ſlung,
And at his back the well-ſtor'd quiver hung:
(His arrows rattled, as he urg'd his flight.)
In clouds he flew, conceal'd from mortal ſight:
Then took his ſtand, the well-aim'd ſhaft to throw:
Fierce ſprung the ſtring, and twang'd the ſilver bow.
The dogs and mules his firſt keen arrow flew;
Amid the ranks the next more fatal flew,
A deathful dart. The funeral piles around
For ever blaz'd on the devoted ground.
Nine days entire he vex'd th' embattled hoſt,
The tenth. Achilles through the winding coaſt
Summon'd a council, by the queen's command
Who wields heaven's ſceptre in her ſnowy hand:
She mourn'd her favourite Greeks, who now encloſe
The hero, ſwiftly ſpeaking as he roſe:
" What now, O Atreus' ſon, remains in view,
" But o'er the deep our wanderings to renew,
" Doom'd to deſtruction, while our waſted powers
" The ſword and peſtilence at once devours?
" Why haſte we not ſome prophet's ſkill to prove,
" Or ſeek by dreams? for dreams deſcend from " Jove.)
" What moves Apollo's rage let him explain,
" What vow with-held, what hecatomb unſlain:
" And if the blood of lambs and goats can pay
" The price of guilt, and turn this curſe away."
Thus he. And next the reverend Calchas roſe,
Their guide to Ilion whom the Grecians choſe;
The prince of augurs, whoſe enlightened eye
Could things paſt, preſent, and to come, deſcry:
Such wiſdom Phœbus gave. He thus began,
His ſpeech addreſſing to the godlike man:
" Me then command'ſt thou, lov'd of Jove, to " ſhow
" What moves the god that bends the dreadful bow?
" Firſt plight thy faith thy ready help to lend,
" By words to aid me, or by arms defend.
" For I foreſee his rage, whoſe ample ſway
" The Argian powers and ſceptred chiefs obey.
" The wrath of kings what ſubject can oppoſe?
" Deep in their breaſts the ſmother'd vengeance " glows,
" Still watchful to deſtroy. Swear, valiant youth,
" Swear, wilt thou guard me, if I ſpeak the truth?"
To this Achilles ſwift replies: " Be bold.
" Diſcloſe, what Phœbus tells thee, uncontroul'd.
" By him, who, liſtening to thy powerful prayer,
" Reveals the ſecret, I devoutly ſwear,
" That, while theſe eyes behold the light, no hand
" Shall dare to wrong thee on this crowded ſtrand,
" Not Atreus' ſon. Though now himſelf he boaſt
" The king of men, and ſovereign of the hoſt."
Then boldly he. " Nor does the god complain
" Of vows with-held, or hecatombs unſlain.
" Chryſeïs to her awful ſire refus'd,
" The gifts rejected, and the prieſt abus'd, [call,
" Call down theſe judgments, and for more they
" Juſt ready on th' exhauſted camp to fall;
" Till ranſom-free the damſel is beſtow'd,
" And hecatombs are ſent to ſoothe the god,
" To Chryſa ſent. Perhaps Apollo's rage
" The gifts may expiate, and the prieſt aſſuage."
He ſpoke and ſat. When, with an angry frown,
The chief of kings upſtarted from his throne.
Diſdain and vengeance in his boſom riſe,
Lour in his brows, and ſparkle in his eyes:
Full at the prieſt their fiery orbs he bent,
And all at once his fury found a vent.
" Augur of ills, (for never good to me
" Did that moſt inauſpicious voice decree)
" Forever ready to denounce my woes,
" When Greece is puniſh'd, I am ſtill the cauſe;
" And now when Phœbus ſpreads his plagues a- " broad,
" And waſtes our camp, 'tis I provoke the god,
" Becauſe my blooming captive I detain,
" And the large ranſom is produc'd in vain.
" Fond of the maid, my queen, in beauty's pride,
" Ne'er charm'd me more, a virgin and a bride;
" Not Clytemneſtra boaſts a nobler race,
" A ſweeter temper, or a lovelier face,
" In works of female ſkill hath more command,
" Or guides the needle with a nicer hand.
" Yet ſhe ſhall go. The fair our peace ſhall buy:
" Better I ſuffer, than my people die.
" But mark me well. See inſtantly prepar'd
" A full equivalent, a new reward.
" Nor is it meet, while each enjoys his ſhare,
" Your chief ſhould loſe his portion of the war:
" In vain your chief; whilſt the dear prize I boaſt,
" Is wreſted from me, and forever loſt."
To whom the ſwift purſuer quick reply'd:
" O ſunk in avarice, and ſwoln with pride!
" How ſhall the Greeks, though large of ſoul they " be,
" Collect their ſever'd ſpoils, a heap for thee
" To ſearch anew, and cull the choiceſt ſhare,
" Amid the mighty harveſt of the war?
" Then yield thy captive to the god reſign'd,
" Aſſur'd a tenfold recompenſe to find,
" When Jove's decree ſhall throw proud Ilion " down,
" And give to plunder the devoted town."
" Think not (Atrides anſwer'd) though thou " ſhine,
" Graceful in beauty, like the powers divine,
" Think not, thy wiles, in ſpecious words convey'd,
" From its firm purpoſe ſhall my ſoul diſſuade.
" Muſt I alone bereft ſit down with ſhame,
" And thou inſulting keep thy captive dame?
" If, as I aſk, the large-ſoul'd Greeks conſent
" Full recompenſe to give, I ſtand content.
" If not: a prize I ſhall myſelf decree,
" From him, or him, or elſe perhaps from thee.
" While the proud prince, deſpoil'd, ſhall rage in " vain.
" But break we here. The reſt let time explain.
" Launch now a well-trimm'd galley from the ſhore,
" With hands experienc'd at the bending oar:
" Encloſe the hecatomb; and then with care
" To the high deck convey the captive fair.
" The ſacred bark let ſage Ulyſſes guide,
" Or Ajax, or Idomeneus, preſide:
" Or thou, O mighty man, the chief ſhalt be.
" And who more fit to ſoothe the god than thee?"

" Shameleſs, and poor of ſoul," the prince replies,
And on the monarch caſts his ſcornful eyes,
" What Greek henceforth will march at thy com-
" mand,
" In ſearch of danger on the doubtful ſtrand?
" Who in the face of day provoke the fight,
" Or tempt the ſecret ambuſh of the night?
" Not I, be ſure. Henceforward I am free.
" For ne'er was Priam's houſe a foe to me.
" Far from their inroads, in my paſtures feed
" The lowing heifer, and the pamper'd ſteed,
" On Phthia's hills our fruits ſecurely grow,
" And ripen careleſs of the diſtant foe,
" Between whoſe realms and our Theſſalian ſhore
" Unnumber'd mountains riſe, and billows roar.
" For thine, and for thy baffled brother's ſame,
" Acroſs the ſeas, diſdainful man, I came;
" Yet inſolent! by arbitrary ſway,
" Thou talk'ſt of ſeizing on my rightful prey,
" The prize whoſe purchaſe toils and dangers coſt,
" And given by ſuffrage of the Grecian hoſt.
" What town, when ſack'd by our victorious bands,
" But ſtill brought wealth to thoſe rapacious hands?
" To me, thus ſcorn'd, contented, doſt thou yield
" My ſhare of blood in the tumultuous field;
" But ſtill the flower of all the ſpoil is thine;
" There claim'ſt thou moſt. Nor e'er did I repine.
" Whate'er was giv'n I took, and thought it beſt,
" With ſlaughter tir'd, and panting after reſt.
" To Phthia now, for I ſhall fight no more,
" My ſhips their crooked prows ſhall turn from
" ſhore.
" When I am ſcorn'd, I think I well foreſee
" What ſpoils and pillage will be won by thee,
" Hence! (cry'd the monarch) hence! without
" delay: [ſtay.
" Think not, vain man! my voice ſhall urge thy
" Others thou leav'ſt to the great cauſe inclin'd,
" A league of kings thou leav'ſt, and Jove behind.
" Of all the chiefs doſt thou oppoſe me moſt:
" Outrage and uproar are thy only boaſt.
" Diſcord and jars thy joy. But learn to know,
" If thou art ſtrong, 'tis Jove hath made thee ſo.
" Go, at thy pleaſure. None will ſtop thy way.
" Go, bid thy baſe-born Myrmidons obey.
" Thou, nor thy rage, ſhall my reſolves ſubdue;
" I fix my purpoſe, and my threats renew.
" Since 'tis decreed I muſt the maid reſtore,
" A ſhip ſhall waft her to th' offended power;
" But fair Briſeïs thy allotted prize,
" Myſelf will ſeize, and ſeize before thy eyes:
" That thou and each audacious man may ſee,
" How vain the raſh attempt to cope with me."
Stung to the ſoul, tumultuous thoughts began
This way and that to rend the godlike man.
To force a paſſage with his falchion drawn,
And hurl th' imperial boaſter from his throne,
He now reſolves. and now reſolves again
To quell his fury, and his arm reſtrain.
While thus by turns his rage and reaſon ſway'd,
And half unſheath'd he held the glittering blade;
That moment, Juno, whoſe impartial eye
Watch'd o'er them both, ſent Pallas from the ſky:
She flew, and caught his yellow hair behind,
To him alone the radiant goddeſs ſhin'd.)
Sudden he turn'd, and ſtarted with ſurpriſe;
Rage and revenge flaſh'd dreadful in his eyes.
Then thus with haſty words? " O! heavenly-
" born,
" Com'ſt thou to ſee proud Agamemnon's ſcorn?
" But thou ſhalt ſee (my ſword ſhall make it good)
" This glutted ſand ſmoke with the tyrant's blood."
" To ſoothe thy ſoul, the blue-ey'd maid replies,
" (If thou obey my voice) I left the ſkies.
" Heaven's queen, who favours both, gave this " command!
" Suppreſs thy wrath, and ſtay thy vengeful hand.
" Be all thy rage in tauntful words expreſt;
" But guiltleſs let the thirſty falchion reſt.
" Mark what I ſpeak. An hour is on its way,
" When gifts tenfold for this affront ſhall pay.
" Suppreſs thy wrath; and heaven and me obey."
Then he: " I yield; though with reluctant
" mind.
" Who yields to heaven ſhall heaven propitious find."
The ſilver hilt cloſe-graſping, at the word,
Deep in the ſheath he plung'd his mighty ſword.
The goddeſs, turning, darted from his ſight,
And reach'd Olympus in a moment's flight.
But fierce Achilles, in a thundering tone,
Throws out his wrath, and goes impetuous on:
" Valiant with wine, and furious from the " bowl!
" Thou fierce-look'd talker with a coward ſoul!
" War's glorious peril ever flow to ſhare:
" Aloof thou view'ſt the field; for death is there,
" 'Tis greater far this peaceful camp to ſway,
" And peel the Greeks, at will, who diſobey:
" A tyrant lord o'er ſlaves to earth debas'd;
" For, had they ſouls, this outrage were thy laſt.
" But, thou, my fix'd, my final purpoſe hear.
" By this dread ſceptre ſolemnly I ſwear:
" By this (which, once from out the foreſt torn,
" Nor leaf nor ſhade ſhall ever more adorn.
" Which never more its verdure muſt renew,
" Lopp'd from the vital ſtem, whence firſt it grew,
" But given by Jove the ſons of men to awe,
" Now ſways the nations, and confirms the law)
" A day ſhall come, when for this hour's diſdain
" The Greeks ſhall wiſh for me, and wiſh in vain
" Nor thou, though griev'd, the wanted aid af-
" ford,
" When heaps on heaps ſhall fall by Hector's ſword:
" Too late with anguiſh ſhall thy heart be torn,
" That the firſt Greek was made the public ſcorn."
He ſaid. And, mounting with a furious bound,
He daſh'd his ſtudded ſceptre on the ground;
Then ſat. Atrides, eager to reply,
On the fierce champion glanc'd a vengeful eye.
'Twas then, the madding monarchs to compoſe,
The Pylian prince, the ſmooth-ſpeech'd Neſtor
roſe.
His tongue dropp'd honey. Full of days was he;
Two ages paſt, he liv'd the third to ſee:
And, his firſt race of ſubjects long decay'd,
O'er their ſons ſons a peaceful ſceptre ſway'd.
" Alas for Greece! (he cries) and with what joy
" Shall Priam hear, and every ſon of Troy!
" That you, the firſt in wiſdom as in wars,
" Waſte your great ſouls in poor ignoble jars!

" Go to! you both are young. Yet oft rever'd
" Greater than you have the wise Nestor heard.
" Their equals never shall these eyes behold:
" Cæneus the just, Pirithous the bold,
" Exadius, Dryas, born to high command,
" Shepherds of men, and rulers of the land,
" Theseus unrivall'd in his sire's abodes,
" And mighty Polypheme, a match for gods.
" They, greatest names that ancient story knows,
" In mortal conflict met as dreadful foes:
" Fearless through rocks and wilds their prey pur-
" sued,
" And the huge double Centaur race subdued.
" With them my early youth was pleas'd to roam
" Through regions, far from my sweet native home;
" They call'd me to the wars. No living hand
" Could match their valour, or their strength
" withstand;
" Yet wont they oft my sage advice to hear.
" Then listen both, with an attentive ear.
" Seize not thou, king of men, the beauteous slave,
" Th' allotted prize the Grecian voices gave.
" Nor thou, Pelides, in a threatening tone
" Urge him to wrath, who fills that sacred throne,
" The king of forty kings, and honour'd more
" By mighty Jove, than e'er was king before.
" Brave though thou art, and of a race divine,
" Thou must obey a power more great than thine.
" And thou, O king, forbear. Myself will sue
" Great Thetis' son his vengeance to subdue:
" Great Thetis' valiant son, our country's boast,
" The shield and bulwark of the Grecian host."
" Wise are thy words, O sire, (the king began)
" But what can satiate this aspiring man?
" Unbounded power he claims o'er humankind,
" And hopes for slaves I trust, he ne'er shall find.
" Shall we, because the gods have form'd him
" strong,
" Bear the lewd language of his lawless tongue!
" If aw'd by thee, the Greeks might well de-
" spise
" My name," the prince precipitate, replies.
" In vain thou nodd'st from thy imperial throne.
" Thy vassals seek elsewhere; for I am none.
" But break we here. The fair, though justly mine,
" With sword undrawn I purpose to resign.
" On aught beside, I once for all command,
" Lay not, I charge thee, thy presumptuous hand.
" Come not within my reach, nor dare advance,
" Or thy heart's blood shall reek upon my lance."
Thus both in foul debate prolong'd the day.
The council broke, each takes his separate way.
Achilles seeks his tent with restless mind;
Patroclus and his train move slow behind.
Mean time, a bark was haul'd along the sand,
Twice ten selected Greeks, a brawny band,
Tug the tough oars, at the great king's command.
The gifts, the hecatomb, the captive fair,
Are all intrusted to Ulysses' care.
They mount the deck. The vessel takes its flight,
Bounds o'er the surge, and lessens to the sight.
Next he ordains along the winding coast
By hollow'd rites to purify the host.
A herd of chosen victims they provide,
And cast their offals on the briny tide,
Fat bulls and goats to great Apollo die.
In clouds the savoury steam ascend the sky.
The Greeks to heaven their solemn vows address;
But dire revenge roll'd in the monarch's breast.
Obsequious at his call two heralds stand:
To them in frowns he gives this harsh command.
" Ye heralds, to Achilles' tent repair;
" Thence swift the female slave Briseïs bear.
" With arms, if disobey'd, myself will come.
" Bid him resign her, or he tempts his doom."
The heralds, though unwillingly, obey.
Along the sea-beat shore they speed their way:
And, now the Myrmidonian quarter past,
At his tent-door they find the hero plac'd.
Disturb'd the solemn messengers he saw:
They too stood silent, with respectful awe,
Before the royal youth, they neither spoke.
He guess'd their message, and the silence broke:
" Ye ministers of gods and men, draw near,
" Not you, but him whose heralds ye appear,
" Robb'd of my right I blame. Patroclus, bring
" The damsel forth for this disdainful king.
" But ye, my wrongs, O heralds, bear in mind,
" And clear me to the gods and all mankind,
" Ev'n to your thoughtless king; if evermore
" My aid be wanted on the hostile shore.
" Thoughtless he is, nor knows his certain doom,
" Blind to the past, nor sees the woes to come,
" His best defence thus rashly to forego,
" And leave a naked army to the foe."
He ceas'd Patroclus his dear friend obey'd,
And usher'd in the lovely weeping maid.
Sore sigh'd she, as the heralds took her hand,
And oft look'd back slow-moving o'er the strand.
The widow'd hero, when the fair was gone,
Far from his friends sat bath'd in tears alone.
On the cold beach he sat, and fix'd his eyes
Where black with storms the curling billows rise,
And as the sea wide-rolling he survey'd,
With out-stretch'd arms to his fond mother pray'd:
" Since to short life thy hapless son was born,
" Great Jove stands bound by promise to adorn
" His tinted course with an immortal name.
" Is this the great amends? the promis'd fame?
" The son of Atreus, proud of lawless sway,
" Demands, possesses, and enjoys my prey."
Near her old sire enthron'd, she heard him weep
From the low silent caverns of the deep:
Then in a morning mist her head she rears,
Sits by her son, and mingles tears with tears, [cries) Cl se grasps her darling's hand. " My son (she
" Why heaves thy heart? and why o'erflow thy
" eyes?
" Oh tell me, tell thy mother all thy care,
" That both may know it, and that both may
" share.' [groan,
" Oh! goddess! (cry'd he with an inward
" Thou know'st it all: to thee are all things
" known.
" Eëtian Thebes we sack'd, their ransack'd towers,
" The plunder of a people, all was ours.
" We stood agreed the booty to divide.
" Chryseïs rosy-cheek'd, and glossy-ey'd,
" Fell to the king; but holy Chryses bore
" Vast gifts of ransom to the tented shore:

" His sceptre stretching forth (the golden rod
" Hung round with hallow'd garlands of his god)
" Of all the host, of every princely chief.
" But first of Atreus' sons he begg'd relief.
" Throughout the host consenting murmurs ran,
" To yield her to the venerable man;
" But the harsh king deny'd to do him right,
" And drove the trembling prophet from his sight.
" Apollo heard his injur'd suppliant's cry,
" And dealt his arrows through th' infected sky;
" The swift contagion sent by his commands,
" Swept through the camp, and thinn'd the Gre-
" cian bands.
" The guilty cause a sacred augur show'd,
" And I first mov'd to mitigate the god.
" At this the tyrant storm'd, and vengeance vow'd;
" And now too soon hath made his threatnings
" good.
" Chryseïs first with gifts to Chrysa sent,
" His heralds came this moment to my tent,
" And bore Breseïs thence, my beauteous slave,
" Th' allotted prize, which the leagu'd Grecians
" gave.
" Thou goddess, then, and thou, I know, hast
" power,
" For thine own son the might of Jove implore.
" Oft in my father's house I've heard thee tell,
" When sudden fears on heaven's great monarchs
" fell,
" Thy aid the rebel deities o'ercame,
" And fav'd the mighty thunderer from shame.
" Pallas, and Neptune, and great Juno, bound
" The fire in chains, and hemm'd their sovereign
" round.
" Thy voice, O goddess, broke their idle bands,
" And call'd the giant of the hundred hands,
" The prodigy, whom heaven and earth revere,
" His father Neptune he in strength surpass'd;
" At Jove's right hand his hideous form he plac'd,
" Proud of his might The gods with secret dread,
" Beheld the huge enormous shape and fled.
" Remind him then: for well thou know'st the art:
" Go, clasp his knees, and melt his mighty heart.
" Let the driven Argians, hunted o'er the plain,
" Seek the vast verge of his tempestuous main:
" There let them perish, void of all relief,
" My wrongs remember, and enjoy their chief.
" Too late with anguish shall his heart be torn,
" That the first Greek was made the public scorn."
Then she (with tears her azure eyes ran o'er:)
" Why bore I thee! or nourish'd when I bore!
" Blest, if within thy tent, and free from strife,
" Thou might'st possess the poor remains of life,
" Thy death approaching now the fates foreshow;
" Short is thy destin'd term, and full of woe.
" Ill-fated thou! and oh unhappy I!
" But hence to the celestial courts I fly,
" Where, hid in snow, to heaven Olympus swells,
" And Jove, rejoicing in his thunder, dwells.
" Mean time, my son, indulge thy just disdain:
" Vent all thy rage, and shun the hostile plain,
" Till Jove returns. Last night my waves he
" cross'd,
" And sought the distant Ethiopian coast;
" Along the skies his radiant course he steer'd,
" Behind him all the train of gods appear'd,
" A bright procession. To the holy feast
" Of blameless men he goes a grateful guest.
" To heaven he comes, when twice six days are " o'er!
" Then shall his voice the fire of gods implore,
" Then to my lofty mansion will I pass,
" Founded on rocks of ever-during brass:
" There will I clasp his knees with wonted art,
" No doubt, my son, but I shall melt his heart."
She ceas'd. and left him lost in doubtful care,
And bent on vengeance for the ravish'd fair.
But, safe arriv'd near Chrysa's sacred stand,
The sage Ulysses now advanc'd to land.
Along the coast he shoots with swelling gales,
Then lowers the lofty mast, and furls the sails;
Next plies to port with many a well-tim'd oar,
And drops his anchors near the faithful shore.
The bark now fix'd amidst the rolling tide,
Chryseïs follows her experienc'd guide:
The gifts to Phœbus from the Grecian host,
A herd of bulls went bellowing o'er the coast.
To the god's fane, high looking o'er the land,
He led, and near the altar took his stand,
Then gave her joyful to her father's hand.
" All hail! Atrides sets thy daughter free,
" Sends offerings to thy god and gifts to thee.
" But thou entreat the power, whose dreadful
" sway
" Afflicts his camp, and sweeps his host away."
He said, and gave her. The fond father smil'd
With secret rapture, and embrac'd his child.
The victims now they range in chosen bands,
And offer gifts with unpolluted hands:
When with loud voice, and arms uprear'd in air,
The hoary priest preferr'd this powerful prayer:
" Dread warrior with the silver bow, give ear:
" Patron of Chrysa and of Cilla, hear.
" About this dome thou walk'st thy constant round:
" Still have my vows thy power propitious found.
" Rous'd by my prayers ev'n now thy vengeance
" burns,
" And smit by thee, the Grecian army mourns.
" Hear me once more; and let the suppliant foe
" Avert thy wrath, and slack thy dreadful bow."
He pray'd: and great Apollo heard his prayer.
The suppliants now their votive rites prepare:
Amidst the flames they cast the hallow'd bread,
And heaven-ward turn each victims destin'd head:
Next slay the fatted bulls, their skins divide,
And from each carcase rend the smoking hide,
On every limb large rolls of fat bestow,
And chosen morsels round the offering strow:
Mysterious rites. Then on the fire divine
The great high priest pours forth the ruddy wine;
Himself the offering burns. On either hand
A troop of youths, in decent order stand.
On sharpen'd forks, obedient to the fire,
They turn the tasteful fragments in the fire,
Adorn the feast, see every dish well-stor'd,
And serve the plenteous messes to the board.
When now the various feasts had cheer'd their souls, [bowls,
With sparkling wines they crown the generous

The first libations to Apollo pay,
And solemnise with sacred hymns the day:
His praise in lō Pæans loud they sing,
And soothe the rage of the far-shooting king.
At evening, through the shore disper's'd they sleep,
Hush'd by the distant roarings of the deep.
When now, ascending from the shades of night,
Aurera glow'd in all her rosy light,
The daughter of the dawn: th' awaken'd crew
Back to the Greeks encamp'd their course renew.
The breezes freshen: for with friendly gales
Apollo swell'd their wide, distended, sails:
Cleft by the rapid prow, the waves divide,
And in hoarse murmurs break on either side.
In safety to the destin'd port they pass'd,
And fix'd their bark with grappling haulsers fast;
Then dragg'd her farther, on the dry-land coast,
Regain'd their tents, and mingled in the host.
But fierce Achilles, still on vengeance bent,
Cherish'd his wrath, and madden'd in his tent.
Th' assembled chiefs he shun'd with high disdain,
A band of kings: nor sought the hostile plain;
But long'd to hear the distant troops engage,
The strife grow doubtful, and the battle rage.
Twelve days were past; and now th' ethereal train,
Jove at their head, to heaven return'd again:
When Thetis, from the deep prepar'd to rise,
Shot through a big-swoln wave, and pierc'd the skies.
At early morn she reach'd the realms above,
The court of gods, the residence of Jove.
On the top point of high Olympus, crown'd
With hills on hills, him far apart she found,
Above the rest. The earth beneath display'd
(A boundless prospect) his broad eye survey'd.
Her left hand grasp'd his knees, her right she rear'd,
And touch'd with blandishment his awful beard;
Then, suppliant, with submissive voice implor'd
Old Saturn's son, the god by gods ador'd:
"If e'er, by rebel deities oppress,
"My aid reliev'd thee, grant this one request.
"Since to short life my hapless son was born,
"Do thou with fame the scanty space adorn.
"Punish the king of men, whose lawless sway
"Hath sham'd the youth, and seiz'd his destin'd prey.
"Awhile let Troy prevail, that Greece may grieve,
"And doubled honours to my offspring give."
She said. The god vouchsaf'd not to reply
(A deep suspence sat in his thoughtful eye):
Once more around his knees the goddess clung,
And to soft accents form'd her artful tongue:
"Oh! speak. Or grant me, or deny my prayer.
"Fear not to speak, what I am doom'd to bear;
"That I may know, if thou my prayer deny,
"The most despis'd of all the gods am I."
With a deep sigh the thundering power replies:
"To what a height will Juno's anger rise!
"Still doth her voice before the gods upbraid
"My partial hand, that gives the Trojans aid.
"I grant thy suit. But, hence! depart unseen,
"And shun the sight of heaven's suspicious queen.
"Believe my nod, the great, the certain sign,
"When Jove propitious hears the powers divine;
"The sign that ratifies my high command,
"That thus I will: and what I will shall stand."
This said, his kingly brow the sire inclin'd;
The large black curls fell awful from behind,
Thick shadowing the stern forehead of the god;
Olympus trembled at th' almighty nod.
The goddess smil'd: and, with a sudden leap,
From the high mountain plung'd into the deep.
But Jove repair'd to his celestial towers:
And, as he rose, up-rose th' immortal powers.
In ranks, on either side, th' assembly cast,
Bow'd down, and did obeisance as he pass'd.
To him enthron'd (for whispering she had seen
Close at his knees the silver-footed queen,
Daughter of him, who, low beneath the tides,
Aged and hoary in the deep resides)
Big with invectives, Juno silence broke,
And thus, opprobrious her resentments spoke:
"False Jove! what goddess whispering did I see?
"O fond of counsels, still conceal'd from me!
"To me, neglected, thou wilt ne'er impart
"One single thought of thy close-cover'd heart."
To whom the sire of gods and men reply'd;
"Strive not to find, what I decree to hide.
"Laborious were the search, and vain the strife,
"Vain ev'n for thee, my sister and my wife.
"The thoughts and counsels, proper to declare,
"Nor god nor mortal shall before thee share:
"But, what my secret wisdom shall ordain,
"Think not to reach, for know the thought were vain.
"Dread Saturn's son, why so severe?" replies
"The goddess of the large majestic eyes. [show;
"Thy own dark thoughts at pleasure hide, or
"Ne'er have I ask'd, nor now aspire to know.
"Nor yet my fears are vain, nor came unseen
"To thy high throne, the silver-footed queen,
"Daughter of him, who low beneath the tides
"Aged and hoary in the deep resides.
"Thy nod assures me she was not deny'd:
"And Greece must perish for a madman's pride."
To whom the god, whose hand the tempest forms,
Drives clouds on clouds, and blackens heaven with storms, [plain?
Thus wrathful answer'd: "Dost thou still com-
"Perplex'd for ever, and perplex'd in vain!
"Should'st thou disclose the dark event to come,
"How wilt thou stop th' irrevocable doom!
"This serves the more to sharpen my disdain;
"And woes foreseen but lengthen out thy pain.
"Be silent then. Dispute not my command;
"Nor tempt the force of this superior hand:
"Lest all the gods, around thee leagu'd, engage
"In vain to shield thee from my kindled rage."
Mute and abash'd she sat without reply,
And downward turn'd her large majestic eye,
Nor further durst th' offended sire provoke;
The gods around him trembled, as he spoke,
When Vulcan, for his mother fore distress'd,
Turn'd orator, and thus his speech address'd:
"Hard is our fate, if men of mortal line
"Stir up debate among the powers divine,
"If things on earth disturb the blest abodes,
"And mar th' ambrosial banquet of the gods!

" Then let my mother once be rul'd by me,
" Though much more wife than I pretend to be:
" Let me adviſe her ſilent to obey,
" And due ſubmiſſion to our father pay.
" Nor force again his gloomy rage to riſe,
" Ill-tim'd, and damp the revels of the ſkies.
" For ſhould he toſs her from th' Olympian hill,
" Who could reſiſt the mighty monarch's will?
" Then thou to love the thunderer reconcile,
" And tempt him kindly on us all to ſmile."
He ſaid: and in his tottering hands up-bore
A double goblet, fill'd, and foaming o'er.
" Sit down, dear mother, with a heart content,
" Nor urge a more diſgraceful puniſhment,
" Which if great Jove inflict, poor I, diſmay'd,
" Muſt ſtand aloof, nor dare to give thee aid.
" Great Jove ſhall reign for ever, uncontrol'd:
" Remember, when I took thy part of old,
" Caught by the heel he ſwung me round on high;
" And headlong hurl'd me from th' etherial ſky:
" From morn to noon I fell, from noon to night;
" Till pitch'd on Lemnos, a moſt piteous ſight,
" The Sintians hardly could my breath recal,
" Giddy and gaſping with the dreadful fall."
She ſmil'd: and, ſmiling, her white arm diſplay'd
To reach the bowl her aukward ſon convey'd.
From right to left the generous bowl he crown'd,
And dealt the roſy nectar fairly round.
The gods laugh'd out, unweary'd, as they ſpy'd
The buſy ſkinker hop from ſide to ſide.
Thus, feaſting to the full, they paſs'd away,
In bliſsful banquets, all the live-long day,
Nor wanted melody. With heavenly art
The muſes ſung; each muſe perform'd her part.
Alternate warbling; while the golden lyre,
Touch'd by Apollo, led the vocal choir.
The ſun at length declin'd, when every gueſt
Sought his bright palace, and withdrew to reſt;
Each had his palace on th' Olympian hill,
A maſterpiece of Vulcan's matchleſs ſkill.
Ev'n he, the god, who heaven's great ſceptre ſways,
And frowns amid the lightning's dreadful blaze,
His bed of ſtate aſcending, lay compos'd;
His eyes a ſweet refreſhing ſlumber cloſ'd:
And at his ſide, all-glorious to behold,
Was Juno lodg'd in her alcove of gold.

TO THE EARL OF WARWICK,

ON THE DEATH OF MR. ADDISON.

If, dumb too long, the drooping muſe hath ſtay'd,
And left her debt to Addiſon unpaid,
Blame not her ſilence, Warwick, but bemoan,
And judge, oh judge, my boſom by your own.
What mourner ever felt poetic fires!
Slow comes the verſe that real woe inſpires:
Grief unaffected ſuits but ill with art,
Or flowing numbers with a bleeding heart.
Can I forget the diſmal night that gave
My ſoul's beſt part for ever to the grave!
How ſilent did his old companions tread,
By midnight lamps, the manſions of the dead,
Through breathing ſtatues, then unheeded things,
Through rows of warriors, and through walks of kings!
What awe did the ſlow ſolemn knell inſpire;
The pealing organ, and the pauſing choir;
The duties by the lawn-rob'd prelate pay'd;
And the laſt words, that duſt to duſt convey'd!
While ſpeechleſs o'er thy cloſing grave we bend,
Accept theſe tears, thou dear departed friend.
Oh, gone for ever! take this long adieu;
And ſleep in peace, next thy lov'd Montague.
To ſtrew freſh laurels, let the taſk be mine,
A frequent pilgrim, at thy ſacred ſhrine;
Mine with true ſighs thy abſence to bemoan,
And grave with faithful epitaphs thy ſtone.
If e'er from me thy lov'd memorial part,
May ſhame afflict this alienated heart;
Of thee forgetful if I form a ſong,
My lyre be broken, and untun'd my tongue,
My grief be doubled from thy image free,
And mirth a torment, unchaſtis'd by thee.
Oft let me range the gloomy aiſles alone,
Sad luxury! to vulgar minds unknown,
Along the walls where ſpeaking marbles ſhow
What worthies form the hallow'd mould below;
Proud names, who once the reins of empire held;
In arms who triumph'd; or in arts excell'd;
Chiefs, grac'd with ſcars, and prodigal of blood;
Stern patriots, who for ſacred freedom ſtood;
Juſt men, by whom impartial laws were given;
And ſaints who taught, and led, the way to heaven;
Ne'er to theſe chambers, where the mighty reſt,
Since their foundation, came a nobler gueſt;
Nor e'er was to the bowers of bliſs convey'd
A fairer ſpirit or more welcome ſhade.
In what new region, to the juſt aſſign'd,
What new employments pleaſe th' unbody'd mind;
A winged virtue, through th' ethereal ſky,
From world to world unweary'd does he fly?
Or curious trace the long laborious maze
Of heaven's decrees, where wondering angels gaze;
Does he delight to hear bold ſeraphs tell
How Michael battl'd, and the dragon fell;
Or, mix'd with milder cherubim, to glow
In hymns of love, not ill eſſay'd below?
Or doſt thou warn poor mortals left behind,
A taſk well-ſuited to thy gentle mind?
Oh! if ſometimes thy ſpotleſs form deſcend;
To me thy aid, thou guardian genius, lend!
When rage miſguides me, or when fear alarms,
When pain diſtreſſes, or when pleaſure charms,
In ſilent whiſperings purer thoughts impart,
And turn from ill, a frail and feeble heart;
Lead through the paths thy virtue trod before,
Till bliſs ſhall join, nor death can part us more.
That awful form, which, ſo the heavens decree,
Muſt ſtill be lov'd and ſtill deplor'd by me;
In nightly viſions ſeldom fails to riſe,
Or, rous'd by fancy, meets my waking eyes.
If buſineſs calls, or crowded courts invite;
Th' unblemiſh'd ſtateſman ſeems to ſtrike my ſight;
If in the ſtage I ſeek to ſoothe my care;
I meet his ſoul which breathes in Cato there;
If penſive to the rural ſhades I rove;
His ſhape o'ertakes me in the lonely grove;
'Twas there of juſt and good he reaſon'd ſtrong,
Clear'd ſome great truth, or rais'd ſome ſerious ſong;

There patient ſhow'd us the wiſe courſe to ſteer,
A candid cenſor, and a friend ſevere;
There taught us how to live; and (oh! too high
The price for knowledge) taught us how to die.
Thou hill, whoſe brow the antique ſtructures grace,
Rear'd by bold chiefs of Warwick's noble race,
Why, once ſo lov'd, whene'er thy bower appears,
O'er my dim eye-ball glance the ſudden tears!
How ſweet were once thy proſpects freſh and fair,
Thy ſloping walks, and unpolluted air!
How ſweet the glooms beneath thy aged trees,
Thy noon-tide ſhadow, and thy evening breeze!
His image thy forſaken bowers reſtore;
Thy walks and airy proſpects charm no more;
No more the ſummer in thy glooms allay'd,
Thy evening breezes, and thy noon-day ſhade.
From other hills, however fortune frown'd;
Some refuge in the muſe's art I found;
Reluctant now I touch the trembling ſtring,
Bereft of him, who taught me how to ſing;
And theſe ſad accents, murmur'd o'er his urn,
Betray that abſence, they attempt to mourn.
O! muſt I then (now freſh my boſom bleeds,
And Craggs in death to Addiſon ſucceeds)
The verſe, begun to one loſt friend, prolong,
And weep a ſecond in th' unfiniſh'd ſong.
Theſe works divine, which on his death-bed laid
To thee, O Craggs! th' expiring ſage convey'd,
Great, but ill-omen'd, monument of fame,
Nor he ſurviv'd to give, nor thou to claim.
Swift after him thy ſocial ſpirit flies,
And cloſe to his, how ſoon! thy coffin lies.
Bleſt pair! whoſe union future bards ſhall tell
In future tongues: each other's boaſt! farewell,
Farewell! whom, join'd in fame, in friendſhip try'd,
No chance could ſever, nor the grave divide.

COLIN AND LUCY.

A BALLAD.

Of Leinſter, fam'd for maidens fair,
Bright Lucy was the grace;
Nor e'er did Liffy's limpid ſtream
Reflect ſo ſweet a face:
Till luckleſs love, and pining care,
Impair'd her roſy hue,
Her coral lips, and damaſk cheeks,
And eyes of gliſſy blue.

Oh, have you ſeen a lily pale,
When beating rains deſcend?
So droop'd the ſlow-conſuming maid,
Her life now near its end.
By Lucy warn'd, of flattering ſwains
Take heed, ye eaſy fair:
Of vengeance due to broken vows,
Ye perjur'd ſwains, beware.

Three times, all in the dead of night,
A bell was heard to ring;
And ſhrieking at her window thrice,
The raven flap'd his wing
Too well the love-lorn maiden knew
The ſolemn boding ſound:
And thus, in dying words, beſpoke
The virgins weeping round:

"I hear a voice, you cannot hear,
"Which ſays, I muſt not ſtay;
"I ſee a hand, you cannot ſee,
"Which beckons me away.
"By a falſe heart, and broken vows,
"In early youth I die:
"Was I to blame, becauſe his bride
"Was thrice as rich as I?

"Ah, Colin! give not her thy vows,
"Vows due to me alone:
"Nor thou, fond maid, receive his kiſs,
"Nor think him all thy own.
"To-morrow, in the church to wed,
"Impatient, both prepare!
"But know, fond maid; and know, falſe man,
"That Lucy will be there!

"Then bear my corſe, my comrades, bear,
"This bridegroom blithe to meet,
"He in his wedding-trim ſo gay,
"I in my winding ſheet."
She ſpoke, ſhe dy'd, her corſe was borne,
The bridegroom blithe to meet,
He in his wedding trim ſo gay,
She in her winding-ſheet

Then what were perjur'd Colin's thoughts?
How were theſe nuptials kept?
The brideſmen flock'd round Lucy dead,
And all the village wept.
Confuſion, ſhame, remorſe, deſpair,
At once his boſom ſwell:
The damps of death bedew'd his brow,
He ſhook, he groan'd, he fell.

From the vain bride, ah, bride no more!
The varying crimſon fled,
When, ſtretch'd before her rival's corſe,
She ſaw her huſband dead.
Then to his Lucy's new-made grave,
Convey'd by trembling ſwains,
One mould with her, beneath one ſod,
For ever he remains.

Oft at his grave, the conſtant hind
And plighted maid are ſeen;
With garlands gay, and true-love knots,
They deck the ſacred green;
But, ſwain forſworn, whoe'er thou art,
This hallow'd ſpot forbear;
Remember Colin's dreadful fate,
And fear to meet him there.

TO SIR GODFREY KNELLER,

AT HIS COUNTRY SEAT.

To Whitton's ſhades, and Hounſlow's airy plain,
Thou, Kneller, tak'ſt thy ſummer flights in vain,
In vain thy wiſh gives all thy rural hours
To the fair villa, and well-order'd bowers;
To court thy pencil early at thy gates,
Ambition knocks, and fleeting beauty waits;
The boaſtful muſe, of others fame ſo ſure,
Implores thy aid to make her own ſecure;
The great, the fair, and, if aught nobler be,
Aught more belov'd, the arts ſolicit thee.

How canſt thou hope to fly the world, in vain
From Europe ſever'd by the circling main;
Sought by the kings of every diſtant land,
And every hero worthy of thy hand?
Haſt thou forgot that mighty Bourbon ſear'd
He ſtill was mortal, till thy draught appeas'd?
That Coſmo choſe thy glowing form to place,
Amidſt her maſters of the Lombard race?
See on her Titian's and her Guido's urns,
Her falling arts forlorn Heſperia mourns;
While Britain wins each garland from her brow,
Her wit and freedom firſt, her painting now.
Let the faint copier, on old Tiber's ſhore,
Nor mean the taſk, each breathing buſt explore,
Line after line, with painful patience trace,
This Roman grandeur, that Athenian grace;
Vain care of parts, if, impotent of ſoul,
Th' induſtrious workman fails to warm the whole,
Each theft betrays the marble whence it came,
And a cool ſtatue ſtiffens in the frame.
Thee nature taught, nor art her aid deny'd,
The kindeſt miſtreſs, and the ſureſt guide,
To catch a likeneſs at one piercing ſight,
And place the faireſt in the faireſt light;
Ere yet thy pencil tries her nicer toils,
Or on thy pallet lie the blended oils,
Thy careleſs chalk has half atchiev'd thy art,
And her juſt image makes Cleora ſtart.
A mind that graſps the whole is rarely found,
Half learn'd, half painters, and half wits, abound;
Few, like thy genius, at proportion aim,
All great, all graceful, and throughout the ſame.
Such be thy life, O ſince the glorious rage
That fir'd thy youth! flames unſubdued by age;
Though wealth, nor fame, now touch thy fated mind,
Still tinge the canvas, bounteous to mankind;
Since after thee may riſe an impious line,
Coarſe manglers of the human face divine,
Paint on, till fate diſſolve thy mortal part,
And live and die the monarch of thy art.

ON THE

DEATH OF THE EARL OF CADOGAN.

Of Marlborough's captains, and Eugenio's friends,
The laſt, Cadogan, to the grave deſcends:
Low lies each hand, whence Blenheim's glory ſprung,
The chiefs who conquer'd, and the bards who ſung.
From his cold corſe though every friend be fled,
Lo! envy waits, that lover of the dead:
Thus did ſhe feign o'er Naſſau's herſe to mourn;
Thus wept inſidious Churchill o'er thy urn;
To blaſt the living, gave the dead their due,
And wreaths, herſelf had tainted, trim'd anew.
Thou, yet unnam'd to fill his empty place,
And lead to war thy country's growing race,
Take every wiſh a Britiſh heart can frame,
Add palm to palm, and riſe from fame to fame.
An hour muſt come, when thou ſhalt hear with rage
Thyſelf traduc'd, and curſe a thankleſs age:
Nor yet for this decline the generous ſtrife,
Theſe ills, brave man, ſhall quit thee with thy life,
Alive, though ſtain'd by every abject ſlave,
Secure of fame and juſtice in the grave.
Ah, no!——when once the mortal yields to fate,
The blaſt of fame's ſweet trumpet ſounds too late,
Too late to ſtay the ſpirit on its flight,
Or ſoothe the new inhabitant of light;
Who hears regardleſs, while fond man, diſtreſs'd,
Hangs on the abſent, and laments the bleſt.
Farewell then fame, ill ſought through fields and blood,
Farewell unfaithful promiſer of good:
Thou muſic, warbling to the deafen'd ear!
Thou incenſe waſted on the funeral bier!
Through life purſued in vain, by death obtain'd,
When aſk'd, deny'd us, and when given, diſdain'd.

AN ODE,

Inſcribed to the Earl of Sunderland, at Windſor.

Thou dome, where Edward firſt enroll'd
His red-croſs knights and barons bold,
Whoſe vacant ſeats, by virtue bought,
Ambitious emperors have ſought:
Where Britain's foremoſt names are found,
In peace belov'd, in war renown'd,
Who made the hoſtile nations moan,
Or brought a bleſſing on their own:

Once more a ſon of Spenſer waits,
A name familiar to thy gates;
Sprung from the chief whoſe proweſs gain'd
The garter while thy founder reign'd,
He offer'd here his dinted ſhield,
The dread of Gauls in Creſſi's field,
Which, in thy high-arch'd temple rais'd,
For four long centuries hath blaz'd.

Theſe feats our ſires, a hardy kind,
To the fierce ſons of war confin'd,
The flower of chivalry, who drew
With ſinew'd arm the ſtubborn yew:
Or with heav'd pole-ax clear'd the field;
Or who, in juſts and tourneys ſkill'd,
Before their ladies eyes renown'd,
Threw horſe and horſeman to the ground.

In after-times, as courts refin'd,
Our patriots in the liſt were join'd.
Not only Warwick ſtain'd with blood,
Or Marlborough near the Danube's flood,
Have in their crimſon croſſes glow'd;
But, on juſt lawgivers beſtow'd,
Theſe emblems Cecil did inveſt,
And gleam'd on wiſe Godolphin's breaſt.

So Greece, ere arts began to riſe,
Fix'd huge Orion in the ſkies,
And ſtern Alcides, fam'd in wars,
Beſpangled with a thouſand ſtars;
Till letter'd Athens round the pole
Made gentler conſtellations roll;
In the blue heavens the lyre ſhe ſtrung,
And near the Maid the * Balance hung.

Then, Spenſer, mount amid the band,
Where knights and kings promiſcuous ſtand.

* Names of conſtellations.

What though the hero's flame repreſs'd
Burns calmly in thy generous breaſt!
Yet who more dauntleſs to oppoſe
In doubtful days our home-bred foes!
Who rais'd his country's wealth ſo high,
Or view'd with leſs deſiring eye!

The ſage who large of ſoul ſurveys
The globe, and all its empires weighs,
Watchful the various climes to guide,
Which ſeas, and tongues, and faiths, divide,
A nobler name in Windſor's ſhrine,
Shall leave, if right the muſe divine,
Than ſprung of old, abhorr'd and vain,
From ravag'd realms, and myriads ſlain.

Why praiſe we, prodigal of fame,
The rage that ſets the world on flame?
My guiltleſs muſe his brow ſhall bind,
Whoſe godlike bounty ſpares mankind.
For thoſe, whom bloody garlands crown,
The braſs may breathe, the marble frown,
To him through every reſcued land,
Ten thouſand living trophies ſtand.

KENSINGTON-GARDEN.

" — Campos, ubi Troja fuit."——VIRG.

WHERE Kenſington high o'er the neighbouring lands
'Midſt greens and ſweets, a regal fabric, ſtands,
And ſees each ſpring, luxuriant in her bowers,
A ſnow of bloſſoms, and a wild of flowers,
The dames of Britain oft in crowds repair
To gravel walks, and unpolluted air.
Here, while the town in damps and darkneſs lies,
They breathe in ſun-ſhine, and ſee azure ſkies;
Each walk, with robes of various dyes beſpread,
Seems from afar a moving tulip-bed,
Where rich brocades and gloſſy damaſks glow,
And chints, the rival of the ſhowery bow.

Here England's daughter, darling of the land,
Sometimes, ſurrounded with her virgin band,
Gleams through the ſhades. She, towering o'er the reſt,
Stands faireſt of the fairer kind confeſs'd,
Form'd to gain hearts, that Brunſwick's cauſe de-
And charm a people to her father's ſide.

Long have theſe groves to royal gueſts been known
Nor Naſſau firſt prefer'd them to a throne.
Ere Norman banners wav'd in Britiſh air;
Ere lordly Hubba with the golden hair
Pour'd in his Danes; ere elder Julius came;
Or Dardan Brutus gave our iſle a name;
A prince of Albion's lineage grac'd the wood,
The ſcene of wars, and ſtain'd with lovers' blood.

You, who through gazing crowds, your captive throng,
Throw pangs and paſſions, as you move along,
Turn on the left, ye fair, your radiant eyes,
Where all unlevell'd the gay garden lies:
If generous anguiſh for another's pains
Ere heav'd your hearts, or ſhiver'd through your veins,
Look down attentive on the pleaſing dale,
And liſten to my melancholy tale.

That hollow ſpace, where now in living rows
Line above line the yew's ſad verdure grows,
Was, ere the planter's hand its beauty gave
A common pit, a rude unfaſhion'd cave.
The landſkip now ſo ſweet we well may praiſe:
But far, far ſweeter in its ancient days,
Far ſweeter was it, when its peopled ground
With fairy domes and dazzling towers was crown'd.
Where in the midſt thoſe verdant pillars ſpring,
Roſe the proud palace of the Elfin king;
For every hedge of vegetable green,
In happier years a crowded ſtreet was ſeen;
Nor all thoſe leaves that now the proſpect grace,
Could match the numbers of its pygmy race,
What urg'd this mighty empire to its fate,
A tale of woe and wonder, I relate.

When Albion rul'd the land, whoſe lineage came
From Neptune mingling with a mortal dame,
Their midnight pranks the ſprightly fairies play'd
On every hill, and danc'd in every ſhade.
But, foes to ſun-ſhine, moſt they took delight
In dells and dales conceal'd from human ſight:
There hew'd their houſes in the arching rock;
Or ſcoop'd the boſom of the blaſted oak;
Or heard, o'erſhadow'd by ſome ſhelving hill,
The diſtant murmurs of the falling rill.
They, rich in pilfer'd ſpoils, indulg'd their mirth,
And pity'd the huge wretched ſons of earth.
Ev'n now, 'tis ſaid, the hinds o'erhear their ſtrain,
And ſtrive to view their airy forms in vain:
They to their cells at man's approach repair,
Like the ſhy leveret, or the mother-hare,
The whilſt poor mortals ſtartle at the ſound
Of unſeen footſteps on the haunted ground.

Amid this garden, then with woods o'ergrown,
Stood the lov'd ſeat of royal Oberon.
From every region to his palace-gate
Came peers and princes of the fairy ſtate,
Who, rank'd in council round the ſacred ſhade,
Their monarch's will and great beheſts obey'd.
From Thames' fair banks, by lofty towers adorn'd,
With loads of plunder oft his chiefs return'd:
Hence in proud robes, and colours bright and gay,
Shone every knight and every lovely fay.
Whoe'er on Powell's dazzling ſtage diſplay'd,
Hath fam'd King Pepin, and his court ſurvey'd,
May gueſs, if old by modern things we trace,
The pomp and ſplendour of the fairy-race.

By magic fenc'd, by ſpells encompaſs'd round,
No mortal touch'd this interdicted ground;
No mortal enter'd, thoſe alone who came
Stol'n from the couch of ſome terreſtrial dame:
For oft of babes they robb'd the matron's bed,
And left ſome ſickly changeling in their ſtead.

It chanc'd a youth of Albion's royal blood
Was foſter'd here, the wonder of the wood.
Milkah for wiles above her peers renown'd,
Deep-ſkill'd in charms and many a myſtic ſound,
As through the regal dome ſhe fought for prey,
Obſerv'd the infant Albion where he lay
In mantles broider'd o'er with gorgeous pride,
And ſtole him from the ſleeping mother's ſide.

Who now but Milkah triumphs in her mind!
Ah, wretched nymph, to future evils blind!
The time ſhall come when thou ſhalt dearly pay
The theft, hard-hearted! of that guilty day:
Thou in thy turn ſhalt like the queen repine,
And all her ſorrows, doubled, ſhall be thine:

He who adorns thy houſe, the lovely boy
Who now adorns it, ſhall at length deſtroy.
Two hundred moons in their pale courſe had ſeen
The gay-rob'd fairies glimmer on the green,
And Albion now had reach'd in youthful prime
To nineteen years, as mortals meaſure time.
Fluſh'd with reſiſtleſs charms he ſir'd to love
Each nymph and little Dryad of the grove;
For ſkilful Milkah ſpar'd not to employ
Her utmoſt art to rear the princely boy;
Each ſupple limb ſhe ſwath'd, and tender bone,
And to the Elfin ſtandard kept him down;
She robb'd dwarf-elders of their fragrant fruit,
And fed him early with the daiſy's root,
Whence through his veins the powerful juices ran,
And form'd in beauteous miniature the man.
Yet ſtill, two inches taller than the reſt,
His lofty port his human birth confeſs'd;
A foot in height, how ſtately did he ſhow!
How look ſuperior on the crowd below!
What knight like him could toſs the ruſhy lance!
Who move ſo graceful in the mazy dance!
A ſhape ſo nice, or features half ſo fair,
What elf could boaſt! or ſuch a flow of hair!
Bright Kenna ſaw, a princeſs born to reign,
And felt the charmer burn in every vein.
She, heireſs to this empire's potent lord,
Prais'd like the ſtars, and next the moon ador'd.
She, whom at diſtance thrones and princedoms view'd,
To whom proud Oriel and Azuriel ſued,
In her high palace languiſh'd, void of joy,
And pin'd in ſecret for a mortal boy.
He too was ſmitten, and diſcreetly ſtrove
By courtly deeds to gain the virgin's love.
For her he cull'd the faireſt flowers that grew,
Ere morning ſuns had drain'd their fragrant dew;
He chas'd the hornet in his mid-day flight,
And brought her glow-worms in the noon of night;
When on ripe fruits ſhe caſt a wiſhing eye,
Did ever Albion think the tree too high!
He ſhow'd her where the pregnant goldfinch hung,
And the wren-mother brooding o'er her young;
To her th' inſcription on their eggs he read,
(Admire, ye clerks, the youth whom Milkah bred)
To her he ſhow'd each herb of virtuous juice,
Their powers diſtinguiſh'd and deſcrib'd their uſe:
All vain their powers, alas! to Kenna prove,
And well ſung Ovid, "There's no herb for love."
As when a ghoſt, enlarg'd from realms below,
Seeks its old friend to tell ſome ſecret wo,
The poor ſhade ſhivering ſtands, and muſt not break
His painful ſilence, till the mortal ſpeak:
So far'd it with the little love-ſick maid,
Forbid to utter, what her eyes betray'd.
He ſaw her anguiſh, and reveal'd his flame,
And ſpar'd the bluſhes of the tongue-ty'd dame.
The day would fail me, ſhould I reckon o'er
The ſighs they laviſh'd, and the oaths they ſwore
In words ſo melting, that compar'd with thoſe
The niceſt courtſhip of terreſtrial beaux
Would ſound like compliments, from country clowns
To red cheek'd ſweet-hearts in their home-ſpun gowns.

All in a lawn of many a various hue
A bed of flowers (a fairy foreſt) grew;
'Twas here one noon, the gaudieſt of the May,
The ſtill, the ſecret, ſilent, hour of day,
Beneath a lofty tulip's ample ſhade
Sat the young lover and th' immortal maid.
They thought all fairies ſlept, ah, luckleſs pair!
Hid, but in vain, in the ſun's noon-tide glare!
When Albion, leaning on his Kenna's breaſt,
Thus all the ſoftneſs of his ſoul expreſt:
"All things are huſh'd. The ſun's meridian rays
" Veil the horizon in one mighty blaze:
" Nor moon nor ſtar in heaven's blue arch is ſeen
" With kindly rays to ſilver o'er the green,
" Grateful to fairy eyes; they ſecret take
" Their reſt, and only wretched mortals wake.
" This dead of day I fly to thee alone,
" A world to me, a multitude in one.
" Oh, ſweet as dew-drops on theſe flowery lawns,
" When the ſky opens, and the evening dawns!
" Straight as the pink, that towers ſo high in air,
" Soft as the blow-bell! as the daiſy fair!
" Bleſt be the hour, when firſt I was convey'd
" An infant captive to this bliſsful ſhade!
" And bleſt the hand that did my form refine,
" And ſhrunk my ſtature to a match with thine!
" Glad I for thee renounce my royal birth,
" And all the giant-daughters of the earth.
" Thou, if thy braaſt with equal ardour burn,
" Renounce thy kind, and love for love return.
" So from us two, combin'd by nuptial ties,
" A race of unknown demi-gods ſhall riſe.
" O ſpeak, my love! my vows with vows repay,
" And ſweetly ſwear my riſing fears away."
To whom (the ſhining azure of her eyes
More brighten'd) thus th' enamour'd maid replies:
" By all the ſtars, and firſt the glorious moon,
" I ſwear, and by the head of Oberon,
" A dreadful oath! no prince of fairy line
" Shall e'er in wedlock plight his vows with mine.
" Where'er my footſteps in the dance are ſeen,
" May toadſtools riſe, and mildews blaſt the green,
" May the keen eaſt wind blight my favourite flowers,
" And ſnakes and ſpotted adders haunt my bowers,
" Confin'd whole ages in an hemlock ſhade
" There rather pine I a neglected maid,
" Or worſe, exil'd from Cynthia's gentle rays,
" Parch in the ſun a thouſand ſummer-days,
" Than any prince, a prince of fairy line,
" In ſacred wedlock plight his vows with mine."
She ended: and with lips of roſy hue
Dipp'd five times over in ambroſial dew,
Stifled his words. When from his covert rear'd,
The frowning brow of Oberon appear'd.
A ſun-flower's trunk was near, whence (killing ſight!)
The monarch iſſued, half an ell in height;
Full on the pair a furious look he caſt,
Nor ſpoke; but gave his bugle-horn a blaſt
That through the woodland echoed far and wide,
And drew a ſwarm of ſubjects to his ſide.
A hundred choſen knights, in war renown'd,
Drive Albion baniſh'd from the ſacred ground;

And twice ten myriads guard the bright abodes,
Where the proud king, amidſt his demi-gods,
For Kenna's ſudden bridal bids prepare,
And to Azuriel gives the weeping fair.
If fame in arms, with ancient birth combin'd,
A faultleſs beauty, and a ſpotleſs mind,
To love and praiſe can generous ſouls incline,
That love, Azuriel, and that praiſe, was thine.
Blood, only leſs than royal, fill'd thy veins,
Proud was thy roof, and large thy fair domains.
Where now the ſkies high Holland-Houſe invades,
And ſhort-liv'd Warwick ſadden'd all the ſhades,
Thy dwelling ſtood: nor did in him afford
A nobler owner, or a lovelier lord.
For thee a hundred fields produc'd their ſtore,
And by thy name ten thouſand vaſſals ſwore;
So lov'd thy name, that, at their monarch's choice,
All fairy ſhouted with a general voice.
Oriel alone a ſecret rage ſuppreſt,
That from his boſom heav'd the golden veſt.
Along the banks of Thame his empire ran,
Wide was his range, and populous his clan.
When cleanly ſervants, if we truſt old tales,
Beſide their wages had good fairy vails,
Whole heaps of ſilver tokens, nightly paid,
The careful wife, or the neat dairy-maid,
Sunk not his ſtores. With ſmiles and powerful bribes
He gain'd the leaders of his neighbour tribes
And ere the night the face of heaven had chang'd,
Beneath his banners half the fairies rang'd.
Meanwhile, driven back to earth, a lonely way
The cheerleſs Albion wander'd half the day,
A long, long journey, chok'd with brakes and thorns
Ill-meaſur'd by ten thouſand barley-corns.
Tir'd out at length, a ſpreading ſtream he ſpy'd
Fed by old Thame, a daughter of the tide:
'Twas then a ſpreading ſtream, though now its fame
Obſcur'd, it bears the Creek's inglorious name,
And creeps, as through contracted bounds it ſtrays,
A leap for boys in theſe degenerate days.
On the clear cryſtal's verdant bank he ſtood,
And thrice look'd backward on the fatal wood,
And thrice he groan'd, and thrice he beat his breaſt,
And thus in tears his kindred gods addreſt.
"If true, ye watery powers, my lineage came
"From Neptune mingling with a mortal dame;
"Down to his court, with coral garlands crown'd
"Through all your grottoes waft my plaintive, ſound,
"And urge the god, whoſe trident ſhakes the earth,
"To grace his offſpring, and aſſert my birth."
He ſaid. A gentle Naiad heard his prayer,
And, touch'd with pity for a lover's care,
Shoots to the ſea, where low beneath the tides
Old Neptune in th' unfathom'd deep reſides,
Rous'd at the news, the ſea's ſtern ſultan ſwore
Revenge, and ſcarce from preſent arms forbore;
But firſt the nymph his harbinger he ſends,
And to her care the favourite boy commends.
As through the Thames her backward courſe ſhe guides,
Driven by his current up the refluent tides,
Along his banks the pigmy legions ſpread,
She ſpies, and haughty Oriel at their head.
Soon with wrong'd Albion's name the hoſt ſhe fires,
And counts the ocean's god among his ſires:
"The ocean's god, by whom ſhall be o'erthrown,
"(Styx heard his oath) the tyrant Oberon.
"See here beneath a toadſtool's deadly gloom
"Lies Albion: him the fates your leader doom.
"Hear, and obey; 'tis Neptune's powerful call,
"By him Azuriel and his king ſhall fall."
She ſaid. They bow'd: and on their ſhields up-bore
With ſhouts their new ſaluted emperor.
Ev'n Oriel ſmil'd: at leaſt to ſmile he ſtrove,
And hopes of vengeance triumph'd over love.
See now the mourner of the lonely ſhade
By gods protected, and by hoſts obey'd,
A ſlave, a chief, by fickle fortune's play,
In the ſhort courſe of one revolving day.
What wonder if the youth, ſo ſtrangely bleſt,
Felt his heart flutter in his little breaſt!
His thick embattled troops, with ſecret pride,
He views extended half an acre wide;
More light he treads, more tall he ſeems to riſe,
And ſtruts a ſtraw-breadth nearer to the ſkies.
O for thy muſe, great Bard*, whoſe lofty ſtrains
In battle join'd the pigmies and the cranes!
Each gaudy knight, had I that warmth divine,
Each colour'd legion in my verſe ſhould ſhine.
But ſimple I, and innocent of art,
The tale, that ſooth'd my infant years, impart,
The tale I heard whole winter-eves, untir'd,
And ſing the battles, that my nurſe inſpir'd.
Now the ſhrill corn-pipes, echoing loud to arms,
To rank and file reduce the ſtraggling ſwarms.
Thick rows of ſpears at once, with ſudden glare,
A grove of needles glitter in the air;
Looſe in the winds ſmall ribbon-ſtreamers flow,
Dipt in all colours of the heavenly bow,
And the gay hoſt, that now its march purſues,
Gleams o'er the meadows in a thouſand hues.
On Buda's plains thus formidably bright,
Shone Aſia's ſons, a pleaſing dreadful ſight.
In various robes their ſilken troops were ſeen,
The blue, the red, and prophet's ſacred green:
When blooming Brunſwick, near the Danube's flood,
Firſt ſtain'd his maiden ſword in Turkiſh blood.
Unſeen and ſilent march the ſlow brigades
Through pathleſs wilds, and unfrequented ſhades.
In hope already vanquiſh'd by ſurpriſe,
In Albion's power the fairy empire lies;
Already has he ſeiz'd on Kenna's charms,
And the glad beauty trembles in his arms.
The march concludes: and now in proſpect near,
But fenc'd with arms, the hoſtile towers appear.
For Oberon, or Druids falſely ſing,
Wore his prime viſier in a magic ring,

* Mr. Addiſon

A ſubtle ſprite, that opening plots foretold
By ſudden dimneſs on the beamy gold.
Hence, in a creſcent form'd, his legions bright
With beating boſoms waited for the fight;
To charge their foes they march, a glittering band,
And in their van doth bold Azuriel ſtand.
What rage that hour did Albion's ſoul poſſeſs,
Let chiefs imagine, and let lovers gueſs!
Forth iſſuing from his ranks, that ſtrove in vain
To check his courſe, athwart the dreadful plain
He ſtrides indignant: and with haughty cries
To ſingle fight the fairy prince defies.
Forbear! raſh youth, th' unequal war to try;
Nor, ſprung from mortals, with immortals vie.
No god ſtands ready to avert thy doom,
Nor yet thy grandſire of the waves is come.
My words are vain—no words the wretch can move,
By beauty dazzled, and bewitch'd by love:
He longs, he burns, to win the glorious prize,
And ſees no danger, while he ſees her eyes.
Now from each hoſt the eager warriors ſtart,
And furious Albion flings his haſty dart.
'Twas feather'd from the bee's tranſparent wing,
And its ſhaft ended in a hornet's ſting;
But, toſt in rage, it flew without a wound,
High o'er the foe, and guiltleſs pierc'd the ground.
Not ſo Azuriel's: with unerring aim
Too near the needle-pointed javelin came,
Drove through the ſevenfold ſhield, and ſilken veſt,
And lightly raz'd the lover's ivory breaſt.
Rous'd at the ſmart, and riſing to the blow,
With his keen ſword he cleaves his fairy foe,
Sheer from the ſhoulder to the waſte he cleaves
And of one arm the tottering trunk bereaves.
His uſeleſs ſteel brave Albion weilds no more,
But ſternly ſmiles, and thinks the combat o'er:
So had it been, had aught of mortal ſtrain,
Or leſs than fairy felt the deadly pain.
But empyreal forms howe'er in fight
Gaſh'd and diſmember'd, eaſily unite.
As ſome frail cup of China's pureſt mould,
With azure varniſh'd, and bedropt with gold,
Though broke, if cur'd by ſome nice virgin's hands,
In its old ſtrength and priſtine beauty ſtands;
The tumults of the boiling bohea braves,
And holds ſecure the coffee's ſable waves:
So did Azuriel's arm, if fame ſay true,
Rejoin the vital trunk whence firſt it grew;
And, whilſt in wonder fix'd poor Albion ſtood,
Plung'd the curs'd ſabre in his heart's warm blood.
The golden broidery, tender Milkah wove,
The breaſt, to Kenna ſacred and to love,
Lie rent and mangled: and the gaping wound
Pours out a flood of purple on the ground.
The jetty luſtre ſickens in his eyes:
On his cold cheeks the bloomy freſhneſs dies;
'Oh Kenna, Kenna, thrice he try'd to ſay,
'Kenna, farewell!' and ſigh'd his ſoul away.
His fall the Dryads with loud ſhrieks deplore,
By ſiſter Naiads echo'd from the ſhore,
Thence down to Neptune's ſecret realms convey'd,
Through grots, and glooms, and many a coral ſhade.
The ſea's great ſire, with looks denouncing war,
The trident ſhakes, and mounts the pearly car:
With one ſtern frown the wide-ſpread deep deforms,
And works the madding ocean into ſtorms.
O'er foaming mountains, and through burſting tides,
Now high, now low, the bounding chariot rides,
Till through the Thames in a loud whirlwind's roar
It ſhoots, and lands him on the deſtin'd ſhore.
Now fix'd on earth his towering ſtature ſtood,
Hung o'er the mountains, and o'erlook'd the wood
To Brumpton's grove one ample ſtride he took
(The vallies trembled, and the foreſts ſhook)
The next huge ſtep reach'd the devoted ſhade,
Where chok'd in blood was wretched Albion laid
Where now the vanquiſh'd, with the victor join'd,
Beneath the regal banners ſtood combin'd.
Th' embattell'd dwarfs with rage and ſcorn he paſt,
And on their town his eye vindictive caſt.
In deep foundations his ſtrong trident cleaves.
And high in air th' uprooted empire heaves;
On his broad engine the vaſt ruin hung,
Which on the foe with force divine he flung:
Aghaſt the legions, in th' approaching ſhade,
Th' inverted ſpires and rocking domes ſurvey'd,
That downward tumbling on the hoſt below
Cruſh'd the whole nation at one dreadful blow.
Towers, arms, nymphs, warriors, are toge her loſt, [ghoſt.
And a whole empire falls to ſoothe ſad Albion's
Such was the period, long reſtrain'd by fate,
And ſuch the downfall of the fairy ſtate.
This dale, a pleaſing region, not unbleſt,
This dale poſſeſt they; and had ſtill poſſeſt;
Had not their monarch, with a father's pride,
Rent from her lord th' inviolable bride,
Raſh to diſſolve the contract ſeal'd above,
The ſolemn vows and ſacred bonds of love.
Now, where his elves ſo ſprightly danc'd the round,
No violet breathes, nor daiſy paints the ground,
His towers and people fill one common grave,
A ſhapeleſs ruin, and a barren cave.
Beneath huge hills of ſmoking piles he lay
Stunn'd and confounded a whole ſummer's day,
At length awak'd (for what can long reſtrain
Unbody'd ſpirits!) but awak'd in pain:
And as he ſaw the deſolated wood,
And the dark den where once his empire ſtood,
Grief chill'd his heart: to his half-open'd eyes
In every oak a Neptune ſeem'd to riſe:
He fled: and left, with all his trembling peers,
The long poſſeſſion of a thouſand years.
Through buſh, through brake, through groves and gloomy dales,
Through dank and dry, o'er ſtreams and flowery vales,
Direct they fled; but often look'd behind,
And ſtopt and ſtarted at each ruſtling wind.
Wing'd with like fear, his abdicated bands
Diſperſe and wander into different lands.
Part hid beneath the Peak's deep caverns lie,
In ſilent glooms, impervious to the ſky;

Part on fair Avon's margin ſeek repoſe,
Whoſe ſtream o'er Britain's midmoſt region flows,
Where formidable Neptune never came,
And ſeas and oceans are but known by fame:
Some to dark woods and ſecret ſhade retreat:
And ſome on mountains chooſe their airy ſeat.
There haply by the ruddy damſel ſeen,
Or ſhepherd-boy, they featly foot the green,
While from their ſteps a circling verdure ſprings;
But fly from towns, and dread the courts of kings.
Mean while ſad Kenna, loth to quit the grove,
Hung o'er the body of her breathleſs love,
Try'd every art, (vain arts!) to change his doom,
And vow'd (vain vows!) to join him in the tomb.
What could ſhe do? the fates alike deny
The dead to live, or fairy forms to die. [tells
An herb there grows (the ſame old * Homer
Ulyſſes bore to rival Circe's ſpells)
Its root is ebon-black, but ſends to light
A ſtem that bends with flowrets milky white,
Moly the plant, which gods and fairies know,
But ſecret kept from mortal men below.
On his pale limbs its virtuous juice ſhe ſhed,
And murmur'd myſtic numbers o'er the dead,
When lo! the little ſhape by magic power
Grew leſs and leſs, contracted to a flower;
A flower, that firſt in this ſweet garden ſmil'd,
To virgins ſacred, and the ſnow-drop ſtyl'd.
The new-born plant with ſweet regret ſhe
view'd, [dew'd,
Warm'd with her ſighs, and with her tear's be-
Its ripen'd ſeeds from bank to bank convey'd,
And with her lover whiten'd half the ſhade.
Thus won from death each ſpring ſhe ſees him
grow,
And glories in the vegetable ſnow, [plains,
Which now increas'd through wide Britannia's
Its parent's warmth and ſpotleſs name retains,
Firſt leader of the flowery race aſpires,
And foremoſt catches the ſun's genial fires,
'Mid froſts and ſnows triumphant dares appear,
Mingles the ſeaſons, and leads on the year.
Deſerted now of all the pigmy race,
Nor man nor fairy touch'd this guilty place.
In heaps on heaps, for many a rolling age,
It lay accurs'd, the mark of Neptune's rage.
Till great Naſſau recloth'd the deſart ſhade,
Thence ſacred to Britannia's monarchs made.
'Twas then the green-rob'd nymph, fair Kenna,
came,
(Kenna, that gave the neighbouring town its name.)
Proud when ſhe ſaw th' ennobled garden ſhine,
With nymphs and heroes of her lover's line,
She vow'd to grace the manſions once her own,
And picture out in plants the fairy town.
To far-fam'd wiſe her flight unſeen ſhe ſped,
And with gay proſpects fill'd the craftſman's head,
Soft in his fancy drew a pleaſing ſcheme,
And plann'd that landſhip in a morning dream.
With the ſweet view the fire of gardens fir'd,
Attempts the labour by the nymph inſpir'd,
The walls and ſtreets in rows of yew deſigns,
And forms the town in all its ancient lines;

The corner trees he lifts more high in air,
And girds the palace with a verdant ſquare;
Nor knows, while round he views the riſing ſcenes,
He builds a city as he plants his greens.
With a ſad pleaſure the aërial maid
This image of her ancient realms ſurvey'd,
How chang'd, how fall'n from its primæval ſtate!
Yet here each moon, the hour her lover dy'd,
Each moon his ſolemn obſequies ſhe pays,
And leads the dance beneath pale Cynthia's rays;
Pleas'd in theſe ſhades to head her fairy train,
And grace the groves where Albion's kinſmen reign.

* Odyſſ. Lib. x.

TO A LADY BEFORE MARRIAGE.

Oh, form'd by nature, and refin'd by art!
With charms to win, and ſenſe to fix the heart!
By thouſands ſought, Clotilda, canſt thou free
Thy crowd of captives, and deſcend to me?
Content in ſhades obſcure to waſte thy life,
A hidden beauty, and a country wife.
O, liſten, while thy ſummers are my theme!
Ah, ſoothe thy partner in his waking dream!
In ſome ſmall hamlet on the lonely plain,
Where Thames, through meadows, rolls his ma-
zy train; [ray'd,
Or where high Windſor, thick with greens ar-
Waves his old oaks, and ſpreads his ample ſhade,
Fancy has figur'd out our calm retreat;
Already round the viſionary ſeat
Our limes begin to ſhoot, our flowers to ſpring,
The brooks to murmur, and the birds to ſing.
Where doſt thou lie, thou thinly-peopled green?
Thou nameleſs lawn, and village yet unſeen?
Where ſons, contented with their native ground,
Ne'er travell'd further than ten furlongs round;
And the tann'd peaſant, and his ruddy bride,
Were born together, and together died.
Where early larks beſt tell the morning light,
And only Philomel diſturbs the night;
'Midſt gardens here my humble pile ſhall riſe,
With ſweets ſurrounded of ten thouſand dyes;
All ſavage where th' embroider'd gardens end,
The haunt of echoes ſhall my woods aſcend;
And oh! if heaven th' ambitious thought approve,
A rill ſhall warble croſs the gloomy grove,
A little rill, o'er pebbly beds convey'd,
Guſh down the ſteep, and glitter through the glade.
What cheering ſcents thoſe bordering banks exhale!
How loud that heifer lows from yonder vale!
That thruſh how ſhrill! his note ſo clear, ſo high,
He drowns each feather'd minſtrel of the ſky.
Here let me trace, beneath the purpled morn,
The deep-mouth'd beagle, and the ſprightly horn:
Or lure the trout with well-diſſembled flies,
Or ſetch the fluttering partridge from the ſkies.
Nor ſhall thy hand diſdain to crop the vine,
The downy peach, or flavour'd nectarine;
Or rob the bee-hive of its golden hoard,
And bear th' unbought luxuriance to thy board.
Sometimes my books by day ſhall kill the hours,
While from thy needle riſe the ſilken flowers,
And thou, by turns, to eaſe my feeble ſight,
Reſume the volume, and deceive the night.

Oh! when I mark thy twinkling eyes oppreſt,
Soft whiſpering, let me warn my love to reſt;
Then watch thee, charm'd, while ſleep locks every ſenſe,
And to ſweet heaven commend thy innocence.
Thus reign'd our fathers o'er the rural fold,
Wife, hale, and honeſt, in the days of old;
Till courts aroſe, where ſubſtance pays for ſhow,
And ſpecious joys are bought with real woe.
See Flavia's pendants, large, well-ſpread, and right,
The ear that wears them hears a fool each night:
Mark how th' embroider'd colonel ſneaks away,
To ſhun the withering dame that made him gay;
That knave, to gain a title, loſt his fame;
That rais'd his credit by a daughter's ſhame;
This coxcomb's ribband coſt him half his land,
And oaks, unnumber'd, bought that fool a wand.
Fond man, as all his ſorrows were too few,
Acquires ſtrange wants that nature never knew,
By midnight lamps he emulates the day,
And ſleeps, perverſe, the cheerful ſuns away;
From goblets high-emboſt, his wine muſt glide,
Round his clos'd ſight the gorgeous curtain ſlide;
Fruits ere their time to grace his pomp muſt riſe,
And three untaſted courſes glut his eyes.
For this are nature's gentle calls withſtood,
The voice of conſcience, and the bonds of blood;
This wiſdom thy reward for every pain,
And this gay glory all thy mighty gain.
Fair phantoms woo'd and ſcorn'd from age to age,
Since bards began to laugh, or prieſts to rage.
And yet, juſt curſe on man's aſpiring kind,
Prone to ambition, to example blind,
Our children's children ſhall our ſteps purſue,
And the ſame errors be for ever new.
Mean while in hope a guiltleſs country ſwain,
My reed with warblings cheers th' imagin'd plain.
Hail humble ſhades, where truth and ſilence dwell!
Thou noiſy town, and faithleſs court, farewell!
Farewell ambition, once my darling flame!
The thirſt of lucre, and the charm of fame!
In life's by-road, that winds through paths unknown,
My days, though number'd, ſhall be all my own.
Here ſhall they end, (O, might they twice begin!)
And all be white the fates intend to ſpin.

A POEM,

IN PRAISE OF THE HORN-BOOK.

Written under a Fit of the Gout.

" Magni magna patrant, nos non niſi ludicra——
——— Podagra hæc otia fecit."

Hail, ancient book, moſt venerable code!
Learning's firſt cradle, and its laſt abode!
The huge unnumber'd volumes which we ſee,
By lazy plagiaries are ſtol'n from thee.
Yet future times, to thy ſufficient ſtore,
Shall ne'er preſume to add one letter more.
Thee will I ſing, in comely wainſcot bound,
And golden verge encloſing thee around;
The faithful horn before, from age to age,
Preſerving thy invaluable page;
Behind, thy patron ſaint in armour ſhines,
With ſword and lance, to guard thy ſacred lines:
Beneath his courſer's feet the dragon lies
Transfix'd; his blood thy ſcarlet cover dies;
Th' inſtructive handle's at the bottom fix'd,
Leſt wrangling critics ſhould pervert the text.
Or if to ginger-bread thou ſhalt deſcend,
And liquoriſh learning to thy babes extend;
Or ſugar'd plane, o'erſpread with beaten gold,
Does the ſweet treaſure of thy letters hold;
Thou ſtill ſhalt be my ſong——Apollo's choir
I ſcorn t' invoke; Cadmus my verſe inſpire:
'Twas Cadmus who the firſt materials brought
Of all the learning which has ſince been taught,
Soon made complete! for mortals ne'er ſhall know
More than contain'd of old the Chriſt-croſs row;
What maſters dictate, or what doctors preach,
Wiſe matrons hence, ev'n to our children teach:
But as the name of every plant and flower
(So common that each peaſant knows its power)
Phyſicians in myſterious cant expreſs,
T' amuſe the patient, and enhance their fees;
So from the letters of our native tongue,
Put in Greek ſcrawls, a myſtery too is ſprung,
Schools are erected, puzzling grammars made,
And artful men ſtrike out a gainful trade:
Strange characters adorn the learned gate,
And heedleſs youth catch at the ſhining bait;
The pregnant boys the noiſy charms declare,
And * Tau's and Delta's make their mother's ſtare;
Th' uncommon ſounds amaze the vulgar ear,
And what's uncommon never coſts too dear.
Yet in all tongues the horn-book is the ſame,
Taught by the Grecian maſter, or the Engliſh dame.
But how ſhall I thy endleſs virtues tell,
In which thou doſt all other books excel?
No greaſy thumbs thy ſpotleſs leaf can ſoil,
Nor crooked dogs-ears thy ſmooth corners ſpoil;
In idle pages no errata ſtand,
To tell the blunders of the printer's hand:
No fulſome dedication here is writ,
Nor flattering verſe, to praiſe the author's wit:
The margin with no tedious notes is vex'd,
Nor various reading to confound the text:
All parties in thy literal ſenſe agree,
Thou perfect centre of concordancy!
Search we the records of an ancient date,
Or read what modern hiſtories relate,
They all proclaim what wonders have been done
By the plain letters taken as they run:
" † Too high the floods of paſſion us'd to roll,
" And rend the Roman youth's impatient ſoul;
" His haſty anger furniſh'd ſcenes of blood,
" And frequent deaths of worthy men enſued:
" In vain were all the weaker methods try'd,
" None could ſuffice to ſtem the furious tide,
" Thy ſacred line he did but once repeat,
" And laid the ſtorm, and cool'd the raging heat."
Thy heavenly notes, like angels' muſic, cheer
Departing ſouls, and ſoothe the dying ear.

† The advice given to Auguſtus, by Athenodorus the Stoic philoſopher.

An aged peasant, on his lateſt bed,
Wiſh'd for a friend ſome godly book to read;
The pious grandſon thy known handle takes,
And (eyes lift up) this ſavory lecture makes:
Great A he gravely read; th' important ſound
The empty walls and hallow roof rebound:
Th' expiring ancient rear'd his drooping head,
And thank'd his ſtars that Hodge had learn'd to read.
Great B, the younker bauls; O heavenly breath!
What ghoſtly comforts in the hour of death!
What hopes I feel! great C, pronounc'd the boy;
The grandſire dies with ecſtaſy of joy.
Yet in ſome lands ſuch ignorance abounds,
Whole pariſhes ſcarce know thy uſeful ſounds.
Of Eſſex hundreds ſame gives this report,
But fame, I ween, ſays many things in ſport.
Scarce lives the man to whom thou'rt quite unknown,
Though few th' extent of thy vaſt empire own.
Whatever wonders magic ſpells can do
On earth, in air, in ſea, in ſhades below;
What words profound and dark wiſe Mahomet ſpoke,
When his old cow an angel's figure took;
What ſtrong enchantments ſage Canidia knew,
Or Horace ſung, fierce monſters to ſubdue,
O mighty book! are all contain'd in you?
All human arts, and every ſcience meet,
Within the limits of thy ſingle ſheet:
From thy vaſt root all learning's branches grow,
And all her ſtreams from thy deep fountain flow.
And, lo! while thus thy wonders I indite,
Inſpir'd I feel the power of which I write;
The gentler gout his former rage forgets,
Leſs frequent now, and leſs ſevere the fits:
Looſe grew the chains which bound my uſeleſs feet;
Stiffneſs and pain from every joint retreat;
Surpriſing ſtrength comes every moment on,
I ſtand, I ſtep, I walk, and now I run.
Here let me ceaſe, my hobling numbers ſtop,
And at * thy handle hang my crutches up.

THERISTES;

OR, THE LORDLING,

The Grandſon of a Bricklayer, Great-grandſon of a Butcher.

Theristes of amphibious breed,
Motley fruit of mongrel ſeed:
By the dam from lordlings ſprung,
By the ſire exhal'd from dung:
Think on every vice in both,
Look on him, and ſee their growth.
View him on the mother's ſide,
Fill'd with falſehood, ſpleen, and pride,
Poſitive and over-bearing,
Changing ſtill, and ſtill adhering,
Spiteful, peeviſh, rude, untoward:
Fierce in tongue, in heart a coward:
When his friends he moſt is hard on,
Cringing comes to beg their pardon;
Reputation ever tearing,
Ever deareſt friendſhip ſwearing,
Judgment weak, and paſſion ſtrong;
Always various, always wrong:
Provocation never waits,
Where he loves, or where he hates.
Talks whate'er comes in his head,
Wiſhes it were all unſaid.
Let me now the vices trace,
From his father's ſcoundrel race,
Who could give the looby ſuch airs;
Were they maſons? Were they butchers?
Herald lend the muſe an anſwer,
From his atavus and grandſire;
This was dexterous at his trowel,
That was bred to kill a cow well:
Hence the greaſy clumſy mien,
In his dreſs and figure ſeen:
Hence that mean and ſordid ſoul,
Like his body, rank and foul:
Hence that wild ſuſpicious peep,
Like a rogue that ſteals a ſheep:
Hence he learn'd the butcher's guile,
How to cut a throat and ſmile:
Like a butcher doom'd for life,
In his mouth to wear his knife.
Hence he draws his daily food,
From his tenant's vital blood.
Laſtly, let his gifts be try'd,
Borrow'd from the maſon ſide.
Some, perhaps, may think him able
In the ſtate to build a Babel;
Could we place him in a ſtation
To deſtroy the old foundation.
True, indeed, I ſhould be gladder
Could he learn to mount the ladder.
May he at his letter end
Mount alive, and dead deſcend.
In him tell me, which prevail,
Female vices moſt, or male?
What produc'd them, can you tell?
Human race, or imp of hell?

OXFORD:

A POEM.

Inſcribed to Lord Lonſdale, 1707.

"Unum opus eſt intactæ palladis urbem
"Carmine perpetuo celebrare"—
Hor. 1 Od. vii.

Whilst you, my lord, adorn that ſtately ſeat,
Where ſhining beauty makes her ſoft retreat,
Enjoying all thoſe graces, uncontrol'd,
Which nobleſt youths would die but to behold;
Whilſt you inhabit Lowther's awful pile,
A ſtructure worthy of the founder's toil;
Amaz'd we ſee the former Lonſdale ſhine
In each deſcendant of his noble line:
But moſt tranſported and ſurpriz'd we view
His ancient glories all reviv'd in you,
Where charms and virtues join their equal grace,
Your father's godlike ſoul, your mother's lovely face.

Me fortune and kind Heaven's indulgent care
To famous Oxford and the muſes bear,
Where, of all ranks, the blooming youths combine
To pay due homage to the mighty Nine,
And ſnatch, with ſmiling joy, the laurel crown,
Due to the learned honours of the gown.
Here I, the meaneſt of the tuneful throng,
Delude the time with an unhallow'd ſong,
Which thus my thanks to much-lov'd Oxford pays,
In no ungrateful, though unartful lays.

Where ſhall I firſt the beauteous ſcene diſcloſe,
And all the gay variety expoſe?
For whereſoe'er I turn my wondering eyes,
Aſpiring towers and verdant groves ariſe,
Immortal greens the ſmiling plains array,
And mazy rivers murmur all the way.
O! might your eyes behold each ſparkling dome,
And freely o'er the beauteous proſpect roam,
Leſs raviſh'd your own Lowther you'd ſurvey,
Though pomp and ſtate the coſtly ſeat diſplay,
Where art ſo nicely has adorn'd the place,
That nature's aid might ſeem an uſeleſs grace;
Yet nature's ſmiles ſuch various charms impart,
That vain and needleſs are the ſtrokes of art.
In equal ſtate our riſing ſtructures ſhine,
Fram'd by ſuch rules, and form'd by ſuch deſign,
That here, at once ſurpris'd and pleas'd, we view
Old Athens loſt and conquer'd in the new;
More ſweet our ſhades, more fit our bright abodes
For warbling muſes and inſpiring gods.
Great * Vanbrook's ſelf might own each artful draught
Equal to models in his curious thought,
Nor ſcorn a fabric by our plans to frame,
Or in immortal labours ſing their fame;
Both ways he ſaves them from deſtroying fate,
If he but praiſe them, or but imitate.

See, where the ſacred † Sheldon's haughty dome
Rivals the ſtately pomp of ancient Rome,
Whoſe form, ſo great and noble ſeems deſign'd
T' expreſs the grandeur of its founder's mind.
Here, in one lofty building, we behold
Whate'er the Latian pride could boaſt of old.
True, no dire combats feed the ſavage eye,
And ſtrew the ſand with ſportive cruelty;
But, more adorn'd with what the muſe inſpires,
It far outſhines their bloody theatres.
Delightful ſcene! when here, in equal verſe,
The youthful bards their godlike queen rehearſe,
To Churchill's wreaths Apollo's laurel join,
And ſing the plains of Hockſtet and Judoign.

Next let the muſe record our Bodley's ſeat ‡
Nor aim at numbers, like the ſubject, great:
All hail, thou fabric, ſacred to the Nine,
Thy fame immortal, and thy form divine!
Who to thy praiſe attempts the dangerous flight,
Should in thy various tongues be taught to write;
His verſe, like thee, a lofty dreſs ſhould wear,
And breathe the genius which inhabits there;
Thy proper lays alone can make thee live,
And pay that fame, which firſt thyſelf didſt give.

So fountains, which through ſecret channels flow,
And pour above the floods they take below,
Back to their father ocean urge their way,
And to the ſea, the ſtreams it gave, repay.

No more we fear the military rage,
Nurs'd up in ſome obſcure barbarian age;
Nor dread the ruin of our arts divine,
From thick-ſcull'd heroes of the Gothic line,
Though pale the Romans ſaw thoſe arms advance,
And wept their learning loſt in ignorance.
Let brutal rage around its terrors ſpread,
The living murder, and conſume the dead,
In impious fires let nobleſt writings burn,
And with their authors ſhare a common urn;
Only, ye fates, our lov'd Bodleian ſpare,
Be IT, and learning's ſelf ſhall be your care,
Here every art and every grace ſhall join,
Collected Phœbus here alone ſhall ſhine,
Each other ſeat be dark, and this be all divine.
Thus when the Greeks imperial Troy defac'd,
And to the ground its fatal walls debas'd,
In vain they burn the work of hands divine,
And vow deſtruction to the Dardan line,
Whilſt good Æneas flies th' unequal wars,
And, with his guardian gods, Iülus bears,
Old Troy for ever ſtands in him alone,
And all the Phrygian kings ſurvive in one.

Here ſtill preſides each ſage's reverend ſhade,
In ſoft and eaſy grandeur laid;
Their deathleſs works forbid their fame to die,
Nor time itſelf their perſons ſhall deſtroy,
Preſerv'd within the living gallery *.
What greater gift could bounteous heaven beſtow,
Than to be ſeen above, and read below?
With deep reſpect I bend my duteous head;
To ſee the faithful likeneſs of the dead;
But O! what muſe can equal warmth impart?
The painter's ſkill tranſcends the poet's art.
When round the pictur'd founders I deſcry,
With goodneſs ſoft, and great with majeſty,
So much of life the artful colours give,
Scarce more within their colleges they live;
My blood begins in wilder rounds to roll,
And pleaſing tumults combat in my ſoul;
An humble awe my downcaſt eyes betray,
And only leſs than adoration pay,
Such were the Roman fathers, when o'ercome,
They ſaw the Gauls inſult o'er conquer'd Rome;
Each captive ſeem'd the haughty victor's lord,
And proſtrate chiefs their awful ſlaves ador'd.

Such art as this adorns your Lowther's hall,
Where feaſting gods carouſe upon the wall;
The nectar, which creating paint ſupplies,
Intoxicates each pleas'd ſpectator's eyes;
Who view, amaz'd, the figures heavenly fair,
And think they breathe the true Elyſian air.
With ſtrokes ſo bold, great Verrio's hand has drawn
The gods in dwellings brighter than their own.

Fir'd with a thouſand raptures, I behold
What lively features grac'd each bard of old;
Such lips, I think, did guide his charming tongue,
In ſuch an air as this the poet ſung;

Such eyes as theſe glow'd with the ſacred fire,
And hands like theſe employ'd the vocal lyre.
Quite raviſh'd, I purſue each image o'er,
And ſcarce admire their deathleſs labours more.
See where the gloomy Scaliger appears,
Each ſhade is critic, and each feature ſneers;
The artful Ben ſo ſmartly ſtrikes the eye,
I more than ſee a fancied comedy;
The muddy Scotus crowns the motley ſhew,
And metaphyſics cloud his wrinkled brow.
But diſtant awe invades my beating breaſt,
To ſee great Ormond in the paint expreſt;
With fear I view the figure from afar,
Which burns with noble ardour for the war;
But near approaches free my doubting mind,
To view ſuch ſweetneſs with ſuch grandeur join'd.
Here ſtudious heads the graver tablet ſhows,
And there with martial warmth the picture glows;
The blooming youth here boaſts a brighter hue,
And painted virgins far outſhine the true.
Hail, colours, which with nature bear a ſtrife,
And only want a voice to perfect life;
The wondering ſtranger makes a ſudden ſtand,
And pays low homage to the lovely band;
Within each frame a real fair believes,
And vainly thinks the mimic canvaſs lives;
Till, undeceiv'd, he quits th' enchanting ſhow,
Pleas'd with the art, though he laments it too.
So when his Juno bold Ixion woo'd,
And aim'd at pleaſures worthy of a god,
A beauteous cloud was form'd by angry Jove,
Fit to invite, though not indulge his love;
The mortal thought he ſaw his goddeſs ſhine,
And all the lying graces look'd divine;
But when with heat he claſp'd her fancied charms,
The empty vapour baulk'd his eager arms.
Loth to depart, I leave th' inviting ſcene,
Yet ſcarce forbear to view it o'er again;
But ſtill new objects give a new delight,
And various proſpects bleſs the wandering ſight.
Aloft in ſtate the airy towers ariſe,
And with new luſtre deck the wondering ſkies;
Lo! to what height the ſchools aſcending reach,
Built with that art which they alone can teach;
The lofty dome expands her ſpacious gate,
Where all the decent graces jointly wait;
In every ſhape the god of art reſorts,
And crowds of ſages fill th' extended courts.
With wonders fraught the bright muſeum ſee,
Itſelf the greateſt curioſity!
Where nature's choiceſt treaſure, all combin'd,
Delight at once, and quite confound the mind;
Ten thouſand ſplendors ſtrike the dazzled eye,
And form on earth another galaxy.
Here colleges in ſweet confuſion riſe,
There temples ſeem to reach their native ſkies;
Spires, towers, and groves, compoſe the various ſhow,
And mingled proſpects charm the doubting view;
Who can deny their characters divine,
Without reſplendent, and inſpir'd within?
But, ſince above my weak and artleſs lays,
Let their own poets ſing their equal praiſe.
One labour more my grateful verſe renews,
And rears aloft the low-deſcending muſe;
The building *, parent of my young eſſays,
Aſks in return a tributary praiſe.
Pillars ſublime bear up the learned weight,
And antique ſages tread the pompous height;
Whilſt guardian muſes ſhade the happy piles,
And all around diffuſe propitious ſmiles.
Here Lancaſter, adorn'd with every grace,
Stands chief in merit, as the chief in place:
To his lov'd name our earlieſt lays belong,
The theme at once, and patron of our ſong.
Long may he o'er his much lov'd queen's preſide,
Our arts encourage, and our counſels guide;
Till after-ages, fill'd with glad ſurpriſe,
Behold his image all majeſtic riſe,
Where now in pomp a venerable band,
Princes and queens, and holy fathers, ſtand.
Good Egglesfield † claims homage from the eye,
And the hard ſtone ſeems ſoft with piety;
The mighty monarchs ſtill the ſame appear,
And every marble frown provokes the war;
Whilſt rugged rocks, mark'd with Philippa's face,
Soften to charms, and glow with new-born grace.
A fight leſs noble did the warriors yield,
Transform'd to ſtatues by the Gorgon ſhield;
Diſtorting fear the coward's form confeſt,
And fury ſeem'd to heave the hero's breaſt;
The lifeleſs rocks each various thought betray'd,
And all the ſoul was in the ſtone diſplay'd.
Too high, my verſe, has been thy daring flight,
Thy ſofter numbers now the groves invite,
Where ſilent ſhades provoke the ſpeaking lyre,
And cheerful objects happy ſongs inſpire,
At once beſtow rewards, and thoughts infuſe,
Compoſe a garland, and ſupply a muſe.
Behold around, and ſee the living green
In native colours paints a blooming ſcene;
Th' eternal buds no deadly winter fear,
But ſcorn the coldeſt ſeaſon of the year;
Apollo ſure will bleſs the happy place,
Which his own Daphne condeſcends to grace;
For here the everlaſting laurels grow,
In every grotto, and on every brow.
Proſpects ſo gay demand a Congreve's ſtrains,
To call the gods and nymphs upon the plains;
Pan yields his empire o'er the ſylvan throng,
Pleas'd to ſubmit to his ſuperior ſong;
Great Denham's genius looks with rapture down,
And Spenſer's ſhade reſigns the rural crown.
Fill'd with great thoughts, a thouſand ſages rove
Through every field and ſolitary grove;
Whoſe ſouls, aſcending an exalted height,
Outſoar the drooping muſe's vulgar flight,
That longs to ſee her darling votaries laid
Beneath the covert of ſome gentle ſhade,
Where purling ſtreams and warbling birds conſpire
To aid th' enchantments of the trembling lyre.
Bear me, ſome God, to Chriſt-Church, royal ſeat,
And lay me ſoftly in the green retreat,
Where Aldrich holds o'er wit the ſovereign power,
And crowns the poets which he taught before.

† Robert Egglesfield, B. D. the founder, 1340.

To Aldrich Britain owes her tuneful Boyle,
The nobleſt trophy of the conquer'd iſle;
Who adds new warmth to our poetic fire,
And gives to England the Hibernian lyre.
Philips, by Phœbus and his Aldrich taught,
Sings with that heat wherewith his Churchill fought,
Unfetter'd, in great Milton's ſtrain he writes,
Like Milton's angels whilſt his hero fights;
Purſues the bard, whilſt he with honour can,
Equals the poet, and excels the man.

O'er all the plains, the ſtreams, and woods around,
The pleaſing lays of ſweeteſt bards reſound;
A faithful echo every note returns,
And liſtening river-gods neglect their urns.
When Codrington * and Steele their verſe unrein,
And form an eaſy, unaffected ſtrain,
A double wreath of laurel binds their brow,
As they are poets and are warriors too.
Trapp's lofty ſcenes in gentle numbers flow,
Like Dryden great, as ſoft as moving Rowe.
When youthful Harriſon, with tuneful ſkill, [Hill;
Makes Woodſtock Park ſcarce yield to Cooper's
Old Chaucer from th' Elyſian fields looks down,
And ſees at length a genius like his own; [low,
Charm'd with his lays, which reach the ſhades be-
Fair Roſamonda intermits her woe,
Forgets the anguiſh of an injur'd ſoul,
The fatal poignard, and envenom'd bowl.

Apollo ſmiles on Magd'len's peaceful bowers,
Perfumes the air, and paints the grot with flowers,
Where Yalden learn'd to gain the myrtle crown,
And every muſe was fond of Addiſon.
Applauded man! for weightier truſts deſign'd,
For once diſdain not to unbend thy mind;
Thy mother Iſis and her groves rehearſe,
A ſubject not unworthy of thy verſe;
So Latian fields will ceaſe to boaſt thy praiſe,
And yield to Oxford, painted in thy lays:
And when the age to come, from envy free,
What thou to Virgil giv'ſt ſhall give to thee,
Iſis, immortal by the poet's ſkill,
"Shall, in the ſmooth deſcription, murmur ſtill †;"
New beauties ſhall adorn our ſylvan ſcene,
And in thy numbers grow for ever green.

Danby's fam'd gift ‡ ſuch verſe as thine requires,
Exalted raptures, and celeſtial fires;
Apollo here ſhould plenteouſly impart,
As well his ſinging, as his curing art;
Nature herſelf the healing garden loves,
Which kindly her declining ſtrength improves,
Baffles the ſtrokes of unrelenting death,
Can break his arrows, and can blunt his teeth.
How ſweet the landſkip! where, in living trees,
Here frowns a vegetable Hercules!
There fam'd Achilles learns to live again,
And looks yet angry in the mimic ſcene;
Here artful birds, which blooming arbours ſhow,
Seem to fly higher, whilſt they upwards grow,
From the ſame leaves both arms and warriors riſe,
And every bough a different charm ſupplies.

So when our world the great Creator made,
And, unadorn'd, the ſluggiſh chaos laid,
Horror and Beauty own'd their ſire the ſame,
And Form itſelf from Parent Matter came,
That lumpiſh maſs alone was ſource of all,
And Bards and Themes had one original.

In vain the groves demand my longer ſtay,
The gentle Iſis wafts the muſe away;
With eaſe the river guides her wandering ſtream,
And haſtes to mingle with uxorious Thame,
Attempting poets on her banks lie down,
And quaff, inſpir'd, the better Helicon,
Harmonious ſtrains adorn their various themes,
Sweet as the banks, and flowing as the ſtreams.

Bleſs'd we, whom bounteous fortune here has thrown,
And made the various bleſſings all our own!
Nor crowns, nor globes, the pageantry of ſtate,
Upon our humble, eaſy ſlumbers wait;
Nor aught that is ambition's lofty theme
Diſturbs our ſleep, and gilds the gaudy dream.
Touch'd by no ills which vex th' unhappy great,
We only read the changes in the ſtate,
Triumphant Marlborough's arms at diſtance hear,
And learn from fame the rough events of war;
With pointed rhymes the Gallic tyrant pierce,
And make the cannon thunder in our verſe.

See how the matchleſs youth their hours improve,
And in the glorious way to knowledge move!
Eager for fame, prevent the riſing ſun,
And watch the midnight labours of the moon.
Not tender years their bold attempts reſtrain,
Who leave dull Time, and haſten into man,
Pure to the ſoul, and pleaſing to the eyes,
Like angels youthful, and like angels wiſe.

Some learn the mighty deeds of ages gone,
And, by the lives of heroes, form their own;
Now view the Granique chok'd with heaps of ſlain,
And warring worlds on the Pharſalian plain;
Now hear the trumpets clangour from afar,
And all the dreadful harmony of war;
Now trace thoſe ſecret tricks that loſt a ſtate,
And ſearch the fine-ſpun arts that made it great,
Correct thoſe errors that its ruin bred,
And bid ſome long-loſt empire rear its ancient head,

Others, to whom perſuaſive arts belong
(Words in their looks, and muſic on their tongue),
Inſtructed by the wit of Greece and Rome,
Learn richly to adorn their native home;
Whilſt liſtening crowds confeſs the ſweet ſurpriſe,
With pleaſure in their breaſts, and wonder in their eyes.

Here curious minds the latent ſeeds diſcloſe,
And nature's darkeſt labyrinths expoſe;
Whilſt greater ſouls the diſtant words deſcry,
Pierce to the outſtretch'd borders of the ſky,
Enlarge the ſearching mind, and broad expand the eye.

O you, whoſe riſing years ſo great began,
In whoſe bright youth I read the ſhining man,
O Lonſdale, know what nobleſt minds approve,
The thoughts they cheriſh, and the arts they love,

* The great benefactor to All-ſouls College.
† Letter from Italy, by Mr. Addiſon.
‡ The Phyſic-garden at Oxford.

Let theſe examples your young boſom fire,
And bid your ſoul to boundleſs height aſpire.
Methinks I ſee you in our ſhades retir'd,
Alike admiring, and by all admir'd:
Your eloquence now charms my raviſh'd ear,
Which future ſenates ſhall tranſported hear,
Now mournful verſe inſpires a pleaſing woe,
And now your cheeks with warlike fury glow,
Whilſt on the paper fancy'd fields appear,
And proſpects of imaginary war;
Your martial ſoul ſees Hockſtet's fatal plain,
Or fights the fam'd Ramilia o'er again.
But I in vain theſe lofty names rehearſe,
Above the faint attempts of humble verſe,
Which Garth ſhould in immortal ſtrains deſign,
Or Addiſon exalt with warmth divine;
A meaner ſong my tender voice requires,
And fainter lays confeſs the fainter fires,
By nature fitted for an humble theme,
A painted proſpect, or a murmuring ſtream,
To tune a vulgar note in Echo's praiſe,
Whilſt Echo's ſelf reſounds the flattering lays;
Or, whilſt I tell how Myra's charms ſurpriſe,
Paint roſes on her cheeks, and ſuns within her eyes.
O, did proportion'd height to me belong,
Great Anna's name ſhould grace th' ambitious ſong;
Illuſtrious dames ſhould round their queen reſort,
And Lonſdale's mother crown the ſplendid court;
Her noble ſon ſhould boaſt no vulgar place,
But ſhare the ancient honours of his race; [eyes
Whilſt each fair daughter's face and conquering
To Venus only ſhould ſubmit the prize.
O matchleſs beauties! more than heavenly fair,
Your looks reſiſtleſs, and divine your air,
Let your bright eyes their bounteous beams diffuſe,
And no fond bard ſhall aſk an uſeleſs muſe;
Their kindling rays excite a noble fire,
Give beauty to the ſong, and muſic to the lyre.
This charming theme I ever could purſue,
And think the inſpiration ever new,
Did not the God my wandering pen reſtrain;
And bring me to his Oxford back again.
Oxford, the goddeſs muſe's native home,
Inſpir'd like Athens, and adorn'd like Rome!
Hadſt thou of old been Learning's fam'd retreat,
And Pagan muſes choſe thy lovely ſeat,
O, how unbounded had their fiction been!
What fancy'd viſions had adorn'd the ſcene!
Upon each hill a Sylvan Pan had ſtood,
And every thicket boaſted of a God;
Satyrs had friſk'd in each poetic grove,
And not a ſtream without its nymphs could move;
Each ſummit had the train of Muſes ſhow'd,
And Hippocrene in every fountain flow'd;
The tales, adorn'd with each poetic grace,
Had look'd almoſt as charming as the place.
Ev'n now we hear the world with tranſports own
Thoſe fictions by more wond'rous truths outdone;
Here pure Euſebia keeps her holy ſeat,
And Themis ſmiles from Heaven on this retreat;
Our chaſter graces own refin'd deſires,
And all our muſes burn with veſtal fires;
Whilſt guardian-angels our Apollo's ſtand,
Scattering rich favours with a bounteous hand
To bleſs the happy air, and ſanctify the land.
O pleaſing ſhades! O ever-green retreats!
Ye learned grottos! and ye ſacred ſeats!
Never may you politer arts refuſe,
But entertain in peace the baſhful muſe!
So may you be kind Heav'n's diſtinguiſh'd care,
And may your fame be laſting, as 'tis fair!
Let greater bards on fam'd Parnaſſus dream,
Or taſte th' inſpir'd Heliconian ſtream;
Yet, whilſt our Oxford is the bleſt abode
Of every muſe, and every tuneful god,
Parnaſſus owns its honours far outdone,
And Iſis boaſts more bards than Helicon.
A thouſand bleſſings I to Oxford owe,
But you, my Lord, th' inſpiring muſe beſtow;
Grac'd with your name th' unpoliſh'd poem ſhines,
You guard its faults, and conſecrate the lines,
O might you here meet my deſiring eyes,
My drooping ſong to nobler heights would riſe:
Or might I come to breathe your northern air,
Yet ſhould I find an equal pleaſure there;
Your preſence would the harſher climate ſoothe,
Huſh every wind, and every mountain ſmooth;
Would bid the groves in ſpringing pomp ariſe,
And open charming viſta's to the eyes;
Would make my trifling verſe be heard around,
And ſportive echo play the empty ſound:
With you I ſhould a better Phœbus find,
And own in you alone the charms of Oxford join'd.

PRINTED BY MUNDELL AND SON, ROYAL BANK CLOSE.

Anno 1794.

THE LIFE OF SOMERVILE.

The family of Somervile was originally from Normandy; and came to England with William the Conqueror, in 1066. Sir Walter de Somervile had a conſiderable command in the Conqueror's army; and was rewarded for his ſervices, with the lordſhip of Whichenovre in Staffordſhire, and Aſton in Glouceſterſhire. His eldeſt ſon, Sir Walter de Somervile, ſucceeded him in the lordſhip of Whichenovre; and from him was deſcended Sir Philip de Somervile, lord of Whichenovre, in the reign of Henry V. who held the lands of Whichenovre, Scireſcot, Ridware, Netherton, and Cowlee, of the Earls of Lancaſter, by the memorable ſervice of giving a flitch of bacon, as a reward to any huſband and wife, who could ſay, that they never had the leaſt difference, nor contradicted one another, within the ſpace of twelve months after marriage, &c. The male line of the Whichenovre family is long ſince extinct, having ended in a daughter, married to Stafford Duke of Buckingham, beheaded in the reign of Henry VIII. William de Somervile, the ſecond ſon of the firſt Sir Walter, having contracted a friendſhip with David I. King of Scotland, when he was in England, accompanied him to Scotland, and obtained from him the barony of Carnwath in Lanarkſhire, where he ſettled. He was the progenitor of the preſent Lord Somerville, and the other families of that name in Scotland.

Roger de Somervile, the third ſon of the firſt Sir Walter, got from his father the lordſhip of Aſton in Glouceſterſhire, which, after him, was called Somervile-Aſton.

Sir John Somervile, his grandſon, obtained by marriage ſeveral eſtates in Warwickſhire, which, with Somervile-Aſton, deſcended to Robert Somervile, Eſq. his lineal repreſentative, father of William Somervile, the poet, who was born at Edſton in Warwickſhire, in 1692.

He tells of himſelf, in his Ode to General Stanhope, that he was born near Avona's winding ſtream; and Ramſay, his contemporary and admirer, in an encomiaſtic epiſtle addreſſed to him, on reading ſeveral of his excellent poems, gives a metrical, but inaccurate account of his illuſtrious lineage, and that of his "noble kinſman."

You both from one great lineage ſpring,
Both from de Somervile, who came
With William, England's conqu'ring king,
To win fair plains and laſting fame.
Whichnour he left to 's eldeſt ſon,
That firſt-born chief you repreſent;
The ſecond came to Caledon,
From whom our Somer'le takes deſcent.

Of the perſonal hiſtory of Somervile, ſome dates, and ſome few facts, ſcarce more intereſting than thoſe that make the ornaments of a country tombſtone, are all the memorials that have deſcended to poſterity.

A poet, while living, it has been well obſerved, is ſeldom an object ſufficiently great to attract much attention; his real merits are known but to a few, and theſe are generally ſparing in their praiſes. When his fame is increaſed by time, it is then too late to inveſtigate the peculiarities of his diſpoſition and familiar practices: "the dews of the morning are paſt, and we vainly try to continue the chaſe by the meridian ſplendour."

He was educated at Wincheſter ſchool, and afterward choſen to one of the vacancies in New College, Oxford.

In the places of his education, tradition has preſerved no account of his having diſplayed any uncommon proofs of his genius or literature.

It is probable that he was not negligent of ſtudy; and, it is certain, that he made a conſiderable proficiency in claſſical learning, and diſcovered an early propenſity to poetry.

It is not known how long he reſided at Oxford, or what literary or political connections he formed there; but he ſeems to have been an early friend to the Hanover ſucceſſion, and other meaſures reſulting from principles of freedom.

When the Tory miniſters of Queen Anne removed the Duke of Marlborough from all his places, he addreſſed an Ode to him, which ſtands high among the moſt diſtinguiſhed compoſitions of that time.

It was followed, in 1712, by an Ode, occaſioned by the Duke of Marlborough's embarking for Oſtend; which, though leſs elevated, has ſome fine encomiaſtic ſtrains.

After the acceſſion of King George, he preſerved his attachment to the Whig party; and addreſſed an Ode to General Stanhope, one of his Majeſty's Secretaries of State, afterward Earl Stanhope, in which he is conſtant to his theme, and mingles the praiſes of Marlborough and Stanhope with appropriate encomiums on Milton, and Addiſon, and other Engliſh poets, whoſe efforts have been directed to ſupport the cauſe of freedom.

When Addiſon purchaſed an eſtate in Warwickſhire, his native county, he did not miſs ſo fair an occaſion of ſhowing his reſpect for that great man, and of doing honour to the ſeat of his illuſtrious anceſtors, and the birth-place of the immortal Shakſpeare.

> Contending nations ancient Homer claim,
> And Mantua glories in her Maro's name,
> Our happier ſoil the prize ſhall yield to none,
> Ardenna's groves ſhall boaſt an Addiſon.—
> Your wiſer choice prefers this ſpot of earth,
> Diſtinguiſh'd by th' immortal Shakſpeare's birth;
> Where through the vales the fair Avona glides,
> And nouriſhes the glebe with fattening tides—
> Here, on the painted borders of the flood
> The babe was born, his bed with roſes ſtrew'd;
> Here, in an ancient venerable dome,
> Oppreſt with grief, we view the poet's tomb!

His compliment to Addiſon, as a teacher of moral and religious truth, is expreſſed with admirable felicity and delicacy.

> When panting virtue her laſt efforts made,
> You brought your Clio to the virgin's aid,
> Preſumptuous Folly bluſh'd, and Vice withdrew,
> To vengeance yielding her abandon'd crew.

He was now diſtinguiſhed as a poet, and came forward among the reſt, with verſes to the author of the Eſſay on Man, and an Epiſtle to Mr. Thomſon, on the firſt edition of his Seaſons.

He was no leſs diſtinguiſhed as an accompliſhed gentleman, an active and ſkilful ſportſman, and a uſeful juſtice of the peace.

Inheriting an eſtate of fifteen hundred a-year, he lived chiefly in the country; and ſet a good example to men of his own claſs, by devoting part of his time to elegant knowledge; the ſubjects which his poetry has adorned, ſhow that it is practicable to be at once a ſkilful ſportſman and a man of letters.

He was a man of high ſpirit; and ſeems to have practiſed an unbounded hoſpitality, and to have been wholly negligent of economy, by which he impaired his fortune, and ſubjected himſelf to diſtreſſes, which met with but little commiſeration from his unfeeling neighbours.

In 1730, he concluded a bargain with James Lord Somerville (who claimed and obtained, in 1722, the ancient peerage that had been dormant since 1618), for the reverſion of his eſtate at his death.

His connection with Lord Somerville probably occaſioned his poetical correſpondence with Ramſay, who was patroniſed by that nobleman.

He was the intimate friend of Shenſtone, who was his neighbour, and by whom he was too much reſembled in his negligence of economy.

"I loved Mr. Somervile," ſays Shenſtone, "becauſe he knew ſo perfectly what belonged to the flocci-nauci-nihili-pilification of money."

In the latter part of his life, he wrote The Chaſe, which raiſed his reputation very high among ſportſmen, and men of letters, and by which he is beſt known. It is written with equal vigour and elegance, and juſtly ranks among the beſt didactic poems in the Engliſh language.

It was followed by Hobbinol, a burleſque poem, dedicated to Hogarth; and Field Sports, a poem on hawking, addreſſed to Frederick Prince of Wales, and printed in 1742.

"Mr. Somervile's poem upon hawking, called Field Sports," ſays Shenſtone, in his letter to Mr. Graves, "was ſent to Mr. Lyttleton, to be read to the Prince, to whom it is inſcribed. It ſeems he is fond of hawking."

Of the cloſe of his life, thoſe whom his poems have delighted, will read with pain the following account, copied from the letters of his friend Shenſtone.

"Our old friend Somervile is dead! I did not imagine I could have been ſo ſorry as I find myſelf upon this occaſion. Sublatum quærimus. I can now excuſe all his foibles, impute them to age, and to diſtreſs of circumſtances; the laſt of theſe conſiderations wrings my very ſoul to think on. For a man of high ſpirit, conſcious of having (at leaſt in one production) generally pleaſed the world, to be plagued and threatened by wretches that are very low in every ſenſe; to be forced to drink himſelf into pains of the body, in order to get rid of the pains of the mind, is a miſery."

He died July 19, 1742, in the 50th year of his age, and was buried at Wotton, near Henley, on Arden.

His eſtate, inherited from a long line of anceſtors, devolved to Lord Somerville, chargeable with a jointure of ſix hundred a-year to his mother, who lived till ninety.

His Chaſe, Hobbinol, and Field Sports, have been frequently printed; and are inſerted with his Occaſional Poems, Tranſlations, Fables, and Tales, in the collection of the "Engliſh Poets" 1779, and 1790.

From Lady Luxborough's "Letters to Shenſtone," p. 211, it appears that he tranſlated Alzire, from Voltaire, which was then in MS., in her poſſeſſion; together with ſeveral "little poems and impromptus, which," ſhe ſays, "are, for the moſt part, too trivial or too local for the preſs."

Somervile is, by his contempotaries, allowed to have been a man of very great benevolence, and of very agreeable manners.

Shenſtone, who knew him well, has tranſmitted to poſterity a very advantageous idea of his private character, as well as his capacity as a poet.

Near Avon's banks, on Arden's flowery plain,
A tuneful ſhepherd charm'd the liſt'ning wave,
And ſunny Cotſol' fondly lov'd the ſwain;
Yet not a garland crowns the ſhepherd's grave.

Oh loſt Ophelia! ſmoothly flow'd the day,
To feel his muſic with my flames agree,
To taſte the beauties of his melting lay,
To taſte, and fancy it was dear to thee!

When, for his tomb, with each revolving year,
I ſteal the muſk roſe from the ſcented brake,
I ſtrew my cowſlips, and I pay my tear;
I'll add the myrtle for Ophelia's ſake.——Eleg. xviii.

He was much esteemed for his amiable and estimable qualities by Lady Luxborough, the sister of Lord Bolingbroke; who "seemed," says Shenstone, "in all respects the female Lord Bolingbroke." Her correspondence with Shenstone exhibits many unequivocal testimonies of her veneration for his virtue and his genius. "I return," says she, "Mr. Somervile's picture. I think it very like Worledge's, and indeed very like Mr. Somervile; but, methinks, it scarcely does him justice, as some of the least agreeable features in his face are rather too strongly marked; as under the eyes, for example; and I think, as he was very fair, the pencil might be fainter. But, upon the whole, had I not another of him, I would not give this for a great sum." In another place: "As to the urn for Mr. Somervile, my present design is to place it under the great double oak, as himself expresses it, "under the oak's protecting shade." It will be like raising a throne as well as a monument for Mr. Somervile; and, could he see it, he would, I believe, think himself more honourably placed, than if he was kicked down below one's feet, which might offend his elevated spirit." Again: "Mr. Allen proposes, that below where Mr. Somervile's name, &c. is placed, should be added, Multis ille bonis flebilis occidit."

I think with him, that this motto will record him as a man who deserved the esteem of every good man, and was regretted accordingly. But you and I may both be in the right in agreeing to the inscription's being in English.

Sacred to the Memory of

WILLIAM SOMERVILE, Esquire.

"I am charmed with your thought of alluding to the Chase, which you very justly say would be the most proper ornament, a wreath and French horn. As the reason of my erecting it is to be plainly understood to mean no more than my esteem for him as a worthy man, and a good poet, who had honoured me with his friendship, I should like the whole to be as plain as possible; that is to say, as far as is consistent with expressing my friendship for Mr. Somervile, and his poetical genius, trophies of which must undoubtedly be on one side the urn. Neither would I have it expensive; but I would express with as much simplicity as possible, my respect for his memory, without flattery or pomp; and that it was my friendship only which made me raise this memorandum of him. So that my first thought of all was, only to have had an altar, without any urn, and something wrote upon it equivalent to what you have put round the blazing altar you drew out in your letter, viz. Sacred to Friendship, or to that effect." In her letter, April 25, 1750, she writes: "As to the urn, I told you it was erected. As the motto Mr. Allen, and that you had chose, cannot, in your opinion, be on each side the same plinth, and neither of them singly take in both the moral and the poetical character of Mr. Somervile, nor my friendship, I searched Francis's Horace, with a view to find one only that should express, in some measure, the whole. The motto is,

Debita sparge lacryma favillam
Vatis Amici.

This upon the plinth, and under it on the pedestal over the wreath, Mr. Somervile's name in Latin, and $\frac{H.\ L.}{P.}$ and, at bottom, the date of the year he died, because of the word favillam. I do not imagine Author of the Chase can be put agreeably into Latin; and, I confess, it appears to me, that the emblematical horn, wreathed with laurel, will suffice to put all who know him, in mind of that poetical performance, without any explanation by words."

His character as a poet, as given by Dr. Johnson, may be generally allowed, with some exception to his unreasonable dislike of blank verse and burlesque poetry.

"Somervile has tried many modes of poetry; and though perhaps he has not in any reached such excellence as to raise much envy, it may commonly be said, at least, that "he writes very well for a gentleman." His serious pieces are sometimes elevated, and his trifles are sometimes elegant. In his Verses to Addison, the couplet which mentions Clio, is written with the most exquisite delicacy of praiſe; it exhibits one of thoſe happy ſtrokes that are ſeldom attained. In his Odes to Marlborough, there are beautiful lines. His ſubjects are commonly ſuch as require no great depth of thought, or energy of expreſſion. His Fables are generally ſtale; and therefore excite no curioſity. Of his favourite, The Two Springs, the fiction is unnatural, and the moral inconſequential. In his Tales, there is too much coarſeneſs, with too little eaſe of language, and not ſufficient rapidity of narration.

" His great work is his Chaſe, which he undertook in his maturer age, when his ear was improved to the approbation of blank verſe; of which, however, his two firſt lines give a bad ſpecimen. To this poem praiſe cannot be totally denied. He is allowed by ſportſmen, to write with great intelligence of his ſubject, which is the firſt requiſite to excellence; and, though it is impoſſible to intereſt the common readers of verſe, in the dangers or pleaſures of the chaſe, he has done all that tranſition and variety could effect; and has, with great propriety, enlarged his plan, by the modes of hunting uſed in other countries.

" With ſtill leſs judgment did he chooſe blank verſe as the vehicle of Rural Sports. If blank verſe be not tumid and gorgeous, it is crippled proſe—and familiar images in laboured language, have nothing to recommend them but abſurd novelty, which, wanting the attractions of nature, cannot pleaſe long.—One excellence of the " Splendid Shilling," is, that it is ſhort. Diſguiſe can gratify no longer than it deceives."

THE WORKS OF SOMERVILE.

PREFACE.

The old and infirm have at leaſt this privilege, that they can recal to their minds thoſe ſcenes of joy in which they once delighted, and ruminate over their paſt pleaſures, with a ſatisfaction almoſt equal to the firſt enjoyment. For thoſe ideas, to which any agreeable ſenſation is annexed, are eaſily excited; as leaving behind the moſt ſtrong and permanent impreſſions. The amuſements of our youth are the boaſt and comfort of our declining years. The ancients carried this notion even yet further, and ſuppoſed their heroes in the Elyſian fields were fond of the very ſame diverſions they exerciſed on earth. Death itſelf could not wean them from the accuſtomed ſports and gaieties of life.

" Pars in gramineis exercent membra palæſtris;
" Contendunt ludo, et fulvâ luctantur arenâ:
" Pars pedibus plaudunt choreas, et carmina di-
" cunt.
" Arma procul, currûſque virûm miratur inanes.
" Stant terrâ defixæ haſtæ, paſſimque ſoluti
" Per campum paſcuntur equi. Quæ gratia cur-
" rûm
" Armorumque fuit vivis, quæ cura nitentes
" Paſcere equos, eadem ſequitur tellure repoſ-
" tos."——VIRG. Æneid. vi.

Part on the graſſy cirque their pliant limbs
In wreſtling exerciſe, or on the ſands
Struggling diſpute the prize. Part lead the ring,
Or ſwell the chorus with alternate lays.
The chief their arms admires, their empty cars,
Their lances fix'd in earth. Th' unharneſs'd ſteeds
Graze unreſtrain'd; horſes, and cars, and arms,
All the ſame fond deſires, and pleaſing cares,
Still haunt their ſhades, and after death ſurvive.

I hope, therefore, I may be indulged (even by the more grave and cenſorious part of mankind) if at my leiſure hours, I run over, in my elbow chair, ſome of thoſe chaſes, which were once the delight of a more vigorous age. It is an entertaining, and (as I conceive) a very innocent amuſement. The reſult of theſe rambling imaginations will be found in the following poem; which, if equally diverting to my readers, as to myſelf, I ſhall have gained my end. I have intermixed the preceptive parts with ſo many deſcriptions and digreſſions, in the Georgic manner, that I hope they will not be tedious. I am ſure they are very neceſſary to be well underſtood by any gentleman, who would enjoy this noble ſport in full perfection. In this, at leaſt, I may comfort myſelf, that I cannot treſpaſs upon their patience more than Markham, Blome, and the other proſe writers upon this ſubject.

It is moſt certain, that hunting was the exerciſe of the greateſt heroes in antiquity. By this they formed themſelves for war; and their exploits againſt wild beaſts were a prelude to their other victories. Xenophon ſays, that almoſt all the ancient heroes, Neſtor, Theſeus, Caſtor, Pollux, Ulyſſus, Diomedes, Achilles, &c were μαθηταὶ κυνηγεσιῶν, diſciples of hunting; being taught carefully that art, as what would be highly ſerviceable to them in military diſcipline. Xen. Cynegetic. And Pliny obſerves, thoſe who were deſigned for great captains, were firſt taught " certare cum fugaci-
" bus feris curſu, cum audacibus robore, cum
" callidis aſtu:" to conteſt with the ſwifteſt wild beaſts, in ſpeed; with the boldeſt, in ſtrength; with the moſt cunning, in craft and ſubtilty. Plin. Panegyr. And the Roman emperors, in thoſe monuments they erected, to tranſmit their actions to future ages, made no ſcruple to join the glories of the chaſe to their moſt celebrated triumphs. Neither were their poets wanting to do juſtice to this heroic exerciſe. Beſide that of Oppian in Greek, we have ſeveral poems in Latin upon hunting. Gratius was contemporary with Ovid; as appears by this verſe:

" Aptaque venanti Gratius arma dabit."
Lib. iv. Pont.

Gratius ſhall arm the huntſman for the chaſe.

But of his works only ſome fragments remain. There are many others of more modern date. Amongſt theſe Nemeſianus, who ſeems very much ſuperior to Gratius, though of a more degenerate age. But only a fragment of his firſt book is preſerved. We might indeed have expected to have ſeen it treated more at large by Virgil, in his third Georgic, ſince it is expreſsly part of his ſubject. But he has favoured us only with ten verſes; and what he says of dogs, relates wholly to greyhounds and mastiffs.

" Veloces Spartæ catulos, acremque Molossum."
Georg. iii.

The greyhound swift, and mastiff's furious breed.

And he directs us to feed them with butter-milk. " Pasce fero pingui." He has, it is true, touched upon the Chase, in the 4th and 7th books of the Æneid. But it is evident, that the art of hunting is very different now from what it was in his days, and very much altered and improved in these latter ages. It does not appear to me, that the ancients had any notion of pursuing wild beasts by the scent only, with a regular and well-disciplined pack of hounds; and therefore they must have passed for poachers amongst our modern sportsmen. The muster-roll, given us by Ovid, in his story of Actæon, is of all sorts of dogs, and of all countries. And the description of the ancient hunting, as we find it in the antiquities of Pere de Montfaucon, taken from the sepulchre of the Nasos, and the arch of Constantine, has not the least trace of the manner now in use.

Whenever the ancients mention dogs followed by the scent, they mean no more than finding out the game by the nose of one single dog. This was as much as they knew of the " odora canum vis." Thus Nemesianus says,

" Odorato noscunt vestigia prato,
" Atque etiam leporum secreta cubilia mon-
" strant."

They challenge on the mead the recent stains,
And trail the hare unto her secret form.

Oppian has a long description of these dogs in his first book, from ver. 479 to 526. And here, though he seems to describe the hunting of the hare by the scent through many turnings and windings; yet he really says no more, than that one of those hounds, which he calls ἰχνευτῆρες, finds out the game. For he follows the scent no further than the hare's form; from whence, after he has started her, he pursues her by sight. I am indebted for these two last remarks to a reverend and very learned gentleman, whose judgment in the Belles Lettres nobody disputes, and whose approbation gave me the assurance to publish this poem.

Oppian also observes, that the best sort of these finders were brought from Britain; this island having always been famous (as it is at this day) for the best breed of hounds, for persons the best skilled in the art of hunting, and for horses the most enduring to follow the chase. It is therefore strange that none of our poets have yet thought it worth their while to treat of this subject; which is without doubt very noble in itself, and very well adapted to receive the most beautiful turns of poetry. Perhaps our poets have no great genius for hunting. Yet I hope, my brethren of the couples, by encouraging this first, but imperfect, essay, will show the world they have at least some taste for poetry.

The ancients esteemed hunting, not only as a manly and warlike exercise, but as highly conducive to health. The famous Galen recommends it above all others, as not only exercising the body, but giving delight and entertainment to the mind. And he calls the inventors of this art wise men, and well skilled in human nature. Lib. de parvæ pilæ exercitio.

The gentlemen, who are fond of a gingle at the close of every verse, and think no poem truly musical, but what is in rhyme, will here find themselves disappointed. If they be pleased to read over the short preface before the Paradise Lost, Mr. Smith's poem in memory of his friend Mr. John Philips, and the Archbishop of Cambray's letter to Monsieur Fontenelle, they may probably be of another opinion. For my own part, I shall not be ashamed to follow the example of Milton, Philips, Thomson, and all our best tragic writers.

Some few terms of art are dispersed here and there; but such only as are absolutely requisite to explain my subject. I hope in this the critics will excuse me; for I am humbly of opinion, that the affectation, and not the necessary use, is the proper object of their censure.

But I have done. I know the impatience of my brethren, when a fine day, and the concert of the kennel, invite them abroad. I shall therefore leave my reader to such diversion as he may find in the poem itself.

" En age, segnes,
" Rumpe moras; vocat ingenti clamore Cithæ-
" ron,
" Taygetique canes, domitrixque Epidaurus equo-
" rum; [git."
" Et vox assensu nemorum ingeminata remu-
VIRG. Georg. iii.

Hark, away,
Cast far behind the lingering cares of life.
Cithæron calls aloud, and in full cry
The hounds, Taygetus. Epidaurus trains
For us the generous steed; the hunter's shouts,
And cheering cries, assenting woods return.

RECOMMENDATORY POEMS.

TO WILLIAM SOMERVILE, Esq.

ON HIS POEM CALLED THE CHASE.

While you, Sir, gain the ſteep aſcent to fame,
And honours due to deathleſs merit claim;
To a weak muſe a kind indulgence lend,
Fond with juſt praiſe your labours to commend,
And tell the world that Somervile's her friend.
Her incenſe guiltleſs of the forms of art
Breathes all the huntſman's honeſty of heart;
Whoſe fancy ſtill the pleaſing ſcene retains
Of Edric's villa, and Ardenna's plains:
Joys, which from change ſuperior charms receiv'd,
The horn hoarſe ſounding by the lyre reliev'd:
When the day crown'd with rural chaſte delight,
Reſigns obſequious to the feſtive night;
The feſtive night awakes th' harmonious lay,
And in ſweet verſe recounts the triumphs of the day.
Strange! that the Britiſh muſe ſhould leave ſo long,
The chaſe, the ſport of Britain's kings, unſung!
Diſtinguiſh'd land! by Heaven indulg'd to breed,
The ſtout, ſagacious hound, and generous ſteed;
In vain! while yet no bard adorn'd our iſle,
To celebrate the glorious ſylvan toil.
For this what darling ſon ſhall feel thy fire,
God of th' unerring bow, and tuneful lyre?
Our vows are heard.—Attend, ye vocal throng,
Somervile meditates th' adventurous ſong.
Bold to attempt, and happy to excel,
His numerous verſe the huntſman's art ſhall tell.
From him, ye Britiſh youths, a vigorous race,
Imbibe the various ſcience of the chaſe;
And while the well-plann'd ſyſtem you admire,
Know Brunſwick only could the work inſpire;
A Georgic muſe awaits Auguſtan days,
And Somervile's will ſing, when Frederick's give the bays.

John Nixon.

TO THE AUTHOR OF THE CHASE.

Once more, my friend, I touch the trembling lyre,
And in my boſom feel poetic fire.
For thee I quit the law's more rugged ways,
To pay my humble tribute to thy lays,
What, though I daily turn each learned ſage,
And labour through the unenlighten'd page:
Wak'd by thy lines, the borrow'd flames I feel,
As flints give fire when aided by the ſteel.
Though in ſulphureous clouds of ſmoke confin'd,
Thy rural ſcenes ſpring freſh into my mind.
Thy genius in ſuch colours paints the chaſe,
The real to fictitious joys give place.
When the wild muſic charms my raviſh'd ear,
How dull, how taſteleſs Handel's notes appear!
Ev'n Farinelli's ſelf the palm reſigns,
He yields—but to the muſic of thy lines.
If friends to poetry can yet be found;
Who without bluſhing ſenſe prefer to ſound;
Then let this ſoft, this ſoul-enfeebling band,
Theſe warbling minſtrels, quit the beggar'd land.
They but a momentary joy impart,
'Tis you, who touch the ſoul, and warm the heart.
How tempting do thy ſylvan ſports appear!
Ev'n wild Ambition might vouchſafe an ear,
Might her fond luſt of power a while compoſe,
And gladly change it for thy ſweet repoſe.
No fierce, unruly ſenates, threaten here,
No axe, no ſcaffold, to the view appear,
No envy, diſappointment, and deſpair.
Here, bleſt viciſſitude, whene'er you pleaſe,
You ſtep from exerciſe to learned eaſe:
Turn o'er each claſſic page, each beauty trace,
The mind unwearied in the pleaſing chaſe.
Oh! would kind Heaven ſuch happineſs beſtow,
Let fools, let knaves, be maſters here below.
Grandeur and place, thoſe baits to catch the wiſe,
And all their pageant train, I pity and deſpiſe.

THE CHASE.

BOOK I.

" Nec tibi cura canum fuerit poſtrema."——VIRG. Georg. iii.

" Romanis ſolenne viris opus, utile famæ,
" Vitæque, et membris."——HOR. 1 Ep. xviii.

THE ARGUMENT.

The ſubject propoſed. Addreſs to his Royal Highneſs the Prince. The origin of hunting. The rude and unpoliſhed manner of the firſt hunters. Beaſts at firſt hunted for food and ſacrifice. The grant made by God to man of the beaſts, &c. The regular manner of hunting firſt brought into this iſland by the Normans. The beſt hounds and beſt horſes bred here. The advantage of this exerciſe to us, as iſlanders. Addreſs to gentlemen of eſtates. Situation of the kennel and its ſeveral courts. The diverſion and employment of hounds in the kennel. The different ſorts of hounds for each different chaſe. Deſcription of a perfect hound. Of ſizing and ſorting of hounds, the middle-ſized hound recommended. Of the large deep-mouthed hound for hunting the ſtag and otter. Of the lime-hound; their uſe on the borders of England and Scotland. A phyſical account of ſcents. Of good and bad ſcenting days. A ſhort admonition to my brethren of the couples.

THE Chaſe I ſing, hounds, and their various breed,
And no leſs various uſe. O thou great prince!
Whom Cambria's towering hills proclaim their lord,
Deign thou to hear my bold, inſtructive ſong.
While grateful citizens with pompous ſhow,
Rear the triumphal arch, rich with th' exploits
Of thy illuſtrious houſe; while virgins pave
Thy way with flowers, and, as the royal youth
Paſſing they view, admire and ſigh in vain;
While crowded theatres, too fondly proud
Of their exotic minſtrels, and ſhrill pipes,
The price of manhood, hail thee with a ſong,
And airs ſoft warbling; my hoarſe-ſounding horn
Invites thee to the Chaſe, the ſport of kings;
Image of war, without its guilt. The muſe
Aloft on wing ſhall ſoar, conduct with care
Thy foaming courſer o'er the ſteepy rock,
Or on the river bank receive thee ſafe,
Light-bounding o'er the wave, from ſhore to ſhore.
Be thou our great protector, gracious youth!
And if, in future times, ſome envious prince,
Careleſs of right and guileful, ſhould invade
Thy Britain's commerce, or ſhould ſtrive in vain
To wreſt the balance from thy equal hand;
Thy hunter-train, in cheerful green array'd,
(A band undaunted, and innur'd to toils)
Shall compaſs thee around, die at thy feet,
Or hew thy paſſage through th' embattled foe,
And clear thy way to fame: inſpir'd by thee
The nobler chaſe of glory ſhall purſue
Through fire, and ſmoke, and blood, and fields of death.

Nature, in her productions ſlow, aſpires
By juſt degrees to reach perfection's height:
So mimic art works leiſurely, till time
Improve the piece, or wiſe experience give
The proper finiſhing. When Nimrod bold,
That mighty hunter, firſt made war on beaſts,
And ſtain'd the woodland-green with purple dye,
New, and unpoliſh'd was the huntſman's art;
No ſtated rule, his wanton will his guide.
With clubs and ſtones, rude implements of war,
He arm'd his ſavage bands, a multitude
Untrain'd; of twining oſiers form'd, they pitch
Their artleſs toils, then range the deſert hills,
And ſcour the plains below; the trembling herd
Start at th' unuſual ſound, and clamorous ſhout
Unheard before; ſurpris'd, alas! to find [lord,
Man now their foe, when erſt they deem'd their
But mild and gentle, and by whom as yet
Secure they graz'd. Death ſtretches o'er the plain
Wide-waſting, and grim ſlaughter red with blood;
Urg'd on by hunger keen, they wound, they kill,
Their rage licentious knows no bound; at laſt,
Incumber'd with their ſpoils, joyful they bear
Upon their ſhoulders broad the bleeding prey.
Part on their altars ſmoke a ſacrifice
To that all-gracious power, whoſe bounteous hand
Supports his wide creation; what remains
On living coals they broil, inelegant
Of taſte, nor ſkill'd as yet in nicer arts
Of pamper'd luxury. Devotion pure,
And ſtrong neceſſity, thus firſt began

The chaſe of beaſts: though bloody was the deed,
Yet without guilt. For the green herb alone
Unequal to ſuſtain man's labouring race,
Now every moving thing that liv'd on earth
Was granted him for food *. So juſt is Heaven,
To give us in proportion to our wants.
Or chance or induſtry in after-time
Some few improvements made, but ſhort as yet
Of due perfection. In this iſle remote,
Our painted anceſtors were ſlow to learn,
To arms devote, of the politer arts
Nor ſkill'd nor ſtudious; till from Neuſtria's coaſts
Victorious William, to more decent rules
Subdu'd our Saxon fathers, taught to ſpeak
The proper dialect, with horn and voice
To cheer the buſy hound, whoſe well-known cry
His liſtening peers approve with joint acclaim.
From him ſucceſſive huntſmen learn'd to join
In bloody ſocial leagues, the multitude
Diſpers'd, to ſize, to ſort their various tribes,
To rear, feed, hunt, and diſcipline the pack.
Hail, happy Britain! highly favour'd iſle,
And Heav'n's peculiar care! To thee 'tis given
To train the ſprightly ſteed, more fleet than thoſe
Begot by winds, or the celeſtial breed
That bore the great Pelides through the preſs
Of heroes arm'd, and broke their crowded ranks;
Which proudly neighing, with the ſun begins
Cheerful his courſe? and ere his beams decline,
Has meaſur'd half thy ſurface unfatigu'd.
In thee alone, fair land of liberty!
Is bred the perfect hound, in ſcent and ſpeed
As yet unrival'd, while in other climes
Their virtue fails, a weak degenerate race.
In vain malignant ſteams and winter fogs
Load the dull air, and hover round our coaſts,
The huntſman ever gay, robuſt, and bold,
Defies the noxious vapour, and confides
In this delightful exerciſe, to raiſe
His drooping head, and cheer his heart with joy.
Ye vigorous youths, by ſmiling fortune bleſt
With large demeſnes, hereditary wealth,
Heap'd copious by your wiſe forefathers care,
Hear and attend! while I the means reveal
T' enjoy thoſe pleaſures, for the weak too ſtrong,
Too coſtly for the poor: To rein the ſteed
Swift-ſtretching o'er the plain, to cheer the pack,
Opening in conſorts of harmonious joy,
But breathing death. What though the gripe ſevere
Of brazen-fiſted Time, and ſlow diſeaſe
Creeping through every vein, and nerve unſtrung,
Afflict my ſhatter'd frame, undaunted ſtill,
Fix'd as a mountain aſh, that braves the bolts
Of angry Jove; though blaſted, yet unfallen;
Still can my ſoul in Fancy's mirror view
Deeds glorious once, recal the joyous ſcene
In all its ſplendours deck'd, o'er the full bowl
Recount my triumphs paſt, urge others on
With hand and voice, and point the winding way:
Pleas'd with that ſocial ſweet garrulity,
The poor diſbanded veteran's ſole delight.
Firſt let the kennel be the huntſman's care,
Upon ſome little eminence erect,
And fronting to the ruddy dawn; its courts
On either hand wide opening to receive
The ſun's all-cheering beams, when mild he ſhines,
And gilds the mountain tops. For much the pack
(Rous'd from their dark alcoves) delight to ſtretch
And baſk in his invigorating ray:
Warn'd by the ſtreaming light and merry lark,
Forth ruſh the jolly clan; with tuneful throats
They carol loud, and in grand chorus join'd
Salute the new-born day. For not alone
The vegetable world, but men and brutes
Own his reviving influence, and joy
At his approach. Fountain of light! if chance
Some envious cloud veil thy refulgent brow,
In vain the muſes aid; untouch'd, unſtrung,
Lies my mute harp, and thy deſponding bard
Sits darkly muſing o'er th' unfiniſh'd lay.
Let no Corinthian pillars prop the dome,
A vain expence, on charitable deeds
Better diſpos'd, to clothe the tatter'd wretch,
Who ſhrinks beneath the blaſt, to feed the poor
Pinch'd with afflictive want: For uſe, not ſtate,
Gracefully plain, let each apartment riſe.
O'er all let cleanlineſs preſide, no ſcraps
Beſtrew the pavement, and no half-pick'd bones
To kindle fierce debate, or to diſguſt
That nicer ſenſe, on which the ſportſman's hope,
And all his future triumphs, muſt depend.
Soon as the growling pack with eager joy
Have lapp'd their ſmoking viands, morn or eve,
From the full ciſtern lead the ductile ſtreams,
To waſh thy court well pav'd, nor ſpare thy pains,
For much to health will cleanlineſs avail.
Seek'ſt thou for hounds to climb the rocky ſteep
And bruſh th' entangled covert, whoſe nice ſcent
O'er greaſy fallows and frequented roads
Can pick the dubious way. Baniſh far off
Each noiſome ſtench, let no offenſive ſmell
Invade thy wide incloſure, but admit
The nitrous air and purifying breeze.
Water and ſhade no leſs demand thy care:
In a large ſquare th' adjacent field incloſe,
There plant in equal ranks the ſpreading elm,
Or fragrant lime; moſt happy thy deſign,
If at the bottom of thy ſpacious court,
A large canal, fed by the cryſtal brook,
From its tranſparent boſom ſhall reflect
Downward thy ſtructure and inverted grove.
Here when the ſun's too potent gleams annoy
The crowded kennel, and the drooping pack,
Reſtleſs, and faint, loll their unmoiſten'd tongues,
And drop their feeble tails, to cooler ſhades
Lead forth the panting tribe; ſoon ſhalt thou find
The cordial breeze their fainting hearts revive:
Tumultuous ſoon they plunge into the ſtream,
There lave their reeking ſides, with greedy joy
Gulp down the flying wave, this way and that
From ſhore to ſhore they ſwim, while clamour loud
And wild uproar torments the troubled flood:
Then on the ſunny bank they roll and ſtretch
Their dripping limbs, or elſe in wanton rings
Courſing around, purſuing and purſued,
The merry multitude diſporting play.
But here with watchful and obſervant eye,
Attend their frolics, which too often end

* Gen. chap. ix. ver 3.

In bloody broils and death. High o'er thy head
Wave thy refounding whip, and with a voice
Fierce-menacing o'er-rule the ſtern debate,
And quench their kindling rage; for oft in ſport
Begun, combat enſues, growling they ſnarl,
Then on their haunches rear'd, rampant they ſeize
Each other's throats, with teeth and claws in gore
Beſmear'd, they wound, they tear, till on the ground,
Panting, half dead the conquer'd champion lies:
Then ſudden all the baſe ignoble crowd
Loud-clamouring ſeize the helpleſs worried wretch,
And, thirſting for his blood, drag different ways
His mangled carcaſe on th' enſanguin'd plain.
O breaſts of pity void! t' oppreſs the weak,
To point your vengeance at the friendleſs head,
And with one mutual cry inſult the fall'n!
Emblem too juſt of man's degenerate race.
Others apart, by native inſtinct led,
Knowing inſtructor! 'mong the ranker graſs
Cull each ſalubrious plant, with bitter juice
Concoctive ſtor'd, and potent to allay
Each vicious ferment. Thus the hand divine
Of Providence, beneficent and kind
To all his creatures, for the brutes preſcribes
A ready remedy, and is himſelf
Their great phyſician. Now grown ſtiff with age,
And many a painful chaſe, the wiſe old hound,
Regardleſs of the frolic pack, attends
His maſter's ſide, or ſlumbers at his eaſe
Beneath the bending ſhade; there many a ring
Runs o'er in dreams; now on the doubtful foil
Puzzles perplex'd, or doubles intricate
Cautious unfolds, then wing'd with all his ſpeed,
Bounds o'er the lawn to ſeize his panting prey:
And in imperfect whimperings ſpeaks his joy.
A different hound for every different chaſe
Select with judgment; nor the timorous hare
O'ermatch'd deſtroy, but leave that vile offence
To the mean, murderous, courſing crew; intent
On blood and ſpoil. O blaſt their hopes, juſt Heaven!
And all their painful drudgeries repay
With diſappointment and ſevere remorſe.
But huſband thou thy pleaſures, and give ſcope
To all her ſubtle play: by nature led
A thouſand ſhifts ſhe tries; t' unravel theſe
Th' induſtrious beagle twiſts his waving tail,
Through all her labyrinths purſues, and rings
Her doleful knell. See there with countenance blithe,
And with a courtly grin, the fawning hound
Salutes thee cowering, his wide opening noſe
Upward he curls, and his large ſloe-black eyes
Melt in ſoft blandiſhments, and humble joy!
His gloſſy ſkin, or yellow-pied, or blue,
In lights or ſhades by Nature's pencil drawn,
Reflects the various tints: his ears and legs
Fleckt here and there, in gay enamel'd pride,
Rival the ſpeckled pard; his ruſh-grown tail
O'er his broad back bends in an ample arch;
On ſhoulders clean, upright and firm he ſtands;
His round cat foot, ſtrait hams, and wide-ſpread thighs,
And his low-dropping cheſt, confeſs his ſpeed,
His ſtrength, his wind, or on the ſteepy hill,
Or far-extended plain; in every part
So well proportion'd that the nicer ſkill
Of Phidias himſelf can't blame thy choice.
Of ſuch compoſe thy pack. But here a mean
Obſerve, nor the large hound prefer, of ſize
Gigantic; he in the thick-woven covert
Painfully tugs, or in the thorny brake
Torn and embarraſs'd bleeds; but if too ſmall,
The pigmy brood in every furrow ſwims;
Moil'd in the clogging clay, panting they lag
Behind inglorious; or elſe ſhivering creep
Benumb'd and faint beneath the ſheltering thorn.
For hounds of middle ſize, active and ſtrong,
Will better anſwer all thy various ends,
And crown thy pleaſing labours with ſucceſs.
As ſome brave captain, curious and exact
By his fix'd ſtandard forms in equal ranks
His gay battalion, as one man they move
Step after ſtep, their ſize the ſame, their arms
Far-gleaming, dart the ſame united blaze:
Reviewing generals his merit own;
How regular! how juſt! And all his cares
Are well repaid, if mighty George approve.
So model thou thy pack, if honour touch
Thy generous ſoul, and the world's juſt applauſe.
But above all take heed, nor mix thy hounds
Of different kinds; diſcordant ſounds ſhall grate
Thy ears offended, and a lagging line
Of babbling curs diſgrace thy broken pack.
But if th' amphibious otter be thy chace,
Or ſtately ſtag, that o'er the woodland reigns;
Or if the harmonious thunder of the field
Delight thy raviſh'd ears; the deep flew'd hound
Breed up with care, ſtrong, heavy, ſlow, but ſure;
Whoſe ears down-hanging from his thick round head
Shall ſweep the morning dew, whoſe clanging voice
Awake the mountain echo in her cell,
And ſhake the foreſts: The bold Talbot kind
Of theſe the prime; as white as Alpine ſnows;
And great their uſe of old. Upon the banks
Of Tweed, ſlow winding through the vale, the ſeat
Of war and rapine once, ere Britons knew
The ſweets of peace, or Anna's dread commands
To laſting leagues the haughty rivals aw'd,
There dwelt a pilfering race; well train'd and ſkill'd
In all the myſteries of theft, the ſpoil
Their only ſubſtance, feuds and war their ſport:
Not more expert in every fraudful art
Th' arch* felon was of old, who by the tail
Drew back his lowing prize: in vain his wiles,
In vain the ſhelter of the covering rock,
In vain the ſooty cloud, and ruddy flames
That iſſued from his mouth; for ſoon he paid
His forfeit life: a debt how juſtly due
To wrong'd Alcides, and avenging heaven!
Veil'd in the ſhades of night they ford the ſtream,
Then prowling far and near, whate'er they ſeize
Becomes their prey; nor flocks nor herds are ſafe.
Nor ſtalls protect the ſteer, nor ſtrong-barr'd doors
Secure the favourite horſe. Soon as the morn

* Cacus, Virg. Æn. lib. viii.

Reveals his wrongs, with ghaſtly viſage wan
The plunder'd owner ſtands, and from his lips
A thouſand thronging curſes burſt their way:
He calls his ſtout allies, and in a line
His faithful hound he leads, then with a voice
That utters loud his rage, attentive cheers:
Soon the ſagacious brute, his curling tail
Flouriſh'd in air, low bending plies around
His buſy noſe, the ſteaming vapour ſnuffs
Inquiſite, nor leaves one turf untried,
Till, conſcious of the recent ſtains, his heart
Beats quick; his ſnuffling noſe, his active tail,
Atteſt his joy; then with deep opening mouth,
That makes the welkin tremble, he proclaims
Th' audacious felon; ſoot by foot he marks
His winding way, while all the liſtening crowd
Applaud his reaſonings. O'er the watery ford,
Dry ſandy heaths, and ſtony barren hills,
O'er beaten paths, with men and beaſts diſtain'd,
Unerring he purſues; till at the cot
Arriv'd, and ſeizing by his guilty throat
The caitif vile, redeems the captive prey:
So exquiſitely delicate his ſenſe! [quire
Should ſome more curious ſportſman here in-
Whence this ſagacity, this wondrous power
Of tracing ſtep by ſtep, or man or brute?
What guide inviſible points out their way,
O'er the dank marſh, bleak hill, and ſandy plain?
The courteous muſe ſhall the dark cauſe reveal.
The blood that from the heart inceſſant rolls
In many a crimſon tide, then here and there
In ſmaller rills diſparted, as it flows
Propell'd, the ferous particles evade
Through th' open pores, and with the ambient air
Entangling mix. As fuming vapours riſe,
And hang upon the gently purling brook,
There by th' incumbent atmoſphere compreſs'd.
The panting chaſe grows warmer as he flies,
And through the net-work of the ſkin perſpires;
Leaves a long ſtreaming trail behind, which by
The cooler air condens'd, remains, unleſs
By ſome rude ſtorm diſpers'd, or rarified
By the meridian ſun's intenſer heat.
To every ſhrub the warm effluvia cling,
Hang on the graſs, impregnate earth and ſkies.
With noſtrils opening wide, o'er hill, o'er dale
The vigorous hounds purſue, with every breath
Inhale the grateful ſteam, quick pleaſures ſting
Their tingling nerves, while they their thanks repay,
And in triumphant melody confeſs
The titillating joy. Thus on the air
Depend the hunter's hopes. When ruddy ſtreaks
At eve forebode a bluſtering ſtormy day,
Or lowering clouds blacken the mountain's brow,
When nipping froſts, and the keen biting blaſts
Of the dry parching eaſt, menace the trees
With tender bloſſoms teeming, kindly ſpare
Thy ſleeping pack, in their warm beds of ſtraw
Low-ſinking at their eaſe; liſtleſs they ſhrink
Into ſome dark receſs, nor hear thy voice
Though oft invok'd; or haply if thy call
Rouſe up the ſlumbering tribe, with heavy eyes
Glaz'd, lifeleſs, dull, downward they drop their tails
Inverted; high on their bent backs erect
Their pointed briſtles ſtare, or 'mong the tufts
Of ranker weeds, each ſtomach-healing plant
Curious they crop, ſick, ſpiritleſs, forlorn.
Theſe inauſpicious days, on other cares
Employ thy precious hours; th' improving friend
With open arms embrace, and from his lips
Glean ſcience, ſeaſon'd with good-natur'd wit.
But if th' inclement ſkies and angry Jove
Forbid the pleaſing intercourſe, thy books
Invite thy ready hand, each ſacred page
Rich with the wiſe remarks of heroes old.
Converſe familiar with th' illuſtrious dead;
With great examples of old Greece or Rome,
Enlarge thy free-born heart, and bleſs kind Heaven,
That Britain yet enjoys dear liberty,
That balm of life, that ſweeteſt bleſſing, cheap
Though purchas'd with our blood. Well bred, polite,
Credit thy calling. See! how mean, how low,
The bookleſs ſauntering youth, proud of the ſkut
That dignifies his cap, his flouriſh'd belt,
And ruſty couples gingling by his ſide.
Be thou of other mold; and know that ſuch
Tranſporting pleaſures were by Heaven ordain'd
Wiſdom's relief, and virtue's great reward.

BOOK II.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of the power of inſtinct in brutes. Two remarkable inſtances in the hunting of the roebuck, and in the hare going to ſeat in the morning. Of the variety of ſeats or forms of the hare, according to the change of the ſeaſon, weather, or wind. Deſcription of the hare-hunting in all its parts, interſperſed with rules to be obſerved by thoſe who follow that chaſe. Tranſition to the Aſiatic way of hunting, particularly the magnificent manner of the Great Mogul, and other Tartarian princes, taken from Monſieur Bernier, and the hiſtory of Gengiſkan the Great. Concludes with a ſhort reproof of tyrants and oppreſſors of mankind.

Nor will it leſs delight th' attentive ſage
T' obſerve that inſtinct, which unerring guides
The brutal race, which mimic's reaſon's lore,
And oft tranſcends: Heaven-taught, the roe-buck
ſwift
Loiters at eaſe before the driving pack
And mocks their vain purſuit, nor far he flies,
But checks his ardour, till the ſteaming ſcent
That freſhens on the blade, provokes their rage.
Urg'd to their ſpeed, his weak deluded foes
Soon flag fatigued; ſtrain'd to exceſs each nerve,
Each ſlacken'd ſinew fails; they pant, they foam;
Then o'er the lawn he bounds, o'er the high hills
Stretches ſecure, and leaves the ſcatter'd crowd
To puzzle in the diſtant vale below.
'Tis inſtinct that directs the jealous hare
To chooſe her ſoft abode: With ſtep revers'd
She forms the doubling maze; then, ere the morn
Peeps through the clouds, leaps to her cloſe receſs,

As wandering ſhepherds on th' Arabian plains
No ſettled reſidence obſerve, but ſhift
Their moving camp, now, on ſome cooler hill
With cedars crown'd, court the refreſhing breeze;
And then, below, where trickling ſtreams diſtil
From ſome penurious ſource, their thirſt allay,
And feed their fainting flocks: ſo the wiſe hares
Oft quit their ſeats, leſt ſome more curious eye
Should mark their haunts, and by dark treacherous wiles
Plot their deſtruction; or perchance in hopes
Of plenteous forage, near the ranker mead,
Or matted blade, wary and cloſe they ſit.
When ſpring ſhines forth, ſeaſon of love and joy,
In the moiſt marſh, 'mong beds of ruſhes hid,
They cool their boiling blood: When ſummer ſuns
Bake the cleft earth, to thick wide waving fields
Of corn full grown, they lead their helpleſs young:
But when autumnal torrents and fierce rains
Deluge the vale, in the dry crumbling bank
Their forms they delve, and cautiouſly avoid
The dripping covert: Yet when winter's cold
Their limbs benumbs, thither with ſpeed return'd
In the long graſs they ſkulk, or ſhrinking creep
Among the wither'd leaves, thus changing ſtill,
As fancy prompts them, or as food invites.
But every ſeaſon carefully obſerv'd,
Th' inconſtant winds, the fickle element,
The wiſe experienc'd huntſman ſoon may find
His ſubtle, various game, nor waſte in vain
His tedious hours, till his impatient hounds,
With diſappointment vex'd, each ſpringing lark
Babbling purſue, far ſcatter'd o'er the fields.
Now golden Autumn from her open lap
Her fragrant bounties ſhowers; the fields are ſhorn;
Inwardly ſmiling, the proud farmer views
The riſing pyramids that grace his yard,
And counts his large increaſe; his barns are ſtor'd
And groaning ſtaddles bend beneath their load.
All now is free as air, and the gay pack
In the rough briſtly ſtubbles range unblam'd;
No widow's tears o'erflow, no ſecret curſe
Swells in the farmer's breaſt, which his pale lips
Trembling conceal, by his fierce landlord aw'd:
But courteous now he levels every fence,
Joins in the common cry, and halloos loud,
Charm'd with the rattling thunder of the field.
Oh bear me, ſome kind power inviſible!
To that extended lawn, where the gay court
View the ſwift racers, ſtretching to the goal;
Games more renown'd, and a far nobler train,
Than proud Elean fields could boaſt of old.
Oh! were a Theban lyre not wanting here,
And Pindar's voice, to do their merit right!
Or to thoſe ſpacious plains, where the ſtrain'd eye
In the wide proſpect loſt, beholds at laſt
Sarum's proud ſpire, that o'er the hills aſcends,
And pierces through the clouds. Or to thy downs,
Fair Cotſwold, where the well-breath'd beagle climbs
With matchleſs ſpeed, thy green aſpiring brow,
And leaves the lagging multitude behind.
Hail, gentle dawn! mild bluſhing goddeſs, hail!
Rejoic'd I ſee thy purple mantle ſpread
O'er half the ſkies, gems pave thy radiant way,
And orient pearls from every ſhrub depend.
Farewell, Cleora; here deep ſunk in down
Slumber ſecure, with happy dreams amus'd,
Till grateful ſteams ſhall tempt thee to receive
Thy early meal, or thy officious maids,
The toilet plac'd, ſhall urge thee to perform
Th' important work. Me other joys invite,
The horn ſonorous calls, the pack awak'd
Their mattins chaunt, nor brook my long delay,
My courſer hears their voice; ſee there, with ears
And tail erect, neighing he paws the ground;
Fierce rapture kindles in his reddening eyes,
And boils in every vein. As captive boys
Cow'd by the ruling rod and haughty frowns
Of pedagogues ſevere, from their hard taſks
If once diſmiſs'd, no limits can contain
The tumult rais'd within their little breaſts,
But give a looſe to all their frolic play:
So from their kennel ruſh the joyous pack;
A thouſand wanton gaieties expreſs
Their inward ecſtacy, their pleaſing ſport
Once more indulg'd, and liberty reſtor'd.
The riſing ſun, that o'er th' horizon peeps,
As many colours from their gloſſy ſkins
Beaming reflects, as paint the various bow
When April ſhowers deſcend. Delightful ſcene!
Where all around is gay, men, horſes, dogs,
And in each ſmiling countenance appears
Freſh blooming health, and univerſal joy.
Huntſman, lead on! behind the cluſtering pack
Submiſs attend, hear with reſpect thy whip
Loud clanging, and thy harſher voice obey:
Spare not the ſtraggling cur that wildly roves;
But let thy briſk aſſiſtant on his back
Imprint thy juſt reſentments; let each laſh
Bite to the quick, till howling he return,
And whining creep amid the trembling crowd.
Here on this verdant ſpot, where nature kind
With double bleſſings crowns the farmer's hopes;
Where flowers autumnal ſpring, and the rank mead
Affords the wandering hares a rich repaſt;
Throw off thy ready pack. See, where they ſpread,
And range around, and daſh the glittering dew.
If ſome ſtaunch hound, with his authentic voice,
Avow the recent trail, the juſtling tribe
Attend his call, then with one mutual cry,
The welcome news confirm, and echoing hills
Repeat the pleaſing tale. See how they thread
The brakes, and up yon furrow drive along!
But quick they back recoil, and wiſely check
Their eager haſte; then o'er the fallow'd ground
How leiſurely they work, and many a pauſe
Th' harmonious concert breaks; till more aſſur'd
With joy redoubled the low vallies ring.
What artful labyrinths perplex their way!
Ah! there ſhe lies; how cloſe! ſhe pants, ſhe doubts
If now ſhe lives; ſhe trembles as ſhe ſits,
With horror ſeiz'd. The wither'd graſs that clings
Around her head, of the ſame ruſſet hue
Almoſt deceiv'd my ſight, had not her eyes

With life full-beaming her vain wiles betray'd.
At diſtance draw thy pack, let all be huſh'd,
No clamour loud, no frantic joy be heard,
Leſt the wild hound run gadding o'er the plain
Untractable, nor hear thy chiding voice.
Now gently put her off; ſee how direct
To her known mew ſhe flies! Here, huntſman, bring
(But without hurry) all thy jolly hounds,
And calmly lay them in. How low they ſtoop,
And ſeem to plough the ground! then all at once
With greedy noſtrils ſnuff the fuming ſteam
That glads their fluttering hearts. As winds let looſe
From the dark caverns of the bluſtering god,
They burſt away, and ſweep the dewy lawn.
Hope gives them wings while ſhe's ſpurr'd on by fear,
The welkin rings, men, dogs, hills, rocks, and woods,
In the full concert join. Now, my brave youths,
Stripp'd for the chaſe, give all your ſouls to joy!
See how their courſers, than the mountain roe
More fleet, the verdant carpet ſkim, thick clouds
Snorting they breathe, their ſhining hoofs ſcarce print
The graſs unbruis'd: with emulation fir'd
They ſtrain to lead the field, top the barr'd gate,
O'er the deep ditch exulting bound, and bruſh
The thorny-twining hedge: The riders bend
O'er their arch'd necks; with ſteady hands, by turns
Indulge their ſpeed, or moderate their rage.
Where are their ſorrows, diſappointments, wrongs,
Vexations, ſickneſs, cares? All, all are gone,
And with the panting winds lag far behind.
Huntſman! her gait obſerve; if in wide rings
She wheel her mazy way, in the ſame round
Perſiſting ſtill, ſhe'll foil the beaten track,
But if ſhe fly, and with the favouring wind
Urge her bold courſe; leſs intricate thy taſk:
Puſh on thy pack. Like ſome poor exil'd wretch
The frighted chaſe leaves her late dear abodes,
O'r plains remote ſhe ſtretches far away,
Ah! never to return! For greedy death
Hovering exults, ſecure to ſeize his prey.
Hark from yon covert, where thoſe towering oaks
Above the humble copſe aſpiring riſe,
What glorious triumphs burſt in every gale
Upon our raviſh'd ears! the hunters ſhout,
The clanging horns ſwell their ſweet-winding notes,
The pack wide opening load the trembling air
With various melody; from tree to tree
The propagated cry redoubling bounds,
And winged zephyrs waft the floating joy
Through all the regions near: afflictive birch
No more the ſchool-boy dreads, his priſon broke,
Scampering he flies, nor heeds his maſter's call;
The weary traveller forgets his road,
And climbs th' adjacent hill; the ploughman leaves
Th' unfiniſh'd furrow; nor his bleating flocks
Are now the ſhepherd's joy! men, boys, and girls,
Deſert th' unpeopled village; and wild crowds
Spread o'er the plain, by the ſweet frenzy ſeiz'd.
Look, how ſhe pants! and o'er yon opening glade
Slips glancing by! while, at the further end,
The puzzling back unravel wile by wile,
Maze within maze. The covert's utmoſt bound
Slily ſhe ſkirts; behind them cautious creeps
And in that very track, ſo lately ſtain'd
By all the ſteaming crowd, ſeems to purſue
The foe ſhe flies. Let cavillers deny
That brutes have reaſon; ſure 'tis ſomething more;
'Tis Heaven directs, and ſtratagems inſpires
Beyond the ſhort extent of human thought.
But hold—I ſee her from the covert break;
Sad on yon little eminence ſhe ſits;
Intent ſhe liſtens with one ear erect,
Pondering, and doubtful what new courſe to take;
And how t' eſcape the fierce blood-thirſty crew,
That ſtill urge on, and ſtill in vollies loud
Inſult her woes, and mock her ſore diſtreſs.
As now in louder peals the loaded winds
Bring on the gathering ſtorm, her fears prevail,
And o'er the plain, and o'er the mountain's ridge,
Away ſhe flies; nor ſhips with wind and tide,
And all their canvaſs wings, ſcud half ſo faſt.
Once more, ye jovial train, your courage try,
And each clean courſer's ſpeed. We ſcour along;
In pleaſing hurry and confuſion toſt;
Oblivion to be wiſh'd. The patient pack
Hang on the ſcent unweary'd, up they climb,
And ardent we purſue; our labouring ſteeds
We preſs, we gore; till once the ſummit gain'd,
Painfully panting; there we breathe a while;
Then, like a foaming torrent, pouring down
Precipitant, we ſmoke along the vale.
Happy the man who with unrival'd ſpeed
Can paſs his fellows, and with pleaſure view
The ſtruggling pack; how in the rapid courſe
Alternate they preſide, and joſtling puſh
To guide the dubious ſcent; how giddy youth
Oft babbling errs, by wiſer age reprov'd;
How, niggard of his ſtrength, the wiſe old hound
Hangs in the rear, till ſome important point
Rouſe all his diligence, or till the chaſe
Sinking he finds: then to the head he ſprings
With thirſt of glory fir'd, and wins the prize.
Huntſman, take heed; they ſtop in full career.
Yon crowding flocks, that at a diſtance gaze,
Have haply foil'd the turf. See! that old hound,
How buſily he works, but dares not truſt
His doubtful ſenſe; draw yet a wider ring.
Hark! now again the chorus fills. As bells,
Sally'd a while, at once their peal renew,
And high in air the tuneful thunder rolls.
See, how they toſs, with animated rage
Recovering all they loſt! That eager haſte
Some doubling wile foreſhows. Ah! yet once more
They're check'd, hold back with ſpeed—on either hand
They flouriſh round—ev'n yet perſiſt—'Tis right,
Away they ſpring; the ruſtling ſtubbles bend
Beneath the driving ſtorm. Now the poor chaſe
Begins to flag, to her laſt ſhifts reduc'd.
From brake to brake ſhe flies, and viſits all
Her well-known haunts, where once ſhe rang'd ſecure,

With love and plenty bleſt. See! there ſhe goes,
She reels along, and by her gait betrays
Her inward weakneſs. See, how black ſhe looks!
The ſweat, that clogs th' obſtructed pores, ſcarce leaves
A languid ſcent. And now in open view
See, ſee, ſhe flies! each eager hound exerts
His utmoſt ſpeed, and ſtretches every nerve.
How quick ſhe turns! their gaping jaws eludes,
And yet a moment lives; till, round enclos'd
By all the greedy pack, with infant ſcreams
She yields her breath, and there reluctant dies.
So when the furious Bacchanals aſſail'd
Threcian Orpheus, poor ill-fated bard!
Loud was the cry; hills, woods, and Hebrus' banks,
Return'd their clamorous rage; diſtreſs'd he flies,
Shifting from place to place, but flies in vain;
For eager they purſue, till panting, faint,
By noiſy multitudes o'erpower'd, he ſinks
To the relentleſs crowd a bleeding prey.

The huntſman now, a deep inciſion made,
Shakes out with hands impure, and daſhes down
Her reeking entrails and yet quivering heart.
Theſe claim the pack, the bloody perquiſite
For all their toils. Stretch'd on the ground ſhe lies
A mangled corſe; in her dim glaring eyes
Cold death exults, and ſtiffens every limb.
Aw'd by the threatening whip, the furious hounds
Around her bay; or at their maſter's foot,
Each happy favourite courts his kind applauſe,
With humble adulation cowering low.
All now is joy. With cheeks full-blown they wind
Her ſolemn dirge, while the loud-opening pack
The concert ſwell, and hills and dales return
The ſadly-pleaſing ſounds. Thus the poor hare,
A puny, daſtard animal, but vers'd
In ſubtle wiles, diverts the youthful train.
But if thy proud, aſpiring ſoul diſdains
So mean a prey, delighted with the pomp,
Magnificence, and grandeur of the chaſe;
Hear what the muſe from faithful records ſings.

Why on the banks of Gemna, Indian ſtream,
Line within line, riſe the pavilions proud,
Their ſilken ſtreamers waving in the wind?
Why neighs the warrior horſe? From tent to tent,
Why preſs in crowds the buzzing multitude?
Why ſhines the poliſh'd helm, and pointed lance,
This way and that far beaming o'er the plain?
Nor Viſapour nor Golconda rebel;
Nor the great Sopy, with his numerous hoſt,
Lays waſte the provinces; nor glory fires
To rob and to deſtroy, beneath the name
And ſpecious guiſe of war. A nobler cauſe
Calls Aurengzebe to arms. No cities ſack'd,
No mother's tears, no helpleſs orphan's cries,
No violated leagues, with ſharp remorſe
Shall ſting the conſcious victor: but mankind
Shall hail him good and juſt. For 'tis on beaſts
He draws his vengeful ſword! on beaſts of prey
Full-fed with human gore. See, ſee, he comes!
Imperial Dehli, opening wide her gates,
Pours out her thronging legions, bright in arms,
And all the pomp of war. Before them ſound
Clarions and trumpets, breathing martial airs,
And bold defiance. High upon his throne,
Borne on the back of his proud elephant,
Sits the great chief of Tamur's glorious race:
Sublime he ſits, amid the radiant blaze
Of gems and gold. Omrahs about him crowd,
And rein th' Arabian ſteed, and watch his nod:
And potent rajahs, who themſelves preſide
O'er realms of wide extent; but here ſubmiſs
Their homage pay, alternate kings and ſlaves.
Next theſe, with prying eunuchs girt around,
The fair ſultanas of his court: a troop
Of choſen beauties, but with care conceal'd
From each intruſive eye; one look is death.
A cruel eaſtern law! (had kings a power
But equal to their wild tyrannic will)
To rob us of the ſun's all-cheering ray,
Were leſs ſevere. The vulgar cloſe the march,
Slaves and artificers; and Dehli mourns
Her empty and depopulated ſtreets.
Now at the camp arriv'd with ſtern review,
Through groves of ſpears, from file to file he darts
His ſharp experienc'd eye; their order marks,
Each in his ſtation rang'd, exact and firm,
Till in the boundleſs line his ſight is loſt.
Not greater multitudes in arms appear'd
On theſe extended plains, when Ammon's ſon
With mighty Porus in dread battle join'd,
The vaſſal world the prize. Nor was that hoſt
More numerous of old, which the great king*
Pour'd out on Greece from all th' unpeopled Eaſt;
That bridg'd the Helleſpont from ſhore to ſhore,
And drank the rivers dry. Mean while in troops
The buſy hunter-train mark out the ground,
A wide circumference; full many a league
In compaſs round; woods, rivers, hills, and plains,
Large provinces; enough to gratify
Ambition's higheſt aim, could reaſon bound
Man's erring will. Now ſit in cloſe divan
The mighty chiefs of this prodigious hoſt.
He from the throne high-eminent preſides,
Gives out his mandates proud, laws of the chaſe,
From ancient records drawn. With reverence low,
And proſtrate at his feet, the chiefs receive
His irreverſible decrees, from which
To vary is to die. Then his brave bands
Each to his ſtation leads; encamping round,
Till the wide circle is completely form'd.
Where decent order reigns, what theſe command,
Thoſe execute with ſpeed, and punctual care;
In all the ſtricteſt diſcipline of war:
As if ſome watchful foe, with bold inſult,
Hung lowering o'er their camp. The high reſolve
That flies on wings through all th' encircling line,
Each motion ſteers, and animates the whole.
So by the ſun's attractive power controll'd,
The planets in their ſpheres roll round his orb:
On all he ſhines, and rules the great machine.

Ere yet the morn diſpels the fleeting miſts,
The ſignal given by the loud trumpet's voice,
Now high in air th' imperial ſtandard waves,
Emblazon'd rich with gold, and glittering gems;

* Xerxes.

And like a sheet of fire, through the dun gloom
Streaming meteorous. The soldiers shouts,
And all the brazen instruments of war,
With mutual clamour, and united din,
Fill the large concave. While from camp to camp
They catch the varied sounds, floating in air,
Round all the wide circumference, tigers fell
Shrink at the noise, deep in his gloomy den
The lion starts, and morsels yet unchew'd
Drop from his trembling jaws. Now all at once
Onward they march embattled, to the sound
Of martial harmony; fifes, cornets, drums,
That rouse the sleepy soul to arms, and bold
Heroic deeds. In parties here and there
Detach'd o'er hill and dale, the hunter's range
Inquisitive; strong dogs, that match in fight
The boldest brute, around their masters wait,
A faithful guard. No haunt unsearch'd, they drive
From every covert, and from every den,
The lurking savages. Incessant shouts
Re-echo through the woods, and kindling fires
Gleam from the mountain tops; the forest seems
One mingling blaze: like flocks of sheep they fly,
Before the flaming brand: fierce lions, pards,
Boars, tigers, bears, and wolves; a dreadful crew
Of grim blood-thirsty foes; growling along,
They stalk indignant; but fierce vengeance still
Hangs pealing on their rear, and pointed spears
Present immediate death. Soon as the night
Wrapt in her sable veil forbids the chase,
They pitch their tents, in even ranks, around
The circling camp. The guards are plac'd, and fires
At proper distances ascending rise,
And paint th' horizon with their ruddy light.
So round some island's shore of large extent,
Amid the gloomy horrors of the night,
The billows breaking on the pointed rocks,
Seem all one flame, and the bright circuit wide
Appears a bulwark of surrounding fire,
What dreadful howlings, and what hideous roar,
Disturb those peaceful shades! where erst the bird
That glads the night had chear'd the listening groves [gloom
With sweet complainings. Through the silent
Oft they the guards assail; as oft repell'd
They fly reluctant, with hot boiling rage
Stung to the quick, and mad with wild despair.
Thus day by day they still the chase renew,
At night encamp; till now in streighter bounds
The circle lessens, and the beasts perceive
The wall that hems them in on every side.
And now their fury bursts, and knows no mean;
From man they turn, and point their ill-judg'd rage
Against their fellow brutes. With teeth and claws
The civil war begins; grappling they tear.
Lions on tigers prey, and bears on wolves:
Horrible discord! till the crowd behind
Shouting pursue, and part the bloody fray.
At once their wrath subsides; tame as the lamb
The lion hangs his head, the furious pard,
Cow'd and subdued, flies from the face of man,
Nor bears one glance of his commanding eye.
So abject is a tyrant in distress!
At last, within the narrow plain confin'd,
A listed field, mark'd out for bloody deeds,
An amphitheatre more glorious far
Than ancient Rome could boast, they crowd in heaps,
Dismay'd, and quite appall'd. In meet array
Sheath'd in refulgent arms, a noble band
Advance; great lords of high imperial blood,
Early resolv'd t' assert their royal race,
And prove by glorious deeds their valour's growth
Mature, ere yet the callow down has spread
Its curling shade. On bold Arabian steeds
With decent pride they sit, that fearless hear
The lion's dreadful roar; and down the rock
Swift-shooting plunge, or o'er the mountain's ridge
Stretching along, the greedy tiger leave
Panting behind. On foot their faithful slaves
With javelins arm'd attend; each watchful eye
Fix'd on his youthful care, for him alone
He fears, and, to redeem his life, unmov'd
Would lose his own. The mighty Aurengzebe,
From his high elevated throne, beholds
His blooming race; revolving in his mind
What once he was, in his gay spring of life,
When vigour strung his nerves. Parental joy
Melts in his eye, and flushes in his cheek.
Now the loud trumpet sounds a charge. The shouts
Of eager hosts, through all the circling line,
And the wild howlings of the beasts within
Rend wide the welkin, flights of arrows, wing'd
With death, and javelins launch from every arm,
Gall fore the brutal bands, with many a wound
Gor'd through and through. Despair at last prevails,
When fainting nature shrinks, and rouses all
Their drooping courage. Swell'd with furious rage,
Their eyes dart fire; and on the youthful band
They rush implacable. They their broad shields
Quick interpose; on each devoted head
Their flaming falchions, as the bolts of Jove,
Descend unerring. Prostrate on the ground
The grinning monsters lie, and their foul gore
Defiles the verdant plain. Nor idle stand
The trusty slaves; with pointed spears they pierce
Through their tough hides; or at their gaping mouths
An easier passage find. The king of brutes
In broken roarings breathes his last; the bear
Grumbles in death; nor can his spotted skin,
Though sleek it shine, with varied beauties gay,
Save the proud pard from unrelenting fate.
The battle bleeds, grim slaughter strides along,
Glutting her greedy jaws, grins o'er her prey.
Men, horses, dogs, fierce beasts of every kind,
A strange promiscuous carnage, drench'd in blood,
And heaps on heaps amass'd. What yet remain
Alive, with vain assault contend to break
Th' impenetrable line. Others, whom fear
Inspires with self-preserving wiles, beneath
The bodies of the slain for shelter creep.
Aghast they fly, or hide their heads dispers'd.
And now perchance (had Heaven but pleas'd) the work

Of death had been complete; and Aurengzebe
By one dread frown extinguiſh'd half their race.
When lo! the bright ſultanas of his court
Appear, and to his raviſh'd eyes diſplay
Thoſe charms but rarely to the day reveal'd.
Lowly they bend, and humbly ſue, to ſave
The vanquiſh'd hoſt. What mortal can deny
When ſuppliant beauty begs? At his command,
Opening to right and left, the well-train'd troops
Leave a large void for their retreating foes.
Away they fly, on wings of fear upborn,
To ſeek on diſtant hills their late abodes.
Ye proud oppreſſors, whoſe vain hearts exult
In wantonneſs of power, 'gainſt the brute race,
Fierce robbers like yourſelves, a guiltleſs war
Wage uncontroul'd: here quench your thirſt of blood;
But learn from Aurengzebe to ſpare mankind.

BOOK III.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of King Edgar, and his impoſing a tribute of wolves heads upon the kings of Wales: from hence a tranſition to fox-hunting, which is deſcribed in all its parts. Cenſure of an over-numerous pack. Of the ſeveral engines to deſtroy foxes and other wild beaſts. The ſteel-trap deſcribed, and the manner of uſing it. Deſcription of the pit-fall for the lion; and another for the elephant. The ancient way of hunting the tiger with a mirror. The Arabian manner of hunting the wild boar. Deſcription of the royal chaſe at Windſor Foreſt. Concludes with an addreſs to his Majeſty, and an eulogy upon mercy.

In Albion's iſle, when glorious Edgar reign'd,
He, wiſely provident, from her white cliffs
Launch'd half her foreſts, and with numerous fleets
Cover'd his wide domain: there proudly rode
Lord of the deep, the great prerogative
Of Britiſh monarchs. Each invader bold,
Dane and Norwegian, at a diſtance gaz'd,
And, diſappointed, gnaſh'd his teeth in vain.
He ſcour'd the ſeas, and to remoteſt ſhores
With ſwelling ſails the trembling corſair fled,
Rich commerce flouriſh'd; and with buſy oars
Daſh'd the reſounding ſurge. Nor leſs at land
His royal cares; wiſe, potent, gracious prince!
His ſubjects from their cruel foes he ſav'd,
And from rapacious ſavages their flocks:
Cambria's proud kings (though with reluctance) paid
Their tributary wolves; head after head,
In full account, till the woods yield no more,
And all the ravenous race extinct is loſt.
In fertile paſtures, more ſecurely graz'd
The ſocial troops; and ſoon their large increaſe
With curling fleeces whiten'd all the plains.
But yet, alas! the wily fox remain'd,
A ſubtle, pilfering foe, prowling around
In midnight ſhades, and wakeful to deſtroy.
In the full fold, the poor defenceleſs lamb,
Seiz'd by his guileful arts, with ſweet warm blood
Supplies a rich repaſt. The mournful ewe,
Her deareſt treaſure loſt, through the dun night
Wanders perplex'd, and darkling bleats in vain:
While in th' adjacent buſh, poor Philomel,
(Herſelf a parent once, till wanton churls
Deſpoil'd her neſt) joins in her loud laments,
With ſweeter notes, and more melodious wo.
For theſe nocturnal thieves, huntſmen prepare
The ſharpeſt vengeance. Oh! how glorious 'tis
To right th' oppreſs'd, and bring the felon vile
To juſt diſgrace! Ere yet the morning peep,
Or ſtars retire from the firſt bluſh of day,
With thy far echoing voice alarm thy pack,
And rouſe thy bold compeers. Then to the copſe,
Thick with entangling graſs, or prickly furze,
With ſilence lead thy many-coloured hounds,
In all their beauty's pride. See! how they range
Diſpers'd, how buſily this way, and that,
They croſs, examining with curious noſe
Each likely haunt. Hark! on the drag I hear
Their doubtful notes, preluding to a cry
More nobly full, and ſwell'd with every mouth.
As ſtraggling armies, at the trumpet's voice,
Preſs to their ſtandard; hither all repair,
And hurry through the woods; with haſty ſtep
Ruſtling, and full of hope; now driven on heaps
They puſh, they ſtrive; while from his kennel ſneaks
The conſcious villain. See! he ſkulks along,
Sleek at the ſhepherd's coſt, and plump with meals
Purloin'd. So thrive the wicked here below.
Though high his bruſh he bear, though tipt with white
It gaily ſhine; yet ere the ſun declin'd
Recal the ſhades of night, the pamper'd rogue
Shall rue his fate revers'd; and at his heels
Behold the juſt avenger, ſwift to ſeize
His forfeit head, and thirſting for his blood.
Heavens! what melodious ſtrains! how beat our hearts
Big with tumultuous joy! the loaded gales
Breathe harmony; and as the tempeſt drives
From wood to wood, through every dark receſs
The foreſt thunders, and the mountains ſhake.
The chorus ſwells; leſs various, and leſs ſweet,
The trilling notes, when in thoſe very groves,
The feather'd choriſters ſalute the ſpring.
And every buſh in concert joins; or when
The maſter's hand, in modulated air,
Bids the loud organ breathe, and all the powers
Of muſic in one inſtrument combine,
An univerſal minſtrelſy. And now
In vain each earth he tries, the doors are barr'd
Impregnable, nor is the covert ſafe;
He pants for purer air. Hark! what loud ſhouts
Re-echo through the groves! he breaks away.
Shrill horns proclaim his flight. Each ſtraggling hound
Strains o'er the lawn to reach the diſtant pack.
'Tis triumph all and joy. Now, my brave youths,
Now give a looſe to the clean generous ſteed;
Flouriſh the whip, nor ſpare the galling ſpur;
But, in the madneſs of delight, forget
Your fears. Far o'er the rocky hills we range,
And dangerous our courſe; but in the brave

True courage never fails. In vain the ſtream
In foaming eddies whirls; in vain the ditch
Wide gaping threatens death. The craggy ſteep,
Where the poor dizzy ſhepherd crawls with care,
And clings to every twig, gives us no pain;
But down we ſweep, as ſtoops the falcon bold
To pounce his prey. Then up th' opponent hill,
By the ſwift motion ſtung, we mount aloft:
So ſhips in winter ſeas now gliding ſink
Adown the ſteepy wave, then toſs'd on high
Ride on the billows, and defy the ſtorm.
What lengths we paſs! where will the wandering chaſe
Lead us bewilder'd! ſmooth as ſwallows ſkim
The new-ſhorn mead, and far more ſwift, we fly.
See my brave pack; how to the head they preſs,
Joſtling in cloſe array, then more diffuſe
Obliquely wheel, while from their opening mouths
The vollied thunder breaks. So when the cranes
Their annual voyage ſteer, with wanton wing
Their figure oft they change, and their loud clang
From cloud to cloud rebounds. How far behind
The hunter crew, wide-ſtraggling o'er the plain!
The panting courſer now with trembling nerves
Begins to reel; urg'd by the goring ſpur,
Makes many a faint effort: he ſnorts, he foams,
The big round drops run trickling down his ſides,
With ſweat and blood diſtain'd. Look back and view
The ſtrange confuſion of the vale below,
Where ſour vexation reigns; ſee yon poor jade,
In vain th' impatient rider frets and ſwears;
With galling ſpurs harrows his mangled ſides;
He can no more: his ſtiff unpliant limbs
Rooted in earth, unmov'd and fix'd he ſtands,
For every cruel curſe returns a groan,
And ſobs, and faints, and dies. Who without grief
Can view that pamper'd ſteed, his maſter's joy,
His minion, and his daily care, well cloth'd,
Well fed with every nicer cate; no coſt,
No labour ſpar'd; who, when the flying chaſe
Broke from the copſe, without a rival led
The numerous train: now a ſad ſpectacle
Of pride brought low, and humble inſolence,
Drove like a pannier'd aſs, and ſcourg'd along,
While theſe, with looſen'd reins and dangling heels,
Hang on their reeling palfreys, that ſcarce bear
Their weights: another in the treacherous bog
Lies floundering half ingulf'd. What biting thoughts
Torments th' abandon'd crew! Old age laments
His vigour ſpent: the tall, plump, brawny youth
Curſes his cumberous bulk; and envies now
The ſhort pygmæan race, he whilom kenn'd
With proud inſulting leer. A choſen few
Alone the ſport enjoy, nor droop beneath
Their pleaſing toils. Here, huntſman, from this height
Obſerve yon birds of prey; if I can judge,
'Tis there the villain lurks: they hover round
And claim him as their own. Was I not right?
See! there he creeps along; his bruſh he drags,
And ſweeps the mire impure; from his wide jaws
His tongue unmoiſten'd hangs; ſymptoms too ſure
Of ſudden death. Ha! yet he flies, nor yields
To black deſpair. But one looſe more, and all
His wiles are vain. Hark! through yon village now
The rattling clamour rings. The barns, the cots,
And leafleſs elms return the joyous ſounds.
Through every homeſtall, and through every yard,
His midnight walks, panting, forlorn, he flies;
Through every hole he ſneaks, through every jakes
Plunging he wades beſmear'd, and fondly hopes
In a ſuperior ſtench to loſe his own:
But, faithful to the track, th' unerring hounds
With peals of echoing vengeance cloſe purſue.
And now diſtreſs'd, no ſheltering covert near,
Into the hen-rooſt creeps, whoſe walls with gore
Diſtain'd atteſt his guilt. There, villain, there
Expect thy fate deſerv'd. And ſoon from thence
The pack inquiſitive, with clamour loud,
Drag out their trembling prize; and on his blood
With greedy tranſport feaſt. In bolder notes
Each ſounding horn proclaims the felon dead:
And all th' aſſembled village ſhouts for joy.
The farmer, who beholds his mortal foe
Stretch'd at his feet, applauds the glorious deed,
And grateful calls us to a ſhort repaſt;
In the full glaſs the liquid amber ſmiles,
Our native product. And his good old mate
With choiceſt viands heaps the liberal board,
To crown our triumphs, and reward our toils.
Here muſt th' inſtructive muſe (but with reſpect)
Cenſure that numerous pack, that crowd of ſtate,
With which the vain profuſion of the great
Covers the lawn, and ſhakes the trembling copſe.
Pompous incumbrance! A magnificence
Uſeleſs, vexatious! For the wily fox,
Safe in th' increaſing number of his foes,
Kens well the great advantage: ſlinks behind,
And ſlyly creeps through the ſame beaten track,
And hunts them ſtep by ſtep: then views, eſcap'd,
With inward ecſtaſy, the panting throng
In their own footſteps puzzled, foil'd, and loſt.
So when proud eaſtern kings ſummon to arms
Their gaudy legions, from far diſtant climes
They flock in crowds, unpeopling half a world:
But when the day of battle calls them forth
To charge the well-train'd foe, a band compact
Of choſen veterans; they preſs blindly on,
In heaps confus'd, by their own weapons fall
A ſmoking carnage ſcatter'd o'er the plain.
Nor hounds alone this noxious brood deſtroy:
The plunder'd warrener full many a wile
Deviſes to entrap his greedy foe,
Fat with nocturnal ſpoils. At cloſe of day,
With ſilence drags his tail: then from the ground
Pares thin the cloſe-graz'd turf; there with nice hand
Covers the latent death, with curious ſprings
Prepar'd to fly at once, whene'er the tread
Of man or beaſt unwarily ſhall preſs
The yielding ſurface. By th' indented ſteel
With gripe tenacious held, the felon grins,
And ſtruggles, but in vain: yet oft 'tis known,
When every art has fail'd the captive fox
Has ſhar'd the wounded joint, and with a limb
Compounded for his life. But, if perchance

In the deep pitfall plung'd, there's no escape;
But unrepriev'd he dies, and bleach'd in air,
The jest of clowns, his reeking carcase hangs.
Of these are various kinds; not even the king
Of brutes evades this deep devouring grave:
But, by the wily African betray'd,
Heedless of fate, within its gaping jaws
Expires indignant. When the orient beam
With blushes paints the dawn; and all the race
Carnivorous, with blood full-gorg'd, retire
Into their darksome cells, there fatiate snore
O'er dripping offals, and the mangled limbs
Of men and beasts; the painful forester
Climbs the high hills, whose proud aspiring tops
With the tall cedar crown'd, and taper fir,
Assail the clouds. There 'mong the craggy rocks,
And thickets intricate, trembling he views
His footsteps in the sand; the dismal road
And avenue to death. Hither he calls
His wathful bands; and low into the ground
A pit they sink, full many a fathom deep.
Then in the midst a column high is rear'd,
The butt of some fair tree; upon whose top
A lamb is plac'd, just ravish'd from his dam.
And next a wall they build, with stones and earth
Encircling round, and hiding from all view
The dreadful precipice. Now when the shades
Of night hang lowering o'er the mountain's brow;
And hunger keen, and pungent thirst of blood,
Rouse up the slothful beast, he shakes his sides,
Slow-rising from his lair, and stretches wide
His ravenous paws, with recent gore distain'd.
The forests tremble, as he roars aloud,
Impatient to destroy. O'erjoy'd he hears
The bleating innocent, that claims in vain
The shepherd's care, and seeks with piteous moan
The foodful teat; himself, alas! design'd
Another's meal. For now the greedy brute
Winds him from far; and leaping o'er the mound
To seize his trembling prey, headlong is plung'd
Into the deep abyss. Prostrate he lies
Astunn'd and impotent. Ah! what avail
Thine eye-balls flashing fire, thy length of tail,
That lashes thy broad sides, thy jaws besmear'd
With blood and offals crude, thy shaggy mane
The terror of the woods, thy stately port,
And bulk enormous, since by stratagem
Thy strength is foil'd? Unequal is the strife,
When sovereign reason combats brutal rage.
On distant Ethiopia's sun-burnt coast,
The black inhabitants a pitfall frame,
But of a different kind, and different use!
With slender poles the wide capacious mouth,
And hurdles slight, they close; o'er these is spread
A floor of verdant turf, with all its flowers
Smiling delusive, and from strictest search
Concealing the deep grave that yawns below.
Then boughs of trees they cut, with tempting fruit
Of various kinds forcharg'd; the downy peach,
The clustering vine, and of bright golden rind,
The fragrant orange. Soon as evening gray
Advances slow, besprinkling all around
With kind refreshing dews the thirsty glebe,
The stately elephant from the close shade
With step majestic strides, eager to taste
The cooler breeze, that from the sea-beat shore
Delightful breathes, or in the limpid stream
To lave his panting sides; joyous he scents
The rich repast, unweeting of the death
That lurks within. And soon he sporting breaks
The brittle boughs, and greedily devours
The fruit delicious. Ah! too dearly bought;
The price is life. For now the treacherous turf
Trembling gives way; and the unwieldy beast,
Self-sinking, drops into the dark profound.
So when dilated vapours, struggling, heave
Th' incumbent earth; if chance the cavern'd ground
Shrinking subside, and the thin surface yield,
Down sinks at once the ponderous dome, ingulf'd
With all its towers. Subtle, delusive man!
How various are thy wiles! artful to kill
Thy savage foes, a dull unthinking race!
Fierce from his lair, springs forth the speckled pard,
Thirsting for blood, and eager to destroy;
The huntsman flies, but to his flight alone
Confides not: at convenient distance fix'd,
A polish'd mirror stops in full career
The furious brute: he there his image views;
Spots against spots with rage improving glow;
Another pard his bristly whiskers curls,
Grins as he grins, fierce menacing, and wide
Distends his opening paws; himself against
Himself oppos'd, and with dread vengeance arm'd.
The huntsman, now secure, with fatal aim
Directs the pointed spear, by which transfix'd
He dies, and with him dies the rival shade.
Thus man innumerous engines forms, t' assail
The savage kind; but most the docile horse,
Swift and confederate with man, annoys
His brethren of the plains; without whose aid
The hunter's arts are vain, unskill'd to wage
With the more active brutes an equal war.
But borne by him, without the well-train'd pack,
Man dares his foe, on wings of wind secure.
Him the fierce Arab mounts, and, with his troop
Of bold compeers, ranges the deserts wild.
Where, by the maguet's aid, the traveller
Steers his untrodden course; yet oft on land
Is wreck'd, in the high-rolling waves of sand
Immerst and lost. While these intrepid bands,
Safe in their horses speed, out-fly the storm, [prey.
And scouring round, make men and beasts their
The grisly boar is singled from his herd,
As large as that in Erimanthian woods,
A match for Hercules. Round him they fly
In circles wide; and each in passing sends
His feather'd death into his brawny sides.
But perilous th' attempt. For if the steed
Haply too near approach; or the loose earth
His footing fail, the watchful angry beast
Th' advantage spies; and at one sidelong glance
Rips up his groin. Wounded, he rears aloft,
And, plunging from his back the rider hurls
Precipitant; then bleeding spurns the ground,
And drags his reeking entrails o'er the plain.
Mean while the surly monster trots along,
But with unequal speed; for still they wound,
Swift-wheeling in the spacious ring. A wood

Of darts upon his back he bears; adown
His tortur'd ſides, the crimſon torrents roll
From many a gaping font. And now at laſt
Staggering he falls, in blood and foam expires.
But whither roves my devious muſe, intent
On antique tales? While yet the royal ſtag
Unſung remains. Tread with reſpectful awe
Windſor's green glades; where Denham, tuneful bard,
Charm'd once the liſtening Dryads, with his ſong
Sublimely ſweet. O! grant me, ſacred ſhade,
To glean ſubmiſs what thy full ſickle leaves.
The morning ſun, that gilds with trembling rays
Windſor's high towers, beholds the courtly train
Mount for the chaſe, nor views in all his courſe
A ſcene ſo gay: heroic, noble youths,
In arts and arms renown'd, and lovely nymphs
The faireſt of this iſle, where beauty dwells
Delighted, and deſerts her Paphian grove
For our more favour'd ſhades: in proud parade
Theſe ſhine magnificent, and preſs around
The royal happy pair. Great in themſelves,
They ſmile ſuperior; of external ſhow
Regardleſs, while their inbred virtues give
A luſtre to their power, and grace their court
With real ſplendors, far above the pomp
Of eaſtern kings, in all their tinſel pride.
Like troops of Amazons, the female band
Prance round their cars, not in refulgent arms
As thoſe of old; unſkill'd to wield the ſword,
Or bend the bow, theſe kill with ſurer aim.
The royal offspring, faireſt of the fair,
Lead on the ſplendid train. Anna more bright
Than ſummer ſuns, or as the lightning keen,
With irreſiſtible effulgence arm'd,
Fires every heart. He muſt be more than man,
Who unconcern'd can bear the piercing ray.
Amelia, milder than the bluſhing dawn,
With ſweet engaging air, but equal power,
Inſenſibly ſubdues, and in ſoft chains
Her willing captives leads. Illuſtrious maids,
Ever triumphant! whoſe victorious charms,
Without the needleſs aid of high deſcent,
Had aw'd mankind, and taught the world's great lords
To bow and ſue for grace. But who is he
Freſh as a roſe-bud newly blown, and fair
As opening lilies; on whom every eye
With joy and admiration dwells? See, ſee,
He reins his docile barb with manly grace.
Is it Adonis for the chaſe array'd?
Or Britain's ſecond hope? Hail, blooming youth!
May all your virtues with your years improve,
Till in conſummate worth, you ſhine the pride
Of theſe our days, and to ſucceeding times
A bright example. As his guard of mutes
On the great ſultan wait, with eyes dejected,
And fix'd on earth, no voice, no ſound is heard
Within the wide ſerail, but all is huſh'd,
And awful ſilence reigns; thus ſtand the pack
Mute and unmov'd, and cowering low to earth,
While paſs the glittering court, and royal pair:
So diſciplin'd thoſe hounds, and ſo reſerv'd,
Whoſe honour 'tis to glad the hearts of kings.
But ſoon the winding horn, and huntſman's voice,
Let looſe the general chorus; far around
Joy ſpreads its wings, and the gay morning ſmiles.
Unharbour'd now the royal ſtag forſakes
His wonted lair; he ſhakes his dappled ſides,
And toſſes high his beamy head, the copſe
Beneath his antlers bends. What doubling ſhifts
He tries! not more the wily hare; in theſe
Would ſtill perſiſt, did not the full mouth'd pack
With dreadful concert thunder in his rear.
The woods reply, the hunter's cheering ſhouts
Float through the glades, and the wide foreſt rings.
How merrily they chant! their noſtrils deep
Inhale the grateful ſteam. Such is the cry,
And ſuch th' harmonious din, the ſoldier deems
The battle kindling, and the ſtateſman grave
Forgets his weighty cares; each age, each ſex,
In the wild tranſport joins; luxuriant joy,
And pleaſure in exceſs, ſparkling exult
On every brow, and revel unreſtrain'd.
How happy art thou, man, when thou'rt no more
Thyſelf! when all the pangs that grind thy ſoul,
In rapture and in ſweet oblivion loſt,
Yield a ſhort interval and eaſe from pain!
See the ſwift courſer ſtrains, his ſhining hoofs
Securely beat the ſolid ground. Who now
The dangerous pitfall fears, with tangling heath
High-overgrown? or who the quivering bog
Soft yielding to the ſtep? All now is plain,
Plain as the ſtrand ſea-lav'd, that ſtretches far
Beneath the rocky ſhore. Glades croſſing glades
The foreſt opens to our wondering view:
Such was the king's command. Let tyrants fierce
Lay waſte the world; his the moſt glorious part
To check their pride; and when the brazen voice
Of war is huſh'd (as erſt victorious Rome)
T' employ his ſtation'd legions in the works
Of peace; to ſmooth the rugged wilderneſs,
To drain the ſtagnate fen, to raiſe the ſlope
Depending road, and to make gay the face
Of nature, with th' embelliſhments of art.
How melts my beating heart! as I behold
Each lovely nymph, our iſland's boaſt and pride,
Puſh on the generous ſteed, that ſtrokes along
O'er rough, o'er ſmooth, nor heeds the ſteepy hill,
Nor faulters in th' extended vale below:
Their garments looſely waving in the wind,
And all the fluſh of beauty in their cheeks!
While at their ſides their penſive lovers wait,
Direct their dubious courſe; now chill'd with fear
Solicitous, and now with love inflam'd.
O! grant, indulgent Heaven, no riſing ſtorm
May darken with black wings this glorious ſcene!
Should ſome malignant power thus damp our joys,
Vain were the gloomy cave, ſuch as of old
Betray'd to lawleſs love the Tyrian queen.
For Britain's virtuous nymphs are chaſte as fair,
Spotleſs, unblam'd, with equal triumph reign
In the dun gloom, as in the blaze of day.
Now the blown ſtag, through woods, bogs, roads, and ſtreams
Has meaſur'd half the foreſt; but alas!
He flies in vain, he flies not from his fears.
Though far he caſt the lingering pack behind,
His haggar'd fancy ſtill with horror views
The fell deſtroyer; ſtill the fatal cry

Inſults his ears, and wounds his trembling heart.
So the poor fury-haunted wretch (his hands
In guiltleſs blood diſtain'd) ſtill ſeems to hear
The dying ſhrieks: and the pale threatening ghoſt
Moves as he moves, and as he flies, purſues.
See here his ſlot; up yon green hill he climbs,
Pants on its brow a while, ſadly looks back
On his purſuers, covering all the plain;
But wrung with anguiſh, bears not long the ſight,
Shoots down the ſteep, and ſweats along the vale,
There mingles with the herd, where once he reign'd
Proud monarch of the groves, whoſe claſhing beam
His rivals aw'd, and whoſe exalted power
Was ſtill rewarded with ſucceſsful love.
But the baſe herd have learn'd the ways of men,
Averſe they fly, or with rebellious aim
Chaſe him from thence: needleſs their impious deed,
The huntſman knows him by a thouſand marks,
Black, and imboſt; nor are his hounds deceiv'd;
Too well diſtinguiſh theſe, and never leave
Their once devoted foe; familiar grows
His ſcent, and ſtrong their appetite to kill.
Again he flies, and with redoubled ſpeed
Skims o'er the lawn, ſtill the tenacious crew
Hang on the track, aloud demand their prey,
And puſh him many a league. If haply then
Too far eſcap'd, and the gay courtly train
Behind are caſt, the huntſman's clanging whip
Stops full their bold career; paſſive they ſtand,
Unmov'd, an humble, an obſequious crowd,
As if by ſtern Meduſa gaz'd to ſtones.
So at their general's voice whole armies halt
In full purſuit, and check their thirſt of blood,
Soon at the king's command, like haſty ſtreams
Damm'd up a while, they foam, and pour along
With freſh recruited might. The ſtag, who hop'd
His foes were loſt, now once more hears aſtunn'd,
The dreadful din; he ſhivers every limb,
He ſtarts, he bounds; each buſh preſents a foe.
Preſs'd by the freſh relay, no pauſe allow'd,
Breathleſs, and faint, he faulters in his pace,
And lifts his weary limbs with pain, that ſcarce
Suſtain their load: he pants, he ſobs appall'd;
Drops down his heavy head to earth, beneath
His cumbrous beams oppreſs'd. But if perchance
Some prying eye ſurpriſe him; ſoon he rears
Erect his towering front, bounds o'er the lawn
With ill-diſſembled vigour, to amuſe
The knowing foreſter; who inly ſmiles
At his weak ſhifts and unavailing frauds.
So midnight tapers waſte their laſt remains,
Shine forth a while, and as they blaze expire.
From wood to wood redoubling thunders roll,
And bellow through the vales; the moving ſtorm
Thickens amain, and loud triumphant ſhouts,
And horns ſhrill-warbling in each glade, prelude
To his approaching fate. And now in view
With hobbling gait, and high, exerts amaz'd
What ſtrength is left: to the laſt dregs of life
Reduc'd, his ſpirits fail, on every ſide
Hemm'd in, beſieg'd; not the leaſt opening left
To gleaming hope, th' unhappy's laſt reſerve.
Where ſhall he turn? or whither fly? Deſpair
Gives courage to the weak. Reſolv'd to die,
He fears no more, but ruſhes on his foes,
And deals his deaths around; beneath his feet
Theſe groveling lie, thoſe by his antlers gor'd
Defile th' enſanguin'd plain. Ah! ſee diſtreſs'd
He ſtands at bay againſt yon knotty trunk,
That covers well his rear, his front preſents
An hoſt of foes. O! ſhun, ye noble train,
The rude encounter, and believe your lives
Your country's due alone. As now aloof
The wing around, he finds his ſoul uprais'd,
To dare ſome great exploit, he charges home
Upon the broken pack, that on each ſide
Fly diverſe; then as o'er the turf he ſtrains,
He vents the cooling ſtream, and up the breeze
Urges his courſe with equal violence:
Then takes the ſoil, and plunges in the flood
Precipitant; down the mid ſtream he wafts
Along, till (like a ſhip diſtreſs'd, that runs
Into ſome winding creek) cloſe to the verge
Of a ſmall iſland, for his weary feet
Sure anchorage he finds, there ſkulks immers'd:
His noſe alone above the wave draws in
The vital air; all elſe beneath the flood
Conceal'd, and loſt, deceives each prying eye
Of man or brute. In vain the crowding pack
Draw on the margin of the ſtream, or cut
The liquid wave with oary feet, that move
In equal time. The gliding waters leave
No trace behind, and his contracted pores
But ſparingly perſpire: the huntſman ſtrains
His labouring lungs, and puffs his cheeks in vain:
At length a blood-hound bold, ſtudious to kill,
And exquiſite of ſenſe, winds him from far;
Headlong he leaps into the flood, his mouth
Loud opening ſpends amain, and his wide throat
Swells every note with joy; then fearleſs dives
Beneath the wave, hangs on his haunch, and wounds
Th' unhappy brute, that flounders in the ſtream,
Sorely diſtreſs'd, and ſtruggling ſtrives to mount
The ſteepy ſhore. Haply once more eſcap'd,
Again he ſtands at bay, amid the groves
Of willows, bending low their downy heads.
Outrageous tranſport fires the greedy pack;
Theſe ſwim the deep, and thoſe crawl up with pain
The ſlippery bank, while others on firm land
Engage; the ſtag repels each bold aſſault,
Maintains his poſt, and wounds for wounds returns.
As when ſome wily corſair boards a ſhip
Full-freighted, or from Afric's golden coaſts,
Or India's wealthy ſtrand, his bloody crew
Upon her deck he flings; theſe in the deep
Drop ſhort, and ſwim to reach her ſteepy ſides,
And clinging climb aloft; while thoſe on board
Urge on the work of fate; the maſter bold,
Preſs'd to his laſt retreat, bravely reſolves
To ſink his wealth beneath the whelming wave,
His wealth, his foes, nor unreveng'd to die.
So fares it with the ſtag: ſo he reſolves
To plunge at once into the flood below,
Himſelf, his foes, in one deep gulf immers'd.
Ere yet he executes this dire intent,
In wild diſorder once more views the light;

Beneath a weight of woe he groans diſtreſs'd,
The tears run trickling down his hairy cheeks;
He weeps, nor weeps in vain. The king beholds
His wretched plight, and tenderneſs innate
Moves his great ſoul. Soon at his high command
Rebuk'd, the diſappointed, hungry pack,
Retire ſubmiſs, and grumbling quit their prey.
Great prince! from thee what may thy ſubjects hope;
So kind, and ſo beneficent to brutes?
O mercy, heavenly born! ſweet attribute!
Thou great, thou beſt prerogative of power!
Juſtice may guard the throne, but, join'd with thee,
On rocks of adamant it ſtands ſecure,
And braves the ſtorm beneath; ſoon as thy ſmiles
Gild the rough deep, the foaming waves ſubſide,
And all the noiſy tumult ſinks in peace.

BOOK IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Of the neceſſity of deſtroying ſome beaſts, and preſerving others for the uſe of man. Of breeding of hounds; the ſeaſon for this buſineſs. The choice of the dog, of great moment. Of the litter of whelps. Of the number to be reared. Of ſetting them out to their ſeveral walks. Care to be taken to prevent their hunting too ſoon. Of entering the whelps. Of breaking them from running at ſheep. Of the diſeaſes of hounds. Of their age. Of madneſs; two ſorts of it deſcribed, the dumb and outrageous madneſs: its dreadful effects. Burning of the wound recommended as preventing all ill conſequences. The infectious hounds to be ſeparated, and fed apart. The vanity of truſting to the many infallible cures for this malady. The diſmal effects of the biting of a mad dog, upon man, deſcribed. Deſcription of the otter hunting. The concluſion.

WHATE'ER of earth is form'd, to earth returns
Diſſolv'd: the various objects we behold,
Plants, animals, this whole material maſs,
Are ever changing, ever new. The ſoul
Of man alone, that particle divine,
Eſcapes the wreck of worlds, when all things fail.
Hence great the diſtance 'twixt the beaſts that periſh,
And God's bright image, man's immortal race.
The brute creation are his property,
Subſervient to his will, and for him made.
As hurtful theſe he kills, as uſeful thoſe
Preſerves; their ſole and arbitrary king.
Should he not kill, as erſt the Samian ſage
Taught unadvis'd, and Indian brachmans now
As vainly preach; the teeming ravenous brutes
Might fill the ſcanty ſpace of this terrene,
Incumbering all the globe: ſhould not his care
Improve his growing ſtock, their kinds might fail,
Man might once more on roots and acorns feed,
And through the deſerts range, ſhivering, forlorn,
Quite deſtitute of every ſolace dear,
And every ſmiling gaiety of life.
The prudent huntſman therefore will ſupply
With annual large recruits, his broken pack,
And propagate their kind. As from the root
Freſh ſcions ſtill ſpring forth and daily yield
New blooming honours to the parent tree.
Far ſhall his pack be fam'd, far ſought his breed,
And princes at their tables feaſt thoſe hounds
His hand preſents, an acceptable boon. [urg'd
Ere yet the ſun through the bright Ram has
His ſteepy courſe, or mother earth unbound
Her frozen boſom to the weſtern gale;
When feather'd troops, their ſocial leagues diſſolv'd,
Select their mates, and on the leafleſs elm.
The noiſy rook builds high her wicker neſt,
Mark well the wanton females of thy pack,
That curl their taper tails, and friſking court
Their pyebald mates enamour'd; their red eyes
Flaſh fires impure; nor reſt, nor food they take,
Goaded by furious love. In ſeparate cells
Confine them now, leſt bloody civil wars
Annoy the peaceful ſtate. If left at large,
The growling rivals in dread battle join.
And rude encounter; on Scamander's ſtreams
Heroes of old with far leſs fury fought,
For the bright Spartan dame, their valour's prize.
Mangled and torn thy favourite hounds ſhall lie,
Stretch'd on the ground; thy kennel ſhall appear
A field of blood: like ſome unhappy town
In civil broils confus'd, while diſcord ſhakes
Her bloody ſcourge aloft, fierce parties rage,
Staining their impious hands in mutual death.
And ſtill the beſt belov'd, and braveſt fall:
Such are the dire effects of lawleſs love.
Huntſman! theſe ills by timely prudent care
Prevent: for every longing dame ſelect
Some happy paramour; to him alone
In leagues connubial join. Conſider well
His lineage; what his fathers did of old,
Chiefs of the pack, and firſt to climb the rock,
Or plunge into the deep, or tread the brake
With thorn ſharp-pointed, plaſh'd, and briars inwoven.
Obſerve with care his ſhape, ſort, colour, ſize.
Nor will ſagacious huntſmen leſs regard
His inward habits: the vain babbler ſhun,
Ever loquacious, ever in the wrong.
His fooliſh offſpring ſhall offend thy ears
With falſe alarms, and loud impertinence.
Nor leſs the ſhifting cur avoid, that breaks
Illuſive from the pack; to the next hedge
Devious he ſtrays, there every muſe he tries:
If haply then he croſs the ſteaming ſcent,
Away he flies vain-glorious; and exults
As of the pack ſupreme, and in his ſpeed
And ſtrength unrival'd. Lo! caſt far behind
His vex'd aſſociates pant, and labouring ſtrain
To climb the ſteep aſcent. Soon as they reach
Th' inſulting boaſter, his falſe courage fails,
Behind he lags, doom'd to the fatal nooſe,
His maſter's hate, and ſcorn of all the field.
What can from ſuch be hop'd, but a baſe brood
Of coward curs, a frantic, vagrant race?

When now the third revolving moon appears,
With sharpen'd horns, above th' horizon's brink;
Without Lucina's aid, expect thy hopes
Are amply crown'd; short pangs produce to light
The smoking litter, crawling helpless, blind,
Nature their guide, they seek the pouting teat
That plenteous streams. Soon as the tender dam
Has form'd them with her tongue, with pleasure view
The marks of their renown'd progenitors,
Sure pledge of triumphs yet to come. All these Select with joy; but to the mercileſs flood
Expoſe the dwindling refuſe, nor o'erload
Th' indulgent mother. If thy heart relent,
Unwilling to deſtroy, a nurſe provide,
And to the foſter-parent give the care
Of thy ſuperfluous brood; ſhe'll cheriſh kind
The alien offſpring; pleas'd thou ſhalt behold
Her tenderneſs, and hoſpitable love.

If frolic now and playful they deſert
Their gloomy cell, and on the verdant turf
With nerves improv'd, purſue the mimic chaſe,
Courſing around; unto the choiceſt friends
Commit thy valued prize: the ruſtic dames
Shall at thy kennel wait, and in their laps
Receive thy growing hopes, with many a kiſs
Careſs, and dignify their little charge
With ſome great title, and reſounding name
Of high import. But cautious here obſerve
To check their youthful ardour, nor permit
The unexperienc'd younker, immature,
Along to range the woods, or haunt the brakes
Where dodging conies ſport; his nerves unſtrung,
And ſtrength unequal; the laborious chaſe
Shall ſtint his growth, and his raſh forward youth
Contract ſuch vicious habits, as thy care
And late correction never ſhall reclaim.

When to full ſtrength arriv'd, mature and bold,
Conduct them to the field; not all at once,
But as thy cooler prudence ſhall direct,
Select a few, and form them by degrees
To ſtricter diſcipline. With theſe conſort
The ſtaunch and ſteady ſages of thy pack,
By long experience vers'd in all the wiles,
And ſubtle doublings of the various chaſe.
Eaſy the leſſon of the youthful train,
When inſtinct prompts, and when example guides.
If the too forward younker at the head
Preſs boldly on in wanton ſportive mood,
Correct his haſte, and let him feel abaſh'd
The ruling whip. But if he ſtoop behind
In wary modeſt guiſe, to his own noſe
Confiding ſure; give him full ſcope to work
His winding way, and with thy voice applaud
His patience, and his care; ſoon ſhalt thou view
The hopeful pupil leader of his tribe,
And all the liſtening pack attend his call.

Oft lead them forth where wanton lambkins play,
And bleating dams with jealous eyes obſerve
Their tender care. If at the crowding flock
He hay preſumptuous, or with eager haſte
Purſue them ſcatter'd o'er the verdant plain;
In the foul fact attach'd, to the ſtrong ram
Tie faſt the raſh offender. See! at firſt
His horn'd companion, fearful and amaz'd,
Shall drag him trembling o'er the rugged ground;
Then, with his load fatigu'd, ſhall turn a-head,
And with his curl'd hard front inceſſant peal
The panting wretch; till, breathleſs and aſtunn'd,
Stretch'd on the turf he lie. Then ſpare not thou
The twining whip, but ply his bleeding ſides
Laſh after laſh, and with thy threatening voice,
Harſh echoing from the hills, inculcate loud
His vile offence. Sooner ſhall trembling doves
Eſcap'd the hawk's ſharp talons, in mid air,
Aſſail their dangerous foe, than he once more
Diſturb the peaceful flocks. In tender age
Thus youth is train'd; as curious artiſts bend
The taper pliant twig, or potters form
Their ſoft and ductile clay to various ſhapes.

Nor is't enough to breed; but to preſerve,
Muſt be the huntſman's care. The ſtaunch old hounds,
Guides of thy pack, though but in number few,
Are yet of great account; ſhall oft untie
The Gordian knot, when reaſon at a ſtand
Puzzling is loſt, and all thy art is vain.
O'er clogging fallows, o'er dry plaſter'd roads,
O'er floated meads, o'er plains with flocks diſtain'd
Rank-ſcenting, theſe muſt lead the dubious way.
As party-chiefs in ſenates who preſide,
With pleaded reaſon and with well-turn'd ſpeech,
Conduct the ſtaring multitude; ſo theſe
Direct the pack, who with joint cry approve,
And loudly boaſt diſcoveries not their own.

Unnumber'd accidents, and various ills,
Attend thy pack, hang hovering o'er their heads,
And point the way that leads to death's dark cave.
Short is their ſpan; few at the date arrive
Of ancient Argus in old Homer's ſong
So highly honour'd: kind, ſagacious brute!
Not ev'n Minerva's wiſdom could conceal
Thy much-lov'd maſter from thy nicer ſenſe.
Dying his lord he own'd, view'd him all o'er
With eager eyes, then cloſ'd thoſe eyes, well pleas'd,

Of leſſer ills the muſe declines to ſing,
Nor ſtoops ſo low; of theſe each groom can tell
The proper remedy. But O! what care,
What prudence, can prevent madneſs, the worſt
Of maladies? Terrific peſt! that blaſts
The huntſman's hopes, and deſolation ſpreads
Through all th' unpeopled kennel unreſtrain'd,
More fatal than th' envenom'd viper's bite;
Or that Apulian ſpider's poiſonous ſting,
Heal'd by the pleaſing antidote of ſounds.

When Sirius reigns, and the ſun's parching beams
Bake the dry gaping ſurface, viſit thou
Each ev'n and morn, with quick obſervant eye,
Thy panting pack. If, in dark ſullen mood,
The glouting hound refuſe his wonted meal,
Retiring to ſome cloſe, obſcure retreat,
Gloomy, diſconſolate: with ſpeed remove
The poor infectious wretch, and in ſtrong chains
Bind him ſuſpected. Thus that dire diſeaſe
Which art can't cure, wiſe caution may prevent.

But, this neglected, ſoon expect a change,
A diſmal change, confuſion, frenzy, death.

Or in ſome dark receſs the ſenſeleſs brute
Sits ſadly pining: deep melancholy,
And black deſpair, upon his clouded brow
Hang lowering; from his half-opening jaws
The clammy venom, and infectious froth,
Diſtilling fall; and from his lungs inflam'd,
Malignant vapours taint the ambient air,
Breathing perdition: his dim eyes are glaz'd,
He droops his penſive head, his trembling limbs
No more ſupport his weight; abject he lies,
Dumb, ſpiritleſs, benumb'd; till death at laſt
Gracious attends, and kindly brings relief.

Or, if outrageous grown, behold, alas!
A yet more dreadful ſcene; his glaring eyes
Redden with fury, like ſome angry boar
Churning he foams; and on his back erect
His pointed briſtles riſe; his tail incurv'd
He drops, and with harſh broken howlings rends
The poiſon-tainted air, with rough hoarſe voice
Inceſſant bays; and ſnuffs th' infectious breeze;
This way and that he ſtares aghaſt, and ſtarts
At his own ſhade: jealous, as if he deem'd
The world his foes. If haply towards the ſtream
He caſt his roving eye, cold horror chills
His ſoul; averſe he flies, trembling, appall'd.
Now frantic to the kennel's utmoſt verge
Raving he runs, and deals deſtruction round.
The pack fly diverſe; for whate'er he meets
Vengeful he bites, and every bite is death.

If now perchance through the weak fence eſcap'd,
Far up the wind he roves, with open mouth
Inhales the cooling breeze; nor man, nor beaſt,
He ſpares implacable. The hunter-horſe,
Once kind aſſociate of his ſylvan toils,
(Who haply now without the kennel's mound
Crops the rank mead, and liſtening hears with joy
The cheering cry, that morn and eve ſalutes
His raptur'd ſenſe) a wretched victim falls.
Unhappy quadruped! no more, alas!
Shall thy fond maſter with his voice applaud
Thy gentleneſs, thy ſpeed; or with his hand
Stroke thy ſoft dappled ſides, as he each day
Viſits thy ſtall, well pleas'd; no more ſhalt thou
With ſprightly neighings, to the winding horn,
And the loud opening pack in concert join'd,
Glad his proud heart. For oh! the ſecret wound
Rankling inflames, he bites the ground, and dies!
Hence to the village with pernicious haſte
Baleful he bends his courſe: the village flies
Alarm'd; the tender mother in her arms
Hugs cloſe the trembling babe; the doors are barr'd,
And flying curs by native inſtinct taught
Shun the contagious bane; the ruſtic bands
Hurry to arms, the rude militia ſeize
Whate'er at hand they find; clubs, forks, or guns,
From every quarter charge the furious foe,
In wild diſorder, and uncouth array: [gor'd,
Till, now with wounds on wounds oppreſs'd and
At one ſhort poiſonous gaſp he breaths his laſt.

Hence to the kennel, muſe, return, and view
With heavy heart that hoſpital of woe;
Where horror ſtalks at large! inſatiate death
Sits growling o'er his prey: each hour preſents
A different ſcene of ruin and diſtreſs.
How buſy art thou, fate! and how ſevere
Thy pointed wrath! the dying and the dead
Promiſcuous lie; o'er theſe the living fight
In one eternal broil; not conſcious why,
Nor yet with whom. So drunkards, in their cups,
Spare not their friends, while ſenſeleſs ſquabble reigns.

Huntſman! it much behoves thee to avoid
The perilous debate! Ah! rouſe up all
Thy vigilance, and tread the treacherous ground
With careful ſtep. Thy fires unquench'd preſerve,
As erſt the veſtal flames; the pointed ſteel
In the hot embers hide; and if ſurpris'd
Thou feel'ſt the deadly bite, quick urge it home
Into the recent ſore, and cauterize [vent:
The wound; ſpare not thy fleſh, nor dread th' e-
Vulcan ſhall ſave when Æſculapius fails.

Here ſhould the knowing muſe recount the means
To ſtop this growing plague. And here, alas!
Each hand preſents a ſovereign cure, and boaſts
Infallibility, but boaſts in vain.
On this depend, each to his ſeparate ſeat
Confine, in fetters bound; give each his meſs
Apart, his range in open air; and then
If deadly ſymptoms to thy grief appear,
Devote the wretch, and let him greatly fall,
A generous victim for the public weal.

Sing, philoſophic muſe, the dire effects
Of this contagious bite on hapleſs man.
The ruſtic ſwains, by long tradition taught
Of leaches old, as ſoon as they perceive
The bite impreſs'd, to the ſea-coaſts repair.
Plung'd in the briny flood, th' unhappy youth
Now journeys home ſecure; but ſoon ſhall wiſh
The ſeas as yet had cover'd him beneath
The foaming ſurge, full many a fathom a deep.
A fate more diſmal, and ſuperior ills
Hang o'er his head devoted. When the moon,
Cloſing her monthly round, returns again
To glad the night; or when full-orb'd ſhe ſhines
High in the vault of heaven; the lurking peſt
Begins the dire aſſault. The poiſonous foam
Through the deep wound inſtill'd with hoſtile rage,
And all its fiery particles ſaline,
Invades th' arterial fluid: whoſe red waves
Tempeſtuous heave, and, their coheſion broke,
Fermenting boil; inteſtine war enſues,
And order to confuſion turns embroil'd.
Now the diſtended veſſels ſcarce contain
The wild uproar, but preſs each weaker part
Unable to reſiſt: the tender brain
And ſtomach ſuffer moſt; convulſions ſhake
His trembling nerves, and wandering pungent pains
Pinch forc the ſleepleſs wretch; his fluttering pulſe
Oft intermits; penſive, and ſad, he mourns
His cruel fate, and to his weeping friends
Laments in vain; to haſty anger prone,
Reſents each ſlight offence, walks with quick ſtep,
And wildly ſtares; at laſt with boundleſs ſway
The tyrant frenzy reigns: for as the dog
(Whoſe fatal bite convey'd th' infectious bane)
Raving he foams, and howls, and barks, and bites,
Like agitations in his boiling blood

Preſent like ſpecies to his troubled mind;
His nature and his actions all canine.
So (as old Homer ſung) th' aſſociates wild
Of wandering Ithacus, by Circe's charms
To ſwine transform'd, ran gruntling through the groves,
Dreadful example to a wicked world!
See there diſtreſs'd he lies, parch'd up with thirſt,
But dares not drink. Till now at laſt his ſoul
Trembling eſcapes, her noiſome dungeon leaves,
And to ſome purer region wings away.
One labour yet remains, celeſtial maid!
Another element demands thy ſong.
No more o'er craggy ſteep, through coverts thick
With pointed thorn, and briers intricate,
Urge on with horn and voice the painful pack:
But ſkim with wanton wing th' irriguous vale,
Where winding ſtreams amid the flowery meads
Perpetual glide along; and undermine
The cavern'd banks, by the tenacious roots
Of hoary willows arch'd; gloomy retreat
Of the bright ſcaly kind; where they at will
On the green watery reed their paſture graze,
Suck the moiſt ſoil, or ſlumber at their eaſe,
Rock'd by the reſtleſs brook, that draws aſlope
Its humid train, and laves their dark abodes.
Where rages not oppreſſion? Where, alas!
Is innocence ſecure? Rapine and ſpoil
Haunt ev'n the loweſt deeps; ſeas have their ſharks,
Rivers and ponds encloſe the ravenous pike;
He in his turn becomes a prey; on him
Th' amphibious otter feaſts. Juſt is his fate
Deſerv'd: but tyrants know no bounds; nor ſpears,
That briſtle on his back, defend the perch
From his wide greedy jaws; nor burniſh'd mail
The yellow carp, nor all his arts can ſave
Th' inſinuating eel, that hides his head
Beneath the ſlimy mud; nor yet eſcapes
The crimſon-ſpotted trout, the river's pride,
And beauty of the ſtream. Without remorſe,
This midnight pillager, ranging around,
Inſatiate ſwallows all. The owner mourns
Th' unpeopled rivulet, and gladly hears
The huntſman's early call, and ſees with joy
The jovial crew, that march upon its banks
In gay parade, with bearded lances arm'd.
The ſubtle ſpoiler of the beaver kind,
Far off perhaps, where ancient alders ſhade
The deep ſtill pool; within ſome hollow trunk
Contrives his wicker couch: whence he ſurveys
His long purlieu, lord of the ſtream, and all
The ſinny ſhoals his own. But you, brave youths,
Diſpute the ſelon's claim; try every root,
And every reedy bank; encourage all
The buſy-ſpreading pack, that fearleſs plunge
Into the flood, and croſs the rapid ſtream.
Bid rocks and caves, and each reſounding ſhore,
Proclaim your bold defiance; loudly raiſe
Each cheering voice, till diſtant hills repeat
The triumphs of the vale. On the ſoft ſand
See there his ſeal impreſs'd! and on that bank
Behold the glittering ſpoils, half-eaten fiſh,
Scales, fins, and bones, the leavings of his feaſt.
Ah! on that yielding ſag-bed, ſee once more
His ſeal I view. O'er yon dank ruſhy marſh
The ſly gooſe-footed prowler bends his courſe,
And ſeeks the diſtant ſhallows. Huntſman, bring
Thy eager pack; and trail him to his couch.
Hark! the loud peal begins, the clamorous joy,
The gallant chiding, loads the trembling air.
Ye Naiads fair, who o'er theſe floods preſide,
Raiſe up your dripping heads above the wave,
And hear our melody. Th' harmonious notes
Float with the ſtream; and every winding creek
And hollow rock, that o'er the dimpling flood
Nods pendant; ſtill improve from ſhore to ſhore
Our ſweet reiterated joys. What ſhouts!
What clamour loud! What gay heart-cheering ſounds
Urge through the breathing braſs their mazy way!
Nor quires of Tritons glad with ſprightlier ſtrains
The dancing billows! when proud Neptune rides
In triumph o'er the deep. How greedily
They ſnuff the fiſhy ſteam, that to each blade
Rank-ſcenting clings! See! how the morning dews
They ſweep, that from their feet beſprinkling drop
Diſpers'd, and leave a track oblique behind.
Now on firm land they range; then in the flood
They plunge tumultuous; or through reedy pools
Ruſtling they work their way: no hole eſcapes
Their curious ſearch. With quick ſenſation now
The fuming vapour ſtings; flutter their hearts,
And joy redoubled burſts from every mouth
In louder ſymphonies. Yon hollow trunk,
That with its hoary head incurv'd ſalutes
The paſſing wave, muſt be the tyrant's fort,
And dread abode. How theſe impatient climb,
While others at the root inceſſant bay!
They put him down. See, there he dives along!
Th' aſcending bubbles mark his gloomy way.
Quick fix the nets, and cut off his retreat
Into the ſheltering deeps. Ah! there he vents!
The pack plunge headlong, and protended ſpears
Menace deſtruction: while the troubled ſurge
Indignant ſoams, and all the ſcaly kind,
Affrighted, hide their heads. Wild tumult reigns,
And loud uproar. Ah, there once more he vents!
See, that bold hound has ſeiz'd him; down they ſink
Together loſt: but ſoon ſhall he repent
His raſh aſſault. See there eſcap'd, he flies
Half-drown'd, and clambers up the ſlippery bank
With ooze and blood diſtain'd. Of all the brutes,
Whether by nature form'd, or by long uſe,
This artful diver beſt can bear the want
Of vital air. Unequal is the fight,
Beneath the whelming element. Yet there
He lives not long; but reſpiration needs
At proper intervals. Again he vents;
Again the crowd attack. That ſpear has pierc'd
His neck; the crimſon waves confeſs the wound.
Fix'd is the bearded lance, unwelcome gueſt,
Where'er he flies; with him it ſinks beneath,
With him it mounts; ſure guide to every foe.
Inly he groans; nor can his tender wound
Bear the cold ſtream. Lo! to yon ſedgy bank
He creeps diſconſolate: his numerous foes
Surround him, hounds and men. Pierc'd through and through,
On pointed ſpears they lift him high in air;

Wriggling he hangs, and grins, and bites in vain:
Bid the loud horns, in gayly-warbling ſtrains,
Proclaim the felon's fate; he dies, he dies.
Rejoice, ye ſcaly tribes, and leaping dance
Above the wave, in ſign of liberty
Reſtor'd; the cruel tyrant is no more.
Rejoice ſecure and bleſs'd; did not as yet
Remain, ſome of your own rapacious kind;
And man, fierce man, with all his various wiles.
O happy! if ye knew your happy ſtate,
Ye rangers of the fields; whom Nature boon
Cheers with her ſmiles, and every element
Conſpires to bleſs. What, if no heroes frown
From marble pedeſtals; nor Raphael's works,
Nor Titian's lively tints, adorn our walls?
Yet theſe the meaneſt of us may behold;
And at another's coſt may feaſt at will
Our wondering eyes; what can the owner more?
But vain, alas! is wealth, not grac'd with power.
The flowery landſkip, and the gilded dome,
And viſtas opening to the wearied eye,
Through all his wide domain; the planted grove,
The ſhrubby wilderneſs, with its gay choir
Of warbling birds, can't lull to ſoft repoſe
Th' ambitious wretch, whoſe diſcontented ſoul
Is harrow'd day and night; he mourns, he pines,
Until his prince's favour makes him great.
See there he comes, th' exalted idol comes!
The circle's form'd, and all his fawning ſlaves
Devoutly bow to earth; from every mouth
The naufeous flattery flows, which he returns
With promiſes that die as ſoon as born.
Vile intercourſe! where virtue has no place.
Frown but the monarch; all his glories fade;
He mingles with the throng, outcaſt, undone,
The pageant of a day; without one friend
To ſoothe his tortur'd mind; all, all are fled.
For, though they baſk'd in his meridian ray,
The inſects vaniſh, as his beams decline.

Not ſuch our friends; for here no dark deſign,
No wicked intereſt, bribes the venal heart;
But inclination to our boſom leads,
And weds them there for life; our ſocial cups
Smile, as we ſmile; open, and unreſerv'd,
We ſpeak our inmoſt ſouls; good-humour, mirth,
Soft complaiſance, and wit from malice free,
Smooth every brow, and glow on every cheek.
O happineſs ſincere! what wretch would groan
Beneath the galling load of power, or walk
Upon the ſlippery pavements of the great,
Who thus could reign, unenvy'd and ſecure?
Ye guardian powers who make mankind your care,
Give me to know wiſe Nature's hidden depths,
Trace each myſterious cauſe, with judgment read
Th' expanded volume, and ſubmiſs adore
That great creative will, who at a word
Spoke forth the wondrous ſcene. But if my ſoul
To this groſs clay confin'd flutters on earth
With leſs ambitious wing; unſkill'd to range
From orb to orb, where Newton leads the way;
And view with piercing eyes the grand machine;
Worlds above worlds; ſubſervient to his voice,
Who, veil'd in clouded majeſty, alone
Gives light to all; bids the great ſyſtem move,
And changeful ſeaſons in their turns advance,
Unmov'd, unchang'd, himſelf: yet this at leaſt
Grant me propitious, an inglorious life,
Calm and ſerene, nor loſt in falſe purſuits
Of wealth or honours; but enough to raiſe
My drooping friends, preventing modeſt want
That dares not aſk. And if, to crown my joys,
Ye grant me health, that, ruddy in my cheeks,
Blooms in my life's decline; fields, woods, and ſtreams,
Each towering hill, each humble vale below,
Shall hear my cheering voice, my hounds ſhall wake
The lazy morn, and glad th' horizon round.

HOBBINOL; OR, THE RURAL GAMES.

A BURLESQUE POEM.

IN BLANK VERSE.

" Nec ſum animi dubius, verbis ea vincere magnum
" Quàm ſit, et angueſtis hunc addere rebus honorem.
" Sed me Parnaſſi deſerta per ardua dulcis
" Raptat Amor. Juvat ire jugis, quà nulla priorum
" Caſtaliam molli divertitur orbita clivo."

VIRG. Georg. lib. iii.

TO MR. HOGARTH.

PERMIT me, Sir, to make choice of you for my patron, being the greateſt maſter in the burleſque way. In this indeed you have ſome advantage of your poetical brethren, that you paint to the eye; yet remember, Sir, that we give ſpeech and motion, and a greater variety to our figures. Your province is the town; leave me a ſmall outride in the country, and I ſhall be content. In this, at leaſt, let us both agree, to make vice and folly the object of our ridicule; and we cannot fail to be of ſome ſervice to mankind. I am,

SIR,

Your admirer, and

Your moſt humble ſervant,

W. S.

PREFACE.

NOTHING is more common than for us poor bards, when we have acquired a little reputation, to print ourſelves into diſgrace. We climb the Aonian mount with difficulty and toil; we receive the bays for which we languiſhed; till, graſping ſtill at more, we loſe our hold, and fall at once to the bottom.

The author of this piece would not thus be felo de ſe, nor would he be murdered by perſons unknown. But as he is ſatisfied, that there are many imperfect copies of this trifle diſperſed abroad, and as he is credibly informed, that he ſhall ſoon be expoſed to view in ſuch an attitude, as he would not care to appear in; he thinks it moſt prudent, in this deſperate caſe, to throw himſelf on the mercy of the public; and offer this whimſical work a voluntary ſacrifice, in hope that he ſtands a better chance for their indulgence, now it has received his laſt hand, than when curtailed and mangled by others.

The poets of almoſt all nations have celebrated the games of their ſeveral countries. Homer began, and all the mimic tribe followed the example of that great father of poetry. Even our own Milton, who laid his ſcene beyond the limits of this ſublunary world, has found room for deſcriptions of this ſort, and has performed it in a more ſublime manner than any who went before him. His, indeed, are ſports; but they are the ſports of angels. This gentleman has endeavoured to do juſtice to his countrymen, the Britiſh freeholders, who, when dreſſed in their holiday clothes, are by no means perſons of a deſpicable figure; but eat and drink as plentifully, and fight as heartily, as the greateſt hero in the Iliad. There is alſo ſome uſe in deſcriptions of this nature, ſince nothing gives us a clearer idea of the genius of a nation, than their ſports and diverſions. If we ſee people dancing, even in wooden ſhoes, and a fiddle always at their heels, we are ſoon convinced of the levity and volatile ſpirit of thoſe merry ſlaves. The famous bull-feaſts are an evident token of the Quixotiſm and romantic taſte of the Spaniards. And a country-wake is too ſad an image of the infirmities of our own people: we ſee nothing but broken heads, bottles flying about, tables overturned, outrageous drunkenneſs, and eternal ſquabble.

Thus much of the ſubject; it may not be improper to touch a little upon the ſtyle. One of the greateſt poets and moſt candid critics of this age has informed us that there are two ſorts of burleſque. Be pleaſed to take it in his own words, Spectator, Numb. 242. "Burleſque (ſays he) is "of two kinds. The firſt repreſents mean perſons in the accoutrements of heroes; the other, "great perſons acting and ſpeaking like the baſeſt "among the people. Don Quixote is an inſtance "of the firſt, and Lucian's gods of the ſecond. It "is a diſpute among the critics, whether burleſque "runs beſt in heroic, like the Diſpenſary; or in "droggel, like that of Hudibras. I think, where "the low character is to be raiſed, the heroic is "the moſt proper meaſure; but when an hero is "to be pulled down and degraded, it is beſt done "in doggrel." Thus far Mr. Addiſon. If therefore the heroic is the proper meaſure where the low character is to be raiſed, Milton's ſtyle muſt be very proper in the ſubject here treated of; becauſe it raiſes the low character more than is poſſible to be done under the reſtraint of rhyme; and the ridicule chiefly conſiſts in raiſing that low character. I beg leave to refer to the authority of Mr. Smith, in his poem upon the death of Mr. John Philips. The whole paſſage is ſo very fine, and gives ſo clear an idea of his manner of writing, that the reader will not think his labour loſt in running it over.

But here it may be objected, that this manner of writing contradicts the rule in Horace:

"Verſibus exponi tragicis res comica non vult."

Monſieur Boileau, in his diſſertation upon the Joconde of de la Fontaine, quotes this paſſage in Horace, and obſerves, "Que comme il n'y a rien "de plus froid, que de conter une choſe grande en "ſtile bas, auſſi n'y a-t-il de plus ridicule, que de "raconter une hiſtoire comique et abſurde en "termes graves et ſerieux." But then he juſtly adds this exception to the general rule in Horace; "à moins que ce ſerieux ne ſoit affecté tout exprès pour rendre la choſe encore plus burleſque." If the obſervation of that celebrated critic, Monſieur Dacier, is true, Horace himſelf, in the ſame epiſtle to the Piſo's, and not far diſtant from the rule here mentioned, has aimed to improve the burleſque by the help of the ſublime, in his note upon this verſe:

"Debemur morti nos noſtraque: ſive receptus
"Terrâ Neptunus"——

And upon the five following verſes has this general remark: "Toutes ces expreſſions nobles qu' "Horace entaſſe dans ces ſix vers ſervent a rendre "plus plaiſante cette chute:

"Ne dum verborum ſtet honos."——

"Car rien ne contribue tant au ridicule que le grand." He indeed would be ſevere upon himſelf alone, who ſhould cenſure this way of writing, when he muſt plainly ſee, that it is affected on purpoſe, only to raiſe the ridicule, and give the reader a more agreeable entertainment. Nothing can improve a merry tale ſo much, as its being delivered with a grave and ſerious air. Our imaginations are agreeably ſurpriſed, and fond of a pleaſure ſo little expected. Whereas he, who would beſpeak our laughter by an affected grimace and ridiculous geſtures, muſt play his part very well indeed, or he will fall ſhort of the idea he has raiſed. It is true, Virgil was very ſenſible that it was difficult thus to elevate a low and mean ſubject;

" Nec ſum animi dubius, verbis ea vincere magnum [rem."
" Quam ſit, et anguſtis hunc addere rebus hono-

But tells us for our encouragement in another place,

" In tenui labor, at tenuis non gloria, ſi quem
" Numina læva ſinunt, auditque vocatus Apollo."

Mr. Addiſon is of the ſame opinion, and adds, that the difficulty is very much increaſed by writing in blank verſe. " The Engliſh and French (ſays he) " who always uſe the ſame words in verſe as in " ordinary converſation, are forced to raiſe their " language with metaphors and figures, or by the " pompouſneſs of the whole phraſe to wear off " any littleneſs, that appears in the particular " parts that compoſe it. This makes our blank " verſe, where there is no rhyme to ſupport the " expreſſion, extremely difficult to ſuch as are not " maſters of the tongue; eſpecially when they " write upon low ſubjects." Remarks upon Italy, p. 99. But there is even yet a greater difficulty behind: the writer in this kind of burleſque muſt not only keep up the pomp and dignity of the ſtyle, but an artful ſneer ſhould appear through the whole work; and every man will judge, that it is no eaſy matter to blend together the hero and the harlequin.

If any perſon ſhould want a key to this poem, his curioſity ſhall be gratified: I ſhall, in plain words, tell him, " It is a ſatire againſt the luxury, " the pride, the wantonneſs, and quarrelſome tem- " per, of the middling ſort of people." As theſe are the proper and genuine cauſe of that bare-faced knavery, and almoſt univerſal poverty, which reign without controul in every place; and as to theſe we owe our many bankrupt farmers, our trade decayed, and lands uncultivated; the author has reaſon to hope that no honeſt man, who loves his country, will think this ſhort reproof out of ſeaſon: for, perhaps, this merry way of bantering men into virtue, may have a better effect than the moſt ſerious admonitions; ſince many, who are proud to be thought immoral, are not very fond of being ridiculous.

CANTO I.

THE ARGUMENT.

Propoſition. Invocation addreſſed to Mr. John Philips, author of the Cyder Poem and Splendid Shilling. Deſcription of the Vale of Eveſham. The Seat of Hobbinol; Hobbinol a great man in his village, ſeated in his wicker ſmoking his pipe, has one only ſon. Young Hobbinol's education, bred up with Ganderetta his near relation. Young Hobbinol and Ganderetta choſen king and queen of May. Her dreſs and attendants. The May-games. Twangdillo the fiddler, his character. The dancing. Ganderetta's extraordinary performance. Bagpipes good muſic in the Highlands. Milonides, maſter of the ring, diſciplines the mob; proclaims the ſeveral prizes. His ſpeech. Paſtorel takes up the belt. His character, his heroic figure, his confidence. Hobbinol, by permiſſion of Ganderetta, accepts the challenge, vaults into the ring. His honourable behaviour, eſcapes a ſcowering. Ganderetta's agony. Paſtorel foiled. Ganderetta not a little pleaſed.

WHAT old Menalcas at his feaſt reveal'd
I ſing, ſtrange feats of ancient proweſs, deeds,
Of high renown, while all his liſtening gueſts
With eager joy receiv'd the pleaſing tale.
O thou*! who late on Vaga's flowery banks
Slumbering ſecure, with Stirom† well bedew'd,
Fallacious caſk, in ſacred dreams were taught
By ancient ſeers, and Merlin prophet old,
To raiſe ignoble themes with ſtrains ſublime,
Be thou my guide; while I thy track purſue
With wing unequal, through the wide expanſe
Adventurous range, and emulate thy flights.
In that rich vale‡, where with Dobunian§ fields
Cornavian‖ borders meet, far fam'd of old
For Montfort's hapleſs fate, undaunted earl;
Where from her fruitful urn Avona pours
Her kindly torrent on the thirſty glebe,
And pillages the hills t' enrich the plains;
On whoſe luxuriant banks flowers of all hues
Start up ſpontaneous; and the teeming ſoil
With haſty ſhoots prevents its owner's prayer:
The pamper'd wanton ſteer, of the ſharp axe
Regardleſs, that o'er his devoted head
Hangs menacing, crops his delicious bane,
Nor knows the price is life; with envious eye
His labouring yoke-fellow beholds his plight,
And deems him bleſt, while on his languid neck
In ſolemn ſloth he tugs the lingering plough.
So blind are mortals, of each other's ſtate
Miſ-judging, ſelf-deceiv'd. Here as ſupreme
Stern Hobbinol in rural plenty reigns
O'er wide extended fields, his large domain.
Th' obſequious villagers, with looks ſubmiſs
Obſervant of his eye, or when with ſeed
T' impregnate earth's fat womb, or when to bring
With clamorous joy the bearded harveſt home.
Here, when the diſtant ſun lengthens the nights,
When the keen froſts the ſhivering farmer warn
To broach his mellow caſk, and frequent blaſts
Inſtruct the crackling billets how to blaze,
In his warm wicker-chair, whoſe pliant twigs
In cloſe embraces join'd, with ſpacious arch
Vault this thick-woven roof, the bloated churl
Loiters in ſtate, each arm reclin'd is prop'd
With yielding pillows of the ſofteſt down.
In mind compos'd, from ſhort coeval tube
He ſucks the vapours bland, thick curling clouds
Of ſmoke around his reeking temples play;
Joyous he ſits, and impotent of thought
Puffs away care and ſorrow from his heart.
How vain the pomp of kings! look down, ye great,

And view with envious eye the downy neſt,
Where ſoft repoſe, and calm contentment dwell,
Unbrib'd by wealth, and unreſtrain'd by power.
One ſon alone had bleſt his bridal bed,
Whom good Caliſta bore, nor long ſurviv'd
To ſhare a mother's joy, but left the babe
To his paternal care. An orphan niece
Near the ſame time his dying brother ſent,
To claim his kind ſupport. The helpleſs pair
In the ſame cradle ſlept, nurs'd up with care
By the ſame tender hand, on the ſame breaſts
Alternate hung with joy; till reaſon dawn'd,
And a new light broke out by ſlow degrees:
Then on the floor the pretty wantons play'd,
Gladding the farmer's heart with growing hopes,
And pleaſures erſt unfelt. Whene'er with cares
Oppreſs'd, when wearied, or alone he doz'd,
Their harmleſs prattle ſooth'd his troubled ſoul.
Say, Hobbinol, what eccſtaſies of joy
Thrill'd through thy veins, when climbing for a kiſs
With little palms they ſtrok'd thy grizly beard,
Or round thy wicker whirl'd their rattling cars?
Thus from their earlieſt days bred up, and train'd,
To mutual fondneſs, with their ſtature grew
The thriving paſſion. What love can decay
That roots ſo deep! now ripening manhood curl'd
On the gay ſtripling's chin: her panting breaſts,
And trembling bluſhes glowing on her cheeks,
Her ſecret wiſh betray'd. She at each mart
All eyes attracted; but her faithful ſhade,
Young Hobbinol, ne'er wander'd from her ſide.
A frown from him daſh'd every rival's hopes.
For he, like Peleus' ſon, was prone to rage,
Inexorable, ſwift like him of foot
With eaſe could overtake his daſtard foe,
Nor ſpar'd the ſuppliant wretch. And now approach'd
Thoſe merry days, when all the nymphs and ſwains,
In ſolemn feſtivals and rural ſports,
Pay their glad homage to the blooming ſpring.
Young Hobbinol by joint conſent is rais'd
T' imperial dignity, and in his hand
Bright Ganderetta tripp'd the jovial queen
Of Maia's gaudy month profuſe of flowers.
From each enamel'd mead th' attendant nymphs
Loaded with odorous ſpoils, from theſe ſelect
Each flower of gorgeous dye, and garlands weave
Of party-colour'd ſweets; each buſy hand
Adorns the jocund queen: in her looſe hair,
That to the winds in wanton ringlets plays,
The tufted cowſlips breathe their ſaint perfumes.
On her refulgent brow, as cryſtal clear,
As Parian marble ſmooth, Narciſſus hangs
His drooping head, and views his image there,
Unhappy flower! panſies of various hue,
Iris, and hyacinth, and aſphodel,
To deck the nymph, their richeſt liveries wear,
And laviſh all their pride. Not Flora's ſelf
More lovely ſmiles, when to the dawning year
Her opening boſom heavenly fragrance breathes.
See on yon verdant lawn, the gathering crowd
Thickens amain; the buxom nymphs advance
Uſher'd by jolly clowns: diſtinctions ceaſe
Loſt in the common joy, and the bold ſlave
Leans on his wealthy maſter, unreprov'd:
The ſick no pains can feel, no wants the poor.
Round his fond mother's neck the ſmiling babe
Exulting clings; hard by decrepid age,
Prop'd on his ſtaff with anxious thought revolves
His pleaſures paſt, and caſts his grave remarks
Among the heedleſs throng. The vigorous youth
Strips for the combat, hopeful to ſubdue
The fair-one's long diſdain, by valour now
Glad to convince her coy erroneous heart,
And prove his merit equal to her charms.
Soft pity pleads his cauſe; bluſhing ſhe views
His brawny limbs, and his undaunted eye,
That looks a proud defiance on his foes.
Reſolv'd and obſtinately firm he ſtands;
Danger nor death he fears, while the rich prize
Is victory and love. On the large bough
Of a thick-ſpreading elm Twangdillo ſits:
One leg on Iſter's banks the hardy ſwain
Left undiſmay'd, Bellona's lightning ſcorch'd
His manly viſage, but in pity left
One eye ſecure. He many a painful bruiſe
Intrepid felt, and many a gaping wound,
For brown Kate's ſake, and for his country's weal:
Yet ſtill the merry bard without regret
Bears his own ills, and with his ſounding ſhell,
And comic phyz, relieves his drooping friends.
Hark, from aloft his tortur'd cat-gut ſqueals,
He tickles every ſtring, to every note
He bends his plaint neck, his ſingle eye
Twinkles with joy, his active ſtump beats time:
Let but this ſubtle artiſt ſoftly touch
The trembling chords, the faint expiring ſwain
Trembles no leſs, and the fond yielding maid
Is tweedled into love. See with what pomp
The gaudy bands advance in trim array!
Love beats in every vein, from every eye
Darts his contagious flames. They friſk, they bound
Now to briſk airs, and to the ſpeaking ſtrings:
Attentive, in mid-way the ſexes meet;
Joyous their adverſe fronts they cloſe, and preſs
To ſtrict embrace, as reſolute to force
And ſtorm a paſſage to each other's heart:
Till by the varying notes forewarn'd back they
Recoil diſparted: each with longing eyes
Purſues his mate retiring, till again
The blended ſexes mix; then hand in hand
Faſt lock'd, around they fly, or nimbly wheel
In mazes intricate. The jocund troop,
Pleas'd with their grateful toil, inceſſant ſhake
Their uncouth brawny limbs, and knock their heels
Sonorous; down each brow the trickling balm
In torrents flows, exhaling ſweets refreſh
The gazing crowd, and heavenly fragrance fills
The circuit wide. So danc'd in days of yore,
When Orpheus play'd a leſſon to the brutes,
The liſtening ſavages, the ſpeckled pard
Dandled the kid, and with the bounding roe
The lion gambol'd. But what heavenly muſe
With equal lays ſhall Ganderetta ſing,
When goddeſs-like ſhe ſkims the verdant plain,
Gracefully gliding? every raviſh'd eye
The nymph attracts and every heart ſhe wounds,

The moſt transported Hobbinol! lo, now,
Now to thy opening arms ſhe ſkuds along,
With yielding bluſhes glowing on her cheeks;
And eyes that ſweetly languiſh; but too ſoon,
Too ſoon, alas! ſhe flies thy vain embrace,
But flies to be purſued; nimbly ſhe trips,
And darts a glance ſo tender as ſhe turns,
That with new hopes reliev'd, thy joys reviſe,
Thy ſtature's rais'd, and thou art more than man.
Thy ſtately port, and more majeſtic air,
And every ſprightly motion ſpeaks thy love.
To the loud bag-pipe's ſolemn voice attend,
Whoſe riſing winds proclaim a ſtorm is nigh.
Harmonious blaſts! that warm the frozen blood
Of Caledonia's ſons to love or war,
And cheer their drooping hearts, robb'd of the ſun's
Enlivening ray, that o'er the ſnowy Alps
Reluctant peeps, and ſpeeds to better climes.
Forthwith in hoary majeſty appears
One of gigantic ſize, but viſage wan,
Milonides the ſtrong, renown'd of old
For feats of arms, but, bending now with years,
His trunk unwieldy from the verdant turf
He rears deliberate, and with his plant
Of toughеſt virgin oak in riſing aids
His trembling limbs; his bald and wrinkled front,
Entrench'd with many a glorious ſcar, beſpeaks
Submiſſive reverence. He with countenance grim
Boaſts his paſt deeds, and with redoubled ſtrokes
Marſhals the crowd, and forms the circle wide.
Stern arbiter! like ſome huge rock he ſtands,
That breaks th' incumbent waves; they throng-
ing preſs
In troops confus'd, and rear their foaming heads
Each above each, but from ſuperior force
Shrinking repell'd, compoſe of ſtateliеſt view
A liquid theatre. With hands uplift,
And voice ſtentorian, he proclaims aloud
Each rural prize. " To him whoſe active foot
" Foils his bold foe, and rivets him to earth,
" This pair of gloves, by curious virgin hands
" Embroider'd, ſeam'd with ſilk, and fring'd with
" gold.
" To him, who beſt the ſtubborn hilts can wield,
" And bloody marks of his diſpleaſure leave
" On his opponent's head, this beaver white
" With ſilver edging grac'd, and ſcarlet plume.
" Ye taper maidens! whoſe impetuous ſpeed
" Outflies the roe, nor bends the tender graſs,
" See here this prize, this rich lac'd ſmock be-
" hold,
" White as your boſoms, as your kiſſes ſoft.
" Bleſt nymph! whom bounteous heaven's pe-
" culiar grace
" Allots this pompous veſt, and worthy deems
" To win a virgin, and to wear a bride."
The gifts refulgent dazzle all the crowd,
In ſpeechleſs admiration fix'd, unmov'd,
Ev'n he who now each glorious palm diſplays,
In ſullen ſilence views his batter'd limbs,
And ſighs his vigour ſpent. Not ſo appall'd
Young Paſtorel, for active ſtrength renown'd:
Him Ida bore, a mountain ſhepherdeſs;
On the bleak woald the new-born infant lay,
Expos'd to winter ſnows, and northern blaſts
Severe. As heroes old, who from great Jove
Derive their proud deſcent, ſo might he boaſt
His line paternal: but be thou, my muſe!
No leaky blab, nor painful umbrage give
To wealthy 'ſquire, or doughty knight, or peer
Of high degree. Him every ſhouting ring
In triumph crown'd, him every champion fear'd,
From † Kiftſgate to remoteſt † Henbury.
High in the midſt the brawny wreſtler ſtands,
A ſtately towering object; the tough belt
Meaſures his ample breaſt, and ſhades around
His ſhoulders broad; proudly ſecure he kens
The tempting prize, in his preſumptuous thought
Already gain'd; with partial look the crowd
Approve his claim. But Hobbinol, enrag'd
To ſee th' important gifts ſo cheaply won,
And uncontеſted honours tamely loſt,
With lowly reverence thus accoſts his queen.
" Fair goddeſs! be propitious to my vows;
" Smile on thy ſlave, nor Hercules himſelf
" Shall rob us of this palm: that boaſter vain
" Far other port ſhall learn." She, with a look
That pierc'd his inmoſt ſoul, ſmiling applauds
His generous ardour, with aſpiring hope
Diſtends his breaſt, and ſtirs the man within:
Yet much, alas! ſhe fears, for much ſhe loves.
So from her arms the Paphian queen diſmiſs'd
The warrior god, on glorious ſlaughter bent,
Provok'd his rage, and with her eyes inflam'd
Her haughty paramour. Swift as the winds
Diſpel the fleeting miſts, at once he ſtrips
His royal robes; and with a frown that chill'd
The blood of the proud youth, active he bounds
High o'er the heads of multitudes reclin'd:
But, as beſeem'd one, whoſe plain honeſt heart,
Nor paſſion foul, nor malice dark as hell,
But honour pure, and love divine, had fir'd,
His hand preſenting, on his ſturdy foe
Diſdainfully he ſmiles; then, quick as thought,
With his left-hand the belt, and with his right
His ſhoulder ſeiz'd faſt griping; his right foot
Eſſay'd the champion's ſtrength: but firm he ſtood,
Fix'd as a mountain aſh, and in his turn
Repaid the bold affront; his horny fiſt
Faſt on his back he clos'd, and ſhook in air
The cumberous load. Nor reſt, nor pauſe allow'd,
Their watchful eyes inſtruct their buſy feet;
They pant, they heave; each nerve, each ſinew's
ſtrain'd,
Graſping they cloſe, beneath each painful gripe
The livid tumours riſe, in briny ſtreams
The ſweat diſtils, and from their batter'd ſhins
The clotted gore diſtains the beaten ground.
Each ſwain his wiſh, each trembling nymph conceals
Her ſecret dread; while every panting breaſt
Alternate fears and hopes depreſs or raiſe.
Thus long in dubious ſcale the conteſt hung,
Till Paſtorel, impatient of delay,
Collecting all his force, a furious ſtroke
At his left ancle aim'd; 'twas death to fall,
To ſtand impoſſible. O Ganderetta!

† Two Hundreds in Glouceſterſhire.

What horrors ſeize thy ſoul! on thy pale cheeks
The roſes fade. But wavering long in air,
Nor firm on foot, nor as yet wholly fallen,
On his right knee he ſlip'd, and nimbly 'ſcap'd
The foul diſgrace. Thus on the ſlacken'd rope
The wingy-footed artiſt, frail ſupport!
Stands tottering; now in dreadful ſhrieks the crowd
Lament his ſudden fate, and yield him loſt:
He on his hams, or on his brawny rump,
Sliding ſecure, derides their vain diſtreſs.
Up ſtarts the vigorous Hobbinol undiſmay'd,
From mother earth like old Anteus rais'd
With might redoubled. Clamour and applauſe
Shake all the neighbouring hills, Avona's banks
Return him loud acclaim: with ardent eyes,
Fierce as a tiger ruſhing from his lair,
He graſp'd the wriſt of his inſulting foe.
Then with quick wheel oblique his ſhoulder point
Beneath his breaſt he fix'd, and whirl'd aloft
High o'er his head the ſprawling youth he flung:
The hollow ground rebellow'd as he fell.
The crowd preſs forward with tumultuous din;
Thoſe to relieve their faint expiring friend,
With gratulations theſe. Hands, tongues, and caps,
Outrageous joy proclaim, ſhrill fiddles ſqueak,
Hoarſe bag-pipes roar, and Ganderetta ſmiles.

CANTO II.

THE ARGUMENT.

The fray. Tonſorio, Colin, Hilderbrand, Cuddy, Cindaraxa, Talgol, Avaro, Cubbin, Collakin, Mundungo. Sir Rhadamanth the juſtice, attended with his guards, comes to quell the fray. Rhadamanth's ſpeech, tumult appeas'd. Gorgonius the butcher takes up the hilts; his character. The Kiftſgatians conſternation, look wiſtfully on Hobbinol; his ſpeech. The cudgel-playing. Gorgonius knock'd down, falls upon Twandillo; his diſtreſs; his lamentation over his broken fiddle.

Long while an univerſal hubbub loud,
Deafening each ear, had drown'd each accent mild;
Till biting taunts and harſh opprobrious words
Vile utterance found. How weak are human minds!
How impotent to ſtem the ſwelling tide,
And without inſolence enjoy ſucceſs!
The vale-inhabitants, proud, and elate
With victory, know no reſtraint, but give
A looſe to joy. Their champion Hobbinol
Vaunting they raiſe, above that earth-born race
Of giants old, who, piling hills on hills,
Pelion on Oſſa, with rebellious aim
Made war on Jove. The ſturdy mountaineers,
Who ſaw their mightieſt fall'n, and in his fall
Their honours paſt impair'd, their trophies, won
By their proud fathers, who with ſcorn look'd down
Upon the ſubject vale, ſullied, deſpoil'd,
And level'd with the duſt, no longer bear
The keen reproach. But as when ſudden fire
Seizes the ripen'd grain, whoſe bending ears
Invite the reaper's hand, the furious god
In footy triumph dreadful rides, upborn
On wings of wind, that with deſtructive breath
Feed the fierce flames; from ridge to ridge he bounds
Wide-waſting, and pernicious ruin ſpreads:
So through the crowd from breaſt to breaſt ſwift flew
The propagated rage; loud vollied oaths,
Like thunder burſting from a cloud, gave ſigns
Of wrath awak'd. Prompt fury ſoon ſupplied
With arms uncouth; and tough well-ſeaſon'd plants
Weighty with lead infus'd, on either hoſt
Fall thick, and heavy; ſtools in pieces rent,
And chairs, and forms, and batter'd bowls, are hurld
With fell intent; like bombs the bottles fly
Hiſſing in air, their ſharp edg'd fragments drench'd
In the warm ſpouting gore; heaps driven on heaps Promiſcuous lie. Tonſorio now advanc'd
On the rough edge of battle: his broad front
Beneath his ſhining helm ſecure, as erſt
Was thine, Mambrino, ſtout Iberian knight!
Defied the rattling ſtorm, that on his head
Fell innocent. A table's ragged frame
In his right hand he bore, Herculean club!
Crowds, puſh'd on crowds, before his potent arm,
Fled ignominious; havock, and diſmay,
Hung on their rear. Collin a merry ſwain,
Blithe as the ſoaring lark, as ſweet the ſtrains
Of his ſoft warbling lips, that whiſtling cheer
His labouring team, they toſs their heads well pleas'd,
In gaudy plumage deck'd, with ſtern diſdain
Beheld this victor proud; his generous ſoul
Brook'd not the foul diſgrace. High o'er his head
His ponderous plough-ſtaff in both hands he rais'd;
Erect he ſtood, and ſtretching every nerve,
As from a forceful engine, down it fell
Upon his hollow'd helm, that yielding ſunk
Beneath the blow, and with its ſharpen'd edge
Shear'd both his ears, they on his ſhoulders broad
Hung ragged. Quick as thought, the vigorous youth
Shortening his ſtaff, the other end he darts
Into his gaping jaws. Tonſorio fled
Sore maim'd; with pounded teeth and clotted gore
Half-chok'd, he fled; with him the hoſt retir'd,
Companions of his ſhame; all but the ſtout,
And erſt unconquer'd Hildebrand, brave man!
Bold champion of the hills! thy weighty blows
Our fathers felt diſmay'd; to keep thy poſt
Unmov'd, whilom thy valour's choice, now fad
Neceſſity compels; decrepit now
With age, and ſtiff with honourable wounds,
He ſtands unterrify'd: one crutch ſuſtains
His frame majeſtic, th' other in his hand
He wields tremendous; like a mountain boar
In toils enclos'd, he dares his circling foes.
They ſhrink aloof, or ſoon with ſhame repent
The raſh aſſault; the ruſtic heroes fall
In heaps around. Cuddy, a dextrous youth,

When force was vain, on fraudful art rely'd:
Clofe to the ground low-cowering, unperceiv'd,
Cautious he crept, and with his crooked bill
Cut fheer the frail fupport, prop of his age:
Reeling a while he ftood, and menac'd fierce
Th' infidious fwain, reluctant now at length
Fell prone, and plough'd the duft. So the tall oak,
Old monarch of the groves, that long had ftood
The fhock of warring winds and the red bolts
Of angry Jove, fhorn of his leafy fhade
At laft, and inwardly decay'd, if chance
The cruel woodman fpy the friendly fpur,
His only hold; that fever'd, foon he nods,
And fhakes th' incumber'd mountain as he falls.
When manly valour fail'd, a female arm
Reftor'd the fight. As in th' adjacent booth
Black Cindaraxa's bufy hand prepar'd
The fmoky viands, fhe beheld, abafh'd,
The routed hoft, and all her daftard friends
Far fcatter'd o'er the plain; their fhameful flight
Griev'd her proud heart, for hurried with the ftream
Ev'n Talgol too had fled, her darling boy.
A flaming brand from off the glowing hearth
The greafy heroine fnatch'd; o'er her pale foes
The threatening meteor fhone, brandifh'd in air,
Or round their heads in ruddy circles play'd.
Acrofs the proftrate Hildebrand fhe ftrode,
Dreadfully bright: the multitude appal'd
Fled different ways, their beards, their hair in flames.
Imprudent fhe purfued, till on the brink
Of the next pool, with force united prefs'd,
And waving round with huge two-handed fway
Her blazing arms into the muddy lake
The bold virago fell. Dire was the fray
Between the warring elements; of old
Thus Mulciber, and Xanthus Dardan ftream
In hideous battle join'd. Juft finking now
Into the boiling deep, with fuppliant hands
She begg'd for life; black-oufe and filth obfcene
Hung in her matted hair; the fhouting crowd
Infult her woes, and, proud of their fuccefs,
The dripping Amazon in triumph lead.
Now, like a gathering ftorm, the rally'd troops
Blacken'd the plain. Young Talgol from their front,
With a fond lover's haſte, fwift as the hind,
That, by the huntfmen's voice alarm'd, had fled,
Panting returns, and feeks the gloomy brake,
Where her dear fawn lay hid, into the booth
Impatient rufh'd. But when the fatal tale
He heard, the deareft treafure of his foul
Purloin'd his Cindy loft; ftiffen'd and pale
A while he ftood; his kindling ire at length
Burft forth implacable, and injur'd love;
Shot lightning from his eyes; a fpit he feiz'd,
Juft reeking from the fat furloin, a long,
Unwieldy fpear; then with impetuous rage
Prefs'd forward on th' embattled hoft, that fhrunk
At his approach. The rich Avaro firft,
His fleſhy rump bor'd with difhoneft wounds,
Fled bellowing: nor could his numerous flocks,
Nor all th' afpiring pyramids that grace
His yard well-ftor'd, fave the penurious clown.
Here Cubbin fell, and there young Collakin,
Nor his fond mother's prayers nor ardent vows
Of love-fick maids could move relentlefs fate.
Where'er he rag'd, with his far-beaming lance
He thinn'd their ranks, and all their battle fwerv'd
With many an inroad goar'd. Then caft around
His furious eyes, if haply he might find
The captive fair; her in the duft he fpy'd
Groveling, difconfolate; thofe locks, that erft,
So bright, fhone like the poliſh'd jet, defil'd
With mire impure; thither with eager haſte
He ran, he flew. But when the wretched maid
Proftrate he view'd, deform'd with gaping wounds
And weltering in her blood, his trembling hand
Soon dropp'd the dreaded lance; on her pale cheeks
Ghaſtly he gaz'd, nor felt the pealing ftorm,
That on his bare defenceleſs brow fell thick
From every arm: o'erpower'd at laft, down funk
His drooping head, on her cold breaſt reclin'd.
Hail, faithful pair! if ought my verſe avail,
Nor envy's fpite nor time fhall e'er efface
The records of your fame; blind Britiſh bards
In ages yet to come, on feſtal days [nymphs
Shall chant this mournful tale, while liſtening
Lament around, and every generous heart
With active valour glows, and virtuous love.
How blind is popular fury! how perverſe,
When broils inteſtine rage, and force controuls
Reaſon and law! As the torn veſſel ſinks,
Between the burſt of adverſe waves o'erwhelm'd;
So fares it with the neutral head, between
Contending parties bruis'd, inceſſant peal'd
With random ſtrokes that undiſcerning fall;
Guiltleſs he ſuffers moſt, who leaſt offends.
Mundungo from the bloody field retir'd,
Cloſe in a corner plied the peaceful bowl;
Incurious he, and thoughtleſs of events,
Now deem'd himſelf conceal'd, wrapt in the cloud
That iſſued from his mouth, and the thick fogs
That hung upon his brows, but hoſtile rage
Inquiſitive found out the ruſty ſwain.
His ſhort black tube down his furr'd throat impell'd,
Staggering he reel'd, and with tenacious gripe
The bulky Jordan, that before him ſtood,
Seiz'd falling; that its liquid freight diſgorg'd
Upon the proſtrate clown; floundering he lay
Beneath the muddy beverage whelm'd ſo late
His prime delight. Thus the luxurious waſp,
Voracious inſect, by the fragrant dregs
Allur'd, and in the viſcous nectar plung'd,
His filmy pennons ſtruggling flaps in vain,
Loſt in a flood of ſweets. Still o'er the plain
Fierce onſet, and tumultuous battle ſpread;
And now they fall, and now they riſe, incens'd
With animated rage, while nought around
Is heard but clamour, ſhout, and female cries,
And curſes mix'd with groans. Diſcord on high
Shook her infernal ſcourge, and o'er their heads
Scream'd with malignant joy; when lo! between
The warring hoſts appear'd ſage Rhadamanth,
A knight of high renown. Nor Quixote bold,
Nor Amadis of Gaul, nor Hudibras,
Mirror of knighthood, e'er could vie with thee,
Great ſultan of the vale! thy front ſevere,
As humble Indians to their pagods bow,

The clowns ſubmiſs approach. Themis to thee
Commits her golden balance, where ſhe weighs
Th' abandon'd orphan's ſighs, the widow's tears;
By thee gives ſure redreſs, comforts the heart
Oppreſs'd with woe, and rears the ſuppliant knee.
Each bold offender hides his guilty head,
Aſtoniſh'd, when thy delegated arm
Draws her vindictive ſword; at thy command,
Stern miniſter of power ſupreme! each ward
Sends forth her brawny myrmidons, their clubs
Blazon'd with royal arms; diſpatchful haſte
Sits earneſt on each brow, and public care.
Encompaſs'd round with theſe his dreadful guards,
He ſpurr'd his ſober ſteed, grizzled with age,
And venerably dull; his ſtirrups ſtreteh'd
Beneath the knightly load; one hand he fix'd
Upon his ſaddle-bow, the other palm
Before him ſpread, like ſome grave orator
In Athens, or free Rome, when eloquence
Subdued mankind, and all the liſtening crowd
Hung by their ears on his perſuaſive tongue.
He thus the jarring multitude addreſs'd:

" Neighbours, and friends, and countrymen, the flower [broil?
" Of Kiftſgate! ah! what means this impious
" Is then the haughty Gaul no more your care?
" Are Landen's plains ſo ſoon forgot, that thus
" Ye ſpill that blood inglorious, waſte that ſtrength,
" Which, well employ'd, once more might have compell'd
" The ſtripling Anjou to a ſhameful flight?
" Or by your great forefathers taught, have fix'd
" The Britiſh ſtandard on Lutetian towers!
" O ſight odious, deteſtable! O times
" Degenerate, of ancient honour void!
" This fact ſo foul, ſo riotous, inſults
" All law, all ſovereign power, and calls aloud
" For vengeance; but, my friends! too well ye know,
" How ſlow this arm to puniſh, and how bleeds
" This heart, when forc'd on rigorous extremes.
" O countrymen! all, all, can teſtify
" My vigilance, my care for public good,
" I am the man, who by your own free choice
" Select from all the tribes, in ſenates rul'd
" Each warm debate, and emptied all my ſtores
" Of ancient ſcience in my country's cauſe.
" Wiſe Tacitus, of penetration deep,
" Each ſecret ſpring reveal'd; Thuanus bold
" Breath'd liberty, and all the mighty dead,
" Rais'd at my call, the Britiſh rights confirm'd:
" While Muſgrave, How, and Seymour ſneer'd in vain.
" I am the man, who from the bench exalt
" This voice, ſtill grateful to your ears, this voice
" Which breaths for you alone. Where is the wretch
" Diſtreſs'd, who in the cobwebs of the law
" Entangled, and in ſubtle problems loſt,
" Seeks not to me for aid! In ſhoals they come
" Neglected, feeleſs clients, nor return
" Unedify'd; ſcarce greater multitudes
" At Delphi ſought the god, to learn their fate
" From his dark oracles. I am the man
" Whoſe watchful providence beyond the date
" Of this frail life extends, to future times
" Beneficent; my uſeful ſchemes ſhall ſteer
" The common-weal in ages yet to come. [keep
" Your children's children, taught by me, ſhall
" Their rights inviolable: and as Rome
" The Sibyl's ſacred books, though wrote on leaves
" And ſcatter'd o'er the ground with pious awe
" Collected; ſo your ſons ſhall glean with care
" My hallow'd fragments, every ſcrip divine
" Conſult intent, of more intrinſic worth
" Than half a Vatican. Hear me, my friends!
" Hear me, my countrymen! Oh ſuffer not
" This hoary head, employ'd for you alone,
" To ſink, with ſorrow to the grave." He ſpake,
And veil'd his bonnet to the crowd. As when
The ſovereign of the floods o'er the rough deep
His awful trident ſhakes, its fury falls,
The warring billows on each hand retire,
And foam, and rage no more. All now is huſh'd,
The multitude appeas'd: a cheerful dawn
Smiles on the fields, the waving throng ſubſides,
And the loud tempeſt ſinks, becalm'd in peace.

Gorgonius now with haughty ſtrides advanc'd,
A gauntlet ſeiz'd, firm on his guard he ſtood
A formidable foe, and dealt in air
His empty blows, a prelude to the fight.
Slaughter his trade; full many a pamper'd ox
Fell by his fatal hand, the bulky beaſt
Dragg'd by his horns, oft at one deadly blow,
His iron fiſt deſcending cruſh'd his ſkull,
And left him ſpurning on the bloody floor,
While at his feet the guiltleſs axe was laid.
In dubious fight of late one eye he loſt,
Bor'd from its orb, and the next glancing ſtroke
Bruis'd ſore the riſing arch, and bent his noſe:
Nathleſs he triumph'd on the well-fought ſtage,
Hockleian hero! Nor was more deform'd
The Cyclops blind, nor of more monſtrous ſize,
Nor his void orb more dreadful to behold,
Weeping the putrid gore, ſevere revenge
Of ſubtle Ithacus. Terribly gay
In his buff doublet, larded o'er with fat
Of ſlaughter'd brutes, the well-oil'd champion ſhone.
Sternly he gaz'd around, with many a frown
Fierce menacing, provok'd the tardy foe.
For now each combatant, that erſt ſo bold
Vaunted his manly deeds, in penſive mood
Hung down his head, and fix'd on earth his eyes,
Pale and diſmay'd. On Hobbinol at laſt
Intent they gaze, on him alone their hope,
Each eye ſolicits him, each panting heart
Joins in the ſilent ſuit. Soon he perceiv'd
Their ſecret wiſh, and eas'd their doubting minds.

" Ye men of Kiftſgate! whoſe wide ſpreading fame
" In ancient days were ſung from ſhore to ſhore,
" To Britiſh bards of old a copious theme;
" Too well, alas! in your pale cheeks I view
" Your daſtard ſouls. O mean, degenerate race!
" But ſince on me ye call, each ſuppliant eye
" Invites my ſovereign aid, lo! here I come,
" The bulwark of your fame, though ſcarce my brows
" Are dry from glorious toils, juſt now atchiev'd,
" To vindicate your worth. Lo! here I ſwear,

" By all my great forefathers fair renown,
" By that illuſtrious wicker, where they ſat
" In comely pride, and in triumphant ſloth
" Gave law to paſſive clowns; or on this ſpot
" In glory's prime, young Hobbinol expires,
" And from his deareſt Ganderetta's arms
" Sinks to death's cold embrace; or by this hand
" That ſtranger, big with inſolence, ſhall fall
" Prone on the ground, and do your honour right."

Forthwith the hilts he ſeiz'd; but on his arm
Fond Ganderetta hung, and round his neck
Curl'd in a ſoft embrace. Honour and love
A doubtful conteſt wag'd, but from her ſoon
He ſprung relentleſs, all her tears were vain.
Yet oft he turn'd, oft ſigh'd, thus pleaſing mild:
" Ill ſhould I merit theſe imperial robes,
" Enſigns of majeſty, by general voice
" Conferr'd, ſhould pain, or death itſelf, avail
" To ſhake the ſteady purpoſe of my ſoul.
" Peace, fair-one! peace! Heaven will protect the man,
" By thee held dear, and crown thy generous love."
Her from the liſted field the matrons ſage
Reluctant drew, and with fair ſpeeches ſooth'd.

Now front to front the fearleſs champions meet;
Gorgonius, like a tower, whoſe cloudy top
Invades the ſkies, ſtood lowering; far beneath
The ſtrippling Hobbinol with careful eye
Each opening ſcans, and each unguarded ſpace
Meaſures intent. While, negligently bold,
The bulky combatant, whoſe heart elate
Diſdain'd his puny foe, now fondly deem'd
At one deciſive ſtroke to win, unhurt,
An eaſy victory; down came at once
The ponderous plant, with fell malicious rage,
Aim'd at his head direct; but the tough hilts,
Swift interpos'd, elude his effort vain.
The cautious Hobbinol, with ready feet,
Now ſhifts his ground, retreating; then again
Advances bold, and his unguarded ſhins
Batters ſecure: Each well-directed blow
Bites to the quick; thick as the falling hail,
The ſtrokes redoubled peal his hollow ſides:
The multitude amaz'd with horror view
The rattling ſtorm, ſhrink back at every blow,
And ſeem to feel his wounds; inly he groan'd,
And gnaſh'd his teeth, and from his blood-ſhot eye
Red lightning flaſh'd; the fierce tumultuous rage
Shook all his mighty fabric; once again
Erect he ſtands, collected, and reſolv'd
To conquer, or to die: ſwift as the bolt
Of angry Jove, the weighty plant deſcends.
But wary Hobbinol, whoſe watchful eye
Perceiv'd his kind intent, ſlip'd on one ſide
Declining; the vain ſtroke from ſuch an height,
With ſuch a force impell'd, headlong drew down
Th' unwieldy champion: on the ſolid ground
He fell rebounding breathleſs, and aſtunn'd,
His trunk extended lay; ſore maim'd from out
His heaving breaſt, he belch'd a crimſon flood.
Full leiſurely he roſe, but conſcious ſhame
Of honour loſt his failing ſtrength renew'd.
Rage, and revenge, and ever-during hate,
Blacken'd his ſtormy front; raſh, furious, blind,
And laviſh of his blood, of random ſtrokes
He laid on load; without deſign or art
Onward he preſs'd outrageous, while his foe
Encircling wheels, or inch by inch retires,
Wiſe niggard of his ſtrength. Yet all thy care,
O Hobbinol! avail'd not to prevent
One hapleſs blow; o'er his ſtrong guard the plant
Lapp'd pliant, and its knotty point impreſs'd
His nervous chine; he wreath'd him to and fro
Convolv'd, yet, thus diſtreſs'd, intrepid bore
His hilts aloft, and guarded well his head.
So when th' unwary clown, with haſty ſtep,
Cruſhes the folded ſnake, her wounded parts
Groveling ſhe trails along, but her high creſt
Erect ſhe bears; in all its ſpeckled pride,
She ſwells inflam'd, and with her forky tongue
Threatens deſtruction. With like eager haſte,
Th' impatient Hobbinol, whom exceſſive pain
Stung to his heart, a ſpeedy vengeance vow'd,
Nor wanted long the means; a feint he made
With well-diſſembled guile, his batter'd ſhins
Mark'd with his eyes, and menac'd with his plant.
Gorgonius, whoſe long-ſuffering legs ſcarce bore
His cumbrous bulk, to his ſupporters frail
Indulgent, ſoon the friendly hilts oppos'd;
Betray'd, deceiv'd on his unguarded creſt
The ſtroke deluſive fell; a diſmal groan
Burſt from his hollow cheſt; his trembling hands
Forſook the hilts, acroſs the ſpacious ring
Backward he reel'd, the crowd affrighted fly
T' eſcape the falling ruin. But, alas!
'Twas thy hard fate, Twangdillo! to receive
His ponderous trunk: on thee, on helpleſs thee,
Headlong and heavy, the foul monſter fell.
Beneath a mountain's weight, th' unhappy bard
Lay proſtrate, nor was more renown'd thy ſong,
O ſeer of Thrace! nor more ſevere thy fate.
His vocal ſhell, the ſolace and ſupport
Of wretched age, gave one melodious ſcream,
And in a thouſand fragments ſtrew'd the plain.
The nymphs, ſure friends to his harmonious mirth,
Fly to his aid, his hairy breaſt expoſe
To each refreſhing gale, and with ſoft hands
His temples chafe; at their perſuaſive touch
His fleeting ſoul returns; upon his rump
He ſat diſconſolate; but when, alas!
He view'd the ſhatter'd fragments, down again
He ſunk expiring: by their friendly care
Once more reviv'd, he thrice eſſay'd to ſpeak,
And thrice the riſing ſobs his voice ſubdu'd.
Till thus at laſt his wretched plight he mourn'd:
" Sweet inſtrument of mirth! ſole comfort left
" To my declining years! whoſe ſprightly notes
" Reſtor'd my vigour, and renew'd my bloom,
" Soft healing balm to every wounded heart!
" Deſpairing, dying ſwains, from the cold ground
" Uprais'd by thee, at thy melodious call,
" With raviſh'd ears receiv'd the flowing joy.
" Gay pleaſantry, and care-beguiling joke,
" Thy ſure attendants were, and at thy voice
" All nature ſmil'd. But, oh, this hand no more
" Shall touch thy wanton ſtrings, no more with lays
" Alternate, from oblivion dark redeem
" The mighty dead, and vindicate their fame.
" Vain are thy toils, O Hobbinol! and all

" Thy triumphs vain. Who ſhall record, brave man!
" Thy bold exploits? who ſhall thy grandeur tell
" Supreme of Kiftſgate? See thy faithful bard,
" Deſpoil'd, undone. O cover me, ye hills!
" Whoſe vocal clifts were taught my joyous ſong.
" Or thou, fair nymph, Avona, on whoſe banks
" The frolic crowd, led by my numerous ſtrains,
" Their orgies kept, and friſk'd it o'er the green,
" Jocund and gay, while thy remurmuring ſtreams
" Danc'd by, well pleas'd. Oh! let thy friendly waves [curs'd!"
" O'erwhelm a wretch, and hide this head ac-

So plains the reſtleſs Philomel, her neſt,
And callow young, the tender growing hope
Of future harmony, and frail return
For all her cares, to barbarous churls a prey;
Darkling ſhe ſings, the woods repeat her moan.

CANTO III.

THE ARGUMENT.

Good eating expedient for heroes. Homer praiſed for keeping a table. Hobbinol triumphant. Ganderetta's bill of fare. Panegyric upon ale. Goſſiping over a bottle. Compliment to Mr. John Philips. Ganderetta's perplexity diſcovered by Hobbinol; his conſolatory ſpeech; compares himſelf to Guy Earl of Warwick. Ganderetta encouraged, ſtrips for the race; her amiable figure. Fuſca the gypſey, her dirty figure. Tabitha her great reputation for ſpeed; hired to the diſſenting academy at Tewkſbury. A ſhort account of Gamaliel the maſter, and his hopeful ſcholars. Tabitha carries weight. The ſmock race. Tabitha's fall. Fuſca's ſhort triumph, her humiliation. Ganderetta's matchleſs ſpeed. Hobbinol lays the prize at her feet. Their mutual triumph. The viciſſitude of human affairs, experienced by Hobbinol. Mopſa, formerly his ſervant, with her two children, appears to him. Mopſa's ſpeech; aſſaults Ganderetta; her flight. Hobbinol's prodigious fright; is taken into cuſtody by conſtables, and dragged to Sir Rhadamanth's.

Though ſome of old, and ſome of modern date,
Penurious their victorious heroes fed
With barren praiſe alone; yet thou, my muſe!
Benevolent, with more indulgent eyes
Behold th' immortal Hobbinol; reward
With due regalement his triumphant toils.
Let Quixotte's hardy courage, and renown
With Sancho's prudent care be meetly join'd.
O thou of bards ſupreme, Mæonides!
What well-fed heroes grace thy hallow'd page!
Laden with glorious ſpoils, and gay with blood
Of ſlaughter'd hoſts, the victor chief returns.
Whole Troy before him fled, and men and gods
Oppos'd in vain: for the brave man, whoſe arm
Repell'd his country's wrongs, ev'n he, the great
Atrides, king of kings, ev'n he prepares
With his own royal hand the ſumptuous feaſt.
Full to the brim, the brazen cauldrons ſmoke,
Through all the buſy camp the riſing blaze
Atteſt their joy; heroes and kings forego
Their ſtate and pride, and at his elbow wait
Obſequious. On a poliſh'd charger plac'd,
The bulky chine with plenteous fat inlaid,
Of golden hue, magnificently ſhines
The choiceſt morſels ſever'd to the gods,
The hero next, well paid for all his wounds,
The rich repaſt divides with Jove; from out
The ſparkling bowl he draws the generous wine,
Unmix'd, unmeaſur'd; with unſtinted joy
His heart o'erflows. In like triumphant port
Sat the victorious Hobbinol; the crowd
Tranſported view, and bleſs their glorious chief:
All Kiftſgate ſounds his praiſe with joint acclaim.
Him every voice, him every knee confeſs,
In merit, as in right, their king. Upon
Their flowery turf, earth's painted lap, are ſpread
The rural dainties; ſuch as nature boon
Preſents with laviſh hand, or ſuch as owe
To Ganderetta's care their grateful taſte
Delicious. For ſhe long ſince prepar'd
To celebrate this day, and with good cheer
To grace his triumphs. Cryſtal gooſeberries
Are pil'd on heaps; in vain the parent tree
Defends her luſcious fruit with pointed ſpears.
The ruby tinctur'd corinth cluſtering hangs,
And emulates the grape; green codlings float
In dulcet creams: nor wants the laſt year's ſtore;
The hardy nut, in ſolid mail ſecure,
Impregnable to winter froſts, repays
Its hoarder's care. The cuſtard's jellied flood
Impatient youth, with greedy joy, devours.
Cheeſecakes and pies, in various forms uprais'd,
In well-built pyramids, aſpiring ſtand.
Black hams, and tongues that ſpeechleſs can perſuade
To ply the briſk carouſe, and cheer the ſoul
With jovial draughts. Nor does the jolly god
Deny his precious gifts; here jocund ſwains,
In uncouth mirth delighted, ſporting quaff
Their native beverage; in the brimming glaſs
The liquid amber ſmiles. Britons, no more
Dread your invading foes; let the falſe Gaul,
Of rule infatiate, potent to deceive,
And great by ſubtile wiles, from the adverſe ſhore
Pour forth his numerous hoſts; Iberia! join
Thy towering fleets, once more aloft diſplay
Thy conſecrated banners, fill thy ſails
With prayers and vows, moſt formidably ſtrong
In holy trumpery, let old Ocean groan
Beneath the proud Armada, vainly deem'd
Invincible; yet fruitleſs all their toils,
Vain every raſh effort, while our fat glebe,
Of barley grain productive, ſtill ſupplies
The flowing treaſure, and with ſums immenſe
Supports the throne; while this rich cordial warms
The farmer's courage, arms his ſtubborn ſoul
With native honour, and reſiſtleſs rage.
Thus vaunt the crowd, each freeborn heart o'erflows
With Britain's glory, and his country's love.
Here, in a merry knot combin'd, the nymphs
Pour out mellifluous ſtreams, the balmy ſpoils
Of the laborious bee. The modeſt maid
But coyly ſips, and bluſhing drinks, abaſh'd:

Each lover with obſervant eye beholds
Her graceful ſhame, and at her glowing cheeks
Rekindles all his fires, but matrons ſage,
Better experienc'd, and inſtructed well
In midnight myſteries, and feaſt-rites old,
Graſp the capacious bowl; nor ceaſe to draw
The ſpumy nectar. Healths of gay import
Fly merrily about; now Scandal ſly,
Inſinuating, gilds the ſpecious tale
With treacherous praiſe, and with a double face
Ambiguous wantonneſs demurely ſneers:
Till circling brimmers every veil withdraw,
And dauntleſs impudence appears unmaſk'd.
Others apart, in the cool ſhade retir'd,
Silurian cyder quaff, by that great bard
Enobled, who firſt taught my groveling muſe
To mount aerial. O! could I but raiſe
My feeble voice to his exalted ſtrains,
Or to the height of this great argument,
The generous liquid in each line ſhould bound
Spirituous, nor oppreſſive cork ſubdue
Its foaming rage; but, to the lofty theme
Unequal, muſe, decline the pleaſing taſk.
Thus they luxurious, on the graſſy turf,
Revel'd at large; while nought around was heard
But mirth confus'd, and undiſtinguiſh'd joy,
And laughter far reſounding; ſerious care
Found here no place, to Ganderetta's breaſt
Retiring; there with hopes and fears perplex'd
Her fluctuating mind. Hence the ſoft ſigh
Eſcapes unheeded, ſpight of all her art;
The trembling bluſhes on her lovely cheeks
Alternate ebb and flow; from the full glaſs
She ſlies abſtemious, ſhuns th' untaſted feaſt:
But careful Hobbinol, whoſe amorous eye
From her's ne'er wander'd, haunting ſtill the place
Where his dear treaſure lay, diſcover'd ſoon
Her ſecret woe, and bore a lover's part.
Compaſſion melts his ſoul, her glowing cheeks
He kiſs'd, enamour'd, and her panting heart
He preſs'd to his; then with theſe ſoothing words,
Tenderly ſmiling, her faint hopes reviv'd.
" Courage, my fair! the ſplendid prize is thine.
" Indulgent fortune will not damp our joys,
" Nor blaſt the glories of this happy day.
" Hear me, ye ſwains! ye men of Kiftſgate! hear:
" Though great the honours by your hands conferr'd,
" Theſe royal ornaments, though great the force
" Of this puiſſant arm, as all muſt own,
" Who ſaw this day the bold Gorgonius fall;
" Yet were I more renown'd for feats of arms,
" And knightly proweſs, than that mighty Guy,
" So fam'd in antique ſong, Warwick's great earl,
" Who ſlew the giant Colbrand, in fierce fight
" Maintain'd a ſummer's day, and freed this realm
" From Daniſh vaſſalage; his ponderous ſword,
" And maſſy ſpear, atteſt the glorious deed;
" Nor leſs his hoſpitable ſoul is ſeen
" In that capacious cauldron, whoſe large freight
" Might feaſt a province; yet were I like him,
" The nation's pride, like him I could forego
" All earthly grandeur, wander through the world
" A jocund pilgrim in the loneſome den,
" And rocky cave, with theſe my royal hands
" Scoop the cold ſtreams with herbs and roots content,
" Mean ſuſtenance; could I by this but gain
" For the dear fair, the prize her heart deſires.
" Believe me, charming maid! I'd be a worm,
" The meaneſt inſect, and the loweſt thing
" The world deſpiſes, to enchance thy fame."
So cheer'd he his fair queen, and ſhe was cheer'd.
Now with a noble confidence inſpir'd,
Her looks aſſure ſucceſs, now ſtripp'd of all
Her cumbrous veſtments, beauty's vain diſguiſe,
She ſhines unclouded in her native charms.
Her plaited hair behind her in a brede
Hung careleſs, with becoming grace each bluſh
Varied her cheeks, than the gay riſing dawn
More lovely, when the new-born light ſalutes
The joyful earth, impurpling half the ſkies.
Her heaving breaſt, through the thin covering view'd,
Fix'd each beholder's eye; her taper thighs,
And lineaments exact, would mock the ſkill
Of Phidias; nature alone can form
Such due proportion. To compare with her,
Oread, or Dryad, or of Delia's train,
Fair virgin huntreſs, for the chaſe array'd,
With painted quiver and unerring bow,
Were but to leſſen her ſuperior mien,
And goddeſs-like deport. The maſter's hand,
Rare artiſan! with proper ſhades improves
His lively colouring; ſo here, to grace
Her brighter charms, next her upon the plain
Fuſca the brown appears, with greedy eye
Views the rich prize, her tawny front erects
Audacious, and with her legs unclean,
Booted with grim, and with her freckled ſkin,
Offends the crowd. She of the gypſy train
Had wander'd long, and the ſun's ſcorching rays
Imbrown'd her viſage grim; artful to view
The ſpreading palm, and with vile cant deceive
The love-ſick maid, who barters all her ſtore
For airy viſions and fallacious hope.
Gorgonius, if the current fame ſay true,
Her comrade once, they many a merry prank
Together play'd, and many a mile had ſtroll'd,
For him fit mate. Next Tabitha the tall
Strode o'er the plain, with huge gigantic pace,
And overlook'd the crowd, known far and near
For matchleſs ſpeed; ſhe many a prize had won,
Pride of that neighbouring * mart, for muſtard fam'd,
Sharp-biting grain, where amicably join
The ſiſter floods, and with their liquid arms
Greeting embrace. Here Gamaliel ſage,
Of Cameronian brood, with ruling rod
Trains up his babes of grace, inſtructed well
In all the gainful diſcipline of prayer;
To point the holy leer, by juſt degrees
To cloſe the twinkling eye, t' expand the palms
T' expoſe the whites, and with the ſightleſs ball
To glare upon the crowd, to raiſe or ſink
The docile voice, now murmuring ſoft and low
With inward accent calm, and then again

* Tewkſbury in the vale of Eveſham, where the Avon runs into the Severn.

In foaming floods of rapturous eloquence,
Let loose the storm, and thunder through the nose
The threaten'd vengeance: every muse profane
Is banish'd hence, and, Heliconian streams
Deserted, the fam'd Leman lake supplies
More plenteous draughts, of more divine import.
Hail, happy youths! on whom indulgent Heaven
Each grace divine bestows; nor yet denies
Carnal beatitudes, sweet privilege
Of saints elect! Royal prerogative!
Here in domestic cares employ'd, and bound
To annual servitude, frail Tabitha,
Her pristine vigour lost, now mourns in vain
Her sharpen'd visage, and the sickly qualms
That grieve her soul; a prey to love, while grace
Slept heedless by! Yet her undaunted mind
Still meditates the prize, and still she hopes,
Beneath th' unwieldy load, her wonted speed.
Others of meaner fame the stately muse
Records not; on more lofty flights intent,
She spurns the ground, and mounts her native skies.
Room for the master of the ring; ye swains!
Divide your crowded ranks. See! there on high
The glittering prize, on the tall standard borne,
Waving in air; before him march in files
The rural minstrelsy, the rattling drum
Of solemn sound, and th' animating horn,
Each huntsman's joy; the tabor and the pipe,
Companion dear at feasts, whose cheerful notes
Give life and motion to th' unwieldy clown.
Ev'n age revives, and the pale puking maid
Feels ruddy health rekindling on her cheeks,
And with new vigour trips it o'er the plain.
Counting each careful step, he paces o'er
Th' allotted ground, and fixes at the goal
His standard, there himself majestic swells.
Stretch'd in a line, the panting rivals wait
Th' expected signal, with impatient eyes
Measure the space between, and in conceit
Already grasp the warm contested prize.
Now all at once rush forward to the goal,
And step by step, and side by side, they ply
Their busy feet, and leave the crowd behind.
Quick heaves each breast, and quick they shoot along,
Through the divided air, and bound it o'er the plain.
To this, to that, capricious fortune deals
Short hopes, short fears, and momentary joy.
The breathless throng with open throats pursue,
And broken accents shout imperfect praise.
Such noise confus'd is heard, such wild uproar,
When on the main the swelling surges rise,
Dash o'er the rocks, and, hurrying through the flood,
Drive on each other's backs, and crowd the strand.
Before the rest till Tabitha was seen,
Stretching amain, and whirling o'er the field;
Swift as the shooting star that gilds the night
With rapid transient blaze, she runs, she flies;
Sudden she stops, nor longer can endure
The painful course, but drooping sinks away,
And, like that falling meteor, there she lies
A jelly cold on earth. Fusca, with joy,
Beheld her wretched plight; o'er the pale corse
Insulting bounds; hope gave her wings, and now,
Exerting all her speed, step after step,
At Ganderetta's elbow urg'd her way,
Her shoulder pressing, and with poisonous breath
Tainting her ivory neck. Long while had held
The sharp contest, had not propitious Heaven,
With partial hands, to such transcendent charms
Dispens'd its favours. For as o'er the green
The careless gypsy, with incautious speed,
Push'd forward, and her rival fair had reach'd
With equal pace, and only not o'erpass'd;
Haply she treads, where late the merry train,
In wasteful luxury, and wanton joy,
Lavish had spilt the cyder's frothy flood,
And mead with custard mix'd. Surpris'd, appall'd,
And in the treacherous puddle struggling long,
She slipp'd, she fell, upon her back supine
Extended lay; the laughing multitude
With noisy scorn approv'd her just disgrace.
As the sleek leveret skims before the pack,
So flies the nymph, and so the crowd pursue.
Borne on the wings of wind, the dear one flies,
Swift as the various goddess, nor less bright
In beauty's prime; when through the yielding air
She darts along, and with refracted rays
Paints the gay clouds; celestial messenger,
Charg'd with the high behests of Heaven's great queen!
Her at the goal with open arms receiv'd
Fond Hobbinol; with active leap he seiz'd
The costly prize, and laid it at her feet.
Then pausing stood, dumb with excess of joy,
Expressive silence! for each tender glance
Betray'd the raptures that his tongue conceal'd.
Less mute the crowd, in echoing shouts, applaud
Her speed, her beauty, his obsequious love.
Upon a little eminence, whose top
O'erlook'd the plain, a steep, but short ascent,
Plac'd in a chair of state, with garlands crown'd,
And loaded with the fragrance of the spring,
Fair Ganderetta shone; like mother Eve
In her gay sylvan lodge, delicious bower!
Where nature's wanton hand, above the reach
Of rule, or art, had lavish'd all her store,
To deck the flowery roof; and at her side,
Imperial Hobbinol, with front sublime,
Great as a Roman consul, just return'd
From cities sack'd, and provinces laid waste,
In his paternal wicker lat, enthron'd.
With eager eyes the crowd about them press,
Ambitious to behold the happy pair.
Each voice, each instrument, proclaims their joy
With loudest vehemence: such noise is heard,
Such a tumultuous din, when, at the call
Of Britain's sovereign, the rustic bands
O'erspread the fields; the subtle candidates
Dissembled homage pay, and court the fools
Whom they despise; each proud majestic clown
Looks big, and shouts amain, mad with the taste
Of power supreme, frail empire of a day!
That with the setting sun extinct is lost.
Nor is thy grandeur, mighty Hobbinol
Of longer date. Short is, alas! the reign
Of mortal pride; we play our parts a while,
And strut upon the stage; the scene is chang'd,
And offers us a dungeon for a throne.

Wretched viciſſitude! for, after all
His tinſel dreams of empire and renown,
Fortune, capricious dame, withdraws at once
The goodly proſpect, to his eyes preſents
Her, whom his conſcious ſoul abhorr'd, and fear'd.
Lo! puſhing through the crowd, a meagre form,
With haſty ſtep, and viſage incompos'd!
Wildly ſhe ſtar'd; rage ſparkled in her eyes,
And poverty ſat ſhrinking on her cheeks.
Yet through the cloud that hung upon her brows,
A faded luſtre broke, that dimly ſhone
Shorn of its beams, the ruins of a face,
Impair'd by time, and ſhatter'd by misfortunes.
A froward babe hung at her flabby breaſt,
And tugg'd for life; but wept, with hideous moan,
His fruſtrate hopes, and unavailing pains.
Another o'er her bending ſhoulder peep'd,
Swaddled around with rags of various hue.
He kens his comrade twin with envious eye,
As of his ſhare defrauded; then amain
He alſo ſcreams, and to his brother's cries
In doleful concert joins his loud laments.
O dire effect of lawleſs love! O ſting
Of pleaſure paſt! As when a full-freight ſhip,
Bleſt in a rich return of pearls or gold,
Or fragrant ſpice, or ſilks of coſtly dye,
Makes to the wiſh'd-for port with ſwelling ſails,
And all her gaudy trim diſplay'd; o'erjoy'd
The maſter ſmiles; but if from ſome ſmall creek,
A lurking corſair the rich quarry ſpies,
With all her ſails bears down upon her prey,
And pales of thunder from her hollow ſides
Check his triumphant courſe; aghaſt he ſtands
Stiffen'd with fear, unable to reſiſt,
And impotent to fly; all his fond hopes
Are daſh'd at once! nought now, alas! remains
But the ſad choice of ſlavery or death!
So far'd it with the hapleſs Hobbinol,
In the full blaze of his triumphant joy
Surpris'd by her, whoſe dreadful face alone
Could ſhake his ſtedfaſt ſoul. In vain he turns,
And ſhifts his place averſe; ſhe haunts him ſtill,
And glares upon him, with her haggard eyes,
That fiercely ſpoke her wrongs. Words ſwell'd with ſighs
At length burſt forth, and thus ſhe ſtorms enrag'd.
" Know'ſt thou not me? falſe man! not to " know me
" Argues thyſelf unknowing of thyſelf,
" Puff'd up with pride, and bloated with ſucceſs.
" Is injur'd Mopſa then ſo ſoon forgot?
" Thou knew'ſt me once, ah! woe is me! thou " didſt.
" But if laborious days and ſleepleſs nights,
" If hunger, cold, contempt, and penury,
" Inſeparable gueſts, have thus diſguis'd
" Thy once-belov'd, thy handmaid dear; if thine
" And fortune's frowns have blaſted all my charms;
" If here no roſes grow, no lilies bloom,
" Nor rear their heads on this neglected face;
" If through the world I range a ſlighted ſhade,
" The ghoſt of what I was, forlorn, unknown;
" At leaſt know theſe. See! this ſweet ſimpering " babe,
" Dear image of thyſelf; ſee! how it ſprunts
" With joy at thy approach! ſee, how it gilds
" Its ſoft ſmooth face, with falſe paternal ſmiles!
" Native deceit, from thee, baſe man, deriv'd!
" Or view this other elf, in every art
" Of ſmiling fraud, in every treacherous leer,
" The very Hobbinol! ah! cruel man!
" Wicked, ingrate! and could'ſt thou then ſo " ſoon,
" So ſoon forget that pleaſing fatal night,
" When me, beneath the flowery thorn ſurpris'd
" Thy artful wiles betray'd? was there a ſtar,
" By which thou didſt not ſwear? was there a " curſe,
" A plague on earth, thou didſt not then invoke
" On that devoted head; if e'er thy heart
" Prov'd haggard to my love, if e'er thy hand
" Declin'd the nuptial bond? but, oh! too well,
" Too well, alas! my throbbing breaſt perceiv'd
" The black impending ſtorm; the conſcious " moon
" Veil'd in a ſable cloud her modeſt face,
" And boding owls proclaim'd the dire event.
" And yet I love thee.—Oh! could'ſt thou behold
" That image dwelling in my heart! but why,
" Why waſte I here theſe unavailing tears?
" On this thy minion, on this tawdry thing.
" On this gay victim, thus with garlands crown'd,
" All, all my vengeance fall! ye lightnings, blaſt
" That face accurs'd, the ſource of all my woe!
" Arm, arm, ye furies! arm; all hell break looſe!
" While thus I lead you to my juſt revenge,
" And thus"—Up ſtarts th' aſtoniſh'd Hobbinol
To ſave his better half. " Fly, fly," he cries,
" Fly, my dear life, the fiend's malicious rage."
Borne on the wings of fear, away ſhe bounds,
And in the neighbouring village pants forlorn.
So the cours'd hare to the cloſe covert flies,
Still trembling, though ſecure. Poor Hobbinol
More grievous ills attend: around him preſs
A multitude, with huge Herculian clubs,
Terrific band! the royal mandate theſe
Inſulting ſhow: arreſted, and amaz'd,
Half dead he ſtands; no friends dare interpoſe,
But bow dejected to th' imperial ſcroll:
Such is the force of law. While conſcious ſhame
Sits heavy on his brow, they view the wretch
To Rhadamanth's auguſt tribunal dragg'd.
Good Rhadamanth! to every wanton clown
Severe, indulgent to himſelf alone.

THE ſeveral acts of parliament in favour of Falconry are an evident proof of that high eſteem our anceſtors had conceived for this noble diverſion. Our neighbours, France, Germany, Italy, and all the reſt of Europe, have ſeemed to vie with one another, who ſhould pay the greateſt honours to the courageous falcon. Princes and ſtates were her protectors; and men of the greateſt genius, and moſt accompliſhed in all ſorts of literature, with pleaſure carried the hawk on their fiſts. But the princes of Aſia, Turks, Tartars, Perſians, Indians, &c have greatly out-done us Europeans in the ſplendor and magnificence of their field-parades, both as huntſmen and falconers. For though the deſcription of flying at the ſtag and other wild beaſts with eagles, may be thought a little incredible, yet permit me to aſſure the reader that it is no fiction, but a real fact. All the ancient books of falconry give us an account of it, and the relations of travellers confirm it. But what I think puts it out of all diſpute, is the deſcription the famous Monſieur de Thou has given us in his Latin poem, " De Re Accipitrariâ," lately reprinted at Venice in 1735, with an Italian tranſlation and notes.

" Hoc ſtudio Hæmonii circumſonat aula tyranni,
" Tercentum illi equites, quoties venabula poſcit,
" Tot pedites adſunt: longo nemus omne remugit
" Latrantum occurſu, venatorumque repulſis
" Vocibus; hæic gemini, neque enim ſatis eſſe
" ferendo
" Unus tanto oneri poſſit, cedente petauro
" Circum aquilam geſtant, aliam totidem inde
" miniſtri
" Impoſitam ſubeunt: quarum minor illa vulucri
" Ore canum voces fingit, nemora avia complens
" Terrore ingenti: latebris tum excita repentè
" Infelix fera prorumpit: ruit altera demum
" Sublimis compar magno ſtridore per auras;
" Involat inque oculos et provolat, atque capaces
" Expandens per inane ſinus, caligine denſâ,
" Horribilique ſupervolitans cœlum obruit umbrâ.
" Nec minor intereà obſiſtit: ſublimis ut illa,
" Hæc humilis ſic terga volans premit et latus
" urget:
" Neve gradum referat tetrò, et veſtigia vertat,
" Seu caprea aut cervus ſeſe tulit obvius illis,
" Roſtro atque ungue minax vetat, et cum com-
" pare vires
" Alternat ſocias, artemque remunerat arte.
" Nec mora, nec requies: furiis exterrita tantis
" Donec in inſidias cæcâ convalle locatas
" Precipitet rabidis fera mox lanianda Moloſſis."

I am very much obliged to thoſe gentlemen who have read with favour my poem upon hunting: their goodneſs has encouraged me to make this ſhort ſupplement to the Chaſe, and in this poem to give them ſome account of all the more polite entertainments of the field.

THE ARGUMENT.

Introduction, ver. 1. Deſcription of flying at the ſtag with eagles, after the manner of the Aſiatic princes, 7. Deſcription of hern-hawking, 109. Of flying at the river, 179. Partridge-hawking, 232. Daring the lark with an hobby juſt mentioned, 235. Shooting flying, 241. Setting, 245, Angling, 261. Concluſion, 271.

ONCE more, Great Prince, permit an humble bard
Proſtrate to pay his homage at your feet;
Then, like the morning lark from the low ground
Towering aloft, ſublime to ſoar, and ſing;
Sing the heart-cheering pleaſure of the fields,
The choice delight of heroes and of kings.
In earlier times, monarchs of eaſtern race
In their full blaze of pride, as ſtory tells,
Train'd up th' imperial eagle, ſacred bird!
Hooded, with jingling bells, ſhe perch'd on high;
Not as when erſt on golden wings ſhe led

The Roman legions o'er the conquer'd globe,
Mankind her quarry; but a docile ſlave,
Tam'd to the lure, and careful to attend
Her maſter's voice. Behold the man renown'd,
Abbas the Great (whom all his fawning ſlaves
Deem'd king of kings; vain fools! They ſure forgot
Greater Leonidas, and thoſe fatal ſtraits [heaps Blood-ſtain'd, where ſlaughter'd Perſians fell on
A dreadful carnage!) See his numerous hoſt
Spread wide the plains, and in their front upborne
Each on her perch, that bends beneath her weight,
Two ſiſter eagles, ſtately ponderous birds!
The air's a deſert, and the feather'd race
Fly to the neighbouring coverts dark retreats.
The royal pair on wing, this whirls around
In circles wide, or like the ſwallow ſkims
The ruſſet plain, and mimics as ſhe flies
(By many a ſleepleſs night inſtructed well)
The hound's loud openings, or the ſpaniel's queſt.
What cannot wakeful induſtry ſubdue!
Mean while that mounts on high, and ſeems to view
A black aſcending cloud; when pierc'd the gloom
Of vapours dank condens'd, the ſun's bright beams
Pain not her ſight: ſhe with expanded ſails
Works through th' etherial fluid; then perhaps
Sees through a break of clouds this ſelf-pois'd orb
Hard by her hand-maid moon. She looks beneath
Contemptuous, and beholds from far this earth,
This mole-hill earth, and all its buſy ants
Labouring for life, which laſts ſo ſhort a day
Juſt blazing and extinct. So thou, my ſoul,
That breath of life, which all men muſt perceive
But none diſtinctly know, when once eſcap'd
From this poor helpleſs corſe, and when on high
Borne on angelic wings, look down with ſcorn
On this mean leſſening world, and knaves grown rich;
By chance, or fraud, or inſolence of power.
Now from her higheſt pitch, by quick degrees,
With leſs ambition nearer earth ſhe tends,
As yet ſcarce viſible; and high in air
Pois'd on extended wings, with ſharper ken
Attentive marks whate'er is done below.
Thus ſome wiſe general from a riſing ground
Obſerve th' embattled foe, where ſerried ranks
Forbid acceſs, or where their order looſe
Invites th' attack, and points the way to fate.
All now is tumult, each heart ſwells with joy,
The falconers ſhout, and the wide concave rings,
Tremble the foreſts round, the joyous cries
Float through the vales; and rocks, and woods, and hills
Return the varied ſounds. Forth burſts the ſtag,
Nor truſts the mazes of his deep receſs:
Fear hid him cloſe, ſtrange inconſiſtent guide!
Now hurries him aghaſt, with buſy feet
Far o'er the ſpacious plain; he pants to reach
The mountain's brow, or with unſteady ſtep
To climb the craggy cliff: the gray-hounds ſtrain
Behind to pinch his haunch, who ſcarce evades
Their gaping jaws. One eagle wheeling flies
In airy labyrinths, or with eaſier wing
Skims by his ſide, and ſtuns his patient ear
With hideous cries, then peals his forehead broad,
Or at her eyes his fatal malice aims.
The other, like the bolt of angry heaven,
Darts down at once, and fixes on his back
Her griping talons, ploughing with her beak
His pamper'd chine: the blood, and ſweat diſtill'd
From many a dripping furrow, ſtains the ſoil.
Who pities not this fury-haunted wretch
Embarraſs'd thus, on every ſide diſtreſs'd?
Death will relieve him: for the gray-hounds fierce,
Seizing their prey, ſoon drag him to the ground:
Groaning he falls; with eyes that ſwim in tears
He looks on man, chief author of his woe,
And weeps, and dies. The grandees preſs around
To dip their ſabres in his boiling blood;
Unſeemly joy! 'Tis barbarous to inſult
A fallen foe. The dogs, and birds of prey
Inſatiate, on his reeking bowels feaſt,
But the ſtern falconer claims the lion's ſhare.
Such are the ſports of kings, and better far
Than royal robbery, and the bloody jaws
Of all devouring war. Each animal,
By natural inſtinct taught, ſpares his own kind:
But man, the tyrant man, revels at large,
Free-booter unreſtrain'd, deſtroys at will
The whole creation, men and beaſts his prey,
Theſe for his pleaſure, for his glory thoſe.
Next will I ſing the valiant falcon's fame
Aerial fights, where no confederate brute
Joins in the bloody fray; but bird with bird
Juſts in mid air. Lo! at his ſiege the hern,
Upon the bank of ſome ſmall purling brook,
Obſervant ſtands to take his ſcaly prize,
Himſelf another's game. For mark behind
The wily falconer creeps; his grazing horſe
Conceals the treacherous foe, and on his fiſt
Th' unhooded falcon ſits: with eager eyes
She meditates her prey, and, in her wild
Conceit, already plumes the dying bird.
Up ſprings the hern, redoubling every ſtroke,
Conſcious of danger ſtretches far away,
With buſy pennons and projected beak,
Piercing th' opponent clouds: the falcon ſwift
Follows at ſpeed, mounts as he mounts, for hope
Gives vigour to her wings. Another ſoon
Strains after to ſupport the bold attack,
Perhaps a third. As in ſome winding creek,
On proud Iberia's ſhore, the corſairs fly
Lurk waiting to ſurpriſe a Britiſh ſail,
Full freighted from Hetruria's friendly ports,
Or rich Byzantium; after he they ſcud,
Daſhing the ſpumy waves with equal oars,
And ſpreading all their ſhrouds; ſhe makes the main
Inviting every gale, nor yet forgets
To clear her deck, and tell th' inſulting foe,
In peals of thunder, Britons cannot fear.
So flies the hern purſu'd, but fighting flies.
Warm grows the conflict, every nerve's employ'd;
Now through the yielding element they ſoar
Aſpiring high, then ſink at once, and rove
In trackleſs mazes through the troubled ſky.
No reſt, no peace. The falcon hovering flies
Balanc'd in air, and confidently bold
Hangs o'er him like a cloud, then aims her blow.

Full at his destin'd head. The watchful hern
Shoots from her like a blazing meteor swift
That gilds the night, eludes her talons keen
And pointed beak, and gains a length of way.
Observe th' attentive crowd; all hearts are fix'd
On this important war, and pleasing hope
Glows in each breast. The vulgar and the great,
Equally happy now, with freedom share
The common joy. The shepherd-boy forgets
His bleating care; the labouring hind lets fall
His grain unsown; in transport lost, he robs
Th' expecting furrow, and in wild amaze
The gazing village point their eyes to heaven.
Where is the tongue can speak the falconer's cares,
'Twixt hopes and fears, as in a tempest tost?
His fluttering heart, his varying cheeks confess
His inward woe. Now like a wearied stag,
That stands at bay, the hern provokes their rage;
Close by his languid wing, in downy plumes
Covers his fatal beak, and cautious hides
The well-dissembled fraud. The falcon darts
Like lightning from above, and in her breast
Receives the latent death; down plum she falls
Bounding from earth, and with her trickling gore
Defiles her gaudy plumage. See, alas!
The falconer in despair, his favourite bird
Dead at his feet, as of his dearest friend
He weeps her fate; he meditates revenge,
He storms, he foams, he gives a loose to rage:
Nor wants he long the means; the hern fatigu'd,
Borne down by numbers yields, and prone on earth
He drops: his cruel foes wheeling around
Insult at will. The vengeful falconer flies
Swift as an arrow shooting to their aid;
Then muttering inward curses breaks his wings,
And fixes in the ground his hated beak;
Sees with malignant joy the victors proud
Smear'd with his blood, and on his marrow feast.

Unhappy bird! our fathers' prime delight!
Who fenc'd thine eyrie round with sacred laws.
Nor mighty princes now disdain to wear
Thy waving crest, the mark of high command,
With gold, and pearl, and brillant gems adorn'd.
Now, if the crystal stream delight thee more,
Sportsman, lead on, where through the reedy bank
Th' insinuating waters filter'd stray
In many a winding maze. The wild-duck there
Gluts on the fattening ouse, or steals the spawn
Of teeming shoals, her more delicious feast.
How do the sun-beams on the glassy plain
Sport wanton and amuse our wondering eyes
With variously-reflected changing rays!
The murmuring stream salutes the flowery mead
That glows with fragrance; nature all around
Consents to bless. What sluggard now would sink
In beds of down? what miser would not leave
His bags untold for this transporting scene?
Falconer, take care, oppose thy well-train'd steed,
And slily stalk; unhood thy falcon bold,
Observe at feed the unsuspecting team
Paddling with oary feet: he's seen, they fly.
Now at full speed the falconer spurs away
T' assist his favourite hawk, she from the rest
Has singled out the mallard young and gay,
Whose green and azure brightens in the sun.
Swift as the wind that sweeps the desert plain,
With feet, wings, beak, he cuts the liquid sky:
Behoves him now both oar and sail; for see
Th' unequal foe gains on him as he flies.
Long holds th' aërial course; they rise, they fall,
Now skim in circling rings, then stretch away
With all their force, till at one fatal stroke
The vigorous hawk, exerting every nerve,
Truss'd in mid-air bears down her captive prey.
'Tis well on earth they fall; for oft the duck
Mistrusts her coward wings, and seeks again
The kind protecting flood: if haply then
The falcon rash aim a decisive blow,
And spring to gripe her floating prey; at once
She dives beneath, and near some osier's root
Pops up her head secure; then views her foe
Just in the grasping of her fond desires,
And in full pride of triumph, whelm'd beneath
The gliding stream. Ah! where are now, proud bird!
Thy stately trappings, and thy silver bells,
Thy glossy plumage, and thy silken crest?
Say, tyrant of the skies! Wouldst thou not now
Exchange with thy but late desponding foe
Thy dreadful talons, and thy polish'd beak,
For her web-feet despis'd? How happy they!
Who, when gay pleasure courts, and fortune smiles,
Fear the reverse, with caution tread those paths
Where roses grow, but wily vipers creep!

These are expensive joys, fit for the great
Of large domains possess'd: enough for me
To boast the gentle spar-hawk on my fist,
Or fly the partridge from the bristly field,
Retrieve the covy with my busy train,
Or with my soaring hobby dare the lark.

But, if the shady woods my cares employ,
In quest of feather'd game, my spaniels beat
Puzzling th' entangled copse; and from the brake
Push forth the whirring pheasant; high in air
He waves his varied plumes, stretching away
With hasty wing. Soon from th' uplifted tube
The mimic thunder bursts, the leaden death
O'ertakes him; and with many a giddy whirl
To earth he falls, and at my feet expires.

When autumn smiles, all beauteous in decay,
And paints each chequer'd grove with various hues;
My setter ranges in the new-shorn fields,
His nose in air erect; from ridge to ridge
Panting he bounds, his quarter'd ground divides
In equal intervals, nor careless leaves
One inch untry'd. At length the tainted gales
His nostrils wide inhale; quick joy elates
His beating heart, which, aw'd by discipline
Severe, he dares not own; but cautious creeps
Low-cowering, step by step; at last attains
His proper distance; there he stops at once,
And points with his instructive nose upon
The trembling prey. On wings of wind upborne
The floating net unfolded flies; then drops,
And the poor fluttering captives rise in vain.

Or haply on some river's cooling bank,
Patiently musing, all intent I stand
To hook the scaly glutton. See! down sinks
My cork, that faithful monitor; his weight

My taper angle bends; surpris'd, amaz'd,
He glitters in the sun, and struggling pants
For liberty, till in the purer air
He breathes no more. Such are our pleasing cares,
And sweet amusements, such each busy drudge
Envious must wish, and all the wise enjoy.
Thus, most illustrious prince, have I presum'd
In my obscure sojourn to sing at ease
Rural delights, the joy, and sweet repast
Of every noble mind: and now perchance
Untimely sing; since from yon neighbouring shore
The grumbling thunder rolls; calm peace alarm'd
Starts from her couch, and the rude din of war
Sounds harsh in every ear. But righteous heaven!
Britain deserted, friendless, and alone,
Will not as yet despair: shine but in arms,
O prince, belov'd by all! patron profess'd
Of liberty! with every virtue crown'd! [cliffs,
Millions shall crowd her strand; and her white
As Teneriff, or Atlas firm, defy
The break of seas, and malice of her foes;
Nor the proud Gaul prevail where Cæsar fail'd.

NOTES ON FIELD-SPORTS.

Ver. 18. Straits of Thermopylæ. See the story of Xerxes.

Ver. 103. The place where the hern takes his stand, watching his prey.

Ver. 169. This is done to prevent his hurting the hawk: they generally also break their legs.

Ver. 172. The reward of the hawk made of the brains, marrow, and blood, which they call in Italian, Soppa.

Ver. 174. No man was permitted to shoot within 600 yards of the eyrie, or nest of an hern, under great penalties.

Ver. 176. The hern's top worn at coronations here, and by the great men in Asia in their turbans.

OCCASIONAL POEMS, TRANSLATIONS, FABLES, AND TALES.

"Dum nihil habemus majus, calamo ludimus." PHÆD.

TO WILLIAM SOMERVILE

OF WARWICKSHIRE, ESQ.

On reading several of his Excellent Poems. By Allan Ramsay.

Sir, I have read, and much admire,
Your muse's gay and easy flow,
Warm'd with that true Idalian fire
That gives the bright and cheerful glow.

I conn'd each line with joyous care,
As I can such from sun to sun;
And, like the glutton o'er his fare
Delicious, thought them too soon done.

The witty smile, nature and art,
In all your numbers so combine,
As to complete their just desert,
And grace them with uncommon shine.

Delighted we your muse regard,
When she like Pindar's spreads her wings;
And virtue, being its own reward,
Expresses by the sister springs.

Emotions tender crowd the mind,
When with the royal bard you go,
To sigh in notes divinely kind,
"The mighty fall'n on mount Gilbo."

Much surely was the virgin's joy,
Who with the Iliad had your lays;
For e'er, and since the siege of Troy,
We all delight in love and praise.

These heaven-born passions, such desire,
I never yet could think a crime;
But first-rate virtues which inspire
The soul to reach at the sublime.

But often men mistake the way,
And pump for fame by empty boast,
Like your "gilt ass," who stood to bray,
Till in a flame his tail he lost.

Him "th' incurious Bencher" hits,
With his own tale, so tight and clean,
That, while I read, streams gush, by fits
Of hearty laughter, from my een.

Old Chaucer, bard of vast ingine,
Fontaine and Prior, who have sung
Blyth tales the best; had they heard thine
On Lob, they'd own'd themselves out-done.

The plot's pursued with so much glee,
The too officious "dog and priest,"
The "squire oppress'd," I own for me,
I never heard a better jest.

Pope well describ'd an omber game,
And "King revenging captive queen;"
He merits; but had won more fame,
If author of your "Bowling-green."

You paint your parties, play each bowl,
So natural, just, and with such ease,
That, while I read, upon my soul!
I wonder how I chance to please.

Yet I have pleas'd, and pleaſe the beſt;
And ſure to me laurels belong,
Since Britiſh fair, and 'mongſt the beſt,
Somervile's conſort likes my ſong.

Raviſh'd I heard th' harmonious fair
Sing, like a dweller of the ſky,
My verſes with a Scotian air;
Then ſaints were not ſo bleſt as I.

In her the valued charms unite;
She really is what all would ſeem,
Gracefully handſome, wiſe and ſweet:
'Tis merit to have her eſteem.

Your noble kinſman, her lov'd mate,
Whoſe worth claims all the world's reſpect,
Met in her love a ſmiling fate,
Which has, and muſt have, good effect.

You both from one great lineage ſpring,
Both from de Somervile, who came,
With William, England's conquering king,
To win fair plains, and laſting fame.

Whichnour he left to's eldeſt ſon;
That firſt-born chief you repreſent:
His ſecond came to Caledon,
From whom our Somer'le takes deſcent.

On him and you may fate beſtow
Sweet balmy health and cheerful fire,
As long's ye'd wiſh to live below,
Still bleſt with all you would deſire.

O ſir! oblige the world, and ſpread
In print thoſe and your other lays;
This ſhall be better'd while they read,
And after-ages ſound your praiſe.

I could enlarge—but if I ſhould
On what you've wrote, my ode would run
Too great a length—Your thoughts ſo crowd,
To note them all, I'd ne'er have done.

Accept this offering of a muſe,
Who on her Pictland hills ne'er tires:
Nor ſhould (when worth invites) refuſe
To ſing the perſon ſhe admires.

AN ODE.

Humbly inſcribed to the Duke of Marlborough, upon his Removal from all his Places.

" Virtus repulſæ neſcia ſordidæ
" Intaminatis fulget honoribus,
" Nec ſumit, aut ponit ſecures,
" Arbitrio popularis auræ."
HOR.

When, in meridian glory bright,
You ſhine with more illuſtrious rays,
Above the muſe's weaker flight,
Above the poet's praiſe.
In vain the goddeſs mounts her native ſkies,
In vain, with feeble wings, attempts to riſe;
In vain ſhe toils to do her hero right,
Loſt in exceſs of day, and boundleſs tracks of light.
The Theban ſwan with daring wings,
And force impetuous, ſoars on high,
Above the clouds ſublimely ſings,
Above the reach of mortal eye.
But what, alas! would Pindar do,
Were his bold muſe to ſing of you?
Can Chromius' ſtrength be nam'd with yours?
Can mimic fights and ſportive war
With Schellembergh's demoliſh'd towers,
Or Blenheim's bloody field compare?
The bard would bluſh at Theron's ſpeed,
When Marlborough mounts the fiery ſteed;
And the deſpairing foe's purſued
Through towns and provinces ſubdued.
Fond poet, ſpare thy empty boaſt,
In vain thy chariots raiſe ſo great a duſt;
See Britain's hero with whole armies flies,
To execute his vaſt deſigns,
To paſs the Scheld, to force the lines,
Swift as thy ſmoking car, to win th' Olympic prize.
But now, when, with diminiſh'd light,
And beams more tolerably bright,
With leſs of grandeur and ſurpriſe,
Mild you deſcend to mortal eyes;
Your ſetting glories charm us more,
Than all your dazzling pomp before.
Your worth is better underſtood,
The hero more diſtinctly view'd,
Glad we behold him not ſo great as good.
True virtue's amiable face
Improves, when ſhaded by diſgrace;
A lively ſenſe of conſcious worth,
Calls all her hidden beauties forth;
Darts through the gloom a lovely ray,
And, by her own intrinſic light, creates a nobler day.

Let fickle chance with partial hands divide
Her gaudy pomp, her tinſel pride;
Who to her knaves and fools ſupplies
Thoſe favours which the brave deſpiſe.
Let faction raiſe the ſaucy crowd,
And call her multitude to arms;
Let envy's vipers hiſs aloud,
And rouſe all hell with dire alarms:
Go ſhake the rocks, and bid the hills remove;
Yet ſtill the hero's mind ſhall be
Unchangeable, reſolv'd, and free,
Fix'd on its baſe, firm as the throne of Jove.
Britons, look back on thoſe auſpicious days,
On Iſter's banks when your great leader ſtood,
And with your gaſping foes incumber'd all the flood.
Or when Ramillia's bloody plain
Was fatten'd with the mighty ſlain;
Or when Blaregnia's ramparts were aſſail'd,
With force that heaven itſelf had ſcal'd.
Did then reviling pens profane
Your Marlborough's ſacred name?
Did noiſy tribunes then debauch the crowd?
Did their unrighteous votes blaſpheme aloud?
Did mercenary tools conſpire
To curſe the hero whom their foes admire?
No!—The contending nations ſung his praiſe;
While bards of every clime
Exert their moſt triumphant lays,
No thought too great, no diction too ſublime.
Hail, glorious prince! 'tis not for thee we grieve,
For thy invulnerable fame

No diminution can receive,
Thou, mighty man! art ſtill the ſame,
Thy purer gold eludes the flame;
This fiery trial makes thy virtue ſhine,
And perſecution crowns thy brows with rays divine.
But what, alas! ſhall fainting Europe do?
How ſtand the ſhock of her imperious foe?
What ſucceſſor ſhall bear the weight
Of all our cares? and prop the ſtate?
Since thou our Atlas art remov'd,
O beſt deſerving chief! and therefore beſt belov'd?

To your own Blenheim's bliſsful ſeat,
From this ungrateful world retreat;
A gift unequal to that hero's worth,
Who from the peaceful Thames led our bold Britons forth,
To free the Danube and the Rhine;
Who by the thunder of his arms
Shook the proud Rhône with loud alarms,
And rais'd a tempeſt in the trembling Seine.
After the long fatigues of war,
Repoſe your envy'd virtues here;
Enjoy, my lord, the ſweet repaſt
Of all your glorious toils,
A pleaſure that ſhall ever laſt,
The mighty comfort that proceeds
From the juſt ſenſe of virtuous deeds, [ſpoils
Content with endleſs fame, contemn the meaner
Pomona calls, and Pan invites,
To rural pleaſures, chaſte delights;
The orange and the citron grove
Will by your hand alone improve;
Would fain their gaudy liveries wear,
And wait your preſence to revive the year.
In this Elyſium, more than bleſt,
Laugh at the vulgar's ſenſeleſs hate,
The politician's vain deceit,
The fawning knave, the proud ingrate.
Revolve in your capacious breaſt
The various unforeſeen events,
And unexpected accidents, [great.
That change the flatt'ring ſcene, and overturn the
Frail are our hopes, and ſhort the date
Of grandeur's tranſitory ſtate.
Corinthian braſs ſhall melt away,
And Parian marble ſhall decay;
The vaſt Coloſſus, that on either ſhore
Exulting ſtood, is now no more;
Arts and artificers ſhall die,
And in one common ruin lie.
Behold your own majeſtic palace riſe,
In haſte to emulate the ſkies;
The gilded globes, the pointed ſpires:
See the proud dome's ambitious height,
Emblem of power and pompous ſtate,
Above the clouds aſpires:
Yet Vulcan's ſpight, or angry Jove,
May ſoon its towering pride reprove,
Its painted glories ſoon efface,
Divide the ponderous roof, and ſhake the ſolid baſe.
Material ſtructures muſt ſubmit to fate.
But virtue which alone is truly great,
Virtue like yours, my lord, ſhall be
Secure of immortality.

Nor foreign force, nor factious rage,
Nor envy, nor devouring age,
Your laſting glory ſhall impair,
Time ſhall myſterious truths declare,
And works of darkneſs ſhall diſcloſe;
This bleſſing is reſerv'd for you
T' outlive the trophies to your merit due,
And malice of your foes.
If glorious actions, in a glorious cauſe,
If valour negligent of praiſe,
Deſerving, yet retiring from applauſe,
In generous minds can great ideas raiſe:
If Europe ſav'd, and liberty reſtor'd,
By ſteady conduct, and a proſperous ſword,
Can claim in free-born ſouls a juſt eſteem;
Britain's victorious chief ſhall be
Rever'd by late poſterity,
The hero's pattern, and the poet's theme.

ODE,

Occaſioned by the Duke of Marlborough's embarking for Oſtend, An. 1712.

" Interque mœrentes amicos.
" Egregius properavit exul." Hor.

Ye powers, who rule the boundleſs deep,
Whoſe dread commands the winds obey,
To roll the waters on a heap,
Or ſmooth the liquid way:
Propitious hear Britannia's prayer,
Britannia's hope is now your care,
Whom oft to yonder diſtant ſhore,
Your hoſpitable billows bore,
When Europe in diſtreſs implor'd
Relief from his victorious ſword;
Who, when the mighty work was done,
Tyrants repell'd, and battles won,
On your glad waves, proud of the glorious load,
Through theſe your watery realms, in yearly triumph rode.
To winds and ſeas, diſtreſs'd he flies,
From ſtorms at land, and faction's ſpight:
Though the more fickle crowd denies,
The winds, the ſeas, ſhall do his virtue right.
Be hush't, ye winds! be ſtill, ye ſeas!
Ye billows ſleep at eaſe,
And in your rocky caverns reſt!
Let all be calm as the great hero's breaſt.
Here no unruly paſſions reign,
Nor ſervile fear, nor proud diſdain,
Each wilder luſt is baniſh'd hence,
Where gentle love preſides, and mild benevolence.
Here no gloomy cares ariſe,
Conſcious honour ſtill ſupplies,
Friendly hope, and peace of mind,
Such as dying martyrs find.
Serene within, no guilt he knows,
While all his wrongs ſit heavy on his foes.

Say, muſe, what hero ſhall I ſing,
What great example bring,
To parallel this mighty wrong,
And with his graceful woes adorn my ſong?

Shall brave Themiſtocles appear
Before the haughty Perſian's throne?
While conquer'd chiefs confeſs their fear,
And ſhatter'd fleets his triumphs own;
In admiration fix'd, the monarch ſtood,
With ſecret joy, his glorious prize he view'd,
Of more intrinſic worth than provinces ſubdued.
Or faithful Ariſtides, ſent,
For being juſt, to baniſhment,
He writ the rigid ſentence down,
He pitied the miſguided clown.
Or him, who, when brib'd orators miſled
The factious tribes, to hoſtile Sparta fled;
The vile ingrateful crowd,
Proclaim'd their impious joy aloud,
But ſoon the fools diſcover'd to their coſt,
Athens in Alcibiades was loſt.
Or, if a Roman name delight thee more,
The great Dictator's fate deplore,
Camillus againſt noiſy faction bold,
In victories and triumphs old.
Ungrateful Rome!
Puniſh'd by heaven's avenging doom,
Soon ſhall thy ardent vows invite him home,
The mighty chieftain ſoon recall,
To prop the falling capitol,
And ſave his country from the perjur'd Gaul.
Search, muſe, the dark records of time,
And every ſhameful ſtory trace,
Black with injuſtice and diſgrace,
When glorious merit was a crime;
Yet theſe, all theſe, but faintly can expreſs
Folly without excuſe, and madneſs in exceſs.

The nobleſt object that our eyes can bleſs,
Is the brave man triumphant in diſtreſs;
Above the reach of partial fate,
Above the vulgar's praiſe or hate,
Whom no feign'd ſmiles can raiſe, no real frowns
View him, ye Britons, on the naked ſhore,
Reſolv'd to truſt your faithleſs vows no more,
That mighty man! who for ten glorious years
Surpaſs'd our hopes, prevented all our prayers.
A name, in every clime renown'd,
By nations bleſs'd, by monarchs crown'd.
In ſolemn jubilees our days we ſpent,
Our hearts exulting in each grand event.
Factions applaud the man they hate,
And with regret, to pay their painful homage
Have I not ſeen this crowded ſhore,
With multitudes all cover'd o'er?
While hills and groves their joy proclaim,
And echoing rocks return his name.
Attentive to the lovely form they gaze:
He with a cheerful ſmile,
Glad to reviſit this his parent iſle,
Flies from their incenſe, and eſcapes their praiſe.
Yes, Britons, view him ſtill unmov'd,
Unchang'd, though leſs belov'd.
His generous ſoul no deep reſentment fires,
But, bluſhing for his country's crimes, the kind
good man retires.
Ev'n now he fights for this devoted iſle,
And labours to preſerve his native ſoil,
Diverts the vengeance which juſt heaven pre-
Accus'd, diſarm'd, protects us with his prayers.
Obdurate hearts! cannot ſuch merit move?
The hero's valour, nor the patriot's love?
Fly, goddeſs, fly this inauſpicious place;
Spurn at the vile degenerate race,
Attend the glorious exile, and proclaim
In other climes his laſting fame,
Where honeſt hearts, unknowing to forget
The bleſſings from his arms receiv'd,
Confeſs with joy the mighty debt,
Their altars reſcued, and their gods reliev'd.
Nor fails the hero to a clime unknown,
Cities preſerv'd, their great deliverer own:
Impatient crowds about him preſs,
And with ſincere devotion bleſs.
Thoſe plains, of ten years war the bloody ſtage,
(Where panting nations ſtruggled to be free
And life exchang'd for liberty)
Retain the marks of ſtern Bellona's rage.
The doubtful hind miſtakes the field
His fruitleſs toil ſo lately till'd:
Here deep intrenchments ſunk, and vales appear,
The vain retreats of Gallic fear;
There new-created hills deform the plain,
Big with the carnage of the ſlain:
Theſe monuments, when faction's ſpite
Has ſpit its poiſonous foam in vain,
To endleſs ages ſhall proclaim
The matchleſs warrior's might.
The graves of ſlaughter'd foes ſhall do his valour
Theſe when the curious traveller
Amaz'd ſhall view, and with attentive care
Trace the ſad footſteps of deſtructive war;
Succeſſive bards ſhall tell,
How Marlborough fought, how gaſping tyrants
Alternate chiefs confeſs'd the victor's fame,
Pleas'd and excus'd in their ſucceſſor's ſhame.
In every change, in every form,
The Proteus felt his conquering arm:
Convinc'd of weakneſs, in extreme deſpair,
They lurk'd behind their lines, and wag'd a lazy
Nor lines nor forts could calm the ſoldier's fear,
Surpris'd he found a Marlborough there.
Nature, nor art, his eager rage withſtood,
He meaſur'd diſtant plains, he forc'd the rapid flood,
He fought, he conquer'd, he purſued.
In years advanc'd, with youthful vigour warm'd,
The work of ages in a day perform'd.
When kindly gleams diſſolve the winter ſnows
From Alpine hills, with ſuch impetuous haſte
The icy torrent flows;
In vain the rocks oppoſe,
It drives along enlarg'd, and lays the regions waſte.
Stop, goddeſs, thy preſumptuous flight,
Nor ſoar to ſuch a dangerous height,
Raiſe not the ghoſt of his departed fame,
To pierce our conſcious ſouls with guilty ſhame:
But tune thy harp to humbler lays,
Nor meditate offenſive praiſe.

TO MR. ADDISON,

Occaſioned by his purchaſing an Eſtate in Warwickſhire.

" —En erit unquam
" Ille dies, mihi cum liceat tua dicere facta!

"En erit, ut liceat totum mihi ferre per orbem,
"Sola Sophocleo tua carmina digna cothurno!"
VIRG.

To the gay town where guilty pleasure reigns,
The wise good man prefers our humble plains:
Neglected honours on his merit wait,
Here he retires when courted to be great,
The world resigning for this calm retreat.
His soul with wisdom's choicest treasures fraught,
Here proves in practice each sublimer thought,
And lives by rules his happy pen has taught.
Great bard! how shall my worthless muse aspire
To reach your praise, without your sacred fire?
From the judicious critic's piercing eyes,
To the best natur'd man secure she flies.
When panting virtue her last efforts made,
You brought your Clio to the virgin's aid;
Presumptuous folly blush'd, and vice withdrew,
To vengeance yielding her abandon'd crew.
'Tis true, confederate wits their forces join,
Parnassus labours in the work divine:
Yet these we read with too impatient eyes,
And hunt for you through every dark disguise;
In vain your modesty that name conceals,
Which every thought, which every word, reveals,
With like success bright beauty's goddess tries
To veil immortal charms from mortal eyes;
Her graceful port, and her celestial mien,
To her brave son betray the Cyprian queen;
Odours divine perfume her rosy breast,
She glides along the plain in majesty confess'd.
Hard was the task, and worthy your great mind,
To please at once, and to reform mankind:
Yet, when you write, truth charms with such address,
Pleads virtue's cause with such becoming grace,
His own fond heart the guilty wretch betrays,
He yields delighted, and convinc'd obeys:
You touch our follies with so nice a skill,
Nature and habit prompt in vain to ill.
Nor can it lessen the Spectator's praise,
That from your friendly hand he wears the bays;
His great design all ages shall commend,
But more his happy choice in such a friend.
So the fair queen of night the world relieves,
Nor at the sun's superior honour grieves,
Proud to reflect the glories she receives.
When dark oblivion is the warrior's lot,
His merits censur'd, and his wounds forgot:
When burnish'd helms and gilded armour rust,
And each proud trophy sinks in common dust:
Fresh blooming honours deck the poet's brows,
He shares the mighty blessings he bestows
His spreading fame enlarges as it flows.
Had not your muse in her immortal strain
Describ'd the glorious toils on Blenheim's plain,
Even Marlborough might have fought, and Dormer bled in vain.
When honour calls, and the just cause inspires,
Britain's bold sons to emulate their sires;
Your muse these great examples shall supply,
Like that to conquer, or like this to die.
Contending nations antient Homer claim,
And Mantua glories in her Maro's name;
Our happier soil the prize shall yield to none,
Ardenna's groves shall boast an Addison.
Ye silvan powers, and all ye rural gods,
That guard these peaceful shades, and blest abodes;
For your new guest your choicest gifts prepare,
Exceed his wishes, and prevent his prayer;
Grant him, propitious, freedom, health, and peace,
And as his virtues, let his stores increase.
His lavish hand no deity shall mourn,
The pious bard shall make a just return;
In lasting verse eternal altars raise,
And over-pay your bounty with his praise.
Tune every reed, touch every string, ye swains,
Welcome the stranger to these happy plains,
With hymns of joy in solemn pomp attend
Apollo's darling, and the muses' friend.
Ye nymphs, that haunt the streams and shady groves,
Forget a while to mourn your absent loves;
In song and sportive dance your joy proclaim,
In yielding blushes own your rising flame:
Be kind, ye nymphs, nor let him sigh in vain.
Each land remote your curious eye has view'd,
That Grecian arts, or Roman arms subdu'd,
Search every region, every distant soil,
With pleasing labour and instructive toil:
Say then, accomplish'd bard! What god inclin'd?
To these our humble plains your generous mind;
Nor would you deign in Latian fields to dwell,
Which none know better, or describe so well.
In vain ambrosial fruits invite your stay,
In vain the myrtle groves obstruct your way,
And ductile streams that round the borders stray.
Your wiser choice prefers this spot of earth,
Distinguish'd by th' immortal Shakspeare's birth;
Where through the vales the fair Avona glides,
And nourishes the glebe with fattening tides;
Flora's rich gifts deck all the verdant soil,
And plenty crowns the happy farmer's toil.
Here, on the painted borders of the flood,
The babe was born; his bed with roses strow'd:
Here in an ancient venerable dome,
Oppress'd with grief, we view the poet's tomb.
Angels unseen watch o'er his hallow'd urn,
And in soft elegies complaining mourn!
While the bless'd saint, in loftier strains above,
Reveals the wonders of eternal love.
The heavens, delighted in his tuneful lays,
With silent joy attend their Maker's praise.
In heaven he sings; on earth your muse supplies
Th' important loss, and heals our weeping eyes,
Correctly great, she melts each flinty heart,
With equal genius, but superior art.
Hail, happy pair! ordain'd by turns to bless,
And save a sinking nation in distress.
By great examples to reform the crowd,
Awake their zeal, and warm their frozen blood.
When Brutus strikes for liberty and laws,
Nor spares a father in his country's cause;
Justice severe applauds the cruel deed,
A tyrant suffers, and the world is freed,
But, when we see the godlike Cato bleed,
The nation weeps; and from thy fate, oh Rome!
Learns to prevent her own impending doom.
Where is the wretch a worthless life can prize,
When senates are no more, and Cato dies?

Indulgent sorrow, and a pleasing pain,
Heaves in each breast, and beats in every vein.
Th' expiring patriot animates the crowd,
Bold they demand their ancient rights aloud,
The dear-bought purchase of their fathers' blood.
Fair Liberty her head majestic rears,
Ten thousand blessings in her bosom bears;
Serene she smiles, revealing all her charms,
And calls her free-born youth to glorious arms.
Faction's repell'd, and grumbling leaves her prey,
Forlorn she sits, and dreads the fatal day,
When eastern gales shall sweep her hopes away.
Such ardent zeal your muse alone could raise,
Alone reward it with immortal praise.
Ages to come shall celebrate your fame,
And rescued Britain bless the poet's name.
So when the dreaded powers of Sparta fail'd,
Tyrtæus and Athenian wit prevail'd.
Too weak the laws by wise Lycurgus made,
And rules severe without the muses' aid:
He touch'd the trembling strings, the poet's song
Reviv'd the faint, and made the feeble strong;
Recall'd the living to the dusty plain,
And to a better life restor'd the slain.
The victor-host amaz'd, with horror view'd
Th' assembling troops, and all the war renew'd;
To more than mortal courage quit the field,
And to their foes th' unfinish'd trophies yield.

AN IMITATION OF HORACE,

BOOK IV. ODE IX.

Inscribed to the Right Honourable James Stanhope, Esq. one of his Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, afterwards Earl Stanhope.

Born near Avona's winding stream
I touch the trembling lyre,
No vulgar thoughts, no vulgar theme,
Shall the bold muse inspire.
'Tis immortality's her aim;
Sublime she mounts the skies,
She climbs the steep ascent to fame,
Nor ever shall want force to rise,
While she supports her flight with Stanhope's name.
What though majestic Milton stands alone
Inimitably great!
Bow low, ye bards, at his exalted throne,
And lay your labours at his feet;
Capacious soul! whose boundless thoughts survey
Heaven, hell, earth, sea;
Lo, where th' embattled gods appear,
The mountains from their seats they tear,
And shake th' empyreal heavens with impious war!
Yet, nor shall Milton's ghost repine
At all the honours we bestow
On Addison's deserving brow,
By whom convinc'd, we own his work divine,
Whose skilful pen has done his merit right,
And set the jewel in a fairer light.
Enliven'd by his bright essay
Each flowery scene appears more gay,
New beauties spring in Eden's fertile groves,
And by his culture paradise improves.
Garth, by Apollo doubly bless'd,
Is by the god entire possess'd:
Age, unwilling to depart,
Begs life from his prevailing skill;
Youth, reviving from his art,
Borrows its charms and power to kill:
But when the patriot's injur'd fame,
His country's honour, or his friends,
A more extensive bounty claim,
With joy the ready muse attends,
Immortal honours she bestows,
A gift the muse alone can give;
She crowns the glorious victor's brows,
And bids expiring virtue live.
Nymphs yet unborn shall melt with amorous flames
That Congreve's lays inspire;
And Philips warm the gentle swains
To love and soft desire.
Ah, shun, ye fair, the dangerous sounds!
Alas, each moving accent wounds!
The sparks conceal'd revive again,
The god restor'd, resumes his reign,
In killing joys and pleasing pain.
Thus does each bard in different garb appear,
Each muse has her peculiar air,
And in propriety of dress becomes more fair;
To each, impartial Providence
Well-chosen gifts bestows,
He varies his munificence,
And in divided streams the heavenly blessing flows.

If we look back on ages past and gone,
When infant Time his race begun,
The distant view still lessens to our sight,
Obscur'd in clouds, and veil'd in shades of night.
The muse alone can the dark scenes display,
Enlarge the prospect, and disclose the day.
'Tis she the records of times past explores,
And the dead hero to new life restores,
To the brave man who for his country died,
Erects a lasting pyramid,
Supports his dignity and fame,
When mouldering pillars drop his name.
In full proportion leads her warrior forth,
Discovers his neglected worth,
Brightens his deeds, by envious rust o'ercast,
T' improve the present age, and vindicate the past.
Did not the muse our crying wrongs repeat,
Ages to come no more should know
Of Lewis by oppression great
Than we of Nimrod now:
The meteor should but blaze and die,
Depriv'd of the reward of endless infamy.
Ev'n that brave chief, who set the nations free,
The greatest name the world can boast,
Without the muse's aid, shall be
Sunk in the tide of time, and in oblivion lost.
The sculptor's hand may make the marble live,
Or the bold pencil trace
The wonders of that lovely face,
Where every charm, and every grace,
That man can wish, or heaven can give,
In happy union join'd confess
The hero born to conquer, and to bless.
Yet vain, alas! is every art,
Till the great work the muse complete,
And everlasting fame impart,
That soars aloft, above the reach of fate.

Hail, happy bard! on whom the gods beſtow
A genius equal to the vaſt deſign,
Whoſe thoughts ſublime in eaſy numbers flow,
While Marlborough's virtues animate each line.
How ſhall our trembling ſouls ſurvey
The horrors of each bloody day;
The wreaking carnage of the plain
Incumber'd with the mighty ſlain,
The ſtrange variety of death,
And the ſad murmurs of departing breath?
Scamander's ſtreams ſhall yield to Danube's flood,
To the dark boſom of the deep purſued
By fiercer flames, and ſtain'd with nobler blood.
The gods ſhall arm on either ſide,
Th' important quarrel to decide;
The grand event embroil the realms above,
And faction revel in the court of Jove;
While heaven, and earth, and ſea, and air,
Shall feel the mighty ſhock and labour of the war.

Virtue conceal'd obſcurely dies,
Loſt in the mean diſguiſe
Of abject ſloth, depreſs'd, unknown. [lies,
Rough in its native bed the unwrought diamond
Till chance, or art, reveal its worth,
And call its latent glories forth;
But when its radiant charms are view'd,
Becomes the idol of the crowd,
And adds new luſtre to the monarch's crown.
What Britiſh harp can lie unſtrung,
When Stanhope's fame demands a ſong?
Upward, ye muſes, take your wanton flight,
Tune every lyre to Stanhope's praiſe,
Exert your moſt triumphant lays,
Nor ſuffer ſuch heroic deeds to ſink in endleſs night.
The golden Tagus ſhall forget to flow,
And Ebro leave its channel dry,
Ere Stanhope's name to time ſhall bow,
And loſt in dark oblivion lie.
Where ſhall the muſe begin her airy flight?
Where firſt direct her dubious way?
Loſt in variety of light,
And dazzled in exceſs of day?
Wiſdom and valour, probity and truth,
At once upon the labouring fancy throng,
The conduct of old age, the fire of youth,
United in one breaſt perplex the poet's ſong.
Thoſe virtues which diſpers'd and rare
The gods too thriftily beſtow'd,
And ſcatter'd to amuſe the crowd,
When former heroes were their care;
T' exert at once their power divine,
In thee, brave chief, collected ſhine.
So from each lovely blooming face
Th' ambitious artiſt ſtole a grace,
When in one finiſh'd piece he ſtrove
To paint th' all-glorious queen of love.
Thy provident unbiaſs'd mind
Knowing in arts of peace and war,
With indefatigable care,
Labours the good of human kind:
Erect in dangers, modeſt in ſucceſs,
Corruption's everlaſting bane,
Where injur'd merit finds redreſs,
And worthleſs villians wait in vain.
Though fawning knaves beſiege thy gate,
And court the honeſt man they hate;
Thy ſteady virtue charges through,
Alike unerring to ſubdue,
As when on Almanara's plain the ſcatter'd squadrons flew.
Vain are th' attacks of force or art,
Where Cæſar's arm defends a Cato's heart.
Oh! could thy generous ſoul diſpenſe
Through this unrighteous age its ſacred influence;
Could the baſe crowd from thy example learn,
To trample on their impious gifts with ſcorn,
With ſhame confounded to behold
A nation for a trifle ſold,
Dejected ſenates ſhould no more
Their champion's abſence mourn,
Contending boroughs ſhould thy name return;
Thy bold Philippics ſhould reſtore
Britannia's wealth, and power, and fame,
Nor liberty be deem'd an empty name,
While tyrants trembled on a foreign ſhore.
No ſwelling titles, pomp, and ſtate,
The trappings of a magiſtrate,
Can dignify a ſlave, or make a traitor great.
For, careleſs of external ſhow,
Sage nature dictates whom t' obey,
And we the ready homage pay,
Which to ſuperior gifts we owe.
Merit like thine repuls'd an empire gains,
And virtue, though neglected, reigns.
The wretch is indigent and poor,
Who brooding ſits o'er his ill-gotten ſtore;
Trembling with guilt, and haunted by his ſin;
He feels the rigid judge within.
But they alone are bleſs'd, who wiſely know
T' enjoy the little which the gods beſtow,
Proud of their glorious wants, diſdain
To barter honeſty for gain;
No other ill but ſhame they fear,
And ſcorn to purchaſe life too dear:
Profuſely laviſh of their blood,
For their dear friends or country's good,
If Britain conquer, can rejoice in death,
And in triumphant ſhouts reſign their breath.

TO DR. MACKENZIE.

O THOU, whoſe penetrating mind,
Whoſe heart benevolent, and kind,
Its ever preſent in diſtreſs,
Glad to preſerve, and proud to bleſs:
Oh! leave not Arden's faithful grove,
On Caledonian hills to rove;
But hear our fond united prayer,
Nor force a county to deſpair.
Let homicides in Warwick-lane,
With hecatombs of victims ſlain,
Butcher for knighthood, and for gain;
While thou purſueſt a nobler aim,
Declining intereſt for fame.
Where'er thy Maker's image dwells,
In gilded roofs, or ſmoky cells,
The ſame thy zeal: o'erjoy'd to ſave
Thy fellow-creature from the grave:

For well thy soul can understand
The poor man's call is God's command;
No frail, no transient good, his fee;
But heaven, and bless'd eternity.
Nor are thy labours here in vain,
The pleasure over-pays the pain.
True happiness (if understood)
Consists alone, in doing good;
Speak, all ye wise, can God bestow,
Or man a greater pleasure know?
See where the grateful father bows!
His tears confess how much he owes:
His son, the darling of his heart,
Restor'd by your prevailing art;
His house, his name, redeem'd by you,
His ancient honours bloom anew.
But oh! what idioms can express
The vast transcendant happiness
The faithful husband feels? his wife,
His better half, recall'd to life:
See, with what rapture! see him view
The shatter'd frame rebuilt by you!
See health rekindling in her eyes!
See baffled death give up his prize!
Tell me, my friend, canst thou forbear,
In this gay scene to claim a share?
Does not thy blood more swiftly flow?
Thy heart with secret transports glow?
Health, life, by heaven's indulgence sent,
And thou the glorious instrument!
Safe in thy art, no ills we fear,
Thy hand shall plant Elysium here;
Pale sickness shall thy triumphs own,
And ruddy health exalt her throne.
The fair, renew'd in all her charms,
Shall fly to thy protecting arms;
With gracious smiles repay thy care,
And leave her lovers in despair.
While multitudes applaud and bless
Their great asylum in distress,
My humble muse, among the crowd,
Her joyful Pœans sings aloud.
Could I but with Mæonian flight
Sublimely soar through fields of light,
Above the stars thy name should shine,
Nor great Machaon's rival thine!
But father Phœbus, who has done
So much for thee his favourite son,
His other gifts on me bestows
With partial hands, nor hears my vows:
Oh! let a grateful heart supply,
What the penurious powers deny!

THE WIFE.

Imperial Jove (as poets sung of old)
Was coupled to a more imperial scold,
A jealous, termagant, insulting jade,
And more observant than a wither'd maid:
She watch'd his waters with unweary'd eyes,
And chas'd the god through every sly disguise,
Out-brav'd his thunder with her louder voice,
And shook the poles with everlasting noise.
At midnight revels when the gossips met,
He was the theme of their eternal chat:
This ask'd what form great Jove would next devise,
And when his godship would again Taurise?
That hinted at the wanton life he led
With Leda, and with baby Ganymede:
Scandals and lies went merrily about,
With heavenly lambs-wool, and nectarial stout.
Home she returns erect with lust and pride,
At bed and board alike unsatisfy'd;
The hen-peck'd god her angry presence flies,
Or at her feet the passive thunderer lies,
In vain: still more she raves, still more she storms,
And heaven's high vaults echo her loud alarms:
To Bacchus, merry blade, the god repairs,
To drown in nectar his domestic cares,
The fury thither too pursues the chase,
Palls the rich juice, and poisons every glass;
Wine, that makes cowards brave, the dying strong,
Is a poor cordial 'gainst a woman's tongue.
To arms! to arms! th' impetuous fury cries,
The jolly god th' impending ruin flies:
His trembling tigers hide their fearful heads,
Scar'd at a fierceness which their own exceeds;
Bottles aloft, like bursting bombs resound;
And smoking spout their liquid ruin round;
Like storms of hail the scatter'd fragments fly,
Bruis'd bowls and broken glass obscure the sky;
Tables, and chairs, and stools, together hurl'd,
With universal wreck fright all the nether world.
Such was the clamour, such great Jove's surprise,
When by gigantic hands the mountains rise,
To wrest his thunder, and invade the skies.
Who would not envy Jove eternal life,
And wish for godhead clogg'd with such a wife?
If e'er it be my wayward fate to wed,
Avert, ye powers, a Juno from my bed!
Let her be foolish, ugly, crooked, old,
Let her be whore, or any thing but scold!
With prayers incessant for my lot I crave
The quiet cuckold, not the hen-peck'd slave;
Or give me peace on earth, or give it in the grave!

IN MEMORY OF THE REV. MR. MOORE.

Of humble birth, but of more humble mind,
By learning much, by virtue more refin'd,
A fair and equal friend to all mankind.
Parties and sects, by fierce divisions torn,
Forget their hatred, and consent to mourn;
Their hearts unite in undissembled woe,
And in one common stream their sorrows flow.
Each part in life with equal grace he bore,
Obliging to the rich, a father to the poor.
From sinful riots silently he fled,
But came unbidden to the sick man's bed.
Manners and men he knew, and when to press
The poor man's cause, and plead it with success.
No penal laws he stretch'd, but won by love
His hearers' hearts, unwilling to reprove.
When sour rebukes and harsher language fail,
Could with a lucky jest, or merry tale,
O'er stubborn souls in virtue's cause prevail.
Whene'er he preach'd, the throng attentive stood,
Feasted with manna, and celestial food:
He taught them how to live, and how to die;
Nor did his actions give his words the lye:

Go, happy ſoul! ſublimely take thy flight
Through fields of æther, in long tracks of light,
The gueſt of angels; range from place to place,
And view thy great Redeemer face to face.
Juſt God! eternal ſource of power and love!
Whom we lament on earth, give us above!
Oh! grant us our companion and our friend,
In bliſs without alloy, and without end!

EPITAPH

Upon Hugh Lumber, Huſbandman.

In cottages and homely cells,
True piety neglected dwells:
Till call'd to heaven, her native ſeat,
Where the good man alone is great:
'Tis then this humble duſt ſhall riſe,
And view his judge with joyful eyes;
While haughty tyrants ſhrink afraid,
And call the mountains to their aid.

THE HIP. TO WILLIAM COLMORE, ESQ.

The Day after the great Meteor, in March 1715.

This diſmal morn, when eaſt winds blow,
And every languid pulſe beats low,
With face moſt ſorrowfully grim,
And head oppreſs'd with wind and whim,
Grave as an owl, and juſt as witty,
To thee I twang my doleful ditty;
And in mine own dull rhymes would find
Muſic to ſoothe my reſtleſs mind:
But oh! my friend, I ſing in vain,
No doggrel can relieve my pain;
Since thou art gone my heart's deſire,
And heaven, and earth, and ſea conſpire,
To make my miſeries complete;
Where ſhall a wretched Hip retreat?
What ſhall a drooping mortal do,
Who pines for ſunſhine and for you?
If in the dark alcove I dream,
And you, or Phillis, is my theme,
While love or friendſhip warm my ſoul,
My ſhins are burning to a coal.
If rais'd to ſpeculations high,
I gaze the ſtars and ſpangled ſky,
With heart devout and wondering eye,
Amaz'd I view ſtrange globes of light,
Meteors with horrid luſtre bright,
My guilty trembling ſoul affright.
To mother earth's prolific bed,
Penſive I ſtoop my giddy head,
From thence too all my hopes are fled.
Nor flowers, nor graſs, nor ſhrubs appear,
To deck the ſmiling infant year;
But blaſts my tender bloſſoms wound,
And deſolation reigns around.
If ſea-ward my dark thoughts I bend,
O! where will my misfortunes end?
My loyal ſoul diſtracted meets
Attainted dukes, and * Spaniſh fleets.
Thus jarring elements unite,
Pregnant with wrongs, and arm'd with ſpight,
Succeſſive miſchiefs every hour
On my devoted head they pour.
Whate'er I do, where'er I go,
'Tis ſtill an endleſs ſcene of wo.
'Tis thus diſconſolate I mourn,
I faint, I die, till thy return;
'Till thy briſk wit, and humorous vein,
Reſtore me to myſelf again.
Let others vainly ſeek for eaſe,
From Galen and Hippocrates,
I ſcorn ſuch nauſeous aids as theſe.
Haſte then, my dear, unbrib'd attend,
The beſt elixir is a friend.

* An invaſion from Spain was then expected.

TO A LADY,

Who made me a Preſent of a Silver Pen.

Fair-one, accept the thanks I owe,
'Tis all a grateful heart can do.
If e'er my ſoul the muſe inſpire
With raptures and poetic fire,
Your kind munificence I'll praiſe,
To you a thouſand altars raiſe:
Jove ſhall deſcend in golden rain,
Or die a ſwan; but ſing in vain.
Phœbus the witty and the gay,
Shall quit the chariot of the day,
To baſk in your ſuperior ray.
Your charms ſhall every god ſubdue,
And every goddeſs envy you.
Add this but to your bounty's ſtore,
This one great boon, I aſk no more:
O gracious nymph, be kind as fair,
Nor with diſdain neglect my prayer,
So ſhall your goodneſs be confeſs'd,
And I your ſlave entirely bleſs'd;
This pen no vulgar theme ſhall ſtain.
The nobleſt palm your gift ſhall gain,
To write to you, nor write in vain.

Preſenting to a Lady a White Roſe and a Red on the Tenth of June.

If this pale roſe offend your ſight,
It in your boſom wear;
'Twill bluſh to find itſelf leſs white,
And turn Lancaſtrian there.

But, Celia, ſhould the red be choſe,
With gay vermilion bright;
'Twould ſicken at each bluſh that glows,
And in deſpair turn white.

Let politicians idly prate,
Their Babels build in vain;
As uncontrolable as fate,
Imperial Love ſhall reign.

Each haughty faction ſhall obey,
And whigs and tories join,
Submit to your deſpotic ſway,
Confeſs your right divine.

Yet this, my gracious monarch, own,
They're tyrants that oppreſs;
'Tis mercy muſt ſupport your throne,
And 'tis like heaven to bleſs.

THE BOWLING-GREEN.

WHERE fair Sabrina's wandering currents flow,
A large ſmooth plain extends its verdant brow,
Here every morn while fruitful vapours feed
The ſwelling blade, and bleſs the ſmoking mead,
A cruel tyrant reigns: like time, the ſwain
Whets his unrighteous ſcythe, and ſhaves the plain.
Beneath each ſtroke the peeping flowers decay,
And all th' unripen'd crop is ſwept away,
The heavy roller next he tugs along,
Whiſs his ſhort pipe, or roars a rural ſong,
With curious eye then the preſs'd turf he views,
And every riſing prominence ſubdues.
Now when each craving ſtomach was well-ſtor'd,
And church and king had travel'd round the board,
Hither at fortune's ſhrine to pay their court,
With eager hopes the motley tribe reſort;
Attornies ſpruce, in their plate-button'd frocks,
And roſy parſons fat, and orthodox:
Of every ſect, whigs, papiſts, and high-flyers,
Cornuted aldermen, and hen-peck'd ſquires:
Fox-hunters, quacks, ſcribblers in verſe and proſe,
And half-pay captains, and half-witted beaux;
On the green cirque the ready racers ſtand,
Diſpos'd in pairs, and tempt the bowler's hand:
Each poliſh'd ſphere does his round brother own,
The twins diſtinguiſh'd by their marks are known.
As the ſtrong rein guides the well-manag'd horſe,
Here weighty lead infus'd directs their courſe.
Theſe in the ready road drive on with ſpeed,
But thoſe in crooked paths more artfully ſucceed.
So the tall ſhip that makes ſome dangerous bay,
With a ſide wind obliquely ſlopes her way.
Lo! there the ſilver tumbler fix'd on high,
The victor's prize, inviting every eye!
The champions, or conſent, or chance divide,
While each man thinks his own the ſurer ſide,
And the jack leads, the ſkilful bowler's guide.
Bendo ſtrip'd firſt, from foreign coaſts he brought
A chaos of receipts, and anarchy of thought;
Where the tumultuous whims to faction prone,
Still juſtled monarch Reaſon from her throne:
More dangerous than the porcupine his quill,
Inur'd to ſlaughter, and ſecure to kill.
Let looſe, juſt heaven! each virulent diſeaſe,
But ſave us from ſuch murderers as theſe:
Might Bendo live but half a patriarch's age,
Th' unpeopled world would ſink beneath his rage:
Nor need t' appeaſe the juſt Creator's ire
A ſecond deluge or conſuming fire.
He winks one eye, and knits his brow ſevere,
Then from his hand launches the flying ſphere;
Out of the green the guiltleſs wood he hurl'd,
Swift as his patients from this nether world:
Then grinn'd malignant, but the jocund crowd
Deride his ſenſeleſs rage, and ſhout aloud,
Next, Zadoc, 'tis thy turn, imperious prieſt!
Still late at church, but early at a feaſt.
No turkey-cock appears with better grace,
His garments black, vermilion paints his face;
His wattles hang upon his ſtiffen'd band.
His platter feet upon the trigger ſtand,
He graſps the bowl in his rough brawny hand.
Then ſquatting down, with his grey goggle eyes
He takes his aim, and at the mark it flies.
Zadoc purſues, and wabbles o'er the plain, [vain;
But ſhakes his ſtrutting paunch, and ambles on in
For, oh! wide-erring to the left it glides,
The inmate lead the lighter wood miſguides.
He ſharp reproofs with kind entreaties joins,
Then on the counter ſide with pain reclines;
As if he meant to regulate its courſe,
By power attractive, and magnetic force,
Now almoſt in deſpair, he raves, he ſtorms,
Writhes his unwieldy trunk in various forms:
Unhappy Proteus! ſtill in vain he tries
A thouſand ſhapes, the bowl erroneous flies,
Deaf to his prayers, regardleſs of his cries.
His puffing cheeks with riſing rage inflame,
And all his ſparkling rubies glow with ſhame.
Bendo's proud heart, proof againſt fortune's frown,
Reſolves once more to make the prize his own:
Cautious he plods, ſurveying all the green,
And meaſures with his eye the ſpace between.
But, as on him 'twas a peculiar curſe,
To fall from one extreme into a worſe;
Conſcious of too much vigour, now for fear
He ſhould exceed, at hand he checks the ſphere,
Soon as he found its languid force decay,
And the too weak impreſſion die away;
Quick after it he ſcuds, urges behind
Step after ſtep, and now, with anxious mind,
Hangs o'er the bowl, ſlow-creeping on the plain,
And chides its faint efforts, and bawls amain.
Then on the guiltleſs green the blame to lay,
Curſes the mountains that obſtruct his way;
Brazens it out with an audacious face,
His inſolence improving by diſgrace.
Zadoc, who now with three black mugs had cheer'd
His drooping heart, and his ſunk ſpirits rear'd,
Advances to the trigg with ſolemn pace,
And ruddy hope ſits blooming on his face.
The bowl he pois'd, with pain his hams he bends,
On well-choſe ground unto the mark it tends:
Each adverſe heart pants with unuſual fear,
With joy he follows the propitious ſphere;
Alas! how frail is every mortal ſcheme!
We build on ſand, our happineſs a dream.
Bendo's ſhort bowl ſtops the proud victor's courſe,
Purloins his fame, and deadens all its force.
At Bendo from each corner of his eyes
He darts malignant rays, then muttering flies
Into the bower; there, panting and half dead,
In thick mundungus clouds he hides his head.
Muſe, raiſe thy voice, to win the glorious prize,
Bid all the fury of the battle riſe:
Theſe but the light-arm'd champions of the field,
See Griper there: a veteran well ſkill'd;
This able pilot knows to ſteer a cauſe
Through all the rocks and ſhallows of the laws:
Or if 'tis wreck'd, his trembling client ſaves
On the next plank, and diſappoints the waves.
In this, at leaſt, all hiſtories agree,
That, though he loſt his cauſe, he ſav'd his fee.
When the fat client looks in jovial plight,
How complaiſant the

But if th' abandon'd orphan puts his caſe,
And poverty ſits ſhrinking on his face,
How like a cur he ſnarls! when at the door
For broken ſcraps he quarrels with the poor.
The farmer's oracle, when rent-day's near,
And landlords, by forbearance, are ſevere;
When huntſmen treſpaſs, or his neighbour's ſwine,
Or tatter'd crape extorts by right divine.
Him all the rich their contributions pay,
Him all the poor with aching hearts obey:
He in his ſwanſkin doublet ſtruts along,
Now hegs, and now rebukes, the preſſing throng.
A paſſage clear'd, he takes his aim with care,
And gently from his hand lets looſe the ſphere:
Smooth as a ſwallow o'er the plain it flies,
While he purſues its track with eager eyes;
Its hopeful courſe approv'd, he ſhouts aloud,
Claps both his hands, and juſtles through the crowd,
Hovering a while, ſoon at the mark it ſtood,
Hung o'er inclin'd, and fondly kiſs'd the wood;
Loud is th' applauſe of every betting friend,
And peals of clamorous joy the concave rend.
But in each hoſtile face, a diſmal gloom
Appears, the ſad preſage of loſs to come;
'Mong theſe, Trebellius with a mournful air
Of livid hue, juſt dying with deſpair,
Shuffles about, ſkrews his chop-fallen face,
And no whipp'd gigg ſo often ſhifts his place.
Then gives his ſage advice with wondrous ſkill,
Which no man ever heeds, or ever will:
Yet he perſiſts, inſtructing to confound,
And with his cane points out the dubious ground.

Strong Nimrod now, freſh as the riſing dawn
Appears, his ſinewy limbs, and ſolid brawn,
The gazing crowd admires. He nor in courts
Delights, nor pompous balls; but rural ſports
Are his ſoul's joy. At the horn's briſk alarms
He ſhakes the unwilling Phillis from his arms;
Mounts with the ſun, begins his bold career,
To chaſe the wily fox, or rambling deer.
So Hercules, by Juno's dread command,
From ſavage beaſts and monſters freed the land.
Hark! from the covert of yon gloomy brake,
Harmonius thunder rolls, the foreſts ſhake:
Men, boys, and dogs, impatient for the chaſe,
Tumultuous tranſports fluſh in every face;
With ears erect the courſer paws the ground,
Hills, vales, and hollow rocks, with cheering cries
reſound:
Drive down the precipice (brave youths) with
ſpeed,
Bound o'er the river banks, and ſmoke along the mead.
But whither would the devious muſe purſue
The pleaſing theme, and my paſt joys renew?
Another labour now demands thy ſong,
Stretch'd in two ranks, behold th' expecting throng,
As Nimrod pois'd the ſphere: his arm he drew
Back like an arrow in the Parthian yew,
Then launch'd the whirling globe, and full as ſwift it flew:
Bowls daſh'd on bowls confounded all the plain,
Safe ſtood the foe, well-cover'd by his train.
Aſſaulted tyrants thus their guard defends,
Eſcaping by the ruin of their friends.

But now, he ſtands expos'd, their order broke,
And ſeems to dread the next deciſive ſtroke.
So at ſome bloody ſiege, the ponderous ball
Batters with ceaſeleſs rage the crumbling wall,
(A breach once made) ſoon galls the naked town,
Riots in blood, and heaps on heaps are thrown.

Each avenue thus clear'd, with aching heart
Griper beheld, exerting all his art;
Once more reſolves to check his furious foe,
Block up the paſſage, and elude the blow.
With cautious hand, and with leſs force, he threw
The well-pois'd ſphere, that gently circling
But ſtopping ſhort, cover'd the mark from view.
So little Teucer on the well-fought field,
Securely ſkulk'd behind his brother's ſhield.

Nimrod, in dangers bold, whoſe heart elate,
Nor courted fortune's ſmiles, nor fear'd her hate;
Perplex'd, but not diſcourag'd, walk'd around,
With curious eye examin'd all the ground;
Not the leaſt opening in the front was found.
Sideway he leans, declining to the right,
And marks his way, and moderates his might.
Smooth-gliding o'er the plain th' obedient ſphere
Held on its dubious road, while hope and fear
Alternate ebb'd and flow'd in every breaſt:
Now rolling nearer to the mark it preſs'd;
Then chang'd its courſe, by the ſtrong biaſs rein'd,
And on the foe diſcharg'd the force that yet remain'd.
Smart was the ſtroke, away the rival fled,
The bold intruder triumph'd in his ſtead.

Victorious Nimrod ſeiz'd the glittering prize,
Shouts of outrageous joy invade the ſkies:
Hands, tongues, and caps, exalt the victor's fame,
Sabrina's banks return him loud acclaim.

THE LAMENTATION OF DAVID
OVER SAUL AND JONATHAN.

Proſtrate on earth the bleeding warrior lies,
And Iſrael's beauty on the mountains dies;
How are the mighty fallen!
Huſh'd be my ſorrows, gently fall my tears,
Leſt my ſad tale ſhould reach the aliens ears:
Bid fame be dumb, and tremble to proclaim
In heathen Gath, or Aſcalon, our ſhame;
Leſt proud Philiſtia, leſt our haughty foe,
With impious ſcorn inſult our ſolemn woe.

O Gilboa! ye hills aſpiring high,
The laſt ſad ſcene of Iſrael's tragedy:
No fattening dews be on thy lawns diſtill'd,
No kindly ſhowers refreſh thy thirſty field;
No hallow'd fruits thy barren ſoil ſhall raiſe,
No ſpotleſs kids that on our altars blaze;
Loneſome and wild ſhall thy bleak ſummits riſe,
Accurs'd by men, and hateful to the ſkies.
On thee the ſhields of mighty warriors lay,
The ſhield of Saul was vilely caſt away;
The Lord's anointed, Saul! his ſacred blood
Diſtain'd thy brow, and ſwell'd the common
flood.
How are the mighty fallen!

Where'er their bands the royal heroes led,
The combat thicken'd, and the mighty bled;

The ſlaughter'd hoſts beneath their falchions die,
And wing'd with death unerring arrows fly;
Unknowing to return, ſtill urge the foe,
As fate inſatiate, and as ſure the blow.
The ſon, who next his conquering father fought,
Repeats the wonders his example taught:
Eager his fire's illuſtrious ſteps to trace,
And by heroic deeds aſſert his race.
The royal eagle thus her ripening brood
Trains to the quarry, and directs to blood:
His darling thus, the foreſt monarch rears,
A firm aſſociate for his future wars;
In union terrible, they ſeize the prey,
The mountains tremble, and the woods obey.
In peace united, as in war combin'd,
Were Jonathan's and Saul's affections join'd,
Paternal grace with filial duty vy'd,
And love the knot of nature cloſer ty'd,
Ev'n fate relents, reveres the ſacred band,
And undivided bids their friendſhip ſtand.
From earth to heaven enlarg'd, their joys improve,
Still fairer, brighter ſtill they ſhine above
Bleſt in a long eternity of love.
Daughters of Iſrael, o'er the royal urn
Wail and lament; the king, the father, mourn.
Oh! now at leaſt indulge a pious woe,
'Tis all the dead receive, the living can beſtow.
Caſt off your rich attire and proud array,
Let undiſſembled ſorrows cloud the day:
Thoſe ornaments victorious Saul beſtow'd,
With gold your necks, your robes with purple glow'd:
Quit crowns, and garlands, for the ſable weed,
To ſongs of triumph let dumb grief ſucceed
Let all our grateful hearts for our dead patron bleed.
How are the mighty fallen!
Though thus diſtreſs'd, though thus o'erwhelm'd with grief,
Light is the burthen that admits relief;
My labouring ſoul ſuperior woes oppreſs,
Nor rolling time can heal, nor fate redreſs.
Another Saul your ſorrows can remove,
No ſecond Jonathan ſhall bleſs my love.
O Jonathan! my friend, my brother dear!
Eyes, ſtream afreſh, and call forth every tear:
Swell, my ſad heart each faultering pulſe beat low,
Down ſink my head beneath this weight of woe:
Hear my laments, ye hills! ye woods, return
My ceaſeleſs groans; with me, ye turtles, mourn!
How pleaſant haſt thou been! each lovely grace,
Each youthful charm, fate blooming on thy face:
Joy from thine eyes in radiant glories ſprung,
And manna dropt from thy perſuaſive tongue.
Witneſs, great heav'n! (from you thoſe ardours came)
How wonderful his love! the kindeſt dame
Lov'd not like him, nor felt ſo warm a flame.
No earthly paſſion to ſuch height aſpires,
And ſeraphs only burn with purer fires.
In vain, while honour calls to glorious arms,
And Iſrael's cauſe the pious patriot warms:
In vain, while deaths promiſcuous fly below,
Nor youth can bribe, nor virtue ward the blow.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

WITH THE ILIAD OF HOMER TRANSLATED.

Go, happy volume, to the fair impart
The ſecret wiſhes of a wounded heart:
Kind advocate! exert thy utmoſt zeal,
Deſcribe my paſſion, and my woes reveal.
Oft ſhalt thou kiſs that hand where roſes bloom,
And the white lily breathes its rich perfume;
On thee her eyes ſhall ſhine, thy leaves employ
Each faculty, and ſooth her ſoul with joy.
Watch the ſoft hour, when peaceful ſilence reigns,
And Philomel alone like me complains:
When envious prudes no longer haunt the fair,
But end a day of calumny in prayer:
O'er Quarles or Bunyan nod, in dreams relent,
Without diſguiſe give all their paſſions vent,
And mourn their wither'd charms, and youthful prime miſpent.
Then by the waxen taper's glimmering light,
With thee the ſtudious maid ſhall paſs the night;
Shall feel her heart beat quick in every page,
And tremble at the ſtern Pelides' rage:
With horror view the half-drawn blade appear,
And the deſponding tyrant pale with fear;
To calm that ſoul untam'd, ſage Neſtor fails,
And ev'n celeſtial wiſdom ſcarce prevails.
Then lead her to the margin of the main,
And let her hear th' impatient chief complain;
Toſs'd with ſuperior ſtorms, on the bleak ſhores
He lies, and louder than the billows roars.
Next the dread ſcene unfold of war and blood,
Hector in arms triumphant, Greece ſubdued;
The partial gods who with their foes conſpire,
The dead, the dying, and the fleet on fire.
But tell, oh! tell the cauſe of all this woe,
The fatal ſource from whence theſe miſchiefs flow;
Tell her 'twas love deny'd the hero fir'd,
Depriv'd of her whom moſt his heart deſir'd.
Not the dire vengeance of the thundering Jove,
Can match the boundleſs rage of injur'd love.
Stop the fierce torrent, and its billows riſe,
Lay waſte the ſhores, invade both earth and ſkies:
Confine it not, but let it gently flow,
It kindly cheers the ſmiling plains below,
And everlaſting ſweets upon its borders grow.
To Troy's proud walls the wondering maid convey,
With pointed ſpires and golden turrets gay,
The work of gods: thence let the fair behold
The court of Priam, rich in gems and gold;
His numerous ſons, his queen's majeſtic pride,
Th' aſpiring domes, th' apartments ſtretching wide,
Where on their looms Sidonian virgins wrought,
And weav'd the battles which their lovers fought.
Here let her eyes ſurvey thoſe fatal charms,
The beauteous prize that ſet the world in arms;
Through gazing crowds, bright progeny of Jove,
She walks, and every panting heart beats love.
Ev'n ſapleſs age new bloſſoms at the ſight,
And views the fair deſtroyer with delight:
Beauty's vaſt power, hence to the nymph make known,
In Helen's triumphs let her read her own;

Nor blame her ſlaves, but lay the guilt on fate,
And pardon failings which her charms create.
Raſh bard! forbear, nor let thy flattering muſe,
With pleaſing viſions, thy fond heart abuſe;
Vain are thy hopes preſumptuous, vain thy prayer,
Bright is her image, and divinely fair:
But oh! the goddeſs in thy arms is fleeting air.
So dreams th' ambitious man when rich Tokay,
Or Burgundy, refines his vulgar clay:
The white rod trembles in his potent hand,
And crowds obſequious wait his high command;
Upon his breaſt he views the radiant ſtar,
And gives the word around him, peace or war:
In ſtate he reigns, for one ſhort, buſy night,
But ſoon convinc'd by the next dawning light,
Curſes the fading joys that vaniſh from his ſight.

AN EPISTLE TO ALLAN RAMSAY.

Near fair Avona's ſilver tide,
Whoſe waves in ſoft meanders glide,
I read, to the delighted ſwains,
Your jocund ſongs and rural ſtrains.
Smooth as her ſtreams your numbers flow,
Your thoughts in varied beauties ſhow,
Like flowers that on her borders grow.
While I ſurvey, with raviſh'd eyes,
His* friendly gift, my valued prize,
Where ſiſter arts, with charms divine,
In their full bloom and beauty ſhine,
Alternately my ſoul is bleſt.
Now I behold my welcome gueſt,
That graceful, that engaging air,
So dear to all the brave and fair.
Nor has th' ingenious artiſt ſhown
His outward lineaments alone,
But in th' expreſſive draught deſign'd,
The nobler beauties of his mind;
True friendſhip, love, benevolence,
Unſtudied wit, and manly ſenſe.
Then, as your book I wander o'er,
And feaſt on the delicious ſtore
(Like the laborious buſy bee,
Pleas'd with the ſweet variety),
With equal wonder and ſurpriſe,
I ſee reſembling portraits riſe.
Brave archers march in bright array,
In troops the vulgar line the way.
Here the droll figures ſlyly ſneer,
Or coxcombs at full length appear.
There woods and lawns, a rural ſcene,
And ſwains that gambol on the green.
Your pen can act the pencil's part
With greater genius, fire, and art.
'Believe me, bard, no hunted hind
That pants againſt the ſouthern wind,
And ſeeks the ſtream through unknown ways;
No matron in her teeming days,
E'er felt ſuch longings, ſuch deſires,
As I to view thoſe lofty ſpires,
Thoſe domes, where fair Edina ſhrouds
Her towering head amid the clouds.

But oh! what dangers interpoſe!
Vales deep with dirt, and hills with ſnows,
Proud winter floods with rapid force,
Forbid the pleaſing intercourſe.
But ſure we bards, whoſe purer clay,
Nature has mixt with leſs allay,
Might ſoon find out an eaſier way.
Do not ſage matrons mount on high,
And ſwitch their broom-ſticks through the ſky;
Ride poſt o'er hills, and woods, and ſeas,
From Thule to th' Heſperides†?
And yet the men of Greſham own
That this and ſtranger feats are done,
By a warm fancy's power alone.
This granted; why can't you and I
Stretch forth our wings, and cleave the ſky?
Since our poetic brains, you know,
Than theirs muſt more intenſely glow.
Did not the Theban ſwan take wing,
Sublimely ſoar, and ſweetly ſing?
And do not we of humbler vein,
Sometimes attempt a loftier ſtrain,
Mount ſheer out of the reader's ſight,
Obſcurely loſt in clouds and night?
Then climb your Pegaſus with ſpeed,
I'll meet thee on the banks of Tweed:
Not as our fathers did of yore,
To ſwell the flood with crimſon gore;
Like the Cadmean murdering brood,
Each thirſting for his brother's blood.
For now all hoſtile rage ſhall ceaſe;
Lull'd in the downy arms of peace,
Our honeſt hands and hearts ſhall join,
O'er jovial banquets, ſparkling wine.
Let Peggy at thy elbow wait,
And I ſhall bring my bonny Kate.
But hold—oh! take a ſpecial care,
T' admit no prying kirkman there;
I dread the penitential chair.
What a ſtrange figure ſhould I make,
A poor abandon'd Engliſh rake;
A 'ſquire well born, and ſix foot high,
Perch'd in that ſacred pillory?
Let ſpleen and zeal be baniſh'd thence,
And troubleſome impertinence,
That tells his ſtory o'er again:
Ill-manners and his faucy train,
And ſelf-conceit, and ſtiff-rumpt pride,
That grin at all the world beſide;
Foul ſcandal, with a load of lies,
Intrigues, rencounters, prodigies;
Fame's buſy hawker, light as air,
That feeds on frailties of the fair:
Envy, hypocriſy, deceit,
Fierce party-rage, and warm debate;
And all the hell-hounds that are foes
To friendſhip and the world's repoſe.
But mirth inſtead, and dimpling ſmiles,
And wit, that gloomy care beguiles;
And joke, and pun, and merry tale,
And toaſts, that round the table ſail:
While laughter, burſting through the crowd
In vollies, tells our joys aloud.

* Lord Somerville was pleaſed to ſend me his own picture, and Mr. Ramſay's works.

† The Scilly iſlands were ſo called by the ancients.

Hark! the ſhrill piper mounts on high,
The woods, the ſtreams, the rocks reply,
To his far-ſounding melody.
Behold each labouring ſqueeze prepare
Supplies of modulated air.
Obſerve Croudero's active bow,
His head ſtill noddling to and fro,
His eyes, his cheeks, with raptures glow.
See, ſee the baſhful nymphs advance,
To lead the regulated dance;
Flying ſtill, the ſwains purſuing,
Yet with backward glances wooing.
This, this ſhall be the joyous ſcene;
Nor wanton elves that ſkim the green
Shall be ſo bleſt, ſo blythe, ſo gay,
Or leſs regard what dotards ſay.
My Roſe ſhall then your Thiſtle greet,
The Union ſhall be more complete;
And, in a bottle and a friend,
Each national diſpute ſhall end.

ANSWER TO THE ABOVE EPISTLE,

BY ALLAN RAMSAY.

Sir, I had your's, and own my pleaſure,
On the receipt, exceeded meaſure.
You write with ſo much ſpirit and glee,
Sae ſmooth, ſae ſtrong, correct, and free;
That any he (by you allow'd
To have ſome merit) may be proud.
If that's my fault, bear you the blame,
Wha've lent me ſic a lift to fame.
Your ain tours high, and widens far,
Bright glancing like the firſt-rate ſtar,
And all the world beſtow due praiſe
On the collection of your lays;
Where various arts and turns combine,
Which even in parts firſt poets ſhine:
Like Mat and Swift ye ſing with eaſe,
And can be Waller when you pleaſe.
Continue, ſir, and ſhame the crew
That's plagu'd with having nought to do,
Who fortune in a merry mood
Has overcharg'd with gentle blood,
But has deny'd a genius fit
For action or aſpiring wit;
Such kenna how t' employ their time,
And think activity a crime:
Aught they to either do, or ſay,
Or walk, or write, or read, or pray!
When money, their Factotum, 's able
To furniſh them a numerous rabble,
Who will, for daily drink and wages,
Be chairmen, chaplains, clerks, and pages:
Could they, like you employ their hours
In planting theſe delightful flowers,
Which carpet the poetic fields,
And laſting funds of pleaſure yields;
Nae mair they'd gaunt and gove away,
Or ſleep or loiter out the day,
Or waſte the night damning their ſauls
In deep debauch, and bawdy brawls:
Whence pox and poverty proceed
An early eild, and ſpirits dead.
Reverſe of you;—and him you love,
Whoſe brighter ſpirit tours above
The mob of thoughtleſs lords and beaux,
Who in his ilka action ſhows
"True friendſhip, love, benevolence,
"Unſtudy'd wit, and manly ſenſe."
Allow here what you've ſaid your ſell,
Nought can b' expreſt ſo juſt and well:
To him and her, worthy his love,
And every bleſſing from above,
A ſon is given, God ſave the boy,
For theirs and every Som'ril's joy.
Ye wardins round him take your place,
And raiſe him with each manly grace;
Make his meridian virtues ſhine,
To add freſh luſtres to his line:
And many may the mother ſee
Of ſuch a lovely progeny.

Now, ſir, when Boreas nae mair thuds
Hail, ſnaw and ſleet, frae blacken'd clouds;
While Caledonia's hills are green,
And a' her ſtraths delight the een;
While ilka flower with fragrance blows,
And a' the year its beauty ſhows;
Before again the winter lour,
What hinders then your northern tour?
Be ſure of welcome: nor believe
Thoſe wha an ill report would give
To Ed'nburgh and the land of cakes,
That nought what's neceſſary lacks.
Here plenty's goddeſs frae her horn
Pours fiſh and cattle, claith and corn,
In blyth abundance;—and yet mair,
Our men are brave, our ladies fair.
Nor will North Britain yield for fouth
Of ilka thing, and fellows couth,
To any but her ſiſter South.—

True, rugged roads are curſed driegh,
And ſpeats aft roar frae mountains high:
The body tires—poor tottering clay,
And likes with eaſe at hame to ſtay;
While ſauls ſtride warlds at ilka ſtend,
And can their widening views extend.
Mine ſees you, while you chearfu' roam
On ſweet Avona's flowery howm,
There recollecting, with full view,
Thoſe follies which mankind purſue;
While, conſcious of ſuperior merit,
You riſe with a correcting ſpirit;
And, as an agent of the gods,
Laſh them with ſharp ſatyric rods:
Labour divine!—Next, for a change,
O'er hill and dale I ſee you range,
After the fox or whidding hare,
Confirming health in pureſt air;
While joy frae heights and dales reſounds,
Rais'd by the hola, horn and hounds:
Fatigu'd, yet pleas'd, the chaſe outrun,
I ſee the friend, and ſetting ſun,
Invite you to the temperate bicker,
Which makes the blood and wit flow quicker.
The clock ſtrikes twelve, to reſt you bound,
To ſave your health by ſleeping ſound.
Thus with cool head and healſome breaſt
You ſee new day ſtream frae the eaſt:
Then all the muſes round you ſhine,
Inſpiring every thought divine;

Be long their aid—Your years and bleſſes,
Your ſervant Allan Ramſay wiſhes.

TO ALLAN RAMSAY,

Upon his publiſhing a ſecond Volume of Poems.

Hail, Caledonian bard! whoſe rural ſtrains
Delight the liſtening hills, and cheer the plains!
Already poliſh'd by ſome hand divine,
Thy purer ore what furnace can refine?
Careleſs of cenſure, like the ſun, ſhine forth,
In native luſtre, and intrinſic worth.
To follow nature is by rules to write,
She led the way, and taught the Stagirite.
From her the critic's taſte, the poet's fire,
Both drudge in vain, till ſhe from heaven inſpire:
By the ſame guide inſtructed how to ſoar,
Allan is now what Homer was before.
Ye choſen youths! who dare like him aſpire,
And touch with bolder hand the golden lyre!
Keep nature ſtill in view; on her intent,
Climb by her aid the dangerous ſteep aſcent
To laſting fame. Perhaps a little art
Is needful, to plane o'er ſome rugged part;
But the moſt labour'd elegance and care,
T' arrive at full perfection muſt deſpair.
Alter, blot out, and write all o'er again,
Alas! ſome venial ſins will yet remain.
Indulgence is to human frailty due,
Ev'n Pope has faults, and Addiſon a few;
But thoſe, like miſts that cloud the morning ray,
Are loſt and vaniſh in the blaze of day.
Though ſome intruding pimple find a place
Amid the glories of Clarinda's face,
We ſtill love on, with equal zeal adore,
Nor think her leſs a goddeſs than before.
Slight wounds in no diſgraceful ſcars ſhall end,
Heal'd by the balm of ſome good-natur'd friend.
In vain ſhall canker'd Zoilus aſſail,
While Spence preſides, and candour holds the ſcale.
His generous breaſt, nor envy ſours, nor ſpite,
Taught by his * founder's motto how to write,
Good manners guides his pen. Learn'd without pride,
In dubious points not forward to decide.
If here and there uncommon beauties riſe,
From flower to flower he roves with glad ſurpriſe.
In failings no malignant pleaſure takes,
Nor rudely triumphs over ſmall miſtakes.
No nauſeous praiſe, no biting taunts offend,
W' expect a cenſor, and we find a friend.
Poets, improv'd by his correcting care,
Shall face their foes with more undaunted air,
Stripp'd of their rags, ſhall like Ulyſſes ſhine,
With more heroic port, and grace divine.
No pomp of learning, and no ſund of ſenſe,
Can e'er atone for loſt benevolence.
May Wykeham's ſons, who in each art excel,
And rival ancient bards in writing well, [ſing,
While from their bright examples taught they
And emulate their flights with bolder wing,
From their own frailties learn the humbler part,
Mildly to judge in gentleneſs of heart!

* William of Wykeham, "Manners maketh man."

Such critics, Ramſay, jealous for our fame,
Will not with malice inſolently blame,
But lur'd by praiſe the haggard muſe reclaim.
Retouch each line till all is juſt and neat,
A whole of proper parts, a work almoſt complete.
So when ſome beauteous dame, a reigning toaſt,
The flower of Forth, and proud Edina's boaſt,
Stands at her toilet in her tartan plaid,
In all her richeſt head-geer trimly clad,
The curious hand-maid, with obſervant eye,
Corrects the ſwelling hoop that hangs awry;
Through every plait her buſy fingers rove,
And now ſhe plies below, and then above,
With pleaſing tattle entertains the fair,
Each ribbon ſmooths, adjuſts each rambling hair,
Till the gay nymph in her full luſtre ſhine,
And Homer's Juno was not half ſo fine.

TO THE

AUTHOR OF THE ESSAY ON MAN.

Was ever work to ſuch perfection wrought;
How elegant the diction! pure the thought!
Not ſparingly adorn'd with ſcatter'd rays,
But one bright beauty, one collected blaze:
So breaks the day upon the ſhades of night,
Enlivening all with one unbounded light.
To humble man's proud heart, thy great deſign;
But who can read this wondrous work divine,
So juſtly plann'd, and ſo politely writ,
And not be proud, and boaſt of human wit?
Yet juſt to thee, and to thy precepts true,
Let us know man, and give to God his due;
His image we, but mix'd with coarſe allay,
Our happineſs to love, adore, obey;
To praiſe him for each gracious boon beſtow'd,
For this thy work, for every leſſer good,
With proſtrate hearts before his throne to fall,
And own the great Creator all in all.
The muſe, which ſhould inſtruct, now entertains,
On trifling ſubjects, in enervate ſtrains;
Be it thy taſk to ſet the wanderer right,
Point out her way in her aerial flight;
Her noble mien, her honours loſt reſtore,
And bid her deeply think, and proudly ſoar.
Thy theme ſublime, and eaſy verſe, will prove
Her high deſcent, and miſſion from above.
Let others now tranſlate; thy abler pen
Shall vindicate the ways of God to men;
In virtue's cauſe ſhall glorioully prevail,
When the bench frowns in vain, and pulpits fail,
Made wiſe by thee, whoſe happy ſtyle conveys
The pureſt morals in the ſofteſt lays,
As angels once, ſo now we mortals bold
Shall climb the ladder Jacob view'd of old;
Thy kind reforming muſe ſhall lead the way
To the bright regions of eternal day.

EPISTLE TO MR. THOMSON,

ON THE FIRST EDITION OF HIS SEASONS.

So bright, ſo dark, upon an April day,
The ſun darts forth, or hides his various ray;

So high, so low, the lark aspiring sings,
Or drops to earth again with folded wings;
So smooth, so rough, the sea that laves our shores,
Smiles in a calm, or in a tempest roars.
Believe me, Thomson, 'tis not thus I write,
Severely kind, by envy sour'd or spite:
Nor would I rob thy brows to grace my own;
Such arts are to my honest soul unknown.
I read thee over as a friend should read,
Griev'd when you fail, o'erjoy'd when you succeed.
Why should thy muse, born so divinely fair,
Want the reforming toilet's daily care?
Dress the gay maid, improve each native grace,
And call forth all the glories of her face:
Studiously plain, and elegantly clean,
With unaffected speech, and easy mien,
Th' accomplish'd nymph, in all her best attire,
Courts shall applaud, and prostrate crowds admire.
Discretely daring, with a stiffen'd rein,
Firm in thy seat the flying steed restrain.
Though few thy faults, who can perfection boast?
Spots in the sun are in his lustre lost:
Yet ev'n those spots expunge with patient care,
Nor fondly the minuteſt error spare.
For kind and wise the parent, who reproves
The slightest blemish in the child he loves.
Read Philips much, consider Milton more;
But from their dross extract the purer ore.
To coin new words, or to restore the old,
In southern bards is dangerous and bold;
But rarely, very rarely, will succeed,
When minted on the other side of Tweed.
Let perspicuity o'er all preside—
Soon shalt thou be the nation's joy and pride.
The rhiming, jingling tribe, with bells and song,
Who drive their limping Pegasus along,
Shall learn from thee in bolder flights to rise
To scorn the beaten road, and range the skies.
A genius so refin'd, so just, so great,
In Britain's isle shall fix the muse's seat,
And new Parnassus shall at home create:
Rules from thy works each future bard shall draw,
Thy works, above the critic's nicer law,
And rich in brilliant gems without a flaw.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
LADY ANNE COVENTRY.

Upon viewing her fine Chimney-piece of Shell-work.

The greedy merchant ploughs the sea for gain,
And rides exulting o'er the watery plain:
While howling tempests, from their rocky bed,
Indignant break around his careful head.
The royal fleet the liquid waste explores,
And speaks in thunder to the trembling shores;
The voice of wrath awak'd the nations hear,
The vanquish'd hope, and the proud victors fear;
Those quit their chain, and these resign their palm,
While Britain's awful flag commands a calm.
The curious sage, nor gain nor fame pursues,
With other eyes the boiling deep he views;
Hangs o'er the cliff inquisitive to know
The secret causes of its ebb and flow;
Whence breathe the winds that ruffle its smooth face,
Or ranks in classes all the fishy race,
From those enormous monsters of the main,
Who in their world, like other tyrants, reign,
To the poor cockle-tribe, that humble band,
Who cleave to rocks, or loiter on the strand.
Yet ev'n their shells the forming hand divine
Has, with distinguish'd lustre, taught to shine.
What bright enamel! and what various dyes!
What lively tints delight our wondering eyes!
Th' Almighty painter glows in every line:
How mean, alas! is Raphael's bold design,
And Titian's colouring, if compar'd to thine!
Justly supreme! let us thy power revere,
Thou fill'st all space! all-beauteous every where,
Thy rising sun with blushes paints the morn,
Thy shining lamps the face of night adorn;
Thy flowers the meads, thy nodding trees the hills;
The vales thy pastures green, and bubbling rills;
Thy coral groves, thy rocks that amber weep,
Deck all the gloomy mansions of the deep;
Thy yellow sands distinct with golden ore,
And these thy variegated shells the shore.
To all thy works such grandeur hast thou lent,
And such extravagance of ornament.
For the false traitor, man, this pomp and show!
A scene so gay, for us poor worms below!
No—for thy glory all these beauties rise,
Yet may improve the good, instruct the wise.
You, madam, sprung from Beaufort's royal line,
Who, lost to courts, can in your closet shine,
Best know to use each blessing he bestows,
Best know to praise the power from whence it flows.
Shells in your hand the Parian rock defy,
Or agat, or Ægyptian porphyry—
More glossy they, their veins of brighter dye.
See! where your rising pyramids aspire,
Your guests surpris'd the shining pile admire!
In future times, if some great Phidias rise,
Whose chissel with his mistress nature vies,
Who, with superior skill, can lightly trace
In the hard marble block the softeſt face:
To crown this piece, so elegantly neat,
Your well-wrought bust shall the whole complete;
O'er your own work from age to age preside,
Its author once, and then its greatest pride.

ADDRESS

To his Elbow-chair new-clothed.

My dear companion, and my faithful friend!
If Orpheus taught the listening oaks to bend;
If stones and rubbish, at Amphion's call,
Danc'd into form, and built the Theban wall;
Why should'st not thou attend my humble lays,
And hear my grateful harp resound thy praise?
True, thou art spruce and fine, a very beau;
But what are trappings and external show?
To real worth alone I make my court,
Knaves are my scorn, and coxcombs are my sport.
Once I beheld thee far less trim and gay;
Ragged, disjointed, and to worms a prey;
The safe retreat of every lurking mouse;
Derided, shunn'd; the lumber of my house!

Thy robe how chang'd from what it was before!
Thy velvet robe, which pleas'd my fires of yore!
'Tis thus capricious fortune wheels us round;
Aloft we mount—then tumble to the ground.
Yet grateful then, my conſtancy I prov'd;
I knew thy worth; my friend in rags I lov'd;
I lov'd thee more; nor, like a courtier, ſpurn'd
My benefactor, when the tide was turn'd.
With conſcious ſhame, yet frankly, I confeſs,
That in my youthful days—I lov'd thee leſs.
Where vanity, where pleaſure call'd, I ſtray'd;
And every wayward appetite obey'd.
But ſage experience taught me how to prize
Myſelf; and how, this world: ſhe bade me riſe
To nobler flights regardleſs of a race
Of factious emmets; pointed where to place
My bliſs, and lodg'd me in thy ſoft embrace.
Here on thy yielding down I ſit ſecure;
And, patiently, what heaven has ſent, endure;
From all the futile cares of buſineſs free;
Not fond of life, but yet content to be:
Here mark the fleeting hours; regret the paſt;
And ſeriouſly prepare to meet the laſt.
So ſafe on ſhore the penſion'd ſailor lies;
And all the malice of the ſtorm defies:
With eaſe of body bleſt, and peace of mind,
Pities the reſtleſs crew he left behind;
Whilſt, in his cell, he meditates alone
On his great voyage, to the world unknown.

SONG.

As o'er Aſteria's fields I rove,
The bliſsful ſeat of peace and love,
Ten thouſand beauties round me riſe,
And mingle pleaſure with ſurpriſe.
By nature bleſt in every part,
Adorn'd with every grace of art,
This paradiſe of blooming joys
Each raptur'd ſenſe, at once, employs.

But when I view the radiant queen,
Who form'd this fair enchanting ſcene;
Pardon, ye grots! ye cryſtal floods!
Ye breathing flowers! ye ſhady woods!
Your coolneſs now no more invites;
No more your murmuring ſtream delights;
Your ſweets decay, your verdure's flown;
My ſoul's intent on her alone.

PARAPHRASE UPON A FRENCH SONG.

" Venge moi d'une ingrate maitreſſe,
" Dieu du vin, j'implore bon yvreſſe."

Kind relief in all my pain,
Jolly Bacchus! hear my prayer,
Vengeance on th' ingrateful fair!
In thy ſmiling cordial bowl,
Drown the ſorrows of my ſoul,
All thy deity employ,
Gild each gloomy thought with joy.
Jolly Bacchus! ſave, oh ſave,
From the deep devouring grave,
A poor, deſpairing, dying ſwain.
Haſte away,
Haſte away,
Laſh thy tigers, do not ſtay,
I'm undone if thou delay.
If I view thoſe eyes once more,
Still ſhall love, and ſtill adore,
And be more wretched than before.
See the glory round her face!
See her move!
With what a grace!—
Ye gods above!
Is ſhe not one of your immortal race?—
Fly, ye winged Cupids, fly,
Dart like lightning through the ſky:
Would ye in marble temples dwell,
The dear-one to my arms compel;
Bring her in bands of myrtle tied:
Bid her forget, and bid her hide,
All her ſcorn, and all her pride.
Would ye that your ſlave repay
A ſmoking hecatomb each day;
O reſtore
The beauteous goddeſs I adore;
O reſtore, with all her charms,
The faithleſs vagrant to my arms!

HUDIBRAS AND MILTON RECONCILED.

TO SIR ADOLPHUS OUGHTON.

" Si fractus illabatur orbis,
" Impavidum ferient ruinæ."——Hor.

Dear knight, how great a drudge is he
Who would excel in poetry!
And yet how few have learnt the art,
T' inform the head, or touch the heart!
Some, with a dry and barren brain,
Poor rogues! like coſtive lap-dogs ſtrain;
While others with a flux of wit,
The reader and their friends beſh-t.
Would you (Sir Knight) my judgment know?
He ſtill writes worſt who writes ſo-ſo.
In this the mighty ſecret lies,
To elevate and to ſurpriſe:
Thus far my pen at random run,
The fire was out, the clock ſtruck one,
When, lo! ſtrange hollow murmurs from without,
Invade my ears. In every quarter rous'd,
The warring winds ruſh from their rocky caves
Tumultuous; the vapours dank, or dry,
Beneath their ſtandards rang'd, with lowering front
Darken the welkin. At each dreadful ſhock
Oaks, pines, and elms, down to their mother earth
Bend low their ſuppliant heads: the nodding towers
Menace deſtruction, and old Edrick's houſe
From its foundation ſhakes. The bellowing clouds
Burſt into rain, or gild their ſable ſkirts
With flakes of ruddy fire; fierce elements
In ruin reconcil'd! redoubled peals
Of ceaſeleſs thunder roar. Convulſions rend
The firmament. The whole creation ſtands
Mute and appall'd, and trembling waits its doom.
And now perhaps, dear friend, you wonder
In this dread ſcene of wind, rain, thunder,

What a poor guilty wretch could do;
Then hear—(for, faith, I tell you true)
I water'd, ſhook my giddy head,
Gravely broke wind, and went to bed.

UPON MIRANDA'S LEAVING THE COUNTRY.

The ſun departing hides his head,
The lily and the roſe are dead,
The birds forget to ſing;
The cooing turtles now no more
Repeat their amorous ditties o'er,
But watch th' approaching ſpring.

For ſoon the merry month of May
Reſtores the bright all-cheering ray;
Soft notes charm every grove:
The flowers ambroſial incenſe breathe,
And all above, and all beneath,
Is fragrance, joy, and love.

So when Miranda hence retires,
Each ſhepherd only not expires:
How rueful is the ſcene!
How the dull moments creep along!
No ſportive dance, nor rural ſong,
No gambols on the green.

Yet, when the radiant nymph appears,
Each field its richeſt livery wears,
All nature's blith and gay;
The ſwains tranſported with delight,
After a long and gloomy night,
Bleſs the reviving day.

While thus, indulgent to our prayer
Kind heaven permitted us to ſhare
A bleſſing ſo divine;
While ſmiling hope gave ſome relief,
And joys alternate ſooth'd our grief,
What ſhepherd could repine?

But now—her fatal loſs we mourn,
Never, oh! never to return
To theſe deſerted plains;
Undone, abandon'd to deſpair,
Alas! 'tis winter all the year
To us unhappy ſwains.

Ye little loves, lament around;
With empty quivers ſtrew the ground,
Your bows unbent lay down;
Harmleſs your wounds, pointleſs your darts,
And frail your empire o'er our hearts,
Till ſhe your triumphs crown.

Ye nymphs, ye fawns, complaining ſigh;
Ye graces, let your treſſes fly,
The ſport of every wind:
Ye mimic echoes tell the woods,
Repeat it to the murmuring floods,
She's gone! ſhe's gone! unkind!

Break, ſhepherds, break each tuneleſs reed,
Let all your flocks at random feed,
Each flowery garland tear;
Since wit and beauty quit the plain,
Paſt pleaſures but enhance our pain,
And life's not worth our care.

TO PHYLLIS.

Though cloſe immur'd, poor captive maid!
Young Danaë play'd a wanton's part;
The gold that in her lap was laid,
Soon found a paſſage to her heart.

Ambitious Semele, beguil'd
By Juno's unrelenting hate,
Amid the bright deſtruction ſmil'd,
Enjoy'd her god, and dy'd in ſtate.

The ſwan on Leda's whiter breaſt,
Artful deceiver! neſtling lay,
With joy ſhe claſp'd her downy gueſt,
Fond of a bird ſo ſoft and gay.

What boon can faithful merit ſhare,
Where intereſt reigns, or pride, or ſhow?
'Tis the rich banker wins the fair,
The garter'd knight, or feather'd beau.

No more my panting heart ſhall beat,
Nor Phyllis claim one parting groan?
Her tears, her vows, are all a cheat,
For woman loves herſelf alone.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE EARL OF HALIFAX,

With the Fable of the two Springs.

O Halifax! a name for ever dear
To Phœbus, and which all the Nine revere;
Accept this humble pledge of my eſteem,
So juſtly thine, benevolence my theme.
In myſtic tales, and parables, of old
Grave eaſtern ſeers inſtructive leſſons told;
Wiſe Greece from them receiv'd the happy plan
And taught the brute to pedagogue the man.
The matron Truth appears with better grace,
When well-wrought fables veil her reverend face:
Dry precept may inſtruct, but can't delight,
While pleaſing fictions all our powers excite.
Our buſy minds each faculty employ,
And range around, and ſtart their game with joy;
Pleas'd with the chaſe, make the rich prey their own,
And glory in the conqueſts they have won.
Fable alone can crown the poet's brow,
Upon his works immortal charms beſtow:
And 'twere a ſin that method to diſprove,
Which Heaven has fix'd by ſanctions from above.
My humble muſe in calm retirement roves
Near moſſy fountains, and near ſhady groves:
Yet there, ev'n there, her loyal hands would raiſe
Some rural trophy to her monarch's praiſe;
Inſtruct thoſe fountains and thoſe groves to ſhow,
What copious bleſſings from his bounty flow;
While flowers and ſhrubs bleſs his propitious aid,
His urn refreſhing, or protecting ſhade.
Great friend of human kind! thy pious hand
Nor wounds to kill, nor conquers to command.
Let haughty tyrants of falſe glory dream,
Without remorſe purſue the bloody ſcheme;
To fame forbidden tread the lawleſs way,
And o'er the ravag'd world extend their ſway;

'Tis thine, great George, to guard thy favourite isle
From open force, and every secret wile,
To raise th' oppress'd, to make the captives smile;
To pay just heaven what righteous monarchs owe,
And, like that heaven, to bless the world below:
To build new temples, to repair the old,
To bring the straggling sheep into the fold,
And by wise laws restore an age of gold.
Ye blissful seats where Tame and Isis join,
Lovely retirement of the sacred Nine,
Parent of arts, and once my sweet abode,
Can ye forget the blessings he bestow'd?
Can sophistry prevail against that prince,
Whose mercy and beneficence convince?
Oh! touch each tuneful string, let every muse
From all her stores her noblest Pæans choose;
Pay what she can in tributary lays,
And to his virtue grant supplies of praise.
To all the world your grateful hearts make known,
And in your monarch's fame record your own.
His fame—which envy's breath can never blast,
But ages yet to come shall join the past,
And Brunswick's glory with the world shall last.

A SONG FOR THE LUTE.

Gently, my lute, move every string,
Soft as my sighs, reveal my pain;
While I, in plaintive numbers, sing
Of slighted vows, and cold disdain.

In vain her airs, in vain her art,
In vain she frowns when I appear;
Thy notes shall melt her frozen heart;
She cannot hate, if she can hear.

And see she smiles! through all the groves
Triumphant Iö-Pæans sound:
Clap all your wings, ye little loves;
Ye sportive graces, dance around.

Ye listening oaks, bend to my song;
Not Orpheus play'd a nobler lay:
Ye savages, about me throng;
Ye rocks, and harder hearts, obey.

She comes, she comes, relenting fair!
To fill with joy my longing arms;
What faithful lover can despair,
Who thus with verse, and music, charms?

THE COQUET.

When tortur'd by the cruel fair
And almost mad with wild despair,
My fleeting spirits rove;
One cordial glance restores her slave,
Redeems me from the gaping grave,
And soothes my soul to love.

Thus in a sea of doubt I'm tos'd,
Now sunk, now thrown upon the coast;
What wretch can long endure
Such odd, perplexing pangs as these,
When neither mortal the disease,
Nor yet complete the cure?

Proud tyrant! since to save, or kill,
Depends on thy capricious will,
This milder sentence give;
Reverse my strange, untoward fate,
Oh! let me perish by thy hate,
Or by thy kindness live!

THE SUPERANNUATED LOVER.

Dead to the soft delights of love,
Spare me, O! spare me, cruel boy:
Nor seek in vain that heart to move,
Which pants no more with amorous joy.

Of old, thy faithful hardy swain,
(When smit with fair Pastora's charms)
I serv'd thee many a long campaign,
And wide I spread thy conquering arms.

Now, mighty God, dismiss thy slave,
To feeble age let youth succeed;
Recruit among the strong and brave,
And kindly spare an invalid.

Adieu, fond hopes, fantastic cares,
Ye killing joys, ye pleasing pains!
My soul for better guests prepares,
Reason restor'd, and virtue reigns.

But why, my Cloe, tell me why?
Why trickles down this silent tear?
Why do these blushes rise and die?
Why stand I mute when thou art here?

Ev'n sleep affords my soul no rest,
Thee bathing in the stream I view;
With thee I dance, with thee I feast,
Thee through the gloomy grove pursue.

Triumphant god of gay desires!
Thy vassal's raging pains remove;
I burn, I burn, with fierce fires,
Oh! take my life, or crown my love.

ADVICE TO THE LADIES.

Who now regards Chloris, her tears, and her whining,
Her sighs and fond wishes, and awkward repining?
What a pother is here, with her amorous glances,
Soft fragments of Ovid, and scraps of romances!

A nice prude at fifteen! and a romp in decay!
Cold December affects the sweet blossoms of May;
To fawn in her dotage, and in her bloom spurn us,
Is to quench love's bright torch, and with touch-wood to burn us.

Believe me, dear maids, there's no way of evading;
While ye pish, and cry nay, your roses are fading:
Though your passion survive, your beauty will dwindle,
And our languishing embers can never rekindle.

When bright in your zeniths we prostrate before ye,
When ye set in a cloud, what fool will adore ye?
Then, ye fair, be advis'd, and snatch the kind blessing,
And shew your good conduct by timely possessing.

ANACREONTIC.

TO CLOE DRINKING.

When, my dear Cloe, you reſign
One happy hour to mirth and wine,
Each glaſs you drink ſtill paints your face
With ſome new victorious grace:
Charm in reſerve my ſoul ſurpriſe,
And by freſh wounds your lover dies.
Who can reſiſt thee, lovely fair!
That wit! that ſoft engaging air!
Each panting heart its homage pays,
And all the vaſſal world obeys.
God of the grape, boaſt now no more
Thy triumphs on far Indus' ſhore:
Each uſeleſs weapon now lay down,
Thy tigers, car, and ivy crown;
Give but this juice in full ſupplies,
And truſt thy fame to Cloe's eyes.

TO A DISCARDED TOAST.

Celia, confeſs 'tis all in vain,
To patch the ruins of thy face;
Nor of ill-natur'd time complain,
That robs it of each blooming grace.

If love no more ſhall bend his bow,
Nor point his arrows from thine eye,
If no lac'd fop, nor feather'd beau,
Deſpairing at thy feet ſhall die:

Yet ſtill, my charmer, wit like thine
Shall triumph over age and fate;
Thy ſetting beams with luſtre ſhine,
And rival their meridian height.

Beauty, fair flower! ſoon fades away,
And tranſient are the joys of love;
But wit, and virtue, ne'er decay,

THE PERJUR'D MISTRESS.

From Horace, Epod. xv. ad Neæram.

'Twas night, and heaven intent with all its eyes
Gaz'd on the dear deceitful maid;
A thouſand pretty things ſhe ſaid,
A thouſand artful tricks ſhe play'd,
From me, deluded me, her falſehood to diſguiſe.

She claſp'd me in her ſoft encircling arms,
She preſs'd her glowing cheek to mine,
The clinging ivy, or the curling vine,
Did never yet ſo cloſely twine;
Who could be man and bear the luſtre of her charms?

And thus ſhe ſwore: by all the powers above,
When winter ſtorms ſhall ceaſe to roar,
When ſummer ſuns ſhall ſhine no more,
When wolves their cruelty give o'er,
Neæra then, and not till then, ſhall ceaſe to love.

Ah! falſe Neæra! perjur'd fair! but know,
I have a ſoul too great to bear
A rival's proud inſulting air,
Another may be found as fair,
As fair, ungrateful nymph! and far more juſt than you.
Shouldſt thou repent, and at my feet be laid,
Dejected, penitent, forlorn,
And all thy former follies mourn,
Thy proffer'd paſſion I would ſcorn:
The gods ſhall do me right on that devoted head.

And you, ſpruce ſir, who inſolently gay,
Exulting, laugh at my diſgrace,
Boaſt with vain airs, and ſtiff grimace,
Your large eſtate, your handſome face,
Proud of a fleeting bliſs, the pageant of a day:

You too ſhall ſoon repent this haughty ſcorn;
When, fickle as the ſea or wind,
The proſtitute ſhall change her mind,
To ſuch another coxcomb kind;
Then ſhall I clap my wings, and triumph in my turn.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

Who ſpent the Night in Tears, upon a Report that her Brother was to fight a Duel the next Morning.

Pastora weeps, let every lover mourn,
Her grief is no leſs fatal than her ſcorn:
Thoſe ſhining orbs inflict an equal pain,
O'erflown with tears, or pointed with diſdain.
When doubts and fears invade the tender breaſt,
Where peace, and joy, and love ſhould ever reſt;
As flowers depriv'd of the ſun's genial ray,
Earthward we bend, and ſilently decay;
In ſpight of all philoſophy can do,
Our hearts relent, the burſting torrents flow,
We feel her pains, and propagate her woe.
Each mournful muſe laments the weeping fair,
The graces all their comely treſſes tear,
Love drags his wings, and droops his little head,
And Venus mourns as for Adonis dead.
Patience, dear maid, nor without cauſe complain,
O laviſh not theſe precious drops in vain:
Under the ſhield of your prevailing charms,
Your happy brother lives ſecure from harms,
Your bright reſemblance all my rage diſarms.
Your influence unable to withſtand,
The conſcious ſteel drops from my trembling hand;
Low at your feet the guilty weapon lies,
The foe repents, and the fond lover dies.
Æneas thus by men and gods purſued,
Feeble with wounds, defil'd with duſt and blood,
Beauty's bright goddeſs interpos'd her charms,
And ſav'd the hopes of Troy from Grecian arms.

TO DR. M——

READING MATHEMATICS.

Vain our purſuits of knowledge, vain our care,
The coſt and labour we may juſtly ſpare.
Death from this coarſe alloy refines the mind,
Leaves us at large t' expatiate unconfin'd;
All ſcience opens to our wondering eyes,
And the good man is in a moment wiſe.

FROM MARTIAL.

EPIG. xlvii.

Would you, my friend, find out the true receipt,
To live at eaſe, and ſtem the tide of fate;

The grand elixir thus you muſt infuſe,
And theſe ingredients to be happy chooſe:
Firſt an eſtate, not got with toil and ſweat,
But unincumber'd left, and free from debt:
For let that be your dull foreſather's care,
To pinch and drudge for his deſerving heir;
Fruitful and rich, in land that's ſound and good,
That fills your barns with corn, your hearth with wood;
That cold nor hunger may your houſe infeſt,
While flames invade the ſkies, and pudding crowns the feaſt.
A quiet mind, ſerene, and free from care,
Nor puzzling on the bench, nor noiſy at the bar;
A body ſound, that phyſic cannot mend;
And the beſt phyſic of the mind, a friend,
Equal in birth, in humour, and in place,
Thy other ſelf, diſtinguiſh'd but by face;
Whoſe ſympathetic ſoul takes equal ſhare
Of all thy pleaſure, and of all thy care.
A modeſt board, adorn'd with men of ſenſe,
No French ragouts, nor French impertinence,
A merry bottle to engender wit,
Not over-dos'd, but quantum ſufficit:
Equal the error is in each exceſs,
Nor dullneſs leſs a ſin, than drunkenneſs.
A tender wife diſſolving by thy ſide,
Eaſy and chaſte, free from debate and pride,
Each day a miſtreſs, and each night a bride.
Sleep undiſturb'd, and at the dawn of day,
The merry horn, that chides thy tedious ſtay;
A horſe that's clean, ſure-footed, ſwift, and ſound,
And dogs that make the echoing clifts reſound;
That ſweep the dewy plains, out-fly the wind,
And leave domeſtic ſorrows far behind. [paſt.
Pleas'd with thy preſent lot, nor grudging at the
Nor fearing when thy time ſhall come, nor hoping for thy laſt.

TO A GENTLEMAN,

WHO MARRIED HIS CAST MISTRESS.

From Horace, Book III. Ode ix.

D. While I was yours, and yours alone,
Proud, and tranſported with your charms,
I envy'd not the Perſian throne,
But reign'd more glorious in your arms.

B. While you were true, nor Suky fair
Had chas'd poor Bruny from your breaſt;
Not Ilia could with me compare,
So fam'd, or ſo divinely bleſt.

D. In Suky's arms entranc'd I lie,
So ſweetly ſings the warbling fair!
For whom moſt willingly I'd die,
Would fate the gentle ſyren ſpare.

B. Me Billy burns with mutual fire,
For whom I'd die, in whom I live,
For whom each moment I'd expire,
Might he, my better part, ſurvive.

D. Should I once more my heart reſign,
Would you the penitent receive?
Would Suky ſcorn'd atone my crime?
And would my Bruny own her ſlave?

B. Though brighter he than blazing ſtar,
More fickle thou than wind or ſea,
With thee, my kind returning dear,
I'd live, contented die with thee.

A DAINTY NEW BALLAD:

Occaſioned by a Clergyman's Widow of ſeventy years of age, being married to a young Exciſeman.

There liv'd in our good town,
A relick of the gown,
A chaſte and humble dame;
Who, when her man of God
Was cold as any clod,
Dropt many a tear in vain.

But now, good people, learn all,
No grief can be eternal;
Nor is it meet, I ween,
That folks ſhould always whimper,
There is a time to ſimper,
As quickly ſhall be ſeen.

For love, that little urchin,
About this widow lurching,
Had ſlily fix'd his dart;
The ſilent creeping flame
Boil'd ſore in every vein,
And glow'd about her heart.

So when a pipe we ſmoke,
And from the flint provoke
The ſparks that twinkling play;
The touch-wood old and dry
With heat begins to fry,
And gently waſtes away.

With art ſhe patch'd up nature,
Reforming every feature,
Reſtoring every grace:
To gratify her pride,
She ſtopp'd each cranny wide,
And painted o'er her face.

Nor red, nor eke the white,
Was wanting to invite,
Nor coral lips that pout;
But, oh, in vain ſhe tries!
With darts to arm thoſe eyes
That dimly ſquint about.

With order and with care,
Her pyramid of hair
Sublimely mounts the ſky;
And, that ſhe might prevail,
She bolſter'd up her tail,
With rumps three ſtories high.

With many a rich perfume,
She purify'd her room,
As there was need, no doubt;
For on theſe warm occaſions,
Offenſive exhalations
Are apt to fly about.

On beds of roſes lying,
Expecting, wiſhing, dying,
Thus languiſh'd for her love
The Cyprian queen of old,
As merry bards have told,
All in a myrtle grove.

In pale of mother church,
She fondly hop'd to lurch,
But, ah me! hop'd in vain;
No doctor could be found,
Who this her caſe profound
Durſt venture to explain.

At length a youth full ſmart,
Who oft by magic art
Had div'd in many a hole;
Or kilderkin, or tun,
Or hogſhead, 'twas all one,
He'd ſound it with his pole.

His art, and eke his face,
So ſuited to her caſe,
Engag'd her love-ſick heart;
Quoth ſhe, my pretty Diver,
With thee I'll live for ever,
And from thee never part.

For thee my bloom reviving,
For thee freſh charms ariſing,
Shall melt thee into joy;
Nor doubt, my pretty ſweeting,
Ere nine months are completing,
To ſee a bonny boy.

As ye have ſeen, no doubt,
A candle when juſt out,
In flames break forth again;
So ſhone this widow bright,
All blazing in deſpight
Of threeſcore years and ten.

CANIDIA'S EPITHALAMIUM.

UPON THE SAME.

Time as malevolent, as old,
To blaſt Canidia's face,
(Which once 'twas rapture to behold)
With wrinkles and diſgrace.

Not ſo in blooming beauty bright,
Each envying virgin's pattern,
She reign'd with undiſputed right
A * prieſteſs of St. Cattern.

Each ſprightly ſoph, each brawny thrum,
Spent his firſt runnings here;
And hoary doctors dribbling come,
To languiſh and deſpair.

Low at her feet the proſtrate arts
Their humble homage pay;
To her the tyrant of their hearts,
Each bard directs his lay.

But now, when impotent to pleaſe,
Alas! ſhe would be doing;
Reverſing nature's wiſe decrees,
She goes herſelf a-wooing.

Though brib'd with all her pelf, the ſwain
Moſt awkwardly complies;
Preſs'd to bear arms, he ſerves in pain,
Or from his colours flies.

So does an ivy, green when old,
And ſprouting in decay;
In juiceleſs, joyleſs arms infold
A ſapling young and gay.

The thriving plant, if better join'd,
Would emulate the ſkies;
But, to that wither'd trunk confin'd,
Grows ſickly, pines, and dies.

HUNTING-SONG.

Behold, my friend, the roſy-finger'd morn,
With bluſhes on her face,
Peeps o'er yon azure hill;
Rich gems the trees enchaſe,
Pearls from each buſh diſtil,
Ariſe, ariſe, and hail the light new-born.

Hark! hark! the merry horn calls, Come away:
Quit, quit the downy bed;
Break from Amynta's arms;
Oh, let it ne'er be ſaid,
That all, that all her charms,
Though ſhe's as Venus fair, can tempt thy ſtay.

Perplex thy ſoul no more with cares below,
For what will pelf avail!
Thy courſer paws the ground,
Each beagle cocks his tail,
They ſpend their mouths around,
While health, and pleaſure, ſmiles on every brow.

Try, huntſmen, all the brakes, ſpread all the plain,
Now, now, ſhe's gone away,
Strip, ſtrip, with ſpeed purſue;
The jocund god of day,
Who fain our ſport would view,
See, ſee, he flogs his fiery ſteeds in vain.

Pour down, like a flood from the hills, brave boys,
On the wings of the wind
The merry beagles fly;
Dull ſorrow lags behind:
Ye ſhrill echoes, reply;
Catch each flying ſound, and double our joys.

Ye rocks, woods, and caves, our muſic repeat:
The bright ſpheres thus above,
A gay refulgent train,
Harmoniouſly move
O'er yon celeſtial plain
Like us whirl along, in concert ſo ſweet.

Now Puſs threads the brakes, and heavily flies,
At the head of the pack
Old Fidler bears the bell,
Every foil he hunts back,
And aloud rings her knell,
Till, forc'd into view, ſhe pants, and ſhe dies.

In life's dull round thus we toil, and we ſweat;
Diſeaſes, grief, and pain,
An implacable crew,
While we double in vain,
Unrelenting purſue,
Till, quite hunted down, we yield with regret.

This moment is ours, come live while we may,
What's decreed by dark fate
Is not in our own power,
Since to-morrow's too late,
Take the preſent kind hour:
With wine cheer the night, as ſports bleſs the day

A TRANSLATION OF HORACE, EP. X.

Horace recommends a Country Life, and diſſuades his Friend from Ambition and Avarice.

Health to my friend loſt in the ſmoky town,
From him who breathes in country air alone,
In all things elſe thy ſoul and mine are one;
And like two aged long acquainted doves,
The ſame our mutual hate, the ſame our mutual loves,
Cloſe, and ſecure, you keep your lazy neſt,
My wandering thoughts won't let my pinions reſt:
O'er rocks, ſeas, woods, I take my wanton flight,
And each new object charms with new delight,
To ſay no more, my friend, I live, and reign,
Lord of myſelf: I've broke the ſervile chain,
Shook off with ſcorn the triſles you deſire,
All the vain empty nothings fops admire.
Thus the lean ſlave of ſome fat pamper'd prieſt
With greedy eyes at firſt views each luxurious feaſt;
But, quickly cloy'd, now he no more can eat
Their godly viands, and their holy meat:
Wiſely ambitious to be free and poor,
Longs for the homely ſcraps he loth'd before.
Seek'ſt thou a place where nature is obſerv'd,
And cooler reaſon may be mildly heard;
To rural ſhades let thy calm ſoul retreat,
Theſe are th' Elyſian fields, this is the happy ſeat,
Proof againſt winter's cold, and ſummer's heat,
Here no invidious care thy peace annoys,
Sleep undiſturb'd, uninterrupted joys;
Your marble pavements with diſgrace muſt yield
To each ſmooth plain, and gay enamel'd field:
Your muddy aqueducts can ne'er compare
With country ſtreams, more pure than city air;
Our yew and bays enclos'd in pots ye prize,
And mimic little beauties we deſpiſe.
The roſe and woodbine marble walls ſupport,
Holly and ivy deck the gaudy court:
But yet in vain all ſhifts the artiſt tries,
The diſcontented twig but pines away and dies.
The houſe ye praiſe that a large proſpect yields,
And view with longing eyes the pleaſure of the fields;
'Tis thus ye own, thus tacitly confeſs,
Th' inimitable charms the peaceful country bleſs.
In vain from nature's rules we blindly ſtray,
And puſh th' uneaſy monitrix away:
Still ſhe returns, nor lets our conſcience reſt,
But night and day inculcates what is beſt,
Our trueſt friend, though an unwelcome gueſt
As ſoon th' unſkilful fool that's blind enough,
To call rich Indian damaſk Norwich ſtuff,
Shall become rich by trade, as he be wiſe,
Whoſe partial ſoul and undiſcerning eyes
Can't at firſt ſight, and at each tranſient view,
Diſtinguiſh good from bad, or falſe from true.
He that too high exalts his giddy head
When fortune ſmiles, if the jilt frowns, is dead:
Th' aſpiring fool, big with his haughty boaſt,
Is the moſt abject wretch when all his hopes are loſt.
Sit looſe to all the world, nor aught admire,
Theſe worthleſs toys too fondly we deſire;
Since when the darling's raviſh'd from our heart,
The pleaſure's over-balanc'd by the ſmart.
Confine thy thoughts, and bound thy looſe deſires,
For thrifty nature no great coſt requires:
A healthy body, and thy miſtreſs kind,
A humble cot, and a more humble mind:
Theſe once enjoy'd, the world is all thy own,
From thy poor cell deſpiſe the tottering throne,
And wakeful monarchs in a bed of down.
The ſtag well-arm'd, and with unequal force,
From fruitful meadows chas'd the conquer'd horſe;
The haughty beaſt that ſtomach'd the diſgrace,
In meaner paſtures not content to graze,
Receives the bit, and man's aſſiſtance prays.
The conqueſt gain'd, and many trophies won,
His falſe confederate ſtill rode boldly on;
In vain the beaſt curs'd his perfidious aid,
He plung'd, he rear'd, but nothing could perſuade
The rider from his back, or bridle from his head.
Juſt ſo the wretch that greedily aſpires,
Unable to content his wild deſires;
Dreading the fatal thought of being poor,
Loſes a prize worth all his golden ore,
The happy freedom he enjoy'd before.
About him ſtill th' uneaſy load he bears,
Spurr'd on with fruitleſs hopes, and curb'd with anxious fears.
The man whoſe fortune fit not to his mind,
The way to true content ſhall never find;
If the ſhoe pinch, or if it prove too wide,
In that he walks in pain, in this he treads aſide.
But you, my friend, in calm contentment live,
Always well pleas'd with what the god, ſhall give;
Let not baſe ſhining pelf thy mind deprave,
Tyrant of fools, the wiſe man's drudge and ſlave;
And me reprove if I ſhall crave for more,
Or ſeem the leaſt uneaſy to be poor.
Thus much I write, merry, and free from care,
And nothing covet, but thy preſence here.

THE MISER'S SPEECH.

FROM HORACE, EPOD. II.

Happy the man, who, free from care,
Manures his own paternal fields,
Content, as his wife fathers were,
T' enjoy the crop his labour yields.

Nor uſury torments his breaſt,
That barters happineſs for gain,
Nor war's alarms diſturb his reſt,
Nor hazards of the faithleſs main:

Nor at the loud tumultuous bar,
With coſtly noiſe, and dear debate,
Proclaims an everlaſting war;
Nor fawns on villains baſely great.

But for the vine ſelects a ſpouſe,
Chaſte emblem of the marriage-bed,
Or prunes the too luxuriant boughs,
And graſts more happy in their ſtead.

Or hears the lowing herds from far,
That fatten on the fruitful plains,
And ponders with delightful care,
The proſpect of his future gains.

Or ſhears his ſheep that round him graze,
And droop beneath their curling loads;
Or plunders his laborious bees
Of balmy nectar, drink of gods!

His cheerful head when Autumn rears,
And bending boughs reward his pains,
Joyous he plucks the luſcious pears,
The purple grape his finger ſtains.

Each honeſt heart's a welcome gueſt,
With tempting fruit his tables glow,
The gods are bidden to the feaſt,
To ſhare the bleſſings they beſtow.

Under an oak's protecting ſhade,
In flowery meads profuſely gay,
Supine he leans his peaceful head,
And gently loiters life away.

The vocal ſtreams that murmuring flow,
Or from their ſprings complaining creep,
The birds that chirp on every bough,
Invite his yielding eyes to ſleep.

But, when bleak ſtorms and lowering Jove
Now ſadden the declining year,
Through every thicket, every grove,
Swift he purſues the flying deer.

With deep-hung hounds he ſweeps the plains;
The hills, the vallies, ſmoke around:
The woods repeat his pleaſing pains,
And echo propagates the ſound.

Or, puſh'd by his victorious ſpear,
The griſly boar before him flies,
Betray'd by his prevailing fear
Into the toils, the monſter dies.

His towering falcon mounts the ſkies,
And cuts through clouds his liquid way;
Or elſe with ſly deceit he tries
To make the leſſer game his prey.

Who, thus poſſeſs'd of ſolid joy,
Would love, that idle imp, adore?
Cloe's coquet, Myrtilla's coy,
And Phyllis is a perjur'd whore.

Adieu, fantaſtic idle flame!
Give me a profitable wife,
A careful, but obliging dame,
To ſoften all the toils of life:

Who ſhall with tender care provide,
Againſt her weary ſpouſe return,
With plenty ſee his board ſupply'd,
And make the crackling billets burn:

And while his men and maids repair
To fold his ſheep, to milk his kine,
With unbought dainties feaſt her dear,
And treat him with domeſtic wine.

I view with pity and diſdain
The coſtly trifles coxcombs boaſt,
Their Bourdeaux, Burgundy, Champaign,
Though ſparkling with the brighteſt toaſt.

Pleas'd with ſound manufacture more,
Than all the ſtum the knaves impoſe,
When the vain cully treats his whore,
At Brawn's, the Mitre, or the Roſe.

Let ſops their ſickly palates pleaſe,
With luxury's expenſive ſtore,
And feaſt each virulent diſeaſe
With dainties from a foreign ſhore.

I, whom my little farm ſupplies,
Richly on nature's bounty live;
The only happy are the wiſe,
Content is all the gods can give.

While thus on wholeſome cates I feaſt,
Oh, with what rapture I behold
My flocks in comely order haſte
T' enrich with foil the barren fold!

The languid ox approaches ſlow,
To ſhare the food his labours earn:
Painful he tugs th' inverted plough,
Nor hunger quickens his return.

My wanton ſwains, uncouthly gay,
About my ſmiling hearth delight,
To ſweeten the laborious day,
By many a merry tale at night.

Thus ſpoke old Gripe, when bottles three
Of Burton ale, and ſea-coal fire,
Unlock'd his breaſt; reſolv'd to be
A generous, honeſt, country 'ſquire.

That very night his money lent,
On bond, or mortgage, he call'd in,
With lawful uſe of ſix per cent.
Next morn, he put it out at ten.

FABLE I.

The Captive Trumpeter.

" — Quo non præſtantior alter
" Ære ciere viros, Martemque accendere cantu."
VIRG.

A PARTY of huſſars of late
For prog and plunder ſcour'd the plains,
Some French Gens d' Armes ſurpris'd, and beat,
And brought their trumpeter in chains.

In doleful plight, th' unhappy bard
For quarter begg'd on bended knee,
Pity, Meſſieurs! in truth 'tis hard
To kill a harmleſs enemy.

Theſe hands, of ſlaughter innocent,
Ne'er brandiſh'd the deſtructive ſword,
To you or yours no hurt I meant,
O take a poor muſician's word.

But the ſtern foe, with generous rage,
Scoundrel! reply'd, thou firſt ſhalt die,
Who, urging others to engage,
From fame and danger baſely fly.

The brave by law of arms we ſpare,
Thou by the hangman ſhalt expire;
'Tis juſt, and not at all ſevere,
To ſtop the breath that blew the fire.

FABLE II.

The bald-pated Welſhman, and the Fly.

" — Qui non moderabitur iræ, [mens,
" Infectum volet eſſe, dolor quod ſuaſerit et
" Dum pœnas odio per vim feſtinat inulto."
HOR.

A 'SQUIRE of Wales, whoſe blood ran higher
Than that of any other 'ſquire,

Haſty and hot; whoſe peeviſh honour
Reveng'd each ſlight was put upon her,
Upon a mountain's top one day
Expos'd to Sol's meridian ray;
He ſum'd, he rav'd, he curs'd, he ſwore,
Exhal'd a ſea at every pore:
At laſt, ſuch inſults to evade,
Sought the next tree's protecting ſhade;
Where, as he lay diſſolv'd in ſweat,
And wip'd off many a rivulet,
Off in a pet the beaver flies,
And flaxen wig, time's beſt diſguiſe,
By which, folks of maturer ages
Vie with ſmooth beaux, and ladies pages:
Though 'twas a ſecret rarely known,
Ill-natur'd age had cropt his crown,
Grubb'd all the covert up, and now
A large ſmooth plain extends his brow.
Thus as he lay with numſkul bare,
And courted the refreſhing air,
New perſecutions ſtill appear,
A noiſy fly offends his ear.
Alas! what man of parts and ſenſe
Could bear ſuch vile impertinence?
Yet ſo diſcourteous is our fate,
Fools always buz about the great.
This inſect now, whoſe active ſpight,
Teaz'd him with never-ceaſing bite,
With ſo much judgment play'd his part,
He had him both in tierce and quart:
In vain with open hands he tries
To guard his ears, his noſe, his eyes;
For now at laſt, familiar grown,
He perch'd upon his worſhip's crown,
With teeth and claws his ſkin he tore,
And ſtuff'd himſelf with human gore.
At laſt, in manners to excel,
Untruſs'd a point, ſome authors tell.
But now what rhetoric could aſſuage
The furious 'ſquire, ſtark mad with rage?
Impatient at the foul diſgrace,
From inſect of ſo mean a race;
And plotting vengeance on his foe,
With double fiſt he aims a blow:
The nimble fly eſcap'd by flight,
And ſkip'd from this unequal fight.
Th' impending ſtroke with all its weight
Fell on his own beloved pate.
Thus much he gain'd by this adventurous deed,
He foul'd his fingers, and he broke his head.

MORAL.

Let ſenates hence learn to preſerve their ſtate,
And ſcorn the fool, below their grave debate,
Who by th' unequal ſtrife grows popular and great.
Let him buz on, with ſenſeleſs rant defy
The wiſe, the good; yet ſtill 'tis but a fly.
With puny foes the toil 's not worth the coſt,
Where nothing can be gain'd, much may be loſt:
Let cranes and pigmies in mock-war engage,
A prey beneath the generous eagle's rage.
True honour o'er the clouds ſublimely wings;
Young Ammon ſcorns to run with leſs than kings.

FABLE III.

The Ant and the Fly.

" Quem res plus nimio delectavêre ſecundæ,
" Mutatæ quatient." Hor.

The careful ant that meanly fares,
And labours hardly to ſupply,
With wholeſome cates and homely tares,
His numerous working family;

Upon a viſit met one day
His couſin fly, in all his pride,
A courtier inſolent and gay,
By Goody Maggot near ally'd:

The humble inſect humbly bow'd,
And all his loweſt congees paid,
Of an alliance wondrous proud
To ſuch a huffing tearing blade.

The haughty fly look'd big, and ſwore
He knew him not, nor whence he came
Huff'd much, and with impatience bore
The ſcandal of ſo mean a claim.

Friend Clodpate, know, 'tis not the mode
At court, to own ſuch clowns as thee,
Nor is it civil to intrude
On flies of rank and quality.

I—who, in joy and indolence,
Converſe with monarchs and grandees,
Regaling every nicer ſenſe
With olios, ſoups, and fricaſſees;

Who kiſs each beauty's balmy lip,
Or gently buz into her ear,
About her ſnowy boſom ſkip,
And ſometimes creep the Lord knows where!

The ant, who could no longer bear
His couſin's inſolence and pride,
Toſs'd up his head, and with an air
Of conſcious worth, he thus reply'd:

Vain inſect! know, the time will come,
When the court-ſun no more ſhall ſhine,
When froſts thy gaudy limbs benumb,
And damps about thy wings ſhall twine;

When ſome dark naſty hole ſhall hide
And cover thy neglected head,
When all this lofty ſwelling pride
Shall burſt, and ſhrink into a ſhade:

Take heed, leſt fortune change the ſcene:
Some of thy brethren I remember,
In June have mighty princes been,
But begg'd their bread before December.

MORAL.

This precious offspring of a t—d
Is firſt a pimp, and then a lord;
Ambitious to be great, not good,
Forgets his own dear fleſh and blood.
Blind goddeſs! who delight'ſt in joke,
O fix him on thy loweſt ſpoke;
And ſince the ſcoundrel is ſo vain,
Reduce him to his filth again.

FABLE IV.

The Wolf, the Fox, and the Ape.

" Clodius accuſat Mœchos, Catilina Cethegum."
Juv.

THE wolf impeach'd the fox of theft,
The fox the charge deny'd;
To the grave ape the caſe was left,
In juſtice to decide.

Wiſe Pug with comely buttocks ſate,
And nodded o'er the laws,
Diſtinguiſh'd well through the debate,
And thus adjudg'd the cauſe:

The goods are ſtole, but not from thee,
Two pickled rogues well met,
Thou ſhalt be hang'd for perjury,
He for an arrant cheat.

MORAL.

Hang both, judicious brute, 'twas bravely ſaid,
May villains always to their ruin plead!
When knaves fall out, and ſpitefully accuſe,
There's nothing like the reconciling nooſe.
O hemp! the nobleſt gift propitious heaven
To mortals with a bounteous hand has given,
To ſtop malicious breath, to end debate,
To prop the ſhaking throne, and purge the ſtate.

FABLE V.

The Dog and the Bear.

" —Delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi,
" Seditione, dolis, ſcelere, atque libidine et irâ
" Iliacos intra muros, peccatur, et extra."
Hor.

TOWSER, of right Hockleian ſire,
A dog of mettle and of fire,
With Urſin grim, an errant bear,
Maintain'd a long and dubious war:
Oft Urſin on his back was toſt,
And Towſer many a collop loſt;
Capricious fortune would declare,
Now for the dog, then for the bear.
Thus having try'd their courage fairly,
Brave Urſin firſt deſir'd a parly;
Stout combatant (quoth he) whoſe might
I've felt in many a bloody fight,
Tell me the cauſe of all this pother,
And why we worry one another?
That's a moot point, the cur reply'd,
Our maſters only can decide.
While thee and I our hearts blood ſpill,
They prudently their pockets fill;
Halloo us on with all their might,
To turn a penny by the fight.
If that's the caſe, return'd the bear,
'Tis time at laſt to end the war;
Thou keep thy teeth, and I my claws,
To combat in a nobler cauſe;
Sleep in a whole ſkin, I adviſe,
And let them bleed, who gain the prize.

MORAL.

Parties enrag'd on one another fall,
The butcher and the bear-ward pocket all.

FABLE VI.

The Wounded Man, and the Swarm of Flies.

" E malis minimum."—

SQUALID with wounds, and many a gaping ſore,
A wretched Lazar lay diſtreſs'd;
A ſwarm of flies his bleeding ulcers tore,
And on his putrid carcaſe feaſt.

A courteous traveller, who paſs'd that way,
And ſaw the vile Harpeian brood,
Offer'd his help the monſtrous crew to flay,
That rioted on human blood.

Ah! gentle ſir, th' unhappy wretch reply'd,
Your well-meant charity reſrain;
The angry gods have that redreſs deny'd,
Your goodneſs would increaſe my pain.

Fat, and full-fed, and with abundance cloy'd,
But now and then theſe tyrants feed;
But were, alas! this pamper'd brood deſtroy'd,
The lean and hungry would ſucceed.

MORAL.

The body politic muſt ſoon decay,
When ſwarms of inſects on its vitals prey;
When blood-ſuckers of ſtate, a greedy brood,
Feaſt on our wounds, and fatten with our blood.
What muſt we do in this ſevere diſtreſs?
Come, doctor, give the patient ſome redreſs:
The quacks in politics a change adviſe,
But cooler counſels ſhould direct the wiſe.
'Tis hard, indeed; but better this, than worſe;
Miſtaken bleſſings prove the greateſt curſe.
Alas! what would our bleeding country gain,
If, when this viperous brood at laſt is ſlain,
The teeming Hydra pullulates again;
Seizes the prey with more voracious bite,
To ſatisfy his hungry appetite?

FABLE VII.

The Wolf and the Dog.

" Hunc ego per Syrtes, Libyæque extrema tri-
" umphum
" Ducere maluerim, quam ter capitolia curru
" Scandere Pompeii, quam frangere colla Jugur-
" thæ." Luc.

A PROWLING wolf that ſcour'd the plains,
To eaſe his hunger's griping pains;
Ragged as courtier in diſgrace,
Hide-bound, and lean, and out of caſe;
By chance a well-fed dog eſpy'd,
And being kin, and near ally'd,
He civilly ſalutes the cur,
How do you, cuz? Your ſervant, ſir!
O happy friend! how gay thy mien!
How plump thy ſides, how ſleek thy ſkin!
Triumphant plenty ſhines all o'er,
And the fat melts at every pore!

While I, alas! decay'd and old,
With hunger pin'd, and ſtiff with cold,
With many a howl, and hideous groan,
Tell the relentleſs woods my moan.
Pr'ythee, my happy friend! impart
Thy wond'rous, cunning, thriving art.
Why, faith, I'll tell thee as a friend,
But firſt thy ſurly manners mend;
Be complaiſant, obliging, kind,
And leave the wolf for once behind.
The wolf, whoſe mouth began to water,
With joy and rapture gallop'd after;
When thus the dog: At bed and board,
I ſhare the plenty of my lord;
From every gueſt I claim a fee,
Who court my lord by bribing me:
In mirth I revel all the day,
And many a game at romps I play:
I fetch and carry, leap o'er ſticks,
And twenty ſuch diverting tricks.
'Tis pretty, faith, the wolf reply'd,
And on his neck the collar ſpy'd:
He ſtarts, and without more ado
He bids the abject wretch adieu:
Enjoy your dainties, friend; to me
The nobleſt feaſt is liberty.
The famiſh'd wolf upon theſe deſart plains,
Is happier than a fawning cur in chains.

MORAL.

Thus bravely ſpoke the nurſe of ancient Rome,
Thus the ſtarv'd Swiſs, and hungry Griſons roam,
On barren hills, clad with eternal ſnow,
And look with ſcorn on the prim ſlaves below.
Thus Cato 'ſcap'd by death the tyrant's chains,
And walks unſhackled in th' Elyſian plains.
Thus, Britons, thus your great forefathers ſtood
For liberty, and fought in ſeas of blood.
To barren rocks, and gloomy woods confin'd,
Their virtues by neceſſity refin'd,
Nor cold, nor want, nor death, could ſhake their
ſteady mind.
No ſaucy Druid then durſt cry aloud,
And with his ſlaviſh cant debauch the crowd:
No paſſive legions in a ſcoundrel's cauſe
Pillage a city, and affront the laws.
The ſtate was quiet, happy, and ſerene,
For Boadicea was the Briton's queen;
Her ſubjects their juſt liberties maintain'd,
And in her people's hearts the happy monarch
reign'd.

FABLE VIII.

The Oyſter.

" —— In jus
" Acres procurrunt, magnum ſpectaculum uter-
" que." HOR.

Two comrades, as grave authors ſay,
(But in what chapter, page, or line,
Ye critics, if ye pleaſe, define)
Had found an oyſter in their way.

Conteſt and foul debate aroſe,
Both view'd at once with greedy eyes,
Both challeng'd the delicious prize,
And high words ſoon improv'd to blows.

Actions on actions hence ſucceed,
Each hero's obſtinately ſtout,
Green bags and parchments fly about,
Pleadings are drawn, and counſel fee'd.

The parſon of the place, good man!
Whoſe kind and charitable heart
In human ills ſtill bore a part,
Thrice ſhook his head, and thus began:

Neighbours and friends, refer to me
This doughty matter in diſpute,
I'll ſoon decide th' important ſuit,
And finiſh all without a fee.

Give me the oyſter then—'tis well—
He opens it, and at one ſup
Gulps the conteſted triſle up,
And, ſmiling, gives to each a ſhell.

Henceforth let fooliſh diſcord ceaſe,
Your oyſter's good as e'er was eat;
I thank you for my dainty treat,
God bleſs you both, and live in peace.

MORAL.

Ye men of Norfolk and of Wales,
From this learn common ſenſe;
Nor thruſt your neighbours into goals
For every ſlight offence.

Baniſh thoſe vermin of debate,
That on your ſubſtance feed;
The knaves, who now are ſerv'd in plate,
Would ſtarve, if fools agreed.

FABLE IX.

The Sheep and the Buſh.

" Lætus ſorte tuâ vives ſapientèr." HOR.

A SHEEP, well-meaning brute! one morn
Retir'd beneath a ſpreading thorn,
A pealing ſtorm to ſhun;
Eſcap'd indeed both rain and wind,
But left, alas! his fleece behind:
Was it not wiſely done?

MORAL.

Beneath the blaſt while pliant oſiers bend,
The ſtubborn oak each furious wind ſhall rend;
Diſcreetly yield, and patiently endure,
Such common evils as admit no cure.
Theſe fate ordains, and Heaven's high will hath ſent:
In humble littleneſs ſubmit content.
But thoſe thy folly brings, in time prevent.

FABLE X.

The Frog's Choice.

Ὦ ποποι, οιον δη νυ Θεὸς βροτοὶ απιοσιλαι.
Εξ ημεων γαρ φασι κακ' εμμεναι· οι δε και αυτοι
Σφησιν ατασθαλιησιν υπερ μορον αλγι' εχουσιν.

In a wild ſtate of nature, long
The frogs at random liv'd,
The weak a prey unto the ſtrong,
With anarchy oppreſs'd and griev'd.

At length the lawleſs rout,
Taught by their ſufferings, grew devout:
An embaſſy to Jove they ſent,
And begg'd his highneſs would beſtow
Some ſettled form of government,
A king to rule the ſens below.
Jove, ſmiling, grants their odd requeſt,
A king th' indulgent power beſtow'd,
(Such as might ſuit their genius beſt)
A beam of a prodigious ſize,
With all its cumberous load,
Came tumbling from the ſkies.
The waters daſh againſt the ſhore,
The hollow caverns roar;
The rocks return the dreadful ſound,
Convulſions ſhake the ground.
The multitude with horror fled,
And in his oozy bed
Each ſkulking coward hid his head.

When all is now grown calm again,
And ſmoothly glides the liquid plain,
A frog more reſolute and bold,
Peeping with caution from his hold;
Recover'd from his firſt ſurpriſe,
As o'er the wave his head he popt,
He ſaw—but ſcarce believ'd his eyes,
On the ſame bank where firſt he dropt,
Th' imperial lubber lies,
Stretch'd at his eaſe, careleſs, content:
Is this the monarch Jove has ſent,
(Said he) our warlike troops to lead?
Ay! 'tis a glorious prince indeed!
By ſuch an active general led,
The routed mice our arms ſhall dread,
Subdued ſhall quit their claim:
Old Homer ſhall recant his lays,
For us new trophies raiſe,
Sing our victorious arms, and juſtify our fame.
Then laughing impudently loud,
He ſoon alarm'd the daſtard crowd.
The croaking nations with contempt
Behold the worthleſs indolent,
On wings of winds, ſwift ſcandal flies,
Libels, lampoons, and lies,
Hoarſe treaſons, tuneleſs blaſphemies.
With active leap at laſt upon his back they ſtride,
And on the royal loggerhead in triumph ride.

Once more to Jove their prayers addreſt,
And once more Jove grants their requeſt:
A ſtork he ſends of monſtrous ſize,
Red lightning flaſhing in his eyes;
Rul'd by no block, as heretofore,
The gazing crowds preſs'd to his court;
Admire his ſtately mien, his haughty port,
And only not adore.
Addreſſes of congratulation,
Sent from each loyal corporation,
Full-freight with truth and ſenſe,
Exhauſted all their eloquence.
But now, alas! 'twas night; kings muſt have meat;
The Grand Vizier firſt goes to pot,
Three Baſſas next, happy their lot!
Gain'd Paradiſe by being eat.
And this, ſaid he, and this is mine,
And this, by right divine:
In ſhort; 'twas all for public weal,
He ſwallow'd half a nation at a meal.
Again they beg Almighty Jove,
This cruel tyrant to remove.
With fierce reſentment in his eyes,
The frowning thunderer replies;
Thoſe evils which yourſelves create,
Raſh fools! ye now repent too late;
Made wretched by the public voice,
Not through neceſſity, but choice! [curſe,
Be gone!—Nor wreſt from heaven ſome heavier
Better bear this, this ſtork, than worſe.

MORAL.

Oppreſs'd with happineſs, and ſick with eaſe,
Not heaven itſelf our fickle minds can pleaſe.
Fondly we wiſh, cloy'd with celeſtial ſtore,
The leeks and onions which we loath'd before:
Still roving, ſtill deſiring, never pleas'd,
With plenty ſtarv'd, and ev'n with health diſeas'd.
With partial eyes each preſent good we view,
Nor covet what is beſt, but what is new.
Ye powers above, who make mankind your care,
To bleſs the ſupplicant, reject his prayer!

FABLE XI.

Liberty and Love; or, the two Sparrows.

" — Dos eſt uxoria, lites." OVID.

A SPARROW and his mate,
(Believe me, gentle Kate)
Once lov'd like I and you;
With mutual ardour join'd,
No turtles e'er ſo kind,
So conſtant, and ſo true.

They hopp'd from ſpray to ſpray,
They bill'd, they chirp'd all day,
They cuddled cloſe all night;
To bliſs they wak'd each morn,
In every buſh and thorn,
Gay ſcenes of new delight.

At length the fowler came,
(The knave was much to blame)
And this dear pair trapann'd;
Both in one cage confin'd,
Why, faith and troth, 'twas kind;
Nay, hold—that muſt be ſcann'd.

Fair liberty thus gone,
And one coop'd up with one,
'Twas awkward, new, and ſtrange;
For better and for worſe,
O diſmal, fatal curſe!
No more abroad to range.

No carols now they ſing,
Each droops his little wing,
And mourns his cruel fate:
Clouds on each brow appear,
My honey, and my dear,
Is now quite out of date.

They pine, lament, and moan,
'Twould melt an heart of ſtone,
To hear their ſad complaint:
Nor he ſupply'd her wants,
Nor ſhe reſrain'd from taunts,
That might provoke a ſaint.

Hard words improve to blows;
For now, grown mortal foes,
They peck, they ſcratch, they ſcream;
The cage lies on the floor,
The wires are ſtain'd with gore,
It ſwells into a ſtream.

Dear Kitty, would you know
The cauſe of all this woe,
It is not hard to gueſs;
Whatever does conſtrain,
Turns pleaſure into pain,
'Tis choice alone can bleſs.

When both no more are free,
Inſipid I muſt be,
And you loſe all your charms;
My ſmother'd paſſion dies,
And even your bright eyes,
Neceſſity diſarms.

Then let us love, my fair,
But unconſtrain'd as air,
Each join a willing heart;
Let free-born ſouls diſdain
To wear a tyrant's chain,
And act a nobler part.

FABLE XII.

The two Springs.

" — Errat longè meâ quidem ſententiâ
" Qui imperium credat gravius eſſe aut ſtabilius
" Vi quod fit, quàm illud quod amicitiâ adjungi-
" tur." TER.

Two ſiſter ſprings, from the ſame parent hill,
Born on the ſame propitious day,
Through the cleft rock diſtil:
Adown the reverend mountain's ſide,
Through groves of myrtle glide,
Or through the violet beds obliquely ſtray.
The laurel, each proud victor's crown,
From them receives her high renown,
From them the curling vine
Her cluſters big with racy wine,
To them her oil the peaceful olive owes,
And her vermilion bluſh the roſe.
The gracious ſtreams in ſmooth meanders flow,
To every thirſty root diſpenſe
Their kindly cooling influence,
And paradiſe adorns the mountain's brow.

But oh! the ſad effect of pride!
Theſe happy twins at laſt divide.
" Siſter (exclaims th' ambitious ſpring)
" What profit do theſe labours bring?
" Always to give, and never to enjoy,
" A fruitleſs and a mean employ!
" Stay here inglorious if you pleaſe,
" And loiter out a life of indolence and eaſe:
" Go, humble drudge, each thiſtle rear,
" And nurſe each ſhrub, your daily care,
" While, pouring down from this my lofty ſource,
" I deluge all the plain,
" No dams ſhall ſtop my courſe,
" And rocks oppoſe in vain.
" See where my foaming billows flow,
" Above the hills my waves aſpire,
" The ſhepherds and their flocks retire,
" And talleſt cedars as they paſs in ſign of homage
" bow.
" To me each tributary ſpring
" Its ſupplemental ſtores ſhall bring,
" With me the rivers ſhall unite,
" The lakes beneath my banners fight,
" Till the proud Danube and the Rhine
" Shall own their fame eclips'd by mine;
" Both gods and men ſhall dread my watery ſway,
" Nor theſe in cities ſafe, nor in their temples
" they."

Away the haughty boaſter flew
Scarce bade her ſiſter ſtream a cool adieu,
Her waves grow turbulent and bold,
Not gently murmuring as of old,
But roughly daſh againſt the ſhore,
And toſs their ſpumy heads, and proudly roar.
The careful farmer with ſurpriſe,
Sees the tumultuous torrent riſe;
With buſy looks the ruſtic band appear,
To guard their growing hopes, the promiſe of the year.
All hands unite, with dams they bound
The raſh rebellious ſtream around;
In vain ſhe foams, in vain ſhe raves,
In vain ſhe curls her feeble waves,
Beſieg'd at laſt on every ſide,
Her ſource exhauſted and her channel dry'd,
(Such is the fate of impotence and pride!)
A ſhallow pond ſhe ſtands confin'd,
The refuge of the croaking kind.
Ruſhes and ſags, an inbred foe,
Choke up the muddy pool below;
The tyrant ſun on high
Exacts his uſual ſubſidy;
And the poor pittance that remains,
Each gaping cranny drains.
Too late the fool repents her haughty boaſt,
A nameleſs nothing, in oblivion loſt.

Her ſiſter ſpring, benevolent and kind,
With joy ſees all around her bleſt,
The good ſhe does, into her generous mind
Returns again with intereſt.
The farmer oft invokes her aid
When Sirius nips the tender blade;
Her ſtreams a ſure elixir bring,
Gay plenty decks the fields, and a perpetual ſpring.
Where'er the gardener ſmooths her eaſy way,
Her ductile ſtreams obey.
Courteous ſhe viſits every bed,
Narciſſus rears his drooping head,
By her diffuſive bounty fed.
Reviv'd from her indulgent urn,
Sad Hyacinth forgets to mourn,
Rich in the bleſſings ſhe beſtows
All nature ſmiles where'er ſhe flows.
Enamour'd with a nymph ſo fair,
See where the river gods appear,
A nymph ſo eminently good,
The joy of all the neighbourhood;
They claſp her in their liquid arms,
And riot in th' abundance of her charms.

Like old Alpheus fond, their wanton ſtreams they join'd,
Like Arethuſa ſhe, as lovely, and as kind.
Now ſwell'd into a mighty flood,
Her channel deep and wide,
Still ſhe perſiſts in doing good,
Her bounty flows with every tide.
A thouſand rivulets in her train
With fertile waves enrich the plain:
The ſcaly herd, a numerous throng,
Beneath her ſilver billows glide along,
Whoſe ſtill increaſing ſhoals ſupply
The poor man's wants, the great one's luxury:
Here all the feather'd troops retreat,
Securely ply their oary feet,
Upon her floating herbage gaze,
And with their tuneful notes reſound her praiſe.
Here flocks and herds in ſafety feed,
And fatten in each flowery mead;
No beaſts of prey appear
The watchful ſhepherd to beguile,
No monſters of the deep inhabit here,
Nor the voracious ſhark, nor wily crocodile;
But Delia and her nymphs, chaſte ſylvan queen,
By mortals prying eyes unſeen,
Bathe in her flood, and ſport upon her borders green.
Here merchants, careful of their ſtore,
By angry billows toſt,
Anchor ſecure beneath her ſhore,
And bleſs the friendly coaſt.
Soon mighty fleets in all their pride
Triumphant on her ſurface ride:
The buſy trader on her banks appears,
An hundred different tongues ſhe hears.
At laſt, with wonder and ſurpriſe,
She ſees a ſtately city riſe;
With joy the happy flood admires
The lofty domes, the pointed ſpires;
The porticos, magnificently great,
Where all the crowding nations meet;
The bridges that adorn her brow,
From bank to bank their ample arches ſtride,
Through which her curling waves in triumph glide,
And in melodious murmurs flow.
Now grown a port of high renown,
The treaſure of the world her own,
Both Indies with their precious ſtores,
Pay yearly tribute to her ſhores.
Honour'd by all, a rich, well-peopled ſtream,
Nor father Thames himſelf of more eſteem.

MORAL.

The power of kings (if rightly underſtood)
Is but a grant from heaven of doing good;
Proud tyrants, who maliciouſly deſtroy,
And ride o'er ruins with malignant joy;
Humbled in duſt, ſoon to their coſt ſhall know
Heaven our avenger, and mankind their foe;
While gracious monarchs reap the good they ſow:
Bleſſing, are bleſs'd; far ſpreads their juſt renown,
Conſenting nations their dominion own,
And joyful happy crowds ſupport their throne.
In vain the powers of earth and hell combine,
Each guardian angel ſhall protect that line,
Who by their virtues prove their right divine.

FABLE XIII.

The Bald Bachelor.

Being a paraphraſe upon the Second Fable in the Second Book of Phædrus.

" Frigidus in venerem ſenior, fruſtraque laborem
" Ingratum trahit: et ſi quando at prælia ventum
" eſt,
" Ut quondam in ſtipulis magnus ſine viribus ignis,
" Incaſſum furit. Ergo animos ævumque notabis
" Præcipuè."— VIRG. Georg. lib. iii.

A BACHELOR, who, paſt his prime,
Had been a good one in his time,
Had ſcour'd the ſtreets, had whor'd, got drunk,
Had fought his man, and kept his punk:
Was ſometimes rich, but oftener poor,
With early duns about his door;
Being a little off his mettle,
Thought it convenient now to ſettle:
Grew wondrous wiſe at forty-five,
Reſolving to be grave, and thrive.
By chance he caſt his roguiſh eye
Upon a dame who liv'd hard by;
A widow debonair and gay,
October in the dreſs of May;
Artful to lay both red and white,
Skill'd in repairs, and, ev'n in ſpite
Of time and wrinkles, kept all tight.
But he, whoſe heart was apt to rove,
An arrant wanderer in love;
Beſides this widow, had Miſs Kitty,
Juicy and young, exceeding witty:
On her he thought, ſerious or gay,
His dream by night, his toaſt by day;
He thought, but not on her alone,
For who would be confin'd to one?
Between them both ſtrange work he made;
Gave this a ball, or maſqueade;
With that, at ſerious ombre play'd:
The ſelf-ſame compliments he ſpoke,
The ſelf-ſame oaths he ſwore, he broke;
Alternately on each beſtows
Frail promiſes and ſhort-liv'd vows.
Variety! kind ſource of joy!
Without whoſe aid all pleaſures cloy;
Without thee, who would ever prove
The painful drudgeries of love?
Without thee, what indulgent wight
Would read what we in garrets write!
But, not to make my tale perplex'd,
And keep more cloſely to my text;
'Tis fit the courteous reader know
This middle-aged man had been a beau.
But, above all, his head of hair
Had been his great peculiar care;
To which his ſerious hours he lent,
Nor deem'd the precious time miſpent.
'Twas long, and curling, and jet black,
Hung to the middle of his back;
Black, did I ſay? Ay, once 'twas ſo,
But cruel time had ſmok'd the beau,
And powder'd o'er his head with ſnow.

As an old horſe that had been hard rid,
Or from his maſter's coach diſcarded,
Forc'd in a tumbrel to go filler,
Or load for ſome poor rogue a miller;
On his grave noddle, o'er his eyes,
Black hairs and white promiſcuous riſe;
Which chequer o'er his reverend pate,
And prove the keffel more ſedate:
So with this worthy 'ſquire it far'd,
Yet he nor time nor labour ſpar'd,
But, with exceſſive coſt and pains,
Still made the beſt of his remains.
Each night beneath his cap he furl'd it,
Each morn in modiſh ringlets curl'd it;
Now made his comely treſſes ſhine,
With orange-butter, jeſſamine;
Then with ſweet powder and perfumes
He purify'd his upper rooms.
So when a jockey brings a mare,
Or horſe, or gelding, to a fair,
Though he be ſpavin'd, old, and blind,
With founder'd feet, and broken wind;
Yet, if he's maſter of his trade,
He'll curry well, and trim the jade,
To make the cheat go glibly down,
And bubble ſome unwary clown.
What woman made of fleſh and blood,
So ſweet a gallant e'er withſtood?
They melt, they yield, both, both are ſmitten,
The good old puſs, and the young kitten;
And, being now familiar grown,
Each look'd upon him as her own;
No longer talk'd of dear, or honey,
But of plain downright matrimony.
At that dread word his worſhip ſtarted,
And was (we may ſuppoſe) faint-hearted;
Yet, being reſolv'd to change his ſtate,
Winks both his eyes, and truſts to fate.
But now new douhts and ſcruples riſe,
To plague him with perplexities;
He knew not which, alas! to chooſe,
This he muſt take, and that refuſe.
As when ſome idle country lad
Swings on a gate, his wooden pad;
To right, to left, he ſpurs away,
But neither here nor there can ſtay;
Till, by the catch ſurpris'd, the lout
His journey ends, where he ſet out:
Ev'n ſo this dubious lover ſtray'd,
Between the widow and the maid;
And, after ſwinging to and fro,
Was juſt in æquilibrio.
Yet ſtill a lover's warmth he ſhows,
And makes his viſits and his bows;
Domeſtic grown, both here and there,
Nor Pug, nor Shock, were half ſo dear:
With bread and butter, and with tea,
And madam's toilet, who but he?
There fix'd a patch, or broke a comb;
At night, the widow's drawing-room.
O ſweet viciſſitude of love!
Who would covet heaven above,
Were men but thus allow'd to rove?
But, alas! ſome curs'd event,
Some unexpected accident,
Humbles our pride, and ſhows the odds
Between frail mortals and the gods:
This by the ſequel will appear
A truth moſt evident and clear.
As on the widow's panting breaſt
He laid his peaceful head to reſt,
Dreaming of pleaſures yet in ſtore,
And joys he ne'er had felt before;
His grizly locks appear diſplay'd,
In all their pomp of light and ſhade,
Alas! my future ſpouſe, ſaid ſhe,
What do mine eyes aſtoniſh'd ſee?
Marriage demands equality.
What will malicious neighbours ſay,
Should I, a widow young and gay,
Marry a man both old and gray?
Thoſe hideous hairs!—with that a tear
Did in each cryſtal ſluice appear;
She fetch'd a deep ſigh from her heart,
As who ſhould ſay, Beſt friends muſt part!
Then mus'd a while; there is but one,
But this expedient left alone,
To ſave that dear head from diſgrace;
Here, Jenny, fetch my tweaſer-caſe.
To work then went the treacherous fair,
And grubb'd up here and there a hair:
But, as ſhe meant not to renew
His charms, but ſet her own to view;
And by this foil more bright appear,
In youthful bloom when he was near,
The cunning gipſy nipt away
The black, but ſlily left the gray.
O Delilah! perfidious fair!
O ſex ingenious to enſnare!
How faithleſs all your doings are!
Whom nature form'd your lord, your guide,
You his precarious power deride,
Tool of your vanity and pride.
The 'ſquire, who, thus deceiv'd, ne'er dreamt
What the deceitful traitreſs meant;
Thrice kiſs'd her hand, and then retir'd,
With more exalted thoughts inſpir'd:
To his fair Filly next repairs,
With ſtatelier port, and youthful airs.
Lord! ſir—(ſaid ſhe) you're mighty gay,
But I muſt tell you by the way,
That no brood gooſe was e'er ſo gray.
Here, let this hand eradicate
Thoſe foul diſhonours of your pate,
For ſhe, poor thing! whoſe virgin heart,
Unſkill'd in every female art,
In pure ſimplicity believ'd
His youth might this way be retriev'd;
At leaſt his age diſguis'd, and ſhe,
From ſpightful prudes, and cenſure free;
With earneſt diligence and care,
Grubb'd by the roots each grizzled hair;
Some few black hairs ſhe left behind,
But not one of the ſilver kind.
But when ſhe ſaw what work ſhe'd made,
His bald broad front, without a ſhade,
And all his hatchet face diſplay'd,
With ſcarce ſix hairs upon a ſide,
His large out-ſpreading lugs to hide;

She laugh'd, she ſcream'd; and Nan and Beſs,
In concert laugh'd, and ſcream'd no leſs.
Home ſculk'd the 'ſquire, and hid his face,
Sore ſmitten with the foul diſgrace:
Softly he knock'd, but truſty John,
Who knew his hour was twelve, or one,
Rubb'd both his eyes, and yawn'd, and ſwore,
And quickly blunder'd to the door.
But ſtarting back at this diſaſter,
Vow'd that old Nick had hagg'd his maſter:
The landlady, in ſore affright,
Fell into fits, and ſwoon'd out-right;
The neighbourhood was rais'd, and call'd,
The maids miſcarry'd, children bawl'd,
The cur, whom oft his bounty fed,
With many a ſcrap and bit of bread;
Now own'd him not, but in the throng
Growl'd at him as he ſneak'd along.
To bed he went, 'tis true, but not
Or clos'd his eyes, or ſlept one jot;
Not Niſus was in ſuch deſpair,
Spoil'd of his kingdom and his hair:
Not ev'n Belinda made ſuch moan,
When her dear favourite lock was gone.
He ſum'd, he rav'd, he curs'd amain,
And all his paſt life ran o'er again;
Damn'd every female bite to Tyburn,
From mother Eve, to mother Wyburn,
Each youthful vanity abjur'd,
Whores, box and dice, and claps ill-cur'd:
And, having loſt by female art
This darling idol of his heart,
Thoſe precious locks, that might out-vie
The trim-curl'd God who lights the ſky;
Reſolv'd to grow devout and wiſe,
Or what's almoſt the ſame—preciſe;
Canted, and whin'd, and talk'd moſt odly,
Was very ſlovenly and godly
(For nothing makes devotion keen,
Like diſappointment and chagrin):
In fine, he ſet his houſe in order,
And piouſly put on a border.

MORAL.

To you, gay ſparks, who waſte your youthful prime,
Old Æſop ſends this monitory rhyme;
Leave, leave, for ſhame your trulls at Sh—er hall,
And marry in good time, or not at all.
Of all the monſters Smithfield e'er could ſhow,
There's none ſo hideous as a batter'd beau.
Truſt not the noon of life, but take the morn;
Will Honeycomb is every female's ſcorn.
Let him be rich, high born, book-learn'd, and wiſe,
Believe me, friends, in every woman's eyes,
'Tis back, and brawn, and ſinew, wins the prize.

FABLE XIV.

The Fortune Hunter.

"Fortuna ſævo læta negotio, et
"Ludum inſolentem ludere pertinax
"Tranſmutat incertos honores." HOR.

CANTO I.

SOME authors, more abſtruſe than wiſe,
Friendſhip confine to ſtricter ties,
Require exact conformity,
In perſon, age, and quality;
Their humours, principles, and wit,
Muſt, like exchequer tallies, hit.
Others, leſs ſcrupulous, opine
That hands and hearts in love may join,
Though different inclinations ſway,
For Nature's more in fault than they.
Whoe'er would ſift this point more fully,
May read St Evremond and Tully;
With me the doctrine ſhall prevail
That's à propos to form my tale.
Two brethren (whether twins or no
Imports not very much to know)
Together bred; as fam'd their love
As Leda's brats begot by Jove:
As various too their tempers were;
That briſk, and frolic, debonair;
This more conſiderate and ſevere.
While Bob, with diligence would pore
And con by heart his battle door,
Frank play'd at romps with John the groom,
Or ſwitch'd his hobby round the room.
The ſtriplings now too bulky grown,
To make dirt-pies, and lounge at home,
With aching hearts to ſchool are ſent,
Their humours ſtill of various bent:
The ſilent, ſerious, ſolid boy,
Came on apace, was daddy's joy,
Conſtrued, and pars'd, and ſaid his part,
And got Quæ-genus all by heart.
While Franky, that unlucky rogue,
Fell in with every whim in vogue,
Valued not Lilly of a ſtraw,
A rook at chuck, a dab at taw.
His bum was often bruſh'd, you'll ſay,
'Tis true, now twice, then thrice a day:
So leeches at the breech are fed,
To cure vertigos in the head.
But, by your leave, good doctor Freind,
Let me this maxim recommend;
"A genius can't be forc'd;" nor can
You make an ape an alderman:
The patch-work doublet well may ſuit,
But how would furs become the brute?
In ſhort, the caſe is very plain,
When maggots once are in the brain,
Whole loads of birch are ſpent in vain.
Now to purſue this hopeful pair
To Oxford, and the Lord knows where,
Would take more ink than I can ſpare.
Nor ſhall I here minutely ſcore
The volumes Bob turn'd o'er and o'er,
The laundreſſes turn'd up by Frank,
With many a ſtrange diverting prank;
'Twould jade my muſe, though better fed,
And kept in body clothes and bread,
When briſtles on each chin began
To ſprout, the promiſe of a man,
The good old gentleman expir'd,
And decently to heaven retir'd:
The brethren, at their country ſeat,
Enjoy'd a pleaſant, ſnug retreat;
Their cellars and their barns well ſtor'd,
And plenty ſmoking on their board:

Ale and tobacco for the vicar,
For gentry ſometimes better liquor.
Judicious Bob had read all o'er
Each weighty ſtay'd philoſopher,
And therefore rightly underſtood
The real from th' apparent good;
Subſtantial bliſs, intrinſic joys,
From buſtle, vanity, and noiſe;
Could his own happineſs create,
And bring his mind to his eſtate:
Liv'd in the ſame calm, eaſy round,
His judgment clear, his body ſound;
Good humour, probity, and ſenſe,
Repaid with peace and indolence:
While rakiſh Frank, whoſe active ſoul
No bounds, no principle control,
Flies o'er the world where pleaſure calls,
To races, maſquerades, and balls;
At random roves, now here, now there,
Drinks with the gay, and toaſts the fair.
As when the full-fed reſty ſteed
Breaks from his groom, he flies with ſpeed;
His high-arch'd neck he proudly rears,
Upon his back his tail he bears,
His main upon his ſhoulders curls,
O'er every precipice he whirls,
He plunges in the cooling tides,
He laves his ſhining pamper'd ſides,
He ſnuffs the females on the plain,
And to his joy he ſprings amain,
To this, to that, impetuous flies,
Nor can the ſtud his luſt ſuffice;
Till nature flags, his vigour ſpent,
With drooping tail, and nerves unbent,
The humble beaſt returns content,
Waits tamely at the ſtable door,
As tractable as e'er before.
This was exactly Franky's caſe;
When blood ran high he liv'd apace;
But pockets drain'd, and every vein,
Look'd ſilly, and came home again.
At length extravagance and vice,
Whoring and drinking, box and dice,
Sunk his exchequer; cares intrude,
And duns grow troubleſome and rude.
What meaſures ſhall poor Franky take
To manage wiſely the laſt ſtake,
With ſome few pieces in his purſe,
And half a dozen brats at nurſe?
Penſive he walk'd, lay long a-bed,
Now bit his nails, then ſcratch'd his head,
At laſt reſolv'd: Reſolv'd! on what?
There's not a penny to be got;
The queſtion now remains alone,
Whether 'tis beſt to hang or drown.
Thank you for that, good friendly devil!
You're very courteous, very civil;
Other expedients may be try'd,
The man is young, the world is wide,
And, as judicious authors ſay,
"Every dog ſhall have his day;"
What if we ramble for a while?
Seek Fortune out, and court her ſmile,
Act every part in life to win her,
Firſt try the ſaint, and then the ſinner;
Preſs boldly on; ſlighted, purſue;
Repuls'd, again the charge renew;
Give her no reſt, attend, entreat,
And ſtick at nothing to be great.
Fir'd with theſe thoughts, the youth grew vain,
Look'd on the country with diſdain;
Where Virtue's fools her laws obey,
And dream a lazy life away;
Thinks poverty the greateſt ſin,
And walks on thorns till he begin:
But firſt before his brother laid
The hopeful ſcheme, and begg'd his aid.
Kind Bob was much abaſh'd, to ſee
His brother in extremity,
Reduc'd to rags for want of thought,
A beggar, and not worth a groat.
He griev'd full ſore, gave good advice,
Quoted his authors grave and wiſe,
All who with wholeſome morals treat us,
Old Seneca and Epictetus.
What's my unhappy brother doing?
Whither rambling? whom purſuing
An idle, tricking, giddy jade,
A phantom, and a fleeting ſhade;
Graſp'd in this coxcomb's arms a while,
The falſe jilt fawns, then a fond ſmile;
On that ſhe leers, he like the reſt
Is ſoon a bubble and a jeſt;
But live with me, juſt to thyſelf,
And ſcorn the bitch, and all her pelf;
Fortune's ador'd by fools alone,
The wiſe man always makes his own.
But 'tis, alas! in vain t' apply
Fine ſayings and philoſophy,
Where a poor youth's o'erheated brain,
Is ſold to intereſt and gain,
And pride and fierce ambition reign.
Bob found it ſo, nor did he ſtrive
To work the nail that would not drive;
Content to do the beſt he could,
And as became his brotherhood,
Gave him what money he could ſpare,
And kindly paid his old arrear,
Bought him his equipage and clothes,
So thus ſupply'd away he goes,
For London town he mounts, as gay
As tailors on their wedding-day.
Not many miles upon the road,
A widow's ſtately manſion ſtood;
What if dame Fortune ſhould be there?
(Said Frank) 'tis ten to one, I ſwear:
I'll try to find her in the crowd,
She loves the wealthy and the proud.
Away he ſpurs, and at the door
Stood gallant gentry many a ſcore,
Penelope had never more.
Here tortur'd cats-gut ſqueals amain,
Guittars in ſofter notes complain,
And lutes reveal the lover's pain.
Frank, with a careleſs, eaſy mien,
Sung her a ſong, and was let in.
The reſt with envy burſt, to ſee
The ſtranger's odd felicity.
Low bow'd the footman at the ſtairs,
The gentleman at top appears:

And is your lady, sir, at home?
Pray walk into the drawing-room.
But here my muse is too well bred,
To prattle what was done or said;
She lik'd the youth, his dress, his face,
His calves, his back, and every grace:
Supper was serv'd, and down they sit,
Much meat, good wine, some little wit.
The grace-cup drunk, or dance, or play;
Frank chose the last, was very gay,
Had the good luck the board to strip,
And punted to her ladyship.
The clock strikes one, the gentry bow'd,
Each to his own apartment show'd;
But Franky was in piteous mood,
Slept not a wink; he raves, he dies,
Smit with her jointure and her eyes.
Restless as in a lion's den,
He sprawl'd and kick'd about till ten:
But, as he dreamt of future joys,
His ear was startled with a noise,
Six trumpets and a kettle-drum;
Up in a hurry flies the groom,
Lord, sir! get dress'd, the colonel's come:
Your horse is ready at the door,
You may reach Uxbridge, sir, by four.
Poor Franky must in haste remove,
With disappointment vex'd, and love;
To dirt abandon'd, and despair,
For lace and feather won the fair.
Now for the town he jogs apace,
With leaky boots and sun-burnt face;
And, leaving Acton in his rear,
Began to breathe sulphureous air.
Arriv'd at length, the table spread,
Three bottles drunk, he reels to bed.
Next morn his busy thoughts begun,
To rise and travel with the sun;
Whims heap'd on whims his head turn'd round,
But how dame Fortune might be found,
Was the momentuous grand affair,
His secret wish, his only care.
Damme, thought Franky to himself,
I'll find this giddy wandering elf;
I'll hunt her out in every quarter.
Till she bestow the staff or garter:
I'll visit good Lord Sunderland,
Who keeps the jilt at his command;
Or else some courteous duchess may
Take pity on a runaway.
Dress'd to a pink, to court he flies,
At this levee, and that he plies;
Bows in his rank, an humble slave,
And meanly fawns on every knave;
With maids of honour learns to chat,
Fights for this lord, and pimps for that.
Fortune he sought from place to place,
She led him still a wild-goose chase;
Always prepar'd with some excuse,
The hopeful younker to amuse;
Was busy, indispos'd, was gone
To Hampton-court, or Kensington;
And, after all her wiles and dodgings,
She slipp'd clear off, and bilk'd her lodgings.
Jaded, and almost in dispair,
A gamester whisper'd in his ear;
Who would seek Fortune, sir, at court?
At H—l's is her chief resort;
'Tis there her midnight hours she spends,
Is very gracious to her friends;
Shows honest men the means of thriving,
The best, good-natur'd goddess living.
Away he trudges with his rook,
Throws many a main, is bit, is broke;
With dirty knuckles, aching head,
Disconsolate he sneaks to bed.

CANTO II.

How humble, and how complaisant,
Is a proud man reduc'd to want!
With what a silly, hanging face,
He bears his unforeseen disgrace!
His spirits flag, his pulse beats low,
The gods, and all the world his foe;
To thriving knaves a ridicule,
A butt to every wealthy fool.
For where is courage, wit, or sense,
When a poor rake has lost his pence?
Let all the learn'd say what they can,
'Tis ready money makes the man;
Commands respect where'er we go,
And gives a grace to all we do.
With such reflections Frank distress'd,
The horrors of his soul express'd:
Contempt, the basket, and a gaol,
By turns his restless mind assail;
Aghast the dismal scene he flies,
And death grows pleasing in his eyes:
For since his rhino was all flown,
To the last solitary crown,
Who would not, like a Roman, dare
To leave that world he could not share?
The pistol on his table lay,
And death fled hovering o'er his prey;
There wanted nothing now to do,
But touch the trigger, and adieu.
As he was saying some short prayers,
He heard a wheezing on the stairs,
And looking out, his aunt appears;
Who from Moorfields, breathless and lame,
To see her graceless godson came:
The salutations being past,
Coughing, and out of wind, at last
In his great chair she took her place,
How does your brother? is my neice
Well marry'd? when will Robin settle?
He answer'd all things to a tittle;
Gave such content in every part,
He gain'd the good old beldam's heart.
"Godson," said she, "alas! I know
"Matters with you are but so-so:
"You're come to town, I understand,
"To make your fortune out of hand;
"Your time and patrimony lost,
"To beg a place, or buy a post.
"Believe me, godson, I'm your friend;
"Of this great town, this wicked end
"Is ripe for judgment; Satan's seat,
"The sink of sin, and hell complete.
"In every street of trulls a troop,
"And every cook-wench wears a hoop;

" Sodom was lefs deform'd with vice,
" Lewdnefs of all kinds, cards and dice."
Frank blufh'd (which, by the way, was more
Than ever he had done before);
And own'd it was a wretched place,
Unfit for any child of grace.
The good old aunt o'erjoyed to fee
Thefe glimmerings of fanctity;
" My dear," faid fhe, " this purfe is yours,
" It coft me many painful hours;
" Take it, improve it, and become
" By art and induftry a plumb.
" But leave, for fhame, this impious ftreet,
" All over mark'd with cloven feet;
" In our more holy quarter live,
" Where both your foul and ftock may thrive;
" Where righteous citizens repair,
" And heaven and earth the godly fhare,
" Gain this by jobbing, that by prayer.
" At Jonathan's go fmoke a pipe,
" Look very ferious, dine on tripe;
" Get early up, late clofe your eyes,
" And leave no ftone unturn'd to rife:
" Then each good day at Salter's-Hall
" Pray for a bleffing upon all."
Lowly the raviſh'd Franky bows,
While joy fat fmiling on his brows;
And without fcruple, in a trice,
He took her money and advice.
Not an extravagant young heir,
Befet with duns, and in defpair,
When joyful tidings reach his ear,
And dad retires by heaven's commands,
To leave his chink to better hands;
Not wandering failors almoft loft,
When they behold the wifh'd-for coaft;
Not culprit when the knot is plac'd,
And kind reprive arrives in haſte;
E'er felt a joy in fuch exceſs,
As Frank reliev'd from this diſtreſs.
A thoufand antic trics he play'd,
The purfe he kifs'd, fwore, curs'd and pray'd;
Counted the pieces o'er and o'er,
And hugg'd his unexpected ſtore;
Built ſtately caſtles in the air,
Supp'd with the great, enjoy'd the fair;
Pick'd out his title and his place,
Was ſcarce contented with your Grace.
Strange viſions working in his head,
Frantic, half mad, he ſtrolls to bed;
Sleeps little; if he ſleeps, he dreams
Of ſceptres, and of diadems.
" Fortune," ſaid he, " ſhall now no more
" Trick and deceive me as of yore:
" This paſſport ſhall admittance gain,
" In ſpight of all the jilt's diſdain:
" 'Tis this the tyrant's pride diſarms,
" And brings her bluſhing to my arms;
" This golden bough my wiſh ſhall ſpeed,
" And to th' Elyſian fields ſhall lead."
The morn ſcarce peep'd, but up he roſe,
Impatient huddled on his clothes;
Call'd the next coach, gave double pay,
And to 'Change-Alley whirl'd away.
'Tis here dame Fortune every day
Opens her booth, and ſhows her play;
Here laughing ſits behind the ſcene,
Dances her puppets here unſeen,
And turns her whimſical machine.
Powel, with all his wire and wit,
To her great genius muſt ſubmit:
Exact at twelve the goddeſs ſhows.
And fame aloud her trumpet blows;
Harangues the mob with ſhams and lies,
And bids their actions fall, or riſe.
Old Chaos here his throne regains;
And here in odd confuſion reigns;
All order, all diſtinction loſt,
Now high, now low, the fools are toſt.
Here lucky coxcombs vainly rear
Their giddy heads, there in deſpair
Sits humbled pride, with downcaſt look,
Bankrupts reſtor'd, and miſers broke,
Strange figures here our eyes invade,
And the whole world in maſquerade;
A carman in a hat and feather,
A lord in frieze, his breeches leather:
Tom Whiplaſh in his coach of ſtate,
Drawn by the tits he drove of late:
A colonel of the bold train-bands,
Selling his equipage and lands.
Hard by a cobler bidding fair,
For the gold chain, and next lord mayor:
A butcher bluſtering in the crowd,
Of his late purchas'd 'ſcutcheon proud,
Retains his cleaver for his creſt,
His motto too beneath the reſt,
" Virtue and merit is a jeſt."
Two toaſts with all their trinkets gone,
Padding the ſtreets for half a-crown:
A daggled counteſs and her maid,
Her houſe-rent and her ſlaves unpaid,
A tailor's wife in rich brocade.
All ſects, all parties, high and low,
At fortune's ſhrine devoutly bow;
Nought can their ardent zeal reſtrain,
Where each man's godlineſs is gain.
From taverns, meeting-houſes, ſtews,
Atheiſts and Quakers, bawds and Jews,
Stateſmen and fidlers, beaux and porters,
Blue aprons here, and there blue garters.
As human race of old began
From ſtones and clods, transform'd to man,
So from each dunghill, ſtrange ſurpriſe!
In troops the recent gentry riſe,
Of muſhroom growth, they wildly ſtare,
And ape the great with awkward air:
So Pinkethman upon the ſtage,
Mounting his aſs in warlike rage,
With ſimpering Dicky for his page,
In Lee's mad rant, with monkey face,
Burleſques the prince of Ammon's race.
Induſtrious Frank, among the reſt,
Bought, ſold, and cavil'd, bawl'd and preſs'd;
Lodg'd in a garret on the ſpot,
Follow'd inſtructions to a jot,
The praying part alone forgot.
Learnt every dealing term of art,
And all th' ingenious cant by heart;
Nor doubted but he ſoon ſhould find
Dame Fortune complaiſant and kind.

After her oft he call'd aloud,
But ſtill ſhe vaniſh'd in the crowd;
Now with ſmooth looks and tempting ſmiles
The faithleſs hypocrite beguiles;
Then with a cool and ſcornful air,
Bids the deluded wretch deſpair;
Takes pet without the leaſt pretence,
And wonders at his inſolence.
Thus with her fickle humours vex'd,
And between hopes and fears perplex'd;
His patience quite worn out at laſt
Reſolves to throw one deſperate caſt.
" 'Tis vain," ſaid he, " to whine and woo,
" 'Tis one briſk ſtroke the work muſt do.
" Fortune is like a widow won,
" And truckles to the bold alone;
" I'll puſh at once and venture all,
" At leaſt I ſhall with honour fall."
But, curſe upon the treacherous jade,
Who thus his ſervices repaid;
When now he thought the world his own,
He bought a bear, and was undone.

CANTO III.

As here is ſomething in a face,
An air, and a peculiar grace,
Which boldeſt painters cannot trace;
That more than features, ſhape, or hair,
Diſtinguiſhes the happy fair;
Strikes every eye, and makes her known.
A ruling toaſt through all the town:
So in each action 'tis ſucceſs
That gives it all its comelineſs;
Guards it from cenſure and from blame,
Brightens and burniſhes our fame.
For what is virtue, courage, wit,
In all men, but a lucky hit?
But, vice versâ, where this fails,
The wiſeſt conduct nought avails;
The man of merit ſoon ſhall find
The world to proſperous knaves inclin'd,
Himſelf the laſt of all mankind.
Too true poor Frank this theſis found,
Bankrupt, deſpoil'd, and run aground,
In durance vile detain'd and loſt,
And all his mighty projects croſt:
With grief and ſhame at once oppreſt,
Tears ſwell his eyes, and ſighs his breaſt;
A poor, forlorn, abandon'd rake,
Where ſhall he turn? what meaſures take?
Betray'd, deceiv'd, and ruin'd quite,
By his own greedy appetite;
He mourns his fatal luſt of pelf,
And curſes Fortune and himſelf:
In limbo pent, would fain get free,
Importunate for liberty.
So when the watchful hungry mouſe,
At midnight prowling round the houſe.
Winds in a corner toaſted cheeſe,
Glad the luxurious prey to ſeize;
With whiſkers curl'd, and round black eyes,
He meditates the luſcious prize,
Till caught, trepann'd, laments too late
The rigorous decrees of fate:
Reſtleſs his freedom to regain,
He bites the wire, and climbs in vain.
The wretched captive thus diſtreſs'd,
His buſy thoughts allow no reſt:
Fond on each project to depend,
Kind hope his only faithful friend;
Odd whimſies floating in his brain,
He plots, contrives, but all in vain,
Approves, rejects, and thinks again.
As when the ſhipwreck'd wretch is toſt
From wave to wave, and almoſt loſt,
Beat by the billows from the ſhore,
Returns half drown'd, and hugs once more
The friendly plank he graſp'd before:
So Frank, when all expedients fail,
To ſave his carcaſe from a gaol,
Eat up with vermin and with care,
And almoſt ſinking in deſpair,
Reſolves once more to make his court
To his old aunt, his laſt reſort:
Takes pen in hand, now writes, now tears,
Then blots his paper with his tears,
Ranſacks his troubled ſoul, to raiſe
Each tender ſentiment and phraſe;
And every lame excuſe ſupplies
With artful colouring and diſguiſe;
Kind to himſelf, lays all the blame
On Fortune, that capricious dame:
In ſhort informs her all was loſt,
And ſends it by the penny-poſt.
Soon as the ancient nymph had read
The fatal ſcroll, ſhe took her bed,
Cold palſies ſeize her trembling head;
She groans, ſhe ſighs, ſhe ſobs, ſhe ſmears
Her ſpectacles and beard with tears;
Her noſe that wont to ſympathiſe
With all th' o'erflowings of her eyes,
Adown in pearly drops diſtils,
Th' united ſtream each chaſm fills.
Geneva now, nor Nants will do,
Her toothleſs gums their hold let go;
And on the ground, O fatal ſtroke!
The ſhort coæval pipe is broke:
With vapours chok'd, entranc'd ſhe lies,
Belches, and prays, and ſ—ts, and dies,
But ſleep, that kind reſtorative,
Recall'd her ſoul, and bid her live;
With cooler thoughts the caſe ſhe weigh'd,
And brought her reaſon to her aid.
Away ſhe hobbles, and with ſpeed
Reſolves to ſee the captive freed;
Wipe off this ſtain and foul diſgrace,
And vindicate her ancient race.
With her a ſage director comes,
More weighty than a brace of plumbs,
A good man in the city cant,
Where caſh, not morals, makes the ſaint.
T' improve a genius ſo polite,
The clumſy thing was dubb'd a knight:
Fortune's chief confident and friend,
Grown fat by many a dividend;
And ſtill her favour he retains,
By want of merit and of brains;
On her top ſpoke ſublime he ſits,
The jeſt and theme of ſneering wits:

For fools in fortune's pillory plac'd
Are mounted to be more disgrac'd.
This rich old Hunks, as Woodcock wife,
Was call'd the younker to advife :
" Young man," faid he, " refrain from tears,
" While joyful tidings bleſs thine ears;
" Up and be doing, boy, and try
" To conquer fate by induſtry;
" For know that all of mortal race,
" Are born to loſſes and diſgrace :
" Ev'n I broke twice, I, heretofore
" A tailor deſpicably poor,
" In every hole for ſhelter crept,
" On the ſame bulk, botch'd, lous'd, and ſlept,
" With ſcarce one penny to prepare
" A friendly halter in deſpair ;
" My credit like my garment torn,
" Threadbare, and ragged, over-worn :
" But ſoon I patch'd it up again,
" Theſe buſy hands, this working brain,
" Ne'er ceas'd from labour, pain, and ſweat,
" Till fortune ſmil'd, and I was great.
" Now at each pompous city feaſt,
" Who but Sir Triſtram ? Every gueſt
" Reſpectful bows. In each debate,
" My nod muſt give the ſentence weight :
" On me prime miniſters attend,
" And ——Aiſlabie 's my friend :
" In embryo each bold project lies,
" Till my conſenting purſe ſupplies.
" This hand—nay do not think me vain,
" Soften'd the Swede, and humbled Spain.
" To me the fair, whom all adore,
" Addreſs their prayers, and own my power ;
" When the poor toaſt by break of day
" Has punted all her gold away,
" Undreſs'd, and in her native charms,
" She flies to theſe indulgent arms;
" She curls each dimple in her face
" To win the good Sir Triſtram's grace ;
" Offers her brilliants with a ſmile,
" That might an achoret beguile ;
" And when my potent aid is lent,
" Away the dear-one wheels content.
" He that can money get, my boy,
" Shall every other good enjoy ;
" Be rich, and every boon receive,
" That man can wiſh, or Heaven can give.
" Now to the means, dear youth, attend,
" By which thy ſorrows ſoon ſhall end :
" Thy good old aunt reſolves to bail
" Her hopeful godſon out of gaol;
" But what is freedom to the poor ?
" The man who begs from door to door
" Is free ; in lazy wretchedneſs
" He lives, till Heaven his ſubſtance bleſs ;
" But, having learnt to cog and chouſe,
" To cut a purſe, or break a houſe,
" Then ſoon he mends his own apparel,
" Eats boil'd and roaſt, and taps his barrel ;
" Drinks double bub, with all his might,
" And hugs his doxy every night :
" Thy ſprightly genius ne'er ſhall lie
" Depreſs'd by want and penury ;
" Go, with a proſperous merry gale,
" To the South Seas adventurous ſail ;
" Fat Plenty dwells on thoſe rich ſhores,
" Abundance opens all her ſtores ;
" Ingots and pearls for beads are ſold,
" And rivers glide on ſands of gold ;
" Profit and Pleaſure hand in hand,
" Smile on the fields, and bleſs the land ;
" The ſwains unlabour'd harveſts reap,
" Fountains run wine, and whores are cheap.
" Fortune is always true and kind,
" Nor veers, as here, with every wind ;
" Not, as in theſe penurious iſles,
" Retails her bleſſings and her ſmiles ;
" But deals by wholeſale with her friends,
" And gluts them with her dividends.
" Then haſte, fet ſail, the ſhip's unmoor'd,
" And waits to take thee now on board."
The youth o'erjoy'd this project hears,
From his flock-bed his head he rears,
And waters all his rags with tears.
In ſhort, he took his friend's advice,
Pack'd up his baggage in a trice ;
Dancing for joy, on board he flew,
With all Potoſi in his view.

CANTO IV.

Behold the youth juſt now ſet free
On land, immur'd again at ſea ;
Stow'd with his cargo in the hold,
In queſt of other worlds for gold.
He who ſo late regal'd at eaſe,
On olios, ſoups, and fricaſſees;
Drank with the witty and the gay,
Sparkling Champaign, and rich Tokay ;
Now breaks his faſt with Suffolk cheeſe,
And burſts at noon with pork and peaſe ;
Inſtead of wine, content to ſip,
With noiſy tars, their nauſeous flip :
Their breath with chew'd mundungus ſweet,
Their jeſts more fulſome than their meat.
While thunder rolls, and ſtorms ariſe,
He ſnoring in his hammock lies ;
In golden dreams enjoys the night,
And counts his bags with vaſt delight.
Mountains of gold erect his throne,
Each precious gem is now his own ;
Kind Jove deſcends in golden fleet,
Pactolus murmurs at his feet;
The ſea gives up its hoarded ſtore,
Poſſeſſing all he covets more.
O gold ! attractive gold ! in vain
Honour and conſcience would reſtrain
Thy boundleſs univerſal reign.
To thee each ſtubborn virtue bends,
The man oblig'd betrays his friends;
The patriot quits his country's cauſe,
And ſells her liberty and laws ;
The pious prude's no longer nice,
And ev'n lawn ſleeves can flatter vice.
At thy too abſolute command,
Thy zealots ranſack ſea and land :
Where'er thy beams thy power diſplay,
The ſwarming inſects haſte away,
To baſk in thy refulgent ray.
Now the bold crew with proſperous wind,
Leave the retreating land behind;

Fearleſs they quit their native ſhore,
Albion's cliffs are ſeen no more.
Then on the wide Atlantic borne,
Their rigging and their tackle torn;
Danger in various ſhapes appears,
Sudden alarms, and ſhivering fears.
Here, might ſome copious bard dilate
And ſhow fierce Neptune drawn in ſtate;
While guards of Triton's clear his way,
And Nereids round his chariot play;
Then bid the ſtormy Boreas riſe,
And forky lightning cleave the ſkies;
The ſhip nigh foundering in the deep,
Or bounding o'er the ridgy ſteep:
Deſcribe the monſters of the main,
The Phocæ, and their finny train,
Tornados, hurricanes, and rain.
Spouts, ſhoals, and rocks of dreadful ſize,
And pirates lurking for their prize;
Amazing miracles rehearſe,
And turn all Dampier into verſe.
My negligent and humble muſe
Leſs ambitious aims purſues;
Content with more familiar phraſe,
Nor deals in ſuch embroider'd lays;
Pleas'd if my rhyme juſt meaſure keeps,
And ſtretch'd at eaſe my reader ſleeps.
Hibernian matrons thus of old,
Their ſoporific ſtories told;
To ſleep in vain the patient ſtrove,
Perplex'd with buſineſs, croſs'd in love;
Till ſoothing tales becalm'd his breaſt,
And lull'd his troubled ſoul to reſt.
Suffice it only to recite,
They drank all day, they ſnor'd all night:
And, after many moons were paſt,
They made the wiſh'd-for ſhores at laſt.
Frank, with his cargo in his hand,
Leap'd joyful on the golden ſtrand;
Open'd his toy-ſhop in the port,
Trinkets of various ſize and ſort;
Bracelets and combs, bodkins and tweezers,
Bath-metal rings, and knives, and ſciſſars;
And in one lucky day got more
Than Bubble-boy in half a ſcore:
For Fortune now, no longer coy,
Smil'd on her darling favourite boy;
No longer from his arms retir'd,
But gave him all his heart deſir'd,
Ah! thoughtleſs youth! in time beware,
And ſhun the treacherous harlot's ſnare;
The wiſer ſavages behold,
Who truck not liberty for gold;
Proof againſt all her ſubtle wiles,
Regardleſs of her frowns or ſmiles;
If frugal Nature want ſupplies,
The lance or dart unerring flies:
The mountain boar their prey deſcends,
Or the fat kid regales their friends;
The jocund tribe, from ſun to ſun,
Feaſt on the prize their valour won.
Ceaſe, babbling muſe, thy vain advice,
'Tis thrown away on avarice:
Bid hungry lions quit their prey,
Or ſtreams that down the mountains ſtray
Divert their courſe, return again,
And climb the ſteep from whence they came.
Unbleſt with his ill-gotten ſtore,
Th' inſatiate youth ſtill craves for more;
To counſel deaf, t' examples blind,
Scrapes up whatever he can find.
Now maſter of a veſſel grown,
With all the glittering freight his own,
To Fortune ſtill he makes his court,
And coaſts along from port to port.
Each rolling tide brings freſh ſupplies,
And heaps on heaps delight his eyes.
Through Panama's delicious bay,
The loaded veſſel ploughs her way;
With the rich freight oppreſs'd ſhe ſails,
And ſummons all the friendly gales,
Frank on her deck triumphant ſtood,
And view'd the calm tranſparent flood;
Let book-learn'd ſots, ſaid he, adore
Th' aſpiring hills that grace thy ſhore;
Thy verdant iſles, the groves that bow
Their nodding heads, and ſhade thy brow;
Thy face ſerene, thy gentle breaſt,
Where ſyrens ſing, and halcyons reſt;
Propitious flood! on me beſtow
The treaſures of thy depths below;
Which long in thy dark womb have ſlept,
From age to age ſecurely kept.
Scarce had he ſpoke, when, ſtrange ſurpriſe!
Th' indignant waves in mountains riſe,
And hurricanes invade the ſkies;
The ſhip againſt the ſhoals was ſtruck,
And in a thouſand pieces broke;
But one poor truſty plank, to ſave
Its owner from the watery grave;
On this he mounts, is caſt on ſhore,
Half dead, a bankrupt as before:
Spiritleſs, fainting, and alone,
On the bare beach he makes his moan.
Then climbs the ragged rock, t' explore
If aught was driving to the ſhore,
The poor remains of all his ſtore:
With greedy diligence prepar'd
To ſave whate'er the waves had ſpar'd.
But, oh! the wretch expects in vain
Compaſſion from the furious main;
Men, goods, are ſunk. Mad with deſpair
He beat his breaſt, he tore his hair:
Then leaning o'er the craggy ſteep,
Look'd down into the boiling deep;
Almoſt reſolv'd to caſt himſelf,
And periſh with his dear, dear pelf.

CANTO V.

If Heaven the thriving trader bleſs,
What fawning crowds about him preſs!
But, if he fail, diſtreſs'd and poor,
His mob of friends are ſeen no more;
For all men hold it meet to fly
Th' infectious breath of poverty.
Poor Frank, deſerted and forlorn,
Curſes the day that he was born:
Each treacherous crony hides his face,
Or ſtarts whene'er he haunts the place.

His wealth thus loſt, with that his friends,
On Fortune ſtill the youth depends:
One ſmile, ſaid he, can ſoon reſtore
A bankrupt wretch, and give him more;
She will not, ſure, refuſe her aid?
Fallacious hope! for the falſe jade
That very day took wing, was flown,
And on her wonted journey gone
(Intent her coſtly goods to ſell)
From Panama to Portobel:
Five hundred mules her baggage bear,
And groan beneath the precious ware,
The goddeſs rides ſublime in air;
And hence conveys a freſh ſupply,
For pride, debate, and luxury.
Frank, when he heard th' unwelcome news,
Like a ſtaunch hound the chaſe purſues,
Takes the ſame rout, doubles his ſpeed,
Nor doubts her help in time of need.
O'er the wide waſte, through pathleſs ways,
The ſolitary pilgrim ſtrays;
Now on the ſwampy deſart plain,
Through brakes of mangroves works with pain;
Then climbs the hills with many a groan,
And melts beneath the torrid zone.
With berries and green plantains fed,
On the parch'd earth he leans his head;
Fainting with thirſt, to heaven he cries,
But finds no ſtream but from his eyes.
Ah, wretch! thy vain laments forbear,
And for a worſe extreme prepare;
Sudden the lowering ſtorms ariſe,
The burſting thunder rends the ſkies,
Aſlant the ruddy lightning flies;
Darts through the gloom a tranſient ray,
And gives a ſhort, but dreadful day:
With pealing rain the woods reſound,
Convulſions ſhake the ſolid ground.
Benumb'd with cold, but more with fear,
Strange phantoms to his mind appear,
The wolves around him howl for food,
The ravenous tigers hunt for blood,
And canibals more fierce than they
(Monſters who make mankind their prey)
Riot and feaſt on human gore,
And, ſtill inſatiate, thirſts for more.
Half dead at every noiſe he hears,
His fancy multiplies his fears;
Whate'er he read or heard of old,
Whate'er his nurſe or Cruſoe told,
Each tragic ſcene his eyes behold:
Things paſt as preſent fear applies.
Their pains he bears, their deaths he dies.
At length the ſun began to peep,
And gild the ſurface of the deep,
Then on the reeking moiſture fed,
The ſcatter'd clouds before him fled,
The rivers ſhrunk into their bed:
Nature revives; the feather'd throng
Salute the morning with a ſong.
Frank with his fellow-brutes aroſe,
Yet dreaming ſtill he ſaw his foes,
Reels to and fro, laments and grieves,
And ſtarting, doubts if yet he lives.
At laſt his ſpirits mend their pace,
And hope ſat dawning on his face;
Ev'n ſuch is human life, ſaid he,
A night of dread and miſery,
Till heaven relents, relieves our pain,
And ſun-ſhine days return again.
O Fortune! who doſt now beſtow,
Frowning, this bitter cup of woe,
Do not thy faithful ſlave deſtroy,
But give th' alternative of joy.
Then many a painful ſtep he takes,
O'er hills and vales, through woods and brakes;
No ſturdy deſperate buccaneer
E'er ſuffer'd hardſhips more ſevere.
Stubborn, incorrigibly blind,
No dangers can divert his mind;
His tedious journey he purſues,
At laſt his eye tranſported views
Fair Portobel, whoſe riſing ſpires
Inflame his heart with new deſires.
Secure of Fortune's grace, he ſmiles,
And flattering hope the wretch beguiles.
Though nature calls for ſleep and food,
Yet ſtronger avarice ſubdued;
Ev'n ſhameful nakedneſs and pain,
And thirſt and hunger, plead in vain:
No reſt he gives his weary feet,
Fortune he ſeeks from ſtreet to ſtreet;
Careful in every corner pries,
Now here, now there, impatient flies,
Wherever buſy crowds reſort,
The change, the market, and the port;
In vain he turns his eye-balls round,
Fortune was no where to be found;
The jilt, not many hours before,
With the Plate-fleet had left the ſhore
Laughs at the credulous fool behind,
And joyful ſcuds before the wind.
Poor Frank forſaken on the coaſt,
All his fond hopes at once are loſt.
Aghaſt the ſwelling ſails he views,
And with his eye the fleet purſues,
Till, leſſen'd to his wearied ſight,
It leaves him to deſpair and night.
So when the faithleſs Theſeus fled
The Cretan nymph's deſerted bed,
Awak'd, at diſtance on the main,
She view'd the proſperous perjur'd ſwain,
And call'd th' avenging gods in vain.
Proſtrate on earth till break of day,
Senſeleſs and motionleſs he lay,
Till tears at laſt find out their way;
Guſh like a torrent from his eyes,
In bitterneſs of ſoul he cries,
" O Fortune now too late I ſee,
" Too late, alas! thy treachery.
" Wretch that I am, abandon'd, loſt,
" About the world at random toſt,
" Whither, oh, whither ſhall I run?
" Sore pinch'd with hunger, and undone.
" In the dark mines go hide thy head
" Accurs'd, exchange thy ſweat for bread,
" Sculk under ground, in earth's dark womb
" Go, ſlave, and dig thyſelf a tomb:
" There's gold enough; pernicious gold!
" To which long ſince thy peace was ſold;
" Vain helpleſs idol! canſt thou ſave
" This ſhatter'd carcaſe from the grave?

" Reſtleſs diſturber of mankind,
" Canſt thou give health, or peace of mind?
" Ah, no! deceiv'd the fool ſhall be
" Who puts his confidence in thee.
" Fatally blind, my native home
" I left, in this rude world to roam;
" O brother! ſhall I view no more
" Thy peaceful bowers? fair Albion's ſhore?
" Yes (if kind Heaven my life ſhall ſpare)
" Some happy moments yet I'll ſhare,
" In thy delightful bleſt retreat,
" With thee contemn the rich and great;
" Reedeem my time miſpent, and wait
" Till death relieve th' unfortunate."
Adverſity, ſage uſeful gueſt,
Severe inſtructor, but the beſt;
It is from thee alone we know
Juſtly to value things below;
Right reaſon's ever faithful friend,
To thee our haughty paſſions bend;
Tam'd by thy rod, poor Frank at laſt
Repents of all his follies paſt;
Reſign'd, and patient to endure
Thoſe ills, which Heaven alone can cure.
With vain purſuits and labours worn,
He meditates a quick return,
Longs to reviſit yet once more,
Poor prodigal his native ſhore.
In the next ſhip for Britain bound,
Glad Frank a ready paſſage found;
Nor veſſel now, nor freight his own,
He fears no longer Fortune's frown;
No property but life his ſhare,
Life a frail good not worth his care;
Active and willing to obey,
A merry mariner, and gay,
He hands the ſails, and jokes all day.
At night no dreams diſturb his reſt,
No paſſions riot in his breaſt;
For, having nothing left to loſe,
Sweet and unbroken his repoſe:
And now fair Albion's cliffs are ſeen,
And hills with fruitful herbage green:
His heart beats quick, the joy that ties
His faltering tongue burſts from his eyes.
At length, thus hail'd the well-known land,
And kneeling kiſs'd the happy ſtrand.
" And do I then draw native air,
" After an age of toil and care?
" O welcome parent iſle! no more
" The vagrant ſhall deſert thy ſhore,
" But, flying to thy kind embrace,
" Here end his life's laborious race."
So when the ſtag, intent to rove,
Quits the ſafe park and ſheltering grove,
Tops the high pale, ſtrolls unconfin'd,
And leaves the lazy herd behind,
Bleſt in his happy change a while,
Corn fields and flowery meadows ſmile,
The pamper'd beaſt enjoys the ſpoil;
Till on the next returning morn,
Alarm'd, he hears the fatal horn;
Before the ſtaunch, blood-thirſty hounds,
Panting, o'er hills unknown he bounds,
With clamour every wood reſounds:
He creeps the thorny brakes with pain,
He ſeeks the diſtant ſtream in vain,
And now, by ſad experience wiſe,
To his dear home the rambler flies;
His old encloſure gains once more,
And joins the herd he ſcorn'd before.
Nor are his labours finiſh'd yet,
Hunger and thirſt, and pain and ſweat,
And many a tedious mile remains,
Before his brother's houſe he gains.
Without one doit his purſe to bleſs,
Nor very elegant his dreſs;
With a tarr'd jump, a crooked hat,
Scarce one whole ſhoe, and half a hat;
From door to door the ſtroller ſkipp'd,
Sometimes reliev'd, but oftener whipp'd;
Sun-burnt and ragged, on he fares,
At laſt the manſion-houſe appears,
Timely relief for all his cares.
Around he gaz'd, his greedy ſight
Devours each object with delight;
Through each known haunt tranſported roves,
Gay ſmiling fields, and ſhady groves,
Once conſcious of his youthful loves.
About the hoſpitable gate
Crowds of dejected wretches wait;
Each day kind Bob's diffuſive hand,
Cheer'd and refreſh'd the tatter'd band,
Proud the moſt godlike joy to ſhare,
He fed the hungry, cloth'd the bare.
Frank amongſt theſe his ſtation choſe,
With looks revealing inward woes;
When, lo! with wonder and ſurpriſe,
He ſaw dame Fortune in diſguiſe;
He ſaw, but ſcarce believ'd his eyes.
Her fawning ſmiles, her trickling air,
Th' egregious hypocrite declare;
A gipſy's mantle round her ſpread,
Of various dye, white, yellow, red;
Strange feats ſhe promis'd, clamour'd loud,
And with her cant amus'd the crowd:
There every day impatient ply'd,
Puſh'd to get in, but ſtill deny'd;
For Bob, who knew the ſubtle whore,
Thruſt the falſe vagrant from his door.
But, when the ſtranger's face he view'd,
With no deceitful tears bedew'd,
His boding heart began to melt,
And more than uſual pity felt:
He trac'd his features o'er and o'er,
That ſpoke him better born, though poor,
Though cloth'd in rags, genteel his mien,
That face he ſomewhere muſt have ſeen:
Nature at laſt reveals the truth,
He knows, and owns the hapleſs youth.
Surpris'd, and ſpeechleſs, both embrace,
And mingling tears o'erflow each face;
Till B b thus eas'd his labouring thought,
And this inſtructive moral taught.
Welcome, my brother, to my longing arms,
Here on my boſom reſt ſecure from harms;
See Fortune there, that falſe deluſive jade,
To whom thy prayers and ardent vows were paid:
She (like her ſex) the fond purſuer flies;
But flight the jilt, and at thy feet ſhe dies

Now ſafe in port, indulge thyſelf on ſhore,
Oh, tempt the faithleſs winds and ſeas no more;
Let unavailing toils, and dangers paſt,
Though late, this uſeful leſſon teach at laſt,
True happineſs is only to be found
In a contented mind, a body ſound,
All elſe is dream, a dance on fairy ground:
While reſtleſs fools each idle whim purſue,
And ſtill one wiſh obtain'd creates a new,
Like froward babes, the toys they have, deteſt,
While ſtill the neweſt trifle pleaſes beſt:
Let us, my brother, rich in wiſdom's ſtore,
What Heaven has lent, enjoy, nor covet more;
Subdue our paſſions, curb their ſaucy rage,
And to ourſelves reſtore the golden age.

THE DEVIL OUTWITTED,

A TALE.

A VICAR liv'd on this ſide Trent,
Religious, learn'd, benevolent,
Pure was his life, in deed, word, thought,
A comment on the truths he taught:
His pariſh large, his income ſmall,
Yet ſeldom wanted wherewithal;
For againſt every merry tide
Madam would carefully provide.
A painful paſtor; but his ſheep,
Alas! within no bounds would keep;
A ſcabby flock, that every day
Run riot, and would go aſtray.
He thump'd his cuſhion, fretted, vext,
Thump'd o'er again each uſeful text;
Rebuk'd, exhorted, all in vain,
His pariſh was the more profane:
The ſcrubs would have their wicked will,
And cunning Satan triumph'd ſtill.
At laſt, when each expedient fail'd,
And ſerious meaſures nought avail'd,
It came into his head, to try
The force of wit and raillery.
The good man was by nature gay,
Could gibe and joke as well as pray;
Not like ſome hide-bound folk, who chaſe
Each merry ſmile from their dull face,
And think pride zeal, ill-nature grace.
At chriſtenings and each jovial feaſt,
He ſingled out the ſinful beaſt:
Let all his pointed arrows fly,
Told this and that, look'd very ſly,
And left my maſters to apply.
His tales were humorous, often true,
And now and then ſet off to view
With lucky fictions and ſheer wit,
That pierc'd where truth could never hit.
The laugh was always on his ſide,
While paſſive fools by turns deride;
And, giggling thus at one another,
Each jeering lout reform'd his brother;
Till the whole pariſh was with eaſe
Sham'd into virtue by degrees:
Then be advis'd, and try a tale,
When Chryſoſtom and Auſtin fail.

THE OFFICIOUS MESSENGER,

A TALE.

MAN, of precarious ſcience vain,
Treats other creatures with diſdain;
Nor Pug nor Shock have common ſenſe,
Nor even Pol the leaſt pretence,
Though ſhe prates better than us all,
To be accounted rational.
The brute creation here below,
It ſeems, is nature's puppet-ſhow;
But clock-work all, and mere machine,
What can theſe idle gimcracks mean?
Ye world-makers of Greſham-hall,
Dog Rover ſhall confute you all;
Shall prove that every reaſoning brute
Like Ben of Bangor can diſpute;
Can apprehend, judge, ſyllogize;
Or like proud Bently criticiſe:
At a moot point, or odd diſaſter,
Is often wiſer than his maſter.
He may miſtake ſometimes, 'tis true,
None are infallible but you.
The dog whom nothing can miſlead
Muſt be a dog of parts indeed:
But to my tale; hear me, my friend,
And with due gravity attend.
Rover, as heralds are agreed,
Well-born, and of the ſetting breed,
Rang'd high, was ſtout, of noſe acute,
A very learn'd and courteous brute.
In parallel lines his ground he beat,
Not ſuch as in one centre meet,
In thoſe let blundering doctors deal,
His were exactly parallel.
When tainted gales the game betray,
Down cloſe he ſinks, and eyes his prey.
Though different paſſions tempt his ſoul,
True as the needle to the pole,
He keeps his point, and panting lies,
The floating net above him flies,
Then, dropping, ſweeps the fluttering prize.
Nor this his only excellence:
When ſurly farmers took offence,
And the rank corn the ſport deny'd,
Still faithful to his maſter's ſide,
A thouſand pretty pranks he play'd,
And cheerful each command obey'd:
Humble his mind, though great his wit,
Would lug a pig, or turn the ſpit;
Would fetch and carry, leap o'er ſticks,
And forty ſuch diverting tricks.
Nor Partridge, nor wiſe Gadbury,
Could find loſt goods ſo ſoon as he;
Bid him go back a mile or more,
And ſeek the glove you hid before,
Still his unerring noſe would wind it,
If above ground, was ſure to find it;
Whimpering for joy his maſter greet,
And humbly lay it at his feet.
But hold—it cannot be deny'd,
That uſeful talents miſapply'd,
May make wild work. It hapt one day,
'Squire Lobb, his maſter, took his way,

New shav'd, and smug, and very tight,
To compliment a neighbouring knight;
In his best trowsers he appears
(A comely person for his years);
And clean white drawers, that many a day
In lavender and rose-cakes lay.
Across his brawny shoulders strung,
On his left side his dagger hung;
Dead-doing blade! a dreadful guest,
Or in the field, or at the feast.
No Franklin carving of a chine
At Christide, ever look'd so fine.
With him obsequious Rover trudg'd,
Nor from his heels one moment budg'd:
A while they travell'd, when within
Poor Lobb perceiv'd a rumbling din:
Then warring winds, for want of vent,
Shook all his earthly tenement.
So in the body politic
(For states sometimes, like men, are sick)
Dark faction mutters through the crowd,
Ere bare-fac'd treason roars aloud:
Whether crude humours undigested
His labouring entrails had infested,
Or last night's load of bottled ale,
Grown mutinous, was breaking gaol:
The cause of this his awkward pain,
Let Johnston or let H——th explain;
Whose learned noses may discover,
Why nature's stink pot thus ran over.
My province is th' effect to trace,
And give each point its proper grace,
Th' effect, O lamentable case!
Long had he struggled, but in vain,
The factious tumult to restrain:
What should he do? Th' unruly rout
Press'd on, and it was time, no doubt,
T' unbutton, and to let all out.
The trowsers soon his will obey!
Not so his stubborn drawers, for they,
Beneath his hanging paunch close ty'd,
His utmost art and pains defy'd:
He drew his dagger on the spot,
Resolv'd to cut the Gordian knot.
In the same road just then pass'd by (Such was the will of destiny)
The courteous curate of the place,
Good-nature shone o'er all his face;
Surpris'd the flaming blade to view,
And deeming slaughter must ensue,
Off from his back himself he threw,
Then without ceremony seiz'd
The 'squire impatient to be eas'd.
"Lord! Master Lobb, who would have thought
"The fiend had e'er so strongly wrought;
"Is suicide so slight a fault?
"Rip up thy guts, man! What—go quick "To hell? Outrageous lunatic!
"But, by the blessing, I'll prevent
"With this right hand, thy foul intent."
Then gripp'd the dagger fast: the 'squire,
Like Peleus' son, look'd pale with ire;
While the good man like Pallas stood,
And check'd his eager thirst for blood,
At last, when both a while had strain'd,
Strength, join'd with zeal, the conquest gain'd.
The curate in all points obey'd,
Into the sheath returns the blade:
But first th' unhappy 'squire he swore,
T' attempt upon his life no more.
With sage advice his speech he clos'd,
And left him (as he thought) compos'd.
But was it so, friend Lobb? I own,
Misfortune seldom comes alone;
Satan supplies the swelling tide,
And ills on ills are multiply'd.
Subdued and all his measures broke,
His purpose and intent mistook;
Within his drawers, alas! he found
His guts let out without a wound:
For, in the conflict straining hard,
He left his postern gate unbarr'd;
Most wofully bedawb'd, he moans
His piteous case, he sighs, he groans.
To lose his dinner, and return,
Was very hard, not to be borne:
Hunger, they say, parent of arts,
Will make a fool a man of parts.
The sharp-set 'squire resolves at last,
Whate'er befel him, not to fast;
He mus'd a while, chaf'd, strain'd his wits,
At last on this expedient hits;
To the next brook with sober pace
He tends, preparing to uncase,
Straddling and muttering all the way,
Curs'd inwardly th' unlucky day.
The coast now clear, no soul in view,
Off in a trice his trowsers drew;
More leisurely his drawers, for care
And caution was convenient there:
So fast the plaister'd birdlime stuck,
The skin came off with every pluck,
Sorely he gaul'd each brawny ham;
Nor other parts escap'd, which shame
Forbids a bashful muse to name.
Not without pain the work atchiev'd,
He scrubb'd and wash'd the parts aggriev'd;
Then, with nice hand and look sedate,
Folds up his drawers, with their rich freight,
And hides them in a bush, at leisure
Resolv'd to fetch his hidden treasure:
The trusty Rover lay hard by,
Observing all with curious eye.
Now rigg'd again, once more a beau,
And matters fix'd in statu quo,
Brisk as a snake in merry May,
That just has cast his slough away,
Gladsome he caper'd o'er the green,
As he presum'd both sweet and clean;
For, oh! amongst us mortal elves,
How few there are smell out themselves!
With a mole's ear, and eagle's eye,
And with a blood-hound's nose, we fly
On others' faults implacably.
But where's that ear, that eye, that nose,
Against its master will depose?
Ruddy Miss Prue, with golden hair,
Stinks like a pole-cat or a bear,
Yet romps about me every day,
Sweeter, she thinks, than new-made hay.
Lord Plausible, at Tom's and Will's,
Whose poisonous breath in whispers kills,

Still buzzes in my ear, nor knows
What fatal ſecrets he beſtows:
Let him deſtroy each day a ſcore,
'Tis mere chance-medley, and no more.
In fine, ſelf-love bribes every ſenſe,
And all at home is excellence.
The 'ſquire arriv'd in decent plight
With reverence due ſalutes the knight;
Compliments paſt, the dinner-bell
Rung quick and loud, harmonious knell
To greedy Lobb! Th' Orphean lyre
Did ne'er ſuch rapturous joy inſpire;
Though this the ſavage throng obey,
That hunger tames more fierce than they.
In comely order now appear
The footmen loaded with good cheer,
Her ladyſhip brings up the rear.
Simpering ſhe liſps, "Your ſervant, ſir—
"The ways are bad, one can't well ſtir
"Abroad—or 'twere indeed unkind
"To leave good Mrs. Lobb behind—
"She's well, I hope—Maſter, they ſay,
"Comes on apace—How's Miſs, I pray?"
Lobb bow'd, and cring'd; and, muttering low,
Made for his chair, would fain fall-to.
Theſe weighty points adjuſted, ſoon
My lady brandiſhes her ſpoon.
Unhappy Lobb, pleas'd with his treat,
And minding nothing but his meat,
Too near the fire had choſe his ſeat:
When, oh! th' effluvia of his bum
Begin amain to ſcent the room,
Ambroſial ſweets, and rich perfume.
The flickering footman ſtopt his noſe;
The chaplain too, under the roſe,
Made awkward mouths; the knight took ſnuff;
Her ladyſhip began to huff;
"Indeed, Sir John—pray, good my dear—
"'Tis wrong to make your kennel here—
"Dogs in their place are good, I own—
"But in the parlour—ſoh!—be gone."
Now Rockwood leaves th' unfiniſh'd bone,
Baniſh'd for failings not his own;
No grace ev'n Fidler could obtain,
And favourite Virgin fawn'd in vain.
The ſervants, to the ſtranger kind,
Leave truſty Rover ſtill behind;
But Lobb, who would not ſeem to be
Defective in civility,
And, for removing of all doubt,
Knitting his brows, bids him get out:
By ſigns expreſſes his command,
And to the door points with his hand.
The dog, or through miſtake or ſpight
(Grave authors have not ſet us right),
Fled back the very way he came,
And in the buſh ſoon found his game;
Brought in his mouth the ſavoury load,
And at his maſter's elbow ſtood.
O Lobb! what idioms can expreſs
Thy ſtrange confuſion and diſtreſs,
When on the floor the drawers diſplay'd
The fulſome ſecret had bewray'd?
No traitor, when his hand and ſeal
Produc'd his dark deſigns reveal,
E'er look'd with ſuch a hanging face,
As Lobb half dead at this diſgrace.
Wild-ſtaring, thunder-ſtruck, and dumb,
While peals of laughter ſhake the room;
Each ſaſh thrown up to let in air,
The knight fell backward in his chair,
Laugh'd till his heart-ſtrings almoſt break,
The chaplain giggled for a week;
Her ladyſhip began to call,
For hartſhorn, and her Abigail;
The ſervants chuckled at the door,
And all was clamour and uproar.
Rover, who now began to quake,
As conſcious of his foul miſtake,
Truſts to his heels to ſave his life;
The 'ſquire ſneaks home, and beats his wife.

THE INQUISITIVE BRIDEGROOM:

A TALE.

Frank Plume, a ſpark about the town,
Now weary of intriguing grown,
Thought it adviſable to wed,
And chooſe a partner of his bed,
Virtuous and chaſte—Aye, right—but where
Is there a nymph that's chaſte as fair?
A bleſſing to be priz'd, but rare.
For continence penurious heaven
With a too ſparing hand has given;
A plant but ſeldom to be found,
And thrives but ill on Britiſh ground.
Should our adventurer haſte on board,
And ſee what foreign ſoils afford?
Where watchful dragons guard the prize,
And jealous dons have Argus' eyes,
Where the rich caſket, cloſe immur'd,
Is under lock and key ſecur'd?
No—Frank, by long experience wiſe,
Had known theſe ſorts took by ſurpriſe.
Nature in ſpite of art prevail'd,
And all their vigilance had fail'd.
The youth was puzzled—ſhould he go
And ſcale a convent? would that do?
Is nuns-fleſh always good and ſweet?
Fly-blown ſometimes, not fit to eat.
Well—he reſolves to do his beſt,
And prudently contrives this teſt;
If the laſt favour I obtain,
And the nymph yield, the caſe is plain:
Marry'd, ſhe'll play the ſame odd prank
With others—ſhe's no wife for Frank.
But, could I find a female heart
Impregnable to force or art,
That all my batteries could withſtand,
The ſap, and even ſword in hand;
Ye gods! how happy ſhould I be,
From each perplexing thought ſet free,
From cuckoldom, and jealouſy!
The project pleas'd. He now appears,
And ſhines in all his killing airs,
And every uſeful toy prepares,
New opera tunes, and billet-doux,
The clouded cane, and red-heel'd ſhoes;
Nor the clock-ſtocking was forgot,
Th' embroider'd coat, and ſhoulder-knot;

All that a woman's heart might move,
The potent trumpery of love.
Here importunity prevails,
There tears in floods, or sighs in gales.
Now, in the lucky moment try'd,
Low at his feet the fair one dy'd,
For Strephon would not be deny'd.
Then, if no motives could persuade,
A golden shower debauch'd the maid,
The mistress truckled, and obey'd.
To modesty a sham pretence
Gain'd some, others impertinence;
But most, plain downright impudence.
Like Cæsar, now he conquer'd all,
The vassal sex before him fall;
Where'er he march'd, slaughter ensued,
He came, he saw, and he subdued.
At length a stubborn nymph he found,
For bold Camilla stood her ground;
Parry'd his thrusts with equal art,
And had him both in tierce and quart:
She kept the hero still in play,
And still maintain'd the doubtful day.
Here he resolves to make a stand,
Take her, and marry out of hand.
The jolly priest soon ty'd the knot,
The luscious tale was not forgot,
Then empty'd both his pipe and pot.
The posset drunk, the stocking thrown,
The candles out, the curtains drawn,
And sir and madam all alone;
" My dear (said he) I strove, you know,
" To taste the joys you now bestow,
" All my persuasive arts I try'd,
" But still relentless you deny'd;
" Tell me, inexorable fair,
" How could you, thus attack'd, forbear?"
" Swear to forgive what's past (she cry'd);
" The naked truth shan't be deny'd."
He did; the baggage thus reply'd:
Deceiv'd so many times before
By your false sex, I rashly swore,
To trust deceitful man no more.

BACCHUS TRIUMPHANT:

A TALE.

" For shame, said Ebony, for shame,
" Tom Ruby, troth, you're much to blame,
" To drink at this confounded rate,
" To guzzle thus, early and late!"
Poor Tom, who just had took his whet,
And at the door his uncle met,
Surpris'd and thunder-struck, would fain
Make his escape, but, oh! in vain.
Each blush, that glow'd with an ill grace,
Lighted the flambeaux in his face;
No loop-hole left, no slight pretence,
To palliate the foul offence.
" I own (said he) I'm very bad—
" A sot—incorrigibly mad—
" But, sir—I thank you for your love,
" And by your lectures would improve:
" Yet, give me leave to say, the street
" For conference is not so meet.
" Here in this room—nay, sir, come in—
" Expose, chastise me for my sin;
" Exert each trope, your utmost art,
" To touch this senseless, flinty heart.
" I'm conscious of my guilt, 'tis true,
" But yet I know my frailty too;
" A slight rebuke will never do.
" Urge home my faults—come in, I pray—
" Let not my soul be cast away."
Wise Ebony, who deem'd it good
T' encourage by all means he could
These first appearances of grace,
Follow'd up stairs, and took his place.
The bottle and the cruft appear'd,
And wily Tom demurely sneer'd.
" My duty, sir!"—" Thank you, kind Tom!"—
" Again, an't please you!"—" Thank you!
" Come—"
" Sorrow is dry—I must once more—"
" Nay, Tom, I told you at the door
" I would not drink—what! before dinner?—
" Not one glass more, as I'm a sinner—
" Come, to the point in hand; is't fit
" A man of your good sense and wit
" Those parts which heaven bestow'd should drown,
" A butt to all the sots in town?
" Why, tell me, Tom—what sort can stand
" (Though regular, and bravely man'd)
" If night and day the fierce foe plies
" With never-ceasing batteries;
" Will there not be a breach at last?"—
" Uncle, 'tis true—forgive what's past."
" But if nor interest, nor fame,
" Nor health, can your dull soul reclaim,
" Hast not a conscience, man? no thought
" Of an hereafter? dear are bought
" These sensual pleasures."—" I relent,
" Kind sir—but give your zeal a vent—"
Then, pouting, hung his head; yet still
Took care his uncle's glass to fill,
Which as his hurry'd spirits sunk,
Unwittingly, good man! he drunk.
Each pint, alas! drew on the next,
Old Ebony stuck to his text,
Grown warm, like any angel spoke,
Till intervening hickups broke
The well-strung argument. Poor Tom
Was now too forward to reel home.
That preaching still, this still repenting,
Both equally to drink consenting,
Till both brimful could swill no more,
And fell dead drunk upon the floor.
Bacchus, the jolly god, who sate
Wide-straddling o'er his tun in state,
Close by the window side, from whence
He heard this weighty conference;
Joy kindling in his ruddy checks,
Thus the indulgent godhead speaks:
" Frail mortals know, reason in vain
" Rebels, and would disturb my reign.
" See there the sophister o'erthrown,
" With stronger arguments knock'd down
" Than e'er in wrangling schools were known!
" The wine that sparkles in this glass
" Smooths every brow, gilds every face:

" As vapours when the ſun appears,
" Far hence anxieties and fears:
" Grave ermine ſmiles, lawn ſleeves grow gay,
" Each haughty monarch owns my ſway,
" And cardinals and popes obey:
" Ev'n Cato drank his glaſs, 'twas I
" Taught the brave patriot how to die
" For injur'd Rome and liberty;
" 'Twas I who with immortal lays
" Inſpir'd the bard that ſung his praiſe.
" Let dull unſociable fools
" Loll in their cells, and live by rules;
" My votaries, in gay delight
" And mirth, ſhall revel all the night;
" Act well their parts on life's dull ſtage,
" And make each moment worth an age."

THE NIGHT-WALKER RECLAIMED:

A TALE.

In thoſe bleſt days of jubilee,
When pious Charles ſet England free
From canting and hypocriſy;
Moſt graciouſly to all reſtoring
Their ancient privilege of whoring;
There liv'd, but 'tis no matter where,
The ſon of an old cavalier;
Of ancient lineage was the 'ſquire,
A man of mettle and of fire;
Clean-ſhap'd, well-limb'd, black-ey'd, and tall,
Made a good figure at a ball,
And only wanted wherewithal.
His penſion was ill-paid and ſtrait,
Full many a loyal hero's fate:
Often half ſtarv'd, and often out
At elbows, an hard caſe, no doubt.
Sometimes perhaps a lucky main
Prudently manag'd in Long-Lane
Repair'd the thread-bare beau again;
And now and then ſome ſecret favours,
The kind returns of pious labours,
Enrich'd the ſtrong and vigorous lover,
His honour liv'd a while in clover.
For (to ſay truth) it is but juſt,
Where all things are decay'd but luſt,
That ladies of maturer ages
Give citron-water and good wages.
Thus far Tom Wild had made a ſhift,
And got good helps at a dead lift;
But John, his humble meagre ſlave,
One foot already in the grave,
Hide-bound as one of Pharoah's kine,
With good Duke Numps was forc'd to dine:
Yet ſtill the thoughtful ſerious elf
Would not be wanting to himſelf;
Bore up againſt both tide and wind,
Turn'd every project in his mind,
And each expedient weigh'd, to find
A remedy in this diſtreſs.
Some god—(nay, ſir, ſuppoſe no leſs,
For in this hard and knotty caſe,
T' employ a god is no diſgrace;
Though Mercury be ſent from Jove,
Or Iris wing it from above)
Some god, I ſay, inſpir'd the knave,
His maſter and himſelf to ſave.
As both went ſupperleſs to bed
One night (firſt ſcratching of his head)
" Alas!" quoth John, " ſir, 'tis hard fare
" To ſuck one's thumbs, and live on air;
" To reel from pillar unto poſt,
" An empty ſhade, a walking ghoſt;
" To hear one's guts make piteous moan,
" Thoſe worſt of duns, and yet not one,
" One mouldy ſcrape to ſatisfy
" Their craving importunity.
" Nay—good your honour pleaſe to hear:"
(And then the varlet dropt a tear)
" A project form'd in this dull brain,
" Shall ſet us all adrift again;
" A project, ſir, nay, let me tell ye,
" Shall fill your pockets, and my belly.
" Know then, old Gripe is dead of late,
" Who purchas'd at any eaſy rate,
" Your manor-houſe and fine eſtate.
" Nay, ſtare not, ſir: by G— 'tis true
" The devil for once has got his due:
" The raſcal has left every penny,
" To his old maiden ſiſter Jenny:
" Go, claſp the dowdy in your arms,
" Nor want you bread, though ſhe want charms:
" Cajole the dirty drab, and then
" The man ſhall have his mare again;
" Clod-Hall is your's, your houſe, your rents,
" And all your lands, and tenements."
" Faith, John," ſaid he, (then lick'd his chops)
" This project gives indeed ſome hopes:
" But curſed hard the terms, to marry,
" To ſtick to one, and never vary;
" And that one old and ugly too:
" Frail mortals tell me what to do?"
" For that," ſaid John, " truſt me; my treat
" Shan't be one ill-dreſs'd diſh of meat;
" Let but your honour be my gueſt,
" Variety ſhall crown the feaſt."
" 'Tis done," reply'd Tom Wild, " 'tis done,
" The flag hangs out, the fort is won;
" Ne'er doubt my vigorous attacks,
" Come to my arms, my * Sycorax;
" Bold in thy right we mount our throne,
" And all the iſland is our own."
Well—forth they rode, both Squire and John;
Here might a florid bard make known,
His horſe's virtues, and his own;
A thouſand prodigies advance,
Retailing every circumſtance.
But I, who am not over-nice,
And always love to be conciſe,
Shall let the courteous reader gueſs
The ſquire's accoutrements and dreſs.
Suppoſe we then the gentle youth
Laid at her feet, all love, all truth;
Haranguing it in verſe and proſe,
A mount her forehead white with ſnows,
Her cheeks the lily and the roſe;

* See Dryden's Tempeſt, altered from Shakſpeare.

Her ivory teeth, her coral lips,
Her well-turn'd ears, whose ruby tips
Afford a thousand compliments,
Which he, fond youth, profusely vents:
The pretty dimple in her chin,
The den of love, who lurks within.
But, oh! the lustre of her eyes,
Nor stars, nor moon, nor sun suffice,
He vows, protests, raves, sinks, and dies.
Much of her breasts he spoke, and hair,
In terms most elegant and rare;
Call'd her the goddess he ador'd,
And in heroic fustian soar'd.
For, though the youth could well explain
His mind in a more humble strain;
Yet Ovid and the wits agree,
That a true lover's speech should be
In rapture and in simile.
Imagine now, all points put right,
The fiddles and the wedding-night;
Each noisy steeple rock'd with glee,
And every bard sung merrily:
Gay pleasure wanton'd unconfin'd,
The men all drunk, the women kind:
Clod-Hall did ne'er so fine appear,
Floating in posset and strong beer.
Come, muse, thou flattern house-wife, tell,
Where's our friend John? I hope he's well;
Well! Ay, as any man can be,
With Susan in the gallery.
Sue was a lass buxom and tight,
The chamber maid and favourite;
Juicy and young, just fit for man,
Thus the sweet dialogue began.
"Lard, sir," quoth Sue, "how brisk, how gay,
"How spruce our master look'd to-day!
"I'm sure no king was e'er so fine,
"No sun more gloriously can shine."
"Alas, my dear, all is not gold
"That glisters, as I've read of old,
"And all the wise and learned say,
"The best is not without allay."
"Well, master John, name if you can
"A more accomplish'd gentleman.
"Beside (else may I never thrive)
"The best good-natur'd 'squire alive."
(John shrugg'd, and shook his head. "Nay sure
"You by your looking so demure
"Have learnt some secret fault; if so,
"Tell me, good John, nay pr'ythee do,
"Tell me, I say, I long to know.
"Safe as thy gold in thy strong box,
"This breast the dark deposit locks,
"These lips no secrets shall reveal."
"Well—let me first affix my seal:
Then kiss'd the soft obliging fair.
"But hold—now I must hear you swear,
"By all your virgin charms below,
"No mortal e'er this tale shall know."
She swore; then thus the cunning knave,
With look most politic and grave,
Proceeds: "Why—faith and troth, dear Sue,
"This jewel has a flaw, 'tis true;
"My master's generous, and all that,
"Not faulty but unfortunate."
"Why will you keep one in suspense?
"Why teaze one thus?"—"Have patience.
"The youth has failings, there's no doubt,
"And who, my Suky, is without?
"But should you tell—nay that I dread"—
"By heaven, and by my maidenhead—
"Now speak, speak quick."—"He who denies
"Those pouting lips, those roguish eyes,
"Must sure be more than man—then know,
"My dearest, since you'll have it so;
"My master Wild not only talks
"Much in his sleep, but also walks;
"Walks many a winter night alone,
"This way and that, up stairs and down:
"Now, if disturb'd, if by surprise
"He's rous'd, and slumbers quit his eyes;
"Lord, how I tremble! how I dread
"To speak it! Thrice beneath the bed,
"Alas! to save my life I fled:
"And twice behind the door I crept,
"And once out of the window leapt.
"No raging bedlam just got loose
"Is half so mad; about the house
"Frantic he runs; each eye-ball glares,
"He raves, he foams, he wildly stares;
"The family before him flies,
"Whoe'er is overtaken dies.
"Opiates, and breathing of a vein,
"Scarce settle his distemper'd brain,
"And bring him to himself again.
"But, if not cross'd, if let alone
"To take his frolic, and be gone;
"Soon he returns from whence he came,
"No lamb more innocent and tame."
Thus having gain'd her point, to bed
In haste the flickering gipsy fled;
The pungent secret in her breast
Gave such sharp pangs, she could not rest:
Prim'd, charg'd, and cock'd, her next desire
Was to present, and to give fire.
Sleepless the tortur'd Susan lay,
Tossing and tumbling every way,
Impatient for the dawn of day.
So labours in the sacred shade,
Full of the god, the Delphic maid:
So wind, in hypocondrics pent,
Struggles and heaves to find a vent;
In labyrinths intricate it roars,
Now downward sinks, then upward soars;
Th' uneasy patient groans in vain,
No cordials can relieve his pain;
Till at the postern gate, enlarg'd,
The bursting thunder is discharg'd.
At last the happy hour was come,
When call'd into her lady's room;
Scarce three pins stuck into her gown,
But out it bolts, and all is known.
Nor idle long the secret lies,
From mouth to mouth improv'd it flies,
And grows amain in strength and size:
For fame, at first of pigmy birth,
Walks cautiously on mother earth;
But soon (as ancient bards have said)
In clouds the giant hides her head.
To council now the gossips went,
Madam herself was president;

Th' affair is banded pro and con,
Much breath is ſpent, few conqueſts won.
At length dame Hobb, to end the ſtrife,
And madam Blouſe, the parſon's wife,
In this with one conſent agree,
That, ſince th' effect was lunacy
If wak'd, it were by much the beſt,
Not to diſturb him in the leaſt:
Ev'n let him ramble if he pleaſe;
Troth, 'tis a comical diſeaſe;
The worſt is to himſelf: when cold
And ſhivering he returns, then fold
The vagrant in your arms; he'll reſt
With pleaſure on your glowing breaſt.
Madam approv'd of this advice,
Iſſued her orders in a trice;
" That none henceforth preſume to ſtir,
" Or thwart th' unhappy wanderer."
John, when his maſter's knock he heard,
Soon in the dreſſing-room appear'd,
Archly he look'd, and ſlily leer'd.
" What game?" ſays Wild. " Oh! never more,
" Pheaſants and patridge in great ſtore;
" I wiſh your ammunition laſt!"
And then réveal'd how all had paſt.
Next thought it proper to explain
His plot, and how he laid his train:
" The coaſt is clear, ſir, go in peace,
" No dragon guards the golden fleece."
Here, muſe, let ſable night advance,
Deſcribe her ſtate with elegance;
Around her dark pavilion ſpread
The clouds; with poppies crown her head;
Note well her owls, and bats obſcene;
Call her an Æthiopian queen;
Or, if you think 'twill mend my tale,
Call her a widow with a veil;
Of ſpecters and hobgoblins tell,
Or ſay 'twas midnight, 'tis as well.
Well then—'twas midnight, as was ſaid,
When Wild ſtarts upright in his bed,
Leaps out, and, without more ado,
Takes in his room a turn or two;
Opening the door, ſoon out he ſtalks,
And to the next apartment walks;
Where on her back there lay poor Sue,
Alas! friend John, ſhe dreamt of you.
Wak'd with the noiſe, her maſter known,
By moon-light and his brocade gown,
Frighted ſhe dares not ſcream, in bed
She ſinks, and down ſhe pops her head;
The curtains gently drawn, he ſprings
Between the ſheets, then cloſely clings.
Now, muſe, relate what there he did:
Hold, impudence!—it muſt be hid!—
He did—as any man would do
In ſuch a caſe—did he not, Sue?
Then up into the garret flies,
Where Joan, and Dol, and Betty lies;
A leaſh of laſſes all together,
And in the dog-days—in hot weather;
Why, faith, 'twas hard—he did his beſt,
And left to Providence the reſt.
Content the paſſive creatures lie,
For who in duty could deny?
Was non-reſiſtance ever thought
By modern caſuiſts a fault?
Were not her orders ſtrict and plain?
All ſtruggling dangerous and vain?
Well, down our younker trips again;
Much wiſhing, as he reel'd along,
For ſome rich cordial warm and ſtrong.
In bed he quickly tumbled then,
Nor wak'd next morn till after ten.
Thus night by night he led his life,
Bleſſing all females but his wife;
Much work upon his hands there lay,
More bills were drawn than he could pay;
No lawyer drudg'd ſo hard as he,
In Eaſter Term or Hillary;
But lawyers labour for their fee:
Here no ſelf-intereſt or gain,
The pleaſure balances the pain.
So the great ſultan walks among
His troop of laſſes fair and young:
So the town-bull in Opentide,
His lowing lovers by his ſide,
Revels at large in nature's right,
Curb'd by no law, but appetite;
Friſking his tail, he roves at pleaſure,
And knows no ſtint, and keeps no meaſure,
But now the ninth revolving moon
(Alas! it came an age too ſoon;
Curſe on each haſty fleeting night!)
Some odd diſcoveries brought to light.
Strange tympanies the women ſeize,
An epidemical diſeaſe;
Madam herſelf with theſe might paſs
For a clean-ſhap'd and taper laſs.
'Twas vain to hide th' apparent load,
For hoops were not then à la-mode;
Sue, being queſtion'd, and hard preſs'd,
Blubbering the naked truth confeſs'd:
" Were not your orders moſt ſevere,
" That none ſhould ſtop his night-career?
" And who durſt wake him? troth not I;
" I was not then prepar'd to die."
" Well Sue, ſaid ſhe, thou ſhalt have grace,
" But then this night I take thy place,
" Thou mine, my night-clothes on thy head,
" Soon ſhall he leave thee ſafe in bed:
" Lie ſtill, and ſtir not on thy life,
" But do the penance of a wife;
" Much pleaſure haſt thou had; at laſt
" 'Tis proper for thy ſins to faſt."
This point agreed, to bed ſhe went,
And Sue crept in, but ill-content:
Soon as th' accuſtom'd hour was come,
The younker ſally'd from his room,
To Sue's apartment whipt away,
And like a lion ſeiz'd his prey;
She claſp'd him in her longing arms,
Sharp-ſet, ſhe feaſted on his charms.
He did whate'er he could; but more
Was yet to do, encore, encore!
Fain would he now elope, ſhe claſpt
Him ſtill, no bur e'er ſtuck ſo faſt.
At length the morn with envious light
Diſcover'd all: in what ſad plight

Poor man, he lay! abaſh'd, for ſhame
He could not ſpeak, not ev'n one lame
Excuſe was left. She, with a grace
That gave new beauties to her face;
And with a kind obliging air
(Always ſucceſsful in the fair),
Thus ſoon reliev'd him from deſpair.
" Ah! generous youth, pardon a fault,
" No fooliſh jealouſy has taught;
" 'Tis your own crime, open as day,
" To your conviction paves the way.
" Oh! might this ſtratagem regain
" Your love! let me not plead in vain;
" Something to gratitude is due,
" Have I not given all to you?"
Tom ſtar'd, lock'd pale, then in great haſte
Slipp'd on his gown; yet thus at laſt
Spoke faintly, as amaz'd he ſtood,
" I will, my dear, be very good."

THE HAPPY DISAPPOINTMENT:

A TALE.

In days of yore, when belles and beaux
Left maſquerades and puppet-ſhows,
Deſerted ombre and baſſet,
At Jonathan's to ſqueeze and ſweat;
When ſprightly rakes forſook champaign,
The play-houſe, and the merry main,
Good mother Wyburn and the ſtews,
To ſmoke with brokers, ſtink with Jews:
In fine, when all the world run mad
(A ſtory not leſs true than ſad);
Ned Smart, a virtuous youth, well known
To all this chaſte and ſober town,
Got every penny he could rally,
To try his fortune in 'Change-Alley:
In haſte to loll in coach and ſix,
Bought bulls and bears, play'd twenty tricks,
Amongſt his brother lunatics.
Tranſported at his firſt ſucceſs,
A thouſand whims his fancy bleſs,
With ſcenes of future happineſs.
How frail are all our joys below!
Mere dazzling meteors, flaſh and ſhow!
Oh, fortune! falſe deceitful whore!
Caught in thy trap with thouſands more,
He found his rhino ſunk and gone,
Himſelf a bankrupt, and undone.
Ned could not well digeſt this change,
Forc'd in the world at large to range;
With Babel's monarch turn'd to graſs,
Would it not break an heart of braſs?
'Tis vain to ſob and hang the lip;
One penny left, he buys a ſlip,
At once his life and cares to loſe,
Under his ear he fits the nooſe.
An hook in an old wall he ſpies,
To that the fatal rope he ties:
Like Curtius now, at one bold leap
He plung'd into the gaping deep;
Nor did he doubt in hell to find
Dealings more juſt, and friends more kind.
As he began to twiſt and ſprawl,
The looſen'd ſtones break from the wall;
Down drops the rake upon the ſpot,
And after him an earthen pot:
Reeling he roſe, and gaz'd around,
And ſaw the crock lie on the ground;
Surpris'd, amaz'd, at this odd ſight,
Trembling, he broke it in a fright;
When, lo! at once came pouring forth
Ingots, and pearls, and gems of worth.
O'erjoy'd with fortune's kind bequeſt,
He took the birds, but left the neſt;
And then, to ſpy what might enſue,
Into a neighbouring wood withdrew;
Nor waited long. For ſoon he ſees
A tall black man ſculk through the trees;
He knew him by his ſhuffling pace,
His thread-bare coat and hatchet face:
And who the devil ſhould it be,
But ſanctify'd Sir Timothy!
His uncle by his mother's ſide,
His guardian, and his faithful guide.
This driveling knight, with pockets full,
And proud as any Great Mogul,
For his wiſe conduct had been made
Director of the jobbing trade:
And had moſt piouſly drawn in
Poor Ned and all his neareſt kin.
The greedy fools laid out their gold,
And bought the very ſtock he ſold;
Thus the kind knave convey'd their pelf,
By bocus pocus, to himſelf;
And, to ſecure the ſpoils he got,
Form'd this contrivance of the pot.
Here every night, and every morn,
Devout as any monk new ſhorn,
The proſtrate hypocrite implores
Juſt heaven to bleſs his hidden ſtores;
But, when he ſaw dear mammon flown,
The plunder'd hive, the honey gone,
No jilted bully, no bilk'd hack,
No thief when beadles flay his back,
No loſing rook, no carted whore,
No failor when the billows roar,
With ſuch a grace e'er curs'd and ſwore.
Then, as he por'd upon the ground,
And turn'd his haggard eyes around,
The halter at his feet he ſpy'd,
" And is this all that's left?" he cry'd:
" Am I thus paid for all my cares,
" My lectures, repetitions, prayers?
" 'Tis well—there's ſomething ſav'd at leaſt,
" Welcome, thou faithful, friendly gueſt;
" If I muſt hang, now all is loſt,
" 'Tis cheaper at another's coſt;
" To do it at my own expence,
" Would be downright extravagance."
Thus comforted, without a tear,
He fix'd the nooſe beneath his ear,
To the next bough the rope he ty'd,
And moſt heroically dy'd.
Ned, who behind a ſpreading tree,
Beheld this tragi-comedy,
With hearty curſes rung his knell,
And bid him thus his laſt farewel.
" Was it not, uncle, very kind,
" In me, to leave the rope behind?

" A legacy ſo well beſtow'd,
" For all the gratitude I ow'd.
" Adieu, Sir Tim; by heaven's decree,
" Soon may thy brethren follow thee,
" In the ſame glorious manner ſwing,
" Without one friend to cut the ſtring;
" That hence rapacious knaves may know,
" Juſtice is always ſure, though ſlow."

A PADLOCK FOR THE MOUTH:

A TALE.

Jack Dimple was a merry blade,
Young, amorous, witty, and well made;
Diſcreet?—Hold, ſir—nay, as I live,
My friend, you're too inquiſitive:
Diſcretion, all men muſt agree,
Is a moſt ſhining quality,
Which like leaf-gold makes a great ſhow,
And thinly ſpread ſets off a beau.
But, ſir, to put you out of pain,
Our younker had not half a grain,
A leaky blab, raſh, faithleſs, vain.
The victories his eyes had won,
As ſoon as e'er obtain'd, were known;
For trophies rear'd, the deed proclaim
Spoils hung on high expoſe the dame,
And love is ſacrific'd to fame.
Such inſolence the ſex alarms,
The female world is up in arms;
Th' outrageous Bacchanals combine,
And brandiſh'd tongues in concert join.
Unhappy youth! where wilt thou go
T' eſcape ſo terrible a foe?
Seek ſhelter on the Libyan ſhore,
Where tigers and where lions roar?
Sleep on the borders of the Nile,
And truſt the wily crocodile?
'Tis vain to ſhun a woman's hate,
Heavy the blow, and ſure as fate.
Phyllis appear'd among the crowd,
But not ſo talkative and loud,
With ſilence and with care ſuppreſt
The glowing vengeance in her breaſt,
Reſolv'd, by ſtratagem and art,
To make the ſaucy villain ſmart.
The cunning baggage had prepar'd,
Pomatum, of the fineſt lard,
With ſtrong aſtringents mix'd the meſs,
Alom, and vitriol, Q. S.
Arſenic, and bole. But I want time
To turn all Quincy into rhyme,
'Twould make my diction too ſublime.
Her grandame this receipt had taught,
Which Bendo from Grand Cairo brought,
An able ſtyptic (as 'tis ſaid)
To ſodder a crack'd maidenhead.
This ointment being duly made,
The jilt upon her toilet laid:
The ſauntering cully ſoon appears,
As uſual, vows, proteſts, and ſwears;
Careleſs an opera tune he hums,
Plunders her patch-box, breaks her combs.
As up and down the monkey play'd,
His hand upon the box he laid,
The fatal box. Pleas'd with her wiles,
The treacherous Pandora ſmiles.
" What's this?" cries Jack. " That box!" ſaid ſhe:
" Pomatum; what elſe ſhould it be?"
But here 'tis fit my reader knows
'Twas March, when bluſtering Boreas blows,
Stern enemy to belles and beaux.
His lips were ſore; rough, pointed, torn,
The coral briſtled like a thorn.
Pleas'd with a cure ſo à-propos,
Nor jealous of ſo fair a foe,
The healing ointment thick he ſpread,
And every gaping cranny fed.
His chops begin to glow and ſhoot,
He ſtrove to ſpeak, but, oh! was mute,
Mute as a fiſh, all he could ſtrain,
Were ſome horſe gutturals forc'd with pain.
He ſtamps, he raves, he ſobs, he ſighs,
The tears ran trickling from his eyes;
He thought but could not ſpeak a curſe,
His lips were drawn into a purſe.
Madam no longer could contain,
Triumphant joy burſts out amain;
She laughs, ſhe ſcreams, the houſe is rais'd,
Through all the ſtreet th' affair is blaz'd:
In ſhoals now all the neighbours come,
Laugh out, and preſs into the room.
Sir Harry Taudry and his bride,
Miſs Tulip deck'd in all her pride;
Wife Madam Froth, and widow Babble,
Coquettes and prudes, a mighty rabble.
So great a concourſe ne'er was known
At Smithfield, when a monſter's ſhown;
When bears dance jiggs with comely mien,
When witty Punch adorns the ſcene,
Or frolic Pug plays Harlequin.
In vain he ſtrives to hide his head,
In vain he creeps behind the bed,
Ferreted thence, expos'd to view,
The crowd their clamorous ſhouts renew:
A thouſand taunts, a thouſand jeers,
Stark dumb, the paſſive creature hears.
No perjur'd villain nail'd on high,
And pelted in the pillory,
His face beſmear'd, his eyes, his chops,
With rotten eggs and turnip-tops,
Was e'er ſo maul'd. Phyllis, at laſt,
To pay him for offences paſt,
With ſneering malice in her face,
Thus ſpoke, and gave the coup-de-grace:
" Lard! how demure, and how preciſe
" He looks! ſilence becomes the wiſe.
" Vile tongue! its maſter to betray,
" But now the priſoner muſt obey,
" I've lock'd the door, and keep the key.
" Learn hence, what angry woman can,
" When wrong'd by that falſe traitor man;
" Who boaſts our favours, ſoon or late,
" The treacherous blab ſhall feel our hate."

THE WISE BUILDER:

A TALE.

Wise Socrates had built a farm,
Little, convenient, ſnug, and warm,
Secur'd from rain and wind:
A gallant whiſper'd in his ear,
" Shall the great Socrates live here,
" To this mean cell confin'd?"

" The furniture's my chiefeſt care,"
Reply'd the ſage; " here's room to ſpare,
" Sweet ſir, for I and you;
" When this with faithful friends is fill'd,
" An ampler palace I ſhall build;
" Till then, this cot muſt do."

THE TRUE USE OF THE LOOKING-GLASS.

A TALE.

Tom Careful had a ſon and heir,
Exact his ſhape, genteel his air,
Adonis was not half ſo fair.
But then, alas! his daughter Jane
Was but ſo-ſo, a little plain.
In mam's apartment, as one day
The little romp and hoyden play,
Their faces in the glaſs they view'd,
Which then upon her toilet ſtood;
Where, as Narciſſus vain, the boy
Beheld each riſing charm with joy;
With partial eyes ſurvey'd himſelf,
But for his ſiſter, poor brown elf,
On her the ſelf-enamour'd chit
Was very laviſh of his wit.
She bore, alas! whate'er ſhe could,
But 'twas too much for fleſh and blood;
What female ever had the grace
To pardon ſcandal on her face?
Diſconſolate away ſhe flies,
And at her daddy's feet ſhe lies;
Sighs, ſobs, and groans, calls to her aid,
And tears, that readily obey'd;
Then aggravates the vile offence,
Exerting all her eloquence:
The cauſe th' indulgent father heard,
And culprit ſummon'd ſoon appear'd;
Some tokens of remorſe he ſhow'd,
And promis'd largely to be good.
As both the tender father preſs'd
With equal ardour to his breaſt,
And ſmiling kiſs'd, " Let there be peace,"
Said he; " let broils and diſcord ceaſe:
" Each day, my children, thus employ
" The faithful mirror; you, my boy,
" Remember that no vice diſgrace
" The gift of heaven, that beauteous face:
" And you, my girl, take ſpecial care
" Your want of beauty to repair
" By virtue, which alone is fair."

MAHOMET ALI BEG:

OR, THE FAITHFUL MINISTER OF STATE.

A long deſcent, and noble blood,
Is but a vain fantaſtic good,
Unleſs with inbred virtues join'd,
An honeſt, brave, and generous mind.
All that our anceſtors have done,
Nations reliev'd, and battles won;
The trophies of each bloody field,
Can only then true honour yield,
When, like Argyll, we ſcorn to owe,
And pay that luſtre they beſtow;
But, if, a mean degenerate race,
Slothful we faint, and ſlack our pace,
Lag in the glorious courſe of fame,
Their great atchievements we diſclaim.
Some bold plebeian ſoon ſhall riſe,
Stretch to the goal, and win the prize.
For, ſince the forming hand of old,
Caſt all mankind in the ſame mold;
Since no diſtinguiſh'd clan is bleſt
With finer porcelain than the reſt;
And ſince in all the ruling mind
Is of the ſame celeſtial kind;
'Tis education ſhows the way
Each latent beauty to diſplay;
Each happy genius brings to light,
Conceal'd before in ſhades of night:
So diamonds from the gloomy mine,
Taught by the workman's hand to ſhine,
On Cloe's ivory boſom blaze,
Or grace the crown with brilliant rays.
Merit obſcure ſhall raiſe its head,
Though dark obſtructing clouds o'erſpread;
Heroes, as yet unſung, ſhall fight
For ſlaves oppreſs'd, and injur'd right;
And able ſtateſmen prop the throne,
To Battle-Abbey-Roll * unknown.
Sha Abbas, with ſupreme command,
In Perſia reign'd, and bleſs'd the land;
A mighty prince, valiant and wiſe,
Expert, with ſharp diſcerning eyes,
To find true virtue in diſguiſe.
Hunting (it ſeems) was his delight,
His joy by day, his dream by night:
The ſport of all the brave and bold,
From Nimrod, who, in days of old,
Made men as well as beaſts his prey,
To mightier George, whoſe milder ſway
Glad happy crowds with pride obey.
In queſt of his fierce ſavage foes,
Before the ſun the monarch roſe,
The grizly lion to engage,
By baying dogs provok'd to rage;
In the cloſe thicket to explore,
And puſh from thence the briſtled boar:
Or to purſue the flying deer,
While deep-mouth'd hounds the vallies cheer;
And echo from repeating hills
His heart with joy redoubled fills.
Under a rock's projecting ſhade,
A ſhepherd boy his ſeat had made,
Happy as Crœſus on his throne,
The riches of the world his own.
Content on mortals here below,
Is all that heaven can beſtow.
His crook and ſcrip were by him laid,
Upon his oaten pipe he play'd;
His flocks ſecurely couch'd around,
And ſeem'd to liſten to the ſound.
Returning from the chaſe one day,
The king by chance had loſt his way:
Nor guards, nor nobles, now attend;
But one young lord, his boſom friend.
Now tir'd with labour, ſpent with heat,
They fought this pleaſant cool retreat;
The boy leap'd active from his ſeat,
And, with a kind obliging grace,
Offer'd the king unknown his place.

* A record which contained the names of the chief men that came over with the Conqueror.

The Perſian monarch, who ſo late,
Lord of the world, rul'd all in ſtate;
On cloth of gold and tiſſue trod,
Whole nations trembling at his nod;
With diamonds and with rubies crown'd,
And girt with fawning ſlaves around;
Behold him now: his canopy
Th' impending rock, each ſhrub, each tree,
That grew upon its ſhaggy brow,
To their great prince obſervant bow;
Yield, as in duty bound, their aid,
And bleſs him with a friendly ſhade,
On the bare flint, he ſits alone,
And, oh! would kings this truth but own,
The ſafer and the nobler throne!
But where do I digreſs? 'tis time
To check this arrogance of rhyme.
As the judicious monarch view'd
The ſtripling's air, nor bold nor rude,
With native modeſty ſubdued;
The bluſh that glow'd in all its pride
Then trembled on his cheeks and dy'd.
He grew inquiſitive to trace
What ſoul dwelt in that lovely caſe:
To every queſtion, ſerious, gay,
The youth reply'd without delay;
His anſwers for the moſt part right,
And taking, if not appoſite:
Unſtudy'd, unaffected ſenſe,
Mix'd with his native diffidence.
The king was charm'd with ſuch a prize,
And ſtood with wonder in his eyes;
Commits his treaſure to the care
Of the young lord; bids him not ſpare
For coſt, or pains, t' enrich his breaſt
With all the learning of the eaſt.
He bow'd, obey'd, well cloth'd, well fed,
And with his patron's children bred;
Still every day the youth improv'd,
By all admir'd, by all belov'd.

Now the firſt curling down began
To give the promiſe of a man;
To court he's call'd, employ'd, and train'd,
In lower poſts, yet ſtill he gain'd
By candour, courteſy, and ſkill,
The ſubject's love, the king's good will.
Employ'd in greater matters now,
No flatteries, no bribes, could bow
His ſtubborn ſoul; true to his truſt,
Firm, and inexorably juſt,
In judgment ripe, he ſoon became
A Walpole, or a Walſingham;
And, wakeful for the public peace,
No dragon guards the golden fleece
With half that vigilance and care.
His buſy eyes kenn'd every where;
In each dark ſcheme knew how to dive,
Though cunning Derviſes contrive
Their plots, diſguis'd with ſhams and lies,
And cloak'd with real perjuries.
Now high in rank the peer is plac'd,
And Ali Beg with titles grac'd;
No bounds his maſter's bounties know,
His ſwelling coffers overflow,
And he is puzzled to beſtow;
Perplex'd and ſtudious to contrive
To whom, and how, not what to give;
His pious frauds conceal the name,
And ſkreen the modeſt man from ſhame.
Whoe'er would heavenly treaſures raiſe,
Muſt grant the boon, eſcape the praiſe.
But his immenſe and endleſs gain
No private charities could drain:
On public works he fix'd his mind,
The zealous friend of human kind.
Convenient inns on each great road
At his own proper coſts endow'd,
To weary caravans afford
Refreſhment, both at bed and board.
From Thames, the Tiber, and the Rhine,
Nations remote with Ali dine;
In various tongues his bounty's bleſt,
While with ſurpriſe the ſtranger gueſt
Does here on unbought dainties feaſt:
See ſtately palaces ariſe,
And gilded domes invade the ſkies.
Say, muſe, what lords inhabit here?
Nor favourite eunuch, prince, nor peer?
The poor, the lame, the blind, the ſick,
The ideot, and the lunatic.
He curb'd each river's ſwelling pride,
O'er the reluctant murmuring tide
From bank to bank his bridges ſtride.
A thouſand gracious deeds were done,
Bury'd in ſilence and unknown.

At length, worn out with years and care,
Sha Abbas dy'd; left his young heir
Sha Seſi, unexperienc'd, raw,
By his ſtern father kept in awe;
To the ſeraglio's walls confin'd,
Barr'd from the converſe of mankind.
Strange jealouſy! a certain rule,
To breed a tyrant and a fool.
Still Ali was prime miniſter,
But had not much his maſter's ear;
Walk'd on unfaithful, ſlippery ground,
Till an occaſion could be found
To pick a quarrel; then, no doubt,
As is the mode at court—turn out.
Sha Seſi, among eunuchs bred,
With them convers'd, by them was led;
Beardleſs, half-men! in whoſe falſe breaſts,
Nor joy, nor love, nor friendſhip, reſts.
There ſpight and pining envy dwell,
And rage as in their native hell;
For, conſcious of their own diſgrace
Each excellence they would debaſe,
And vent their ſpleen on human race.
This Ali found. Strange ſenſeleſs lies
And inconſiſtent calumnies
They buz into the monarch's ears,
And he believes all that he hears.
" Great prince," ſaid they, " Ali, your ſlave—
" Whom we acknowledge wiſe and brave—
" Yet pardon us—we can't but ſee
" His boundleſs pride and vanity:
" His bridges triumph o'er each tide,
" In their own channels taught to glide.
" Each beggar, and each lazy drone,
" His ſubject, more than yours, is grown:

" And for a palace leaves his cell,
" Where Xerxes might be proud to dwell.
" His inns for travellers provide,
" Strangers are liſted on his ſide:
" In his own houſe how grand the ſcene!
" Tiſſues and velvets are too mean,
" Gold, jewels, pearls, unheard expence!
" Suſpected, bold, magnificence!
" Whence can this flood of riches flow?
" Examine his accounts, you'll know:
" Your eye on your exchequer caſt,
" The ſecret will come out at laſt."
Ali next morn (for 'twas his way
To riſe before the dawn of day)
Went early to the council-board,
Proſtrate on earth, his king ador'd.
The king, with countenance ſevere,
Look'd ſternly on his miniſter:
" Ali," ſaid he, " I have been told,
" Great treaſures, both in gems and gold,
" Were left, and truſted to your care;
" 'Mong theſe, one gem exceeding rare,
" I long to view; which was (they ſaid)
" A preſent from the ſultan made,
" The fineſt that the world e'er ſaw,
" White, large, and fair, without a flaw."
Th' unblemiſh'd Ali thus reply'd,
" Great ſir! it cannot be deny'd,
" 'Tis brilliant, beautiful, and clear,
" The Great Mogul has not its peer.
" Pleaſe it your majeſty, to go
" Into the treaſury below,
" You'll wonder at its piercing ray,
" The ſun gives not a nobler day."
Together now they all deſcend;
Poor Ali had no other friend,
But a ſoul faithful to its truſt,
The ſure aſylum of the juſt.
In proper claſſes now are ſeen
The diamonds bright, and emeralds green;
Pearls, rubies, ſapphires, next appear,
Diſpos'd in rows with niceſt care.
The king views all with curious eyes,
Applauds with wonder and ſurpriſe,
Their order and peculiar grace,
Each thing adapted to its place;
The reſt with envious leer behold,
And ſtumble upon bars of gold.
Next, in an amber box, is ſhown
The nobleſt jewel of the crown:
" This, ſir," ſaid he, " believe your ſlave,
" Is the fine gem the ſultan gave;
" Around it dart its beams of light,
" No comet e'er was half ſo bright."
The king with joy the gem admires,
Well-pleas'd, and half-convinc'd, retires.
" Ali," ſaid he, " with you I dine;
" Your furniture, I'm told, is fine."
Wiſe Ali, for this favour ſhow'd,
Humbly with loweſt reverence bow'd.
At Ali's houſe now every hand
Is buſy at their lord's command;
Where at th' appointed hour reſort
The king and all his ſplendid court.
Ali came forth his prince to meet,
And, lowly bowing, kiſs'd his feet.
On all his compliments beſtows,
Civil alike to friends and foes.
The king, impatient to behold
His furniture of gems and gold,
From room to room the chaſe purſued,
With curious eyes each corner view'd,
Ranſack'd th' apartments o'er and o'er,
Each cloſet ſearch'd, unlock'd each door;
But all he found was plain and coarſe,
The meaneſt Perſian ſcarce had worſe;
Theſe Ali for convenience bought,
Nor for expenſive trifles ſought.
One door a prying eunuch ſpy'd,
With bars and locks well fortify'd,
And now, ſecure to find the prize,
Show'd it the king with joyful eyes.
" Ali," ſaid he, " that citadel
" Is ſtrong, and baricadoed well?
" What have you there?" Ali reply'd,
" Oh, ſir, there's lodg'd my greateſt pride;
" There are the gems I value moſt,
" And all the treaſures I can boaſt."
All now convinc'd of his diſgrace,
Triumph appear'd in every face.
The monarch doubted now no more;
The keys are brought, unlock'd the door,
When, lo! upon the wall appear
His ſhepherd's weeds hung up with care,
Nor crook nor ſcrip was wanting there;
Nor pipe that tun'd his humble lays,
Sweet ſolace of his better days!
Then, bowing low, he touch'd his breaſt,
And thus the wondering king addreſt:
" Great Prince! your Ali is your ſlave,
" To you belong whate'er I have;
" Goods, houſe, are yours, nay yours this head,
" For ſpeak the word, and I am dead:
" Theſe moveables, and theſe alone,
" I may with juſtice call my own.
" Your royal ſire, Abbas the Great,
" Whom nations proſtrate at his feet
" On earth ador'd; whoſe ſoul at reſt,
" In paradiſe a welcome gueſt,
" * Enjoys its full, and fragrant bowers,
" Or wantons upon beds of flowers,
" While the pure ſtream, in living rills,
" From rocks of adamant diſtils,
" And black-ey'd nymphs attend his nod,
" Fair daughters of that bleſt abode:
" By his command, I left the plain,
" An humble, but contented ſwain.
" Nor ſought I wealth, nor power, nor place;
" All theſe were owing to his grace;
" 'Twas his mere bounty made me great,
" And fix'd me here, in this high ſeat,
" The mark of envy. Much he gave,
" But yet of nought depriv'd his ſlave:
" He touch'd not theſe. Alas! whoſe ſpite,
" Whoſe avarice, would theſe excite?
" My old, hereditary right!
" Grant me but theſe, Great Prince, once more,
" Grant me the pleaſure to be poor,
" This ſcrip, theſe homely weeds, I'll wear,
" The bleating flocks ſhall be my care;

* Such is the Paradiſe the Turks expect.

" Th' employ that did my youth engage,
Shall be the comfort of my age."
The king, amaz'd at ſuch a ſcorn
Of riches, in a ſhepherd born;
" How ſoars that ſoul," ſaid he, " above
" The courtier's hate, or monarch's love!
" No power ſuch virtue can efface,
" No jealous malice ſhall diſgrace.
" Wealth, grandeur, pomp, are a mere cheat,
" But this is to be truly great."
While tears ran trickling down his face,
He claſp'd him in a cloſe embrace;
Then caus'd himſelf to be undreſt,
And cloth'd him in his royal veſt:
The greateſt honour he could give,
Or Perſian ſubjects can receive.

THE SWEET-SCENTED MISER.

Tell me, my noble generous friend,
With what deſign, and to what end,
Do greedy fools heap up with care
That pelf, which they want heart to ſhare?
What other pleaſure can they know,
But to enjoy, or to beſtow?
Acts of benevolence and love
Give us a taſte of heaven above;
We imitate th' immortal powers,
Whoſe ſun-ſhine, and whoſe kindly ſhowers,
Refreſh the poor and barren ground,
And plant a paradiſe around:
But this mean, ſneaking avarice,
Is a collection of all vice.
Where this foul weed but taints the place,
Nor virtue grows, nor worth, nor grace;
The ſoul a deſert waſte remains,
And ghaſtly deſolation reigns.
But where will theſe grave morals tend?
Pardon my zeal, dear courteous friend;
The province of my humbler vein,
Is not to preach, but entertain.
Gripe, from the cradle to the grave,
Was good for nothing, but to ſave;
Mammon his God, to him alone
He bow'd, and his ſhort creed was known:
On his thumb-nail it might be wrote,
" A penny ſav'd's a penny got."
This rich poor man was jogging down,
Once on a time, from London town;
With him his ſon, a handy lad:
To dreſs his daddy—or his pad:
Among his dealers he had been,
And all their ready caſh ſwept clean.
Gripe, to ſave charges on the road,
At each good houſe cramm'd in a load:
With boil'd and roaſt his belly fill'd,
And greedily each tankard ſwill'd:
How ſavoury, how ſweet the meat!
How good the drink when others treat!
Now on the road Gripe trots behind,
For weighty reaſons (as you'll find):
The boy ſoon long'd to take a whet,
His horſe at each ſign made a ſet,
And he ſpurr'd on with great regret.
This the old man obſerv'd with pain,
" Ah! ſon," ſaid he, " the way to gain
" Wealth (our chief good) is to abſtain;
" Check each expenſive appetite,
" And make the moſt of every mite:
" Conſider well, my child, O think
" What numbers are undone by drink!
" Hopeful young men! who might be great,
" Die well, and leave a large eſtate;
" But, by lewd comrades led aſtray,
" Guzzling, throw all their means away.
" Tom Daſh, of parts acute and rare.
" Can ſplit a fraction to a hair;
" Knows Wingate better than his creed,
" Can draw ſtrong ale, or a weak deed;
" By precedents a bond can write,
" Or an indenture tripartite;
" Can meaſure land, paſture, or wood,
" Yet never purchas'd half a rood.
" Whom all theſe liberal arts adorn,
" Is he not rich! as ſheep new ſhorn!
" The reaſon need not far be ſought,
" For three-pence gain'd, he ſpends a groat.
" There's Billy Blowſe, that merry fellow,
" So wondrous witty when he's mellow;
" Ale and mundungus, in deſpite
" Of nature, make the clown polite.
" When thoſe rich ſteams chafe his dull head,
" What flowers ſhoot up in that hot-bed!
" His jeſts, when fogs his temples ſhroud,
" Like the ſun burſting through a cloud,
" Blaze out, and dazzle all the crowd:
" They laugh, each wag's exceeding gay,
" While he, poor ninny! jokes away
" By night, whate'er he gets by day.
" To theſe examples I might add
" A 'ſquire or two, troth full as bad;
" Who, doom'd by heaven for their ſins,
" Mind nothing but their nipperkins:
" But theſe, at this time, ſhall ſuffice;
" By ſaving, boy, that is, be wiſe."
Now, muſe, come hold thy noſe, and tell
What doleful accident befel;
His horſe ſet hard, an ancient hack,
That twice ten years carry'd a pack,
But ſuch a cargo ne'er before;
He had him cheap, and kept him poor;
His bowels ſtuft with too much meat,
He ſat uneaſy in his ſeat,
And riggled often to and fro,
With painful gripings gnaw'd below.
His diſtance yet in hope to gain,
For the next inn he ſpurs amain;
In haſte alights, and ſcuds away,
But time and tide for no man ſtay.
No means can ſave whom heaven has curſt,
For out th' impetuous torrent burſt.
Struck dumb, aghaſt at firſt he ſtood,
And ſcratch'd his head in penſive mood:
But, wiſely judging 'twas in vain
To make an outcry, and complain,
Of a bad bargain made the beſt,
And lull'd his troubled ſoul to reſt.
Back he return'd with rueful face,
And ſhuffled through the houſe apace;
My landlady ſcreams out in haſte,
" Old gentleman, ho!—where ſo faſt?
" Before you go, pray pay your ſhot,
" This young man here has drunk a pot."

" A pot!" said Gripe; " oh, the young rogue!
" Ah, ruinous, expensive dog!"
And, muttering curses in his ear,
Look'd like a witch with hellish leer;
But, finding 'twas in vain to fret,
Pull'd out his catskin, paid the debt.
This point adjusted, on they fare,
Ambrosial sweets perfume the air:
The younker, by the fragrant scent,
Perceiving now how matters went,
Laugh'd inwardly, could scarce contain,
And kept his countenance with pain.
At last he cries, " Now, sir, an't please,
" I hope you're better, and at ease."
" Better, you booby!—'tis all out"—
" What's out?" said he. " You drunken lout!
" All in my trowsers—well—no matter.—
" Not great—th' expence of soap and water;
" This charge—if times are not too hard,
" By management may be repair'd:
" But, oh! that damn'd confounded pot!
" Extravagant, audacious sot;
" This, this indeed, my soul does grieve,
" There's two-pence lost without retrieve!"

THE INCURIOUS BENCHER.

At Jenny Mann's, where heroes meet,
And lay their laurels at her feet;
The modern Pallas, at whose shrine
They bow, and by whose aid they dine:
Colonel Brocade among the rest
Was every day a welcome guest.
One night as carelessly he stood,
Cheering his reins before the fire,
(So every true-born Briton should)
Like that, he chaf'd, and fum'd, with ire.
" Jenny," said he, " tis very hard,
" That no man's honour can be spar'd;
" If I but sup with Lady Duchess,
" Or play a game at ombre, such is
" The malice of the world, 'tis said,
" Although his Grace lay drunk in bed,
" 'Twas I that caus'd his aching head.
" If Madam Doodle would be witty,
" And I am summon'd to the city,
" To play at blind-man's-buff, or so,
" What won't such hellish malice do?
" If I but catch her in a corner,
" Humph—'tis, Your servant, Colonel Horner:
" But rot the sneering fops, if e'er
" I prove it, it shall cost them dear;
" I swear by this dead-doing blade,
" Dreadful examples shall be made:
" What—can't they drink bohea and cream,
" But (d—n them) I must be their theme?
" Other men's business let alone,
" Why should not coxcombs mind their own?"
As thus he rav'd with all his might (How insecure from Fortune's spight,
Alas! is every mortal wight!)
To show his ancient spleen to Mars,
Fierce Vulcan caught him by the a—
Stuck to his skirts, insatiate varlet!
And fed with pleasure on the scarlet.
Hard by, and in the corner, fate
A Bencher grave, with look sedate,
Smoking his pipe, warm as a toast,
And reading over last week's post;
He saw the foe the fort invade,
And soon smelt out the breach he made:
But not a word—a little fly
He look'd, 'tis true, and from each eye
A side-long glance sometimes he sent,
To bring him news, and watch th' event.
At length, upon that tender part
Where honour lodges (as of old Authentic Hudibras has told)
The blustering colonel felt a smart.
Sore griev'd for his affronted bum,
Frisk'd, skip'd, and bounc'd about the room;
Then turning short, " Zounds, sir!" he cries—
" Pox on him, had the fool no eyes?
" What! let a man be burnt alive!"
" I am not, sir, inquisitive"
(Reply'd Sir Gravity) " to know
" Whate'er your honour's pleas'd to do;
" If you will burn your tail to tinder,
" Pray what have I to do to hinder?
" Other mens business let alone,
" Why should not coxcombs mind their own?"
Then, knocking out his pipe with care,
Laid down his penny at the bar;
And, wrapping round his frieze surtout,
Took up his crab-tree, and walk'd out.

THE BUSY INDOLENT:

A TALE.

Jack Careless was a man of parts,
Well skill'd in the politer arts,
With judgment read, with humour writ:
Among his friends past for a wit:
But lov'd his ease more than his meat,
And wonder'd knaves could toil and cheat,
T' expose themselves by being great.
At no levees the suppliant bow'd;
Nor courted for their votes the crowd:
Nor riches nor preferment sought,
Did what he pleas'd, spoke what he thought.
Content within due bounds to live,
And what he could not spend, to give:
Would whiff his pipe o'er nappy ale,
And joke, and pun, and tell his tale;
Reform the state, lay down the law,
And talk of lords he never saw;
Fight Marlborough's battles o'er again,
And push the French on Blenheim's plain;
Discourse of Paris, Naples, Rome,
Though he had never stirr'd from home:
'Tis true he travel'd with great care,
The tour of Europe—in his chair.
Was loth to part without his load,
Or move till morning peep'd abroad.
One day this honest, idle rake,
Nor quite asleep, nor well awake,
Was lolling in his elbow chair,
And building castles in the air;
His nipperkin (the port was good)
Half empty at his elbow stood,
When a strange noise offends his ear,
The din increas'd as it came near,
And in his yard at last he view'd
Of farmers a great multitude;

Who that day, walking of their rounds,
Had disagreed about their bounds;
And sure the difference must be wide,
Where each does for himself decide.
Vollies of oaths in vain they swear,
Which burst like guiltless bombs in air; [oaf!"
And, "Thou'rt a knave!" and, "Thou'rt an
Is banded round with truth enough.
At length they mutually agree,
His worship should be referee,
Which courteous (Jack consents to be:
Though for himself he would not budge)
Yet for his friends an arrant drudge;
A conscience of this point he made,
With pleasure readily obey'd,
And shot like lightning to their aid.
The farmers, summon'd to his room,
Bowing with awkward reverence come.
In his great chair his worship sate,
A grave and able magistrate:
Silence proclaim'd, each clack was laid,
And flippant tongues with pain obey'd.
In a short speech, he first computes
The vast expence of law disputes,
And everlasting chancery suits.
With zeal and warmth he railed then
Pack'd juries, sheriffs, talesmen!
And recommended in the close,
Good neighbourhood, peace, and repose.
Next weigh'd with care each man's pretence,
Perus'd records, heard evidence,
Observ'd, reply'd, hit every blot,
Unravel'd every Gordian knot;
With great activity and parts,
Inform'd their judgments, won their hearts;
And, without fees, or time mispent,
By strength of ale and argument,
Dispatch'd them home, friends and content.
Trusty, who at his elbow sate,
And with surprise heard the debate,
Astonish'd, could not but admire
His strange dexterity and fire;
His wise discernment and good sense,
His quickness, ease, and eloquence.
"Lord! sir," said he, "I can't but chide:
"What useful talents do you hide!
"In half an hour you have done more
"Than Puzzle can in half a score,
"With all the practice of the courts,
"His cases, precedents, reports."
Jack with a smile reply'd, "'Tis true,
"This may seem odd, my friend, to you,
"But give me not more than my due.
"No hungry judge nods o'er the laws,
"But hastens to decide the cause:
"Who hands the oar, and drags the chain,
"Will struggle to be free again.
"So lazy men and indolent,
"With cares oppress'd, and business spent,
"Exert their utmost powers and skill,
"Work hard; for what? Why, to sit still.
"They toil, they sweat, they want no fee,
"For ev'n sloth prompts to industry.
"Therefore, my friend, I freely own
"All this address I now have shown,
"Is mere impatience, and no more,
"To lounge and loiter as before:
"Life is a span, the world an inn——
"Here, sirrah, t' other nipperkin."

THE YEOMAN OF KENT:

A TALE.

A YEOMAN bold (suppose of Kent)
Liv'd on his own, and paid no rent;
Manur'd his own paternal land,
Had always money at command,
To purchase bargains, or to lend,
T' improve his stock, or help a friend:
At Cressy and Poictiers, of old,
His ancestors were bowmen bold;
Whose good yew bows, and sinews strong,
Drew arrows of a cloth-yard long;
For England's glory, strew'd the plain
With barons, counts, and princes slain.
Belov'd by all the neighbourhood,
For his delight was doing good:
At every mart his word a law,
Kept all the shuffling knaves in awe.
How just is heaven, and how true,
To give to such desert its due!
'Tis in authentic legions said,
Two twins at once had bless'd his bed;
Frank was the eldest, but the other
Was honest Numps, his younger brother;
That, with a face effeminate,
And shape too fine and delicate,
Took after his fond mother Kate,
A Franklin's daughter. Numps was rough,
No heart of oak was half so tough,
And true as steel, to cuff, or kick,
Or play a bout at double stick,
Who but friend Numps? While Frank's delight
Was more (they say) to dance, than fight;
At Whitson-ales king of the May,
Among the maids, brisk, frolic, gay,
He tript it on each holiday.
Their genius different, Frank would roam
To town; but Numps, he staid at home.
The youth was forward, apt to learn,
Could soon an honest living earn;
Good company would always keep,
Was known to Falstaff in East-cheap:
Threw many a merry main, could bully,
And put the doctor on his cully;
Ply'd hard his work, and learnt the way,
To watch all night, and sleep all day.
Flush'd with success, new rigg'd, and clean,
Polite his air, genteel his mien:
Accomplish'd thus in every part,
He won a buxom widow's heart.
Her fortune narrow; and too wide,
Alas! lay her concerns, her pride:
Great as a duchess, she would scorn
Mean fare, a gentlewoman born;
Poor and expensive! on my life
'Twas but the devil of a wife.
Yet Frank, with what he won by night,
A while liv'd tolerably tight;

And ſpouſe, who ſometimes ſate till morn
At cribbidge, made a good return.
While thus they liv'd from hand to mouth,
She laid a bantling to the youth;
But whether 'twas his own or no,
My authors don't pretend to know.
His charge enhanc'd, 'tis alſo true
A lying-in 's expenſive too,
In cradles, whittles, ſpice-bowls, ſack,
Whate'er the wanton goſſips lack;
While ſcandal thick as hail-ſhot flies,
Till peaceful bumpers ſeal their eyes.
Frank deem'd it prudent to retire,
And viſit the good man his ſire;
In the ſtage-coach he ſeats himſelf,
Loaded with madam and her elf;
In her right hand the coral plac'd,
Her lap a China orange grac'd:
Pap for the babe was not forgot;
And lullaby's melodious note,
That warbled in his ears all day.
Shorten'd the rugged, tedious way.
Frank, to the manſion-houſe now come,
Rejoic'd to find himſelf at home;
Neighbours around, and couſins went
By ſcores, to pay their compliment.
The good old man was kind, 'tis true,
But yet a little ſhock'd, to view
A 'ſquire ſo fine, a ſight ſo new.
But above all, the lady fair
Was pink'd, and deck'd beyond compare;
Scarce a ſhrieve's wife at an aſſize
Was dreſs'd ſo fine, ſo roll'd her eyes:
And maſter too in all his pride,
His ſilver rattle by his ſide,
Would ſhake it oft, then ſhrilly ſcream,
More noiſy than the yeoman's team;
With taſſals and with plumes made proud,
While jingling bells ring out aloud.
The good old dame, raviſh'd outright,
Ev'n doated on ſo gay a ſight;
Her Frank, as glorious as the morn;
Poor Numps was look'd upon with ſcorn.
With other eyes the yeoman ſage
Beheld each youth; nought could engage
His wary and diſcerning heart,
But ſterling worth and true deſert.
At laſt, he could no longer bear
Such ſtrange ſophiſticated ware;
He cries (enrag'd at this odd ſcene)
" What can this fooliſh coxcomb mean,
" Who, like a pedlar with his pack,
" Carries his riches on his back?
" Soon ſhall this blockhead ſink my rents,
" And alienate my tenements,
" Which long have ſtood in good repair,
" Nor ſunk, nor roſe, from heir to heir;
" Still the ſame rent without advance,
" Since the Black Prince firſt conquer'd France:
" But now, alas! all muſt be loſt,
" And all my prudent projects croſt.
" Brave honeſt race! Is it thus then
" We dwindle into gentlemen?
" But I'll prevent this foul diſgrace,
" This butterfly from hence I'll chaſe."

He ſaddles Ball without delay,
To London town directs his way;
There at the Herald's office he
Took out his coat, and paid his fee,
And had it cheap, as wits agree.
A lion rampant, ſtout and able,
Argent the field, the border ſable;
The gay eſcutcheon look'd as fine,
As any new-daub'd country ſign.
Thus having done what he decreed,
Home he returns with all his ſpeed:
" Here, ſon," ſaid he, " ſince you will be
" A gentleman in ſpight of me;
" Here, ſir, this gorgeous bauble take,
" How well it will become a rake!
" Be what you ſeem: this is your ſhare;
" But honeſt Numps ſhall be my heir;
" To him I'll leave my whole eſtate,
" Leſt my brave race degenerate.

THE HAPPY LUNATIC.

TO DOCTOR M———. A TALE.

When ſaints were cheap in good Nol's reign,
As ſinners now in Drury-Lane;
Wrapt up in myſteries profound,
A ſaint perceiv'd his head turn round:
Whether the ſweet and ſavoury wind,
That ſhould have been diſcharg'd behind,
For want of vent had upward fled,
And ſeiz'd the fortreſs of his head;
Ye ſage philoſophers, debate:
I ſolve no problems intricate.
That he was mad, to me is clear,
Elſe why ſhould he, whoſe nicer ear
Could never bear church-muſic here,
Dream that he heard the bleſt above,
Chanting in hymns of joy and love?
Organs themſelves, which were of yore
The muſic of the ſcarlet whore,
Are now with tranſport heard. In fine,
Raviſh'd with harmony divine,
All earthly bleſſings he deſies,
The gueſt and favourite of the ſkies.
At laſt, his too officious friends
The doctor call, and he attends;
The patient cur'd, demands his fee.
" Curſe on thy farting pills and thee," Reply'd the ſaint: " ah! to my coſt
" I'm cur'd; but where's the heaven I loſt?
" Go, vile deceiver, get thee hence,
" Who'd barter paradiſe for ſenſe?"
Ev'n ſo bemus'd (that is, poſſeſt),
With raptures fir'd, and more than bleſt?
In pompous epic, towering odes,
I ſtrut with heroes, feaſt with gods;
Enjoy by turns the tuneful quire,
For me they touch each golden lyre.
Happy deluſion! kind deceit!
Till you, my friend, reveal the cheat;
Your eye ſevere, traces each fault,
Each ſwelling word, each tinſel thought.
Cur'd of my frenzy, I deſpiſe
Such trifles, ſtript of their diſguiſe,
Convinc'd, and miſerably wiſe.

Anno 1794.

THE LIFE OF PATTISON.

Of the perſonal hiſtory of William Pattiſon, a youth of a very extraordinary genius, few particulars have been tranſmitted by his contemporaries; and for theſe we are chiefly indebted to the anonymous editor of his poems, who was enabled to perform "this act of juſtice to his memory," by a caſual acquaintance, the inſpection of his literary correſpondence, and the communications of his friends "in the north, and at Cambridge."

As the reſearches which have been made in the two ſeminaries of Appleby, and Sidney College, to which this unfortunate ſcholar belonged, have furniſhed no new memorials of his perſon or his genius, the preſent writer muſt content himſelf with repeating the few melancholy incidents, which have hitherto formed the ſlender hiſtory of his life.

He was born at Peaſmarſh, near Rye, in the county of Suſſex, in 1706, of a family in no reſpect illuſtrious; his father being a farmer at that place, who rented a conſiderable eſtate belonging to the Earl of Thanet.

In his early childhood, having diſcovered the moſt promiſing marks of lively parts, and a great propenſity to learning, and his father being unable to give him a ſuitable education, he obtained the patronage of the Earl of Thanet, who placed him at the free-ſchool of Appleby, in Weſtmoreland, under the tuition of Mr. Banks, a teacher of eminent learning and abilities.

After the death of Mr. Banks, he continued about two years under the care of his ſucceſſor, Mr. Thomas Nevinſon of Queen's College, Oxford, during which time he chiefly applied himſelf to the ſtudy of claſſical literature and poetry.

About this time, he became acquainted with the Rev. Mr. Noble, ſchoolmaſter at Kirkby Stephen, a man of letters, and an excellent critic in poetry, who uſed frequently to read the claſſics with him, taught him how to diſcern the beauties and the faults of authors, deſcribed to him the difference between falſe wit and judicious writing, and gave him ſuch inſtructions towards the advancement of his knowledge, and the refinement of his taſte, as proved very advantageous to him in the proſecution of his ſtudies.

Mr. Nevinſon being preſented to a living in Northumberland, reſigned the ſchool, and was ſucceeded by Mr. Richard Yates of Queen's College (the preſentation to the ſchool being in that College), under whoſe care he continued about a year.

While he was at ſchool, he happened to contract a debt, of about ten pounds, for books, to three bookſellers in Penrith, who rudely demanded payment. Having no money, nor any friend who could advance him that ſum, he wrote an Ode upon Chriſtmas Day, and preſented it to Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, Bart. at Edenhall, who was ſo much pleaſed with it, that he ordered his chaplain to pay immediately what money he owed for books.

Some time after, he addreſſed an Ode to John Tufton, Eſq., nephew to the Earl of Thanet, in which his acknowledgments to the Tufton family are finely expreſſed, and for which he was very handſomely rewarded.

Shortly after, he ridiculed the pretenſions of three poetical coxcombs, who, at that time, peſtered the ſchool with their nonſenſical rhymes, by the following tranſpoſition of Dryden's fine epigram on Milton.

Three poetasters in one age were born,
And all at once did Appleby adorn;
The first in penury of thought surpast,
In rumbling cant the next, in both the last;
The force of dulness could no farther go,
To make a third, she joined the former two.

Though he avowed, upon every occasion, the obligations he was under to the Thanet family, yet he had the misfortune, by some misunderstanding, to experience the neglect of his noble patron before he left Appleby; in consequence of which, his election to Queen's College, Oxford, pursuant to the foundation, was prevented, and he returned home to his parents. He left Appleby school in 1723; and the year following, he was sent to Sidney College, Cambridge, "wholly through means of his mother's indulgence, whom he ever declared to be the most tender, as his father was one of the most rigid parents."

As soon as he was settled in the University, he wrote an Epistle to a Friend in the north, which contains an elegant and interesting description of a college life.

At Cambridge, as at Appleby, poetry was his favourite pursuit, and angling the chief alleviation of his studies; for he was always averse to the public disputations, and on a particular occasion, shewed his resentment at being carried to the schools by the wranglers.

As the brute world to father Adam came,
Requesting, with inquiring looks, a name,
To every beast a title he assign'd,
And nominated all the sylvan-kind.
So savage multitudes about me throng;
Did Adam's talent but to me belong!
Yet though they cheat the world by their disguise,
They are but asses to poetic eyes.

He was considered as a youth of much hope; and the proofs which he exhibited of intellectual energy, and literary powers, procured him the acquaintance of the most distinguished scholars in the University.

While his poetical compositions obtained him a high reputation among men of wit and learning, his companionable talents, and the festivity of his conversation, procured him a ready admission to the circles of elegance and fashion.

Few men came into company better qualified to please, or to instruct; but it was his misfortune to split on the rock of misapplication; for he made that which should have been only an amusement, his principal pursuit, and suffered himself to be deluded from the rugged paths of study, by the fascination of elegant society, and the dreams of a warm and voluptuous imagination. This latter disposition led him into some juvenile imprudences, which exposed him to the censure of his tutor, whose temper, it is said, was ill qualified to reconcile him to the discipline of the College.

The grounds of the quarrel between him and his tutor cannot at this time be known; but it appears, from his epistolary correspondence, that "the rigour with which his tutor treated him was not easy to brook, and he could very ill bear restraint;" and he tells of himself, "that it was the threats of expulsion, and the dread of such a scandal, which made him cut his name out of the College book."

He left the University, whatever was the cause, in thoughtless gaiety, by deputing his gown to make his apology in the following verses, which he pinned upon it, at his departure:

Whoever gives himself the pains to stoop,
And take my venerable tatters up,
To his presuming inquisition I,
In loco Pattisoni thus reply:
Tir'd with the senseless jargon of the gown,
My master left the college for the town;
Where, from pedantic drudgery secur'd,
He laughs at follies, which he once endur'd;
And scorns his precious minutes to regale,
With wretched college wit, and college ale;

Far nobler pleaſures open to his view,
Pleaſures for ever ſweet, for ever new!
Bright wit, ſoft beauty, and ambition's fire
Inflame his boſom, and his muſe inſpire;
While to his few, but much endearing friends,
His love and humble ſervice he commends.

His moſt ſincere friends expreſſed their concern at his departure, and ſtrongly urged him either to return, or at leaſt to make an apology for his behaviour to the maſter and fellows of the college. The former he could not be perſuaded to, but the latter he readily complied with, in a ſtate of his caſe, which he tranſmitted in a letter to one of his friends.

"The world is ever inclined," ſays he, "to ſuſpect us of partiality, when we ſpeak of ourſelves; and it is unnatural for a perſon to condemn himſelf, when he has an adverſary ſo ready as mine to deal with, I was going to ſay, ſo powerful, without conſidering the validity of his accuſations, which muſt be proved. If they are found to be true, I ſhall, with a great deal of reſignation, ſubmit to the cenſures of mankind; and when he has honeſtly acquitted himſelf from the ſame charge to his conſcience, I invite him to throw the firſt ſtone. Here is a field of ſatire opened for me; but I ſcorn to draw upon a naked man, and ſhall content myſelf. But I hope, the abſolute neceſſity of ſuch a proceeding will, in ſome meaſure, excuſe me to that uſual indulgence, which the maſter and the fellows have ever favoured me with, eſpecially ſince it is the laſt offence I am likely to be guilty of."

In ſupport of the charge againſt his tutor, the following authorities are produced from his epiſtolary correſpondence.

"I adviſe you," ſays Mr. Waſe, of Sidney College, "to ſend a decent epiſtle to the maſter, with an impartial account of the ill treatment which you have met with under B———; diſplay therein his ſevere uſage in moving terms, and urge, that he was the chief cauſe of your abrupt departing hence. B——— is not as yet returned; the fellows begin in an open manner to complain of his miſbehaviour to them, and diſhoneſty to his creditors; they have met together twice, to conſult ſome means of redreſſing the grievance of college ſervants and others."

"B——— threatens," ſays Mr. Waſe in another letter, "to give you trouble; but on what ſcore is unknown to me. He ſeems exceedingly incenſed at your leaving college, counter to his permiſſion; and, for the defence of his own reputation with regard to you, expoſes his accounts, and letters from your friends, to every curious eye, and takes no ſmall pains to enumerate, in emphatical words, what mighty ſervices he has done, and what vaſt kindneſſes he always ſhowed you, whilſt in college. He opened his books, to my view, yeſterday morning, wherein I perceive you ſtand indebted to him, all matters juſtly calculated, but for a mere trifle; for he has your caution-money in his cuſtody, being ten pounds, and exhibition money, &c. to receive on your account; all which will near amount to a complete diſburſement of himſelf, &c."

"I know of no ſeverities from his tutor," ſays Mr. Webber, of Peaſmarſh, "but what were neceſſary to make him ſenſible of his doings, and to know to whom he was indebted for his favours, which I am ſure he was to Mr. B———."

The laſt account, if not wholly true, is rendered extremely probable, by the circumſtances that may reaſonably be ſuppoſed to have miſguided a young, enthuſiaſtic, ambitious mind, like that of Pattiſon. But whatever offices of friendſhip his tutor might ſhew him while under his care, it was ungenerous to expoſe his private affairs after his departure; all obligations being cancelled, when a public declaration is made of them.

The apology which he made, to avert the reproach of expulſion, met with a reception ſo very favourable, as renders it ſufficiently probable, that he had not been guilty of any of thoſe groſs immoralities, which require the infliction of the ſevereſt ſtatutable animadverſion. So unwilling was the ſociety to loſe him, that his exhibition was kept in ſuſpenſe for ſome time, in expectation of his return to college. His friends took occaſion, from this circumſtance, to renew their ſolicitations, and with ſome hopes of ſucceſs. "I will be at Cambridge," ſays he, in a letter to Mr. Waſe, "by next Diviſion; for I am afraid I cannot diſpatch affairs before."

But he only talked of returning: his determination, which ſeems never to have been very ſteady, ſoon yielded to the faſcinating pleaſures of irreſiſtible London. "I meet every day," he adds,

" with very great encouragement among perſons of diſtinction, and, in ſhort, live ſo happily, that I begin to be in love with the town."

This happineſs was but of ſhort duration; and his life became the forfeit of his imprudence, in not returning to college, after his friends had prepared the way for his kind reception.

Upon his leaving the Univerſity, in 1726, he had recommendations to many perſons of diſtinguiſhed rank and abilities in London, by whom he was encouraged to publiſh a collection of his poems by ſubſcription. He ſeems to have been introduced to Pope, to whom he addreſſed an epiſtle, and who promoted the ſubſcription to his Miſcellany; and he lived in habits of familiar intimacy and correſpondence with Euſden and Harte.

When the perſons of diſtinction, by whom he was careſſed and applauded, became quite tired out, by repeated acts of friendſhip, he ſubſiſted, for ſome time, on the caſual profits of the ſubſcription, till, at length, that reſource failed, and he appears, by the following letter, to have been reduced to ſuch extreme indigence, as to be no longer able to procure the neceſſaries of life.

" If you was ever touched," ſays he, " with a ſenſe of humanity, conſider my condition; what I am, my propoſals will inform you; what I have been, Sidney College, in Cambridge, can witneſs; what I ſhall be ſome few hours hence, I tremble to think.—Spare my bluſhes!—I have not enjoyed the common neceſſaries of life for theſe two days."

What effect this application met with is unknown; a ſuſpicion is inſinuated, that it was diſregarded, as well as a ſimilar application to Southerne; but it would be a diſhonour to human nature to ſuppoſe, that ſo ſmall a requeſt as only a ſubſcription to his miſcellany, met with a denial.

In this diſtreſs, which was aggravated by a drooping indiſpoſition, he found a friend in Mr. H. Curll, bookſeller in the Strand, who received him into his houſe, in the beginning of June 1727, where he remained about a month, chiefly employed in tranſcribing his poems for the preſs, in order to fulfil his engagements to his ſubſcribers.

Shortly after, when a conſiderable part of the collection was printed, he was ſeized with the ſmall pox, and attended by Dr. Pellet (by the recommendation of his friend Euſden), who had him conveyed to the houſe of a nurſe, eminent for her ſkill and care in that diſeaſe, in St. Clement's pariſh.

No care was wanting on the part of Dr. Pellet to have ſaved him, and the greateſt hopes appeared of his recovery; but he had laid his afflictions to heart, and all medicinal preſcriptions were ineffectual. A ſudden and unexpected turn of the diſeaſe put an end to his life, and to the hopes he had raiſed in all that knew him, of becoming one of the moſt eminent poets of our nation, July 11. 1727, in the 21ſt year of his age. He was buried in the upper church yard, belonging to St. Clement Danes in the Strand.

On his death bed, he expreſſed a ſtrong deſire to be reconciled to his father, who had withdrawn the allowance he made him at Cambridge; but he not only, while he was alive, denied him this ſatisfaction, but even refuſed, after his death, to perform the laſt offices to his remains.

The editor of his poems obſerves, " that though the ſmall-pox contributed to deprive us of ſo great a genius, yet it was his dying declaration: His heart was broke, through the misfortunes he had fallen under; which," he adds, " I wiſh I could not ſay, were wholly owing to himſelf. It muſt be declared, that his ſufferings were inexpreſſible; and to ſum up all in the words of his friend Mr. Harte: He was miſerably unfortunate, to my knowledge."

The Miſcellany, for which he took ſubſcriptions, was printed for H. Curll, in the Strand, in 1728, under the title of, The Poetical works of Mr. William Pattiſon, late of Sidney College, Cambridge; which included Verſes to Mr. John Saunders, The Hour-Glaſs, The Nightingale and Shepherd, The Court of Venus, Orpheus and Eurydice, and Verſes to Mr. Mitchell, publiſhed in his lifetime.

It appears, by his letters, that he intended to print a ſecond volume of Miſcellanies, which were tranſcribed for the preſs by himſelf, conſiſting of ſeven epiſtles of an intended verſion of Ovid; Sapho to Phaon, Paris to Helen, Penelope to Ulyſſes, Ariadne to Theſeus, Oenone to Paris, Dido to Æneas, Laodamia to Proteſilaus, with ſome other claſſical tranſlations and occaſional poems. He intended alſo, to write a poem on Angling, in five cantos.

The compiler of this collection thinks he has ſeen ſomewhere the Poetical Works of Pattiſon mentioned in two volumes; but the ſecond volume, if it was indeed printed, has eluded his inquiries,

The poems which were publiſhed, and thoſe which were printed, but not publiſhed, in his lifetime, with the omiſſion of a few little pieces offenſive to decency, are now, for the firſt time, received into a collection of claſſical Engliſh poetry.

Of his familiar manners and habits of ſtudy, the following account is given by one of the friends of his youth, and the companions of his ſtudies:

" Mr. Pattiſon was a man of great ſpeculation, and conſequently a lover of ſolitude. Of all the books he ever read, Spenſer's " Faery Queen" delighted him moſt. He had read that book through ſeveral times; and I do not queſtion, but his mind received a richneſs from theſe romantic repreſentations and paradiſaical deſcriptions. He was no leſs pleaſed to ſee any of theſe repreſentations realized. There is a place near Appleby, which, by reaſon of the near reſemblance it has to ſome deſcriptions in Cowley, he called Cowley's Walk. On one ſide of the walk is a huge rock, grown over with moſs, and ivy climbing to the ſides of it, and, in ſome parts, little trees ſpring out of the crevices of the rock. At the bottom thereof grows a wild row of trees, but very irregular; and indeed every part of it looks aged and venerable. In this rock there is a cave naturally arched over the top, in form of a canopy, and the borders of the arch are edged round with ivy, which hangs down and overſhades the place, and from hence he called it Hederinda. At the foot of this cave, there runs a ſtream of water quite through the walk, and the walk is a level plain, which has on one hand the water, and the trees and a precipice on the other. In winter time it looks very full of horror, when nothing remains but rugged rocks and empty waſtes; whereas in the ſpring time, the ſinging of the birds, the fragrancy of the flowers, and the murmuring of the ſtream, greatly contribute to the embelliſhment of the place, and render it exceedingly delightful. Many an agreeable afternoon has he amuſed away in this place with a friend or two, and many a moonlight night has he retired thither to indulge himſelf in that ſadly pleaſing melancholy which the awful ſolemnity of the place neceſſarily produces.

" He was a great admirer of angling. A great inducement to his becoming a fiſher, might probably proceed from that pleaſant gloom of thought, which the murmuring of the ſtream naturally inſpired him with, and which is the ſame caſt of mind, that inclined him to admire Cowley's Walk. He was ſo much a lover of this diverſion, that he uſed frequently to ſit up late, and ſometimes whole ſummer nights, upon the banks of his Ituna, with his angle in his hand. Here he uſed very often to write verſes; and I have heard him ſay, that many of his lines owed their ſmoothneſs and harmony to theſe ſtreams. Here it was he wrote that agreeable philoſophical poem, The Morning Contemplation.

" He was naturally of a facetious fancy, and ſhowed a greater maſtery in no kind of writing more than in the burleſque manner. Add to this, that his panegyric was always genteel, but never fulſome, and his ſatire poignant, but never ſcurrilous."

Next to the " Faery Queen," he was an enthuſiaſtic admirer of Browne's " Britannia's Paſtorals," " an imperfect copy of which he had purchaſed for a ſhilling, and which, through his misfortunes, was the whole library he left behind him."

The friend, to whom he addreſſed the Epiſtle from Cambridge, ſays, in a letter, " that even at ſchool an early fondneſs after Ovid's Epiſtles began to dawn in his breaſt;" and, " that as to a new tranſlation, he knew none more equal to the undertaking." He farther confirms his opinion, by the ſpecimen Pattiſon ſent him, in this definitive ſentence of his verſification, " your's is that in Engliſh, which Ovid's is in Latin." His friend, Harte, ſent him a letter, only two days before his death, containing ſome judicious remarks on his verſion of Ovid, which is preſerved in the Memoirs of his Life, and is the moſt valuable article in his epiſtolary correſpondence.

To his amiable qualities, and agreeable manners, his ſchool-fellows and fellow-collegians bear ample teſtimony. He loved and eſteemed, and was eſteemed and beloved by Mr. Taylor, Mr. Roche, Mr. Dickinſon, Mr. Hulſe, Mr. Ward, Mr. Waſe, and Mr. Bunce of Cambridge; and held an amicable correſpondence with Pope, Euſden, and Harte, and retained the affectionate regard of Mr. Yates, of Appleby ſchool, Mr. Noble, of Kirkby Stephen ſchool, and of his dear friend and ſchool-fellow, deſigned under the poetical name of Florio. Benevolence of diſpoſition, and ſenſibility of temper, in an exceſſive degree, ſeem to have been his peculiar characteriſtics. If, in ſome in-ſtances, he courted too aſſiduouſly, the company of particular circles, it ought to be obſerved, that one ſo able to communicate as well as to receive pleaſure, was always welcome. He was, by conſtitutional temper, as well as by benevolent diſpoſitions, and by ſprightly talents, a moſt agreeable companion. It will always be reflected upon with regret, that his companionable talents, and endearing qualities, procured him no uſeful connection, nor any ſolid and laſting advantage. He brought cares on himſelf, as many other young men of genius have done, to drive away care from others, who, placed by fortune above injury, firſt ſeduced him from the great work of life, and then ſuffered him, after much anxiety and much trouble, to die of a broken heart.

As a poet, the pretenſions of Pattiſon ſeem not to have been hitherto ſufficiently conſidered or allowed. His compoſitions, though little known, are characteriſed by a degree of tenderneſs, terſeneſs, refinement, and harmony, which entitles them to the attention of the readers of poetry. They poſſeſs a conſiderable portion of the ſtrong imagination of Spenſer and Milton, and the rich melody of Dryden and Pope. The piece of moſt conſpicuous merit in his works, is the Epiſtle of Abelard to Eloiſa, in anſwer to Pope's inimitable Epiſtle of "Eloiſa to Abelard." It is evidently the production of a man of ſenſibility and genius; and for flowing deſcription, paſſionate language, picturesque imagery, and pathetic exclamation, is only inferior to the production of Pope, of which it is an imitation, even to the cadence of the verſe. It is impoſſible to read it without experiencing the alternate impulſe of deſire, pity, or rage; and laſtly, the freezing languor of irrecoverable deſpair. It has not been exceeded by the compoſitions of Cawthorne and Warwick on the ſame ſubject. The Epiſtles of Roſamond to Henry, and Henry to Roſamond, abound in natural and tender ſentiments, and appoſite imagery. The fragment of an Epiſtle from Tarico to Inkle is truly Ovidian; it is much to be regretted, that it is unfiniſhed. The Morning Contemplation abounds in excellent morality, enlivened by a variety of appropriate imagery, and many of the ornaments of true poetry. The verſes on the 5th of November are vigorouſly written. They abound in ſublime deſcription, vivid imagery, and ſtriking metaphors.

The College Life contains ſome animated, expreſſive, and harmonious lines. The livelineſs of the deſcription evinces a moſt vigorous imagination. The Hour Glaſs deſerves every praiſe. The morality and the poetry are equally conſpicuous. His tranſlations from Strada, Claudian, and Virgil, are, in general, claſſical and ſpirited, and remarkable for the harmony and elegance of the verſe. His Feſtum Luſtrale ſhews what a maſter he was of the Latin language. The deſcription is lively, humorous, and juſt. Of his amatory, humourous and occaſional pieces, the poetical merit is much beyond his years; but they are ſcarcely to be inſpected with all the ſeverity of criticiſm. Conſiderable allowances are to be made for the exerciſes of a ſchool-boy, for the incorrect effuſions of momentary paſſion; for a few lines thrown together to pleaſe a female, or to amuſe a ſchool-fellow; and perhaps not leſs for the haſty and involuntary productions of indigence and neceſſity, calculated for the ſole purpoſe of procuring a ſubſiſtence.

"He had an uncommon genius," ſays Mr. Webber, "for Engliſh poetry, and he was ſo taken with it, as to be negligent of other arts of learning, even of ſuch as muſt be neceſſary for the compoſition of a good poet.

"It is too late now to ſay, that I wiſh he had behaved ſo, as to tarry longer where he was, giving the world now and then a ſpecimen of what they might hope from him in time, and then have launched forth, as his judgment, when more mature, ſhould direct him."

The life of Pattiſon, whoſe talents raiſed him high in the opinion of his intimate acquaintance and friends, but failed to procure him the comforts or even the neceſſaries of life, cannot conclude more properly than in the emphatic words of Dr. Johnſon, which the writer of this narrative wiſhes were written in letters of adamant, on the heart of every man of genius in the world.

"Thoſe who, in confidence of ſuperior capacities or attainments, diſregard the common maxims of life, ſhould remember, that nothing can atone for the want of prudence; that negligence and irregularity long continued, will make knowledge uſeleſs, wit ridiculous, and genius contemptible."

DEDICATION.

TO THE EARL OF PETERBOROW.

My Lord,

As the Laurel and the Myrtle, are the undoubted trophies of your worth, the Bays is always ſure of finding your protection.

And when your Lordſhip is aſſured, that, the author of theſe poems deſired they might be placed next to thoſe of his dear friend Mr. Harte, it is but fulfilling his requeſt to aſk this favour, which, it is hoped, will not be denied by your Lordſhip.

If poſterity can be told he had the honour to pleaſe a Mordaunt, the remainder of his papers ſhall ſpeedily be offered up at the ſhrine of merit; if otherwiſe, warned by the fate of their predeceſſors, it is reſolved that, with their author, they ſhall reſt in peace.

I am,

Your Lordſhip's

Moſt obedient

Humble ſervant,

LUCASIA

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

ODE.

To John Tufton, Esq. Nephew to the Earl of Thanet.

Nor heaps of gold nor monuments as high
As the ambition of the great,
Can buy one moment tow'rds eternity,
Or change the fix'd decrees of fate;
'Tis verſe alone can give a name,
And crown our actions with eternal fame:
Thus mighty Cæſar's triumphs live,
Not in his monuments, but thoſe his poets give.

In fields of death, the bleeding warriors toil,
And brave the loudeſt ſtorms of fate;
They die to make eternal fame their ſpoil,
And pawn their life for being great:
To virtue, verſe this fame can give,
Virtue by verſe, by virtue poets live;
For her they tune their numbers high;
For virtue is the burning glaſs of poetry.

But, ah! where does this heavenly goddeſs dwell?
Where does her bleſſed ſeat remain?
We ſearch the palace, and the hermit's cell,
We ſearch, but ſearch, alas, in vain!
Gold is the load-ſtone of the great,
And vulgar ſouls muſt catch the glitt'ring bait;
The ſcale of juſtice ſinks with gold,
And impious bribes to win the cauſe, muſt damn the ſoul.

In Tufton, muſe behold the deity,
With him begin to grace your ſong;
All that is great, and good in him, you ſee,
To him your voice, and lyre, belong;
He rais'd you from a low degree,
Then let your numbers raiſe him to the ſky;
Offer what gifts the muſe can give,
He gave you fame, then make his fame to live.

But, ah, my muſe, your colours are too faint,
Your ſtrength too weak, your theme too great,
Alas in vain, your pencil ſtrives to paint,
What mortal cannot imitate:
But if he ſmile, then ſtretch your wing,
And tune his praiſes on a bolder ſtring;
Then ev'ry tongue ſhall ſpeak his fame,
And critics ſpare my verſe, protected with his name

Thus gold at firſt, is but a ſluggiſh maſs,
Whilſt it lies cover'd in the earth;
But when 'tis coin'd, the awful monarch's face
Makes it a god, and gives it birth;
The world the ſudden god adore,
And humbly own his univerſal power;
Sceptres and kings are in his hand,
And nature reverences his ſupreme command.

To my School-Fellow, Mr. William Pattiſon, upon his Departure from Appleby School.

Lend me thy muſe, thy merits to proclaim,
And give thy worth its juſt intrinſic fame;
My muſe too humble, and my lays too ſlow,
My wings too ſlender, and my verſe too low.
To me a while, my friend, thy muſe impart,
Grief chills my vigour, and diſarms my heart;
Thy verſe alone can tell thy boundleſs praiſe,
Thy lays alone are worthy of thy lays.

Say, never-dying, ever tuneful nine,
How oft the bard attended at your ſhrine,
How oft he rais'd the voice, and tun'd the ſtring,
How oft he ſung your fame,—how oft ſhall ſing.

Ye verdant trees, that in green order rear
Your waving treſſes in the fluid air;
In a more formidable proſpect ſtand,
With nodding foilage on poetic land.
Ye purling ſtreams, that run by Cowley's ſide,
Have learn'd, by him, in ſmoother feet to glide;
His verſe diſcover'd Hederinda's ſhade,
With age and ivy, memorable made:
The rock affords her never-dying bays,
To crown her poet with immortal praiſe.

Your lovely Laura's name ſhall never die,
But live coeval with eternity.
Venus, and all the goddeſſes around,
Dreſt in your verſe, with ſurer light'nings wound
The little loves, and ſmiles in numbers roll,
And Cupid's arrows ſteal upon the ſoul.

But now no more the Naïads prattling play,
But in ſoft ſilence ſlumber out the day;
Cupid's full quiver, and the court of love,
The chequer'd ſcene of Hederinda's grove,
No more, alas! its wonted joy diſplays,
He's gone, that dreſs'd them in viviſic lays:
He's gone—in Homer no delights abound,
No ſweet variety in Virgil's found,
Nor muſic which can heal a lover's wound!
Sorrow, like the priſmatic glaſs does ſhow
One undiſtinguiſh'd ſpectacle of woe;

His preſence ev'ry ſweeteſt joy improv'd
Still lov'd, and honour'd, by the muſe he lov'd.

YARICO TO INKLE:

AN EPISTLE.

DEAR, faithleſs man! if e'er that cruel breaſt
Love's pleaſing toys, and ſoft delights, confeſt;
Diſtreſs like mine, may ſure thy pity move,
For tender pity is the child of love!
But can compaſſion from thy boſom flow?
Source of my wrongs, and fountain of my woe!
Wilt thou repentant, ſoften at my grief,
Melt at my tears, and lend a late relief!
What have I done? ah! how deſerv'd thy hate?
Or was this vengeance treaſur'd up by fate?
Then will I mourn my fate's ſevere decree,
Nor charge a guilt ſo black, ſo baſe on thee;
For O! I know, ah no! I knew, thy mind
Soft as the dove, and as the turtle kind;
How have I ſeen thy gentle boſom move,
And heave, contagious, to ſome tale of love!
How have I heard thee paint the faithfull'ſt pair,
Deſcribe their bliſs, and e'en their raptures ſhare!
Then have thy lips, with ſweet tranſition ſwore
Thy love more laſting, and thy paſſion more!

And what, is truth, if ſigns like theſe deceive!
Signs! that might win the warieſt to believe.

THE COLLEGE LIFE.

TO A FRIEND.

Sid. Coll. Cantab. March 15. 1724-5.

SIR,
FROM ſacred ſhades, and academic groves,
Where, loſt in thought, a muſing fancy roves;
What kind endearing numbers ſhall I ſend,
To meet the critic in the fondling friend?

Here learned ſolitudes ſalute our eyes,
And the gay ſcenes in real raptures riſe;
Through claſſic ſhades majeſtic domes aſpire,
And dimly from the piercing eye retire.
Deep through the groves old Cam ſerenely flows,
Free from the prattling Naiads babbling noiſe.
His nymphs in gentle ſilence move along,
And hear their murmurs in ſome ſoft'ning ſong;
Till by the forcing torrent borne away,
They mourn becauſe they can no longer ſtay:
Poetic hills the wide horizon bound,
And wall the learned paradiſe around.

But yet—though all things with my ſoul agree,
Pall'd are my joys, and taſteleſs without thee;
Theſe viſionary pleaſures but renew
The real happineſs I found in you;
Where venerable Cowley's ſacred ſhade
The ſweeteſt ſcene of ſolitude is made;
When ſtretch'd at eaſe, amuſingly we lay,
How tuneſully the minutes danc'd away.

Oh! ſoothe me, fancy, with ſome pleaſing dream,
And gently waft me to Ituna's ſtream—
Hark! the ſoft, balmy, breathing breezes blow—
Hark! Hederinda's warbling murmurs flow—
Here oft I left the buſy world behind,
And found the better part, in you refin'd.

But would you know how I divide my time,
Betwixt my ſtudies, buſineſs, and my rhyme?

Wak'd, by the promiſe of a day, we riſe,
And with our ſouls ſalute the dawning ſkies;
All ſummon'd, to devotion's ſane repair,
And pioufly begin the day with prayer;
Thence, led by reaſon's glimmering light, deſcry
The dark receſſes of philoſophy;
Through claſſic groves the wily wanton trace,
And logically urge the puzzling chaſe.

But when the ſounds of the preſaging bell
Noon's pleaſurable invitation tell;
Moods, methods, figures, ſwim before my ſight,
And ſyllogiſms wing their airy flight.
Confus'd the fairy viſion flits away—
And no ideas, but of dinner, ſtay.

Thus, fabled hags, at midnight's ſolemn noon,
With magic ſpells enchant the labouring moon;
But when the cock proclaims the ſpringing light,
Each horrid phantom diſappears in night.

Now, thoſe, whom recreating toils invite,
Pour'd on the plain, indulge their lov'd delight;
Now flies aloft in air the whirling ball,
Anxious, the learned rabble wait its fall;
Purſu'd by wafting caps the fury flies,
Riſes in height, and leſſens in the ſkies.

Thus healthfully refreſh'd, we leave the plain,
For pleaſure oft repeated, is but pain.
Next we ſurvey the vaſt capacious ball,
And take long journies o'er the learned wall:
Or from her tender birth Britannia trace,
And all her glories center'd in great Brunſwick's race.
The dark original of time renew,
And bring three thouſand wond'ring years to view.

Now to the muſes ſoft retirements fly,
Or ſoar with Milton, or with Waller ſigh;
Each fav'rite bard o'erpays my curious view,
For who can fail to pleaſe who charms like you.

To find us thus, Apollo takes his way,
To ſooth the ſultry labours of the day;
The tuneful muſes charm his liſt'ning ears,
And in ſoft ſounds he bears away his cares.

Thus, deareſt Florio, thus my faithful friend,
In learned luxury my time I ſpend;
Till length'ning ſhades the ſetting ſun diſplay,
And falling dews lament the falling day:
Then, loſt in thought, where aged Cam divides
Thoſe verdant groves that paint his azure tides,
With muſing pleaſure I reflect around,
And ſtand inchanted on poetic ground.
Straight to my glancing thought thoſe bards appear,
That fill'd the world with fame, and charm'd us here:
Here Spenſer, Cowley, and that awful name
Of mighty Milton, flouriſh'd into fame;
From theſe amuſing groves, his copious mind,
The blooming ſhades of paradiſe deſign'd.
In theſe retirements, Dryden fann'd his fire,
And gentle Waller tun'd his tender lyre;

Hail! happy bards, whilſt thus I think I hear
Your tuneful melody improve my ear,
With rev'rence I approach each ſacred ſhade,
Perhaps by your creating numbers made.
Deluſion helps my fancy as I walk,
Hears waters murmur, and ſoft echoes talk;
Through the dim ſhade its ſacred poet ſees,
Or hears his muſic in the waſted breeze.

Here Locke and Newton through the world were known,
And made unravell'd nature's works their own;
Too ſoon we loſt thoſe fav'rites of the ſky,
Yet, Florio may the double loſs ſupply.
Haſte, then, my friend, nor let me mourn your ſtay,
Lo! the world ſuffers by your long delay—
Let proſp'rous fortune on your will attend,
And in your happy wiſhes bleſs your friend.

THE JEALOUS SHEPHERD:

A PASTORAL.

It happen'd once upon a ſummer's day,
When lads and laſſes go to making hay;
The weary mowers laid themſelves adown,
To take a bottle and a nap at noon;
When Bootyſlub (for ſo was call'd the ſwain
That languiſh'd under Dorothy's diſdain)
While others ſlept, by love was kept awake,
To mourn his fate, and mend his Dolly's rake.

Dolt as I am, (complains the love-ſick lout)
Not to conſider what I am about?
Here I employ my little ſtock of art,
But who, alas! ſhall mend my broken heart?
None can that work perform but Dorothy,
And that will ne'er be done by cruelty;
For ſtill ſhe perſecutes me with diſdain,
Laughs at my woes, and banters all my pain.

Ah, Dolly! Dolly! can you be ſo dull,
To leave your lover for a fopiſh fool?
A butterfly the cabbages deſtroys,
On you a butterfly his breath employs—
I ſay no more—my meaning you may gueſs—
Perhaps you had been pleas'd, had I ſaid leſs.

But yet there was a time, or elſe I dream'd,
When Bootyſlub in your good graces ſeem'd;
Then, if you knew I kiſs'd a laſs at town,
How have I ſeen you pout, and fret, and frown?
Nay, once you told me, that I need not roam,
For charity ſhould ſtill begin at home.
Theſe jealous hints, or I miſtake them, prove
The greateſt and the ſureſt ſigns of love;
Yet, if you lov'd, methinks you cou'd not be
So kind to Floripert, ſo croſs to me.

Remember, how, to jealouſy betray'd,
You ſcolded at the parſon's pretty maid;
When with inquiring looks you paſs'd the houſe,
And catch'd me keeping up the damſel's cows;
Your ſcornful eyes with jealous fury burn'd,
On her they glanc'd, and then on me they turn'd;
I took the hint, and fear'd what might enſue,
So ſtooping, ſeem'd to buckle up my ſhoe,
Then left the laſs, and ſneak'd away to you.

Alas! alas! that I your love believ'd!
I lov'd, and in my turn am thus deceiv'd,
Nor dare I of my cruel fate complain,
Or, if I do, alas! 'tis all in vain.
For ever curſt be that deteſted day,
When from the laſt May-fair we took our way,
Remember how you forg'd a falſe excuſe
Your eaſy natur'd lover to abuſe.
No fondling father call'd you back again,
A better reaſon! 'twas your fondling ſwain;
And if I meet him e'er alone, I vow,
I'll ſurely beat the puppy black and blue.
I mark'd the watchful coxcomb all the day,
And kept him from his meditated prey;
Invited him to exerciſe the ball,
And bravely give, or bravely ward a fall:
So ſhould we both our pleading merits ſhow,
And you, though blind, the difference might know!
But all I urg'd, I urg'd alas! in vain,
Nor would he glory give, nor could he gain.

Ah, Dolly! Dolly! where were all your vows,
When cheeſe-cakes lur'd you to the tavern-houſe;
Your vows were as your cheeſe-cakes ſweet, yet weak!
And can you both alike together break?
But if you do ſo—you, with equal eaſe, [pleaſe.
Can make new vows, and cheeſe-cakes when you

And could you then your Bootyſlub forget,
And in another's lap ſo kindly ſit?
Around his neck your fondling arms you flung,
And learn'd the ſilly catches which he ſung.
Whilſt unconcern'd at home you hear me ſing,
Or tunefully torment the roſin'd ſtring;
Your favour every way I try to gain,
But dance, or fiddle; ſing, or pipe; in vain.

Oh learn at laſt a flatterer to hate,
And think on Suſan Silly's cruel fate:
Her pride poor honeſt Hobbinol deſpis'd,
And vainly Tommy Taudry's folly priz'd.
But now, too late, ſhe ſees herſelf undone,
Her portion ſquander'd, and her honour gone—
What better canſt thou hope from ſuch a flame,
But love refuſes what my rage would name.

How chang'd is Dolly now, from what ſhe was
When firſt—Ah, had I never ſpy'd the laſs!
The very time I perfectly can tell,
For love remembers every thing too well!

Sure, I can ne'er forget the Sunday morn,
Though from her mem'ry ſo ſoon 'tis worn:
A goodly bible in my hand I took,
And very gravely thought to read my book;
When through the window, by a luckleſs chance,
Heedleſs, I caſt a cuſtomary glance;
'Twas there I ſaw the pretty Dolly walk,
Fair, and upright as roſes on their ſtalk:
So trimly was the tidy damſel dreſs'd,
That, ſpite of all the flowers, ſhe ſeem'd the beſt.
Sometimes to ſmell a pretty roſe ſhe ſtopp'd,
Pleas'd with the ſmell, the pretty roſe ſhe cropp'd;
Then in her ſnowy breaſt the fav'rite plac'd,
Her ſweeter breaſt the bluſhing fav'rite grac'd;
But then! how did I wiſh myſelf between
Her ſwelling boſom, and the flower, unſeen!

But as I wiſh'd, I found a pleaſing ſmart,
I know not how, begin to melt my heart:
Nay, all my limbs with ſuch a ſhiv'ring ſhook,
That I the chillneſs for an ague took.
Ah, had it been one, I had felt leſs harm,
For I can cure an ague with a charm!
Now, all my ſpells and charms but trifles prove,
Far ſtronger are the magic charms of love.

But when I found ſhe ſmil'd to ſee me look,
I pleas'd as well, ſoon laid aſide my book,
And, boldly blithſome, to the garden went,
Where ſhe, as well as I, knew what I meant,
Yet ſeemingly my ſearching ſight to ſhun,
Behind an apple-tree the gipſy run;
But ſoon I found the amorous deceit,
And forc'd a kiſs, to reconcile the cheat.
But forc'd it ſo, that when ſhe ſeem'd to ſtrive
To keep it moſt, the more ſhe ſeem'd to give.
Remember then, my lovely faithleſs maid,
What oaths, what vows, what promiſes, you made;
Think for your own, if not your lover's ſake,
How bad it is a binding oath to break.

But while I thus theſe ſilly tales repeat,
I find myſelf already in a ſweat:
What ſhall I do, too well ſhe knows my love,
And her coy coldneſs does the ſcorner prove.

Well then—when ſhadows length'ning o'er the vale,
Call forth the milk-maid, with her cleanly pail,
To my old ſweat-heart Cicily will I go,
And more than all my former kindneſs ſhow;
Conduct the girl along the crowded mead,
And to teaze Dolly, through the paſture lead;
Perhaps I'll whiſper out-ſome ſecret place,
And kiſs her too before her jealous face;
Then let her rival cry, and frown, and fret,
And in my cruelty her own forget.
Then let her be as much, or more afraid
Of Cicily, than ſhe was the parſon's maid.
So ſhall my ſcorn, and counterfeit diſdain
Revive her love, if any love remain.

TO MR. JOHN SAUNDERS,

Occaſioned by a ſight of ſome of his Paintings at Cambridge.

When nature, from her unexhauſted mine,
Reſolves to make ſome mighty ſcience ſhine;
Her embryo ſeeds inform the future birth
Improve the ſoul, and animate the earth;
From thence, an Homer, or Apelles, riſe,
A Shakſpeare, or a Saunders, ſtrike our eyes;
And, lo! the promis'd wonder charms my view,
The old Apelles rivall'd in the new!
See! like the ſun, his beams their pow'r diſcloſe,
Like him, he paints his progreſs, as he goes;
Renews the opening ſpring's enlivening dye,
Or bids rich autumn ripen to the eye.

Let ſome, elaborately vain, impart
The cold effects of induſtry, and art,
The warmer draughts deſerve a nobler name,
Nature's thy art, as nature is thy theme,
Taught by thy touch, the lily fairer blows,
A ſofter damaſk bluſhes in the roſe,
And a more gay creation from thy pencil flows.
Nor flowers, nor fruits alone, improv'd we ſee,
But beauty owes her empire half to thee:
How bloom Belinda's never-fading charms!
How, in thy paint, the fair perfection warms!
What pure vermillion tinctures every grace!
How all the goddeſs brightens in her face!
The mimic rolling eye, now ſeems to move,
Dawns into life, and kindles into love;
Struck, at each look, a captive of thy art,
I ſigh! and fancy arrows in my heart:
Confounded at thy nice creative hand, [ſtand.
Think the draught lives, and, like ſome picture,

Would thus each nymph, with providential care,
Enſure her charms, and ſhine for ever fair,
How might ſhe brave the dire, deteſted rage,
Of ſpleen, ſmall-pox, or all-devouring age!
Then, when ~~old time~~ ſhould bid the roſes die,
Pale the red pouting lip and dim the ſparkling eye;
Then might the fair a bright reverſion ſave,
Bloom in her death, and triumph in her grave:
Then Cælia, ſpight of that bewitching frown,
Would ſee thy paint more laſting than her own.

But lo! more glorious aims thy hand purſues,
More glorious ſcenes attract the raviſh'd muſe:
Silent I ſtand, and, loſt in wonder ſee,
A godhead ſhrouded in mortality!
What majeſty eclips'd the ſhades diſplay!
How the light kindles with eternal day!
What beams of love! what pitying tears are ſeen!
Meltingly ſad, yet ſolemnly ſerene!

O happy artiſt! live for ever bleſt! [thy breaſt?
Whence dawn'd this heaven-ſprung image in
Sure ſome kind angel, ſtudious in thy art,
Ting'd the bright dyes, and quicken'd every part;
Hence, like their great original they ſhine,
Appear as human, but are all divine!
What may not now thy lively touch command?
What may not owe new glories to thy hand?
Thy wond'rous hand not only nature drew,
But copied ev'n the Lord of Nature too.

TO MR. SAUNDERS,

Occaſioned by the breaking of the Glaſs of Mr. Euſden's Picture.

Oft have I thought thy wonder-working art,
Could more than nature's outward form impart,
But now my eyes convinc'd the truth believe,
For lo! the picture more than ſeems to live,
Pleas'd to decide miſtruſting reaſon's ſtrife,
Breaks through the glaſs, and ſtartles into life.

BURLESQUE.

Dear Hulse,

When Ovid in his exile wrote,
Low was his verſe, and barren was his thought;
My caſe is juſt the ſame, and for to mock it,
The muſe keeps equal tenor with my pocket;
And for th' aſſurance of a moderate poet,
I think theſe lines are proof enough to ſhow it.

Reſt that, howe'er, as 'twill—can I be-ſong ye,
So as to get a little caſh among ye;
This week, by carrier Haſwel, you may ſend it,
And, may the gods that guard the roads defend it!
With that inſpir'd, a gorgeous ſword I'll buy me,
And, plum'd with hopes, to good Sir Robert hie me.
Preſent myſelf with this new-modell'd trifle,
Which, ſhould he chance to like, I'll lay my life, he'll
Make every wiſh, a bard can frame, ſucceed,
And then my muſe, and I, are made indeed! [me,
But ſtay—One word forgot—with love commend
To all ſuch honeſt fellows as befriend me
With their ſubſcriptions—But I cannot on
For rhyme—And ſo excuſe your Pattiſon.

P. S. Septemb. the twenty-fifth, or twenty-ſixth
As to my lodging, for à date, t'en't fix'd.

A SESSION OF THE CAMBRIDGE POETS.

By a vacant preferment Apollo thought fit
To ſettle the bays, and eſtabliſh a wit,
For his truſty friend Roche, by much merit and grace,
Had obtain'd in Elyſium the laureat's place;
Accordingly, to the fam'd borders of Cam,
Deſcended the god, with a goddeſs hight fame,
The figure ſhe wore, as Dan Virgil declares,
Was illumin'd with eyes, and becluſter'd with ears,
(And faith, as you'll find, ſhe had of them all,
To pick one good poet, and hear ev'ry call,)
A trumpet ſhe blew, for a trumpet ſhe bore,
As the laudable cuſtom informs us of yore.
Thick as bees, when they ſwarm to the tinkling braſs,
The bards flock around her, and darken the place;
Each pretender, for ſuch was Apollo's command,
Brought his works, and conducted his muſe in his hand:
But, good Lord! how his godſhip at firſt was amaz'd,
To find the chaſte nine to ſuch numbers were rais'd?
However, to baniſh immodeſt ſuſpicions,
He order'd a ſilence, and heard the petitions.

B——ll * firſt, as the candidates joſtled along,
With a gate moſt affected, emerg'd from the throng.
Apollo obſerv'd ſomewhat odd in his look,
And, giving a beck, thus the goddeſs beſpoke:
Pr'thee, what's that fame fellow? Some half-witted beau?
I don't know as ever I've ſeen him till now ——
Nor can I remember, I think, replies Fame,
To have heard of his worth, or ſo much as his name:
But odds, I will lay, by thoſe papers there brought,
'Tis the ſame, who the place in the Memoirs has bought—— *
Say you ſo, cries Apollo, and is he ſo vain?
Yet pſhaw; 'tis the only place that he can gain.
The bard now elate with ambition appear'd,
Propos'd his pretence, and deſir'd to be heard;
When Apollo ſtraight bid him his labours produce,
And, for his authority, bring him his muſe.
More haſty, than wiſely, the labours were ſhown,
But, alas! for the muſe, the fly gipſy was flown,
For her birth it was mortal, nor could her feign'd power
Stand the teſt of the godhead ſhe mimick'd before;
O'eraw'd by the deity no longer could ſtay,
But, like Spenſer's falſe Florimel, faded away!

De V——l in the tumult ran bawling aloud,
And ſwore that he ought to be heard by the god,
And heard too he was, for the god cut him ſhort,
And aſk'd what pretenſions could draw him to court!
What pretenſion! cries he; but the godhead replies,
Before you are witty, pray learn to be wiſe,
And if, as they ſay, you are lunatic grown,
For I hear you converſe with my ſiſter the moon,
In ſecret confinement, a purge or two try,
And let your own eſſay bum-fodder ſupply.

Next Ch——y roll'd onward, a bard of renown,
For bulk and bombaſt ſuper-eminent grown,
Of lampoons and Pindarics huge bundles he brought,
But the burden was light, becauſe barren of thought,
From railing at friends, falſely ſmiling he came,
Detraction his pleaſure, ambition his aim.
But Apollo ſoon knew him, notwithſtanding all art,
For your gods, at firſt ſight, can diſcover the heart.
And told him, that pride, and inhuman backbitings,
Were the worſt of all evils,—except his own writings;
Ay, I ſee, cries the god, I ſee your excuſe—
But hang it, that's nothing in ſhape of a muſe!—
I ſuppoſe that it's term'd, by you mortals here, ſature.
But we gods have thought fit to bename it ill-na-
Beſides ſuch a bulk, for high flights was ne'er made well——
And I mortally hate the remembrance of Shadwell.

Little R——th took the hint, and right archly declar'd,
That if body diminutive diſtinguiſh'd the bard,
Then his cauſe it was juſt,—but to humour the joke,
With an affable air, thus the deity ſpoke:
And told him, he could not heroics right ſuit,
For his body, at full length, was ſcarce more than one foot.

Ho, Ward! cries the god, as he ſaw him ſtand by,
Come forward a little, and don't be ſo ſhy—
I know you are modeſt; but harkee between us,
Here, look ye this token, 'twas ſent you by Venus—
For her ladyſhip told me, ſome few days ago,
She came down in the form of a nymph † that you know,

* A junior bachelor of Trinity-College, who, in a tranſlation of a poem printed in the Univerſity, at his own coſt, impertinently begged pardon for the word emerged in its proper ſenſe.

* It is credibly reported, that he gave a certain ſum for the mention of his performances in the memoirs of literature.

† Mrs. F—er.

And, pleas'd with a copy or two of your verſes,
Preſents you this myrtle—'twas wreath'd by the graces—
Here, take't,—'tis as good as my laureat's place is.

Hulſe next he beheld with poetical rage,
And told him, 'twas pity he was not at age;
Nor mind, cries the god, thoſe dull fools, that deſire to Eclipſe that bright merit—they ne'er can aſpire to;
Juſt ſo, in a morning, I ſee, as I riſe
Black fogs, and dull vapours uſurping my ſkies—
But two dramatiſts here, the mere ſcum of the gang,
Broke the ſimile ſhort, and began to harangue;
Four acts of a play, cries the one I have writ,
And had I a plot, then the work were complete;
My characters—go, cries the god, ſcribbling elf,
And learn firſt to get thee a good one thyſelf.

As Pattiſon ſtood unconcern'd in the crowd,
Apollo beheld him, and call'd him aloud;
Declaring his manners, though perhaps not his wit,
His identical ſelf to a nicety hit;
Alike their employments, alike their delight,
Both rambled all day, and both tippled all night;
Both us'd the ſame haunts, both purſu'd the like game,
And Laura and Thetis but differ'd in name.
Now the bard, without doubt, the reaſon acquir'd,
But Woman and Fate, both againſt him conſpir'd,
For, unhappily! juſt as he drew up more nigh,
A pretty tight damſel came tripping it by;
No longer the laurel attracted his eyes,
They were fix'd on a far more deſirable prize—
His highneſs he thank'd; but reſigning his lays,
Declar'd, that a nymph was far better than bays.

Apollo now, tir'd with debates and confuſion,
Was glad to draw his affairs to concluſion,
And, ſick at the numbers ſtill ſwarming around,
Thrice Tayr he call'd, but no Tayr was found:
Not here? (cries the god) oh! I gueſs at his ſtay—
He ſtole a few poems of mine t'other day---
But, however, I forgive him the cunning device,
And, ſince his are my labours, be his too my prize.

1725-6.

ROSAMOND TO HENRY:

AN EPISTLE.

Qualis populeâ mærens Philomela ſub Umbrâ
Flet Noctem ramoque ſedens, miſerabile Carmen
Integrat, et mœſtis latè Loca Queſtibus implet.
VIRG. Georg.

FROM theſe lone ſhades, and ever-gloomy bowers,
Once the dear-ſhade of Henry's ſofter hours!
What tender ſtrains of paſſion can impart
The pangs of abſence to an amorous heart!
Far, far too faint the powers of language prove,
Language that ſlow interpreter of love!
Souls pair'd like ours, like ours to union wrought,
Converſe by ſilent ſympathy of thought;
O then, by that myſterious art, divine
The wild impatience of my breaſt, by thine!
And to conceive what I would ſay to thee,
Conceive, my love, what thou would'ſt ſay to me!

As in the tenderneſs of ſoul I ſigh,
Methinks I hear thy tender ſoul reply;
And as in thought, o'er heaps of heroes ſlain,
I trace thy progreſs on the fatal plain,
Perhaps thy thought explores me through the grove,
And, ſoft'ning, ſteals an interval of love.
In the deep covert of a bow'ring ſhade
Deſcribes my poſture, languiſhingly laid!
Now, ſadly ſolac'd with the murm'ring ſprings,
Now, melting into tears, the ſofteſt things!
And how the feign'd ideas all agree!
So bowers the ſhade, ſo melt my tears for thee!
Here, as in Eden, once we bliſsful lay:
How oft night ſtole, unheeded, on the day!
Our ſoft-breath'd raptures charm'd the liſtening grove,
And all was harmony, for all was love!

But hark! the trumpet ſounds! ſee diſcords riſe!
'Tis honour calls; from me my Henry flies!
Honour, to him, more bright than Roſamonda's eyes!
Not thus my honour with his paſſion ſtrove,
His ſighs I pity, and indulg'd his love:
He then cry'd, honour was an empty name,
And love a ſweeter recompence than fame.

Oh! had I liv'd in ſome obſcure retreat,
Securely fair, and innocently ſweet;
How had I bleſs'd ſomé humble ſhepherd's arms!
How kept my fame as ſpotleſs as my charms!
Then, hadſt thou ne'er beheld theſe eyes of mine,
Nor they bewail'd the fatal power of thine!
Dear fatal power! to me for ever dear---
Fix'd in my tender breaſt, and rooted there!
For ever in my tender breaſt remain---
And be for ever a delightful pain!

With what ſurpriſe thoſe glories firſt I view'd,
That in one moment my whole heart ſubdu'd!
With ſuch reſiſtleſs beams, ſo fierce they ſhone,
Not ſuch the dazzling radiance of thy crown!
Sent from thy crown I never felt a dart;
The lover, not the monarch, won my heart:
Nor e'er the monarch with ſuch charms appears,
As when the lovers ſoften'd dreſs he wears:
As when he, ſilent, deigns my breaſt to ſeek,
And looks ſuch language, as no tongue can ſpeak.

Whene'er my crimes (if love a crime can be,
If 'tis a crime to live, and die for thee!)
In hideous forms ariſe, and cloud my ſoul,
One thought on Henry can that gloom controul:
No more my breaſt alternate paſſions move,
The froſts of honour melt before the fires of love.

Again, I muſt repeat that fatal hour, [bower;
Which ſnatch'd my Henry from his Woodſtock
When mad Bellona, with tumult'ous cries,
The hero rous'd, and drown'd the lover's ſighs.
Stretch'd on my downy couch, at eaſe I lay,
And ſought by reading to beguile the day;
With am'rous ſtrains I ſooth'd a grateful fire,
And all the woman glow'd with ſoft deſire.

Till, as I wiſh'd, I heard the vocal breeze,
Proclaim my Henry ruſtling through the trees;
O'erjoy'd, I ran to meet thy longing arms,
And taſte a dear remembrance of thy charms;
But ſoon I ſaw ſome ſad conceal'd ſurpriſe,
Fade on thy cheeks, and languiſh on thy eyes;
Through each diſſembled ſmile, a ſorrow ſtole,
And whiſper'd out the ſecret of thy ſoul.
What this could mean, uncertain to divine.
No fault I knew, yet fear'd ſome fault was mine.
But ſoon thy love diſpell'd thoſe airy fears,
Diſpell'd alas!---but brought too ſolid cares.
For as with hands, entwin'd in hands, we walk'd,
Of love, and hapleſs lovers, ſtill thou talk'd:
Thy tears of pity anſwer'd each ſad moan,
And in their ſeeming mis'ries, wept thy own.
"I cannot leave her!"---I o'erheard thee ſay,---
Pierc'd to the ſoul, I ſunk, and dy'd away.
What art reſtor'd me, thou alone can'ſt tell,
For thy kind arms embrac'd me, as I fell.
My opening eyes, fix'd on thy beauties, hung,
And my ears drunk the cordial of thy tongue.
Again my thoughts return with killing pain,
Within thy arms I ſink, and ſwoon again:
Again thou doſt my ſweet phyſician prove,
From death to life alternately I move,
Now dead by anguiſh, now reviv'd by love.
But when, without diſguiſe, truth I found,
My agonizing ſorrows knew no bound:
My locks I tore, then, all entranc'd, I lay,
Till by degrees my grief to words gave way,
And ſoft I cry'd,---Oh! ſtay, my Henry, ſtay.
One moment more! add yet, and yet, a kiſs!---
Oh! give me thine, and take my ſoul in this!
Farewell!---perhaps, farewell for ever!---oh!
Who can ſuſtain ſo dire a weight of woe?

Ah, wretched maid! alas, a maid no more!
No hero's that ſpotleſs title can reſtore!
Ah, who ſhall now protect thy injur'd fame?
Who ſhield thy weakneſs from th' aſſaults of ſhame?
Who lull thy anxious ſoul to balmy reſt,
If Henry, deareſt Henry, flies thy breaſt?

Yet, though he flies, your wings, ye angels, ſpread,
And hover, guardians, o'er my Henry's head,
Who knows but this kind pray'r is pour'd too late,
And he already ſtruggles with his fate?
Already, wounded, pants, and gaſps in death,
And Roſamonda is his lateſt breath?

Propitious Heaven! vouchſafe a gracious ear!
Grant, theſe be only phantoms of my fear:
Heav'n ſtill is gracious, if true ſuppliants pray;
And lo!—the foul chimæras fleet away!
Tranſporting proſpects to my wiſhes riſe,
Beam on my ſoul, and brighten in my eyes!
He lives! he lives! I ſee his banner ſpread,
And laurels, wreath'd round the gay victor's head!
Ye winds! convey the news to Albion's floods!
Ye floods! reſound it to the joyous woods!
Ye joyous woods! your tuneful choirs prepare
To hail my hero from the toils of war!

Deluſive ſcenes! too beautiful to ſtay!
They fade in viſionary ſtreaks away.

Alas! no lovely Henry now is nigh!
His genius took his form to ſoothe my eye.
No more I ſeem his melting voice to hear!
Peace! babling fountains! nor abuſe my ear.
Ye flowers! ye ſtreams! ye gales, no longer move!
For ah! how ſtrong is fancy, join'd with love!

O! frail inconſtancy of mortal ſtate!
One hour dejected, and the next elate!
Rais'd by falſe hopes, or by falſe fears depreſt,
How different paſſions ſway the human breaſt!
Now ſmiling pleaſures, with fair charms, invite,
Now frowning horrors, with black trains, affright.
Future diſtruſts the preſent joys controul,
And fancy triumphs o'er the reas'ning ſoul.

As mid the trees I ſolitary rove,
The trees awake ſome image of my love:
Where'er their arms in am'rous foldings join,
My longing arms I ſpread to fold in thine.
The beauteous flow'rs thy face reflected bear,
(If flow'rs in beauty may with thee compare),
Their wafted fragrancies thy breath inſpire,
And my ſoul kindles with ideal fire!
The thick-weav'd ſhades, and grove encircling grove,
Are emblems of th' eternity of love,
My bluſhing guilt the crimſon roſes paint,
And I, like roſes, unſupported faint:
Like their's my youthful charms (if charms) conſume,
For love, a cloſer canker, eats my bloom.

How bleſt might other nymphs ſurvey theſe ſcenes,
Fountains and ſhades, and hills, and flow'ry greens?
Proſpects on proſpects, might detain the ſight,
And ſtill variety give new delight.
But, I with thee, ſhould find in deſerts eaſe;
Without thee, not even Paradiſe could pleaſe.
Wilds, by thy preſence, gardens would appear,
Gardens are wilds ſince Henry is not here.
Let grottos ſink, or porticos ariſe?
Heedleſs I view them with unpleaſur'd eyes:
Their mantling umbrage cools the noon-day fire,
But what can cool a lover's fierce deſire?

In the deep boſom of a darkſome ſhade,
By baleful yew and mournful cypreſs made;
A widow turtle weeps her raviſh'd love,
And ſorrowfully ſolaces the grove,
Sometimes my paſſion I aloud diſcloſe;
The widow'd turtle, anſwering, cooes her woes.

Bred by my hand, my ſorrow's ſad relief,
A little linnet learns to ſigh my grief;
Taught by my voice, and by obedience tame,
The pretty liſper whiſtles Henry's name:
Perch'd on my head, the ſylvan ſyren ſings,
And tunes the harſher notes of gurgling ſprings.

Emboſom'd in a vale, thou know'ſt the ſhade,
Faſt by the murmurs of a ſoft caſcade;
There, while one night full beams of Cynthia play,
(Warm was the night) with wand'rings tir'd, I lay,
Till, by degrees, the falling waters clos'd
My eye-lids, and my weary'd limbs repos'd.
Sudden the fairy monarch I behold,
Near he approach'd, and thus my fate foretold:

'Twas the fame Oberon*, that once we faw
Circle the green, and give his dancers law.)

Unhappy nymph! thy beauty is thy crime,
And muſt ſuch beauty periſh in its prime!
No more great Henry ſhall enjoy theſe charms
Nor thou ill fated fair adorn his arms!
Cropt like an opening roſe thy fall I fear!
But riſe and ſupplicate the vengeance near.

Then (as methought) I wak'd with threaten'd woes
Emerging from thick ſhades, a phantom roſe.
One hand ſuſtain'd—a ſhort, but naked ſword,—
And one a golden bowl, with poiſon ſtor'd.
The jealous queen, the frowning form expreſs'd,
It ſpoke, and aim'd the dagger at my breaſt.

Ariſe! nor aſk thy crime—but chooſe thy fate,
Know prayers are vain—repentance is too late!
Vengeance is mine—Here, drink this poiſon'd
Or this keen dagger drinks thy guilty ſoul? [bowl,
It ceas'd: convulſions in my boſom ſtrove,
My curdling blood ſcarce in ſtiff tides could move.
Thrice I cry'd Henry, with a feeble ſound,
And thrice I ſtarted at the ſad rebound!
Ev'n echo now grew frightful: with ſurpriſe
Trembling I lay, nor dar'd t' unveil my eyes,
Till warbling birds proclaim'd the morning light,
And told me 'twas a viſion of the night;
Yet not the morn could chaſe my gloomy care,
But winds and trees, alarm'd my ſoul with fear;
While waving boughs, that in the ſun-beams play'd,
Seem'd to ſhow daggers in each pointed ſhade.

Why was I form'd with ſuch a coward mind?
The ſport of ſhadows, or a ruſtling wind!
Nerves, better ſtrung, did manly ſpirits warm,
Glad would I part with every female charm,
Then, cas'd in ſteel, the front of battle dare,
And, with great Henry, rouſe the ſoul of war!
This arm ſhall guard the hero from the foe,
Repel the ſtorm, or intercept the blow;
And ſhould my weakneſs in the warrior fail,
The ſoft-befeeching woman ſhould prevail;
For thee, I'll ſoothe each proud inſulting foe,
And melt him with petitionary wo;
With thee, in every hardy hazard join,
In dangers ſave thy life, to make it mine.
By night, compoſe thy haraſs'd ſoul to reſt,
And huſh it on the pillow of my breaſt;
With patient eyes eternal vigils keep,
And court good angels to protect thy ſleep.

Alas! in vain I urge my fruſtrate will,
I find myſelf a feeble woman ſtill;
The feeble woman to my breaſt returns,
For Henry's gone, and Roſamonda mourns!
O! ſee my eyes their ſtreaming anguiſh pour,
O! hear my ſighs increaſe the ſwelling ſhower;
What can I more than ſhed my tears and ſighs?
Poor woman's ſtrength alone in weakneſs lies?

But whether is ungovern'd fancy flown?
Thoughts of impoſſibilities he gone!
Guilt claims no miracles, nor heav'n conſpires
To aid my crimes, and fan my lawleſs fires.

Life irkſome grows; deteſted is the light,
And my ſoul dreads the viſions of the night.
Swift let me to ſome hallow'd convent go.—
Can I for ever Henry leave?—ah! no:—
But O loſt innocence!—I loſt a name:—
O honour!—broken is the bubble, fame.
Are my ſins monſtrous? Do invented crimes,
Alike unknown to paſt, or preſent times,
Demand red vengeance? Some peculiar curſe?—
Crowds ſtand recorded for the ſame,—or worſe.
Have I, unpitying, heard the poor complain,
Or ſeen the wretched weep, and weep in vain?
Have I my flame feign'd for a ſordid end?
E'er wrong'd a ſoe, or e'er betray'd a friend?
Not to my charge ſuch crimes has malice brought,
Love, only love, is my unbounded fault:
A fault, that ſure may heav'n to pity move,
Since half of heav'n ('tis ſaid) conſiſts in love.

Ah! fooliſh nymph!—Here, view the queen! the laws!—
But there, view Henry, as th' enchanting cauſe!
By ſuch a cauſe the prieſteſs would retire,
And quit the veſtal for a nobler fire.

I will again th' immortal powers implore;
Brave Henry for Britannia's ſake reſtore!
In him ſhe lives, to him her joys are due,
And only ſends her earlieſt thanks to you.
But oh! my lord, my darling lord, beware!
Tempt not too bold the dangers of the war!
Think, when thou ſeeſt the fate impelling dart,
O! think it aim'd at Roſamonda's heart!
Were but each breaſt as ſoft as mine! no more
Should tumults riſe, or martial thunders roar:
Heroes ſhould ſcorn the glories of the field,
And the fam'd laurel to the myrtle yield:
For ſweeter paſſions, ſweeter ſtrifes inſpire,
And love alone ſhould ſet the ſoul on fire.

May then theſe eyes in tears no longer mourn,
But cheerful hail their Henry's wiſh'd return!
O! ſwift, victorious, huſh the war's alarms!
Swift, if thy Roſamonda boaſts ſome charms,
Fly on the wings of love, and conqueſt to her arms!

October 20. 1725.

HENRY TO ROSAMOND:

AN EPISTLE.

SHALL then his beauteous Roſamonda mourn,
Nor Henry's ſoul the ſoft complaint return!
O ceaſe, my fair! I deeply feel thy ſmart,
And all thy ſorrows double in my heart:
Far from my breaſt, ye ſcenes of war! remove,
Far from my breaſt, be every ſcene but love;
Soft riſing thoughts as when, in Woodſtock-bowers,
Joyful, we lov'd away the laughing hours.

Now midnight-reſt relieves the ſoldier's care,
Huſh'd are the drums, and every voice of war;
Faint gleam the fires along the dewy field,
And faint the noiſe, that ſleeping courſers yield;
Yet love, the lordly tyrant of my breaſt,
Alarms my ſoul, and interrupts my reſt;
In vain a nation's cares the monarch move,
For ah! far greater is the monarch Love!

* King of the fairies.

Warm from my lips, thy tender letter lies,
And every word is magic to my eyes;
Weeping, I read, and hear thy soft-breath'd woes,
And all the warrior in the lover lose:
Then I by fancy vanish'd joys restore,
Feast on false love, and act past pleasures o'er.
Fancy can soothe my soul with pleasing dreams
While tented Galia, bowery Woodstock seems;
Led by delusive steps, in thought, I rove,
Through well known greens, and every winding grove.
There, haply on some flowery bank reclin'd
My sweet-reposing Rosamonda find;
When then (for then thy secret thoughts I see)
In pious slumbers breath'st thy soul to me;
Dissolv'd with joy, and feasting on thy charms,
I clasp thee in imaginary arms;
And then—ah then!—I seem sincerely blest—
Then only Rosamonda, knows the rest—

O glories! empires' crowns! how weak ye prove,
If thus out-rivalled by a dream of love!
O love! what toys thy real sweets bestow,
When ev'n their shadows can transport me so!
O bless ecstatic! blest relief from cares!
Thus let me lose my soul in softer wars!
By love's transporting sighs my sweet alarms,
Nor worlds, but Rosamonda crown my arms!
In her alone, my full desires agree,
Her charms are empires, glories, all to me!

THE HOUR GLASS.

As in my silent study late I sate,
Intent on poet's poor precarious state,
Around my sight a sudden dimness play'd,
And ting'd the taper with a blewy shade;
When to my eyes appear'd that watchful pow'r
Which measures out the sandy-streaming hour,
An human form the meagure phantom wore,
And on its brow a faded laurel bore,
On me were fix'd its looks, whilst thus it spoke,
And sounds like these the solemn silence broke.
" At length the time is come to tell a truth
" To thee, to thee alone, O fated youth!
" Then mark my story well—in happier days,
" Like thine my bosom panted after praise;
" For to the grave fatigues of life I strove
" To grow immortal in a myrtle grove:
" Lost there, I lavish'd out my little store,
" Destin'd to live poetically poor;
" What slender gains my labours brought I spent,
" And through the glass my luscious profit went;
" From thence, with fictious inspiration warm'd,
" A vain eternity's reversion charm'd;
" My fate I bless'd---for future fame reserv'd!
" For that I glory'd!---and for that I---starv'd!
" Thence by some powerful transmigration turn'd,
" In these repentant streams my folly mourn'd:
" Here, as you see, my fleeting minutes pass,
" Still, as of old, devoted to the glass.
" As once too humble for proud rooms of state,
" In homely cottages I seek my fate,
" And find my vast poetic promis'd land
" All dwindled to this little barren sand;
" With which advise, ye youthful sons of rhyme,
" In abler studies to employ your time;
" Warn'd by my fate, to learn, for learn you must
" That all your fame, like mine, but turns to dust."

THE CAMBRIDGE BEAUTIES.

By an Admirer of the Fair Sex

Ye gentle nymphs, to whom my lays belong;
Approve my numbers, and assist my song;
Soft smiling may your bright'ning eyes inspire
At once the poet's, and the lover's fire:
So shall the muse each magic charm rehearse,
So shall each charm be lasting as her verse.

Bless'd in my choice! what blooming beauties rise!
How court my numbers with inspiring eyes!
O could my lays like gentle Waller move,
Like gentle Waller, tune the soul to love;
Bright as my theme, each easy note should shine,
And Sacharissas smile in ev'ry line.
To Aurenelia fam'd Carlisle should yield,
And Waller own his fav'rite fair excell'd:
Had charms like her's inspir'd his lofty lays,
How had he grown immortal in her praise!
How might the muse her wonted gift receive,
And poetry from beauty learn to live!

When Sylvia smiles, methinks she smiles to prove
Her charms superior to the power of love.
Gay sportive Cupids flutter round the fair,
Pant on her breast and wanton in her hair;
With ev'ry lock, a new adorer gain,
And ev'ry ringlet is a lover's chain;
The orbit ringlets, soft dissolving down,
Flow on her breast, and half her bosom drown;
Through the bright shades, her panting bubbies heave,
Like swans emerging from a silver wave.

On Delia's cheeks, eternal roses bloom,
Her ruby lips exhale a sweet perfume;
Her ruby lips indulge a mutual kiss,
And blush luxuriant in their envy'd bliss.

When bright Belinda leads the sprightly dance,
With ev'ry step our captive hearts advance;
Her magic charms the soft enchantress prove,
And on her breast descends the god of love
Smiling, she seems to imitate those airs,
That form their regularity by her's;
Moves, as the soul-dissolving numbers move;
And musically swims the maze of love:
On the soft sounds, her gentle motions flow,
And sail along magestically slow:
Her waving arms in snowy circles play,
And all the easy conqueror display;
Melodious music warbles love's alarms,
Sounds the soft charge, and sings her conqu'ring charms.

When Flora sings, ye gods! 'tis heaven to hear,
We listen to the music of the sphere;
Our ravish'd sight confirms the sweet surprise,
And owns the angel, by her heav'nly eyes.

But, oh! my muse, your tunefull'st charms prepare,
Harmonious, as your Aurenelia's fair.

Where'er she looks, her eyes like lightnings wound,
When e'er she speaks, there's music in the sound;
From her dear lips such melting softness flows,
Soft as when Zephyrs kiss the silken rose:
But when the wondrous charmer talks of love,
Good gods! what raptures in our bosom move!
How each discourse our soul transported warms,
And, if 'tis possible, improves her charms.

O ever beauteous, ever lovely fair,
Pride of my verse, and object of my care.
O take me, clasp me, melting in thy arms,
Unfold thy sweets, and open all thy charms.
On those dear breasts for ever let me rove,
Those breasts to me the true poetic grove!
On those soft hills for ever let me sing,
And sip thy sacred Heliconian spring.

Were Paris here to judge fair beauty's prize,
How might these brighter goddesses surprise;
How could his choice the doubtful favour place,
When a new Venus shines in ev'ry face?
But since that task, that pleasing task I claim,
O Venus guide me to a brighter flame:
To Aurenclia's charms my wishes move,
Warm her cold heart, and tune her breast to love;
There, let my soul a nobler prize impart,
And for an apple, give my bleeding heart.

ABELARD TO ELOISA.

In my dark cell, low prostrate on the ground,
Mourning my crimes, thy letter entrance found;
Too soon my soul the well known name confest,
My beating heart sprung fiercely in my breast;
Through my whole frame a guilty transport glow'd
And streaming torrents from my eyes fast flow'd.

O Eloisa! art thou still the same?
Dost thou still nourish this destructive flame?
Have not the gentle rules of peace, and heav'n
From thy soft soul this fatal passion driven?
Alas! I thought you disengag'd, and free,
And can you still, still sigh, and weep for me?
What powerful deity, what hallow'd shrine,
Can save me from a love, a faith like thine?
Where shall I fly, when not this awful cave,
Whose rugged feet the surging billows lave;
When not these gloomy cloister's solemn walls,
O'er whose rough sides the languid ivy crawls;
When my dread vows, in vain, their force oppose,
Opposing love, alas! how vain are vows!
In fruitless penance here I wear away
Each tedious night, each sad revolving day:
I fast, I pray; and with deceitful art
Veil thy dear image from my tortur'd heart.
My tortur'd heart conflicting passions move,
I hope, despair, repent, but still I love.
A thousand jarring thoughts my bosom tear,
For thou, not God, my Eloise art there.
To the false world's deluding pleasures dead,
No longer by its wand'ring fires misled;
In learn'd disputes, harsh precepts I infuse,
And give that counsel, I want power to use.
The rigid maxims of the grave, and wise,
Have quench'd each milder sparkle in my eyes;
Each lovely feature of this well-known face,
By grief revers'd, assumes a sterner grace:
O Eloisa! would the fates once more
(Indulgent to thy wish) this form restore,
How wouldst thou from these arms with horror start,
To miss those charms, familiar to thy heart!
Nor could thy quick, thy piercing judgment see,
To speak thy Abelard, but love of thee:
Lean abstinence, pale grief, and haggard care,
The dire attendants of forlorn despair;
Have Abelard the gay, the young remov'd,
And in the hermit, sunk the man you lov'd.

Wrapt in the gloom these holy mansions shed,
The thorny paths of penitence I tread;
Lost to the world, from all its interest free,
And torn from all my soul held dear in thee;
Ambition, with its train of frailties, gone,
All loves, all forms forgot, but thine alone.

Amidst the blaze of day, and dusk of night,
My Eloisa rises to my sight;
Veil'd as in Paraclete's sea-bath'd tow'rs,
The wretched mourner counts the lagging hours;
I hear the sigh, see the swift-falling tears,
Weep all her griefs, and pine with all her cares.
O vows! O converts! your stern force impart,
And frown the melting phantom from my heart;
Let other sighs a worthier sorrow show,
Let other tears, for sin, repentant flow;
Low to the earth, my guilty eyes I roll,
And humble to the dust my contrite soul.
Forgiving pow'r! your gracious call I meet,
Who first empower'd this rebel heart to beat!
Who through this trembling, this offending frame,
For nobler ends diffus'd life's active flame:
O change the temper of this throbbing breast,
And form anew each beating pulse to rest!
Let springing grace, fair faith and hope remove,
The fatal traces of voluptuous love;
Voluptuous love from his soft mansion tear,
And leave no tracks of Eloisa there.

Are these the wishes of thy inmost soul?
Would I its softest tend'rest peace controul?
Would I, thus touch'd, this gloomy heart resign
To the cold substance of the marble shrine?
Transform'd like these pale saints that round me move,
O bless'd insensibles! that knew not love!
Ah! rather let me keep this hapless flame,
Adieu, false honour, unavailing fame!
Not your harsh rules, but tender love, supplies
The streams that gush from my despairing eyes:
I feel the traitor melt around my heart, [dart!
And through my veins with treach'rous influence
Inspire me heav'n! assist me, grace divine!
Aid me ye saints! unknown to crimes like mine!
You, while on earth, all pangs severe could prove,
All but the tort'ring pangs of hopeless love.
An holier rage in your pure bosoms dwelt,
Nor can you pity what you never felt;
A sympathizing grief alone can cure,
The hand that heals, must feel, what I endure.
Thou Eloise! alone, canst give me ease,
And bid my struggling soul subside in peace;

Reſtore me to my long loſt heav'n of reſt,
And take thyſelf from my reluctant breaſt:
If crimes, like mine, could an allay receive,
That bleſs'd allay, thy wond'rous charms muſt give.
Thy form, which firſt my heart to love inclin'd,
Still wanders in my loſt, my guilty mind:
I ſaw thee as the new-blown bloſſoms fair,
Sprightly as light, and ſoft as ſummer air;
Wit, youth, and beauty, in each feature ſhone,
Bleſs'd by my fate, I gaz'd, and was undone!
There dy'd the gen'rous fire, whoſe vig'rous flame,
Enlarg'd my ſoul, and led me on to fame;
Nor fame, nor wealth, my ſoften'd heart could move,
My heart, inſenſible to all but love!
Snatch'd from myſelf, my learning taſteleſs grew,
And vain philoſophy oppos'd to you.

A train of woes we mourn; nor ſhouldwe mourn,
The hours that cannot, ought not to return;
As once to love, I ſway'd thy yielding mind,
Too fond, alas! too fatally inclin'd!
To virtue now let me thy breaſt inſpire,
And fan, with zeal divine, the holy fire;
Teach you to injur'd heav'n, all chang'd, to turn,
And bid thy ſoul with ſacred raptures burn.
O that my own example could impart
This noble warmth to thy ſoft trembling heart!
That mine, with pious undiſſembled care,
Might aid the latent virtue ſtruggling there!
Alas, I rave! nor grace, nor zeal divine,
Burns in a breaſt o'erwhelm'd with crimes, like mine:
Too ſure I find (whilſt I the fortune prove
Of feeble piety, conflicting love)
On black deſpair, my forc'd devotion built,
Abſence, to me, has greater pangs than guilt.

Ah! yet my Eloiſe, thy charms I view,
Yet my ſighs break, and my tears flow for you;
Each weak reſiſtance ſtronger knits my chain,
I ſigh, weep, love, deſpair, repent in vain!
Haſte Eliſa, haſte, thy lover free,
Amidſt thy warmer pray'rs, O think of me!
Wing with thy riſing zeal my grov'ling mind:
And let me mine, from thy repentance find:
Ah! labour, ſtrive, thy love, thyſelf controul,
The change will ſure affect my kindred ſoul:
In bleſt concert our purer ſighs ſhall grieve,
And, Heav'n aſſiſting, ſhall our crimes forgive.
But if unhappy, wretched, loſt in vain,
Faintly th' unequal combat you ſuſtain:
If not to heaven you feel your boſom riſe,
Nor tears, refin'd, fall contrite from your eyes:
If ſtill thy heart thy wonted paſſions move,
And thy tongue prompts thy tender ſoul to love;
Deaf to the weak eſſays of living breath,
Attend the ſtronger eloquence of death.

When that kind pow'er this captive ſoul ſhall free,
(Which, only then, can ceaſe to doat on thee)
When gently ſunk to my eternal ſleep,
The Paraclete my peaceful urn ſhall keep;
Then Eloiſa, then, thy lover view,
See, theſe quench'd eyes, no longer fix'd on you,
From their dead orbs that tender utt'rance flows,
Which firſt on yours my heart's ſoft tales made known.
This breath no more, at length, to eaſe conſign'd,
Pant, like light aſpines quiv'ring with the wind;
See, all my wild tumultuous paſſions o'er,
And thou, amazing ſcene! belov'd no more:
Behold the deſtin'd end of human love,
But let the ſight thy zeal alone improve;
Let not thy conſcious ſoul, with ſorrow mov'd,
Recal how much, how tenderly you lov'd!
With pious care thy fruitleſs grief reſtrain,
Nor let a tear thy ſacred veil profane;
Nor e'en a ſigh on my cold urn beſtow,
But let thy breath with ſacred rapture glow;
Let love divine, frail mortal love, dethrone,
And to thy mind immortal joys make known;
Let Heav'n, relenting, ſtrike thy raviſh'd view,
And ſtill the bright, the bleſt purſuit, renew:
So, with thy crimes, ſhall thy misfortunes ceaſe,
And thy wreck'd ſoul be calmly huſh'd to peace.

TO THE

LAST (KING GEORGE'S) GUINEA.

Inſcribed to the Right Honourable Sir Robert Walpole.

What call, bright monarch! can engage thy breaſt,
To leave thy loyal ſubject thus diſtreſt? [gone,
Who knows, my-guardian-aid, when thou art
What foreign tyrant will uſurp thy throne?
When want, rebellious, arrogates thy reign,
What equal power ſhall faction's rage reſtrain?
Too well, alas! my future ſtate I ſee,
I can but ſigh, and only think of thee!

So, when thy bright original repairs
To foreign realms, with equal griefs and cares:
Britannia mourns; and anxious for her fate,
Implores ſome favourite to protect the ſtate;
Wiſely, as ſtill, the monarch makes his choice,
And for his Walpole joins the general voice.

O couldſt thou there advance an equal claim,
Repos'd in him, our ſafety were the ſame!
Auſpicious thought! and with what eaſe may he,
Who has ſecur'd three nations, ſuccour me.

TO A NEEDLE THAT PRICK'D HIS MISTRESS'S FINGER.

From Bonefonius *.

Miracle of cruelty!
Muſt my Laura bleed by thee?
Her finger too, endure the ſmart?
That tender, inoffenſive part!
What could the ſweet offender do,
Soft, and fair, as falling ſnow;
To ſuffer innocently too!
Was it not envy caus'd this hate,
Becauſe thyſelf were found leſs ſtrait?
Did not this thy fury move
To wound the brighter queen of love?

* All the love poems of this celebrated author, are tranſlated by ſeveral hands. Printed for H. Curll, in the Strand.

But, ah! then dreadful foe, forbear
To execute thy fury here;
Yet, if you ſtill to rage incline,
Revenge at once, your cauſe, and mine:
Let her obdurate boſom feel
The angry fury of thy ſteel.
Her boſom, ſoft as turtle's down,
Yet harder than the hardeſt ſtone!
Her boſom! colder than the ſnow,
Burning at once, and freezing too,
Will brave thy fierceſt, deadlieſt blow.
Here infix thy piercing dart,
Deep as love has pierc'd my heart:
Then, if thou gain'ſt the victory,
How wond'rous will the conqueſt be?
To win a fortreſs that withſtood
The utmoſt fury of a god;
At once thy ſmall, yet glorious dart
Shall conquer love's, and Laura's heart.

ON LAURINDA.

When nature fram'd Laurinda, heavenly fair,
With each attractive charm, and winning air,
Minerva's eloquence refin'd her tongue,
Charm'd in her ſpeech, and warbled in her ſong;
Imperial majeſty from Juno came,
Sooth'd with the ſoftneſs of the Cyprian dame.
O! would ſome other powers employ their care,
To make her kind, as theſe have made her fair;
That ſingle act ſhould all the reſt outſhine,
And make the fair perfection all divine.

THE BEE AND CUPID.

FROM THEOCRITUS.

As Cupid in a flow'ry valley ſtray'd,
Where bees around their hives in cluſters play'd,
The honey's fragrant ſcent allur'd his noſe,
And to the hive the groping archer goes.
Boldly he thruſts his roguiſh fingers in—
Nor in that heaven of ſweets could fear a ſting—
But ſoon he merited, and met his fate,
Repenting of his roguery, too late;
And now, in vain, he frets, he ſtamps, he tears
The flowing honours of his waving hairs;
Deep is the wound, alas! what can he do!
Revenge he vows, but then he fears the foe?
Now ſwift as thought, to Ida's grove he flies,
And thus complaining, to his mother cries,
Alas! mamma, what pain my hand endures!
O take it, kiſs it, cool it, rub 't with yours.
Searching for honey I this torment found,
Small was the author, but, O! deep the wound---
To whom the mother goddeſs thus reply'd,
Unkindly laughing, while poor Cupid cry'd.

Fie, fie, is this your courage, mighty Love!
And is a bee a ſtronger foe than Jove?
Hence child, compaſſionate each lover's heart,
Since you are conquer'd by ſo ſmall a dart.

TO AN

OLD LADY THAT USED TO PAINT.

Kneller with animated art, could trace,
The magic wonders of a lovely face;
His nice creating fancy could impart,
Fire to each charm, and flames to ev'ry heart;
Yet all this ſkill could but at beſt command
A fancy'd goddeſs at the ſecond hand.

You brighter nymph, can greater wonders ſhow!
And all this ſuperficial art out-do;
What if his hand a ſeeming life could give,
Your greater wonder more than ſeems to live!
His nymph, at beſt, could only raiſe our fire,
But you create, and ſatisfy deſire.

TO ONE WHO BLAMED ME

For writing in praiſe of a very undeſerving Lady.

I own, my friend, Olivia is not fair,
An awkward creature, with a flattern air;
She's nature's error, I confeſs indeed,
What then? the ſick alone the doctor need:
Thus cunning tradeſmen praiſe their paltry ware,
And cry, the very beſt in all the fair;
But let the diamonds ſparkle into fame,
And each ſpectator with their worth inflame.

When fancy's in her infancy, the muſe
Some trivial theme, in trifling lays, purſues,
Till, by degrees, ſhe takes a loftier aim
And crowns her actions with immortal fame.
Thus the keen ſword that's bath'd in heroes blood,
Firſt to be temper'd, drinks the filthly flood.

PRESENTING WALLER'S POEMS

TO A LADY.

Madam,
Accept the ſofteſt ſweeteſt ſtrains,
That ever breath'd a dying lover's pains;
That ever yet could unſucceſsful prove,
When arm'd with all the eloquence of love;
And if you find ſome tender moving part,
Soften your ſoul, and ſteal upon your heart;
(For ſure the moſt obdurate maid muſt blame,
The rigid coyneſs of the cruel dame):
Then lovely Laura, think, you faintly feel
The ſymptoms of a flame I dare not tell;
Think, then, you hear your ſuppliant lover ſigh,
But generouſly, more than ſee him die;
And if you kindly liſten to his pain,
Succeſsful Waller has not ſung in vain.

TO A LADY

AT KING'S-COLLEGE CHAPEL, CAMBRIDGE.

Unskill'd in love, unpractis'd in thoſe arts
Of gaining miſtreſſes, and giving hearts,
Mix'd with the gazing crowd I hither come,
Nor dreamt deſtruction near this ſacred dome;
Where holy hymns, and ſolemn ſongs of praiſe,
A venerable adoration raiſe;
But with ſurpriſe, at once I hear and ſee
A ſpeaking, and a ſilent harmony:
Tranſporting ſounds! my fainting ſenſes riſe,
Wing'd with the ſweeter muſic of your eyes:
Your eyes that ſpeak a form ſo bright, ſo fair,
You ſeem the object of each fervent prayer.
Our ſouls the ſweet divinity adore---
Aſpiring vanity can hope no more---

But ah! forbear, thou holy fair, unknown,
Our happineſs to hazard by your own;
Can Heaven, impartial, to your hopes comply,
And give you that, which you to all deny.
Miſtaken maid! you think you bleſſings gain,
When 'tis your very prayers create our pain
And ſave us, but to kill us, with diſdain.
Alas! I feel the fatal poiſon run,
I gaze, I ſigh, I love, and am undone---
Harmonious charms, in vain, my mind reprove,
They ſympathize, and melt, with me, to love:
Whilſt in ſoft ſounds, my ſoul, tranſported, flew,
Miſtook her heav'n, but found a heav'n in you.

THE FOP.

Sir Plume, the banker, of each trading laſs,
(That neweſt French edition of an aſs!
Charm'd by dear ſelf, with love may ſafely ſport,
As things inanimate receive no hurt)
On his own beauteous perſon, deeply read,
No love e'er reach'd his heart, no thought his head;
Pangleſs, he woos ſome pangleſs dame of faſhion,
And in bad French, ſerenely liſps his paſſion;
Then, as the ſuit he makes is right or wrong,
Triumphs in rigadoon, or dies in ſong.

THE REFUSAL OF HER HAND.

That with an eagle's piercing eye,
Ned look'd, what man with eyes can doubt,
When from the feather'd family,
He ſingled this fair chicken out.

A lion's heart, the gen'rous boy
Proudly in ev'ry act maintains,
Bravely attacks the nymph when coy,
When yielding bravely he diſdains.

To play the ſkilful ſurgeon's part,
Two neceſſary points are gain'd;
But to be maſter of his art,
Poor Ned ſtill wants the lady's hand.

THE MORNING CONTEMPLATION.

As I range theſe ſpacious fields,
Feaſt on all that nature yields;
Ev'ry thing conſpires delight,
Charms my ſmell, my taſte, my ſight;
Ev'ry rural ſound I hear
Soothes my ſoul, and tunes my ear.

Yonder azure hills ariſing,
Peeping through the wide horizon;
Strive for the priority,
Which ſhall firſt ſalute my eye:
Gentle winds, each ſweet adorning,
Breathe the wholeſome breath of morning;
Birds on bloſſom'd hawthorns, ſing
Jocund carols to the ſpring;
Hopping o'er the fragrant lawn,
Merrily ſalute the dawn,
And with their muſic ſeem to chide
Man's ingratitude and pride.

O venerable Solitude!
Beſt of bleſſings, chiefeſt good!
Chiefeſt good! for in you is
Every part of happineſs:
No racking paſſions here dim controul,
The peaceful ſurface of my ſoul;
Nothing can my bliſs deſtroy,
Whilſt I thus myſelf enjoy.
Ere the heavens or earth were made,
Or their vaſt foundations laid;
Ere angels yet were taught to ſing,
To tune the lyre, or touch the ſtring;
In godlike pomp the great Three One
Reign'd in their ſolitude alone.

Tell me, all ye mighty wiſe,
Ye governors of colleges;
What deeper wiſdom can you know,
Than eaſy nature's works here ſhow?
All the lonеſome night ye pore,
Philoſophic ſages o'er:
To what prodigious vaſt account
Can all your mighty works amount?
The wiſe man was as wiſe as you,
And yet his wiſdom was---he nothing knew.

Come, ye covetous! ye proud!
Come, ye wiſe fantaſtic crowd!
And as your follies ye diſcern,
Nature's plain inſtructions learn.

See, this river, as it goes,
With what eloquence it flows?
How clear the water, and how fine!
How deep, how rapidly ſerene!
But ſhould it fearful of decay,
Stagnate, and ſtop up its way;
No longer would its ſtreams appear,
Wholeſome, delicate, or clear:
But bury'd in a quagmire ſink,
Or in a choking deluge ſtink.

Believe me, life's the very ſame,
The very image of this ſtream:
If of future fortune fearleſs,
If of preſent changes, careleſs,
It uninterrupted goes,
How ſweet! and how ſerene it flows!
But if ſtopt with theſe reſtraints,
Preſent ills, and future wants;
If anxious doubts, and clogging care,
Betray our reaſon to deſpair;
Life's dull enjoyment only cloys,
And painfully itſelf deſtroys.

View this revential ſhade!
Sacred to retirement made!
What ſurpriſing ſweets ſurround me!
What varieties confound me!
Bleſs'd in this obſcure abode,
I think myſelf almoſt a god!
I think myſelf ſo too the more,
Becauſe I'm out of envy's power!
And if angels envious be,
They alone dare envy me;
And doing ſo, they let me know
I am happier here below.

Where is ſelf-enamour'd pride!
Tinſel vanity beſide:

In what gilded rooms of ſtate
Shaking with the ſtorms of fate
Do they now luxurious lie,
Bound in purple ſlavery!
Can their artificial flowers
Rival theſe delightful bowers?
Compar'd with nature's charms, how faint
Is their mimic-colour'd paint?
I, the living foreſt have,
They the empty ſhadows crave;
Yet, in ſpite of all their theft,
I too have better ſhadows left.
Behold this little ſcrubby thorn,
Of verdure deſtitute, forlorn.
As if it were e'en nature's ſcorn.
Yet this, is of much more poſſeſs'd,
Than any tyrant of the eaſt;
Is richer; nay, is happier far
Than oriental monarchs are:
Can, with equal grandeur, ſhow,
Its brilliant head with diamonds glow:
And contented, knows, next day
Doubly will the loſs repay,
If fortune ſnatches it away.
Princely honours thus remain,
And thus they flee—but ne'er return again—

But this flow'ry meadow walking,
To this prattling echo talking;
As along the ſtream I paſs,
Gazing on my floating face;
Lo! the ruffling winds ariſe,
To ſnatch the proſpect from my eyes:
The mimic form that fury braves,
And proudly triumphs o'er the waves;
Yet though with ev'ry wave 'tis toſt,
The reflection is not loſt.

Virtue wages ſuch a ſtriſe,
In this turbulent ſtream of life;
Rack'd with paſſions, toſt with fears,
Vex'd with jealouſies, and cares:
But a good unſpotted ſoul,
Though ſubject, yet knows no controul,
Whilſt it turns on virtue's pole.

But, lo! the clouds obſcure the ſun,
Swift ſhadows o'er the waters run!
Trembling too, my ſhadow flies?
And by its very likeneſs dies.

Hence learn, reflecting Pattiſon,
How ſilent fate ſtill hurries on,
How ſuddenly you muſt be gone!
And as you now can tell no more,
The likeneſs that your viſage wore,
On the ſurface of the flood,
Where but now you gazing ſtood:
So, as ſoon as you ſhall die,
And reſign mortality;
The deluſive breath of fame,
Shall forget your very name.

VERSES ON THE FIFTH OF NOVEMBER.

Mourn, Rome! thy baffled arts, thy conquer'd arms,
For know! 'tis heav'n thy impious zeal diſarms;

Learn by thy fate, and oft experienc'd coſt,
Our temples ill the true Palladium boaſt:
With ſhame review that dire vindictive day,
When hoſtile nations plow'd the liquid way;
With rebel rage inſpir'd, but ah! how vain
They brav'd the Cynthia of our Britiſh main!
Wing'd with falſe hopes, their floating cities flew,
Like Sodom, doom'd to flaming vengeance too:
Immortal Drake, the Britiſh thunder drove,
Swift, as the bolt, hot-hiſſing from above;
Wide o'er the main, the bright infection flew,
And flying, with tempeſtuous fury grew;
Reflecting billows ſhot a gleamy glare,
And boil'd, and flam'd, with elemental war;
From the deep cavern of his oozy bed,
Old Ocean's ſire emerg'd his azure head;
Like ſcorching Xanthus, felt his floods retire,
And roar'd in anguiſh at the god of fire:
But when he ſaw Britannia's peace alarm'd,
And Heav'n, and Drake, with ſacred vengeance arm'd;
With billowing ſtorms he urg'd the work of fate,
And heav'd huge mountains at the burning fleet;
The burning fleet deplore their impious aim,
And dread the thund'rer, now they feel his flame;
With ſhame, with anguiſh, and with guilt, expire,
Or ſink in wat'ry floods, or floods of fire.

Calm o'er the waves great Drake triumphant rode,
Safe in the ſacred ſanction of a god;
His ark, like Noah's, ſaw the whelming tide,
Abſorp an impious world, and gorge its pride,
Conqueſt ſat ſmiling at the ſcene Heav'n wrought,
And, like the dove, the peaceful olive brought:
Like Iſrael, England, on her ſea-beat ſhore,
Beheld the proud Egyptians, proud no more.

But, as when once, the rebel Titans ſtrove,
And fell ſad victims to a vengeful Jove;
Sprung from the poiſon of their Hydra gore,
A race aroſe, as impious as before;
A race, that durſt uſurp the bleſs'd abodes,
Defy the thund'rer, and dethrone the gods:
So, from this baſe defeat, with impious rage,
New Titans dar'd our Britiſh gods engage;
Salmoneus like, with mimic power they ſtrove,
And madly arm'd the thunder 'gainſt its Jove.

In the deep boſom of the cavern'd earth,
Cloſe plotting treaſon laid the nitrous birth;
Old midwife-night with duſky pinions ſate,
To hatch the ſeeds, and brood them into fate:
When Britain's genius from his ruling ſtar,
Beheld the latent ruin from afar;
(Such, once in heav'n, he ſaw black treaſons rage
When rebel angels durſt their God engage)
With ſailing wings the ſacred pow'r deſcends,
And hov'ring o'er his iſle incumbent bends;
With tutelary care, the guardian fate,
And anxious, watch'd the birth of future fate.
And now the gloomy wings of ſable night,
Embrown'd the ſilver empire of the night;
Nor yet the choral cock proclaim'd the day,
But all in ſilence, all in horror lay;
No breathing breeze the dreary foreſt ſhakes,
And Heaven alone with watchful treaſon wakes:

Repos'd, the meditated martyr lay,
Nor flumb'ring dream'd himself a future prey:
Well might he rest secure from mortal fear;
Whose happiness was Heaven's peculiar care!

Lo! through the gloom, a darting lustre streams,
And, like a comet, sheds its baleful beams;
Like that, each baleful beam malignant springs,
Denouncing fate to empires, and to kings:
For lo! black treason lifts her Hydra head,
Struck at her monster form she starts afraid,
Shrinks in the deepest gloom, and seeks the darkest shade!
But, ah! she turns— "O Britain see thy doom—
"Awake! arise! 'tis hell conspires! 'tis Rome!"
Thanks, Heaven! thy beams dispel the hideous sprite,
She flies, she sinks, she seeks th' abyss of night.
Sink fury! to the deepest hell of pains,
There, curse thy rage, in adamantine chains!
But, hark! Britannia's rousing lion roars,
And thunders treason through her concave shores;
But Heaven protects—ye echoes! waft it round,
Ye repercussive rocks! repeat the sound.

Hence learn, O treach'rous Rome! repuls'd retire,
And only with Britannia's peace, conspire;
Oft as thy plots, and stratagems engage,
As often shalt thou mourn thy baffled rage;
For know, we dare thy poor intending hate,
Whilst Walpole stands the bulwark of our state:
Whilst his judicious hands our vessel guide,
Boldly we'll stem old time's tempestuous tide;
Led by that star, the storms of fate defy,
And launch into immense eternity.

Though rocks, and seas begird Britannia's isle,
Her happy shades with sweets eternal smile.
Though the winds rage, and the rough billows roar,
Soft Halcyon ease adorns her peaceful shore;
Compos'd, she sees the factious floods engage,
And smiles superior to their empty rage;
The breaking waves her rocks with fury beat,
And mourn, like thee, O Rome! in tears their base defeat.

1725.

ON CRASSUS.

Don Crassus plum'd with Bacularian pride,
A cap, a gown, and eke a robe beside,
Pedantically saunters up and down
To satisfy the misbelieving town,
Proud of himself—but prouder of his gown.
And well he may so; for the dapper fellow
Is but poor Fustian, though his gown's Prunello!

CHLOE REPROVED.

As Chloe, conscious of her pretty face,
Kiss'd the reflected goddess in the glass;
And shall these charms, she cries, these matchless charms,
To night be buried in an husband's arms?
No!—since the gods indulgent give me power,
I'll reign, at least, the tyrant of an hour!

She said, and to the glitt'ring toilet flew,
Heighten'd each charm, and ev'n diviner grew;
A thousand arts, a thousand airs she tries,
And thus computes the conquests of her eyes.

With scorn, Honorio's passion I resign,
Brillantis, dear Brillantis! shall be mine;
Conquer'd Sireno shall these charms adore,
Sylvander, and an endless thousand more.

Thus spoke the proud premeditated bride,
And the Cosmetic oracle reply'd.

Beware, fair maid, beware, nor strive to prove,
The dangerous varieties of love;
But think how brittle are those charms you boast,
And think how soon that beauty may be lost.
For this (take notice what I say)
Depend on, to your sorrow,
That if you change your mind to-day,
I'll change your face to-morrow.

THE NIGHTINGALE AND SHEPHERD,

IMITATED FROM STRADA.

'Twas when the sun diffus'd a milder ray,
And length'ning shades confess'd the short'ning day:
To Tiber's banks repair'd an am'rous swain,
The love, and envy, of the neighb'ring plain;
To cool his heat, he sought the breezy grove,
To cool his heat, but more, the heat of love;
To soothe his cares, on a soft lute he play'd,
But the soft lute reviv'd the lovely maid;
Conspiring elms their umbrage shed around,
Wav'd with applause, and listen'd to the sound:
When Philomela, gentle bird of love,
Poor, pretty, harmless Syren of the grove!
Enchanted, heard the shepherd as he play'd,
And stole attentive to the tuneful shade,
Perch'd o'er his head, the charmer seem'd to grow,
And to the lyre, in shadows dance'd below;
With scornful eye elate, inclin'd to hear,
And lent her soul to listen in her ear;
As his swift fingers tremble o'er the lute,
Softly she sings responsive to the note:
Each air, each flowing accent of the song,
She soothes, and sweetens, with her softer tongue;
Gently refines each imitated strain
And with his music charms the ravish'd swain:
The ravish'd swain admir'd the just replies,
At first mistaken for the echoing breeze;
But when he found his little rival near,
Imbibing music both at eye and ear;
Sublimer notes improv'd each lab'ring air,
The daring prelude to the tuneful war:
O'erjoy'd, the charmer heard the bold defy,
And warbling, answer'd, with a brisk reply.

Now tend'rest thoughts the gentle swain inspire,
And with a dying softness tune the lyre,
Echo the music of the vernal woods,
Warble the murmurs of the falling floods.
Thus sweet he plays, but sweet he plays in vain,
For Philomela sings a sweeter strain;

With eaſier art ſhe modulates each note,
More nat'ral muſic melting in her throat.

Much he admir'd the magic of her tongue.
But more to ſee his lute, and art outdone;
And now, to loftier airs, he tunes the ſtrings,
And now, to loftier airs, his echo ſings;
Though loud as thunder, though as ſwift as thought,
She reach'd the ſwelling, caught the flying note;
In trembling treble now in deeper baſe,
She ſhow'd how nature could his art ſurpaſs.

Amaz'd, at length, with rage the ſhepherd burn'd,
His admiration into anger turn'd;
Enflam'd with emulating pride, he ſtood,
And thus defy'd the charmer of the wood.

And wilt thou ſtill my muſic imitate?
Then ſee thy folly, and thy taſk is great---
For know more pow'rful lays remain unſung,
Lays! far ſuperior to that mimic tongue—
If not, this lute, this vanquiſh'd lute, I ſwear,
Shall never more delight the raviſh'd ear;
But, broke in ſcatter'd fragments ſtrew the plain,
And mourn the glory which it could not gain---

He ſaid, and as he ſaid, his ſoul on fire,
With a diſdainful air, he ſwept the lyre;
Quick to the touch, the tides of muſic flow,
Swell into ſtrength, or melt away in woe;
Now, raiſe the ſhrilling trumpet's clanging jar,
Now, rouſe the raging thunders of the war;
Now, ſoft'ning ſounds, and ſadly-pleaſing ſtrains,
Breathe out the lover's joys, and lover's pains.

He ſung, and ceas'd his rivals' notes to hear,
As his dy'd liſt'ning in the ambient air.

But now, too late! her noble folly found,
Sad Philomela ſtood ſubdu'd by ſound. [fill'd,
Though vanquiſh'd, yet, with generous ardour
Ignobly ſtill ſhe ſcorn'd to quit the field;
Each emulated air, each labour'd note,
Trills on her tongue, and trembles through her throat,
But ſlowly faint her penſive accents flow,
Weaken'd with grief, and overcharg'd with woe:
Again, ſhe tunes her voice, again ſhe ſings,
Strains every nerve, and quivers on her wings;
In vain! her ſinking ſpirits fade away,
And in a tuneful agony decay;
Dying, ſhe fell, and as the ſtrains expire,
Breath'd out her ſoul in anguiſh on the lyre;
Diſſolv'd in tranſport, there, reſign'd her breath,
And gain'd a living conqueſt by her death.

THE COURT OF VENUS.

FROM CLAUDIAN.

WHERE the fair Paphian goddeſs kept her court,
Where the loves wanton, and the graces ſport;
A tow'ring mountain lifts its lofty brow,
And bends with pleaſure o'er the plains below;
O'er diſtant, blue-retiring hills ſurveys
Its ſhadows floating in Ionian ſeas;
The top impervious, all acceſs denies,
Tires the faint foot, and dims the dizzy eyes:
No fierce, inclement winter ſhivers here,
No blaſting ſeaſons nip the blooming year;
No ſmoking miſts, nor foggy damps ariſe,
Hang o'er the hills, or fail along the ſkies;
But an untainted Æther ſhines ſerene,
And ſheds its influence on the ſmiling ſcene;
Eternal ſweets the waſting breezes bring,
And whiſper out an everlaſting ſpring.

This pleaſurable mountain by degrees,
Sinks in a level, to ſalute your eyes;
Where joy, ſucceeding joy, for ever new,
For ever riſing to the raviſh'd view,
The wand'ring ſight with ſweet amuſement leads
Through golden groves, and ever-living meads.

Theſe were the gifts, his gratitude to prove,
Vulcan beſtow'd upon the queen of love;
For theſe, the queen of love, reſign'd her charms,
And over-ſold the Heaven in her arms.

Here, a ſoft grove its coolly ſhade affords,
Fann'd by the muſic of the warbling birds;
To this, the ſylvan choriſters reſort,
Hop on the boughs, and to the breezes ſport:
The queen of love, amid the tuneful throng,
With gracious ſmiles rewards the fav'rite ſong;
Elects the worthy tenant of the grove,
And dedicates him to the god of love.

Embow'ring trees the mingled ſhade compoſe,
That imitates the fair, for whom it grows;
With complicating poplars, poplars twine,
With ſpreading alders, ſpreading alders join:
Majeſtic elms with bending foliage flow,
Float in green waves, and fan the ſhades below;
The ſhades below, the cooling gale receive,
And riſing, with the cooling gale, revive:
Two diff'rent rivers murmur through the grove,
Two fatal contrarieties in love!
This, ſweet as mutual joy in youthful veins,
That, bitter, as a dying lover's pains:
Conſcious, the ſtreams, each other ſeem to ſhun,
But, in meanders loſt, too ſoon are one!
Dipt in theſe fabled waves, love's fatal dart,
Stings the diſtracted ſoul, to ſoothe the heart;
To theſe, their double pow'r his arrows owe,
Soft-pleaſing joys, and ſad conſuming woe.

Rang'd on the banks, the little loves reſort,
Plight fancy'd oaths, and bend their bows in ſport;
Theſe, tender nymphs produc'd, a blooming race!
And left their virgin image on their face.
Their ruddy cheeks their parents charms proclaim,
Alike their habit, and their look the ſame:
O'er all theſe troops, preſides the god of love,
A god, whom all the gods revere above;
Sprung from the mother, and the queen of charms,
He ſhines diſtinguiſh'd in ſuperior arms;
His cogent power e'en deities controuls,
And awes the thunderer that awes the poles;
On earth he triumphs o'er a monarch's cares,
And blaſts the laurel which the thunder ſpares:
In woods, and groves, th' inferior archers reign,
Contented with the conqueſts of the plain.

Cloſe by the ſtreams, in fatal pomp array'd,
Love's wild romantic equipage is laid;

Here lawleſs liberty for ever roves,
For ever riots in exceſs of loves;
Inflam'd with wine, diſtracted rage appears,
But ſoon diſſolves in ſelf-accuſing tears
Here warming whiſpers propagate replies,
Sweet-melting murmurs, ſoft-conſenting ſighs;
With all the eloquence that hearts confeſs,
With all the harmony that eyes expreſs:
There young deſire their taſted joys purſue,
Pleas'd with the paſt, and panting for the new;
When ſtrange chimeras on a ſudden riſe,
Shift the falſe ſcene, and intercept their eyes;
Tormenting jealouſies, uneaſy cares,
Diſſembling hopes, imaginary fears;
Accuſing crimes of ill-requitted love,
And breaking vows re-echo through the grove.
Full in the midſt, with nice becoming grace,
Stood youth, too conſcious of his comely face;
Proud of his nervous ſtrength, and vig'rous veins,
With pain his blood the luſcious tide contains;
With haughty ſmiles he mocks declining age,
His ſtarv'd enjoyments, and diſſembled rage;
The wither'd crone avoids him with remorſe,
And ſickens at the thought of, Once he was---

Proud o'er the groves a glitt'ring dome aſcends,
Rich with the labour of Vulcanian hands;
Through the green ranks, the darting luſtre ſtreams,
And the ſhades kindle with reflected flames;
This maſterpiece of ſkill, the Lemnian god,
On his fair ſpouſe a worthy gift beſtow'd.
Immortal monuments of art ſupport
The vaſt foundations of each ample court,
On diamond pillars, diamond pillars riſe;
At once invade, and emulate the ſkies;
Pelucid cryſtal clarifies each ſtone,
And by excluding, makes a double ſun;
In oval ſteps the wavy topaz roll'd,
Gleams by reflexion on the valving gold;
Each ſtone conſpires it emulating rays,
Glitters the beryls, and the rubies blaze;
Carv'd ſaphires melt in undulating flame,
And rink the lucid amber's fainter ſtream.

Here ſpacious greens, reviving areas riſe,
And with a milder ſcene refreſh the eyes;
Through Caſſia groves ambroſial breezes breathe,
And ſteal the aromatic ſweets beneath;
There, ſoft, inferior ſhades of myrtle grow,
And lilies, bluſhing as the roſes glow;
Diſſolv'd with joy, the trickling balm runs o'er,
And the ſweet tears diſtil at every pore.

But now, his journey paſt, the god of love,
With joyful ſteps approach'd his native grove;
And now he re-aſſumes a ſolemn pace,
He moves with majeſty, and looks with grace.

It happen'd then, with future joys elate,
His goddeſs-mother at her toilet ſate;
On either ſide, th' Idalian ſiſters ſtand,
Proud of the ſmiling goddeſſes command;
Theſe ſcatters odours o'er the fragrant fair,
Thoſe thread the mazy tendrils of her hair;
Part exercile the nice correcting comb,
Smooth the ſoft curls, and call the ſtraglers home,
The comely fav'rites, by a nice deſign,
They leave to ſport, and wanton with the wind,
The comely fav'rites, with adorning grace
Wave on the breeze, and flow upon her face,
With cooling airs create an eaſy pride,
And, but increaſe the charms, they ſtrive to hide:
No glaſſes here, deluding lights ſupply,
The brilliant diamond, guides the judging eye;
For as the goddeſs moves new mirrors riſe,
And catch augmenting ſplendors from her eyes;
As to the multiplying ſtones ſhe turns,
In all ſhe dances, and in all ſhe burns.

But, lo! a ſudden ſcene of glory fires
Her riſing ſoul, and breathes more gay deſires;
Her ſon's reflected image ſhe ſurveys,
With trembling joys, ſhe turns to prove the rays,
But turning, conſcious of her only ſon,
Into the bloomy boy's embraces run,
Receives him panting at unfolding charms,
And hugs the little darling in her arms.

ORPHEUS AND EURYDICE.

FROM VIRGIL'S FOURTH GEORGIC.

Incens'd, the raging prophet* thus replies,
Gnaſhes his teeth, and rolls his azure eyes.
No common vengeance does your crimes purſue,
Your crimes, which well deſerve their fatal due;
But humbly ſupplicate immortal hate,
And wiſely ſhun the threat'ning rage of fate;
O! think on Orpheus, and his injur'd ſpouſe,
And mark the wicked author of their woes;
When lawleſs luſt enflam'd thy boiling blood,
To chaſe the flying fair along the flood:
Think, how the ſnake, in verdant ambuſh laid,
Unwarily ſurpris'd the panting maid;
Shrieking, ſhe fell, reſign'd her fainter breath,
And ſought the kinder arms of icy death:
The nymphs, the ſwains, the dying virgin mourn'd,
The river deities, the grief return'd;
The winds, with ſympathiſing ſorrow, ſigh'd,
And the ſad ſtreams their trickling tears ſupply'd.

The wretched huſband, hopeleſs of relief,
In tuneful anguiſh ſought to ſoothe his grief;
But riſing ſorrows all his thoughts controul,
Flow in his eyes, and melt his ſoft'ning ſoul;
In plaintive ſtrains he mourns his conſort gone,
Sighs to the riſing, and the ſetting ſun;
Till wildly loſt in ſolitude and woe,
Raving, he ſought, the dreary ſhades below,
Advent'rous by deſpair, and dar'd to tread
The melancholy manſions of the dead;
With ſongs to ſupplicate th' infernal power,
And ſoothe the god, who ne'er was ſooth'd before.

Lur'd by the magic of the ſacred ſound,
Swift-gliding crowds of ſpectres hover round;
Thick, as when fowls obſcure the ev'ning air,
And to their groves in feather'd clouds repair;
Men, matrons, maids, a viſionary throng,
Surround the poet, and imbibe his ſong;
With all thoſe multitudes of empty ghoſts,
Where Stygian ſtreams ſurround the ſquallid coaſts;
Heedleſs their own unhappy fates to mourn,
Weeping, they make his miſery their own.

* Proteus.

E'en hell itſelf, with all its fiends, was charm'd,
Its terrors ſoften'd, and its rage diſarm'd;
The grinning guardian loll'd his triple tongue,
And fawning, lick'd the poet, as he ſung;
The very furies heav'd away their chains,
And found their own too weak for muſic's ſtrains,
Ixion his eternal toil forewent,
And liſt'ning, on his rolling labour, leant.

But now the tuneful bard, his bride reſtor'd,
Back to the realms of day, the path explor'd;
Slowly ſhe follow'd, as he led the way,
Obedient to Proſerpina's decree:
For if, before the gloomy ſhades were paſt,
He turn'd to look, the look muſt be his laſt,
A fault which hell might paſs in ſilence by,
Could hell behold it with a lover's eye:
And now near travers'd o'er the realms of night,
They roſe emergent on the beams of light;
When the poor youth unfortunately kind,
Caſt a too fond-conductive glance behind:
But, as he turn'd, three peals of thunder ſpoke,
The dire conditionary promiſe broke;
While thus the ſadly ſweet, reproving maid,
Beſpoke the youth by too much love betray'd.

Unhappy Orpheus! ah, unhappy boy!
What mov'd thee thus to blaſt our bloomy joy?
Alas! for ever loſt, I leave thee now!
This parting kiſs, to ſoothe eternal woe——
Farewell—dim ſhades of horror round me riſe,
And ſudden night o'erwhelms my ſwimming eyes.

She ſaid; and as ſhe ſaid, in ſhades withdrew,
From his deluded arms, the viſion flew;
With ſtrict embrace, in vain he ſtops her ſtay,
Diſſolv'd to air, unfelt, ſhe glides away;
In vain he ſeeks her with inceſſant eyes,
In vain invokes her with imploring cries;
What could he do? All efforts are too late,
Again her ſoul is ſummon'd down by fate;
Th' infernal ferry-man relents no more,
And e'en his muſic now forgets its power!

Seven months, by fame's report, the loneſome ſwain,
Devoted to his melancholy pain:
Where Scythian hills are bleak with drifted ſnow,
And ſhiver in the frigid floods below,
Diſtracted, with indulgency of grief,
In ſoul-reſtoring ſtrains he ſought relief;
In ſtrains that e'en the barren mountains charm'd,
And their eternal froſts with pity warm'd:
The liſt'ning ſavages his power confeſs'd,
Their rage he ſooth'd, but could not ſoothe his breaſt.

As the lamenting nightingale complains,
Of cruel ſpoilers, and deſtructive ſwains,
When ſad! ſhe ſees her younglings borne away,
Her downy darlings, an inhuman prey!
Sunk in ſome gloom, ſhe darkling pines alone,
Sighs out her grief, and murmurs out her moan.
Thus Orpheus ſought to calm his peaceleſs breaſt,
A ſtranger to the quietude of reſt;
Now wildly tortur'd by deſpair, he goes,
O'er freezing mountains of eternal ſnows,
Delighted to the barren rocks to tell,
The rigorous benevolence of hell;
Averſe to Venus, and the nuptial joys,
In unavailing grief his life deſtroys;
Till frantic Bacchanals that madly ſtrove
To warm his boſom to a ſecond love,
With rage, revenge, and brutal fury arm'd,
More ſavage, than theſe ſavages he charm'd,
Conſpir'd againſt his life, the bard they ſlew,
And on cold Hebe's ſtreams his head they threw;
Yet, e'en in death, his voice bewails his woe,
And with the ſtreams his ſtrains in anguiſh flow;
Eurydice! his dying tongue deplores,
Eurydice! reſounds along the length'ning ſhores.

UPON A NEEDLE.

Occaſioned by ſeeing a Lady Embroidering.

This little inſtrument of art,
Methinks, reſembles Cupid's dart;
As the ſilken wound it gives,
With enliv'ning beauty lives;
So the pointed ſhafts of love,
On my heart, their power prove;
And, as the vital threads they pierce,
Animate a ſpring of verſe,
Whilſt the flowers of poetry
Ariſe, theſe brighter flowers to ſee.

Yet, though thus like, both darts appear,
In the main point, they differ far;
For, but conſider, their employs—
This creates, but that deſtroys!

TO MR. TAYLOR, A. B. OF ST. JOHN'S, &c.

Upon reading ſome of his excellent Poems.

As ſuppliants e'er they ſeek the ſacred ſhrine,
Prefer their off'rings to the power within;
Thus let me fix this token of my zeal, [ſteal;
Here, through theſe gates of fame, a paſs-port
Purſue the paths of glory where you run,
And, like the lark, ſalute the riſing ſun.

But hark! what ſweet enchanting notes I hear?
Does * Horace, or does Taylor charm mine ear?
Deluſive thought! the Roman, now no more,
To Latium loſt, delights th' Elyſium ſhore;
There, hap'ly could he hear thy loftier ſtrain,
Thy lyre would charm him into life again.

† Securely may'ſt thou dare the darts of death,
Defy the tyrant with thy lateſt breath;
For this life loſt, eternal life receive,
And in thy own Pindaric ever live.

‡ What may not all thy lofty numbers raiſe,
When light receives new luſtre from thy lays?
Amaz'd, I view'd thy beams, like ancient night,
Silver my gloom, and cheer my ſoul with light:
Like the fair orb you ſing with equal force,
By your own brightneſs you direct your courſe;
To us below, thy genial rays diſpenſe,
The glorious beams of everlaſting ſenſe;

---

* Alluding to his odes.
† Alluding to a poem againſt the fear of death.
‡ Alluding to an ode on light.

Ripen each thought, recal each fancy forth,
And warm poetic harveſts into birth.
In thee, as in Apollo, both unite,
Celeſtial luſtre, and celeſtial wit.

* Had holy David heard thee weep his woe,
The Pſalmiſt had reſign'd his harp to you;
Muſic, like yours, would all his griefs controul,
And ſoothe him, as he ſooth'd diſtemper'd Saul.

But whilſt I thus thy pleaſing paths purſue,
What fields of glory open to my view?
What riſing raptures, all my breaſt inſpire,
How my ſoul kindles with reflected fire!
Still, as I read, with rage divine I glow,
Dwell on each thought, and ſtrive to think like you:
With wonder view judicious ardour ſhine,
Bloom in each thought, and ripen ev'ry line:
Each manly verſe, with female ſweetneſs flows,
With fruits, and bloſſoms, like the orange glows.

But, oh! forgive a weak officious friend,
And let theſe lines my honeſt love commend:
Whilſt to ſublimer flights your wings aſpire,
Thus let me gaze at diſtance, thus admire;
Receive a ſingle portion of your power,
Nor, like Eliſha, could I wiſh for more.

But, when time ſees thy future laurels grow
For ſome great Iliad, to adorn thy brow,
In the ſoft ſhade, thus let me chant my love,
And live the linnet of thy laurel grove.

TO LAURA.

When Paris ſaw the bright celeſtial Three,
And view'd thoſe beauties, now reviv'd in thee,
Hadſt thou, my Laura, ſeen the grand diſpute,
Hadſt thou contended for the glitt'ring fruit;
Heaven's queen had found her princely preſents vain,
Nor proffer'd empires you alone could gain;
Pallas abaſh'd, had own'd with ſweet ſurpriſe,
The ſilent eloquence of magic eyes;
Such eyes had ſmil'd thee faireſt of the fair,
And Venus own'd a brighter Venus there.
Though Venus ſhone with each alluring grace,
Her charms had only gain'd a ſecond place:
Thine! thine had won the ſhepherd's noble part,
Though hers the apple, thine had been his heart.

TO THE SAME.—WEEPING.

If Laura weep for thoſe her eyes have ſlain,
Then ſmile, my fair, and we'll revive again.

TO THE SAME.

ON HER PATCHES.

Laura, you ſay, theſe ſable ſpots impart,
The ſeemly tokens of each love-burnt heart;
As conquer'd trophies grace ſome ſacred ſhrine,
So they adorn a power, as much divine:
But if, among thoſe conqueſts of your eyes,
My humble heart can prove a worthy prize;
O let your lip the faithful token wear,
And let me live on endleſs kiſſes there!

* Alluding to a poem on David's lamentation over Abſalom.

TO HER RING.

Bleſt ornament! how happy is thy ſnare,
To bind the ſnowy finger of my fair!
O could I learn thy nice coerſive art,
And as thou bind'ſt her finger, bind her heart!

Not eaſtern diadems, like thee, can ſhine,
Fed from her brighter eyes with beams divine;
Nor can their mightieſt monarch's pow'r command
So large an empire, as thy charmer's hand.

O could thy form thy fond admirer wear,
Thy very likeneſs ſhould in all appear;
My endleſs love, thy endleſs round ſhould ſhow,
And my heart flaming, for thy diamond glow.

ON A LADY'S NECKLACE.

Ye cryſtal orbs that on her boſom lie,
The glitt'ring planets of a brighter ſky,
Like ſtars illumin'd by the lamp of day,
From my Selinda's eye you catch your ray;
Well may thoſe eyes of light like yours inſpire,
When their leaſt beam can ſet my heart on fire.

O happy chain! thy artleſs foldings prove
Superior to the magic charms of love!
O! were you, by a juſt poſſeſſion, mine,
And had I power to make you more divine;
Could art increaſe each globe, as large as this,
Like Anthony, I'd give it for a kiſs:
My worlds, though ſwell'd to thouſands, I'd beſtow,
To circle my Selinda's neck, like you.

TO A LADY,

Who is moſt beautiful when Angry.

Cælia, methinks, that ſweet contracted brow,
Reſembles angry Cupid's bended bow;
Like, that, it aims a ſtroke at every heart,
Whilſt either eye ſupplies a keener dart.

ON WOMEN.

Bright, as thoſe glittering worlds that roll above,
Are women, when in virtue's orb they move;
But then, like ſtars, once fall'n, their light they loſe,
Unheeded fade, and turn to ſlime, like thoſe.

TO MRS. WIGMORE,

Upon ſeeing her at the Mountebank's ſtage.

Could Smith's medicinary power but heal,
With half that eaſe, your fatal glances kill:
How might we bleſs the love-relieving art!
How might it ſoothe this ſad afflicted heart!
But yet, for O! ſo pleaſing is the flame,
So like the charming fair, from whom it came!
Firſt, let each pang diſtract my peaceful reſt,
But never, never! leave my love-ſick breaſt;
Still, ſtill, let hope indulge the dear deſire,
And with the lamp of life alone expire;

So ſhall my death, my faithful paſſion prove,
And my heart die a martyr to my love.

TO MR. EUSDEN,

Deſiring his Corrections on a Poem.*

Dear Sir,

If what a grateful heart can give,
May meet a kind reception, this receive;
To theſe low, humble lines, a while unbend,
And let the critic ſoften to the friend;
Let human candor aid thy judging art,
And thy head ever dictate from thy heart!

Fond to be thought a candidate for fame,
My muſe, ambitious, takes a lofty aim;
But, ah! too bold her wiſh, too large her view,
Unleſs approv'd, unleſs inſpir'd by you;
Unleſs you tune her notes, in vain ſhe ſings,
Unleſs you aid, in vain ſhe ſpreads her wings;
Aw'd by your word, ſhe'll, bluſhing own her fault,
Diſclaiming each extravagance of thought;
Nature, and art, at once, like you, diſpenſe,
And ripen fancy into ſtrength of ſenſe.

Thus, tender trees, with flowers luxuriant ſmile,
Waſte their vain ſap, ungrateful to their ſoil;
Till ſome wiſe hand, with kind corrective care,
Prune their gay pride, and bid their branches bear:
Then fruits, and flowers, promiſcuouſly abound,
Teem from the ſtroke, and bloſſom from the wound.

Sidney-College, Jan. 27. 1725-6.

W. Pattison.

AN APOLOGY TO MR. BELL.

Clarior in tenebris ſi latuiſſet, erat.

Sir,

If I my tributary lays refuſe,
O blame not me, but blame the conſcious muſe!
For when commanding duty bids me ſing,
She ſtops my voice, and breaks the jarring ſtring;
And when I would the pleaſing taſk renew,
The awful Roman riſes to my view,
Let thoſe, ſays he, who aim in all they write,
At once to mingle profit, and delight;
Their theme exactly to their meaſures fit,
Nor vainly hope to riſe above their wit:
Who looks aloft, will ſurely tread awry,
And may miſtake a marl-pit for the ſky.

Yet, like the reſt, I can my tribute bring,
Like ſome perhaps in ſpite of nature ſing:
Ranſack each common author, and from thence
Profane good ancient phraſe with modern ſenſe.
In rapine rich, laboriouſly dull,
Witty, but juſt enough to ſhow a fool;
How could I languiſh in a rural ſong,
And tag the tadpole-paſtoral along?
How ſweetly ſhould the tuneful murmurs creep,
And lull the raviſh'd reader faſt aſleep?
The blaſted oaks ſhould then more juſtly fear,
My rhyming fury, than the thunder's ſcar.

How could I, wing'd with ſplay-foot lyrics fly,
Like hag, on broomſtick, through the troubled ſky!
Rhyming, I'd mount, like Dennis, heretofore,
Bluſter as loudly, and as proudly ſoar.

Well may ſuch poets riſe a tow'ring height,
Who have no thought to intercept their flight;
Nor need they fear to tumble from the ſkies,
For thoſe can never fall, who never riſe.

But ſhall I with collected theft profane
The great, the bleſs'd, the venerable name!
Shall I with murd'rers to the altar fly,
Not through religious zeal, but infamy,
As Blackmore fought in Job a ſanctuary!
Forbid it, Heav'n—I chooſe an humbler fate,
Nor would be wicked, to be vainly great.
Let me in lowlier ſcenes a while delight,
With cooling judgment meditate the flight;
Then, worthy Sir, if time confirm my thought,
The tribute, if 'tis worthy, ſhall be brought;
With double ardour I'll the taſk purſue,
To ſing of Heaven, and ſing to you.

TO MR. HEDGES,

On Reading his Latin Ode to Dr. Broxholme.

Unskill'd in Greek and Roman tongue,
Which words are ſhort, and which are long,
To thee theſe home-ſpun lines I ſend,
Not as a ſcholar, but a friend.

Here I might ſhow from wiſe example,
In work elaborate and ample,
That Homer, though he writ in Greek,
Writ what his mother taughthim ſpeak;
Horace and Virgil's learned Latin,
Was what, when boys, they us'd to prate in,
That all fam'd bards, except the Dutch,
(If there were ever any ſuch)
Have writ the poems, they excel in,
In the ſame tongue they learn'd to ſpell in.

To thee alone, with greateſt eaſe,
'Tis granted, in all ways, to pleaſe;
And, by a gift from heaven miraculous,
All lingua's are to thee vernacula's:
That Horace ſelf had ſcarcely known,
Thy thoughts, or language from his own.

Many a lad returns from ſchool,
A Latin, Greek, and Hebrew fool;
In arts and knowledge ſtill a block,
Though deeply ſkill'd in hic, hæc, hoc.
Heavy they tread the up-hill way,
O'er craggy rocks, and found'ring clay,
Till weary with their road, they ſtop
Juſt at the mountain's lofty top;
Still poring on the barren ground,
View not the beauteous proſpect round;
Which, hid beneath the ſummit, lies
Conceal'd from low and vulgar eyes,
And which alone can amply pay
The toil and drudgery of the way:
From hence they might with tranſport view
All that the ancient ſages knew;
What they perform'd, and what they thought,
How Tully ſpoke, and Cæſar fought;
While manners of a world unknown
Should guide their youth, and form their own;

* Roſamond to Henry.

While bright examples lead to fame,
And vicious teach to fly their ſhame.

Yet we might ſpare the mighty pains
In ſearching ancient dark remains;
Since greater worthies riſe at home,
And Britain ſcorns to yield to Rome.
Auguſtus' reign, renown'd for peace,
For learning, wit, and wealth's increaſe;
No more we envy, while our land
Is doubly bleſs'd from George's hand.
Ammon's ſucceſs, and Cæſar's mind,
To form victorious Marlbro' join'd;
Demoſthenes', and Tully's fame,
Muſt yield to Walpole's greater name;
Faction, and ſtrife, to hear his voice,
Are dumb, and ceaſe their jarring noiſe:
Whole ſenates bow their yielding minds,
Like woods before the ſouthern winds;
Free from deceit, and ſervile art,
He ſpeaks the dictates of his heart;
His tongue enchants, his counſel leads;
Peace enters firſt, then wealth ſucceeds:
His virtues through the land confeſs'd,
While thus he ſoothes us to be bleſt.

If to new ſcenes we turn our view,
And learning, arts, and wit purſue,
Our land can furniſh men of fame,
To eclipſe the Greek, and Roman name.
Locke ſhall inſtruct, and form our youth,
And teach their underſtandings truth.
Vice ſhall look pale, and virtue thrive,
Humanity, and friendſhip live;
While Addiſon our morals rules,
And proves all villains to be fools.
Newton ſhall lead our raviſh'd ſouls,
Through boundleſs worlds beyond the poles;
From ſtar to ſtar direct our way,
As certain, and as fix'd as they.
Examples were but vain to prove,
Our nation's boaſt, our country's love.
A land of patriots brave, and free,
While all mankind ars ſlaves but we!

To what a height true wit can reach,
Let Waller, and let Congreve teach;
And if we needs muſt write by rules,
Without th' aſſiſtance of the ſchools,
In flowing verſe, and lines well-wrought,
What Horace, what Quintilian thought,
Join'd with a little mother wit,
Roſcommon, and our Pope have writ.

The fair, who beſt the muſe inſpire,
Who warm the heart, and tune the lyre,
Superior to all former dames,
Inhabit now the banks of Thames:
Th' Egyptian queen, the ancient's boaſt,
For whom the well-fought world was loſt,
Tell me, dear Hedges, thou canſt tell,
Thou know'ſt the dead, and living well,
Could ſhe her haughty charms compare
With her, who repreſents her here?
Old Homer's theme, the Grecian dame,
Who ſet whole nations in a flame,
No more had been the beauteous prize,
Had they beheld Lavinia's eyes;
The Greeks for her alone had ſtrove,
And Paris had been falſe to love.

Thus taught, and thus inſpir'd, I write
What friendſhip, and what love indite;
Free from each modern witling's vice,
Envy and ſlander, flattery, lies,
To pleaſe our pride, or gain our end,
Each jeſt ſhould ſacrifice a friend;
While one's ill-nature joins to praiſe
What th' other's malice dully ſays;
In peace my harmleſs minutes paſs,
'Twixt buſineſs, beauty, and a glaſs;
Nor want I aught, my ſoul to cheer,
But thee, to join in pleaſure here;
Thus may I live, till life ſhall end,
And love my miſtreſs, country, friend!

TO A FRIEND,

Diſſuading him from loving a certain Lady.

If aught a kindly caution can impart,
Be this, not love, imprinted on thy heart;
Let every line a well-known truth commend,
And, where you doubt the poet, truſt the friend;
Let vanquiſh'd reaſon re-aſſume the field,
And to the true, the fictious goddeſs yield.

What Homer feigns, when fierce Tydides ſtrove
Inſpir'd by Pallas, with the queen of love;
But ſhows the weakneſs of vain beauty's art,
Whilſt wiſdom's ſacred influence arms the heart:
Yet, green in age, unvers'd in female wiles,
Each ſpecious ſhow our eaſy ſight beguiles;
Gay courting ſcenes the early path adorn,
And blooming beauty paints our youthful morn;
Our heedleſs pleaſures with falſe objects riſe,
Blind to the black'ning cloud, and gathering ſkies.
But, ah! methinks, I hear thee, ſighing, ſay,
Such charms invite! ſo flowery ſmiles the way!
Reſolv'd, fair beauty's lovely maze I'll run—
Who might not thus? who would not be undone!—
O ſtay, raſh youth! beware, be timely wiſe,
Lurk'd in that labyrinth, another monſter lies!

How weak were female ſnares, how vain each wile,
Did not our eyes our hood-wink'd minds beguile?
Like groſs idolaters, we form the power,
Then, the dull image, as a god, adore;
Breath'd in ſoft ſighs, our pleading ſouls impart,
And, for the victim, ſacrifice our heart:
Hence, Celia rules, the tyrant of thy breaſt,
In all the ſeeming Deity confeſt;
Hence, when ſhe ſpeaks, there's muſic in the ſound,
Hence, when ſhe looks, her eyes like lightnings wound:
But, to thy reaſon's eye, the ſcene diſplay,
And the proud phantom-goddeſs fades away;
No more her immortality remains,
Unleſs preſerv'd in thy immortal ſtrains.

Grant we, thy Celia's charms ſuperior ſhine,
Or, in the lover's language, look divine;
Yet, is each charm to her alone confin'd?
Or canſt thou judge, by partial paſſion blind?
Still, will each faithful, love-alluring grace,
Beam in her eye, and brighten up her face?

So, the blue ſummit of ſome mountain's height,
Wrapt in gay clouds, deludes the diſtant ſight;
But, as with gazing eyes we draw more near,
Fades the falſe ſcene, and the rough rocks appear.

Nor outward form thy eaſy thought controul,
But be the look an index to the ſoul;
For, when old nature fram'd the faithleſs fair,
From every work the goddeſs cull'd a ſhare;
In heav'nly beauty bade her face excel,
But made her heart the treaſury of hell:
Hence, pride, and luſt, and jealous fury grow,
The ſprings of ſorrow, and the ſeeds of woe!
Thus brothels with a painted angel ſhine,
Whilſt latent devils enambuſh'd, lurk within.

Nor think, my Damon, that I raſhly blame
Thy too good nature, thy too generous flame;
Like thine, my victim'd heart, the pangs has bore,
But, (ah, delightful change!) endures no more;
Yet, O for oft the thought diſturbs my reſt,
'Tis hard to heal a love-envenom'd breaſt;
So ſoft each arrow ſteals upon our heart,
It glides a feather, but it grows a dart.
Yet, wouldſt thou from increaſing ills be free,
Purſue my precepts, and reſolve like me,
When the falſe ſyren ſingles out her man,
Tips the lewd leer, or flaps the flirting fan;
O ſhun th' infection ſwift, victorious, fly,
She ſmiles a ruin, and ſhe looks a lie!
But, muſt ſome lovely, ſome divinely fair,
Sweeten this draught of life, and ſoothe thy care;
Let the gay muſe relieve thy ſickening pain,
And form a brighter Venus of the brain; [grieve,
Then ſhalt thou ſcorn thoſe charms that made thee
And by the fair illuſion learn to live.

So Iſrael's ſons, by poiſonous ſerpents ſtung,
Aloft in air, a mimic ſerpent hung;
Fix'd on the ſight, the ſad afflicted train
Gaz'd into health, and look'd away their pain.

Sidney-Coll. Feb. 19. 1725-6

ON A PAINTED LADY.

Cælia's fair, the charming toaſt,
May of each perfection boaſt;
What penurious nature owes,
Art more liberal beſtows:
Bids a freſher bluſh ariſe,
Keener lightning arm her eyes;
Adds, or animates a grace,
And wakes the wonders of her face:
The bluſhing tinctures ſmiling flow,
To ſee how cunningly they grow;
To ſee how all the beaus adore
Cælia, mortal now no more,
New created by their power.

Thus the faireſt ſweeteſt place,
Once uncultivated was;
Where parterres their flowers diſcloſe,
Buſhes, brakes, and briars roſe;
Thorns with pointed horror ſtood,
And arm'd the borders of the wood;
But ſince the workman's pow'rful hand
Subdu'd, and civiliz'd the land;
Tun'd the torrents to caſcades,
And ſoften'd foreſts into ſhades,
Surpriſing ſcenes attract our ſight,
And turn diſpleaſure to delight;
The ſavages forſake their place,
And yield to nobler human race.

An Natura intendat Monſtrum? Mr.

Tranſlated from the Carm. Quad.

Press'd with a load of poverty and years,
How ſtrange a progidy the wretch appears;
Whoſe trembling limbs, and furrow'd brows reveal,
The noxious witch, foe to the public weal;
Who gathers herbs by moon light, and alarms
The neighb'ring villages with magic charms:
To her imagin'd ſpells dire woes ſucceed,
The gen'rous courſer lothes the flow'ry mead;
Spurning the glebe around the field he flies,
Forſakes his dappled mares, repines, and dies.

From infants tender throats (what nurſes ſay
There numbers ſhall to wond'ring ears convey)
Sharp pins and needles tear their bloody way.
From heifers ſtubborn teats the trickling ſtore
Of milky nectar now deſcends no more;
Dame Baucis trudges to the fields in vain,
Few drops, alas! her ſtinted pails contain.

Oft the malicious hag is ſeen to fly,
Through the large convex of the nether ſky;
Upborn by magic ſtaff ſhe rides ſecure,
(Superior to the giddy whirlwinds power.)
Advent'rous, o'er the pathleſs welkin ſtrays,
Mocks the rude winds, and in the tempeſt plays.
Now dwindled to an hare, ſhe ſcours in view,
While the full cry her circling maze purſue;
Now tir'd, the beagle's eager ſpeed eludes,
In puzzling thickets loſt, or trackleſs woods:
The baffled hunters for the witch inquire,
Now ſafely ſeated by the kitchen fire;
Hid in grimalkin's form, with ſullen pride,
Demure ſhe ſits, and licks her tabby ſide.

Whence knows ſhe thus to vary her diſguiſe,
And in a borrow'd ſhape deceive our eyes?
She, whom the reſtleſs courſe of time made old,
(Time that diſtorts the faireſt human mould)
Though a poor ſimple ſoul as ever liv'd,
Is by the vulgar as a witch receiv'd.
Thus monſters in our mind alone exiſt,
We give 'em birth, and ſhape them as we liſt.

TO MR. ROCHE,

Upon his tranſlating the foregoing Piece.

To praiſe unknown, unknowing to commend,
Diſtinguiſhes the critic from the friend:
Such was my juſt applauſe when public fame
Proclaim'd your merit, but conceal'd your name.
Like Egypt we ador'd the teeming flood,
And bleſs'd the latent author of our good.

No more ſhall ſilly tales the world deceive,
No more the ſillier world thoſe tales believe:
Each wither'd crone ſhall live and die unblam'd,
And be no more a witch or wizard nam'd:
No public grievances inſeſt her eaſe,
But innocently ſhe may ſtink in peace.
The only prodigy which now appears,
Is ſuch a genius ſo beyond its years.

TO A WRETCHED POETASTER;

That went into mourning to counterfeit his ſiſter's death.

In vain, poor fuſtian ſop, you dreſs and write,
Begot in nature's ſcorn, and wit's deſpite;
For ſure ſhe made thee only for a rule,
To form a coxcomb, and a canting fool;
In vain you tag dull miſerable rhyme,
And make it with your ſham'bling legs to chime;
The muſe you may purſue in nature's ſpite,
But never overtake her tow'ring flight;
In this you're only right, ſo ſmart in black,
For then, you ſhow your ſoul, upon your back.

As the ſly peaſant hangs a breathleſs crow,
To ſcare the vermin from the corn below;
So fortune ſets thee in a * world of wit,
To keep fools like thyſelf from taſting it.

Of old, we read Amphion's ſacred ſong,
Could draw dull blocks and ſenſeleſs ſtones along;
The ſame effect among thy books we ſee,
For they draw blocks, as dull, in drawing thee.

Thy wit, and money, both are of a length,
Both ſtol'n, dependant on each other's ſtrength;
But ſoon thy ſiſter ſhall reſume her breath,
And to thy muſe, and thee give ſurer death;
Then, thoſe black enſigns of her wiſh'd-for fate,
May mourn thy tranſient wit, and loſt eſtate.

Wrote at Appleby School, 1723.

SONG.

'Twas in the ſolemn noon of night,
As I lay by a murmuring ſtream,
Betray'd by fancy's ſweet delight,
Amus'd by an amorous dream.

When ſtraight I heard, or ſeem'd to hear,
From an ivy's dark reverend ſhade,
A ſolemn ſound aſſault mine ear,
And heavily pierce the thick glade.

But ſoon a faint pale form appear'd,
Like a ſhade on a moon-ſhiny wall;
To it's gor'd breaſt it's hand it rear'd,
And utter'd this ſorrowful call.

O pity me kind hearted ſwain!
For you knew, ah too well! the falſe maid;
She lov'd me firſt, firſt ſooth'd my pain,
She ſooth'd it, but then ſhe betray'd!

Depreſs'd with anguiſh, rage, and grief,
I fatally fought out this grove,
Here raſhly cut the thread of life,
And ended all hopes of my love!

But yet, though beauty cannot pleaſe,
And, though I'm now taſteleſs of charms,
'Twill rob me of eternal reſt,
To think her enjoy'd in thy arms.

Yet once, I think, thou wert my friend,
Till the friend in the rival was loſt,
O kindly let the rival end.
Nor farther torment a poor ghoſt!

* Meaning his books.

For this a reſtleſs ſhade I rove
Be warn'd by my pitiful fate!
Betimes, betimes renounce your love,
Nor ponder this leſſon too late!

So may good angels guard thy ſleep.—
But I to the falſe-hearted maid
Will glide, and through the curtains peep;
There ſhow her the man ſhe betray'd.

She cannot, ſure, ſhe cannot ſee
So wretched an object unmov'd!
At leaſt, I think, ſhe'll pity me,
More truly than ever ſhe lov'd.

Farewell—but, go to yonder cave,
Where my bones to the ravens lie bare;
Inhume them kindly in a grave,
And my fame from aſperſers, O clear!

I trembled as the ſpectre ſpoke,
And ſtarting, awak'd with the fright,
While the hoarſe night bird's hollow croak,
Preſented the ſhivering ſp'rit.

A ſudden chillneſs freez'd my breaſt,
My ſoul in a terror was fled;
Fainting, I ſunk, benumb'd oppreſs'd,
And dreamt that Beliza was dead.

When ſoon, for now the dawning light
Be-jewell'd the dew-dropping vale,
A youth came poſting through the night;
To tell me the fore-boded tale.

The maid was dead—my fears were juſt,
I aroſe, and ſoon found out the cave,
Prepar'd an urn, then mix'd their duſt,
And weeping laid both in a grave.

FROM LONDON TO CAMBRIDGE.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. ROCHE.

Sir,

Yours, I receiv'd, with mighty pleaſure,
Attended with my learned * treaſure;
And had I Burkett's knack, and time,
I'd ſhoe my muſe's feet with rhyme,
I'd ſend you ſuch a pack of news,
Nay, make an hackney of my muſe:
Prove logically Pope a fool †,
Sagely denounce great Shakſpeare dull,
To both prefer good Maſter Fenton,
Or, in a moment's time invent one;
But for neceſſity you know,
One's ſelf might ſtand—in ſtatu quo.

But hang it, I've no turn for ſatire,
Beſides, 'tis quite againſt my nature;
For criticiſms! pſhaw the bottle——
The devil take your Ariſtotle:
Give me a ſparkling foaming glaſs,
As bright and clever as my laſs;
Thus let us dance an endleſs round,
Till one or t'other throws me down.

But now to talk a little ſerious,
Nor vainly light, nor yet myſterious;

* Books received.

† In anſwer to Burkett's aſſerting theſe tenets.

Pray how do Cambridge matters ſtand?
How fare the brethren of the band?
For now I think on't in your laſt,
Thoſe things were negligently paſs'd;
But in your next, pray let me know,
If you can come to town or no;
For ſolitary here I ſtay,
Impatient at your long delay;
Moſt indolently ſpend my time,
Or ſleep, or drink, or idly rhyme;
Now lay new models for a poem,
Then in a moment's time undo 'em;
For faith the tuneful tribe neglect me,
While you are abſent to direct me.
But, if you'll come, then in a trice,
Aſſiſted by your good advice;
I'll poliſh my poetic ſtore,
And fiſh for trouts in metaphor;
To Thames' ſerene retreats repair,
And finiſh my ſix cantos there *;
My pleaſurable labours done,
Subſcribe, your ſervant Pattiſon.

TO THE SAME.

While you, my dear, ſit moap'd in college,
And loſe your wit in ſearch of knowledge,
Reſtrain'd by tutors, aw'd by doctors,
And watch'd by ſupercilious proctors;
I make the preſent day my own,
And dedicate it to the town:
As how? why thus; here's juſt a piece
And this is all, my pleaſure's price;
With this I'll get politely drunk,
With this I'll get ſome courtly punk,
Not one of your damn'd common whores,
That ply it at your merchant's doors;
But one, ay, ſuch a one! ſo fine!
You bards would call her ſome divine---
Some---but a rapture here encroaches,
Time ſpends---you captain of the coaches!
Here maſter---where? why to the Roſe,
(A place that every body knows.)

But now we've got a moment's talk,
As folks tell ſtories as they walk;
For once I'll be as dull and ſober,
As if I'd guzzled fat October.

I know you, and twenty more,
If once poetically---poor;
Would ſit and frown, be hipp'd, and ſnivel,
And curſe your fortune to the devil;
Whilſt I, all gay, and debonair,
Till I muſt feel, would nothing fear.
Riches are joys indeed---I want 'em,
And I'll thank fortune if ſhe'll grant 'em;
If not---why I'm the richer ſtill---
No, no, you mean the poorer Will---
The richer, Sir, I ſay again,
And thus the matter I'll explain.

Thoſe mortals, happy, you'll allow,
Who nothing borrow, nothing owe?
But ſearch the world: and if you can
In town or country find that man,
To your opinion I'll deſcend,
If not, I hope, you'll hear your friend.

Well, for that's neareſt, go to court,
Begin your ſearch, I wiſh you ſport:
His Honour, Lordſhip, and his Grace,
All mighty men! in mighty place!
But how are all thoſe honours gain'd?
Thoſe mighty places, how obtain'd?
How? why by intereſt and favour,
Then let me note, Sir, by your leave here;
Thoſe dignities 'tis plainly ſhown,
Are but another's, not their own;
Soon got, they may as ſoon be loſt,
While whim and fancy rule the roaſt;
And very plainly, by the bye,
Belong as much to you or I.

But if they're bob'd by church or ſtate,
You ſay they've got a great eſtate:
A great eſtate! by whom? or how?
Lord, Sir! you're too inquis'tive now---
Job's father's dead, he's eldeſt ſon,
Juſt come to age, ſo all's his own;
What would you more? but lend your ear,
And in a moment you ſhall hear;
Your 'ſquire has wealth, and therefore parts!
Is great at court, deep vers'd in arts:
Yet whilſt his ſtock of wealth and ſenſe,
Is due to men or providence;
He lives!---but on another's pence!
And while he grows the richer, yet
He only runs the more in debt;
Hence logically I could ſhow,
The more we have, the more we owe;
But time's too precious thus to ſpend,
And ſee we're at our journey's end---
Here, O delicious! take the glaſs---
O fill it higher! name the laſs---
Now make a fool, as tale ſhall bleſs us,
Of Ariſtotle, and of Crœſus.

TO MR. MITCHELL,

Upon his poetical petition to the Honourable Sir Robert Walpole.

Back, ſcribbler, to thy Caledonian plains,
Cold as thy genius, barren as thy brains;
To thoſe inhoſpitable mountains ſhow,
A curſed rhyming itch they never knew;
Nor think to read thy lectures here; for know,
We never take dictators from the plough:
Then peaceably betimes reſign thy quill,
Scotland to Britiſh power is ſubject ſtill;

While Congreve with a juſt politeneſs warms,
While eaſy Pope with flowing muſic charms;
While witty Swift ſhall every muſe adorn,
And Dennis ſcourge the fools he does not ſcorn;
While Philips' verſe delights the liſt'ning ſwains,
And Steele declines the praiſe his merit gains;
While Fenton's ſadly-pleaſing numbers move,
And Granville kindles up a nobler love.
While happy we theſe tuneful bards can hear,
No foreign jargon ſhall debauch our ear.

* He had a deſign of writing a poem upon angling, in ſix cantos.

Yet warm'd by Britiſh heat, and Britiſh lays,
Thou ſtriv'ſt to turn thy libel into praiſe;
Thus Egypt's ſtreams in muddy currents run,
And ripen into monſters by the ſun.
In vain thou'rt ſanctify'd with Milton's name,
Not even Homer ſhould protect thy ſhame;
In Pope, that mighty Greek thy baſeneſs knows,
And Zoilus and Homer ſtill were foes.
Murderers like thee to an aſylum fly,
Not to ſhow zeal, but hide their infamy:
And with convicted villains may'ſt thou go,
Guilty of robbery, and murder too;
For trace thy ſteps, and preſently we find
The hand that robb'd Pack's garden of the mind;
Murdering each ſweet, diſguiſing it for thine,
And making mortal what he made divine.

ON HIS MISTRESS'S FAVOURS.

Like Alexander, Cælia ſpreads her power,
Like him, ſhe makes the vaſſal world adore;
But, ah! like him, to ſoothe a proud deſire,
Firſt conquers towns, then ſets thoſe towns on fire.

TO MR. POPE.

Dear Sir,
And ſure that fond, familiar name,
May hint, that friendſhip is my gen'rous aim;
O then this frankneſs of my heart excuſe,
And with a ſmile confirm the bluſhing muſe;
Ambitious hope! yet ſay, to bleſs our eyes,
Thy mighty Homer ſhould again ariſe,
Wouldſt thou not pant, the wondrous man to ſee?
Speak from thy inmoſt ſoul!---then cenſure me!
And as aloft in laurell'd ſtate you ſit,
And view below the ſubject ſons of wit;
O, teach thoſe arduous ways through which you
came,
And lead her through the flowery paths of fame.
A child, as yet, no certain ſteps ſhe takes,
But now and then a wild excurſion makes;
Mocks the grave dictates of her guardian art,
Steals from her ſight, and plays a wanton's part.
Though croſs'd myſelf in every glorious aim,
'Tis hope, at leaſt, to be ally'd to fame.
And whilſt the witty and the fair commend,
It hints ſome merit to be call'd thy friend.
Fir'd at that word, againſt my fate I'll ſtrive,
And dare to emulate that praiſe I'd give.
What though I fail the bold attempt to gain,
Mean were the thought to think it made in vain.
The richeſt ore ſhines uſeleſs unreveal'd,
And ſmalleſt talents ſhould not be conceal'd.
For, ſure the muſe that gen'rous verſe inſpires,
Which friendſhip dictates, and affection fires;
Warm'd by a faint reflexion of thy flame,
My boſom kindles at immortal fame;
But well I know the raſhneſs of my youth,
Perhaps theſe lines confirm the fatal truth!
No ſordid views could ever yet ſeduce,
The virgin-chaſteneſs of my youthful muſe;
Let venal hards in ſtate-promotion play,
There ſport like atoms in the ſtream of day.
I never made a wealthy idiot laugh,
Or Iſrael-like ador'd a golden calf;
But when I ſee true worth conſpicuous ſhine,
I burn to make the bright alliance mine.
Superior to the formal world's controul,
Pride in its charms, and claim a kindred ſoul;
O! then this token of my zeal receive,
For next to merit praiſes, is to give.

UPON SEEING A LADY

At the Muſic-Booth at Sturbridge-Fair. By J. Taylor.

Could theſe faint numbers glow with equal
fire,
To that which in his breaſt the writer feels:
Could Phœbus like the fair unknown inſpire,
And verſe, but emulate the flame it tells,
The lover ſome ſucceſs had found, and ſhe
Been known to fame, though loſt to love and me.

Wound not that love with too ſevere a name,
Which was not chance, but paſſion in exceſs,
Conceal'd the ſhaft from whence the arrow
came,
My hopes may be, but not my anguiſh leſs:
Strikes not the lightning with a fate as true,
Though baffled reaſon wonder'd whence it flew.

If not in pity to your lover's woes,
For your own ſake, at leaſt, yourſelf reveal,
Leſt when I die, and thou the latent cauſe,
You loſe a triumph you deſerve ſo well;
Nay, ev'n repaid with all my ſuff'rings be,
And envy'd by my fall—if known, I fall by thee.

Yet more—a thouſand loves may lurk behind,
And half the courſe of glory yet to run;
A flowing wit, diſcreet, and beauteous mind,
May crown the conqueſt which your eyes
begun;
Nor bid me dread the thouſand deaths in ſtore,
I look'd, I ſigh'd, and lov'd—and was undone before!

In vain I, midnight-anchorite, muſt boaſt
Of rugged maxims, and pedantic rules,
For what is life, if beſt enjoyment loſt
In the dull mazes of inſipid ſchools?
Love, muſt refine what ſcience ſcarce began,
And mould the letter'd ſavage into man.

Let lazy hermits dream in college-cells
Severely great, and indolently good,
Whoſe frozen breaſts ſuch glimm'ring rapture
ſells,
As lifeleſs, dull platonics underſtood.
Go, tell that doating ſage, who looks on thee
With Plato's eyes, may queſtion if he ſee.

Judge now my paſſion by ſevereſt truth,
And read what rig'rous juſtice cannot blame
If I have err'd, inform a willing youth,
At leſt, miſtaken only was my flame.
Was love a crime? then teach me to adore,
And zeal ſhall be what paſſion was before.

TO A LADY,

THAT SENT ME A FLOWERED CAP.

What flowers of rhet'ric can I uſe
Theſe brighter flowers to commend?

What gift, or preſent, can I chooſe,
Equivalent to ſend?

I've ſearch'd the muſes fertile field,
But ſearching no where can find ſuch,
Nor even nature's ſelf can yield,
What I admire ſo much.

This token, o'er my temples ſpread,
A double power does impart;
For as it gently warms my head,
It fires my bleeding heart.

But let the bluſt'ring ſtorms engage,
The ruffling winds blow high;
Thus arm'd I'll mock their empty rage,
And every blaſt defy.

Like the bold Grecian chief I ſtand,
In arms ſuperior ſhine;
Like his, they boaſt an heavenly hand,
But ſkill, much more divine!

He did not fear a wound, 'tis true,
From none, except the deities:
And I'm invulnerable too,
To all—except my Laura's eyes.

TO MRS. MARY FREWEN,

UPON HER HAVING THE SMALL-POX.

Let others penſive o'er their mirrors trace,
The beauteous ruins of a former face;
Nor for thy beauties, lovely maid repine,
Thy beauties mingled in a mould divine,
Can but endure a momentary pain,
And like all heavenly ſubſtance heal again.

And ſee thy dangers, and our fears are o'er,
Hearts pant, ſighs heave, and ſorrow ſtreams no more!
As gold by purging flame ſtill clearer glows,
As virtue from affliction brighter grows,
Sweet e'en in griefs, and e'en in pangs ſerene,
Dawn the dear glories of Euphrenia's mien;
Dear to the muſe, who trembling ſpreads her wings,
To ſhrowd the lover, as her poet ſings;
But as he loves, alas! he ſings in vain,
When beauty's in affliction, every ſtrain.
When every charm a thouſand charms reſumes,
And fair as Eden, from confuſion blooms,
Raptur'd he ſtands, and boldly dares divine,
How to an angel thou muſt once refine.

TO THE COUNTESS OF HERTFORD,

Madam,

If the following lines, the reſult of my misfortunes this morning, can engage your ladyſhip's encouragement to the poems I propoſe afterwards, it will be no ſmall recommendation to their publicappearance; and, a very great favour to their author.

Your Ladyſhip's moſt devoted,
and moſt humble ſervant,
William Pattiſon.

Fair patroneſs of gentle arts excuſe,
This rude addreſs of an unhappy muſe;
A muſe, bereft of every worldly view!---
Unknown ſhe comes---but then ſhe comes to you!
And, if a ſtranger's ſoul diſtreſtful, ſigh,
Tun'd by kind ſympathy, our ſouls reply;
Explore the cauſe through a long train of ills,
And, pitying ſhare thoſe woes the ſufferer feels:
The loſs of fortune, friends, or fame divine,---
O grievous loſs! and muſt I call it mine!
And muſt I ſtill reflect thoſe happier hours,
When, peaceably retir'd, in Granta's bowers
I lay, the pleaſing paths to learning plann'd,
And, Moſes-like, juſt ſaw the promis'd land.
Juſt ſaw—but, O my ſoul! I live to mourn
The joyous ſcene, that can no more return!
Diſtreſs!—and have my boundleſs griefs reveal'd
The thought—ambition labouring had conceal'd!
In vain, for when we dictate from the heart,
Nature will ſpeak at every pauſe of art;
And like a baſhful virgin, half expreſt,
In ſpite of all the woman, bluſh the reſt—
Though pangful-martyrs ſmile upon their grief
To man, yet ſigh to him, who ſends relief.
Whence then, my muſe, thy bluſh, and why thy tears,
'Tis not the world—alleviate thy fears;
Remember well, that virtue ſtill the ſame,
Sounds the ſoft earneſt of immortal fame!
Though want itſelf might feed her famiſh'd eye,
And ſorrow ſweeten into harmony?
O how I long to change this mournful ſtrain,
But when fate frowns, the muſes ſmile in vain!
Doom'd by the ſad ſeverity of fate,
And muſt I bound my glory with my hate!
It muſt be ſo—like Noah's dove diſtreſt,
In vain I wander up and down for reſt,
From ſpray to ſpray I traverſe every tree,
And offer up my greeneſt branch to thee?

To the Right Honourable
THE LORD CARTERET.

With an indulgent ſmile, my Lord, excuſe
This ſadly true prediction of the muſe;
And may this ſingle ſpecimen of woe *
Speak for the reſt, and all its author ſhow;
Nor bluſhing let me mourn my youthful hours,
As vainly ſpent in the Parnaſſian bowers.
By nature prompted and a ſlave to fate,
I ſtrove to pleaſe the witty and the great;
Preſumptuous hence, nor without hopes I come
To you, and from your taſte await my doom;
From thence implore the ſanction of your name,
To be my paſſport through the gates of fame.
So, miners, firſt the bullion ore refine,
Then beg their monarch's ſtamp, to make it current coin.

A HARVEST SCENE.

Behold———
The green fields yellowing into corny gold!
White o'er their ranks, an old man half appears,
How hale he looks, though hoar'd with ſeventy years;

* The hour-glaſs, ſubjoined to his propoſals.

His prospect mounts, slow-pac'd, he strives to climb,
And seems some ancient monument of time;
Propt o'er his staff the reverend father stands,
And views heaven's blessings with uplifted hands;
Gleeful in heart computes the year's increase,
And portions out, in thought, his homely race,
His homely race before, his hopes improve,
And labour in obedience for his love;
Sweepy they cut, then bind the sheafy-grain,
And bend beneath the burthen of the plain;
His cheerful eyes, with silent praises crown
Their toils, and smile at vigour once his own;
Till the mid-sun to second nature's call,
Noon-marks the distant steeple's ivy'd wall,
Thence warn'd, he waves his arms, with giddy haste,
The circling summons to a cool repaste.

EFFIGIES AUTHORIS.

Oppress'd with griefs, with poverty, and scorn,
Of all forsaken, and of all forlorn,
What shall I do? or whither shall I flie?
Or what kind ear will hear the muse's cry?
With restless heart from place to place I roam,
A wretched vagrant destitute of home;
Driv'n from fair Granta's shade by fortune's frown,
I came to court the flatt'rer in the town.
Three tedious days detain'd me on the road,
Whilst the winds whistled, and the torrents flow'd,
On my devoted head the gusty breeze,
Shook the collected tempest, from the trees;
For shelter to the shades, I ran in vain,
The shades deceitful deluge'd me with rain;
Thus when fate frowns upon our happier days,
Our friend, perhaps, our bosom friend betrays:
But as vicissitudes controul our fate,
And griefs and joys maintain a doubtful state,
So now the sun's emerging orb appears,
And with the spongy clouds dispels my fears,
In tears the transient tempests flits away,
And all the blue expansion flames with day.
My gazing eyes o'er pleasing prospects roll,
And look away the sorrows of my soul,
Pleas'd at each view, some rueful thought to draw,
And moralize on every scene I saw;
Here, with inviting pride blue mountains rise,
Like joys more pleasant to our distant eyes;
In golden waves, there tides of harvest flow,
Whilst idle poppies intermingling grow,
How like their brother fops an empty show!
In every bush the warbling birds advance,
Sing to the sun, and on the branches dance;
No grief, no cares perplex their souls with strife,
Like bards they live a poor but merry life;
In every place alike their fortunes lie,
Both live in want, and unregarded die.
With like concern they meet approaching death,
In prison, or in fields, resign their breath;
Musing, I saw the fate I could not shun,
Shook my grave head, and pensive travell'd on:
But as Augusta's wish'd-for domes arise,
Peep o'er the clouds, and dance before my eyes.
What thoughts, what tumults fill'd my lab'ring
To be conceiv'd alone, but not express'd; [breast,
What intermingled multitudes arose,
Lords parsons, lawyers, baronets, and beaux,
Fops, coxcombs, cits, and knaves of ev'ry class,
While some the better half, some wholly ass,
On either side bewailing suppliants stand, [hand.
Speak with their looks, and stretch their wither'd
In feeble accents supplicate relief,
And by their sorrows multiply my grief,
Mov'd by their wants, my fortune I deplore,
And deal a tribute from my slender store.
With joy, the favour they receive, and pray,
That God, the bounteous blessing, may repay;
Thus providently wise, the lab'ring swain
O'er the plough'd furrows strews the fertile grain:
The grateful plain o'er-pays his bounteous care,
With tenfold blessings, and a golden year.

Now lost in thought, I wander up and down
Of all unknowing, and to all unknown;
Try in each place, and ransack ev'ry news,
To find some friend, some patron of the muse:
But where? or whom? alas! I search in vain,
The fruitless labour only gives me pain;
But soon each pleasing prospect fades away,
And with my money all my hopes decay.

But now the sun diffus'd a fainter ray,
And falling dews bewail'd the falling day,
When to St. James's park my way I took,
Solemn in pace, and sadden'd in my look:
On the first bench my wearied bones I laid,
For gnawing hunger on my vitals prey'd;
There faint in melancholy mood I sate,
And meditated on my future fate.
Nights sable vapours now the trees invade,
And gloomy darkness deepen'd ev'ry shade;
And now, ah! whither shall the helpless fly,
From the nocturnal horrors of the sky;
With empty rage my cruel fate I curse,
While falling tears bedew my meagre purse;
What shall I do? or whither shall I run?
How 'scape the threat'ning fate I cannot shun;
There, trembling cold, and motionless I lay,
Till sleep beguil'd the tumults of the day.
" Yet though this mortal body was resign'd,
" Tormenting objects terrified my mind,
" Despairing forms too dreadful for the light,
" Danc'd on my eyes, and play'd before my sight;
" Here worn with sorrow, poverty appear'd,
" In ev'ry ghastly form by mortals fear'd:
" And now to make my wants the more deplor'd,
" Prepar'd a plenteous table richly stor'd.
" My hand I stretch'd impatient of delay,
" When lo! the fictious treat dissolv'd away,
" Despair arose, and shook a deadly dart,
" Then aim'd the thirsty arrow at my heart;
" Inly I quiver'd, trembled for my life,
" Lost in tumultuous agony and grief.

" But now a kind, though visionary shade
" Gleam'd through the gloom, and brighten'd all
" the glade,
" On its fair head a branching laurel grew,
" And though before unseen, the form I knew;
" While thus it spoke—poor youth, thy fate I
" mourn,
" And weeping make thy miseries my own;

" But patiently reſign—I bring relief,
" For as I caus'd, 'tis juſt, I cure thy grief.
" Then hear—when morning's beamy rays ariſe,
" And ſhoot refulgent glories through the ſkies;
" To Chiſwick's pleaſurable bowers repair,
" To guide your wand'ring path be Thames's care;
" In thoſe fair hoſpitable ſhades you'll find,
" Great Burlington, the muſe's ſureſt friend:
" Fam'd Burlington, as humble as he's great,
" Pride of the court, and bulwark of the ſtate;
" To him this viſionary tale diſcloſe,
" His ſoul will melt in pity at your woes.
" To him return your long neglected lyre,
" And let his virtues every line inſpire;"
Farewell it ſaid—when as the morn appear'd,
To the warm rays my dewy head I rear'd,
Amaz'd, half drowſy, waken'd in a fright,
I ponder'd on the viſion of the night;
When thoughtleſs in my pocket I reveal'd,
A latent ſixpence happily conceal'd,
Surpris'd with tranſport ſtood my briſtled hair,
On wings I ſeem'd to fly, and tread in air:
To the firſt houſe I took my ſpeedy flight,
There wrote this recent viſion of the night;
The wond'rous tale in ſnowy foldings bound,
Then ſeal'd the paſſport with a waxen wound.
When prompted by my genius, ſwift as thought,
To Chiſwick's bowers my rueful ſtory brought;
Where now with doubtful hopes, and fears, I wait
Your bounteous lordſhip's pleaſure at your gate.

W. PATTISON.

ON A GENTLEMAN'S PICTURE.

POETS and painters rival glories claim,
Alike their labours, and alike their fame;
Appelles by a Homer's thoughts deſign'd,
And Homer was the picture of his mind:
From both the ſame immortal wonders riſe,
At once in ſpeaking to our ears, and eyes;
The pencil's art, a ſeeming likeneſs gives,
But by the pen alone, that likeneſs lives;
For time, that makes thoſe colours fainter ſhow,
Gives life to theſe, and makes them brighter grow.

But your's, bold artiſt *, claim a longer date,
The great original preſerves their fate;
To future fame tranſmit the finiſh'd piece,
And boaſt a perfect parallel with Greece;
Nor boaſt too much—for though the face we find,
We loſe the noble image of the mind:
'Tis ours to draw the manners, yours the men,
And painting's but the ſhadow of the pen:
Yet happy in your art, O, bleſs your fate!
'Tis honour here enough to imitate;
Whilſt we, confounded by your ſkilful hand,
Think the draught lives, and fix'd like pictures ſtand.

VERSES

By way of contraſt to the foregoing Copy, and wrote upon the ſame occaſion.

CRASSUS, the dulleſt, moſt pedantic fool,
That ever humm'd o'er jargon in a ſchool,
Ambitious of attaining endleſs fame,
At firſt, by ſtudy thought to raiſe his name;
For this, by day, the plodding pedant por'd;
For this, by night, o'er ſacred ſages ſnor'd;
But when he found his dull attempts were vain,
And nature gave him too much tongue for brain:
Thinks he the painter ſhall theſe honours give,
And make this face, at leaſt, in colours live,
Quick as his word, the ſeeds of fame ariſe,
And lo! the mimic monſter ſtrikes our eyes!
So like! ſo juſt the living copy too,
For both were made for nothing but for ſhow!
O may their fates to the ſame end be turn'd,
May both be hang'd, and when decay'd, both burn'd!

ON CRASSUS.

DULL magiſterial fool, forbear
To ſpit thy pointleſs venom here;
To more exalted glories born,
Thy mean indignities I ſcorn;
Secure of fame, I boaſt my lays,
While Pope, while Pack, or Congreve praiſe;
Let theſe but favour what I write,
And damn'd like thee, be all thy ſpite:
No more ſhall duty force my lays,
To gild thy vanities with praiſe;
If e'er again my colours ſtrive,
To make thy painter's daubings live;
May fate, and ev'ry muſe combine,
To blaſt me, and the vile deſign;
In ſhort, may heav'n, and all agree,
To make me ſuch an aſs as thee.

WOMEN AND WINE:

AN EPIGRAM.

'TWAS a doubt in debate among ſages of yore,
Whether women or wine had more abſolute power;
Now had I been the judge when the matter was done,
Not one had been wiſer than when it begun;
For how can man tell which the ſtrongeſt to call,
When with the ſame eaſe both can give him a fall?

AD CÆLUM.

GOOD Heaven! this myſtery of life explain,
Nor let me think I bear the load in vain;
Leſt with the tedious paſſage cheerleſs grown,
Urg'd by deſpair I throw the burden down.

POETICAL WORKS

OF

JAMES HAMMOND, Esq.

Containing his

LOVE ELEGIES, PROLOGUE TO ELMERIC,

&c. &c. &c.

To which is prefixed

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

Perhaps ev'n Genius pours a ſlighted lay;
Perhaps ev'n Friendſhip ſheds a fruitleſs tear;
Ev'n Lyttleton but vainly trims the bay,
And fondly graces HAMMOND's mournful bier.

Though weeping virgins haunt his favour'd urn,
Renew their chaplets, and repeat their ſighs;
Though near his tomb Sabean odours burn,
The loitering fragrance, will it reach the ſkies?

No, ſhould his DELIA votive wreaths prepare,
DELIA might place the votive wreaths in vain:
Yet the dear hope of DELIA's future care,
Once crown'd his pleaſures, and diſpell'd his pain.

THE LIFE OF HAMMOND.

Of James Hammond, though he be generally known as an elegiac poet, and well remembered as a man eſteemed and careſſed by the elegant and the great, few memorials are to be found.

The accounts of his biographers are diſcordant and unſatisfactory. According to Shiels, he was the ſon of a Turkey merchant in the city of London, and had ſome office at the Prince of Wales's Court, till the love of a lady, whoſe name was Daſhwood, for a time diſordered his underſtanding. The lady either could not return his paſſion with a reciprocal fondneſs, or entertained too ambitious views to ſettle her affections upon him. "He was inextinguiſhably amorous, and his miſtreſs inexorably cruel."

"Of this narrative," Dr. Johnſon ſays, "part is true, and part falſe. He was the ſecond ſon of Anthony Hammond, a man of note among the wits, poets, and parliamentary orators, in the beginning of this century, who was allied to Sir Robert Walpole, by marrying his ſiſter."

This account is ſtill erroneous. He was of a different family; the ſecond ſon of Anthony Hammond, Eſq. of Somerſham-place, in the county of Huntingdon, member of Parliament for Shoreham in Suſſex. He vacated his ſeat, December 7. 1708, upon being made a Commiſſioner of the Navy, and died about 1728.

Anthony Hammond, Eſq. who had the name of "the ſilver-tongued Hammond," given him by Bolingbroke, was of Wotton in the county of Norfolk. He married Suſannah, a ſiſter of Sir Robert Walpole. A volume of miſcellany poems was inſcribed to him, in 1694, by his friend Hopkins; and in 1720, he was himſelf the editor of "A New Miſcellany of Original Poems," in which he had no ſmall ſhare. He was the intimate friend of Mr. Moyle; and wrote the "Account of his Life and Writings," prefixed to his works in 1727.

He was born about 1710, and educated at Weſtminſter-ſchool; but it does not appear that he was of any univerſity.

He ſeems to have come very early into public notice, and to have been diſtinguiſhed by thoſe whoſe friendſhip prejudiced mankind at that time in favour of the man on whom they were beſtowed; for he was the companion of Cobham, Lyttleton, and Cheſterfield, by whoſe intereſt he obtained the place of Equerry to the Prince of Wales.

He was alſo much eſteemed by Nicholas Hammond, Eſq.; who, at his death, which happened Oct. 13. 1733, left him an eſtate worth 400 l. a-year, beſides leaving 500 l. for erecting a ſchool-houſe, and 500 l. for endowing it.

In 1740, he wrote the Prologue to "Elmeric," a poſthumous tragedy, written by Lillo; in which it is ſaid, that when he wrote that play, he was diſtreſſed by want, and affected by diſeaſe. But in the former particular there appears to be a miſtake, as he died poſſeſſed of an eſtate of 60 l. a-year, beſides other effects to a conſiderable value. The Epilogue has alſo been aſcribed to Hammond.

In 1741, he was choſen into Parliament for Truro in Cornwall; probably one of thoſe who were elected by the Prince's influence.

He died at Stowe, the famous ſeat of Lord Cobham, June 7. 1742, in the thirty-ſecond year of his age. Miſs Daſhwood long ſurvived him, and died unmarried, bed-chamber-woman to the Queen, in 1779.

The character which her lover bequeathed her, was not likely to attract courtſhip; yet it was her own fault that ſhe remained ſingle, having had another very honourable offer.

The character of Hammond seems to have been highly amiable and respectable. He is said to have divided his life between pleasure and books; in his retirement forgetting the town, and in his gaiety losing the student. Of his literary hours, all the efforts are here exhibited, except a Ballad sung at Vauxhall forty years ago, beginning, O how could I venture to love one like thee! and the Epilogue to "Elmeric," which have been given to him.

His Love Elegies, written "before he was twenty-two years old," were published soon after his death, with a recommendatory preface by the editor, who was then believed, and is now affirmed by Dr Maty, to be the Earl of Chesterfield.

"Of the prefacer," says Dr. Johnson, "whoever he was, it may be reasonably suspected, that he never read the poems; for he professes to value them for a very high species of excellence, and recommends them as the genuine effusions of the mind, which expresses a real passion in the language of nature. But the truth is, these elegies have neither passion, nature, nor manners. Where there is fiction, there is no passion; he that describes himself as a shepherd, and his Neæra or Delia as a shepherdess, and talks of goats and lambs, feels no passion. He that courts his mistress with Roman imagery, deserves to lose her; for she may with good grace suspect his sincerity. Hammond has few sentiments drawn from nature, and few images from modern life. He produces nothing but frigid pedantry. It would be hard to find in all his productions three stanzas that deserve to be remembered. His verses are not rugged: but they have no sweetness; they never glide in a stream of melody. Why Hammond and other writers have thought the quatrain of ten syllables elegiac, it is difficult to tell. The character of the elegy is gentleness and tenuity; but this stanza has been pronounced by Dryden, whose knowledge of English metre was not inconsiderable, to be the most magnificent of all the measures which our language affords."

The critical decisions of Dr. Johnson, it is not, in general, very safe to contradict; except when they may be attributed, as in the present instance, to the force of prejudice, or to vitiated and defective feelings, respecting poetical beauty.

Considering Dr. Johnson's peculiar turn of mind, there is no wonder that he should deny nature to Hammond, and find no melody in his verse. The general opinion is much more favourable. That he has been much read, and greatly admired, serves to contradict the assertion of that too-rigid critic, and establishes his claim to some portion of tenderness and harmony; for by the judgment of the common, unprejudiced, unpedantic reader, the merit of every poetical composition must be ultimately determined.

The popular decisions upon the character of Hammond, have been exceedingly favourable: By some, perhaps, he has been extolled too high. He certainly possessed an elegant and cultivated mind. He is not deficient either in feeling, or melody of verse. He has generally expressed himself with sensibility, and in measures sufficiently harmonious.

The specific character of his elegies, and his pretensions to originality, have by no means been distinguished or ascertained with sufficient accuracy.

Dr. Johnson indeed speaks, but only to disapprove of his "Roman imagery;" and Lord Chesterfield, in his preface to the elegies, informs us, that Hammond seems to have judiciously taken Tibullus for his model, rather than Ovid.

After reading Tibullus and Hammond, with the most candid attention, the present writer is obliged to observe, that Hammond appears not merely to have taken the Roman poet for his model, but to have taken from him some of the most beautiful passages in his elegies.

The parallel passages appear almost in every page of both poets; yet Dr. Johnson is silent on the subject; and Lord Chesterfield passes it over, as if he had no suspicion of Hammond's obligations to Tibullus.

The following instances, which immediately occur, will specify what can by no means be called imitations, being almost literal translations.

Compare Tibullus, Lib. i. Eleg. 1., with the thirteenth elegy of Hammond. The thought of rain assisting slumber, is finely translated.

Quam juvat immites ventos audire cubantem,
Et dominam tenero continuisse sinu;

Aut, gelidas hibernus aquas cum ſuderit auſter,
Securum ſomnos imbre juvante ſequi!

What joy to hear the tempeſt howl in vain,
And claſp a fearful miſtreſs to my breaſt,
Or, lull'd to ſlumber by the beating rain,
Secure and happy, ſink at laſt to reſt!

Compare Tibullus, Lib. i. Eleg. 5., with the thirteenth elegy of Hammond.

Huc veniet Meſſala meus, cui dulcia poma
Delia ſelectis detrahet arboribus;
Et tantum venerata virum hunc ſedula curet,
Huic paret, atque epulas ipſa miniſtra gerat.

Hammond has applied this delicate compliment to Lord Cheſterfield, with admirable felicity of expreſſion. Strokes of this exquiſite nature are only to be expected from thoſe who have acceſs to the great, but whom the great have not infected with ſelfiſhneſs.

Stanhope ſhall come, and grace his rural friend;
Delia ſhall wonder at her noble gueſt;
With bluſhing awe the riper fruit commend,
And for her huſband's patron cull the beſt.

Again,

Te ſpectem, ſuprema mihi cum veneris hora,
Te teneam moriens deficiente manu.

On her I'll gaze, when other loves are o'er,
And, dying, preſs her with my clay-cold hand.

Again,

Parce ſolutis
Crinibus, et teneris, Delia, parce genis.

Wound not thy cheeks, nor hurt that flowing hair.

Compare Tibullus, Lib. i. Eleg. 5., with the fourteenth elegy of Hammond.

At mihi felicem vitam, ſi ſalva fuiſſes
Fingebam demens———

What ſcenes of bliſs my raptur'd fancy fram'd!

Hammond has improved upon Tibullus, Lib. 2., Eleg. vi. in his ſecond elegy.

Adieu, ye walls! &c.

Compare Tibullus, Lib. iii. Eleg. 2., with the ninth elegy of Hammond.

Qui primus caram juveni, carumque puellæ
Eripuit juvenem, ferreus ille fuit.
Durus et ille fuit, qui tantum ferre dolorem
Vivere et erepta conjuge qui potuit.

Theſe ſentiments are finely expreſſed by Hammond.

He who could firſt two gentle hearts unbind,
And rob a lover of his weeping fair:
Hard was the man; but harder, in my mind,
The lover ſtill who died not of deſpair.

Again,

Ergo quum tenuem fuero mutatus in umbram,
Candidaque oſſa ſuper nigra favilla tegit,
Ante meum veniat longos incompta capillos,
Et fleat ante meum mæſta Neæra rogum,

This rite, which is altogether foreign to Engliſh manners, Hammond has rather injudiciouſly transferred into his ninth elegy.

> Wilt thou in tears thy lover's corſe attend,
> With eyes averted light the ſolemn fire,
> Till all around the doleful flames aſcend;
> Then, ſlowly ſinking, by degrees expire?

It is unneceſſary to tranſcribe more parallel paſſages, to ſhow that Hammond, not ſatisfied with taking Tibullus for his model, has transfuſed into his elegies the ſentiments and the imagery of the Roman poet. Yet it ought to be obſerved, that he has very often taken the liberty to tranſpoſe, and ſometimes paraphraſtically to enlarge the thoughts, and to give the imagery a more modern poliſh. In the paſſages he has tranſlated, he has generally improved on Tibullus, and given his verſion of the moſt exact, elegant, and harmonious of the Roman elegiac poets, the eaſy air of a modern original. As he felt the diſtreſs which gave riſe to moſt of the elegies of Tibullus, he is not inferior to him in amorous tenderneſs and poetical fancy. His elegies have thoſe ſallies and tranſitions of paſſion, that frantic and deſponding air, ſo obſerveable in the Roman poet; for theſe are the natural emanations of a heated fancy, and a diſtracted heart.

His greateſt fault is, an injudicious adoption of the mythology, and too ſervile an adherence to the manners of the Roman poet; which detract from his merit as an imitator, more than as a tranſlator of Tibullus. Amorous elegy is leſs local than many other of the minor kinds of poetry; the paſſion of love operating nearly the ſame upon the human mind in all ages: yet as the modes of expreſſing that paſſion differ much in different countries, ſo theſe modes muſt not be confounded; a Roman ought not to make love like a Grecian, nor an Engliſhman like a Roman.

Although the elegies of Hammond warrant, in ſome degree, this cenſure, yet it ought to be conſidered, that he has both nature and originality in many parts; and the Elegies to Mr. Grenville and Miſs Daſhwood, ought to have been exempted from the cenſure of Dr. Johnſon, who has ſpoken of him with too great aſperity. They are written in the heroic meaſure, the ſentiments are exquiſitely delicate, and the numbers flow with an eaſy correctneſs. An "Anſwer to the Elegy to Miſs Daſhwood," was written by Lord Hervey, and is a ſuitable companion to it.

The meaſure which he has adopted in his other elegies, is the quatrain, or alternate rhyme, which, like the Latin hexameter and pentameter, is thought to be peculiarly ſuited to plaintive ſubjects; and it muſt be confeſſed, that he has happily ſucceeded. The quatrain has, indeed, a diſagreeable ſameneſs in its ſtructure, every ſucceeding ſtanza being a faithful echo to the laſt; yet is there ſomething plaintive in it—ſome pathetic ſoftneſs in the deſcending melody, that ſeems fitted to expreſs the tender paſſions. It is the peculiar language of love and melancholy, when they ſoothe their ſorrows with the penſive muſe. It is now appropriated to the complaining tone of the Engliſh elegy, by Gray, Shenſtone, Maſon, Whitehead, Græme, and other elegiac poets.

On the character of Hammond it is unneceſſary to enlarge, as it is given in the preface to his elegies, by Lord Cheſterfield, with a minuteneſs, elegance, and tenderneſs, which, making due allowance for the partiality of friendſhip, and the extravagance of erroneous criticiſm, leave nothing to be ſupplied by a caſual hand.

[BY LORD CHESTERFIELD.]

The following elegies were wrote by a young gentleman lately dead, and juſtly lamented.

As he had never declared his intentions concerning their publication, a friend of his, into whoſe hands they fell, determined to publiſh them, in the perſuaſion that they would neither be unwelcome to the public, nor injurious to the memory of their author. The reader muſt decide, whether this determination was the reſult of juſt judgment, or partial friendſhip; for the editor feels, and avows ſo much of the latter, that he gives up all pretenſions to the former.

The author compoſed them ten years ago, before he was two and twenty years old; an age when fancy and imagination commonly riot, at the expence of judgment and correctneſs, neither of which ſeem wanting here. But ſincere in his love as in his friendſhip, he wrote to his miſtreſſes, as he ſpoke to his friends, nothing but the true genuine ſentiments of his heart; he ſate down to write what he thought, not to think what he ſhould write; it was nature and ſentiment only that dictated to a real miſtreſs, not youthful and poetic fancy, to an imaginary one. Elegy, therefore, ſpeaks here her own, proper, native language, the unaffected plaintive language of the tender paſſions; the true elegiac dignity and ſimplicity are preſerved, and united; the one without pride, the other without meanneſs. Tibullus ſeems to have been the model our author judiciouſly preferred to Ovid; the former writing directly from the heart, to the heart; the latter too often yielding and addreſſing himſelf to the imagination.

The undiſſipated youth of the author, allowed him time to apply himſelf to the beſt maſters, the ancients, and his parts enabled him to make the beſt uſe of them; for upon thoſe great models of ſolid ſenſe and virtue, he formed not only his genius, but his heart, both well prepared by nature to adopt, and adorn the reſemblance. He admired that juſtneſs, that noble ſimplicity of thought and expreſſion, which have diſtinguiſhed, and preſerved their writings to this day; but he revered that love of their country, that contempt of riches, that ſacredneſs of friendſhip, and all thoſe heroic and ſocial virtues, which marked them out as the objects of the veneration, though not the imitation, of ſucceeding ages; and he looked back with a kind of religious awe and delight, upon thoſe glorious, and happy times of Greece and Rome, when wiſdom, virtue, and liberty formed the only triumvirates, ere luxury invited corruption to taint, or corruption introduced ſlavery to deſtroy, all public and private virtues. In theſe ſentiments he lived, and would have lived, even in theſe times; in theſe ſentiments he died—but in theſe times too—Ut non erepta a diis immortalibus vita, ſed donata mors eſſe videatur.

LOVE ELEGIES.

" Virginibus puerisque canto."

FIRST PRINTED IN 1743.

ELEGY I.

On his falling in Love with Neæra.

FAREWELL that liberty our fathers give,
In vain they gave, their sons receiv'd in vain:
I saw Neæra, and her instant slave,
Though born a Briton, hugg'd the servile chain.

Her usage well repays my coward heart,
Meanly she triumphs in her lover's shame,
No healing joy relieves his constant smart,
No smile of love rewards the loss of fame.

Oh, that to feel these killing pangs no more,
On Scythian hills I lay a senseless stone,
Was fix'd a rock amidst the watery roar,
And in the vast Atlantic stood alone.

Adieu, ye muses, or my passion aid,
Why should I loiter by your idle spring?
My humble voice would move one only maid,
And she contemns the trifles which I sing.

I do not ask the lofty Epic strain,
Nor strive to paint the wonders of the sphere;
I only sing one cruel maid to gain,
Adieu, ye muses, if she will not hear.

No more in useless innocence I'll pine,
Since guilty presents win the greedy fair,
I'll tear its honours from the broken shrine,
But chiefly thine, O Venus! will I tear.

Deceiv'd by thee, I lov'd a beauteous maid,
Who bends on sordid gold her low desires:
Nor worth nor passion can her heart persuade,
But love must act what avarice requires.

Unwise who first, the charm of nature lost,
With Tyrian purple soil'd the snowy sheep;
Unwiser still who seas and mountains crost,
To dig the rock, and search the pearly deep:

These costly toys our silly fair surprise,
The shining follies cheat their feeble sight,
Their hearts secure in trifles, love despise,
'Tis vain to court them, but more vain to write.

Why did the gods conceal the little mind,
And earthly thoughts beneath a heavenly face;
Forget the worth that dignifies mankind,
Yet smooth and polish so each outward grace?

Hence all the blame that Love and Venus bear,
Hence pleasure short, and anguish ever long,
Hence tears and sighs, and hence the peevish fair,
The froward lover—hence this angry song.

ELEGY II.

Unable to satisfy the covetous temper of Neæra, he intends to make a Campaign, and try, if possible, to forget her.

ADIEU, ye walls, that guard my cruel fair,
No more I'll sit in rosy fetters bound,
My limbs have learnt the weight of arms to bear,
My rousing spirits feel the trumpet's sound.

Few are the maids that now on merit smile,
On spoil and war is bent this iron age:
Yet pain and death attend on war and spoil,
Unfated vengeance and remorseless rage.

To purchase spoil, even love itself is sold,
Her lover's heart is least Neæra's care,
And I through war must seek detested gold,
Not for myself, but for my venal fair:

That while she bends beneath the weight of dress,
The stiffen'd robe may spoil her easy mien;
And art mistaken make her beauty less,
While still it hides some graces better seen.

But if such toys can win her lovely smile,
Hers be the wealth of Tagus' golden sand,
Hers the bright gems that glow in India's soil,
Hers the black sons of Afric's sultry land.

To please her eye let every loom contend,
For her be rifled ocean's pearly bed.
But where, alas! would idle fancy tend,
And soothe with dreams a youthful poet's head?

Let others buy the cold unloving maid,
In forc'd embraces act the tyrant's part,
While I their selfish luxury upbraid,
And scorn the person where I doubt the heart.

Thus warm'd by pride, I think I love no more,
And hide in threats the weakness of my mind:
In vain,—though reason fly the hated door,
Yet Love, the coward Love, still lags behind.

ELEGY III.

He upbraids and threatens the avarice of Neæra, and resolves to quit her.

Should Jove descend in floods of liquid ore,
And golden torrents stream from every part,
That craving bosom still would heave for more,
Not all the gods could satisfy thy heart:

But may thy folly, which can thus disdain
My honest love, the mighty wrong repay,
May midnight fire involve thy sordid gain,
And on the shining heaps of rapine prey:

May all the youths, like me, by love deceiv'd,
Not quench the ruin, but applaud the doom:
And, when thou dy'st, may not one heart be griev'd,
May not one tear bedew the lonely tomb.

But the deserving, tender, generous maid,
Whose only care is her poor lover's mind,
Though ruthless age may bid her beauty fade,
In every friend to love, a friend shall find:

And, when the lamp of life will burn no more,
When dead she seems as in a gentle sleep,
The pitying neighbour shall her loss deplore,
And round the bier assembled lovers weep:

With flowery garlands, each revolving year,
Shall strow the grave where truth and softness rest,
Then home returning, drop the pious tear,
And bid the turf lie easy on her breast.

ELEGY IV.

To his friend, written under the confinement of a long indisposition.

While calm you sit beneath your secret shade,
And lose in pleasing thought the summer-day,
Or tempt the wish of some unpractis'd maid,
Whose heart at once inclines and fears to stray:

The sprightly vigour of my youth is fled,
Lonely and sick, on death is all my thought,
Oh, spare, Persephone, this guiltless head,
Love, too much love, is all thy suppliant's fault.

No virgin's easy faith I e'er betray'd,
My tongue ne'er boasted of a feign'd embrace;
No poisons in the cup have I convey'd,
Nor veil'd destruction with a friendly face:

No secret horrors gnaw this quiet breast,
This pious hand ne'er robb'd the sacred fane,
I ne'er disturb'd the gods eternal rest
With curses loud,—but oft have pray'd in vain.

No stealth of time has thinn'd my flowing hair,
Nor age yet bent me with his iron hand:
Ah! why so soon the tender blossom tear!
Ere autumn yet the ripen'd fruit demand?

Ye gods, whoe'er in gloomy shades below,
Now slowly tread your melancholy round;
Now wandering view the paleful rivers flow,
And musing hearken to their solemn sound:

Oh, let me still enjoy the cheerful day,
Till, many years unheeded o'er me roll'd,
Pleas'd in my age, I trifle life away,
And tell how much he lov'd, ere I grew old.

But you, who now, with festive garlands crown'd,
In chase of pleasure the gay moments spend,
By quick enjoyment heal love's pleasing wound,
And grieve for nothing but your absent friend.

ELEGY V.

The Lover is at first introduced speaking to his Servant, he afterwards addresses himself to his Mistress, and at last there is a supposed Interview between them.

With wine, more wine, deceive thy master's care,
Till creeping slumber soothe his troubled breast,
Let not a whisper stir the silent air.
If hapless love a while consent to rest.

Untoward guards beset my Cynthia's doors,
And cruel locks th' imprison'd fair conceal,
May lightnings blast whom love in vain implores,
And Jove's own thunder rive those bolts of steel.

Ah, gentle door, attend my humble call,
Nor let thy sounding hinge or thefts betray,
So all my curses far from thee shall fall,
We angry lovers mean not half we say.

Remember now the flowery wreathes I gave
When first I told thee of my bold desires,
Nor thou, O Cynthia, fear the watchful slave,
Venus will favour what herself inspires.

She guides the youth who see not where they tread,
She shows the virgin how to turn the door,
Softly to steal from off her silent bed,
And not a step betray her on the floor.

The fearless lover wants no beam of light,
The robber knows him, nor obstructs his way,
Sacred he wanders through the pathless night,
Belongs to Venus, and can never stray.

I scorn the chilling wind, and beating rain,
Nor heed cold watchings on the dewy ground,
If all the hardships I for love sustain,
With love's victorious joys at last be crown'd:

With sudden step let none our bliss surprise,
Or check the freedom of secure delight——
Rash man beware, and shut thy curious eyes,
Left angry Venus snatch their guilty sight.

But shouldst thou see, th' important secret hide,
Though question'd by the powers of earth and heaven,
The prating tongue shall love's revenge abide,
Still sue for grace, and never be forgiven.

A wizard dame, the lover's ancient friend,
With magic charm has deaft thy husband's ear,
At her command I saw the stars descend,
And winged lightnings stop in mid career.

I saw her stamp, and cleave the solid ground,
While ghastly spectres round us wildly roam;
I saw them hearken to her potent sound,
Till, scar'd at day, they sought their dreary home.

At her command the vigorous summer pines,
And wintery clouds obscure the hopeful year;
At her strong bidding, gloomy winter shines,
And vernal roses on the snows appear.

She gave these charms, which I on thee bestow,
They dim the eye, and dull the jealous mind,
For me they make a husband nothing know,
For me, and only me, they make him blind:

But what did most this faithful heart surprise,
She boasted that her skill could set it free:
This faithful heart the boasted freedom flies;
How could it venture to abandon thee?

ELEGY VI.

He adjures Delia to pity him, by their Friendship with Cælia, who was lately dead.

Thousands would seek the lasting peace of death,
And in that harbour shun the storm of care,
Officious hope still holds the fleeting breath,
She tells them still,—To-morrow will be fair.

She tells me, Delia, I shall thee obtain,
But can I listen to her syren song, [chain,
Who seven slow months have dragg'd my painful
So long thy lover, and despis'd so long?

By all the joys thy dearest Cælia gave,
Let not her once-lov'd friend unpitied burn;
So may her ashes find a peaceful grave,
And sleep uninjur'd in their sacred urn.

To her I first avow'd my timorous flame,
She nurs'd my hopes, and taught me how to sue,
She still would pity what the wise might blame,
And feel for weakness which she never knew:

Ah, do not grieve the dear lamented shade,
That hovering round us all my sufferings hears,
She is my saint; to her my prayers are made,
With oft repeated gifts of flowers and tears:

To her sad tomb at midnight I retire,
And lonely sitting by the silent stone,
I tell it all the griefs my wrongs inspire,
The marble image seems to hear my moan:

The friend's pale ghost shall vex thy sleepless bed,
And stand before thee all in virgin white;
That ruthless bosom will disturb the dead,
And call forth pity from eternal night:

Cease, cruel man, the mournful theme forbear,
Though much thou suffer, to thyself complain:
Ah, to recal the sad remembrance spare,
One tear from her, is more than all thy pain.

ELEGY VII.

On Delia's being in the Country, where he supposes she stays to see the Harvest.

Now Delia breathes in woods the fragrant air,
Dull are the hearts that still in town remain,
Venus herself attends on Delia there,
And Cupid sports amid the sylvan train.

Oh, with what joy, my Delia to behold!
I'd press the spade, or wield the weighty prong,
Guide the slow plough-share through the stubborn mold,
And patient goad the loitering ox along:

The scorching heats I'd carelessly despise,
Nor heed the blisters on my tender hand;
The great Apollo wore the same disguise,
Like me subdued to love's supreme command.

No healing herbs could soothe their master's pain,
The art of physic lost, and useless lay,
To Peneus' stream, and Tempe's shady plain,
He drove his herds beneath the noon-tide ray:

Oft with a bleating lamb in either arm,
His blushing sister saw him pace along;
Oft would his voice the silent valley charm,
Till lowing oxen broke the tender song.

Where are his triumphs? where his warlike toil?
Where by his darts the crested Pithon slain?
Where are his Delphi? his delightful isle?
The god himself is grown a cottage swain.

O Ceres! in your golden fields no more,
With harvest's cheerful pomp, my fair detain,—
Think what for lost Proserpina you bore,
And in a mother's anguish feel my pain.

Our wiser fathers left their fields unsown,
Their food was acorns, love their sole employ,
They met, they lik'd, they staid but till alone,
And in each valley snatch'd the honest joy.

No wakeful guard, no doors to stop desire,
Thrice happy times!—But oh, I fondly rave!
Lead me to Delia, all her eyes inspire
I'll do.—I'll plough, or dig, as Delia's slave.

ELEGY VIII.

He despairs that he shall ever possess Delia.

Ah, what avails thy lover's pious care?
His lavish incense clouds the sky in vain,
Nor wealth nor greatness was his idle prayer,
For thee alone he pray'd, thee hop'd to gain:

With thee I hop'd to waste the pleasing day,
Till in thy arms an age of joy was past,
Then, old with love, insensibly decay,
And on thy bosom gently breathe my last,

I scorn the Lydian river's golden wave,
And all the vulgar charms of human life,
I only ask to live my Delia's slave,
And, when I long have serv'd her, call her wife:

I only ask, of her I love possest,
To sink, o'ercome with bliss, in safe repose,
To strain her yielding beauties to my breast,
And kiss her wearied eye-lids till they close.

Attend, O Juno! with thy sober ear,
Attend, gay Venus, parent of desire;
This one fond wish, if you refuse to hear,
Oh, let me with this sigh of love expire!

ELEGY IX.

He has lost Delia.

He who could first two gentle hearts unbind,
And rob a lover of his weeping fair,
Hard was the man, but harder, in my mind,
The lover still, who dy'd not of despair:

With mean disguise let others nature hide,
And mimic virtue with the paint of art,
I scorn the cheat of reason's foolish pride,
And boast the graceful weakness of my heart.

The more I think, the more I feel my pain,
And learn the more each heavenly charm to prize;

While fools, too light for paſſion, ſafe remain,
And dull ſenſation keeps the ſtupid wiſe.

Sad is my day, and ſad my lingering night,
When, wrapt in ſilent grief, I weep alone,
Delia is loſt, and all my paſt delight
Is now the ſource of unavailing moan.

Where is the wit that heighten'd beauty's charms?
Where is the face that fed my longing eyes?
Where isthe ſhape that might have bleſt my arms?
Where are thoſe hopes relentleſs fate denies?

When ſpent with endleſs grief I die at laſt,
Delia may come, and ſee my poor remains,—
Oh, Delia! after ſuch an abſence paſt,
Canſt thou ſtill love, and not forget my pains?

Wilt thou in tears thy lover's corſe attend,
With eyes averted light the ſolemn pyre,
Till all around the doleful flames aſcend,
Then, ſlowly ſinking, by degrees expire?

To ſoothe the hovering ſoul, be thine the care,
With plaintive cries to lead the mournful band,
In ſable weeds the golden vaſe to bear,
And cull my aſhes with thy trembling hand!

Panchaia's odours be their coſtly feaſt,
And all the pride of Aſia's fragrant year;
Give them the treaſures of the fartheſt eaſt,
And, what is ſtill more precious, give thy tear.

Dying for thee, there is in death a pride,
Let all the world thy hapleſs lover know,
No ſilent urn the noble paſſion hide,
But deeply graven thus my ſufferings ſhow:

Here lies a youth, borne down with love and care,
He could not long his Delia's loſs abide,
Joy left his boſom with the parting fair,
And when he durſt no longer hope, he dy'd.

ELEGY X.

On Delia's Birth-day.

This day, which ſaw my Delia's beauty riſe,
Shall more than all our ſacred days be bleſt,
The world enamour'd of her lovely eyes,
Shall grow as good and gentle as her breaſt.

By all our guarded ſighs, and hid deſires,
Oh, may our guiltleſs love be ſtill the ſame!
I burn, and glory in the pleaſing fires,
If Delia's boſom ſhare the mutual flame.

Thou happy genius of her natal hour,
Accept her incenſe, if her thoughts be kind;
But let her court in vain thy angry power,
If all our vows are blotted from her mind.

And thou, O Venus! hear my righteous prayer,
Or bind the ſhepherdeſs, or looſe the ſwain,
Yet rather guard them both with equal care,
And let them die together in thy chain:

What I demand, perhaps her heart deſires,
But virgin fears her nicer tongue reſtrain;
The ſecret thought, which bluſhing love inſpires,
The conſcious eye can tell as well explain.

ELEGY XI.

Againſt Lovers going to War, in which he philoſophically prefers Love and Delia to the more ſerious Vanities of the World.

The man who ſharpen'd firſt the warlike ſteel,
How fell and deadly was his iron heart,
He gave the wound encountering nations feel,
And death grew ſtronger by his fatal art:

Yet not from ſteel debate and battle roſe,
'Tis gold o'erturns the even ſcale of life,
Nature is free to all, and none were foes,
Till partial luxury began the ſtrife.

Let ſpoil and victory adorn the bold,
While I inglorious neither hope nor fear,
Periſh the thirſt of honour, thirſt of gold,
Ere for my abſence Delia loſe a tear:

Why ſhould the lover quit his pleaſing home,
In ſearch of danger on ſome foreign ground;
Far from his weeping fair ungrateful roam,
And riſk in every ſtroke a double wound?

Ah, better far, beneath the ſpreading ſhade,
With cheerful friends to drain the ſprightly bowl,
To ſing the beauties of my darling maid,
And on the ſweet idea feaſt my ſoul:

Then full of love to all her charms retire,
And fold her bluſhing to my eager breaſt,
Till, quite o'ercome with ſoftneſs, with deſire,
Like me ſhe pants, ſhe faints, and ſinks to reſt.

ELEGY XII.

To Delia.

No ſecond love ſhall e'er my heart ſurpriſe,
This ſolemn league did firſt our paſſion bind:
Thou, only thou, canſt pleaſe thy lover's eyes,
Thy voice alone can ſoothe his troubled mind.

Oh, that thy charms were only fair to me,
Diſpleaſe all others, and ſecure my reſt,
No need of envy,—let me happy be,
I little care that others know me bleſt.

With thee in gloomy deſerts let me dwell,
Where never human footſtep mark'd the ground;
Thou, light of life, all darkneſs canſt expel,
And ſeem a world with ſolitude around.

I ſay too much—my heedleſs words reſtore,
My tongue undoes me in this loving hour;
Thou know'ſt thy ſtrength, and thence inſulting more,
Will make me feel the weight of all thy power:

Whate'er I feel, thy ſlave I will remain,
Nor fly the burden I am form'd to bear,
In chains I'll ſit me down at Venus' fane,
She knows my wrongs, and will regard my prayer.

ELEGY XIII.

He imagines himſelf married to Delia, and that content with each other, they are retired into the Country.

Let others boaſt their heaps of ſhining gold,
And view their fields, with waving plenty crown'd,

Whom neighbouring foes in conſtant terror hold,
And trumpets break their ſlumbers, never ſound:

While calmly poor I trifle life away,
Enjoy ſweet leiſure by my cheerful fire,
No wanton hope my quiet ſhall betray,
But, cheaply bleſt, I'll ſcorn each vain deſire.

With timely care I'll ſow my little field,
And plant my orchard with its maſter's hand,
Nor bluſh to ſpread the hay, the hook to wield,
Or range my ſheaves along the ſunny land.

If late at duſk, while careleſsly I roam,
I meet a ſtrolling kid, or bleating lamb,
Under my arm I'll bring the wanderer home,
And not a little chide its thoughtleſs dam.

What joy to hear the tempeſt howl in vain,
And claſp a fearful miſtreſs to my breaſt?
Or, lull'd to ſlumber by the beating rain,
Secure and happy, ſink at laſt to reſt?

Or, if the ſun in flaming Leo ride,
By ſhady rivers indolently ſtray,
And with my Delia, walking ſide by ſide,
Hear how they murmur, as they glide away?

What joy to wind along the cool retreat,
To ſtop, and gaze on Delia as I go?
To mingle ſweet diſcourſe with kiſſes ſweet,
And teach my lovely ſcholar all I know?

Thus pleas'd at heart, and not with fancy's dream,
In ſilent happineſs I reſt unknown;
Content with what I am, not what I ſeem,
I live for Delia and myſelf alone.

Ah, fooliſh man, who thus of her poſſeſt,
Could float and wander with ambition's wind,
And if his outward trappings ſpoke him bleſt,
Not heed the ſickneſs of his conſcious mind!

With her I ſcorn the idle breath of praiſe,
Nor truſt to happineſs that's not our own;
The ſmile of fortune might ſuſpicion raiſe,
But here I know that I am lov'd alone.

Stanhope, in wiſdom as in wit divine,
May riſe, and plead Britannia's glorious cauſe,
With ſteady rein his eager wit confine,
While manly ſenſe the deep attention draws.

Let Stanhope ſpeak his liſtening country's wrongs?
My humble voice ſhall pleaſe one partial maid;
For her alone I pen my tender ſong,
Securely ſitting in his friendly ſhade.

Stanhope ſhall come, and grace his rural friend,
Delia ſhall wonder at her noble gueſt,
With bluſhing awe the riper fruit commend,
And for her huſband's patron cull the beſt.

Hers be the care of all my little train,
While I with tender indolence am bleſt,
The favourite ſubject of her gentle reign,
By love alone diſtinguiſh'd from the reſt.

For her I'll yoke my oxen to the plough,
In gloomy foreſts tend my lonely flock;
For her a goat-herd climb the mountain's brow,
And ſleep extended on the naked rock:

Ah, what avails to preſs the ſtately bed,
And far from her 'midſt taſteleſs grandeur weep,
By marble fountains lay the penſive head,
And, while they murmur, ſtrive in vain to ſleep?

Delia alone can pleaſe, and never tire,
Exceed the paint of thought in true delight;
With her, enjoyment wakens new deſire,
And equal rapture glows through every night:

Beauty and worth in her alike contend,
To charm the fancy, and to fix the mind;
In her, my wife, my miſtreſs, and my friend,
I taſte the joys of ſenſe and reaſon join'd.

On her I'll gaze, when others loves are o'er,
And dying preſs her with my clay-cold hand—
Thou weep'ſt already, as I were no more,
Nor can that gentle breaſt the thought withſtand.

Oh, when I die, my lateſt moments ſpare,
Nor let thy grief with ſharper torments kill,
Wound not thy cheeks, nor hurt that flowing hair,
Though I am dead, my ſoul ſhall love thee ſtill:

Oh, quit the room, oh, quit the deathful bed,
Or thou wilt die, ſo tender is thy heart;
Oh, leave me, Delia, ere thou ſee me dead,
Theſe weeping friends will do thy mournful part:

Let them, extended on the decent bier,
Convey the corſe in melancholy ſtate,
Through all the village ſpread the tender tear,
While pitying maids our wondrous loves relate.

ELEGY XIV.

To Delia.

What ſcenes of bliſs my raptur'd fancy fram'd,
In ſome lone ſpot with peace and thee retir'd!
Though reaſon then my ſanguine fondneſs blam'd,
I ſtill believ'd what flattering love inſpir'd:

But now my wrongs have taught my humbled mind,
To dangerous bliſs no longer to pretend,
In books a calm, but fix'd content to find,
Safe joys, that on ourſelves alone depend:

With them the gentle moments I beguile,
In learned eaſe, and elegant delight;
Compare the beauties of each different ſtyle,
Each various ray of wit's diffuſive light:

Now mark the ſtrength of Milton's ſacred lines,
Senſe rais'd by genius, fancy rul'd by art,
Where all the glory of the Godhead ſhines,
And earlieſt innocence enchants the heart.

Now, fir'd by Pope and virtue, leave the age
In low purſuit of ſelf-undoing wrong,
And trace the author through his moral page,
Whoſe blameleſs life ſtill anſwers to his ſong.

If time and books my lingering pain can heal,
And reaſon fix its empire o'er my heart,
My patriot breaſt a noble warmth ſhall feel, [part.
And glow with love, where weakneſs has no

Thy heart, O Lyttleton, ſhall be my guide,
Its fire ſhall warm me, and its worth improve;
Thy heart, above all envy, and all pride,
Firm as man's ſenſe, and ſoft as woman's love.

And you, O Weſt, with her your partner dear,
Whom ſocial mirth and uſeful ſenſe commend,

With learning's feaſt my drooping mind ſhall cheer,
Glad to eſcape from love to ſuch a friend.

But why, ſo long my weaker heart deceive?
Ah, ſtill I love, in pride and reaſon's ſpite,
No books, alas! my painful thoughts relieve,
And while I threat, this elegy I write.

ELEGY XV.

To Mr. George Grenville.

Oh, form'd alike to ſerve us, and to pleaſe;
Polite with honeſty, and learn'd with eaſe;
With heart to act, with genius to retire;
Open, yet wiſe; though gentle, full of fire:
With thee I ſcorn the low conſtraint of art,
Nor fear to truſt the follies of my heart;
Hear then from what my long deſpair aroſe,
The faithful ſtory of a lover's woes.
When, in a ſober melancholy hour,
Reduc'd by ſickneſs under reaſon's power,
I view'd my ſtate, too little weigh'd before,
And love himſelf could flatter me no more,
My Delia's hopes I would no more deceive, [leave;
But whom my paſſion hurt, through friendſhip
I choſe the coldeſt words my heart to hide,
And cure her ſex's weakneſs through its pride:
The prudence which I taught, I ill purſu'd,
The charm my reaſon broke, my heart renew'd:
Again ſubmiſſive to her feet I came,
And prov'd too well my paſſion by my ſhame;
While ſhe, ſecure in coldneſs, or diſdain,
Forgot my love, or triumph'd in its pain,
Began with higher views her thoughts to raiſe,
And ſcorn'd the humble poet of her praiſe:
She let each little lie o'er truth prevail,
And ſtrengthen'd by her faith each groundleſs tale,
Believ'd the groſſeſt arts that malice try'd,
Nor once in thought was on her lover's ſide:
Oh, where were then the ſcenes of fancied life?
Oh, where the friend, the miſtreſs, and the wife?
Her years of promis'd love were quickly paſt,
Not two revolving moons could ſee them laſt.—
To Stow's delightful ſcenes I now repair,
In Cobham's ſmile to loſe the gloom of care!
Nor fear that he my weakneſs ſhould deſpiſe,
In nature learned, and humanely wiſe:
There Pitt, in manners ſoft, in friendſhip warm,
With mild advice my liſtening grief ſhall charm,
With ſenſe to counſel, and with wit to pleaſe,
A Roman's virtue with a courtier's eaſe.
Nor you, my friend, whoſe heart is ſtill at reſt,
Contemn the human weakneſs of my breaſt;
Reaſon may chide the faults ſhe cannot cure,
And pains, which long we ſcorn'd, we oft endure;
Though wiſer cares employ your ſtudious mind,
Form'd with a ſoul ſo elegantly kind,
Your breaſt may loſe the calm it long has known,
And learn my woes to pity, by its own.

ELEGY XVI.

To Miſs Dashwood.

O say, thou dear poſſeſſor of my breaſt,
Where's now my boaſted liberty and reſt!
Where the gay moments which I once have known!
O, where that heart I fondly thought my own!
From place to place I ſolitary roam,
Abroad uneaſy, not content at home.
I ſcorn the beauties common eyes adore;
The more I view them, feel thy worth the more;
Unmov'd I hear them ſpeak, or ſee them fair,
And only think on thee, who art not there.
In vain would books their formal ſuccour lend,
Nor wit nor wiſdom can relieve their friend;
Wit can't deceive the pain I now endure,
And wiſdom ſhows the ill without the cure.
When from thy ſight I waſte the tedious day,
A thouſand ſchemes I form, and things to ſay;
But when thy preſence gives the time I ſeek,
My heart's ſo full, I wiſh, but cannot ſpeak.
And could I ſpeak with eloquence and eaſe,
Till now not ſtudious of the art to pleaſe,
Could I, at woman who ſo oft exclaim,
Expoſe (nor bluſh) thy triumph and my ſhame,
Abjure thoſe maxims I ſo lately priz'd,
And court that ſex I fooliſhly deſpis'd,
Own thou haſt ſoften'd my obdurate mind,
And thus reveng'd the wrongs of womankind;
Loſt were my words, and fruitleſs all my pain,
In vain to tell thee, all I write in vain;
My humble ſighs ſhall only reach thy ears,
And all my eloquence ſhall be my tears.
And now (for more I never muſt pretend)
Hear me not as thy lover, but thy friend;
Thouſands will fain thy little heart enſnare,
For without danger none like thee are fair;
But wiſely chooſe who beſt deſerves thy flame,
So ſhall the choice itſelf become thy fame;
Nor yet deſpiſe, though void of winning art,
The plain and honeſt courtſhip of the heart:
The ſkilful tongue in love's perſuaſive lore,
Though leſs it feels, will pleaſe and flatter more,
And, meanly learned in that guilty trade,
Can long abuſe a fond, unthinking maid.
And ſince their lips, ſo knowing to deceive,
Thy unexperienc'd youth might ſoon believe;
And ſince their tears, in falſe ſubmiſſion dreſt,
Might thaw the icy coldneſs of thy breaſt;
O! ſhut thine eyes to ſuch deceitful woe:
Caught by the beauty of thy outward ſhow,
Like me they do not love, whate'er they ſeem,
Like me—with paſſion founded on eſteem.

ANSWER TO THE FOREGOING LINES.

BY THE LATE LORD HERVEY.

Too well theſe lines that fatal truth declare,
Which long I've known, yet now I bluſh to hear.
But ſay, what hopes thy fond ill-fated love,
What can it hope, though mutual it ſhould prove?
This little form is fair in vain for you,
In vain for me thy honeſt heart is true;
For wouldſt thou fix diſhonour on my name,
And give me up to penitence and ſhame;
Or gild my ruin with the name of wife,
And make me a poor virtuous wretch for life:
Could'ſt thou ſubmit to wear the marriage chain,
(Too ſure a cure for all thy preſent pain)
No ſaffron robe for us the godhead wears,
His torch inverted, and his face in tears.

Though ev'ry ſofter wiſh were amply crown'd,
Love ſoon would ceaſe to ſmile where fortune frown'd;
Then would thy ſoul my fond conſent deplore,
And blame what it ſolicited before;
Thy own exhauſted would reproach my truth,
And ſay I had undone thy blinded youth;
That I had damp'd ambition's nobler flame,
Eclips'd thy talents, and obſcur'd thy fame;
To madrigals and odes that wit conſign'd,
That would in ſenates or in courts have ſhin'd,
Glorioufly active in thy country's cauſe,
Aſſerting freedom, and enacting laws.

Or ſay, at beſt, that negatively kind
You only mourn'd, and ſilently repin'd;
The jealous demons in my own fond breaſt
Would all theſe thoughts inceſſantly ſuggeſt,
And all that ſenſe muſt feel, though pity had ſuppreſt.
Yet added grief my apprehenſion fills
(If there can be addition to thoſe ills)
When they ſhall cry, whoſe harſh reproof I dread,
" 'Twas thy own deed, thy folly on thy head!
Age knows not to allow for thoughtleſs youth,
Nor pities tenderneſs, nor honours truth;
Holds it romantic to confeſs a heart,
And ſay thoſe virgins act a wiſer part
Who hoſpitals and bedlams would explore
To find the rich, and only dread the poor;
Who, legal proſtitutes for int'reſt ſake,
Clodios and Timons to their boſoms take,
And, if avenging heav'n permit increaſe,
People the world with folly and diſeaſe.
Thoſe titles, deeds, and rent-rolls only wed,
Whilſt the beſt bidder mounts the venal bed,
And the grave aunt and formal ſire approve
This nuptial ſale, this auction of their love.
But if regard to worth or ſenſe be ſhown,
That poor degen'rate child her friends diſown,
Who dares to deviate by a virtuous choice
From her great name's hereditary voice.

Theſe ſcenes my prudence uſhers to my mind,
Of all the ſtorms and quickſands I muſt find,
If I embark upon this ſummer ſea,
Where flatt'ry ſmooths, and pleaſure gilds the way.
Had our ill fate ne'er blown thy dang'rous flame
Beyond the limits of a friend's cold name,
I might upon that ſcore thy heart receive,
And with that guiltleſs name my own deceive;
That commerce now in vain you recommend,
I dread the latent lover in the friend;
Of ignorance I want the poor excuſe,
And know, I both muſt take, or both refuſe.

Hear then the ſafe, the firm reſolve I make,
Ne'er to encourage one I muſt forſake.
Whilſt other maids a ſhameleſs path purſue,
Neither to int'reſt nor to honour true,
And proud to ſwell the triumph of their eyes,
Exult in love from lovers they deſpiſe;
Their maxims all revers'd I mean to prove,
And though I like the lover, quit the love.

PROLOGUE

TO LILLO'S ELMERIC.

No labour'd ſcenes to-night adorn our ſtage,
Lillo's plain ſenſe would here the heart engage.
He knew no art, no rule; but warmly thought
From paſſion's force, and, as he felt, he wrote.
His Barnwell once no critic's teſt could bear,
Yet from each eye ſtill draws the natural tear.
With generous candour hear his lateſt ſtrains,
And let kind pity ſhelter his remains.
Depreſt by want, afflicted by diſeaſe,
Dying he wrote, and dying wiſh'd to pleaſe.
Oh, may that wiſh be now humanely paid,
And no harſh critic vex his gentle ſhade.
'Tis yours his unſupported fame to ſave,
And bid one laurel grace his humble grave.

THE LIFE OF SAVAGE.

For the life of Savage, the "lovers of truth and wit" are obliged to Dr. Johnson, who "was favoured with his confidence, and received from himself an acccount of moſt of the tranſactions which he relates."

The facts ſtated in the preſent account are chiefly taken from Dr. Johnſon's larger narrative, which is written in ſo clear and animated a manner, enriched with ſuch variety of anecdotes, and illuminated throughout with ſo much philoſophy and knowledge of human life, that it is one of the moſt intereſting biographical diſquiſitions in the Engliſh language.

Richard Savage was born in Fox-court, Holborn, on the 10th of January 1697-8. He was the ſon of Anne, Counteſs of Macclesfield, adulterouſly begotten by Richard Savage, Earl of Rivers, who, it is alleged by Dr. Johnſon, gave him his own name, and had it duly recorded in the regiſter of St. Andrew's, Holborn; but that regiſter has been carefully inſpected, and no ſuch entry is to be found. According to Mr. Reed, he was chriſtened by the name of Richard Smith; but of this there is no evidence.

Dr. Johnſon ſtates, that "Lady Macclesfield having lived for ſome time upon very uneaſy terms with her huſband, thought a public confeſſion of adultery the moſt obvious and expeditious method of obtaining her liberty," and aſſuming this to be true, ſtigmatizes her with indignation, as "the wretch who had, without ſcruple, proclaimed herſelf an adultereſs."

That Lady Macclesfield was convicted of the crime of adultery, and ſeparated from her huſband by an act of parliament, cannot be denied; but there is not ſufficient evidence of her voluntarily ſubmitting to the ignominious charge of adultery.

"I have peruſed," ſays Mr. Boſwell, the lively and agreeable biographer of Dr. Johnſon, "the Journals of both Houſes of Parliament, at the period of her divorce, and there find it authentically aſcertained, that ſhe made a moſt ſtrenuous defence by her counſel; the bill having been firſt moved 15th January 1697, and proceeded on at intervals till the 3d of March, when it paſſed. It was brought to the Commons the 5th of March, proceeded on the 7th, 10th, 11th, 14th, and 15th; on which day, after a full examination of witneſſes on both ſides, and hearing of counſel, it was reported without amendment, paſſed, and carried to the Lords." Yet, on the other hand, it ought to be obſerved, that it belonged to Lady Macclesfield to oppoſe the divorce, to prevent a ſuſpicion of colluſion; and therefore her oppoſition, under ſuch circumſtances, is not ſufficient to overbalance the general repute as to her voluntary confeſſion.

As to the truth of the fact, there was no doubt made of it; for Lord Rivers acquieſced in her declaration, and appeared by the meaſures he took to provide for him, to conſider the child as his own. Lord Rivers unfortunately left him to the care of his mother, who, after having forfeited the title of Lady Macclesfield by divorce, retained her fortune, and was married to Colonel Henry Brett, whom ſhe ſurvived many years. She died October 11. 1753, aged above fourſcore.

Strange as it may appear, his mother, from the moment of his birth, looked upon him with a kind of reſentment and abhorrence; and, inſtead of ſupporting, aſſiſting, and defending him, reſolved to diſown him; and in a very ſhort time removed him from her ſight, by committing him to the care of a ſhoemaker's wife, whom ſhe directed to educate him as her own, enjoining her never to inform him of his true parents.

The hapleſs infant was not, however, wholly abandoned. Her mother, Lady Maſon, whether in approbation of her deſign, or to prevent more criminal practices, took ſome charge of his education, and placed him at a ſmall grammar-ſchool near St. Alban's, where he was called by the name of his nurſe.

Here he was initiated in literature, and paſſed through ſeveral of the claſſes, with what rapidity or applauſe cannot now be known.

While he was cultivating his genius, his father Lord Rivers was ſeized with a diſtemper which threatened his life; and as he lay on his death-bed, he thought it his duty to provide for him among his other natural children. Accordingly, he ſent to his mother to inquire after him, and ſhe had the cruelty to cut him off for ever from that happineſs which competence affords, by declaring that he was dead. The Earl did not imagine that there could exiſt a mother that would ruin her ſon without enriching herſelf; and therefore beſtowed upon ſome other perſon ſix thouſand pounds, which he had, in his will, bequeathed to Savage. He died Auguſt 18. 1712.

Mr. Boſwell, for the honour of human nature, is inclined to think the ſhocking tale not true; and ſuppoſes that the perſon who then aſſumed the name of Richard Savage, was an impoſtor, being in reality the ſon of the ſhoemaker, and that, after the death of the real Richard Savage, he attempted to perſonate him; and that the fraud being known to Lady Macclesfield, he was therefore repulſed by her, with juſt reſentment.

Mr. Boſwell ſupports his ſuppoſition by a circumſtance that has been mentioned as an aggravation of Lady Macclesfield's unnatural conduct; and that is, her having prevented him from obtaining the benefit of a legacy left to him by Mrs. Lloyd, his god-mother: "For if there was ſuch a legacy left," ſays he, "his not being able to obtain payment of it, muſt be imputed to his conſcioufneſs that he was not the real perſon. The juſt inference ſhould be, that by the death of Lady Macclesfield's child before its god-mother, the legacy became lapſed; and therefore, that Johnſon's Richard Savage was an impoſtor."

A very little reflection might have ſatisfied Mr. Boſwell, that executors acting under the influence of Lady Macclesfield, might have laid Savage, with a very good title, under conſiderable difficulties in recovering the legacy.

Beſides, we muſt allow the weight of general repute as to his parentage, though illicit, and it muſt ever appear very ſuſpicious, that three different accounts of the Life of Savage, one publiſhed by Hill, in the "The Plain Dealer," in 1724, another by Mr. Beckingham, in 1727, and another by the powerful pen of Dr. Johnſon in 1749, and all of them while Lady Macclesfield was alive, ſhould, notwithſtanding the ſevere attacks upon her, have been ſuffered to paſs without any public and effectual contradiction.

The ſame cruelty which incited his mother to intercept this proviſion which had been intended him, prompted her, on his leaving ſchool, to rid herſelf from the danger of being at any time made known to him, by ſending him ſecretly to the American plantations; but this contrivance was by ſome accident defeated.

Being hindered, by whatever means, from baniſhing him into another country, ſhe formed, ſoon after, a ſcheme of burying him in poverty and obſcurity for the remainder of his days, and had him placed with a ſhoemaker in Holborn.

In this ſtation, however, he did not long continue; for his nurſe dying, he went to take care of the effects of his ſuppoſed mother, and found in her boxes ſome of Lady Maſon's letters to her, which informed him of his birth, and the cauſe of its concealment.

He was now no longer ſatisfied with the employment which had been allotted him, and thought he had a right to ſhare in the affluence of his mother; and therefore, without ſcruple, applied to her as her ſon, and made uſe of every art to awaken her tenderneſs, and attract her regard. But ſhe ſtill reſolved to neglect, though ſhe could no longer diſown him, and took meaſures to prevent his ever entering her houſe on any pretence whatever.

Savage was, at the ſame time, ſo touched with the diſcovery of his real mother, that it was his frequent practice to walk in the dark evenings before her door, in hopes of ſeeing her, as ſhe might come by accident to the window, or croſs her apartment with a candle in her hand.

One evening, walking in the ſtreet that ſhe inhabited, he ſaw the door of her houſe by accident open. He entered it, and went up ſtairs to ſalute her. She diſcovered him before he could enter her chamber, alarmed the family, and ordered them to drive out of the houſe that villain who had endeavoured to murder her. Savage, who had attempted by the moſt ſubmiſſive tenderneſs to ſoften her rage, hearing her utter ſo deteſtable an accuſation, thought it prudent to retire; and never attempted afterwards to ſpeak to her.

While he was aſſiduouſly endeavouring to awaken the tenderneſs of a mother, in whom all natural affection was extinct, he was deſtitute of the means of ſupport, and having no profeſſion, and a ſtrong inclination to literary purſuits, eſpecially poetry, he became by neceſſity an author.

The ſubject he made choice of for his firſt attempt was the Bangorian controverſy, in which he inconſiderately engaged in oppoſition to Hoadly, the able defender of civil and religious liberty, and publiſhed a poem againſt the Biſhop, the ſucceſs of which is not known, but of which he was afterwards much aſhamed.

He then attempted a more gainful kind of writing; and, in 1717, offered a comedy to the ſtage, intituled, Woman's a Riddle, which was refuſed by the players. It was not, however, his own performance, but a tranſlation of a Spaniſh comedy called La Dama Duende, executed by Mrs. Price, lady of Baron Price, who gave him the copy, and, through inadvertency, another copy to Mr. Bullock the player, who made ſome alterations in the MS., and brought it on the ſtage at Lincoln's-inn-fields, the ſame year.

In 1719, he produced Love in a Veil, a comedy, tranſlated likewiſe from a Spaniſh play, called Peor eſta qua eſtava, and was acted at Lincoln's-inn-fields, but ſo late in the year, that he received ſcarce any other advantage from it, than the acquaintance of Steele, and Mr. Wilks the comedian, by whom he was pitied, careſſed, and relieved.

Steele eſpouſed his intereſt with all the ardour of benevolence which conſtituted his character, and aſſerted, that "the inhumanity of his mother had given him a right to find every good man his father."

The kindneſs of Steele did not end in common favours. He propoſed to have eſtabliſhed him in ſome ſettled ſcheme of life, and to have married him to a natural daughter of his, on whom he intended to beſtow a thouſand pounds; but as he was never able to raiſe the ſum which he had offered, the marriage was delayed.

In the mean time, he was informed that Savage had ridiculed him; by which he was ſo much exaſperated, that he withdrew the allowance which he had paid him, and never afterwards admitted him to his houſe.

Mr. Wilks, however, continued an equal and ſteady kindneſs to the time of his death; and by his interpoſition, according to Mr. Beckingham, he once obtained from his mother fifty pounds, and a promiſe of one hundred and fifty more, which was never performed.

Being thus obliged to depend on Mr. Wilks, he became an aſſiduous frequenter of the theatre; and this conſtant attendance, naturally procured him the acquaintance of Mrs. Oldfield, who, according to Dr. Johnſon, was ſo much pleaſed with his converſation, and touched with his misfortunes, that ſhe allowed him an annuity, during her life, of fifty pounds. But Shiels aſſerts, that "ſhe ſo much diſliked Savage, and diſapproved of his conduct, that ſhe never admitted him to her converſation, nor ſuffered him to enter her houſe;" and that "ſhe indeed often relieved him with ſuch donations as ſpoke her generous diſpoſition: but this was at the ſolicitation of friends; and from a principle of humanity, ſhe became not a little inſtrumental in ſaving his life."

It is certain, that at her death, he went into mourning as for a mother; and though Dr. Johnſon, ſays he did not celebrate her in elegies, Chetwood has printed a poem on her death, which he aſcribes to Savage.

He had ſometimes, by the kindneſs of Mr. Wilks, the advantage of a benefit; on which occaſions he often received uncommon marks of regard and compaſſion, though the intereſt of his mother was employed to fruſtrate his applications.

The kindneſs of his friends not affording him any conſtant ſupply, he found it neceſſary to endeavour once more at dramatic poetry; and having been unſucceſsful in comedy, he reſolved to try whether he ſhould not be more fortunate in exhibiting a tragedy.

The ſtory which he choſe for the ſubject, was that of Sir Thomas Overbury. During a conſiderable part of the time in which he was employed upon it, he was without lodging, and often without meat; nor had he any other convenience for ſtudy than the fields or the ſtreets allowed him. There he uſed to walk, and form his ſpeeches, and afterwards ſtep into a ſhop, beg for a moment the uſe of pen and ink, and write down what he had compoſed, upon paper which he had picked up by accident.

It was brought on the ſtage at Drury-lane, June 12. 1723, and acted only three nights. It was once more performed for his benefit, when the houſe opened for the winter ſeaſon, October 2. It was corrected and fitted for the ſtage by Hill, an author of eſtabliſhed reputation, from whoſe friendſhip he received great aſſiſtance on many occaſions, and whom he never mentioned but with the utmoſt tenderneſs and regard. Hill wrote the prologue and epilogue, in which he touches on the circumſtances of Savage with great tenderneſs. He himſelf performed the part of Sir Thomas Overbury, but with ſo little reputation, that he always blotted out his name from the liſt, when a copy of his tragedy was to be ſhown to his friends.

For the dedication, to Herbert Tryſt, Eſq. of Hereſordſhire, he received ten pounds. The accummulated profits of acting, printing, and dedication, were a hundred pounds, which he thought a very large ſum, having never been maſter of ſo much before.

When his neceſſities returned, Hill encouraged a ſubſcription to a Miſcellany of Poems, by publiſhing his ſtory in the "Plain Dealer," with ſome affecting verſes, which had a very powerful effect upon all, but his mother, whom, by making her cruelty more public, they only hardened in her averſion.

To this Miſcellany, the greater part of which was furniſhed by Hill, he wrote a Preface, in which he gives an account of his mother's cruelty, in a very uncommon ſtrain of humour, with a dedication to Lady Mary Wortley-Montague, whom he flatters without reſerve, and with very little art.

Soon afterwards, the death of George I. furniſhed a general ſubject for poetical condolence, in which Savage engaged, without obtaining any other advantage, than the increaſe of his reputation.

He was now advancing in credit, and appeared to be gaining upon mankind, when a misfortune befel him, by which not only his reputation, but his life was endangered.

On the 20th of November, 1727, Savage came from Richmond, whither he had for ſome time retired, in order to purſue his ſtudies without interruption; and accidentally meeting two acquaintances, whoſe names were Merchant and Gregory, he went in with them to a coffee-houſe, where they ſat drinking till it was late. He would willingly have gone to bed in the ſame houſe, but there was not room for the whole company, and therefore they agreed to ramble about the ſtreets till the morning. Happening to diſcover a light in a coffee-houſe near Charing-croſs, they went in, and demanded a room. They were told the next parlour would be empty preſently, as a company were about to leave it, being then paying their reckoning. Merchant, not ſatisfied with this anſwer, ruſhed into the room, and behaved very rudely. This produced a quarrel; ſwords were drawn; and, in the confuſion, one Mr. James Sinclair was killed. A woman ſervant was likewiſe accidentally wounded by Savage, as ſhe was endeavouring to hold him.

Savage and his companions being taken into cuſtody, were tried for this offence; and both he and Gregory were captitally convicted, by the evidence of a common ſtrumpet, a woman by whom ſuch wretches were entertained, and a man by whom they were ſupported. Savage pleaded his own cauſe, and behaved with great reſolution; but it was proved that he gave Sinclair his death's wound, while Gregory commanded the ſword of the deceaſed.

Had his audience been his judges, he had undoubtedly been acquitted; but Mr. Page, then on the bench, treated him with his uſual inſolence and ſeverity, exaſperated the jury againſt him, and miſrepreſented his defence.

The convicts, reconducted to priſon, had no hopes of life but from the mercy of the Crown, which was earneſtly ſolicited by his friends, and only obſtructed by his mother, who had prejudiced the Queen againſt him, by relating the atrocious calumny of his forcing himſelf in upon her, with an intent to murder her.

At length a friend aroſe, whoſe character and rank were too eminent to fail of ſucceſs, the amiable Counteſs of Hertford, by whoſe interpoſition he was admitted to bail, and, on the 9th March 1728, pleaded the royal pardon; to which alſo the petition delivered to his Majeſty by Lord Tyrconnel, his mother's nephew, and the ſolicitations made to Sir Robert Walpole by Mrs. Oldfield, were not a little conducive.

He had now recovered his liberty, but he had no means of ſubſiſtence. He reſolved, therefore, to compel his mother to do ſomething for him, and threatened that he would ſeverely expoſe her cruelty. The expedient proved ſucceſsful. Lord Tyrconnel, whatever were his motives, upon his promiſe to lay aſide his deſign, received him into his family, treated him as his equal, and allowed him two hundred pounds a-year.

Mr. Boſwell repreſents his being received as a companion by Lord Tyrconnel, as if prior to his conviction and pardon; but Dr. Johnſon's account, which is followed here, is confirmed by the appearance of The Wanderer, in 1729, addreſſed to that nobleman, not only in the firſt lines, but in a formal dedication filled with the higheſt ſtrains of panegyric, and the warmeſt profeſſions of gratitude. No alluſion indeed to the murder is obſervable in The Wanderer, which is a circumſtance rather favourable to Mr. Boſwell's account.

For ſome time he had no reaſon to complain of fortune: his appearance was ſplendid, his expences large, and his acquaintance extenſive. He was courted by all who endeavoured to be thought men of genius, and careſſed by all who valued themſelves upon a refined taſte. This interval of proſperity furniſhed him with opportunities of enlarging his knowledge of human nature, by contemplating life from its higheſt gradation to its loweſt. Of his exact obſervations on human life, he has left a proof in The Author to be Let, publiſhed about this time, and afterwards inſerted in a collection of pieces relating to the Dunciad, which were addreſſed to the Earl of Middleſex, in a dedication written by Pope, but ſigned by Savage.

After the publication of this piece, he was conſidered by thoſe who were attacked by Pope, as a kind of confederate, and was ſuſpected of ſupplying him with private intelligence and ſecret incidents; ſo that the ignominy of an informer was added to the terror of a ſatiriſt.

About this time he wrote a panegyrical Epiſtle to Sir Robert Walpole, and The Triumph of Health and Mirth, on the recovery of Lady Tyrconnel, from a languiſhing illneſs.

While the world ſeemed to ſmile upon him, his conduct was ſuch as made Lord Tyrconnel grow weary of him, and even forced him to withdraw his voluntary bounty, and to baniſh him from his table.

The cauſe aſſigned by his Lordſhip for diſmiſſing him, was, his introducing company into his houſe, with whom he practiſed the moſt licentious frolics, and committed all the outrages of drunkenneſs; and ſelling or pawning the books of which he had made him a preſent, ſtamped with his own arms: Both theſe accuſations were eaſily credited.

On the other hand, Savage declared, that Lord Tyrconnel quarrelled with him becauſe he would not ſubtract from his own luxury and extravagance what he had promiſed to allow him: but this is by no means probable.

Theſe mutual accuſations were retorted on both ſides, for many years, with the utmoſt degree of virulence and rage. Savage felt every day the conſequences of the quarrel; and ſeems to have perſuaded Dr. Johnſon, "that his ſpirit never ſuffered him to ſolicit a reconciliation:" but Mr. Boſwell has ſhown, that he once ſolicited a reconciliation, "in the humbleſt manner," by the interpoſition of Mr. Gilbert, his Lordſhip's chaplain.

He now thought himſelf again at liberty to take his revenge on his mother; and publiſhed about this time, The Baſtard, inſcribed with "due reverence," to Mrs. Brett, which had an extraordinary ſale.

His mother, who happened then to be at Bath, was not able to bear the repreſentation of her own conduct, but fled from reproach, and took ſhelter in London.

On the death of Euſden, in 1730, he ineffectually exerted all the intereſt which his wit, or his birth, or his misfortunes could procure, to obtain the place of poet-laureat, which was given to Cibber.

Being diſappointed of the laureat's place, he took a reſolution of applying to the Queen, and publiſhed a poem on her birth-day, which he intituled, The Volunteer Laureat. The Queen, a few days after publication, ſent him fifty pounds, and her "permiſſion to write annually on the ſame ſubject;" and a promiſe of "the like preſent, till ſomething better could be done for him."

When the Princeſs Anne was married to the Prince of Orange, he wrote a poem upon her departure, only, as he declared, "becauſe it was expected from him."

About this time, he was accuſed in "The Daily Courant," of influencing elections againſt the court, by appearing at the head of a Tory mob; but he ſufficiently cleared his innocence, and found no ill effects from the accuſation.

In the diſpute between the Biſhop of London and the Chancellor, relating to Dr. Rundle, he engaged with great zeal againſt the Biſhop; and wrote a poem, called, The Progreſs of a Divine, in which he painted the character of a profligate prieſt, in ſuch odious colours, as drew upon him the reſentment of the clergy. The Court of King's Bench was moved againſt him for obſcenity; but Lord Chief Juſtice York diſmiſſed the information, with encomiums upon the purity and excellence of his writings.

He once intended to make a reparation for the folly or injuſtice with which he might be charged, by writing another poem, called, The Progreſs of a Freethinker; but this plan was, like others, formed, and laid aſide.

He was ſtill in his uſual exigencies, having no certain ſupport but the penſion from the Queen; which, when he received, he regularly diſappeared, and ſpent, and returned to his acquaintance as pennyleſs as before.

His friends ſolicited Sir Robert Walpole in his favour, with ſo much earneſtneſs, that they obtained a promiſe of the next place that ſhould become vacant, not exceeding 200 l. a-year; but, nothing more than promiſes were obtained from that celebrated ſtateſman.

Deſpair was not, however, the character of Savage; when one patronage failed, he had recourſe to another. The Prince of Wales had very liberally rewarded the merit of Thomſon and Mallet; and, therefore, he reſolved to addreſs to him, his Poem on Public Spirit, with regard to Public Works; but he received no reward from his patron, however generous on other occaſions; a diſappointment which he never mentioned without indignation.

His poverty ſtill preſſing, he lodged as much by accident as he dined; for he generally lived by chance, eating only when he was invited to the tables of his acquaintance, from which the meanneſs of his dreſs often excluded him. He often paſſed his nights in thoſe mean houſes which are ſet open for caſual wanderers; ſometimes in cellars, amidſt the riot and filth of the moſt profligate of the rabble; and not ſeldom would he walk the ſtreets till he was weary, and then lie down, in ſummer, on a bulk, and in winter, among the aſhes of a glaſs-houſe.

His neceſſities as a writer for bread, brought him acquainted with Mr. Cave, the editor of "The Gentleman's Magazine;" and his viſits at St. John's Gate, naturally brought Dr. Johnſon and him together.

It is melancholy to reflect, that Dr. Johnſon and Savage have ſometimes wandered together whole nights in the ſtreets for want of a lodging. Yet, in thoſe ſcenes of diſtreſs, it is probable that Savage mentioned many of thoſe anecdotes, with which Dr. Johnſon afterwards enriched the life of his unfortunate companion, and thoſe of other poets.

His diſtreſſes, however afflictive, never dejected him: In his loweſt ſtate he wanted not ſpirit to aſſert the natural dignity of wit, and to repreſs, with contempt, the inſolence which the ſuperiority of fortune incited; of which Dr. Johnſon records an inſtance, in his refuſing to wait upon one of his friends, when he was without meat, lodging, or clothes, only becauſe the meſſage ſignified that he deſired to ſee him about nine in the morning.

It was one of his favourite amuſements to form ſchemes for publiſhing his works by ſubſcription; for which, at length, he printed propoſals; and as they grew obſolete, new ones were printed with freſher dates; but the money which his ſubſcriptions afforded him, was not leſs volatile than that which he received from his other ſchemes.

The death of the Queen, in 1738, deprived him of all hopes at Court: his penſion was diſcontinued; and he was now abandoned again to fortune.

On the return of the Queen's birth-day next year, he addreſſed to his Majeſty, A Poem, ſacred to the memory of the late Queen, which may be juſtly ranked among the beſt pieces which the death of princes has produced. He expected by this addreſs to recover his penſion, and demanded of Sir Robert Walpole to have it reſtored, with a degree of roughneſs, which, perhaps, determined him to withdraw what had been only delayed.

His diſtreſs was now publicly known; and a ſcheme was at length concerted for procuring him a permanent relief. It was propoſed that he ſhould retire to Wales, and receive an allowance of fifty pounds a-year, to be raiſed by ſubſcription, on which he was to live privately in a cheap place, without aſpiring any more to affluence, or having any farther care of reputation. Pope ſubſcribed twenty pounds.

This offer he ſeemed gladly to accept; but his intentions were only to deceive his friends, by retiring for a while to write another tragedy on the ſtory of Sir Thomas Overbury, and then to return with it to London, to bring it upon the ſtage.

He left London in the Briſtol ſtage-coach, in July 1739, having taken leave of his friends with great tenderneſs, and parted from Dr. Johnſon with tears in his eyes.

After ſome ſtay at Briſtol, where he was treated with a regard that highly gratified his vanity, he proceeded to Swanſea, the place originally propoſed for his reſidence, where he lived about a year, very much diſſatisfied with the diminution of his ſalary; for he had in his letters treated his contributors ſo inſolently, that moſt of them withdrew their ſubſcription.

At this place he became acquainted with Mr. Powell, and Mrs. Jones, whom he has celebrated in his poems; and completed his tragedy, with which he reſolved to return to London. Pope oppoſed his return, and adviſed him to put his play into the hands of Thomſon and Mallet, that they might fit it for the ſtage, and receive the profits on his account. This propoſal he rejected with the utmoſt contempt; and ſoon after returned to Briſtol, on his way to London: but, meeting with a repetition of the ſame kind treatment he had before found there, he was tempted to ſtay, till he tired out the generoſity of his friends; and his irregular behaviour grew troubleſome. Diſtreſs ſtole upon him by imperceptible degrees. To complete his miſery, on the 10th of January 1742-3, he was arreſted for a debt of about eight pounds, which he owed at a coffeehouſe; and conducted to the houſe of a ſheriff's officer, where he remained for ſome time "at an immenſe expence," in hopes of procuring bail; and, at length, was removed to Newgate.

The expence of living at the officer's houſe he was enabled to ſupport, by the generoſity of Mr. Naſh at Bath, who, upon hearing of his misfortune, ſent him five guineas.

He was treated by Mr. Dagge, the keeper of the priſon, with great humanity; was ſupported by him at his own table, had a room to himſelf, was allowed to ſtand at the door of the priſon, and ſometimes taken out into the fields.

He employed himſelf in this hoſpitable priſon, in writing a ſatirical poem, called London and Briſtol Delineated; which he left unfiniſhed.

When he had been about ſix months in priſon, he received a letter from Pope, who yet continued to remit him his ſubſcription, containing a charge of very atrocious ingratitude, founded on a complaint which he was ſuppoſed to have made to Henley. He returned a very ſolemn proteſtation of his innocence; but, however, appeared much diſturbed at the accuſation.

In a few days after, he was ſeized with a diſorder, which at firſt was not ſuſpected to be dangerous; but growing daily more languid and dejected, at laſt a fever ſeized his ſpirits, and he expired on the 1ſt of Auguſt 1743, in the 46th year of his age. He was buried in the church-yard of St. Peter, at the expence of the keeper.

Thus lived, and thus died this unfortunate poet; leaving behind him an example of the moſt remarkable combination of virtues and vices, weakneſſes and abilities, that is to be found in the records of biography.

The infelicity of his fate has been a frequent ſubject of lamentation with ſucceeding poets; and very lately by William Preſton, Eſq., an eminent poet of a neighbouring kingdom, in an elegant and pathetic "Epiſtle to a Young Gentleman, on his having addicted himſelf to the ſtudy of Poetry."

He, too, that gloried in a Baſtard's name,
The patient pupil of reproach and ſhame—
Nor father's ſmile, nor mother's tender tears,
Cheer'd the ſad cradle of his tender years!
Lo! time for him prepares the ſcorns and whips,
And ſteeps in poverty beyond the lips---
Oh Savage! doubly born of noble kind,
And tenfold noble in th' exalted mind:
Want, fear, and calumny, for thee combin'd,
And blood oppreſſive clings around thy mind:
Oft to themſelves their pangs the wretched owe,
But Savage! thine from crimes of others flow.
What demons ſteel a ſhameleſs woman's breaſt!
Maternal fury, wilt thou never reſt?
With vileſt falſehoods, every fiend-like art,
The human harpy rends his bleeding heart.
Unwearied hate the curſe of being gave,
Purſued through life, and ſunk him to the grave.
Oh, Savage! curs'd with elegant deſires,
Th' ennobled nature, the poetic fires;
Thy roving wiſhes ſpread th' unwearied wing,
Their ſad returns of miſery to bring.
No peaceful olive proves their wand'rings paſt;
But noxious herbs and fruits of bitter taſte.
In dreary proſpect, dire exiſtence lies
Where crowding ſorrows, woes on woes ariſe;
The murder'd hopes, departed faith of friends;
And mildeſt death, the long perſpective ends.
Alas! what joy thy parting moment ſmooth'd,
By Pope embitter'd, by a jailor ſooth'd.
Strange comforter! he cheer'd thy priſon's gloom,
He gave thy relics to the decent tomb."

Savage was of a middle ſtature, of a thin habit of body, a long viſage, coarſe features, and melancholy aſpect, of a grave and manly deportment, a ſolemn dignity of mien, but which, upon a nearer acquaintance, ſoftened into an engaging eaſineſs of manners. His walk was ſlow, and his voice tremulous and mournful. He was eaſily excited to ſmiles, but very ſeldom provoked to laughter.

Of his character, the moſt ſtriking peculiarities have been diſplayed in the relation of his life. He was undoubtedly a man of excellent parts; and had he received the advantages of a liberal education, and had his natural talents been cultivated to the beſt advantage, he might have made a reſpectable figure in life. He was happy in an agreeable temper, and a lively flow of wit, which made his company much coveted: nor was his judgment both of writings and of men inferior to his wit; but he was too much a ſlave to his paſſions, and his paſſions were too eaſily excited.

He was warm in his friendſhips, but implacable in his enmity; and his greateſt fault, which is indeed the greateſt of all faults, was ingratitude. Vanity, the moſt innocent ſpecies of pride, was moſt frequently predominant; and his veracity was often queſtioned, and not without reaſon.

His poetical works, diſperſed in magazines and fugitive publications, were collected and publiſhed by T. Evans, bookſeller, in 2 vols., 8vo, 1771. His ſecond tragedy, on the ſubject of the firſt, was found among Mr. Cave's papers, many years after his death, and fitted for the ſtage by Mr. William Woodfall, with the aſſiſtance of Mr. Garrick and Mr. Colman, and exhibited at Covent-garden, in 1777, with applauſe.

As a poet, the compoſitions of Savage amply eſtabliſh his fame. The Wanderer, the greateſt effort of his poetical genius, is a work of uncommon merit. It abounds with ſtrong repreſentations of nature, and juſt obſervations upon life. Moſt of the pictures have an evident tendency to illuſtrate his firſt great poſition, "That good is the conſequence of evil," which verges towards the latitudinarianiſm of Mandeville. The terrific portrait of Suicide deſerves particular commendation. It has been objected to The Wanderer, with ſome degree of juſtice, that the diſpoſition of the parts is irregular; that the deſign is obſcure, and the plan perplexed; that the images, however beautiful, ſucceed each other without order; and that the whole performance is not ſo much a regular fabric, as a heap of ſhining materials thrown together by accident, which ſtrike rather with the ſolemn magnificence of a ſtupenduous ruin, than the elegant grandeur of a finiſhed pile.

The Baſtard is a vigorous and ſpirited performance: The vivacious ſallies of thought in the beginning, when he makes a pompous enumeration of the imaginary advantages of baſe birth, and the pathetic ſentiments at the end, where he recounts the real calamities which he ſuffered by the crime of his parents, are chiefly remarkable.

The poem of Public Spirit is not ſo diligently laboured, nor ſo ſucceſsfully finiſhed as The Wanderer. The plan is very extenſive, and compriſes a multitude of topics; but he paſſes negligently over many public works, which deſerved to be more elaborately treated.

The ſettlement of colonies in uninhabited countries, is recommended with all the ornaments of verſe, and all the tenderneſs of humanity and benevolence. He aſſerts the natural equality of mankind, and endeavours to ſuppreſs that pride which inclines men to ſuppoſe, that right is the conſequence of power.

The Triumph of Mirth and Health, is remarkable not only for the gaiety of the ideas, and the melody of the numbers, but for the agreeable fiction upon which it is formed. Among his ſmaller pieces, The Employment of Beauty, The Friend, The Genius of Liberty, Valentine's Day, and the Poem ſacred to the memory of her late Majeſty, deſerve particular commendation.

"As an author," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "if one piece, which he had reſolved to ſuppreſs, be excepted, Savage has very little to fear from the ſtricteſt moral or religious cenſure. And though he may not be altogether ſecure againſt the objections of the critic, it muſt however be acknowledged, that his works are the production of a genius truly poetical, and what many writers, who have been more laviſhly applauded, cannot boaſt, that they have an original air, which has no reſemblance of any foregoing writer; that the verſification and ſentiments have a caſt peculiar to themſelves, which no man can imitate with ſucceſs; becauſe, what was nature in Savage, would be in another affectation. It muſt be confeſſed that his deſcriptions are ſtriking, his images animated, his fictions truly imagined, and his allegories artfully purſued; that his diction is elevated, though ſometimes forced; and his numbers ſonorous and majeſtick, though frequently ſluggiſh and encumbered. Of his ſtyle, the general fault is harſhneſs, and its general excellence is dignity: of his ſentiments, the prevailing beauty is ſimplicity, and uniformity the prevailing defect."

" Nulla mali nova mi facies inopinave ſurgit."

VIRG.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

JOHN LORD VISCOUNT TYRCONNEL,

BARON CHARLEVILLE, AND LORD BROWNLOWE,

KNIGHT OF THE BATH.

MY LORD,

PART of this poem had the honour of your Lordſhip's peruſal when in manuſcript; and it was no ſmall pride to me, when it met with approbation from ſo diſtinguiſhing a judge: ſhould the reſt find the like indulgence, I ſhall have no occaſion (whatever its ſucceſs may be in the world) to repent the labour it has coſt me—But my intention is not to purſue a diſcourſe on my own performence; no, my Lord, it is to embrace this opportunity of throwing out ſentiments that relate to your Lordſhip's goodneſs, the generoſity of which, give me leave to ſay, I have greatly experienced.

I offer it not as a new remark, that dependance on the great, in former times, generally terminated in diſappointment; nay, even their bounty (if it could be called ſuch) was, in its very nature, ungenerous. It was, perhaps, with-held, through an indolent or wilful neglect, till thoſe who lingered in the want of it, grew almoſt paſt the ſenſe of comfort. At length it came, too often, in a manner that half cancelled the obligation, and, perchance, muſt have been acquired too by ſome previous act of guilt in the receiver, the conſequence of which was remorſe and infamy.

But that I live, my Lord, is a proof that dependance on your Lordſhip, and the preſent miniſtry, is an aſſurance of ſucceſs. I am perſuaded, diſtreſs, in many other inſtances, affects your ſoul with a compaſſion, that always ſhows itſelf in a manner moſt humane and active; that to forgive injuries, and confer benefits, is your delight; and that to deſerve your friendſhip is to deſerve the countenance of the beſt of men. To be admitted into the honour of your Lordſhip's converſation (permit me to ſpeak but juſtice) is to be elegantly introduced into the moſt inſtructive, as well as entertaining, parts of literature; it is to be furniſhed with the fineſt obſervations upon human nature, and to receive, from the moſt unaſſuming, ſweet, and winning candour, the worthieſt and moſt polite maxims—ſuch as are always enforced by the actions of your own life. I could alſo take notice of your many public-ſpirited ſervices to your country in Parliament, and your conſtant attachment to liberty, and the royal, illuſtrious houſe of our moſt gracious ſovereign; but, my Lord, believe me, your own deeds are the nobleſt and fitteſt orators to ſpeak your praiſe, and will elevate it far beyond the power of a much abler writer than I am.

I will therefore turn my view from your Lordſhip's virtues to the kind influence of them, which has been ſo lately ſhed upon me; and then, if my future morals and writings ſhall gain any approbation from men of parts and probity, I muſt acknowledge all to be the product of your Lordſhip's goodneſs to me. I muſt, in fine, ſay with Horace,

" Quod ſpiro, et placeo, (et placeo) tuum eſt."

I am, with the higheſt gratitude and adoration,

MY LORD,

Your Lordſhip's moſt dutiful

and devoted ſervant,

RICHARD SAVAGE.

CANTO I.

FAIN would my verſe, Tyrconnel, boaſt thy name,
Brownlowe, at once my ſubject and my fame!
Oh! could that ſpirit, which thy boſom warms,
Whoſe ſtrength ſurpriſes, and whoſe goodneſs charms!
That various worth! could that inſpire my lays,
Envy ſhould ſmile, and cenſure learn to praiſe:
Yet though unequal to a ſoul like thine,
A generous ſoul, approaching to divine,
When bleſs'd beneath ſuch patronage I write,
Great my attempt, though hazardous my flight.
O'er ample nature I extend my views;
Nature to rural ſcenes invites the muſe:
She flies all public care, all venal ſtrife,
To try the ſtill, compar'd with active life;
To prove, by theſe the ſons of men may owe
The fruits of bliſs to burſting clouds of woe;
That ev'n calamity, by thought refin'd,
Inſpirits and adorns the thinking mind.
Come, contemplation, whoſe unbounded gaze,
Swift in a glance, the courſe of things ſurveys;
Who in thyſelf the various view canſt find
Of ſea, land, air, and heaven, and human-kind;
What tides of paſſion in the boſom roll;
What thoughts debaſe, and what exalt the ſoul,
Whoſe pencil paints, obſequious to thy will,
All thou ſurvey'ſt, with a creative ſkill!
Oh, leave awhile thy lov'd, ſequeſter'd ſhade!
Awhile in wintery wilds vouchſafe thy aid!
Then waft me to ſome olive, bowery green,
Where, cloth'd in white, thou ſhow'ſt a mind ſerene;
Where kind content from noiſe and court retires,
And ſmiling ſits, while muſes tune their lyres:
Where zephyrs gently breathe, while ſleep profound
To their ſoft fanning nods, with poppies crown'd;
Sleep, on a treaſure of bright dreams reclines,
By thee beſtow'd; whence fancy colour'd ſhines,
And flutters round his brow a hovering flight,
Varying her plumes in viſionary light.
Though ſolar fires now faint and watery burn,
Juſt where with ice Aquarius frets his urn!
If thaw'd forth iſſue, from its mouth ſevere,
Raw clouds, that ſadden all th' inverted year.
When froſt and fire with martial powers engag'd,
Froſt, northward fled the war, unequal wag'd!
Beneath the pole his legions urg'd their flight,
And gain'd a cave profound and wide as night.
O'er cheerleſs ſcenes by deſolation own'd,
High on an Alp of ice he ſits enthron'd!
One clay-cold hand, his cryſtal beard ſuſtains,
And ſcepter'd one, o'er wind and tempeſt reigns;
O'er ſtony magazines of hail, that ſtorm
The bloſſom'd fruit, and flowery ſpring deform.
His languid eyes like frozen lakes appear,
Dim gleaming all the light that wanders here.
His robe ſnow-wrought, and hoar'd with age; his breath
A nitrous damp, that ſtrikes petrific death.
Far hence lies, ever-freez'd, the northern main,
That checks, and renders navigation vain,
That, ſhut againſt the ſun's diſſolving ray,
Scatters the trembling tides of vanquiſh'd day,
And ſtretching eaſtward half the world ſecures,
Defies diſcovery, and like time endures!
Now froſt ſent boreal blaſts to ſcourge the air,
To bind the ſtreams, and leave the landſcape bare;
Yet when, far weſt, his violence declines,
Though here the brook, or lake, his power confines;
To rocky pools, to cataracts are unknown
His chains!---to rivers, rapid like the Rhone!
The falling moon caſt, cold, a quivering light,
Juſt ſilver'd o'er the ſnow, and ſunk!---pale night
Retir'd. The dawn in light-gray miſts aroſe!
Shrill chants the cock!---the hungry heifer lows!
Slow bluſh yon breaking clouds;---the ſun's up-roll'd!
Th' expanſive gray turns azure, chas'd with gold;
White-glittering ice, chang'd like the topaz, gleams,
Reflecting ſaffron luſtre from his beams.
O contemplation, teach me to explore,
From Britain far remote, ſome diſtant ſhore!
From ſleep a dream diſtinct and lively claim;
Clear let the viſion ſtrike the moral's aim!
It comes! I feel it o'er my ſoul ſerene!
Still morn begins, and froſt retains the ſcene!
Hark!---the loud horn's enlivening note's begun!
From rock to vale ſweet-wandering echoes run!
Still floats the ſound ſhrill-winding from afar!
Wild beaſts aſtoniſh'd dread the ſylvan war!
Spears to the ſun in files embattled play,
March on, charge briſkly, and enjoy the fray!
Swans, ducks, and geeſe, and the wing'd winter-brood,
Chatter diſcordant on yon echoing flood!
At Babel thus, when heaven the tongue confounds,
Sudden a thouſand different jargon-ſounds,
Like jangling bells, harſh mingling grate the ear!
All ſtare! all talk! all mean; but none cohere!
Mark! wiley fowlers meditate their doom,
And ſmoky fate ſpeeds thundering through the gloom!
Stop'd ſhort, they ceaſe in airy rings to fly,
Whirl o'er and o'er, and, fluttering, fall and die.
Still fancy wafts me on! deceiv'd I ſtand,
Eſtrang'd, adventurous on a foreign land!
Wide and more wide extends the ſcene unknown!
Where ſhall I turn, a WANDERER, and alone?
From hilly wilds, and deeps where ſnows remain,
My winding ſteps up a ſteep mountain ſtrain!
Emmers'd a-top, I mark, the hills ſubſide,
And towers aſpire, but with inferior pride!
On this bleak height tall firs, with ice-work crown'd,
Bend, while their flacky winter ſhades the ground!
Hoarſe, and direct, a bluſtering north-wind blows!
On boughs, thick ruſtling, crack the criſped ſnows!
Tangles of froſt half-fright the wilder'd eye,
By heat oft-blacken'd like a lowering ſky!
Hence down the ſide two turbid rivulets pour,
And devious two, in one huge cataract roar!
While pleas'd the watery progreſs I purſue,
Yon rocks in rough aſſemblage ruſh in view!
In form an amphitheatre they riſe;
And a dark gulf in their broad centre lies.

There the dim'd ſight with dizzy weakneſs fails,
And horror o'er the firmeſt brain prevails!
Thither theſe mountain ſtreams their paſſage take,
Headlong foam down, and form a dreadful lake!
The lake, high-ſwelling, ſo redundant grows,
From the heap'd ſtore deriv'd, a river flows;
Which, deepening, travels through a diſtant wood,
And thence emerging, meets a ſiſter-flood;
Mingled they flaſh on a wide-opening plain,
And paſs yon city to the far-ſeen main.
So blend two ſouls by heaven for union made,
And ſtrengthening forward, lend a mutual aid,
And prove in every tranſient turn their aim,
Through finite life to infinite the ſame.
Nor ends the landſcape---ocean, to my ſight,
Points a blue arm, where ſailing ſhips delight,
In proſpect leſſen'd!—Now new rocks, rear'd high,
Stretch a croſs-ridge, and bar the curious eye;
There lies obſcur'd the ripening diamond's ray,
And thence red-branching coral's rent away.
In conic form there gelid cryſtal grows;
Through ſuch the palace-lamp, gay luſtre throws!
Luſtre, which, through dim night, as various plays,
As play from yonder ſnows the changeful rays!
For nobler uſe the cryſtal's worth may riſe,
If tubes perſpective hem the ſpotleſs prize;
Through theſe the beams of the far-lengthen'd eye
Meaſure known ſtars, and new remoter ſpy.
Hence commerce many a ſhorten'd voyage ſteers,
Shorten'd to months, the hazard once of years;
Hence Halley's ſoul etherial flight eſſays;
Inſtructive there from orb to orb ſhe ſtrays;
Sees, round new countleſs ſuns, new ſyſtems roll!
Sees God in all! and magnifies the whole!
Yon rocky ſide enrich'd the ſummer ſcene,
And peaſants ſearch for herbs of healthful green;
Now naked, pale, and comfortleſs it lies,
Like youth extended cold in death's diſguiſe.
There, while without the ſounding tempeſt ſwells,
Incav'd ſecure th' exulting eagle dwells;
And there, when nature owns prolific ſpring,
Spreads o'er her young a fondling mother's wing.
Swains on the coaſt the far-fam'd fiſh deſcry,
That gives the fleecy robe the Tyrian dye;
While ſhells, a ſcatter'd ornament beſtow,
The tinctur'd rivals of the ſhowery bow.
Yon limeleſs ſands, looſe-driving with the wind,
In future cauldrons uſeful texture find,
Till, on the furnace thrown, the glowing maſs
Brightens, and brightening hardens into glaſs.
When winter halcyons, flickering on the wave,
Tune their complaints, yon ſea forgets to rave;
Though laſh'd by ſtorms, which naval pride o'erturn,
The foaming deep in ſparkles ſeems to burn,
Loud winds turn zephyrs to enlarge their notes,
And each ſafe neſt on a calm ſurface floats.
Now veers the wind full eaſt; and keen, and ſore,
Its cutting influence aches in every pore!
How weak thy fabric, man!—A puff, thus blown,
Staggers thy ſtrength, and echoes to thy groan.
A tooth's minuteſt nerve let anguiſh ſeize,
Swift kindred fibres catch! (ſo frail our caſe!)
Pinch'd, pierc'd, and torn, enflam'd, and unaſſwag'd, [rag'd!
They ſmart, and ſwell, and throb, and ſhoot enFrom nerve to nerve fierce flies th' exulting pain!
—And are we of this mighty fabric vain? [glides!
Now my blood chills! ſcarce through my veins it
Sure on each blaſt a ſhivering ague rides!
Warn'd let me this bleak eminence forſake,
And to the vale a different winding take!
Half I deſcend: my ſpirits faſt decay;
A terrace now relieves my weary way.
Cloſe with this ſtage a precipice combines;
Whence ſtill the ſpacious country far declines!
The herds ſeem inſects in the diſtant glades,
And men diminiſh'd, as, at noon, their ſhades!
Thick on this top, o'ergrown for walks, are ſeen
Gray leafleſs wood, and winter-greens between!
The reddening berry, deep-ting'd holly ſhows,
And matted miſletoe, the white, beſtows!
Though loſt the banquet of autumnal fruits,
Though on broad oaks no vernal umbrage ſhoots!
Theſe boughs, the ſilenc'd ſhivering ſongſters ſeek!
Theſe foodful berries fill the hungry beak.
Beneath appears a place, all outward bare,
Inward the dreary manſion of deſpair!
The water of the mountain-road, half ſtray'd,
Breaks o'er it wild, and falls a brown caſcade.
Has nature this rough, naked piece deſign'd,
To hold inhabitants of mortal kind?
She has. Approach'd, appears a deep deſcent,
Which opens in a rock a large extent!
And hark!—its hollow entrance reach'd, I hear
A trampling ſound of footſteps haſtening near!
A death-like chillneſs thwarts my panting breaſt:
Soft! the wiſh'd object ſtands at length confeſs'd!
Of youth his form.—But why with anguiſh bent?
Why pin'd with ſallow marks of diſcontent?
Yet patience, labouring to beguile his care,
Seems to raiſe hope, and ſmiles away deſpair.
Compaſſion, in his eye, ſurveys my grief,
And in his voice invites me to relief.
Preventive of thy call, behold my haſte,
(He ſays) nor let warm thanks thy ſpirits waſte!
All fear forget——Each portal I poſſeſs,
Duty wide-opens to receive diſtreſs.
Oblig'd, I follow, by his guidance led;
The vaulted roof re-echoing to our tread!
And now, in ſquar'd diviſions, I ſurvey
Chambers ſequeſter'd from the glare of day;
Yet needful lights are taught to intervene,
Through rifts; each forming a perſpective ſcene.
In front a parlour meets my entering view;
Oppos'd, a room to ſweet refection due.
Here my chill'd veins are warm'd by chippy fires,
Through the bor'd rock above, the ſmoke expires;
Neat, o'er a homely board, a napkin's ſpread,
Crown'd with a heapy caniſter of bread.
A maple cup is next diſpatch'd to bring
The comfort of the ſalutary ſpring:
Nor mourn we abſent bleſſings of the vine,
Here laughs a frugal bowl of roſy wine;
And ſavoury cates, upon clear embers caſt,
Lie hiſſing, till ſnatch'd off; a rich repaſt!
Soon leap my ſpirits with enliven'd power,
And in gay converſe glides the feaſtful hour.

The hermit, thus: Thou wonder'ſt at thy fare:
On me, yon city, kind, beſtows her care:
Meat for keen famine, and the generous juice,
That warms chill'd life, her charities produce:
Accept without reward; unaſk'd 'twas mine;
Here what thy health requires, as free be thine.
Hence learn that God, (who, in the time of need,
In frozen deſerts can the raven feed)
Well-ſought, will delegate ſome pitying breaſt,
His ſecond means, to ſuccour man diſtreſs'd.
He paus'd. Deep thought upon his aſpect gloom'd;
Then he, with ſmile humane, his voice reſum'd.
I'm juſt inform'd, (and laugh me not to ſcorn)
By one unſeen by thee, thou'rt Engliſh-born.
Of England I—to me the Britiſh ſtate
Riſes, in dear memorial, ever great!
Here ſtand we conſcious:—Diffidence ſuſpend!
Free flow our words!—Did ne'er thy muſe extend
To grots, where contemplation ſmiles ſerene,
Where angels viſit, and where joys convene?
To groves, where more than mortal voices riſe,
Catch the rapt ſoul, and waft it to the ſkies?
This cave!—Yon walks!—But, ere I more unfold,
What artful ſcenes thy eyes ſhall here behold,
Think ſubjects of my toil: nor wondering gaze!
What cannot induſtry completely raiſe?
Be the whole earth in one great landſcape found,
By induſtry is all with beauty crown'd!
He, he alone, explores the mine for gain,
Hews the hard rock, or harrows up the plain;
He forms the ſword to ſmite; he ſheaths the ſteel,
Draws health from herbs, and ſhows the balm to heal;
Or with loom'd wool the native robe ſupplies;
Or bids young plants in future foreſts riſe;
Or fells the monarch oak, which, borne away,
Shall, with new grace, the diſtant ocean ſway;
Hence golden commerce views her wealth increaſe,
The bliſsful child of liberty and peace.
He ſcoops the ſtubborn Alps, and, ſtill employ'd,
Fills, with ſoft fertile mould, the ſteril void;
Slop'd up white rocks, ſmall, yellow harveſts grow,
And, green on terrac'd ſtages, vineyards blow!
By him fall mountains to a level ſpace,
An iſthmus ſinks, and ſunder'd ſeas embrace!
He founds a city on the naked ſhore,
And deſolation ſtarves the tract no more.
From the wild waves he won the Belgic land;
Where wide they foam'd, her towns and traffics ſtand;
He clear'd, manur'd, enlarg'd the furtive ground,
And firms the conqueſt with his fenceful mound.
Ev'n mid the watery world his Venice roſe,
Each fabric there, as pleaſure's ſeat he ſhows!
There marts, ſports, councils, are for action ſought,
Landſcapes for health, and ſolitude for thought.
What wonder then I, by his potent aid,
A manſion in a barren mountain made?
Part thou haſt view'd!—If further we explore,
Let induſtry deſerve applauſe the more.
No frowning care yon bleſt apartment ſees,
There ſleep retires, and finds a couch of eaſe.
Kind dreams, that fly remorſe, and pamper'd wealth,
There ſhed the ſmiles of innocence and health.
Mark!—Here deſcends a grot, delightful ſeat!
Which warms ev'n winter, tempers ſummer heat!
See!—Gurgling from a top, a ſpring diſtills!
In mournful meaſures wind the dripping rills;
Soft coos of diſtant doves, receiv'd around,
In ſoothing mixture, ſwell the watery ſound;
And hence the ſtreamlets ſeek the terrace' ſhade,
Within, without, alike to all convey'd.
Paſs on—New ſcenes, by my creative power,
Invite reflection's ſweet and ſolemn hour.
We enter'd, where, in well-rang'd order, ſtood
Th' inſtructive volumes of the wiſe and good.
Theſe friends (ſaid he) though I deſert mankind,
Good angels never would permit behind.
Each genius, youth conceals, or time diſplays,
I know; each work ſome ſeraph here conveys,
Retirement thus preſents my ſearchful thought,
What heaven inſpir'd, and what the muſe has taught;
What young ſatiric and ſublime has writ,
Whoſe life is virtue, and whoſe muſe is wit.
Rap'd I foreſee thy Mallet's * early aim
Shine in full worth, and ſhoot at length to fame,
Sweet fancy's bloom in Fenton's lay appears,
And the ripe judgment of inſtructive years.
In Hill is all that generous ſouls revere,
To virtue and the muſe for ever dear:
And Thomſon, in this praiſe, thy merit ſee,
The tongue that praiſes merit, praiſes thee.
Theſe ſcorn (ſaid I) the verſe-wright of their age,
Vain of a labour'd, languid, uſeleſs page;
To whoſe dim faculty the meaning ſong
Is glaring, or obſcure, when clear, and ſtrong;
Who, in cant phraſes, gives a work diſgrace;
His wit, and oddneſs of his tone and face;
Let the weak malice, nurs'd to an eſſay,
In ſome low libel a mean heart diſplay;
Thoſe, who once prais'd, now undeceiv'd, deſpiſe,
It lives contemn'd a day, then harmleſs dies.
Or ſhould ſome nobler bard, their worth, unpraiſe,
Deſerting morals, that adorn his lays,
Alas! too oft each ſcience ſhows the ſame,
The great grow jealous of a greater name:
Ye bards, the frailty mourn, yet brave the ſhock;
Has not a Stillingfleet oppos'd a Locke?
Oh, ſtill proceed, with ſacred rapture fir'd!
Unenvy'd had he liv'd, if unadmir'd.
Let envy, he replied, all ireful riſe,
Envy purſues alone the brave and wiſe;
Maro and Socrates inſpire her pain,
And Pope, the monarch of the tuneful train!
To whom be nature's, and Britannia's praiſe!
All their bright honours ruſh into his lays!
And all that glorious warmth his lays reveal,
Which only poets, kings, and patriots feel!
Though gay as mirth, as curious thought ſedate,
As elegance polite, as power elate;
Profound as reaſon, and as juſtice clear;
Soft as compaſſion, yet as truth ſevere;

* He had then juſt written the Excurſion.

As bounty copious, as perſuaſion ſweet,
Like nature various, and like art complete;
So fine her morals, ſo ſublime her views,
His life is almoſt equall'd by his muſe.
O Pope!—Since envy is decreed by fate,
Since ſhe purſues alone the wiſe and great;
In one ſmall, emblematic landſcape ſee,
How vaſt a diſtance 'twixt thy foe and thee!
Truth from an eminence ſurveys our ſcene
(A hill, where all is clear, and all ſerene).
Rude earth-bred ſtorms o'er meaner valleys blow,
And wandering miſts roll, blackening far below;
Dark, and debas'd, like them, is envy's aim,
And clear, and eminent, like truth, thy fame.
Thus I. From what dire cauſe can envy ſpring?
Or why emboſom we a viper's ſting?
'Tis envy ſtings our darling paſſion, pride.
Alas! (the man of mighty ſoul replied)
Why chooſe we miſeries? Moſt derive their birth
From one bad ſource—we dread ſuperior worth;
Prefer'd, it ſeems a ſatire on our own;
Then heedleſs to excel we meanly moan:
Then we abſtract our views, and envy ſhow,
Whence ſprings the miſery, pride is doom'd to know.
Thus folly pain creates: By wiſdom's power,
We ſhun the weight of many a reſtleſs hour—
Lo! I meet wrong; perhaps the wrong I feel
Tends, by the ſcheme of things, to public weal.
I, of the whole, am part—the joy men ſee,
Muſt circulate, and ſo revolve to me.
Why ſhould I then of private loſs complain?
Of loſs, that proves, per chance, a brother's gain?
The wind, that binds one bark within the bay,
May waft a richer freight its wiſh'd-for way.
If rains redundant flood the abject ground,
Mountains are but ſupplied, when vales are drown'd;
If, with ſoft moiſture ſwell'd, the vale looks gay,
The verdure of the mountain fades away.
Shall clouds, but at my welfare's call deſcend?
Shall gravity for me her laws ſuſpend?
For me ſhall ſuns their noon-tide courſe forbear?
Or motion not ſubſiſt to influence air?
Let the means vary, be they froſt, or flame,
Thy end, O nature! ſtill remains the ſame!
Be this the motive of a wiſe man's care,—
To ſhun deſerving ills, and learn to bear.

CANTO II.

While thus a mind humane, and wiſe, he ſhows,
All eloquent of truth his language flows. [pears;
Youth, though depreſs'd, through all his form ap-
Through all his ſentiments the depth of years.
Thus he.—Yet farther induſtry behold,
Which conſcious waits new wonders to unfold,
Enter my chapel next—Lo! here begin
The hallow'd rites, that check the growth of ſin.
When firſt we met, how ſoon you ſeem'd to know
My boſom, labouring with the throbs of woe!
Such racking throbs!—Soft! when I rouſe thoſe cares,
On my chill'd mind pale recollection glares!

When moping frenzy ſtrove my thoughts to ſway,
Here prudent labours chas'd her power away.
Full, and rough-riſing from yon ſculptur'd wall,
Bold prophets nations to repentance call!
Meek martyrs ſmile in flames! gor'd champions groan!
And muſe-like cherubs tune their harps in ſtone!
Next ſhadow'd light a rounding force beſtows,
Swells into life, and ſpeaking action grows!
Here pleaſing, melancholy ſubjects find,
To calm, amuſe, exalt the penſive mind!
This figure tender grief, like mine, implies,
And ſemblant thoughts, that earthly pomp deſpiſe.
Such penitential Magdalene reveals;
Looſe-veil'd, in negligence of charms ſhe kneels.
Though dreſs, near-ſtor'd, its vanity ſupplies,
The vanity of dreſs unheeded lies.
The ſinful world in ſorrowing eye ſhe keeps,
As o'er Jeruſalem Meſſiah weeps.
One hand her boſom ſmites; in one appears
The lifted lawn, that drinks her falling tears.
Since evil outweighs good, and ſways mankind,
True fortitude aſſumes the patient mind:
Such prov'd Meſſiah's, though to ſuffering born,
To penury, repulſe, reproach, and ſcorn.
Here, by the pencil, mark his flight deſign'd;
The weary'd virgin by a ſtream reclin'd,
Who feeds the child. Her looks a charm expreſs,
A modeſt charm, that dignifies diſtreſs.
Boughs o'er their heads with bluſhing fruits depend,
Which angels to her buſied conſort bend.
Hence by the ſmiling infant ſeems diſcern'd,
Trifles, concerning Him, all heaven concern'd.
Here the transfigur'd Son from earth retires:
See! the white form in a bright cloud aſpires!
Full on his followers burſts a flood of rays,
Proſtrate they fall beneath th' o'erwhelming blaze!
Like noon-tide ſummer-ſuns the rays appear,
Unſufferable, magnificent, and near!
What ſcene of agony the garden brings;
The cup of gall; the ſuppliant King of kings!
The crown of thorns; the croſs, that felt him die;
Theſe, languid in the ſketch, unfiniſh'd lie.
There, from the dead, centurions ſee him riſe,
See! but ſtruck down with horrible ſurpriſe!
As the firſt glory ſeem'd a ſun at noon,
This caſts the ſilver ſplendour of the moon.
Here peopled day, th' aſcending God ſurveys!
The glory varies, as the myriads gaze!
Now ſoften'd, like a ſun at diſtance ſeen,
When through a cloud bright-glancing, yet ſerene!
Now faſt encreaſing to the crowd amaz'd,
Like ſome vaſt meteor high in æther rais'd!
My labour, yon high vaulted altar ſtains
With dyes, that emulate æthereal plains.
The convex glaſs, which in that opening glows,
Mid circling rays a pictur'd Saviour ſhows!
Bright it collects the beams, which, trembling all,
Back from the God, a ſhowery radiance fall.
Lightening the ſcene beneath! a ſcene divine!
Where ſaints, clouds, ſeraphs, intermingled ſhine!
Here water-falls, that play melodious round,
Like a ſweet organ, ſwell a lofty ſound!
The ſolemn notes bid earthly paſſions fly,
Lull all my cares, and lift my ſoul on high!

This monumental marble—this I rear
To one—Oh! ever mourn'd!—Oh! ever dear!
He ſtopt—pathetic ſighs the pauſe ſupply,
And the prompt tear ſtarts, quivering, on his eye!
I look'd—two columns near the wall were ſeen,
An imag'd beauty ſtretch'd at length between.
Near the wept fair, her harp Cecilia ſtrung;
Leaning, from high, a liſtening angel hung!
Friendſhip, whoſe figure at the feet remains,
A phœnix, with irradiate creſt, ſuſtains:
This grac'd one palm, while one extends t'impart
Two foreign hands, that claſp a burning heart.
A pendent veil two hovering ſeraphs raiſe,
Which opening heaven upon the roof diſplays!
And two, benevolent, leſs diſtant, hold
A vaſe, collective of perfumes uproll'd!
Theſe from the heart, by friendſhip held, ariſe,
Odorous as incenſe gathering in the ſkies.
In the fond pelican is love expreſt,
Who opens to her young her tender breaſt.
Two mated turtles hovering hang in air,
One by a faulcon ſtruck!—in wild deſpair,
The hermit cries—So death, alas! deſtroys
The tender conſort of my cares and joys!
Again ſoft tears upon his eye-lid hung,
Again check'd ſounds dy'd, fluttering, on his tongue.
Too well his pining inmoſt thought I know!
Too well ev'n ſilence tells the ſtory'd woe!
To his my ſighs, to his my tears reply!
I ſtray o'er all the tomb a watery eye!
Next, on the wall, her ſcenes of life I gaz'd,
The form back-leaning, by a globe half-rais'd!
Cherubs a proffer'd crown of glory ſhow,
Ey'd wiſtful by th' admiring fair below.
In action eloquent diſpos'd her hands,
One ſhows her breaſt, in rapture one expands!
This the fond hermit ſeiz'd!—o'er all his ſoul,
The ſoft, wild, wailing, amorous paſſion ſtole!
In ſtedfaſt gaze his eyes her aſpect keep,
Then turn away, a while dejected weep;
Then he reverts them; but reverts in vain,
Dimm'd with the ſwelling grief that ſtreams again.
Where now is my philoſophy? (he cries)
My joy, hope, reaſon, my Olympia dies!
Why did I e'er that prime of bleſſings know?
Was it, ye cruel fates, t'embitter woe?
Why would your bolts not level firſt my head?
Why muſt I live to weep Olympia dead?
—Sir, I had once a wife! Fair bloom'd her youth,
Her form was beauty, and her ſoul was truth!
Oh, ſhe was dear! How dear, what words can ſay?
She dies!—my heaven at once is ſnatch'd away!
Ah! what avails, that, by a father's care,
I roſe a wealthy and illuſtrious heir?
That early in my youth I learn'd to prove
Th' inſtructive, pleaſing, academic grove?
That in the ſenate eloquence was mine?
That valour gave me in the field to ſhine? [all
That love ſhower'd bleſſings too—far more than
High rapt ambition e'er could happy call?
Ah!—What are theſe, which ev'n the wiſe adore?
Loſt is my pride!—Olympia is no more!
Had I, ye perſecuting powers! been born
The world's cold pity, or, at beſt, its ſcorn;
Of wealth, of rank, of kindred warmth bereft;
To want, to ſhame, to ruthleſs cenſure left!
Patience, or pride, to this, relief ſupplies!
But a loſt wife!—there! there diſtraction lies!
Now three ſad years I yield me all to grief,
And fly the hated comfort of relief!
Though rich, great, young, I leave a pompous ſeat,
(My brother's now) to ſeek ſome dark retreat:
Mid cloiſter'd ſolitary tombs I ſtray,
Deſpair and horror lead the cheerleſs way!
My ſorrow grows to ſuch a wild exceſs,
Life, injur'd life, muſt wiſh the paſſion leſs!
Olympia!—my Olympia's loſt! (I cry)
Olympia's loſt, the hollow vaults reply!
Louder I make my lamentable moan;
The ſwelling echoes learn like me to groan;
The ghoſts to ſcream, as through lone aiſles they ſweep;
The ſhrines to ſhudder, and the ſaints to weep!
Now grief and rage, by gathering ſighs ſuppreſt,
Swell my full heart, and heave my labouring breaſt!
With ſtruggling ſtarts, each vital ſtring they ſtrain,
And ſtrike the tottering fabric of my brain!
O'er my ſunk ſpirits frowns a vapoury ſcene,
Woe's dark retreat! the madding maze of ſpleen!
A deep damp gloom o'erſpreads the murky cell;
Here pining thoughts and ſecret terrors dwell!
Here learn the great unreal wants to feign!
Unpleaſing truths here mortify the vain!
Here learning, blinded firſt, and then beguil'd,
Looks dark as ignorance, as frenzy wild!
Here firſt credulity on reaſon won!
And here falſe zeal myſterious rants begun!
Here love impearls each moment with a tear,
And ſuperſtition owes to ſpleen her fear!
Fantaſtic lightnings, through the dreary way,
In ſwift ſhort ſignals flaſh the burſting day!
Above, beneath, acroſs, around, they fly!
A dire deception ſtrikes the mental eye!
By the blue fires, pale phantoms grin ſevere!
Shrill, fancy'd echoes wound th' affrighted ear!
Air-baniſh'd ſpirits flag in fogs profound,
And, all obſcene, ſhed baneful damps around!
Now whiſpers, trembling in ſome feeble wind,
Sigh out prophetic fears, and freeze the mind!
Loud laughs the hag!—She mocks complaint away,
Unroofs the den, and lets in more than day.
Swarms of wild fancies, wing'd in various flight,
Seek emblematic ſhades, and myſtic light!
Some drive with rapid ſteeds the ſhining car!
Theſe nod from thrones! Thoſe thunder in the war!
Till, tir'd, they turn from the deluſive ſhow,
Start from wild joy, and fix in ſtupid woe.
Here the lone hour a blank of life diſplays,
Till now bad thoughts a fiend more active raiſe;
A fiend in evil moments ever nigh!
Death in her hand, and frenzy in her eye!
Her eye all red, and ſunk!—A robe ſhe wore,
With life's calamities embroider'd o'er.
A mirror in one hand collective ſhows,
Vary'd and multiply'd, that group of woes.
This endleſs foe to generous toil and pain
Lolls on a couch for eaſe; but lolls in vain;

She muſes o'er her woe embroider'd veſt,
And ſelf-abhorrence heightens in her breaſt.
To ſhun her care, the force of ſleep ſhe tries,
Still wakes her mind, though ſlumbers doze her eyes:
She dreams, ſtarts, riſes, ſtalks from place to place,
With reſtleſs, thoughtful, interrupted pace;
Now eyes the ſun, and curſes every ray,
Now the green ground, where colour fades away.
Dim ſpectres dance. Again her eye ſhe rears;
Then from the blood-ſhot ball wipes purpled tears;
Then preſſes hard her brow, with miſchief fraught,
Her brow half burſts with agony of thought!
From me (ſhe cries) pale wretch, thy comfort claim,
Born of deſpair, and ſuicide my name!
Why ſhould thy life a moment's pain endure!
Here every object proffers grief a cure.
She points where leaves of hemlock blackening ſhoot!
Fear not! pluck! eat (ſaid ſhe) the ſovereign root!
Then death, revers'd, ſhall bear his ebon lance!
Soft o'er thy ſight ſhall ſwim the ſhadowy trance!
Or leap yon rock, poſſeſs a watery grave,
And leave wild ſorrow to the wind and wave!
Or mark—this poniard thus from miſery frees!
She wounds her breaſt!—the guilty ſteel I ſeize!
Straight, where ſhe ſtruck, a ſmoking ſpring of gore
Wells from the wound, and floats the crimſon'd floor,
She faints! ſhe fades!---Calm thoughts the deed revolve,
And now, unſtartling, fix the dire reſolve;
Death drops his terrors, and, with charming wiles,
Winning, and kind, like my Olympia ſmiles!
He points the paſſage to the ſeats divine,
Where poets, heroes, ſainted lovers ſhine!
I come, Olympia!---my rear'd arm extends;
Half to my breaſt the threatening point deſcends;
Straight thunder rocks the land! new lightnings play!
When, lo! a voice reſounds---Ariſe! away!
Away! nor murmur at th' afflictive rod!
Nor tempt the vengeance of an angry God!
Fly'ſt thou from providence for vain relief?
Such ill-fought eaſe ſhall draw avenging grief.
Honour, the more obſtructed, ſtronger ſhines,
And zeal by perſecution's rage refines.
By woe, the ſoul to daring action ſwells;
By woe, in paintleſs patience it excels;
From patient, prudent dear experience ſprings,
And traces knowledge through the courſe of things!
Thence hope is form'd, thence fortitude, ſucceſs,
Renown:---whate'er men covet and careſs.
The vaniſh'd fiend thus ſent a hollow voice,
Would'ſt thou be happy? ſtraight be death thy choice.
How mean are thoſe, who paſſively complain;
While active ſouls, more free, their fetters ſtrain!
Though knowledge thine, hope, fortitude, ſucceſs,
Renown:---whate'er men covet and careſs;
On earth ſucceſs muſt in its turn give way,
And ev'n perfection introduce decay.
Never the world of ſpirits thus-- their reſt
Untouch'd! entire!---once happy, ever bleſt!

Earneſt the heavenly voice reſponſive cries,
Oh, liſten not to ſubtilty unwiſe!
Thy guardian ſaint, who mourns thy hapleſs fate,
Heaven grants to prop thy virtue, ere too late.
Know, if thou wilt thy dear lov'd wife deplore,
Olympia waits thee on a foreign ſhore;
There in a cell thy laſt remains be ſpent;
Away! deceive deſpair, and find content!
I heard, obey'd; nor more of fate complain'd;
Long ſeas I meaſur'd, and this mountain gain'd
Soon to a yawning rift, chance turn'd my way;
A den it prov'd, where a huge ſerpent lay!
Flame-ey'd he lay!---he rages now for food,
Meets my firſt glance, and meditates my blood!
His bulk, in many a gather'd orb uproll'd,
Rears ſpire on ſpire! His ſcales, be-dropt with gold,
Shine burniſh'd in the ſun! ſuch height they gain,
They dart green luſtre on the diſtant main!
Now writh'd in dreadful ſlope, he ſtoops his creſt,
Furious to fix on my unſhielded breaſt!
Juſt as he ſprings, my ſabre ſmites the foe!
Headleſs he falls beneath th' unerring blow!
Wrath yet remains, though ſtrength his fabric leaves,
And the meant hiſs the gaſping mouth deceives;
The lengthening trunk ſlow-looſens every fold,
Lingers in life: then ſtretches ſtiff, and cold.
Juſt as th' inveterate ſon of miſchief ends,
Comes a white dove, and near the ſpot deſcends:
I hail this omen! all bad paſſions ceaſe,
Like the ſlain ſnake, and all within is peace.
Next, to religion this plain roof I raiſe!
In duteous rites my hallow'd tapers blaze;
I bid due incenſe on my altars ſmoke!
Then, at this tomb, my promis'd love invoke!
She hears! ſhe comes!---My heart what raptures warm?
All my Olympia ſparkles in the form!
No pale, wan, livid mark of death ſhe bears!
Each reſeate look a quickening tranſport wears!
A robe of light, high-wrought, her ſhape inveſts;
Unzon'd the ſwelling beauty of her breaſts!
Her auburn hair each flowing ring reſumes,
In her fair hand, love's branch of myrtle blooms!
Silent, awhile, each well-known charm I trace;
Then, thus, (while nearer ſhe avoids th' embrace)
Thou dear deceit!---muſt I a ſhade purſue?
Dazzled I gaze!---thou ſwim'ſt before my view!
Dip'd in etherial dews, her bough divine
Sprinkles my eyes, which, ſtrengthen'd, bear the ſhine:
Still thus I urge (for ſtill the ſhadowy bliſs
Shuns the warm graſp, nor yields the tender kiſs)
Oh, fly not!—fade not! liſten to love's call!
She lives! no more I'm man! I'm ſpirit all!
Then let me ſnatch thee!---preſs thee!---take me whole!
Oh, cloſe!---yet cloſer!---cloſer to my ſoul!
Twice, round her waiſt, my eager arms entwin'd,
And, twice deceiv'd, my frenzy claſp'd the wind!
Then thus I rav'd---Behold thy huſband kneel,
And judge! O judge what agonies I feel!
Oh! be no longer, if unkind, thus fair;
Take horror's ſhape, and fright me to deſpair!

Rather than thus, unpitying, see my moan,
Far rather frown, and fix me here in stone!
But mock not thus!---Alas (the charmer said,
Smiling, and in her smile soft radiance play'd)
Alas! no more eluded strength employ,
To clasp a shade!---What more is mortal joy?
Man's bliss is, like his knowledge, but surmis'd;
One ignorance, the other pain disguis'd!
Thou wert (had all thy wish been still possest)
Supremely curs'd from being greatly blest;
For oh! so fair, so dear was I to thee,
Thou hadst forgot thy God to worship me;
This he foresaw, and snatch'd me to the tomb;
Above I flourish in unfading bloom.
Think me not lost: for thee I heaven implore!
Thy guardian angel, though a wife no more!
I, when abstracted from this world you seem,
Hint the pure thought, and frame the heavenly dream!
Close at thy side, when morning streaks the air,
In music's voice I wake thy mind to prayer!
By me, thy hymns, like purest incense, rise,
Fragrant with grace, and pleasing to the skies!
And when that form shall from its clay refine,
(That only bar betwixt my soul and thine!)
When thy lov'd spirit mounts to realms of light,
Then shall Olympia aid thy earliest flight:
Mingled we'll flame in raptures that aspire
Beyond all youth, all sense, and all desire.
She ended. Still such sweetness dwells behind,
Th' inchanting voice still warbles in my mind:
But lo! th' unbodied vision fleets away!---
---Stay, my Olympia!---I conjure thee, stay!
Yet stay---for thee my memory leans to smart!
Sure every vein contains a bleeding heart!
Sooner shall splendor leave the blaze of day,
Than love, so pure, so vast as mine, decay!
From the same heavenly source its lustre came,
And glows, immortal, with congenial flame!
Ah!---let me not with fires neglected burn;
Sweet mistress of my soul, return, return!
Alas!---she's fled---I traverse now the place,
Where my enamour'd thoughts her footsteps trace.
Now, o'er the tomb, I bend my drooping head,
There tears, the eloquence of sorrow, shed.
Sighs choke my words, unable to express
The pangs, the throbs of speechless tenderness!
Not with more ardent, more transparent flame,
Call dying saints on their Creator's name,
Than I on her's;---but through yon yielding door,
Glides a new phantom o'er the illumin'd floor!
The roof swift kindles from the beaming ground,
And floods of living lustre flame around!
In all the majesty of light array'd,
Awful it shines!---'tis Cato's honour'd shade!
As I the heavenly visitant pursue,
Sublimer glory opens to my view!
He speaks---But, oh! what words shall dare repeat
His thoughts!---They leave me fir'd with patriot heat!
More than poetic raptures now I feel,
And own that godlike passion, public zeal!
But from my frailty, it receives a stain,
I grow, unlike my great inspirer, vain;
And burn, once more, the busy world to know,
And would, in scenes of action foremost glow!
Where proud ambition points her dazzling rays!
Where coronets and crowns, attractive, blaze!
When my Olympia leaves the realms above,
And lures me back to solitary love.
She tells me truth, prefers an humble state,
That genuine greatness shuns the being great!
That mean are those, who false-term'd honour prize;
Whose fabrics from their country's ruin rise;
Who look the traitor, like the patriot, fair;
Who, to enjoy the vineyard, wrong the heir.
I hear!---through all my veins new transports roll!
I gaze!---warm love comes rushing on my soul:
Ravish'd I gaze!---again her charms decay!
Again my manhood to my grief gives way!
Cato returns!---Zeal takes her course to reign!
But zeal is in ambition lost again!
I'm now the slave of fondness!---now of pride!
---By turns they conquer, and by turns subside!
These balanc'd each by each, the golden mean,
Betwixt them found, gives happiness serene;
This I'll enjoy!---He ended!---I reply'd,
O hermit! thou art worth severely try'd!
But had not innate grief produc'd thy woes,
Men, barbarous men, had prey'd on thy repose.
When seeking joy, we seldom sorrow miss,
And often misery points the path to bliss.
The soil, most worthy of the thrifty swain,
Is wounded thus, ere trusted with the grain;
The struggling grain must work obscure its way,
Ere the first green springs upward to the day;
Up-sprung, such weed-like coarseness it betrays,
Flocks on th' abandon'd blade permissive graze;
Then shoots the wealth, from imperfection clear,
And thus a grateful harvest crowns the year.

CANTO III.

Thus free our social time from morning flows
Till rising shades attempt the day to close.
Thus my new friend: behold the light's decay:
Back to yon city let me point thy way.
South-west, behind yon hill, the sloping sun,
To ocean's verge his fluent course has run:
His parting eyes a watery radiance shed,
Glance through the vale, and tip the mountain's head:
To which oppos'd the shadowy gulfs, below,
Beauteous, reflect the party-colour'd snow.
Now dance the stars, where Vesper leads the way;
Yet all faint-glimmering with remains of day.
Orient, the queen of night emits her dawn,
And throws, unseen, her mantle o'er the lawn.
Up the blue steep, her crimson orb now shines;
Now on the mountain-top her arm reclines,
In a red crescent seen: Her zone now gleams,
Like Venus, quivering in reflecting streams.
Yet reddening, yet round-burning up the air,
From the white cliff, her feet flow-rising glare

See! flames, condens'd now vary her attire;
Her face, a broad circumference of fire.
Dark firs seem kindled in nocturnal blaze;
Through ranks of pines, her broken lustre plays.
Here glares, there brown-projecting shade bestows,
And, glittering, sports upon the spangled snows.
Now silver turn her beams!---yon den they gain;
The big, rous'd lion shakes his brindled main.
Fierce, fleet, gaunt monsters, all prepar'd for gore,
Rend woods, vales, rocks, with wide resounding roar.
O dire presage!---But fear not thou, my friend,
Our steps the guardians of the just attend.
Homeward I'll wait thee on---and now survey,
How men and spirits chase the night away!
Yon nymphs and swains in amorous mirth advance;
To breathing music moves the circling dance.
Here the bold youth in deeds adventurous glow,
Skimming in rapid sleds the crackling snow.
Not when Tydides won the funeral race,
Shot his light car along in swifter pace.
Here the glaz'd way with iron feet they dare,
And glide, well-pois'd, like Mercuries in air.
There crowds, with stable tread, and level'd eye,
Lift, and dismiss the quoits, that whirling fly.
With force superior, not with skill so true,
The ponderous disk from Roman sinews flew.
Where neighbouring hills some cloudy sheet sustain,
Freez'd o'er the nether vale a pensile plain,
Cross the roof'd hollow rolls the massy round,
The crack'd ice rattles, and the rocks resound!
Censures, disputes, and laughs, alternate, rise;
And deafening clangor thunders up the skies.
Thus, amid crowded images, serene,
From hour to hour we pass'd, from scene to scene:
Fast wore the night. Full long we pac'd our way:
Vain steps! the city yet far distant lay.
While thus the hermit, ere my wonder spoke,
Methought, with new amusement, silence broke:
Yon amber-hued cascade, which fleecy flies
Through rocks, and strays along the trackless skies,
To frolic fairies marks the mazy ring;
Forth to the dance from little cells they spring,
Measur'd to pipe or harp!—and next they stand,
Marshal'd beneath the moon, a radiant band!
In frost-work now delight the sportive kind:
Now court wild fancy in the whistling wind.
Hark! the funeral bell's deep-sounding toll,
To bliss, from misery, calls some righteous soul!
Just freed from life, life swift-ascending fire,
Glorious it mounts, and gleams from yonder spire!
Light clasps its wings!—it views, with pitying sight,
The friendly mourner pay the pious rite;
The plume high wrought, that blackening nods in air;
The slow-pac'd weeping pomp; the solemn prayer;
The decent tomb; the verse, that sorrow gives,
Where, to remembrance sweet, fair virtue lives.
Now to mid-heaven the whiten'd moon inclines,
And shades contract, mark'd out in clearer lines;
With noiseless gloom the plains are deluged o'er:
See!—from the north, what streaming meteors pour!
Beneath Bootes springs the radiant train,
And quiver through the axle of his wain.
O'er altars thus, impainted, we behold
Half-circling glories shoot in rays of gold.
Cross æther swift elance the vivid fires!
As swift again each pointed flame retires!
In Fancy's eye encountering armies glare,
And sanguine ensigns wave unfurl'd in air!
Hence the weak vulgar deem impending fate,
A monarch ruin'd, or unpeopled state.
Thus comets, dreadful visitants! arise
To them wild omens! science to the wise!
These mark the comet to the sun incline,
While deep-red flames around its centre shine!
While its fierce rear a winding trail displays,
And lights all æther with the sweepy blaze!
Or when, compell'd, it flies the torrid zone,
And shoots by worlds unnumber'd and unknown;
By worlds, whose people, all aghast with fear,
May view that minister of vengeance near!
Till now, the transient glow, remote and lost,
Decays, and darkens 'mid involving frost!
Or when it, sunward, drinks rich beams again,
And burns imperious on th' ætherial plain!
The learn'd-one, curious, eyes it from afar,
Sparkling through night, a new illustrious star!
The moon, descending, saw us now pursue
The various talk:---the city near in view!
Here from still-life (he cries) avert thy sight,
And mark what deeds adorn, or shame the night!
But, heedful, each immodest prospect fly;
Where decency forbids inquiry's eye.
Man, were not man, without love's wanton fire,
But reason's glory is to quell desire.
What are thy fruits, O lust? Short blessings bought
With long remorse, the seed of bitter thought;
Perhaps some babe to dire diseases born, [mourn;
Doom'd for another's crimes, through life, to
Or murder'd, to preserve a mother's fame;
Or cast obscure; the child of want and shame!
False pride! What vices on our conduct steal,
From the world's eye one frailty to conceal!
Ye cruel mothers!---Soft! those words command;
So near shall cruelty, and mother stand?
Can the dove's bosom snakey venom draw?
Can its foot sharpen, like the vulture's claw?
Can the fond goat, or tender, fleecy dam
Howl like the wolf, to tear the kid or lamb?
Yes, there are mothers---There I fear'd his aim,
And, conscious, trembled at the coming name;
Then, with a sigh, his issuing words oppos'd!
Straight with a falling tear the speech he clos'd!
That tenderness, which ties of blood deny,
Nature repaid me from a stranger's eye.
Pale grew my cheeks!---But now to general views
Our converse turns, which thus my friend renews.
Yon mansion, made by beaming tapers gay,
Drowns the dim night, and counterfeits the day,
From lumin'd windows glancing on the eye,
Around, athwart, the frisking shadows fly.
There midnight riot spreads illusive joys,
And fortune, health, and dearer time destroys.

Soon death's dark agent to luxuriant eaſe,
Shall wake ſharp warnings in ſome fierce diſeaſe.
O man! thy fabric's like a well-form'd ſtate;
Thy thoughts, firſt rank'd, were ſure deſign'd the great;
Paſſions plebians are, which faction raiſe;
Wine, like pour'd oil, excites the raging blaze:
Then giddy anarchy's rude triumphs riſe:
Then ſovereign reaſon from her empire flies:
That ruler once depos'd, wiſdom and wit,
To noiſe and folly, place and power ſubmit;
Like a frail bark thy weaken'd mind is toſt,
Unſteer'd, unbalanc'd, till its wealth is loſt.
The miſer-ſpirit eyes the ſpendthrift heir,
And mourns, too late, effects of ſordid care.
His treaſures fly to cloy each fawning ſlave;
Yet grudge a ſtone to dignify his grave.
For this, low-thoughted craft his life employ'd;
For this, though wealthy, he no wealth enjoy'd;
For this, he grip'd the poor, and alms deny'd,
Unfriended liv'd and unlamented died.
Yet ſmile, griev'd ſhade! when that unproſperous ſtore
Faſt-leſſens, when gay hours return no more;
Smile at thy heir, beholding, in his fall,
Men once oblig'd, like him, ungrateful all!
Then thought-inſpiring woe his heart ſhall mend,
And prove his only wiſe, unflattering friend.
Folly exhibits thus unmanly ſport,
While plotting miſchief keeps reſerv'd her court.
Lo! from that mount, in blaſting ſulphur broke,
Stream flames voluminous, enwrapp'd with ſmoke!
In chariot-ſhape they whirl up yonder tower,
Lean on its brow, and like deſtruction lower!
From the black depth, a fiery legion ſprings;
Each bold, had ſpectre claps her ſounding wings:
And ſtraight beneath a ſummon'd, traiterous band,
On horror bent, in dark convention ſtand:
From each fiend's mouth a ruddy vapour flows,
Glides through the roof, and o'er the council glows:
The villains, cloſe beneath th' infection pent,
Feel, all-poſſeſs'd, their riſing galls ferment;
And burn with faction, hate, and vengeful ire,
For rapine, blood, and devaſtation dire!
But juſtice marks their ways: ſhe waves in air,
The ſword, high-threatening, like a comet's glare.
While here dark villany herſelf deceives,
There ſtudious honeſty our view relieves.
A feeble taper, from yon loneſome room,
Scattering thin rays, juſt glimmers through the gloom.
There ſits the ſapient bard in muſeful mood,
And glows impaſſion'd for his country's good!
All the bright ſpirits of the juſt combin'd,
Inform, refine, and prompt his towering mind!
He takes the gifted quill from hands divine,
Around his temples rays reſulgent ſhine!
Now rapt! now more than man!—I ſee him climb,
To view this ſpeck of earth from worlds ſublime!
I ſee him now o'er nature's works preſide!
How clear the viſion! and the ſcene how wide!
Let ſome a name by adulation raiſe,
Or ſcandal, meaner than a venal praiſe!
My muſe (he cries) a nobler proſpect view!
Through fancy's wilds ſome moral's point purſue!
From dark deception clear drawn truth diſplay,
As from black chaos roſe reſplendent day!
Awake compaſſion, and bid terror riſe!
Bid humble ſorrows ſtrike ſuperior eyes!
So pamper'd power, unconſcious of diſtreſs,
May ſee, be mov'd, and, being mov'd, redreſs.
Ye traitors, tyrants, fear his ſtinging lay!
Ye powers unlov'd, unpity'd in decay!
But know, to you ſweet-bloſſom'd fame he brings,
Ye heroes, patriots, and paternal kings!
O Thou, who form'd, who rais'd the poet's art.
(Voice of thy will!) unerring force impart!
If wailing worth can generous warmth excite!
If verſe can gild inſtruction with delight,
Inſpire his honeſt muſe with orient flame,
To riſe, to dare, to reach the nobleſt aim!
But, O my friend! myſterious is our fate!
How mean his forrtune, though his mind elate!
Æneas-like he paſſes through the crowd.
Unſought, unſeen beneath misfortune's cloud;
Or ſeen with ſlight regard: Unprais'd his name:
His after-honour, and our after-ſhame.
The doom'd deſert, to avarice ſtands confeſs'd;
Her eyes averted are, and ſteel'd her breaſt.
Envy aſquint the future wonder eyes:
Bold inſult, pointing, hoots him as he flies;
While coward cenſure, ſkill'd in darker ways,
Hints ſure detraction in diſſembled praiſe!
Hunger, thirſt, nakedneſs, there grievous fall!
Unjuſt deriſion too!—that tongue of gall!
Slow comes relief, with no mild charms endued,
Uſher'd by pride, and by reproach purſued.
Forc'd pity meets him with a cold reſpect,
Unkind as ſcorn, ungenerous as neglect.
Yet, ſuffering worth! thy fortitude will ſhine:
Thy foes are virtue's, and her friends are thine!
Patience is thine, and peace thy days ſhall crown;
Thy treaſure prudence, and thy claim renown:
Myriads, unborn, ſhall mourn thy hapleſs fate,
And myriads grow, by thy example, great!
Hark! from the watch-tower rolls the trumpet's ſound,
Sweet through ſtill night, proclaiming ſafety round!
Yon ſhade illuſtrious quits the realms of reſt,
To aid ſome orphan of its race diſtreſt,
Safe winds him through the ſubterraneous way,
That mines yon manſion, grown with ruin gray,
And marks the wealthy, unſuſpected ground,
Where, green with ruſt, long-buried coins, abound.
This plaintive ghoſt, from earth when newly fled,
Saw thoſe, the living truſted, wrong the dead;
He ſaw, by fraud abus'd, the lifeleſs hand
Sign the falſe deed that alienates his land;
Heard, on his fame, injurious cenſure thrown,
And mourn'd the beggar'd orphan's bitter groan.
Commiſſion'd now the falſehood he reveals,
To juſtice ſoon th' enabled heir appeals;
Soon, by his wealth, are coſtly pleas maintain'd,
And, by diſcover'd truth, loſt right regain'd.
But why (ſome may inquire) why kind ſucceſs,
Since myſtic heaven gives miſery oft to bleſs?
Though miſery leads to happineſs and truth,
Unequal to the load, this languid youth,

Unſtrengthen'd virtue ſcarce his boſom fir'd,
And fearful from his growing wants retir'd.
Oh, let not cenſure, if (untry'd by grief,
If, amidſt woe, untempted by relief,)
He ſtoop'd reluctant to low arts of ſhame,
Which then, ev'n then he ſcorn'd, and bluſh'd to name.
Heaven ſees, and makes th' imperfect worth its care,
And cheers the trembling heart, unform'd to bear,
Now riſing fortune elevates his mind,
He ſhines unclouded, and adorns mankind.
So in ſome engine, that denies a vent,
If unreſpiring is ſome creature pent,
It ſickens, droops, and pants, and gaſps for breath,
Sad o'er the ſight ſwim ſhadowy miſts of death;
If then kind air pours powerful in again,
New heats, new pulſes quicken every vein;
From the clear'd, lifted, life-rekindled eye,
Diſpers'd, the dark and dampy vapours fly. [riſe,
From trembling tombs the ghoſts of greatneſs
And o'er their bodies hang with wiſtful eyes;
Or diſcontented ſtalk, and mix their howls
With howling wolves, their ſcreams with ſcreaming owls.
The interval 'twixt night and morn is nigh,
Winter more nitrous chills the ſhadow'd ſky.
Springs with ſoft heats no more give borders green,
Nor ſmoking breathe along the whiten'd ſcene;
While ſteamy currents, ſweet in proſpect, charm
Like veins blue-winding in a fair one's arm.
Now ſleep to fancy parts with half his power
And broken ſlumbers drag the reſtleſs hour.
The murder'd ſeems alive, and ghaſtly glares,
And in dire dreams the conſcious murderer ſcares,
Shows the yet-ſpouting wound, th' enſanguin'd floor,
The walls yet-ſmoking with the ſpatter'd gore;
Or ſhrieks to dozing juſtice, and reveals
The deed, which fraudful art from day conceals;
The delve obſcene, where no ſuſpicion pries,
Where the diſfigur'd corſe unſhrouded lies;
The ſure, the ſtriking proof, ſo ſtrong maintain'd,
Pale guilt ſtarts ſelf-convicted, when arraign'd.
Theſe ſpirits treaſon of its power diveſt,
And turn the peril from the patriot's breaſt.
Thoſe ſolemn thought inſpire, or bright deſcend
To ſnatch in viſion ſweet the dying friend.
But we deceive the gloom, the matin bell
Summons to prayer!—Now breaks th' enchanter's ſpell!
And now—But yon fair ſpirit's form ſurvey!
'Tis ſhe!—Olympia beckons me away!
I haſte!—I fly!—adieu!—and when you ſee
The youth who bleeds with fondneſs, think on me:
Tell him my tale, and be his pain careſt;
By love I tortur'd was, by love I'm bleſt.
When worſhipp'd woman we entranc'd behold,
We praiſe the Maker in his faireſt mould;
The pride of nature, harmony combin'd,
And light immortal to the ſoul refin'd!
Depriv'd of charming women, ſoon we miſs
The prize of friendſhip, and the life of bliſs!
Still through the ſhades Olympia dawning breaks!
What bloom, what brightneſs luſters o'er her cheeks!
Again ſhe calls!—I dare no longer ſtay!
A kind farewell—Olympia, I obey.
He turn'd, no longer in my ſight remain'd;
The mountain he, I ſafe the city gain'd.

CANTO IV.

Still o'er my mind wild fancy holds her ſway,
Still on ſtrange viſionary land I ſtray.
Now ſcenes crowd thick! now indiſtinct appear!
Swift glide the months, and turn the varying year!
Near the bull's horn light's riſing monarch draws;
Now on its back the Pleiades he thaws!
From vernal heat pale winter forc'd to fly,
Northward retires, yet turns a watery eye;
Then with an anguiſh breath nips infant blooms,
Deprives unfolding ſpring of rich perfumes,
Shakes the ſlow-circling blood of human race,
And in ſharp, livid looks contracts the face.
Now o'er Norwegian hills he ſtrides away:
Such ſlippery paths ambition's ſteps betray.
Turning, with ſighs, far ſpiral firs he ſees,
Which bow obedient to the ſouthern breeze:
Now from yon Zemblan rock his creſt he ſhrouds,
Like fame's, obſcur'd amid the whitening clouds;
Thence his loſt empire is with tears deplor'd:
Such tyrants ſhed o'er liberty reſtor'd.
Beneath his eye (that throws malignant light
Ten times the meaſur'd round of mortal ſight)
A waſte, pale glimmering, like a moon, that wanes
A wild expanſe of frozen ſea contains.
It cracks!—vaſt floating mountains beat the ſhore!
Far off he hears thoſe icy ruins roar,
And from the hideous craſh diſtracted flies,
Like one, who feels his dying infant's cries.
Near, and more near the ruſhing torrents ſound,
And one great rift runs through the vaſt profound,
Swift as a ſhooting meteor; groaning loud,
Like deep-roll'd thunder through a rending cloud.
The late dark pole now feels unfetting day;
In hurricanes of wrath he whirls his way;
O'er many a polar Alp to froſt he goes,
O'er crackling vales imbrown'd with melting ſnows:
Here bears ſtalk tenants of the barren ſpace,
Few men, unſocial thoſe!—a barbarous race!
At length the cave appears! the race is run:
How he recounts the conqueſts loſt and won,
And taleful in th' embrace of froſt remains,
Barr'd from our climes, and bound in icy chains.
Meanwhile the ſun his beams on Cancer throws,
Which now beneath his warmeſt influence glows.
From glowing Cancer fallen, the king of day,
Red through the kindling Lion ſhoots his ray.
The tawny harveſt pays the earlier plough,
And mellowing fruitage loads the bending bough,
'Tis day-ſpring. Now green labyrinths I frequent,
Where wiſdom oft retires to meet content.
The mounting lark her warbling anthem lends,
From note to note the raviſh'd ſoul aſcends;
As thus it would the patriarch's ladder climb,
By ſome good angel led to worlds ſublime:

Oft (legends fay) the ſnake with waken'd ire,
Like envy rears in many a ſcaly ſpire;
Then ſongſters droop, then yield their vital gore,
And innocence and muſic are no more.
Mild rides the morn in orient beauty dreſt,
An azure mantle, and a purple veſt.
Which, blown by gales, her gemmy feet diſplay,
Her amber treſſes negligently gay.
Collected now her roſy hand they fill,
And, gently wrung, the pearly dews diſtil.
The ſongful zephyrs, and the laughing hours,
Breathe ſweet; and ſtrow her opening way with flowers.
The chattering ſwallows leave their neſted care,
Each promiſing return with plenteous fare.
So the fond ſwain, who to the market hies,
Stills, with big hopes, his infant's tender cries,
Yonder two turtles, o'er their callow brood,
Hang hovering, ere they ſeek their guiltleſs food.
Fondly they bill. Now to their morning care,
Like our firſt parents, part the amorous pair:
But ah!—a pair no more!—With ſpreading wings,
From the high-ſounding cliff a vulture ſprings;
Steady he ſails along th' aerial gray,
Swoops down, and bears yon timorous dove away.
Start we, who worſe than vultures, Nimrods find,
Men meditating prey on human kind?
Wild beaſts to gloomy dens repace their way,
Where their couch'd young demand the ſlaughter'd prey. [fly,
Rooks, from their nodding neſts, black-ſwarming
And, in hoarſe uproar, tell the fowler nigh.
Now, in his tabernacle rous'd, the ſun
Is warn'd the blue ætherial ſteep to run.
While on his conch of floating jaſper laid,
From his bright eye ſleep calls the dewy ſhade.
The cryſtal dome tranſparent pillars raiſe,
Whence, beam'd from ſapphires, living azure plays:
The liquid floor, in-wrought with pearls divine,
Where all his labours in moſaic ſhine.
His coronet, a cloud of ſilver-white;
His robe with unconſuming crimſon bright,
Varied with gems, all heaven's collected ſtore!
While his looſe locks deſcend, a golden ſhower.
If to his ſteps compar'd, we tardy find
The Grecian racers, who outſtrip the wind,
Fleet to the glowing race behold him ſtart!
His quickening eyes a quivering radiance dart,
And, while this laſt nocturnal flag is furl'd,
Swift into life and motion look the world.
The ſun-flower now averts her blooming cheek
From weſt, to view his eaſtern luſtre break.
What gay, creative, power his preſence brings!
Hills, lawns, lakes, villages!—the face of things,
All night beneath ſucceſſive ſhadows miſs'd,
Inſtant begins in colours to exiſt:
But abſent theſe from ſons of riot keep,
Loſt in impure, unmeditating ſleep.
T' unlock his ſence, the new-riſen ſwain prepares,
And ere forth-driven recounts his fleecy cares;
When, lo! an ambuſh'd wolf, with hunger bold,
Springs at the prey, and fierce invades the fold!
But by the paſtor not in vain defied,
Like our arch foe by ſome celeſtial guide.

Spread on yon rock the ſea-calf I ſurvey:
Baſk'd in the ſun, his ſkin reflects the day.
He ſees yon tower-like ſhip the waves divide,
And ſlips again beneath the glaſſy tide.
The watery herbs, and ſhrubs, and vines, and flowers, [ſhowers.
Rear their bent heads, o'ercharg'd with nightly
Hail, glorious ſun! to whoſe attractive fires,
The weaken'd, vegetative life aſpires!
The juices, wrought by thy directive force,
Through plants, and trees, perform their genial courſe,
Extend in root, with bark unyielding bind
The hearted trunk; or weave the branching rind;
Expand in leaves, in flowery bloſſoms ſhoot,
Bleed in rich gums, and ſwell in ripen'd fruit.
From Thee, bright, univerſal Power! began
Inſtinct in brute, and generous love in man.
Talk'd I of love?---Yon ſwain, with amorous air,
Soft ſwells his pipe, to charm the rural fair.
She milks the flocks; then, liſtening as he plays,
Steals, in the running brook, a conſcious gaze.
The trout, that deep, in winter, ooz'd remains,
Up-ſprings, and ſunward turns its crimſon ſtains.
The tenants of the warren, vainly chas'd;
Now lur'd to ambient fields for green repaſt,
Seek their ſmall vaulted labyrinths in vain;
Entangling nets betray the ſkipping train;
Red maſſacres through their republic fly,
And heaps on heaps by ruthleſs ſpaniels die.
The fiſher, who the lonely beech has ſtray'd,
And all the live-long night his net-work ſpread,
Drags in, and bears the loaded ſnare away;
Where flounce, deceiv'd, th' expiring finny prey.
Near Neptune's temple (Neptune's now no more),
Whoſe ſtatue plants a trident on the ſhore,
In ſportive rings the generous dolphins wind,
And eye, and think the image human-kind:
Dear, pleaſing friendſhip!---See! the pile commands
The vale, and grim at ſuperſtition ſtands!
Time's hand there leaves its print of moſſy green,
With hollows, carv'd for ſnakes, and birds obſcene.
O Gibbs, whoſe art the ſolemn fane can raiſe,
Where God delights to dwell, and man to praiſe;
When moulder'd thus the column falls away,
Like ſome great prince majeſtic in decay;
When ignorance and ſcorn the ground ſhall tread,
Where wiſdom tutor'd, and devotion pray'd;
Where all thy pompous work our wonder claim;
What, but the muſe alone, preſerve thy name?
The ſun ſhines, broken, through yon arch that rears
This once round fabric, half depriv'd by years,
Which roſe a ſtately colonnade, and crown'd
Encircling pillars now unfaithful ſound;
In fragments, theſe the fall of thoſe forebode,
Which, nodding, juſt up-heave their crumbling load.
High, on yon column, which has batter'd ſtood,
Like ſome ſtripp'd oak, the grandeur of the wood,
The ſtork inhabits her aerial neſt;
By her are liberty and peace careſt;

She flies the realms that own deſpotic kings,
And only ſpreads o'er free born ſtates her wings.
The roof is now the daw's, or raven's haunt,
And loathſome toads in the dark entrance pant;
Or ſnakes, that lurk to ſnap the heedleſs fly,
And fated bird, that oft comes fluttering by.
An aqueduct acroſs yon vale is laid,
Its channel through a ruin'd arch betray'd;
Whirl'd down a ſteep, it flies with torrent force,
Flaſhes, and roars, and plows a devious courſe.
Attracted miſts a golden cloud commence,
While through high-colour'd air ſtrike rays intenſe.
Betwixt two points, which yon ſteep mountains ſhow,
Lies a mild bay, to which kind breezes flow.
Beneath a grotto, arch'd for calm retreat,
Leads lengthening in the rock—Be this my ſeat.
Heat never enters here; but coolneſs reigns
O'er zephyrs, and diſtilling, watery veins.
Secluded now I trace th' inſtructive page,
And live o'er ſcenes of many a backward age;
Through days, months, years, through time's whole courſe I run,
And preſent ſtand where time itſelf begun.
Ye mighty dead, of juſt, diſtinguiſh'd fame,
Your thoughts, (ye bright inſtructors!) here I claim.
Here ancient knowledge opens nature's ſprings;
Here truths hiſtoric give the hearts of kings.
Hence contemplation learns white hours to find,
And labours virtue on th' attentive mind:
O lov'd retreat! thy joys content beſtow,
Nor guilt, nor ſhame, nor ſharp repentance know.
What the fifth Charles long aim'd in power to ſee,
That happineſs he found reſerv'd in thee. [weeps,
Now let me change the page—Here Tully
While in death's icy arms his Tullia ſleeps,
His daughter dear!—Retir'd I ſee him mourn,
By all the frenzy now of anguiſh torn.
Wild his complaint! Nor ſweeter ſorrow's ſtrains,
When Singer for Alexis loſt complains.
Each friend condoles, expoſtulates, reproves;
More than a father raving Tully loves;
Or Salluſt cenſures thus!—Unheeding blame,
He ſchemes a temple to his Tullia's name.
Thus o'er my hermit once did grief prevail,
Thus roſe Olympia's tomb, his moving tale,
The ſighs, tears, frantic ſtarts, that baniſh reſt,
And all the burſting ſorrows of his breaſt.
But hark! a ſudden power attunes the air!
Th' enchanting ſound enamour'd breezes bear;
Now low, now high, they ſink, or lift the ſong,
Which the cave echoes ſweet, and ſweet the creeks prolong.
I liſten'd, gaz'd, when, wondrous to behold!
From ocean ſteam'd, a vapour gathering roll'd:
A blue, round ſpot on the mid-roof it came,
Spread broad, and redden'd into dazzling flame.
Full orb'd it ſhone, and dimm'd the ſwimming ſight,
While doubling objects danc'd with darkling light.
Amaz'd I ſtood!—amaz'd I ſtill remain!
What earthly power this wonder can explain?
Gradual, at length, the luſtre dies away:
My eyes reſtor'd, a mortal form ſurvey,
My hermit friend! 'Tis he.—All hail! (he cries)
I ſee, and would alleviate, thy ſurpriſe.
The vaniſh'd meteor was heaven's meſſage meant,
To warn thee hence: I knew the high intent.
Hear then! in this ſequeſter'd cave retir'd,
Departed ſaints converſe with men inſpir'd.
'Tis ſacred ground; nor can thy mind endure,
Yet unprepar'd, an intercourſe ſo pure.
Quick let us hence.---And now extend thy views
O'er yonder lawn; there find the heaven-born muſe!
Or ſeek her, where ſhe truſts her tuneful tale
To the mid, ſilent wood, or vocal vale; [ſhades,
Where trees half check the light with trembling
Cloſe in deep glooms, or open clear in glades;
Or where ſurrounding viſtas far deſcend,
The landſcape varied at each leſſening end;
She, only ſhe can mortal thought refine,
And raiſe thy voice to viſitants divine.

CANTO V.

We left the cave. Be fear (ſaid I) defy'd!
Virtue (for thou art virtue) is my guide.
By time-worn ſteps a ſteep aſcent we gain,
Whoſe ſummit yields a proſpect o'er the plain.
There, bench'd with turf, an oak our ſeat extends,
Whoſe top a verdant, branch'd pavilion bends.
Viſtas, with leaves, diverſify the ſcene,
Some pale, ſome brown, and ſome of lively green.
Now, from the full-grown day a beamy ſhower
Gleams on the lake, and gilds each gloſſy flower.
Gay inſects ſparkle in the genial blaze,
Various as light, and countleſs as its rays:
They dance on every ſtream, and pictur'd play,
Till, by the watery racer, ſnatch'd away.
Now, from yon range of rocks, ſtrong rays rebound,
Doubling the day on flowery plains around:
King-cups beneath far-ſtriking colours glance,
Bright as th' etherial glows the green expanſe.
Gems of the field!---the topaz charms the ſight,
Like theſe, effulging yellow ſtreams of light.
From the ſame rocks, fall rills with ſoften'd force,
Meet in yon mead, and well a river's ſource.
Through her clear channel ſhine her finny ſhoals,
O'er ſands, like gold, the liquid cryſtal rolls.
Dimm'd in yon coarſer moor, her charms decay,
And ſhape, through ruſtling reeds, a ruffled way.
Near willows ſhort and buſhy ſhadows throw:
Now loſt, ſhe ſeems through nether tracts to flow;
Yet, at yon point, winds out in ſilver ſtate,
Like virtue from a labyrinth of fate. [run
In lengthening rows, prone from the mountains,
The flocks:---their fleeces gliſtening in the ſun;
Her ſtreams they ſeek, and, 'twixt her neighbouring trees,
Recline in various attitudes of eaſe.
Where the herds ſip, the little ſcaly fry,
Swift from the ſhore, in ſcattering myriads fly.
Each livery'd cloud, that round th' horizon glows,
Shifts in odd ſcenes, like earth, from whence it roſe.

The bee hums wanton in yon jaſmine bower,
And circling ſettles, and deſpoils the flower.
Melodious there the plumy ſongſters meet,
And all charm'd echo from her arch'd retreat.
Neat poliſh'd manſions riſe in proſpect gay;
Time-batter'd towers frown awful in decay;
The ſun plays glittering on the rocks and ſpires,
And the lawn lightens with reflected fires.

Here mirth, and fancy's wanton train advance
And to light meaſures turn the ſwimming dance,
Sweet, flow-pac'd melancholy next appears,
Pompous in grief, and eloquent of tears.
Here meditation ſhines, in azure dreſt,
All ſtarr'd with gems; a ſun adorns her creſt.
Religion, to whoſe lifted, raptur'd eyes
Seraphic hoſts deſcend from opening ſkies;
Beauty, who ſways the heart, and charms the ſight;
Whoſe tongue is muſic, and whoſe ſmile delight;
Whoſe brow is majeſty; whoſe boſom peace;
Who bade creation be, and chaos ceaſe; [vine
Whoſe breath perfumes the ſpring; whoſe eye di-
Kindled the ſun, and gave its light to ſhine.
Here, in thy likeneſs, fair Ophelia *, ſeen,
She throws kind luſtre o'er th' enliven'd green.
Next her deſcription, rob'd in various hues,
Invites attention from the penſive muſe!
The muſe!---ſhe comes! refin'd the paſſions wait,
And precept, ever winning, wiſe, and great.
The muſe! a thouſand ſpirits wing the air
(Once men, who made like her mankind their care):
Enamour'd round her preſs th' inſpiring throng,
And ſwell to ecſtacy her ſolemn ſong.

Thus in the dame each nobler grace we find,
Fair Wortley's angel-accent, eyes, and mind.
Whether her ſight the dew-bright dawn ſurveys,
The noon's dry heat, or evening's temper'd rays,
The hours of ſtorm, or calm, the gleby ground,
The coral'd ſea, gem'd rock, or ſky profound,
A Raphael's fancy animates each line,
Each image ſtrikes with energy divine;
Bacon and Newton in her thoughts conſpire;
Nor ſweeter than her voice is Handel's lyre.

My hermit thus. She beckons us away:
Oh, let us ſwift the high beheſt obey! [croſt,

Now through a lane, which mingling tracts have
The way unequal, and the landſcape loſt,
We rove. The warblers lively tunes eſſay,
The lark on wing, the linnet on the ſpray,
While muſic trembles in their ſongful throats,
The bullfinch whiſtles ſoft his flute-like notes.
The bolder blackbird ſwells ſonorous lays;
The varying thruſh commands a tuneful maze;
Each a wild length of melody purſues; [coos.
While the ſoft murmuring, amorous wood-dove
And, when in ſpring theſe melting mixtures flow,
The cuckoo ſends her uniſon of woe.

But as ſmooth ſeas are furrow'd by a ſtorm;
As troubles all our tranquil joys deform;
So, loud through air, unwelcome noiſes ſound,
And harmony's at once, in diſcord, drown'd.
From yon dark cypreſs, croaks the raven's cry;
As diſſonant the daw, jay, chattering pie:
The clamorous crows abandon'd carnage ſeek,
And the harſh owl ſhrills out a ſharpening ſhriek.

At the lane's end a high-lath'd gate's prefer'd,
To bar the treſpaſs of a vagrant herd.
Faſt by, a meagre mendicant we find,
Whoſe ruſſet rags hang fluttering in the wind:
Years bow his back, a ſtaff ſupports his tread,
And ſoft white hairs ſhade thin his palſy'd head.
Poor wretch!—Is this for charity his haunt?
He meets the frequent ſlight, and ruthleſs taunt.
On ſlaves of guilt oft ſmiles the ſquandering peer;
But paſſing knows not common bounty here.
Vain thing! in what doſt thou ſuperior ſhine?
His our firſt ſire: what race more ancient thine?
Leſs backward trac'd, he may his lineage draw
From men, whoſe influence kept the world in awe:
Whoſe worthleſs ſons, like thee, perchance conſum'd
Their ample ſtore, their line to want was doom'd.
So thine may periſh, by the courſe of things,
While his, from beggars, re-aſcend to kings.
Now, lazar, as thy hardſhips I peruſe,
On my own ſtate inſtructed would I muſe.
When I view greatneſs, I my lot lament;
Compar'd to thee, I ſnatch ſupreme content.
I might have felt, did heaven not gracious deal,
A fate, which I muſt mourn to ſee thee feel.
But ſoft! the cripple our approach deſcries,
And to the gate, though weak, officious hies.
I ſpring preventive, and unbar the way,
Then, turning, with a ſmile of pity, ſay,
Here, friend!—this little copper alms receive,
Inſtance of will, without the power to give.
Hermit, if here with pity we reflect, [gleet?
How muſt we grieve, when learning meets ne-
When god-like ſouls endure a mean reſtraint;
When generous will is curb'd by tyrant want?
He truly feels what to diſtreſs belongs,
Who to his private, adds a people's wrongs;
Merit's a mark, at which diſgrace is thrown,
And every injur'd virtue is his own.
Such their own pangs with patience here endure,
Yet there weep wounds, they are denied to cure;
Thus rich in poverty, thus humbly great,
And, though depreſs'd, ſuperior to their fate.
Minions in power, and miſers, 'mid their ſtore,
Are mean in greatneſs, and in plenty poor.
What's power, or wealth? Were they not form'd for aid,
A ſpring for virtue, and from wrongs a ſhade?
In power we ſavage tyranny behold,
And wily avarice owns polluted gold.
From golden ſands her pride could Libya raiſe,
Could ſhe, who ſpreads no paſture, claim our praiſe? [breed;
Loath'd were her wealth, where rabid monſters
Where ſerpents, pamper'd on her venom, feed,
No ſheltery trees invite the wanderer's eye,
No fruits, no grain, no gums, her tracts ſupply;
On her vaſt wilds no lovely proſpects run;
But all lies barren, though beneath the ſun.

My hermit thus. I know thy ſoul believes,
'Tis hard vice triumphs, and that virtue grieves;
Yet oft affliction purifies the mind,
Kind benefits oft flow from means unkind.

* Mrs. Oldfield.

Were the whole known, that we uncouth ſuppoſe,
Doubtleſs, would beauteous ſymmetry diſcloſe.
The naked cliff, that ſingly rough remains,
In proſpect dignifies the fertile plains;
Lead-colour'd clouds, in ſcattering fragments ſeen,
Show, though in broken views, the blue ſerene.
Severe diſtreſſes induſtry inſpire;
Thus captive oft excelling arts acquire,
And boldly ſtruggle through a ſtate of ſhame,
To life, eaſe, plenty, liberty, and fame.
Sword-law has often Europe's balance gain'd,
And one red victory years of peace maintain'd.
We paſs through want to wealth, through diſmal ſtrife,
To calm content, through death to endleſs life.
Libya thou nam'ſt---let Afric's waſtes appear
Curſt by thoſe heats, that fructify the year;
Yet the ſame ſuns her orange-groves befriend,
Where cluſtering globes in ſhining rows depend.
Here when fierce beams o'er withering plants are roll'd.
There the green fruit ſeems ripen'd into gold.
Ev'n ſcenes that ſtrike with terrible ſurpriſe,
Still prove a God, juſt, merciful, and wiſe.
Sad wintery blaſts, that ſtrip the autumn, bring
The milder beauties of a flowery ſpring.
Ye ſulphurous fires in jaggy lightnings break!
Ye thunders rattle, and ye nations ſhake!
Ye ſtorms of riving flame the foreſt tear!
Deep crack the rocks! rent trees be whirl'd in air!
Reft at a ſtroke, ſome ſtately fane we'll mourn;
Her tombs wide-ſhatter'd, and her dead up-torn;
Were noxious ſpirits not from caverns drawn,
Rack'd earth would ſoon in gulfs enormous yawn:
Then all were loſt!---Or would we floating view
The baleful cloud, there would deſtruction brew;
Plague, fever, frenzy, cloſe-engendering lie,
Till theſe red ruptures clear the ſullied ſky.

Now a field opens to enlarge my thought,
In parcel'd tracts to various uſes wrought.
Here hardening ripeneſs the firſt blooms behold,
There the laſt bloſſoms ſpring-like pride unfold.
Here ſwelling peaſe on leafy ſtalks are ſeen,
Mix'd flowers of red and azure ſhine between;
Whoſe weaving beauties, heighten'd by the ſun,
In colour'd lanes along the furrows run.
There the next produce of a genial ſhower,
The beans freſh-bloſſoms in a ſpeckled flower;
Whoſe morning dews, when to the ſun reſign'd,
With undulating ſweets embalm the wind.
Now daiſy plats of clover ſquare the plain,
And part the bearded from the beardleſs grain.
There fibrous flax with verdure binds the field,
Which on the loom ſhall art-ſpun labours yield.
The mulberry, in fair ſummer-green array'd,
Full in the midſt ſtarts up, a ſilky ſhade.
For human taſte the rich-ſtain'd fruitage bleeds;
The leaf the ſilk-emitting reptile feeds.
As ſwans their down, as flocks their fleeces leave,
Here worms for man their gloſſy entrails weave.
Hence to adorn the fair, in texture gay,
Sprigs, fruits, and flowers on figur'd veſtments play:
But induſtry prepares them oft to pleaſe
The guilty pride of vain, luxuriant eaſe.

Now frequent, duſty gales offenſive blow,
And o'er my ſight a tranſient blindneſs throw.
Windward we ſhift. Near down th' etherial ſteep,
The lamp of day hangs hovering o'er the deep.
Dun ſhades, in rocky ſhapes up æther roll'd,
Project long, ſhaggy points, deep-ting'd with gold.
Others take faint th' unripen'd cherry's dye,
And paint amuſing landſcapes on the eye.
Their blue-veil'd yellow, through a ſky ſerene,
In ſwelling mixture forms a floating green.
Streak'd through white clouds a mild vermilion ſhines,
And the breeze freſhens, as the heat declines.

Yon crooked, ſunny roads change riſing views
From brown, to ſandy red, and chalky hues.
One mingled ſcene another quick ſucceeds,
Men, chariots, teams, yok'd ſteers, and prancing ſteeds,
Which climb, deſcend, and, as loud whips reſound,
Stretch, ſweat, and ſmoke along unequal ground.
On winding Thames, reflecting radiant beams,
When boats, ſhips, barges mark the roughen'd ſtreams.
This way, and that, they different points purſue;
So mix the motions, and ſo ſhifts the view,
While thus we throw around our gladden'd eyes,
The gifts of heaven in gay profuſion riſe;
Trees rich with gums, and fruits; with jewels rocks:
Plains with flowers, herbs, and plants, and beeves, and flocks;
Mountains with mines; with oak, and cedar, woods;
Quarries with marble, and with fiſh the floods.
In darkening ſpots, mid fields of various dyes,
Tilth new manur'd, or naked fallow lies.
Near uplands fertile pride enclos'd diſplay,
The green graſs yellowing into ſcentful hay.
And thick-ſet hedges fence the full-ear'd corn;
And berries blacken on the virid thorn.
Mark in yon heath oppos'd the cultur'd ſcene,
Wild thyme, pale box, and firs of darker green.
The native ſtrawberry red-ripening grows,
By nettles guarded, as by thorns the roſe.
There nightingales in unprun'd copſes build,
In ſhaggy furzes lies the hare conceal'd.
'Twixt ferns and thiſtles, unſown flowers amuſe,
And form a lucid chace of various hues;
Many half-grey with duſt: confus'd they lie,
Scent the rich year, and lead the wandering eye.

Contemplative, we tread the flowery plain,
The muſe preceding with her heavenly train.
When, lo! the mendicant, ſo late behind,
Strange view! now journeying in our front we find!
And yet a view, more ſtrange, our heed demands;
Touch'd by the muſe's wand transform'd he ſtands.
O'er ſkin late wrinkled, inſtant beauty ſpreads;
The late-dimm'd eye, a vivid luſtre ſheds;
Hairs, once ſo thin, now graceful locks decline;
And rags now chang'd in regal veſtments ſhine.

The hermit thus. In him the BARD behold,
Once ſeen by midnight's lamp in winter's cold;
The BARD, whoſe want ſo multiplied his woes,
He ſunk a mortal, and a ſeraph roſe.

See!—where thoſe ſtately yew-trees darkling grow,
And, waving o'er yon graves, brown horrows throw,
Scornful he points---there, o'er his ſacred duſt,
Ariſe the ſculptur'd tomb, and labour'd buſt.
Vain pomp! beſtow'd by oſtentatious pride,
Who to a life of want relief deny'd.
But thus the BARD. Are theſe the gifts of ſtate?
Gifts unrecciv'd!---Theſe! Ye ungenerous great!
How was I treated when in life forlorn?
My claim your pity; but my lot your ſcorn.
Why were my ſtudious hours oppos'd by need?
In me did poverty from guilt proceed?
Did I contemporary authors wrong,
And deem their worth, but as they priz'd my ſong?
Did I ſoothe vice, or venal ſtrokes betray,
In the low-purpos'd, loud polemic fray?
Did e'er my verſe immodeſt warmth contain,
Or, once-licentious, heavenly truths profane?
Never.---And yet when envy ſunk my name,
Who call'd my ſhadow'd merit into fame?
When, undeſerv'd, a priſon's grate I ſaw,
What hand redeem'd me from the wreſted law!
Who cloth'd me naked, or when hungry fed?
Why cruſh'd the living? Why extol'd the dead?---
But foreign languages adopt my lays,
And diſtant nations ſhame you into praiſe.
Why ſhould unreliſh'd wit theſe honours cauſe?
Cuſtom, not knowledge, dictates your applauſe:
Or think you thus a ſelf-renown to raiſe,
And mingle your vain-glories with my bays?
Be your's the mouldering tomb! Be mine the lay
Immortal!---Thus he ſcoffs the pomp away.
Though words like theſe unletter'd pride impeach,
To the meek heart he turns with milder ſpeech.
Though now a ſeraph, oft he deigns to wear
The face of human friendſhip, oft of care;
To walk diſguis'd an object of relief.
A learn'd, good man, long exercis'd in grief;
Forlorn, a friendleſs orphan oft to roam,
Craving ſome kind, ſome hoſpitable home:
Or, like Ulyſſes, a low lázar ſtand;
Beſeeching pity's eye, and bounty's hand;
Or, like Ulyſſes, royal aid requeſt,
Wandering from court to court, a king diſtreſt.
Thus varying ſhapes, the ſeeming ſon of woe
Eyes the cold heart, and hearts that generous glow:
Then to the muſe relates each lordly name,
Who deals impartial infamy and fame.
Oft, as when men in mortal ſtate depreſs'd,
His lays taught virtue, which his life confeſs'd,
He now forms viſionary ſcenes below,
Inſpiring patience in the heart of woe;
Patience, that ſoftens every ſad extreme, [gleam,
That caſts through dungeon-glooms a cheerful
Diſarms diſeaſe of pain, mocks ſlander's ſting,
And ſtrips of terrors the terrific king,
'Gainſt want, a ſourer foe, its ſuccour lends,
And ſmiling ſees th' ingratitude of friends.
Nor are theſe taſks to him alone conſign'd.
Millions inviſible befriend mankind.
When watery ſtructures, ſeen croſs heaven t' aſcend,
Arch above arch in radiant order bend,
Fancy beholds, adown each glittering ſide,
Myriads of miſſionary ſeraphs glide;
She ſees good angels genial ſhowers beſtow
From the red convex of the dewy bow.
They ſmile upon the ſwain: He views the prize;
Then grateful bends, to bleſs the bounteous ſkies.
Some winds collect, and ſend propitious gales
Oft where Britannia's navy ſpreads her ſails;
There ever wafting, on the breath of fame,
Unequal'd glory in her ſovereign's name.
Some teach young zephyrs vernal ſweets to bear,
And float the balmy health on ambient air;
Zephyrs, that oft, where lovers liſtening lie,
Along the grove in melting muſic die,
And in lone caves to minds poetic roll
Seraphic whiſpers, that abſtract the ſoul.
Some range the colours, as they parted fly,
Clear-pointed to the philoſophic eye;
The flaming red, that pains the dwelling gaze;
The ſtainleſs, lightſome yellow's gilding rays;
The clouded orange, that betwixt them glows,
And to kind mixture tawny luſtre owes;
All-cheering green, that gives the ſpring its dye;
The bright, tranſparent blue, that robes the ſky;
And indico, which ſhaded light diſplays;
And violet, which in the view decays.
Parental hues, whence others all proceed;
An ever-mingling, changeful, countleſs breed;
Unravel'd, variegated, lines of light,
When blended, dazzling in promiſcuous white.
Oft through theſe bows departed ſpirits range,
New to the ſkies, admiring at their change;
Each mind a void, as when firſt born to earth,
Behold a ſecond blank in ſecond birth;
Then, as yon ſeraph bard fram'd hearts below,
Each ſees him here tranſcendent knowledge ſhow,
New ſaints he tutors into truth refin'd,
And tunes to rapturous love the new-form'd mind.
He ſwells the lyre, whoſe loud, melodious lays
Call high Hoſannas from the voice of praiſe;
Though one bad age ſuch poeſy could wrong,
Now worlds around retentive roll the ſong:
Now God's high throne the full-voic'd raptures gain,
Celeſtial hoſts returning ſtrain for ſtrain.
Thus he, who once knew want without relief,
Sees joys reſulting from well-ſuffering grief.
Hark! while we talk, a diſtant pattering rain
Reſounds!---See! up the broad etherial plain
Shoots the bright bow!---The ſeraph flits away;
The muſe, the graces from our view decay.
Behind yon weſtern hill the globe of light
Drops ſudden; faſt-purſued by ſhades of night.
Yon graves from winter-ſcenes to mind recall
Rebellion's council, and rebellion's fall.
What fiends in ſulphurous, car-like clouds upflew!
What midnight treaſon glar'd beneath their view!
And now the traitors rear their Babel-ſchemes,
Big, and more big, ſtupendous miſchief ſeems;
But juſtice, rouz'd, ſuperior ſtrength employs,
Their ſcheme wide ſhatters, and their hope deſtroys.
Diſcord ſhe wills; the miſſile ruin flies;
Sudden, unnatural debates ariſe,
Doubt, mutual jealouſy, and dumb diſguſt,
Dark-hinted mutterings, and avow'd diſtruſt;

To secret ferment is each heart resign'd;
Suspicion hovers in each clouded mind;
They jar, accus'd accuse, revil'd revile,
And wrath to wrath oppose, and guile to guile;
Wrangling they part, themselves themselves betray;
Each dire device starts naked into day;
They feel confusion in the van with fear;
They feel the king of terrors in the rear.
Of these were three by different motives fir'd,
Ambition one, and one revenge inspir'd.
The third, O Mammon, was thy meaner slave;
Thou idol seldom of the great and brave!
Florio, whose life was one continued feast,
His wealth diminish'd, and his debts increas'd,
Vain pomp, and equipage, his low desires,
Who ne'er to intellectual bliss aspires;
He, to repair by vice what vice has broke,
Durst with bold treasons judgment's rod provoke.
His strength of mind, by luxury half dissolv'd,
Ill brooks the woe, where deep he stands involv'd.
He weeps, stamps wild, and to and fro now flies;
Now wrings his hands, and sends unmanly cries,
Arraigns his judge, affirms unjust he bleeds,
And now recants, and now for mercy pleads;
Now blames associates, raves with inward strife,
Upbraids himself; then thinks alone on life.
He rolls red swelling, tearful eyes around,
Sore smites his breast, and sinks upon the ground.
He wails, he quite desponds, convulsive lies,
Shrinks from the fancied axe, and thinks he dies:
Revives, with hope inquires, stops short with fear,
Entreats ev'n flattery, nor the worst will hear;
The worst, alas, his doom!—What friend replies?
Each speaks with shaking head, and down-cast eyes.
One silence breaks, then pauses, drops a tear;
Nor hope affords, nor quite confirms his fear;
But what kind friendship part reserves unknown
Comes thundering in his keeper's surly tone.
Enough struck through and through, in ghastly stare,
He stands transfix'd, the statue of despair;
Nor aught of life, nor aught of death he knows,
Till thought returns, and brings return of woes:
Now pours a storm of grief in gushing streams:
That past—collected in himself he seems,
And with forc'd smile retires—his latent thought
Dark, horrid, as the prison's dismal vault.
If with himself at variance ever-wild,
With angry heaven how stands he reconcil'd?
No penitential orisons arise;
Nay, he obtests the justice of the skies.
Not for his guilt, for sentenc'd life he moans;
His chains rough-clanking to discordant groans,
To bars harsh-grating, heavy-creaking doors,
Hoarse-echoing walls, and hollow-ringing floors,
To thoughts more dissonant, far, far less kind,
One anarchy, one chaos of the mind.
At length, fatigu'd with grief, on earth he lies:
But soon as sleep weighs down th' unwilling eyes,
Glad liberty appears, no damps annoy,
Treason succeeds, and all transforms to joy.
Proud palaces their glittering stores display:
Gain he pursues, and rapine leads the way.
What gold! what gems!—he strains to seize the prize;
Quick from his touch dissolv'd, a cloud it flies.
Conscious he cries—and must I wake to weep?
Ah, yet return, return, delusive sleep!
Sleep comes; but liberty no more:—Unkind,
The dudgeon-glooms hang heavy on his mind.
Shrill winds are heard, and howling demons call;
Wide-flying portals seem unhing'd to fall:
Then close with sudden claps; a dreadful din!
He starts, wakes, storms, and all is hell within.
His genius flies—reflects he now on prayer?
Alas! bad spirits turn those thoughts to air.
What shall he next? What, straight relinquish breath,
To bar a public, just, though shameful death?
Rash, horrid thought! yet now afraid to live,
Murderous he strikes—may heaven the deed forgive!
Why had he thus false spirit to rebel?
And why not fortitude to suffer well?
Were his success, how terrible the blow!
And it recoils on him eternal woe,
Heaven this affliction then for mercy meant,
That a good end might close a life mispent.
Where no kind lips the hallow'd dirge resound,
Far from the compass of yon sacred ground;
Full in the centre of three meeting ways,
Stak'd through he lies.—Warn'd let the wicked gaze.
Near yonder fane, where misery sleeps in peace,
Whose spire fast-lessens, as these shades increase,
Left to the north, whence oft brew'd tempests roll,
Tempests, dire emblems, Cosmo, of thy soul!
There mark that Cosmo, much for guile renown'd!
His grave by unbid plants of poison crown'd.
When out of power, through him the public good,
So strong his factious tribe, suspended stood.
In power, vindictive actions were his aim,
And patriots perish'd by th' ungenerous flame.
If the best cause he in the senate chose,
Ev'n right in him from some wrong motive rose.
The bad he loath'd, and would the weak despise;
Yet courted for dark ends, and shunn'd the wise.
When ill his purpose, eloquent his strain;
His malice had a look, and voice humane.
His smile, the signal of some vile intent,
A private poniard, or empoison'd scent;
Proud, yet to popular applause a slave;
No friend he honour'd, and no foe forgave.
His boons unfrequent, or unjust to need;
The hire of guilt, of infamy the meed;
But, if they chanc'd on learned worth to fall,
Bounty in him was ostentation all,
No true benevolence his thought sublimes,
His noblest actions are illustrious crimes,
Fine parts, which virtue might have rank'd with fame,
Enhance his guilt, and magnify his shame.
When parts in probity in man combine,
In wisdom's eye, how charming must he shine!
Let him, less happy, truth at least impart
And what he wants in genius bear in heart.
Cosmo, as death draws nigh, no more conceals
That storm of passion, which his nature feels;

He feels much fear, more anger, and moſt pride;
But pride and anger make all fear ſubſide.
Dauntleſs he meets at length untimely fate;
A deſperate ſpirit! rather fierce, than great.
Darkling he glides along the dreary coaſt,
A ſullen, wandering, ſelf-tormenting ghoſt.
Where veiny marble dignifies the ground,
With emblem fair in ſculpture riſing round,
Juſt where a croſſing, lengthening aiſle we find,
Full eaſt; whence God returns to judge mankind,
Once-lov'd Horatio ſleeps, a mind elate!
Lamented ſhade, ambition was thy fate.
Ev'n angels, wondering, oft his worth ſurvey'd;
Behold a man, like one of us! they ſaid.
Straight heard the furies, and with envy glar'd,
And to precipitate his fall prepar'd.
Firſt avarice came. In vain ſelf-love ſhe preſs'd;
The poor he pity'd ſtill, and ſtill redreſs'd:
Learning was his, and knowledge to commend,
Of arts a patron, and of want a friend.
Next came revenge: but her eſſay how vain!
Not hate, nor envy, in his heart remain.
No previous malice could his mind engage,
Malice the mother of vindictive rage.
No—from his life his foes might learn to live;
He held it ſtill a triumph to forgive.
At length ambition urg'd his country's weal,
Aſſuming the fair look of public zeal;
Still in his breaſt ſo generous glow'd the flame,
The vice, when there, a virtue half became.
His pitying eye ſaw millions in diſtreſs,
He deem'd it godlike to have power to bleſs:
Thus, when unguarded, treaſon ſtain'd him o'er;
And virtue and content were then no more.
But when to death by rigorous juſtice doom'd,
His genuine ſpirit ſaint-like ſtate reſum'd,
Oft from ſoft penitence diſtill'd a tear;
Oft hope in heavenly mercy lighten'd fear;
Oft would a drop from ſtruggling nature fall,
And then a ſmile of patience brighten all.
He ſeeks in heaven a friend, nor ſeeks in vain.
His guardian angel ſwift deſcends again;
And reſolution thus beſpeaks a mind,
Not ſcorning life, yet all to death reſign'd;
—Ye chains, ſit only to reſtrain the will
Of common, deſperate veterans in ill,
Though rankling on my limbs ye lie, declare,
Did e'er my riſing ſoul your preſſure wear?
No!—free as liberty, and quick as light,
To worlds remote ſhe takes unbounded flight.
Ye dungeon glooms, that dim corporeal eyes,
Could ye once blot her proſpect of the ſkies?
No!—from her clearer ſight ye fled away,
Like error, pierc'd by truth's reſiſtleſs ray.
Ye walls, that witneſs my repentant moan!
Ye echoes, that to midnight ſorrows groan!
Do I, in wrath, to you of fate complain?
Or once betray fear's moſt inglorious pain?
No!—Hail, twice hail then, ignominious death!
Behold how willing glides my parting breath!
Far greater, better far—ay, far indeed!
Like me, have ſuffer'd, and like me will bleed.
Apoſtles, patriarchs, prophets, martyrs all,
Like me once fell, nor murmur'd at their fall.
Shall I, whoſe days, at beſt, no ill deſign'd,
Whoſe virtue ſhone not, though I lov'd mankind,
Shall I, now guilty wretch, ſhall I repine?
Ah, no! to juſtice let me life reſign!
Quick, as a friend, would I embrace my foe!
He taught me patience, who firſt taught me woe;
But friends are foes, they render woe ſevere,
For me they wail, from me extort the tear.
Not thoſe, yet abſent, miſſive griefs controul;
Theſe periods weep, thoſe rave, and theſe condole,
At entrance ſhrieks a friend, with pale ſurpriſe;
Another panting, proſtrate, ſpeechleſs lies;
One gripes my hand, one ſobs upon my breaſt!
Ah, who can bear?—it ſhocks, it murders reſt!
And is it yours, alas! my friends to feel?
And is it mine to comfort, mine to heal?
Is mine the patience, yours the boſom ſtrife?
Ah! would raſh love lure back my thoughts to life?
Adieu, dear, dangerous mourners! ſwift depart!
Ah, fly me! fly!—I tear ye from my heart.
Ye ſaints, whom fears of death could ne'er controul,
In my laſt hour compoſe, ſupport my ſoul!
See my blood waſh repented ſin away!
Receive, receive me to eternal day!
With words like theſe the deſtin'd hero dies,
While angels waft his ſoul to happier ſkies.
Diſtinction now gives way; yet on we talk,
Full darkneſs deepening o'er the formleſs walk.
Night treads not with light ſtep the dewy gale,
Nor bright-diſtends her ſtar-embroider'd vale;
Her leaden'd feet, inclement damps diſtil,
Clouds ſhut her face, black winds her veſture fill;
An earth-born meteor lights the ſable ſkies,
Eaſtward it ſhoots, and, ſunk, forgotten dies.
So pride, that roſe from duſt to guilty power,
Glares out in vain; ſo duſt ſhall pride devour.
Fiſhers, who yonder brink by torches gain,
With teethful tridents ſtrike the ſcaly train.
Like ſnakes in eagles' claws, in vain they ſtrive,
When heav'd aloft, and quivering yet alive.
While here, methought, our time in converſe paſs'd, [faſt.
The moon clouds muffled, and the night wore
At prowling wolves was heard the maſtiff's bay,
And the warn'd maſter's arms forbad the prey!
Thus treaſon ſteels, the patriot thus deſeries,
Forth ſprings the monarch, and the miſchief flies.
Pale glow-worms glimmer'd through the depth of night,
Scattering, like hope through fear, a doubtful light.
Lone Philomela tun'd the ſilent grove,
With penſive pleaſure liſten'd wakeful love.
Half-dreaming fancy form'd an angel's tongue,
And pain forgot to groan, ſo ſweet ſhe ſung.
The night-crone, with the melody alarm'd,
Now paus'd, now liſten'd, and awhile was charm'd;
But like the man, whoſe frequent ſtubborn will
Reſiſts what kind, ſeraphic ſounds inſtil,
Her heart the love-inſpiring voice repell'd,
Her breaſt with agitating miſchief ſwell'd;
Which clos'd her ear, and tempted to deſtroy
The tuneful life, that charms with virtuous joy.

Now faſt we meaſure back the trackleſs way;
No friendly ſtars directive beams diſplay.
But lo!—a thouſand lights ſhoot inſtant rays;
Yon kindling rock reflects the ſtartling blaze.
I ſtand aſtoniſh'd—thus the hermit cries:
Fear not, but liſten with enlarg'd ſurpriſe!
Still muſt theſe hours our mutual converſe claim,
And ceaſe to echo ſtill Olympia's name;
Grots, rivulets, groves, Olympia's name forget,
Olympia now no ſighing winds repeat.
Can I be mortal, and thoſe hours no more,
Thoſe amorous hours, that plaintive echoes bore?
Am I the ſame? Ah no!—Behold a mind,
Unruffled, firm, exalted, and refin'd!
Late months, that made the vernal ſeaſon gay,
Saw my health languiſh off in pale decay.
No racking pain yet gave diſeaſe a date;
No ſad, preſageful thought preluded fate:
Yet number'd were my days—My deſtin'd end
Near, and more near—Nay, every fear ſuſpend!
I paſs'd a weary, lingering, ſleepleſs night:
Then roſe, to walk in morning's earlieſt light:
But few my ſteps—a faint, and cheerleſs few!
Refreſhment from my flagging ſpirits flew.
When, low, retir'd beneath a cypreſs ſhade,
My limbs upon a flowery bank I laid,
Soon by ſoft-creeping, murmuring winds compos'd,
A ſlumber preſs'd my languid eyes---They clos'd:
But clos'd not long---Methought Olympia ſpoke;
Thrice loud ſhe call'd, and thrice the ſlumber broke.
I wak'd. Forth-gliding from a neighbouring wood,
Full in my view the ſhadowy charmer ſtood.
Rapturous I ſtarted up to claſp the ſhade;
But ſtagger'd, fell, and found my vitals fade:
A mantling chillneſs o'er my boſom ſpread,
As if that inſtant number'd with the dead.
Her voice now ſent afar, imperfect ſound,
When in a ſwimming trance my pangs were drown'd.
Still farther off ſhe call'd---With ſoft ſurpriſe,
I turn'd---but void of ſtrength, and aid to riſe;
Short, ſhorter, ſhorter yet, my breath I drew:
Then up my ſtruggling ſoul unburden'd flew.
Thus from a ſtate, where ſin and grief abide,
Heaven ſummon'd me to mercy---thus I died.
He ſaid. Th' aſtoniſhment with which I ſtart,
Like bolted ice runs ſhivering through my heart.
Art thou not mortal then? I cried. But lo!
His raiment lightens, and his features glow!
In ſhady ringlets falls a length of hair;
Embloom'd his aſpect ſhines, enlarg'd his air.
Mild from his eyes enlivening glories beam;
Mild on his brow ſits majeſty ſupreme.
Bright plumes of every dye, that round him flow,
Veſt, robe, and wings, in varied luſtre ſhow.
He looks, and forward ſteps with mien divine;
A grace celeſtial gives him all to ſhine.
He ſpeaks---Nature is raviſh'd at the ſound,
The foreſts move, and ſtreams ſtand liſtening round!
Thus he. As incorruption I aſſum'd,
As inſtant in immortal youth I bloom'd!
Renew'd, and chang'd, I felt my vital ſprings,
With different lights diſcern'd the form of things;
To earth my paſſions fell like miſts away,
And reaſon open'd in eternal day.
Swifter than thought from world to world I flew,
Celeſtial knowledge ſhone in every view.
My food was truth---what tranſport could I miſs?
My proſpect, all infinitude of bliſs.
Olympia met me firſt, and, ſmiling gay,
Onward to mercy led the ſhining way;
As far tranſcendant to her wonted air,
As her dear wonted ſelf to many a fair!
In voice, and form, beauty more beauteous ſhows,
And harmony ſtill more harmonious grows.
She points out ſouls, who taught me friendſhip's charms,
They gaze, they glow, they ſpring into my arms!
Well pleas'd, high anceſtors my view command;
Patrons and patriots all; a glorious band!
Horatio too, by well-born fate refin'd,
Shone out white-rob'd with ſaints, a ſpotleſs mind!
What once, below, ambition made him miſs,
Humility here gain'd, a life of bliſs!
Though late, let ſinners then from ſin depart!
Heaven never yet deſpis'd the contrite heart.
Laſt ſhone, with ſweet, exalted luſtre grac'd,
The ſeraph-bard, in higheſt order plac'd!
Seers, lovers, legiſlators, prelates, kings,
All raptur'd liſten, as he raptur'd ſings.
Sweetneſs and ſtrength his look and lays employ,
Greet ſmiles with ſmiles, and every joy with joy:
Charmful he roſe; his ever charmful tongue
Joy to our ſecond hymeneals ſung;
Still as we paſs'd, the bright, celeſtial throng
Hail'd us in ſocial love, and heavenly ſong.
Of that no more! my deathleſs friendſhip ſee!
I come an angel to the muſe and thee.
Theſe lights, that vibrate, and promiſcuous ſhine,
Are emanations all of forms divine.
And here the muſe, though melted from thy gaze,
Stands among ſpirits, mingling rays with rays.
If thou would'ſt peace attain, my words attend,
The laſt, fond words of thy departed friend!
True joy's a ſeraph, that to heaven aſpires,
Unhurt it triumphs mid' celeſtial choirs.
But ſhould no cares a mortal ſtate moleſt,
Life were a ſtate of ignorance at beſt.
Know then, if ills oblige thee to retire,
Thoſe ills ſolemnity of thought inſpire.
Did not the ſoul abroad for objects roam,
Whence could ſhe learn to call ideas home?
Juſtly to know thyſelf, peruſe mankind;
To know thy God, paint nature on thy mind:
Without ſuch ſcience of the worldly ſcene,
What is retirement?---Empty pride or ſpleen:
But with it wiſdom. There ſhall cares refine,
Render'd by contemplation half-divine.
Truſt not the frantic, or myſterious guide,
Nor ſtoop a captive to the ſchoolman's pride.
On nature's wonders fix alone thy zeal!
They dim not reaſon, when the truth reveal;
So ſhall religion in thy heart endure,
From all traditionary falſehood pure;
So life make death familiar to thy eye,
So ſhalt thou live, as thou may'ſt learn to die;

And, though thou view'ſt thy worſt oppreſſor thrive,
From tranſient woe, immortal bliſs derive.
Farewell—Nay, ſtop the parting tear!—I go!
But leave the muſe thy comforter below.

He ſaid. Inſtant his pinions upward ſoar,
He leſſening as they riſe, till ſeen no more.
While contemplation weigh'd the myſtic view,
The lights all vaniſh'd, and the viſion flew.

THE BASTARD:

INSCRIBED WITH ALL DUE REVERENCE TO

MRS. BRETT, ONCE COUNTESS OF MACCLESFIELD.

"Decet hæc dare dona Novercam." Ov. Met.

PREFACE.

The reader will eaſily perceive theſe verſes were begun, when my heart was gayer than it has been of late; and finiſhed in hours of the deepeſt melancholy.

I hope the world will do me the juſtice to believe, that no part of this flows from any real anger againſt the Lady, to whom it is inſcribed. Whatever undeſerved ſeverities I may have received at her hands, would ſhe deal ſo candidly as acknowledge truth, ſhe very well knows, by an experience of many years, that I have ever behaved myſelf towards her, like one who thought it his duty to ſupport with patience all afflictions from that quarter. Indeed, if I had not been capable of forgiving a mother, I muſt have bluſhed to receive pardon myſelf at the hands of my Sovereign.

Neither, to ſay the truth, were the manner of my birth all, ſhould I have any reaſon for complaint—When I am a little diſpoſed to a gay turn of thinking, I conſider, as I was a derelict from my cradle, I have the honour of a lawful claim to the beſt protection in Europe. For being a ſpot of earth, to which nobody pretends a title, I devolve naturally upon the king, as one of the rights of his royalty.

While I preſume to name his Majeſty, I look back, with confuſion, upon the mercy I have lately experienced; becauſe it is impoſſible to remember it, but with ſomething I would fain forget, for the ſake of my future peace, and alleviation of my paſt misfortune.

I owe my life to the royal pity, if a wretch can, with propriety, be ſaid to live, whoſe days are fewer than his ſorrows; and to whom death had been but a redemption from miſery.

But I will ſuffer my pardon as my puniſhment, till that life, which has ſo graciouſly been given me, ſhall become conſiderable enough not to be uſeleſs in his ſervice to whom it was forfeited. Under influence of theſe ſentiments, with which his Majeſty's great goodneſs has inſpired me, I conſider my loſs of fortune and dignity as my happineſs; to which, as I am born without ambition, I am thrown from them without repining—Poſſeſſing thoſe advantages, my care had been, perhaps, how to enjoy life; by the want of them I am taught this nobler leſſon, to ſtudy how to deſerve it.

RICHARD SAVAGE.

In gayer hours, when high my fancy ran,
The muſe, exulting, thus her lay began.
Bleſt be the baſtard's birth! through wondrous ways,
He ſhines eccentric like a comet's blaze!
No ſickly fruit of faint compliance he!
He! ſtamp'd in nature's mint of ecſtacy!
He lives to build, not boaſt, a generous race:
No tenth tranſmitter of a fooliſh face.
His daring hope, no ſire's example bounds;
His firſt-born lights, no prejudice confounds.
He, kindling from within, requires no flame;
He glories in a baſtard's glowing name.
Born to himſelf, by no poſſeſſion led,
In freedom foſter'd, and by fortune fed;
Nor guides, nor rules, his ſovereign choice controul,
His body independent as his ſoul;
Loos'd to the world's wide range—enjoy'd no aim,
Preſcrib'd no duty, and aſſign'd no name:
Nature's unbounded ſon, he ſtands alone,
His heart unbiaſs'd, and his mind his own.

O mother, yet no mother! 'tis to you,
My thanks for such distinguish'd claims are due.
You, unenslav'd to nature's narrow laws,
Warm championess for freedom's sacred cause,
From all the dry devoirs of blood and line,
From ties maternal, moral and divine,
Discharg'd my grasping soul; push'd me from shore,
And launch'd me into life without an oar.
What had I lost, if, conjugally kind,
By nature hating, yet by vows confin'd,
Untaught the matrimonial bounds to slight,
And coldly conscious of a husband's right,
You had faint-drawn me with a form alone,
A lawful lump of life by force your own!
Then, while your backward will retrench'd desire,
And unconcurring spirits lent no fire,
I had been born your dull, domestic heir,
Load of your life, and motive of your care;
Perhaps been poorly rich, and meanly great,
The slave of pomp, a cypher in the state;
Lordly neglectful of a worth unknown,
And slumbering in a seat, by chance my own.
Far nobler blessings wait the bastard's lot;
Conceiv'd in rapture, and with fire begot!
Strong as necessity, he starts away,
Climbs against wrongs, and brightens into day.
Thus unprophetic, lately misinspir'd,
I sung: gay fluttering hope, my fancy fir'd;
Inly secure, through conscious scorn of ill,
Nor taught by wisdom, how to balance will,
Rashly deceiv'd, I saw no pits to shun,
But thought to purpose and to act were one;
Heedless what pointed cares pervert his way,
Whom caution arms not, and whom woes betray;
But now, expos'd, and shrinking from distress,
I fly to shelter, while the tempests press;
My muse to grief resigns the varying tone,
The raptures languish, and the numbers groan.
O memory! thou soul of joy and pain!
Thou actor of our passions o'er again!
Why dost thou aggravate the wretch's woe?
Why add continuous smart to every blow?
Few are my joys; alas! how soon forgot!
On that kind quarter thou invad'st me not:
While sharp and numberless my sorrows fall;
Yet thou repeat'st, and multiply'st them all!
Is chance a guilt? that my disasterous heart,
For mischief never meant, must ever smart?
Can self-defence be sin!—Ah, plead no more!
What though no purpos'd malice stain'd thee o'er?
Had heaven befriended thy unhappy side,
Thou hadst not been provok'd—Or thou hadst died.
Far be the guilt of homeshed blood from all
On whom, unsought, embroiling dangers fall!
Still the pale dead revives, and lives to me,
To me! through pity's eye condemn'd to see.
Remembrance veils his rage, but swells his fate;
Griev'd I forgive, and am grown cool too late.
Young, and unthoughtful then; who knows, one day,
What ripening virtues might have made their way!
He might have liv'd till folly died in shame,
Till kindling wisdom felt a thirst for fame.
He might perhaps his country's friend have prov'd;
Both happy, generous, candid, and belov'd,
He might have sav'd some worth, now doom'd to fall;
And I, perchance, in him, have murder'd all.
O fate of late repentance! always vain:
Thy remedies but lull undying pain.
Where shall my hope find rest?—No mother's care
Shielded my infant innocence with prayer:
No father's guardian hand my youth maintain'd,
Call'd forth my virtues, or from vice restrain'd,
Is it not thine to snatch some powerful arm,
First to advance, then skreen from future harm?
Am I return'd from death, to live in pain?
Or would imperial pity save in vain?
Distrust it not—What blame can mercy find,
Which gives at once a life, and rears a mind?
Mother, miscall'd, farewell—of soul severe,
This sad reflection yet may force one tear:
All I was wretched by to you I ow'd,
Alone from strangers every comfort flow'd!
Lost to the life you gave, your son no more,
And now adopted, who was doom'd before,
New-born, I may a nobler mother claim,
But dare not whisper her immortal name;
Supremely lovely, and serenely great,
Majestic mother of a kneeling state!
Queen of a people's heart, who ne'er before!
Agreed—yet now with one consent adore!
One contest yet remains in this desire,
Who most shall give applause, where all admire.

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

VERSES

Occasioned by the Right Honourable the Lady Viscountess Tyrconnel's recovery at Bath.

WHERE Thames with pride beholds Augusta's charms,
And either India pours into her arms;
Where liberty bids honest arts abound,
And pleasures dance in one eternal round;
High-thron'd appears the laughter-loving dame,
Goddess of mirth! Euphrosyne her name.
Her smile more cheerful than a vernal morn;
All life! all bloom! of youth and fancy born.
Touch'd into joy, what hearts to her submit!
She looks her sire, and speaks her mother's wit.

O'er the gay world the ſweet inſpirer reigns;
Spleen flies, and elegance her pomp ſuſtains.
Thee, goddeſs! thee! the fair and young obey;
Wealth, wit, love, muſic, all confeſs thy ſway.
In the bleak wild ev'n want by thee is bleſs'd,
And pamper'd pride without thee pines for reſt.
The rich grow richer, while in thee they find
The matchleſs treaſure of a ſmiling mind.
Science by thee flows ſoft in ſocial eaſe,
And virtue, loſing rigour, learns to pleaſe.
The goddeſs ſummons each illuſtrious name,
Bids the gay talk, and forms th' amuſive game.
She, whoſe fair throne is fix'd in human ſouls,
From joy to joy her eye delighted rolls.
But where (ſhe cried) is ſhe, my favourite! ſhe
Of all my race the deareſt far to me!
Whoſe life's the life of each refin'd delight?
She ſaid—But no Tyrconnel glads her ſight.
Swift ſunk her laughing eyes in languid fear;
Swift roſe the ſwelling ſigh, and trembling tear.
In kind low murmurs all the loſs deplore!
Tyrconnel droops, and pleaſure is no more.
The goddeſs, ſilent, paus'd in muſeful air;
But mirth, like virtue, cannot long deſpair.
Celeſtial-hinted thoughts gay hope inſpir'd,
Smiling ſhe roſe, and all with hope were fir'd.
Where Bath's aſcending turrets meet her eyes;
Straight wafted on the tepid breeze ſhe flies,
She flies, her elder ſiſter health to find;
She finds her on the mountain-brow reclin'd.
Around her birds in earlieſt concert ſing;
Her check the ſemblance of the kindling ſpring;
Freſh-tinctur'd like a ſummer-evening ſky,
And a mild ſun ſits ſmiling in her eye.
Looſe to the wind her verdant veſtments flow;
Her limbs yet recent from the ſprings below;
There oft ſhe bathes, then peaceful ſits ſecure,
Where every gale is fragrant, freſh, and pure;
Where flowers and herbs their cordial odours blend,
And all their balmy virtues faſt aſcend.
Hail, ſiſter, hail! (the kindred goddeſs cries)
No common ſuppliant ſtands before your eyes.
You, with whoſe living breath the morn is fraught,
Fluſh the fair cheek, and point the cheerful thought!
Strength, vigour, wit, depriv'd of thee, decline!
Each finer ſenſe, that forms delight, is thine!
Bright ſuns by thee diffuſe a brighter blaze,
And the freſh green a freſher green diſplays!
Without thee pleaſures die, or dully cloy,
And life with thee, howe'er depreſs'd, is joy.
Such thy vaſt power'—The deity replies,
Mirth never aſks a boon, which health denies,
Our mingled gifts tranſcend imperial wealth;
Health ſtrengthens mirth, and mirth inſpirits health.
Theſe gales, yon ſprings, herbs, flowers, and ſun, [are mine;
Thine is their ſmile! be all their influence thine.
Euphroſyne rejoins—Thy friendſhip prove!
See the dear, ſickening object of my love!
Shall that warm heart, ſo cheerful ev'n in pain,
So form'd to pleaſe, unpleas'd itſelf remain?
Siſter! in her my ſmile anew diſplay,
And all the ſocial world ſhall bleſs thy ſway.
Swift, as ſhe ſpeaks, health ſpreads the purple wing,
Soars in the colour'd clouds, and ſheds the ſpring:
Now bland and ſweet ſhe floats along in air;
Air feels, and ſoftening own th' æthereal fair!
In ſtill deſcent ſhe melts on opening flowers,
And deep impregnates plants with genial ſhowers,
The genial ſhowers, new-riſing to the ray,
Exhale in roſeate clouds, and glad the day.
Now in a zephyr's borrow'd voice ſhe ſings,
Sweeps the freſh dews, and ſhakes them from her wings,
Shakes them embalm'd; or, in a gentle kiſs,
Breathes the ſure earneſt of awakening bliſs.
Sapphira feels it, with a ſoft ſurpriſe,
Glide through her veins, and quicken in her eyes!
Inſtant in her own form the goddeſs glows,
Where, bubbling warm, the mineral water flows;
Then, plunging, to the flood new virtue gives;
Steeps every charm; and, as ſhe bathes, it lives!
As from her locks ſhe ſheds the vital ſhower,
'Tis done! (ſhe cries) theſe ſprings poſſeſs my power!
Let theſe immediate to thy darling roll
Health, vigour, life, and gay returning ſoul.
Thou ſmil'ſt Euphroſyne; and conſcious ſee,
Prompt to thy ſmile, how nature joys with thee.
All is green life! all beauty roſy bright;
Full harmony, young love, and dear delight!
See vernal hours lead circling joys along!
All ſun, all bloom, all fragrance, and all ſong!
Receive thy care! Now mirth and health combine.
Each heart ſhall gladden, and each virtue ſhine.
Quick to Auguſta bear thy prize away;
There let her ſmile, and bid a world be gay.

AN EPISTLE

To the Right Honourable Sir Robert Walpole.

STILL let low wits, who ſenſe nor honour prize,
Sneer at all gratitude, all truth diſguiſe;
At living worth, becauſe alive, exclaim,
Inſult the exil'd, and the dead defame!
Such paint, what pity veils in private woes;
And what we ſee with grief, with mirth expoſe;
Studious to urge—(whom will mean authors ſpare?)
The child's, the parent's, and the conſort's tear;
Unconſcious of what pangs the heart may rend,
To loſe what they have ne'er deſerv'd—a friend.
Such, ignorant of facts, invent, relate,
Expos'd perſiſt, and anſwer'd ſtill debate:
Such, but by foils, the cleareſt luſtre ſee,
And deem aſperſing others, praiſing thee.
Far from theſe tracks my honeſt lays aſpire,
And greet a generous heart with generous fire.
Truth be my guide! Truth, which thy virtue claims!
This, nor the poet, nor the patron ſhames!
When party minds ſhall loſe contracted views,
And hiſtory queſtion the recording muſe;
'Tis this alone to after-times muſt ſhine,
And ſtamp the poet and his theme divine.

Long has my muſe, from many a mournful cauſe,
Sung with ſmall power, nor ſought ſublime ap-
plauſe; [ſcope;
From that great point ſhe now ſhall urge her
On that fair promiſe reſt her future hope;
Where policy, from ſtate illuſion clear,
Can through an open aſpect ſhine ſincere;
Where ſcience, law, and liberty depend,
And own the patron, patriot, and the friend;
(That breaſt to feel, that eye on worth to gaze,
That ſmile to cheriſh, and that hand to raiſe!)
Whoſe beſt of hearts her beſt of thoughts inflame,
Whoſe joy is bounty, and whoſe gift is fame.
Where, for relief, flies innocence diſtreſs'd?
To you, who chaſe oppreſſion from th' oppreſs'd:
Who, when complaint to you alone belongs,
Forgive your own, though not a people's wrongs:
Who ſtill make public property your care,
And thence bid private grief no more deſpair.
Aſk they what ſtate your ſheltering care ſhall own?
'Tis youth, 'tis age, the cottage, and the throne:
Nor can the priſon 'ſcape your ſearching eye,
Your ear ſtill opening to the captive's cry.
Nor leſs was promis'd from thy early ſkill,
Ere power enforc'd benevolence of will!
To friends refin'd, thy private life adher'd,
By thee improving, ere by thee prefer'd.
Well hadſt thou weigh'd what truth ſuch friends
afford,
With thee reſigning, and with thee reſtor'd.
Thou taught'ſt them all extenſive love to bear,
And now mankind with thee their friendſhip ſhare.
As the rich cloud by due degrees expands,
And ſhowers down plenty thick on ſundry lands,
Thy ſpreading worth in various bounty fell,
Made genius flouriſh, and made art excel.
How many, yet deceiv'd, all power oppoſe?
Their fears increaſing, as decreaſe their woes;
Jealous of bondage, while they freedom gain,
And moſt oblig'd, moſt eager to complain.
But well we count our bleſs, if well we view,
When power oppreſſion, not protection grew;
View preſent ills that puniſh diſtant climes;
Or bleed in memory here from ancient times.
Mark firſt the robe abus'd religion wore,
Story'd with griefs, and ſtain'd with human gore!
What various tortures, engines, fires, reveal,
Study'd, empower'd, and ſanctify'd by zeal?
Stop here, my muſe!—Peculiar woes deſcry!
Bid them in ſad ſucceſſion ſtrike thy eye!
Lo, to her eye the ſad ſucceſſion ſprings!
She looks, ſhe weeps, and, as ſhe weeps, ſhe ſings.
See the doom'd Hebrew of his ſtores bereft!
See holy murder juſtify the theft!
His ravag'd gold ſome uſeleſs ſhrine ſhall raiſe,
His gems on ſuperſtitious idols blaze!
His wife, his babe, deny'd their little home,
Stripp'd, ſtarv'd, unfriended, and unpity'd roam.
Lo, the prieſt's hand the wafer-god ſupplies!—
A king by conſecrated poiſon dies!
See learning range yon broad ethereal plain,
From world to world, and godlike ſcience gain!
Ah! what avails the curious ſearch ſuſtain'd,
The finiſh'd toil, the godlike ſcience gain'd?
Sentenc'd to flames th' expanſive wiſdom fell,
And truth from heaven was ſorcery from hell.
See reaſon bid each myſtic wile retire, [mire!
Strike out new light! and mark!—the wiſe ad-
Zeal ſhall ſuch hereſy, like learning, hate;
The ſame their glory, and the ſame their fate.
Lo, from fought mercy, one his life receives!
Life, worſe than death, that cruel mercy gives:
The man, perchance, who wealth and honours bore,
Slaves in the mine, or ceaſeleſs ſtrains the oar.
So doom'd are theſe, and ſuch, perhaps, our doom,
Own'd we a prince, avert it heaven! from Rome.
Nor private worth alone falſe zeal aſſails;
Whole nations bleed when bigotry prevails.
What are ſworn friendſhips? What are kindred ties?
What's faith with hereſy? (the zealot cries.)
See, when war ſinks, the thundering cannons roar;
When wounds, and death, and diſcord are no
more;
When muſic bids undreading joys advance,
Swell the ſoft hour, and turn the ſwimming dance:
When, to crown theſe, the ſocial ſparkling bowl
Lifts the cheer'd ſenſe, and pours out all the ſoul;
Sudden he ſends red maſſacre abroad;
Faithleſs to man, to prove his faith to God.
What pure perſuaſive eloquence denies,
All drunk with blood, the arguing ſword ſupplies;
The ſword, which to th' aſſaſſin's hand is given!
Th' aſſaſſin's hand!—pronounc'd the hand of heaven!
Sex bleeds with ſex, and infancy with age;
No rank, no place, no virtue, ſtops his rage;
Shall ſword, and flame, and devaſtation ceaſe,
To pleaſe with zeal, wild zeal! the God of Peace?
Nor leſs abuſe has ſcourg'd the civil ſtate,
When a king's will became a nation's fate,
Enormous power! Nor noble, nor ſerene;
Now fierce and cruel; now but wild and mean.
See titles ſold, to raiſe th' unjuſt ſupply!
Compell'd the purchaſe! or be fin'd, or buy!
No public ſpirit, guarded well by laws,
Uncenſur'd cenſures in his country's cauſe.
See from the merchant forc'd th' unwilling loan!
Who dares deny, or deem his wealth his own?
Denying, ſee! where dungeon damps ariſe,
Diſeas'd he pines, and unaſſiſted dies.
Far more than maſſacre that fate accurſt!
As of all deaths the lingering is the worſt.
New courts of cenſure griev'd with new offence,
Tax'd without power, and fin'd without pretence,
Explain'd, at will, each ſtatute's wreſted aim,
Till marks of merit were the marks of ſhame;
So monſtrous!—Life was the ſevereſt grief,
And the worſt death ſeem'd welcome for relief.
In vain the ſubject ſought redreſs from law,
No ſenate liv'd the partial judge to awe:
Senates were void, and ſenators confin'd
For the great cauſe of nature and mankind;
Who kings ſuperior to the people own;
Yet prove the law ſuperior to the throne.
Who can review without a generous tear,
A church, a ſtate, ſo impious, ſo ſevere;
A land uncultur'd through polemic jars,
Rich!—but with carnage from inteſtine wars;

The hand of induſtry employ'd no more,
And commerce flying to ſome ſafer ſhore;
All property reduc'd, to power a prey,
And ſenſe and learning chas'd by zeal away?
Who honours not each dear departed ghoſt,
That ſtrove for liberty ſo won, ſo loſt:
So well regain'd when godlike William roſe,
And firſt entail'd the bleſſing George beſtows?
May Walpole ſtill the growing triumph raiſe,
And bid theſe emulate Eliza's days;
Still ſerve a prince, who, o'er his people great,
As far tranſcends in virtue, as in ſtate!
The muſe purſues thee to thy rural ſeat;
Ev'n there ſhall liberty inſpire retreat.
When ſolemn cares in flowing wit are drown'd,
And ſportive chat and ſocial laughs go round:
Ev'n then, when pauſing mirth begins to fail,
The converſe varies to the ſerious tale.
The tale pathetic ſpeaks ſome wretch that owes
To ſome deficient law reliefleſs woes.
What inſtant pity warms thy generous breaſt!
How all the legiſlator ſtands confeſs'd!
Now ſprings the hint! 'tis now improv'd to thought!;
Now ripe! and now to public welfare brought!
New bills, which regulating means beſtow,
Juſtice preſerve, yet ſoftening mercy know:
Juſtice ſhall low vexatious wiles decline,
And ſtill thrive moſt, when lawyers moſt repine,
Juſtice from jargon ſhall refin'd appear,
To knowledge through our native language clear.
Hence we may learn, no more deceiv'd by law,
Whence wealth and life their beſt aſſurance draw.
The freed inſolvent, with induſtrious hand,
Strives yet to ſatisfy the juſt demand:
Thus ruthleſs men, who would his powers reſtrain,
Oft what ſeverity would loſe obtain.
Theſe, and a thouſand gifts, thy thought acquires,
Which liberty benevolent inſpires.
From liberty the fruits of law increaſe,
Plenty, and joy, and all the arts of peace.
Abroad the merchant, while the tempeſts rave,
Adventurous ſails, nor fears the wind and wave;
At home untir'd we find th' auſpicious hand
With flocks, and herds, and harveſts, bleſs the land:
While there, the peaſant glads the grateful ſoil,
Here mark the ſhipwright, there the maſon toil,
Hew, ſquare, and rear, magnificent, the ſtone,
And give our oaks a glory not their own!
What life demands by this obeys her call,
And added elegance conſummates all.
Thus ſtately cities, ſtatelier navies riſe,
And ſpread our grandeur under diſtant ſkies.
From liberty each nobler ſcience ſprung,
A Bacon brighten'd, and a Spenſer ſung:
A Clarke and Locke new tracks of truth explore,
And Newton reaches heights unreach'd before.
What trade ſees property that wealth maintain,
What induſtry no longer dreads to gain;
What tender conſcience kneels with fears reſign'd,
Enjoys her worſhip, and avows her mind:
What genius now from want to fortune climbs,
And to ſafe ſcience every thought ſublimes;
What royal power, from his ſuperior ſtate,
Sees public happineſs his own create;
But kens thoſe patriot ſouls, to which he owes
Of old each ſource, whence now each bleſſing flows?
And if ſuch ſpirits from their heaven deſcend,
And blended flame, to point one glorious end;
Flame from one breaſt, and thence to Britain ſhine,
What love, what praiſe, O Walpole, then is thine?

THE VOLUNTEER LAUREAT.

No. I.

On her Majeſty's Birth-day, 1731-2.

Twice twenty tedious moons have roll'd away,
Since hope, kind flatterer! tun'd my penſive lay,
Whiſpering, that you, who rais'd me from deſpair,
Meant, by your ſmiles, to make life worth my care;
With pitying hand an orphan's tears to ſcreen,
And o'er the motherleſs extend the queen.
'Twill be—the prophet guides the poet's ſtrain!
Grief never touch'd a heart like your's in vain:
Heaven gave you power, becauſe you love to bleſs;
And pity, when you feel it, is redreſs.
Two fathers join'd to rob my claim of one!
My mother too thought fit to have no ſon!
The ſenate next, whoſe aid the helpleſs own,
Forgot my infant wrongs, and mine alone!
Yet parents pityleſs, nor peers unkind,
Nor titles loſt, nor woes myſterious join'd,
Strip me of hope---by heav'n thus lowly laid,
To find a Pharoah's daughter in the ſhade.
You cannot hear unmov'd, when wrongs implore,
Your heart is woman, though your mind be more;
Kind, like the power who gave you to our prayers,
You would not lengthen life to ſharpen cares;
They, who a barren leave to live beſtow,
Snatch but from death to ſacrifice to woe.
Hated by her from whom my life I drew,
Whence ſhould I hope, if not from heaven and you?
Nor dare I groan beneath affliction's rod,
My queen my mother, and my father---God.
The pitying muſes ſaw me wit purſue;
A baſtard-ſon, alas! on that ſide too,
Did not your eyes exalt the poet's fire,
And what the muſe denies, the queen inſpire?
While riſing thus your heavenly ſoul to view,
I learn, how angels think, by copying you.
Great princeſs! 'tis decreed---once every year
I march uncall'd your Laureat Volunteer;
Thus ſhall your poet his low genius raiſe, [praiſe.
And charm the world with truths too vaſt for
Nor need I dwell on glories all your own,
Since ſurer means to tempt your ſmiles are known;
Your poet ſhall allot your lord his part,
And paint him in his nobleſt throne---your heart.
Is there a greatneſs that adorns him beſt,
A riſing wiſh, that ripens in his breaſt?

Has he foremeant ſome diſtant age to bleſs,
Diſarm oppreſſion, or expel diſtreſs?
Plans he ſome ſcheme to reconcile mankind,
People the ſeas, and buſy every wind?
Would he by pity the deceiv'd reclaim,
And ſmile contending factions into ſhame?
Would his example lend his laws a weight,
And breathe his own ſoft morals o'er his ſtate?
The muſe ſhall find it all, ſhall make it ſeen,
And teach the world his praiſe, to charm his queen.

Such be the annual truths my verſe imparts,
Nor frown, fair favourite of a people's hearts!
Happy if, plac'd, perchance, beneath your eye,
My muſe, unpenſion'd, might her pinions try;
Fearleſs to fail, whilſt you indulge her flame,
And bid me proudly boaſt your Laureat's name;
Renobled thus by wreaths my queen beſtows,
I loſe all memory of wrongs and woes.

No. II.

On her Majeſty's Birth-day, 1732-3.

"GREAT princeſs, 'tis decreed! once every year,
"I march uncall'd, your Laureat Volunteer."
So ſung the muſe; nor ſung the muſe in vain:
My queen accepts, the year renews the ſtrain.
Ere firſt your influence ſhone with heavenly aid,
Each thought was terror; for each view was ſhade.
Fortune to life each flowery path deny'd;
No ſcience learn'd to bloom, no lay to glide.
Inſtead of hallow'd hill, or vocal vale,
Or ſtream, ſweet-echoing to the tuneful tale;
Damp dens confin'd, or barren deſerts ſpread,
With ſpectres haunted, and the muſes fled;
Ruins in penſive emblem ſeem to riſe,
And all was dark, or wild, to fancy's eyes.

But hark! a gladdening voice all nature cheers!
Diſperſe, ye glooms! a day of joy appears!
Hail, happy day!---'Twas on thy glorious morn,
The firſt, the faireſt of her ſex was born!
How ſwift the change! Cold, wintery ſorrows fly!
Where'er ſhe looks, delight ſurrounds the eye!
Mild ſhines the ſun, the woodlands warble round,
The vales ſweet echo, ſweet the rocks reſound!
In cordial air, ſoft fragrance floats along;
Each ſcene is verdure, and each voice is ſong!

Shoot from your orb divine, ye quickening rays!
Boundleſs, like her benevolence, ye blaze!
Soft emblems of her bounty, fall ye ſhowers!
And ſweet aſcend, and fair unfold ye flowers!
Ye roſes, lilies, you we earlieſt claim,
In whiteneſs, and in fragrance, match her fame!
'Tis yours to fade, to fame like hers is due
Undying ſweets, and bloom for ever new.
Ye bleſſoms, that one varied landſcape riſe,
And ſend your ſcentful tribute to the ſkies;
Diffuſive like yon royal branches ſmile,
Grace the young year, and glad the grateful iſle!
Attend, ye muſes! mark the feather'd quires!
Thoſe the ſpring wakes, as you the queen inſpires.
O, let her praiſe for ever ſwell your ſong!
Sweet let your ſacred ſtreams the notes prolong,
Clear, and more clear, through all my lays refine;
And there let heaven and her reflected ſhine!

As, when chill blights from vernal ſuns retire,
Chearful the vegetative world aſpire,
Put forth unfolding blooms, and waving try
Th' enlivening influence of a milder ſky;
So gives her birth (like yon approaching ſpring)
The land to flouriſh, and the muſe to ſing.

'Twas thus, Zenobia, on Palmyra's throne,
In learning, beauty, and in virtue ſhone;
Beneath her roſe, Longinus, in thy name,
The poet's, critic's, and the patriot's fame!
Is there (ſo high be you, great princeſs, prais'd)
A woe unpitied, or a worth unrais'd?
Art learns to ſoar by your ſweet influence taught;
In life well cheriſh'd; nor in death forgot:
In death, as life, the learn'd your goodneſs tell!
Witneſs the ſacred buſts of Richmond's cell!
Sages, who in unfading light will ſhine;
Who graſp'd at ſcience, like your own, divine!

The muſe, who hails with ſong this glorious morn,
Now looks through days, through months, through years unborn;
All white they riſe, and in their courſe expreſs'd
A king by kings rever'd, by ſubjects bleſt!
A queen, where'er true greatneſs ſpreads in fame;
Where learning towers beyond her ſex's aim;
Where pure religion no extreme can touch,
Of faith too little, or of zeal too much;
Where theſe behold, as on this bleſs'd of morns,
What love protects them, and what worth adorns;
Where'er diffuſive goodneſs ſmiles, a queen
Still prais'd with rapture, as with wonder ſeen!

See nations round, of every wiſh poſſeſs'd!
Life in each eye, and joy in every breaſt!
Shall I, on what I lightly touch'd, explain?
Shall I (vain thought!) attempt the finiſh'd ſtrain?
No!—let the poet ſtop unequal lays,
And to the juſt hiſtorian yield your praiſe.

No. III.

On her Majeſty's Birth-day, 1734-5.

IN youth no parent nurs'd my infant ſongs,
'Twas mine to be inſpir'd alone by wrongs;
Wrongs, that with life their fierce attack began,
Drank infant tears, and ſtill purſue the man.
Life ſcarce is life—Dejection all is mine;
The power, that loves in lonely ſhades to pine;
Of fading cheek, of unelated views;
Whoſe weaken'd eyes the rays of hope refuſe.
'Tis mine the mean, inhuman pride to find;
Who ſhuns th' oppreſs'd, to fortune only kind;
Whoſe pity's inſult, and whoſe cold reſpect
Is keen as ſcorn, ungenerous as neglect.
Void of benevolent, obliging grace,
Ev'n dubious friendſhip half averts his face.
Thus ſunk in ſickneſs, thus with woes oppreſt,
How ſhall the fire awake within my breaſt?
How ſhall the muſe her flagging pinions raiſe?
How tune her voice to Carolina's praiſe?
From jarring thought no tuneful raptures flow;
Theſe with fair days and gentle ſeaſons glow:

Such give alone sweet Philomel to sing,
And Philomel's the poet of the spring.
But soft, my soul! see yon celestial light!
Before whose lambent lustre breaks the night.
It glads me like the morning clad in dews,
And beams reviving from the vernal muse:
Inspiring joyous peace, 'tis she! 'tis she!
A stranger long to misery and me.
Her verdant mantle gracefully declines,
And, flower-embroider'd, as it varies, shines.
To form her garland, zephyr, from his wing,
Throws the first flowers and foliage of the spring.
Her looks how lovely! health and joy have lent
Bloom to her cheek, and to her brow content.
Behold, sweet-beaming her etherial eyes!
Soft as the Pleiades o'er the dewy skies.
She blunts the point of care, alleviates woes,
And pours the balm of comfort and repose;
Bids the heart yield to virtue's silent call,
And shows ambition's sons mere children all;
Who hunt for toys which please with tinsel shine;
For which they squabble, and for which they pine.
Oh, hear her voice, more mellow than the gale,
That breath'd through shepherd's pipe enchants the vale!
Hark! she invites from city smoke and noise,
Vapours impure, and from impurer joys;
From various evils, that, with rage combin'd,
Untune the body, and pollute the mind:
From crowds, to whom no social faith belongs,
Who tread one circle of deceit and wrongs;
With whom politeness is but civil guile,
And laws oppress, exerted by the vile.
To this oppos'd, the muse presents the scene;
Where sylvan pleasures ever smiles serene;
Pleasures that emulate the blest above,
Health, innocence, and peace, the muse, and love;
Pleasures that ravish, while alternate wrought
By friendly converse, and abstracted thought.
These soothe my throbbing breast. No loss I mourn;
Though both from riches and from grandeur torn.
Weep I cruel mother? No—I've seen,
From heaven, a pitying, a maternal queen.
One gave me life; but would no comfort grant;
She more than life resum'd by giving want.
Would she the being which she gave destroy?
My queen gives life, and bids me hope for joy.
Honours and wealth I cheerfully resign;
If competence, if learned ease be mine!
If I by mental, heart-felt joys be fir'd,
And in the vale by all the muse inspir'd!
Here cease my plaint—See yon enlivening scenes!
Child of the spring! Behold the best of queens!
Softness and beauty rose this heavenly morn,
Dawn'd wisdom, and benevolence was born.
Joy, o'er a people, in her influence rose;
Like that which spring o'er rural nature throws.
War to the peaceful pipe resigns his roar,
And breaks his billows on some distant shore.
Domestic discord sinks beneath her smile,
And arts, and trade, and plenty, glad the isle.
Lo, industry surveys, with feasted eyes,
His due reward, a plenteous harvest rise!
Nor (taught by commerce) joys in that alone;
But sees the harvest of a world his own.
Hence thy just praise, thou mild, majestic Thames!
Rich river! richer than Pactolus' streams!
Than those renown'd of yore, by poets roll'd
O'er intermingled pearls, and sands of gold.
How glorious thou, when from old ocean's urn,
Loaded with India's wealth, thy waves return!
Alive thy banks! along each bordering line,
High cultur'd blooms, inviting villas shine:
And while around ten thousand beauties glow,
These still o'er those redoubling lustre throw.
"Come then (so whisper'd the indulgent muse)
"Come then, in Richmond groves thy sorrows lose!
"Come then, and hymn this day! The pleasing scene
"Shows, in each view, the genius of thy queen.
"Hear nature whispering in the breeze her song!
"Hear her sweet warbling through the feather'd throng!
"Come, with the warbling world thy notes unite,
"And with the vegetable smile delight!
"Sure such a scene and song will soon restore
"Lost quiet, and give bliss unknown before;
"Receive it grateful, and adore, when given,
"The goodness of thy parent, queen, and heaven!
"With me each private virtue lifts the voice;
"While public spirit bids a land rejoice:
"O'er all thy queen's benevolence descends,
"And wide o'er all her vital light extends.
"As winter softens into spring, to you
"Blooms fortune's season, through her smile, anew.
"Still for past bounty, let new lays impart
"The sweet effusions of a grateful heart!
"Cast through the telescope of hope your eye!
"There goodness infinite, supreme, descry!
"From him that ray of virtue stream'd on earth,
"Which kindled Caroline's bright soul to birth.
"Behold, he spreads one universal spring!
"Mortals, transform'd to angels, then shall sing;
"Oppression then shall fly with want and shame,
"And blessing and existence be the same!"

No. IV.

On her Majesty's Birth-Day, 1735-6.

Lo! the mild sun salutes the opening spring,
And gladdening nature calls the muse to sing;
Gay chirp the birds, the bloomy sweets exhale,
And health, and song, and fragrance fill the gale.
Yet, mildest suns, to me are pain severe,
And music's self is discord to my ear!
I, jocund spring, unsympathising, see,
And health, that comes to all, comes not to me.
Dear health once fled, what spirits can I find!
What solace meet, when fled my peace of mind?
From absent hooks what studious hint devise?
From absent friends, what aid to thought can rise?
A genius whisper'd in my ear—Go seek
Some man of state!—The muse your wrongs may speak.
But will such listen to the plaintive strain?
The happy seldom heed th' unhappy's pain.
To wealth, to honours, wherefore was I born?
Why left to poverty, repulse, and scorn?

Why was I form'd of elegant desires?
Thought, which beyond a vulgar flight aspires!
Why, by the proud, and wicked, crush'd to earth?
Better the day of death, than day of birth!
Thus I exclaim'd: a little cherub smil'd; [child!
"Hope, I am call'd (said he), a heaven-born
Wrongs sure you have; complain you justly may:
But let wild sorrow whirl not thought away!
No—trust to honour! that you ne'er will stain
From peerage-blood, which fires your filial vein.
Trust more to Providence! from me ne'er swerve!
Once to distrust, is never to deserve.
Did not this day a Caroline disclose?
I promis'd at her birth, and blessing rose!
(Blessing, o'er all the letter'd world to shine,
In knowledge clear, beneficence divine!)
'Tis hers, as mine, to chase away despair;
Woe undeserv'd is her peculiar care.
Her bright benevolence sends me to grief:
On want sheds bounty, and on wrong relief."
Then calm-ey'd Patience, born of angel-kind,
Open'd a dawn of comfort on my mind.
With her came Fortitude, of godlike air!
These arm to conquer ills; at least to bear: [dain,
Arm'd thus, my queen, while wayward fates or-
My life to lengthen, but to lengthen pain;
Your bard, his sorrows with a smile endures;
Since to be wretched, is—to be made yours.

No. V.

On her Majesty's Birth-day, 1736-7.

Ye spirits bright, that æther rove,
That breathe the vernal soul of love;
Bid health descend in balmy dews,
And life in every gale diffuse;
That give the flowers to shine, the birds to sing;
Oh, glad this natal day, the prime of spring!
The virgin snow-drop first appears;
Her golden head the crocus rears.
The flowery tribe, profuse and gay,
Spread to the soft, inviting ray.
So arts shall bloom by Carolina's smile,
So shall her fame waft fragrance o'er the isle.
The warblers various, sweet and clear,
From bloomy sprays salute the year.
O muse, awake! ascend, and sing!
Hail the fair rival of the spring!
To woodland honours woodland hymns belong;
To her, the pride of arts! the muse's song.
Kind, as of late her clement sway,
The season sheds a trepid ray.
The storms of Boreas rave no more;
The storms of faction cease to roar,
At vernal suns as wintery tempests cease,
She, lovely power! smiles faction into peace.

No. VI.

FOR THE FIRST OF MARCH, 1737-8.

Sacred to the Memory of her late Majesty, humbly addressed to his Majesty.

Oft has the muse, on this distinguish'd day,
Tun'd to glad harmony the vernal lay;
But, O lamented change! the lay must flow
From grateful rapture now to grateful woe.
She, to this day, who joyous lustre gave,
Descends for ever to the silent grave.
She, born at once to charm us and to mend,
Of human race the pattern and the friend.
To be or fondly or severely kind,
To check the rash or prompt the better mind,
Parents shall learn from her, and thus shall draw
From filial love alone a filial awe.
Who seek in avarice wisdom's art to save;
Who often squander, yet who never gave;
From her these knew the righteous mean to find,
And the mild virtue stole on half mankind.
The lavish now caught frugal wisdom's lore,
Yet still, the more they sav'd, bestow'd the more.
Now misers learn'd at others woes to melt,
And saw and wonder'd at the change they felt.
The generous, when on her they turn'd their view,
The generous ev'n themselves more generous grew,
Learn'd the shunn'd haunts of shame-fac'd want to trace
To goodness, delicacy, adding grace,
The conscious cheek no rising blush confess'd,
Nor dwelt one thought to pain the modest breast;
Kind and more kind did thus her bounty shower,
And knew no limit but a bounded power.
This truth the widow's sighs, alas! proclaim;
For this the orphan's tears embalm her fame.
The wise beheld her learning's summit gain,
Yet never giddy grow, nor ever vain:
But on one science point a stedfast eye,
That science—how to live and how to die.
Say, Memory, while to thy grateful sight
Arise her virtues in unfading light,
What joys were ours, what sorrows now remain:
Ah! how sublime the bliss how deep the pain!
And thou, bright princess, seated now on high,
Next one, the fairest daughter of the sky,
Whose warm-felt love is to all beings known,
Thy sister Charity! next her thy throne;
See at thy tomb the Virtues weeping lie!
There in dumb sorrow seem the Arts to die.
So were the sun o'er other orbs to blaze,
And from our world, like thee, withdraw his rays,
No more to visit where he warm'd before,
All life must cease, and nature be no more.
Yet shall the muse a heavenly height essay
Beyond the weakness mix'd with mortal clay;
Beyond the loss, which, though she bleeds to see,
Though ne'er to be redeem'd, the loss of thee!
Beyond ev'n this, she hails with joyous lay,
Thy better birth, thy first true natal day;
A day, that sees thee borne beyond the tomb,
To endless health, to youth's eternal bloom;
Borne to the mighty dead, the souls sublime
Of every famous age, and every clime;
To goodness fix'd by truth's unvarying laws,
To bliss that knows no period, knows no pause—
Save when thine eye, from yonder pure serene,
Sheds a soft eye on this our gloomy scene.
With me now liberty and learning mourn,
From all relief, like thy lov'd consort, torn;

For where can prince or people hope relief,
When each contend to be ſupreme in grief?
So vy'd thy virtues, that could point the way,
So well to govern; yet ſo well obey.
Deign one look more! ah! ſee thy conſort dear
Wiſhing all hearts, except his own, to cheer.
Lo! ſtill he bids thy wonted bounty flow
To weeping families of worth and woe.
He ſtops all tears, however faſt they riſe,
Save thoſe that ſtill muſt fall from grateful eyes,
And, ſpite of griefs that ſo uſurp his mind,
Still watches o'er the welfare of mankind.
Father of thoſe whoſe rights thy care defends,
Still moſt their own, when moſt their ſovereign's friends;
Then chiefly brave, from bondage chiefly free,
When moſt they truſt, when moſt they copy thee;
Ah! let the loweſt of thy ſubjects pay
His honeſt heart-felt tributary lay;
In anguiſh happy, if permitted here,
One ſigh to vent, to drop one virtuous tear;
Happier, if pardon'd, ſhould he wildly moan,
And with a monarch's ſorrow mix his own.

OF PUBLIC SPIRIT

IN REGARD TO PUBLIC WORKS:

An Epiſtle to his Royal Highneſs Frederic Prince of Wales.

CONTENTS.

Of reſervoirs, and their uſe; of draining fens, and building bridges, cutting canals, repairing harbours, and ſtopping inundations, making rivers navigable, building light-houſes; of agriculture, gardening, and planting for the nobleſt uſes; of commerce; of public roads; of public buildings, viz. ſquares, ſtreets, manſions, palaces, courts of juſtice, ſenate-houſes, theatres, hoſpitals, churches, colleges; the variety of worthies produced by the latter; of colonies. The ſlave-trade cenſured, &c.

GREAT hope of Britain!—Here the muſe eſſays
A theme, which, to attempt alone, is praiſe.
Be her's a zeal of public ſpirit known!
A princely zeal!—a ſpirit all your own!
Where never ſcience beam'd a friendly ray,
Where one vaſt blank neglected nature lay;
From public ſpirit there, by arts employ'd,
Creation, varying, glads the cheerleſs void,
Hail, arts! where ſafety, treaſure, and delight,
On land, on wave, in wondrous works unite!
Thoſe wondrous works, O muſe! ſucceſſive raiſe,
And point their worth, their dignity, and praiſe!
What though no ſtreams, magnificently play'd,
Riſe a proud column, fall a grand caſcade;
Through nether pipes, which nobler uſe renowns,
Lo! ductile rivulets viſit diſtant towns!
Now vaniſh fens, whence vapours riſe no more,
Whoſe agueiſh influence tainted heaven before.
The ſolid iſthmus ſinks a watery ſpace,
And wonders, in new ſtate, at naval grace.
Where the flood deepening rolls, or wide extends,
From road to road yon arch, connective bends:
Where ports were chok'd; where mounds in vain, aroſe;
There harbours open, and there breaches cloſe;
To keels, obedient, ſpreads each liquid plain,
And bulwark moles repel the boiſterous main.
When the ſunk ſun no homeward ſail befriends,
On the rock's brow the light-houſe kind aſcends,
And from the ſhoaly, o'er the gulfy way,
Points to the pilot's eye the warning ray.
Count ſtill, my muſe (to count, what muſe can ceaſe?)
The works of public ſpirit, freedom, peace!
By them ſhall plants, in foreſts, reach the ſkies;
Then loſe their leafy pride, and navies riſe.
(Navies, which to invaſive foes explain,
Heaven throws not round us rocks and ſeas in vain):
The ſail of commerce in each ſky aſpires,
And property aſſures what toil acquires.
Who digs the mine or quarry, digs with glee;
No ſlave!—His option and his gain are free:
Him the ſame laws the ſame protection yield,
Who ploughs the furrow, or who owns the field.
Unlike, where tyranny the rod maintains
O'er turfleſs, leafleſs, and uncultur'd plains,
Here herbs of food and phyſic plenty ſhowers.
Gives fruits to bluſh, and colours various flowers.
Where ſands or ſtony wilds once ſtarv'd the year,
Laughs the green lawn, and nods the golden ear:
White ſhine the fleecy race, which fate ſhall doom
The feaſt of life, the treaſure of the loom.
On plains now bare ſhall gardens wave their groves;
While ſettling ſongſters woo their feather'd loves.
Where pathleſs woods no grateful openings knew,
Walks tempt the ſtep, and viſtas court the view.
See the parterre confeſs expanſive day;
The grot, eluſive of the noon-tide ray.
Up yon green ſlope a length of terrace lies,
Whence gradual landſcapes fade in diſtant ſkies.
Now the blue lake reflected heaven diſplays;
Now darkens, regularly-wild, the maze.
Urns, obeliſks, fanes, ſtatues intervene;
Now centre, now commence, or end the ſcene.
Lo, proud alcoves! lo, ſoft ſequeſter'd bowers!
Retreats of ſocial, or of ſtudious hours!
Rank above rank here ſhapely greens aſcend;
There others natively-groteſque depend.
The rude, the delicate, immingled tell
How art would nature, nature art excel;
And how, while theſe their rival charms impart,
Art brightens nature, nature brightens art;
Thus, in the various, yet harmonious ſpace,
Blend order, ſymmetry, and force, and grace.
When theſe from public ſpirit ſmile, we ſee
Free-opening gates, and bowery pleaſures free;
For ſure great ſouls one truth can never miſs,
Bliſs not communicated is not bliſs.
Thus public ſpirit, liberty, and peace,
Carve, build, and plant, and give the land increaſe;

From peasant hands imperial works arise,
And British hence with Roman grandeur vies;
Not grandeur that in pompous whim appears,
That levels hills, that vales to mountains rears;
That alters nature's regulated grace,
Meaning to deck, but destin'd to deface.
Though no proud gates, with China's taught to vie,
Magnificently useless strike the eye;
(Useless, where rocks a surer barrier lend,
Where seas encircle, and where fleets defend;)
What though no arch of triumph is assign'd
To laurel'd pride, whose sword has thinn'd mankind;
Though no vast wall extends from coast to coast,
No pyramid aspires, sublimely lost;
Yet the safe road through rocks shall winding tend,
And the firm causeway o'er the clays ascend.
Lo! stately streets, lo! ample squares invite
The salutary gale, that breathes delight.
Lo! structures mark the charitable soil
For casual ill, maim'd valour, feeble toil
Worn out with care, infirmity, and age;
The life here entering, quitting there the stage:
The babe of lawless birth, doom'd else to moan,
To starve or bleed for errors not his own!
Let the frail mother 'scape the fame defil'd,
If from the murdering mother 'scape the child!
Oh! guard his youth from sin's alluring voice;
From deeds of dire necessity, not choice!
His grateful hand, thus never harmful known,
Shall on the public welfare build his own.
Thus worthy crafts, which low-born life divide,
Give towns their opulence, and courts their pride.
Sacred to pleasure structures rise elate,
To that still worthy of the wise and great.
Sacred to pleasure then shall piles ascend?
They shall—when pleasure and instruction blend.
Let theatres from public spirit shine!
Such theatres, as, Athens, once were thine!
See! the gay muse of pointed wit possest,
Who makes the virtuous laugh, the decent jest:
What though she mock, she mocks with honest aim,
And laughs each favourite folly into shame,
With liberal light the tragic charms the age:
In solemn-training robes she fills the stage;
There human nature, mark'd in different lines,
Alive in character distinctly shines.
Quick passions change alternate on her face;
Her diction music, as her action grace.
Instant we catch her terror-giving cares,
Pathetic sighs, and pity-moving tears;
Instant we catch her generous glow of soul,
Till one great striking moral crowns the whole.
Hence in warm youth, by scenes of virtue taught,
Honour exalts, and love expands the thought!
Hence pity, to peculiar grief assign'd,
Grows wide benevolence to all mankind.
Where various edifice the land renowns,
There public spirit plans, exalts, and crowns.
She cheers the mansion with the spacious hall,
Bids painting live along the storied wall;
Seated, she smiling eyes th' unclosing door,
And much she welcomes all, but most the poor;
She turns the pillar, or the arch she bends,
The choir she lengthens, or the choir extends;
She rears the tower, whose height the heavens admire;
She rears, she rounds, she points the lessening spire;
At her command the college-roofs ascend
(For public spirit still is learning's friend).
Stupendous piles, which useful pomp completes,
Thus rise religion's, and thus learning's seats:
There moral truth and holy science spring,
And give the sage to teach, the bard to sing.
There some draw health from herbs and mineral veins,
Some search the systems of the heavenly plains;
Some call from history past times to view,
And others trace old laws, and sketch out new;
Thence saving rights by legislators plann'd,
And guardian patriots thence inspire the land.
Now grant, ye powers, one great, one fond desire,
And, granting, bid a new Whitehall aspire!
Far let it lead, by well-pleas'd Thames survey'd,
The swelling arch, and stately colonnade;
Bid courts of justice, senate-chambers join,
Till various all in one proud work combine!
But now be all the generous goddess seen,
When most diffus'd she shines, and most benign!
Ye sons of misery, attract her view!
Ye sallow, hallow-eyed, and meagre crew!
Such high perfection have our arts attain'd,
That now few sons of toil our arts demand?
Then to the public, to itself, we fear,
Ev'n willing industry grows useless here,
Are we too populous at length confess'd,
From confluent strangers refug'd and redress'd!
Has war so long withdrawn his barbarous train,
That peace o'erstocks us with the sons of men?
So long has plague left pure the ambient air,
That want must prey on those disease would spare?
Hence beauteous wretches (beauty's foul disgrace!)
Though born the pride, the shame of human race;
Fair wretches hence, who nightly streets annoy,
Live but themselves and others to destroy.
Hence robbers rise, to theft, to murder prone,
First driven by want, from habit desperate grown;
Hence for ow'd trifles oft our jails contain
(Torn from mankind) a miserable train;
Torn from, in spite of nature's tenderest cries,
Parental, filial, and connubial ties:
The trader, when on every side distrest,
Hence flies to what expedient frauds suggest;
To prop his question'd credit's tottering state,
Others he first involves to share his fate;
Then for mean refuge must self-exil'd roam
Never to hope a friend, nor find a home.
This public spirit sees, she sees and feels!
Her breast the throb, her eye the tear reveals;
(The patriot throb that beats, the tear that flows
For others welfare, and for others woes)—
And what can I (she said) to cure their grief?
Shall I or point out death, or point relief?
Forth shall I lead them to some happier soil,
To conquest lead them, and enrich with spoil?
Bid them convulse a world, make nature groan,
And spill, in shedding others blood, their own?
No, no—such wars do thou, ambition, wage!
Go sterilize the fertile with thy rage!

Whole nations to depopulate is thine;
To people, culture, and protect, be mine!
Then range the world, discovery!---Strait he goes
O'er seas, o'er Libya's sands, and Zembla's snows;
He settles where kind rays till now have smil'd
(Vain smile) on some luxuriant houseless wild.
How many sons of want might here enjoy
What nature gives for age but to destroy?
Blush, blush, O sun (she cries) here vainly found,
To rise, to set, to roll the seasons round!
Shall heaven distil in dews, descend in rain,
From earth gush fountains, rivers flow---in vain?
There shall the watery lives in myriads stray,
And be, to be alone each other's prey?
Unsought shall here the teeming quarries own
The various species of mechanic stone?
From structure this, from sculpture that confine?
Shall rocks forbid the latent gem to shine?
Shall mines, obedient, aid no artist's care,
Nor give the martial sword, and peaceful share?
Ah! shall they never precious ore unfold,
To smile in silver, or to flame in gold?
Shall here the vegetable world alone,
For joys, for various virtues, rest unknown?
While food and physic, plants and herbs supply,
Here must they shoot alone to bloom and die?
Shall fruits, which none but brutal eyes survey,
Untouch'd grow ripe, untasted drop away?
Shall here th' irrational, the savage kind,
Lord it o'er stores by heaven for man design'd,
And trample what mild suns benignly raise,
While man must lose the use, and heaven the praise?
Shall it then be?—(Indignant here she rose,
Indignant, yet humane. her bosom glows)—
No. By each honour'd Grecian, Roman name,
By men for virtue deify'd by fame,
Who peopled lands, who model'd infant state,
And then bade empire be maturely great;
By these I swear (be witness earth and skies!)
Fair order here shall from confusion rise.
Rapt, I a future colony survey?
Come then, ye sons of misery! come away!
Let those, whose sorrows from neglect are known,
(Here taught, compell'd, empower'd) neglect atone!
Let those enjoy, who never merit woes,
In youth th' industrious wish, in age repose!
Allotted acres (no reluctant soil)
Shall prompt their industry, and pay their toil.
Let families, long strangers to delight,
Whom wayward fate dispers'd by me unite;
Here live enjoying life; see plenty, peace;
Their lands increasing as their sons increase.
As nature yet is found, in leafy glades,
To intermix the walks with lights and shades;
Or as with good and ill, in chequer'd strife,
Various the goddess colours human life:
So, in this fertile clime, if yet are seen
Moors, marshes, cliffs, by turns to intervene;
Where cliffs, moors, marshes, desolate the view,
Where haunts the bittern, and where screams the mew;
Where prowls the wolf, where roll'd the serpent lies,
Shall solemn fanes and halls of justice rise,
And towns shall open (all of structure fair!)
To brightening prospects, and to purest air;
Frequented ports, and vineyards green succeed,
And flocks increasing whiten all the mead.
On science science, arts on arts refine:
On these from high all heaven shall smiling shine,
And public spirit here a people show,
Free, numerous, pleas'd, and busy all below.
Learn, future natives of this promis'd land,
What your forefathers ow'd my saving hand!
Learn, when despair such sudden bliss shall see,
Such bliss must shine from Oglethorpe or me!
Do you the neighbouring blameless Indian aid,
Culture what he neglects, not his invade,
Dare not, oh dare not, with ambitious view,
Force or demand subjection never due.
Let, by my specious name, no tyrants rise,
And cry, while they enslave, they civilize!
Know, liberty and I are still the same,
Congenial!—ever mingling flame with flame!
Why must I Afric's sable children see
Vended for slaves, though form'd by nature free,
The nameless tortures cruel minds invent,
Those to subject, whom nature equal meant?
If these you dare (albeit unjust success
Empowers you now unpunish'd to oppress)
Revolving empire you and your's may doom
(Rome all subdued, yet Vandals vanquish'd Rome),
Yes, empire may revolve, give them the day,
And yoke may yoke, and blood may blood repay.
Thus (ah! how far unequal'd by my lays,
Unskill'd the heart to melt, or mind to raise),
Sublime, benevolent, deep, sweetly clear,
Worthy a Thomson's muse, a Frederick's ear,
Thus spoke the goddess. Thus I faintly tell
In what lov'd works heaven gives her to excel.
But who her sons, that, to her interest true,
Conversant lead her to a prince like you?
These, sir, salute you from life's middle state,
Rich without gold, and without titles great:
Knowledge of books and men exalts their thought,
In wit accomplish'd, though in wiles untaught,
Careless of whispers meant to wound their name,
Nor sneer'd nor brib'd from virtue into shame;
In letters elegant, in honour bright,
They come, they catch, and they reflect delight.
Mixing with these, a few of rank are found,
For councils, embassies, and camps renown'd.
Vers'd in gay life, in honest maxims read,
And ever warm of heart, yet cool of head,
From these the circling glass gives wit to shine,
The bright grow brighter, and ev'n courts refine;
From these so gifted, candid, and upright,
Flows knowledge, softening into ease polite.
Happy the men, who such a prince can please!
Happy the prince rever'd by men like these!
His condescensions dignity display,
Grave with the wise, and with the witty gay;
For him fine marble in the quarry lies,
Which, in due statues, to his fame shall rise;
Ever shall public spirit beam his praise,
And the muse swell it in immortal lays.

TO MR. JOHN DYER,

A PAINTER,

*Adviſing him to draw a certain noble and illuſtrious Perſon; occaſioned by ſeeing his Picture of the celebrated Clio .

FORGIVE an artleſs, an officious friend,
Weak, when I judge, but willing to commend;
Fall'n as I am, by no kind fortune rais'd,
Depreſs'd, obſcur'd, unpity'd, and unprais'd;
Yet, when theſe well-known features I peruſe,
Some warmth awakes—ſome embers of a muſe.
Ye muſes, graces, and ye loves, appear!
Your queen, your Venus, and your Clio's here!
In ſuch pure fires her riſing thoughts refine!
Her eyes with ſuch commanding ſweetneſs ſhine:
Such vivid tinctures ſure through æther glow,
Stain ſummer clouds, or gild the watery bow:
If life Pygmalion's ivory favourite fir'd,
Sure ſome enamour'd god this draught inſpir'd!
Or, if you raſhly caught Promethean flame,
Shade the ſweet theft, and mar the beauteous frame!
Yet if thoſe cheering lights the proſpect fly,
Ah!—let no pleaſing view the loſs ſupply.
Some dreary den, ſome deſert waſte prepare,
Wild as my thoughts, or dark as my deſpair.
But ſtill, my friend, ſtill the ſweet object ſtays,
Still ſtream your colours rich with Clio's rays!
Sure at each kindling touch your canvaſs glows!
Sure the full form, inſtinct with ſpirit, grows!
Let the dull artiſt puzzling rules explore,
Dwell on the face, and gaze the features o'er;
You eye the ſoul—there genuine nature find,
You, through the meaning muſcles, ſtrike the mind.
Nor can one view ſuch boundleſs power confine,
All nature opens to an art like thine!
Now rural ſcenes in ſimple grandeur riſe!
Vales, hills, lawns, lakes, and vineyards feaſt our eyes,
Now halcyon peace a ſmiling aſpect wears!
Now the red ſcene with war and ruin glares!
Here Britain's fleet o'er Europe's ſeas preſide!
There long loſt cities rear their ancient pride;
You from the grave can half redeem the ſlain,
And bid great Julius charm the world again:
Mark out Pharſalia's, mark out Munda's fray,
And image all the honours of the day.
But if new glories moſt our warmth excite;
If toils untry'd to nobleſt aims invite;
Would you in envy'd pomp unrival'd reign,
Oh, let Horatius grace the canvaſs plain!
His form might ev'n idolatry create,
In lineage, titles, wealth, and worth elate!
Empires to him might virgin honours owe,
From him arts, arms, and laws, new influence know.
For him kind ſuns on fruits and grains ſhall ſhine,
And future gold lie ripening in the mine:
For him fine marble in the quarry lies,
Which, in due ſtatues, to his fame ſhall riſe.
Through thoſe bright features Cæſar's ſpirit trace,
Each conquering ſweetneſs, each imperial grace,
All that is ſoft, or eminently great,
In love, in war, in knowledge, or in ſtate.
Thus ſhall your colours, like his worth amaze!
Thus ſhall you charm, enrich'd with Clio's praiſe!
Clear, and more clear, your golden genius ſhines,
While my dim lamp of life obſcure declines:
Dull'd in damp ſhades, it waſtes, unſeen, away,
While yours, triumphant, grows one blaze of day.

VERSES

SENT TO AARON HILL, ESQ.

With the Tragedy of Sir Thomas Overbury, expecting him to correct it.

As the ſoul, ſtript of mortal clay,
Grows all divinely fair,
And boundleſs roves the milky way,
And views ſweet proſpects there.

This hero, clogg'd with droſſy lines,
By thee new vigour tries;
As thy correcting hand refines,
Bright ſcenes around him riſe.

Thy touch brings the wiſh'd ſtone to paſs,
So ſought, ſo long foretold;
It turns polluted lead or braſs,
At once to pureſt gold.

PROLOGUE

Spoken at the revival of Shakſpeare's King Henry the Sixth, at the Theatre-Royal in Drury-Lane. Printed before the Play from a ſpurious Copy.

TO-NIGHT a patient ear, ye Britons lend,
And to your great forefathers' deeds attend.
Here, cheaply warn'd, ye bleſt deſcendants view,
What ills on England, civil diſcord drew.
To wound the heart, the martial muſe prepares;
While the red ſcene with raging ſlaughter glares.
Here, while a monarch's ſufferings we relate,
Let generous grief his ruin'd grandeur wait.
While Second Richard's blood for vengeance calls,
Doom'd for his grandſire's guilt, poor Henry falls.
In civil jars avenging judgment blows,
And royal wrongs entail a people's woes.
Henry, unvers'd in wiles, more good than great,
Drew on by meekneſs his diſaſtrous fate.
Thus when you ſee this land by faction toſt,
Her nobles ſlain, her laws, her freedom loſt;
Let this reflection from the action flow,
We ne'er from foreign foes could ruin know.
Oh, let us then inteſtine diſcord ſhun,
We ne'er can be, but by ourſelves, undone!

THE ANIMALCULE;

A TALE.

Occaſioned by his Grace the Duke of Rutland's receiving the Small-pox by Inoculation.

IN animalcules, muſe, diſplay
Spirits, of name unknown in ſong!

Reader, a kind attention pay,
Nor think an useful comment long.

Far less than mites, on mites they prey;
Minutest things my swarms contain:
When o'er your ivory teeth they sway,
Then throb your little nerves with pain.

Fluids, in drops, minutely swell;
These subtile beings each contains;
In the small sanguine globes they dwell,
Roll from the heart and trace the veins.

Through every tender tube they rove,
In finer spirits strike the brain;
Wind quick through every fibrous grove,
And seek, through pores, the heart again.

If they with purer drops dilate,
And lodge where entity began,
They actuate with a genial heat,
And kindle into future man.

But, when our lives are nature's due,
Air, seas, nor fire, their frames dissolve
They matter, through all forms, pursue,
And oft to genial heats revolve.

Thus once an animalcule prov'd,
When man, a patron to the bays;
This patron was in Greece belov'd;
Yet fame was faithless to his praise.

In Rome this animalcule grew
Mæcenas, whom the classics rate!
Among the Gauls, it prov'd Richlieu,
In learning, power, and bounty great.

In Britain, Halifax it rose;
(By Halifax, bloom'd Congreve's strains);
And now it rediminish'd glows,
To glide through godlike Rutland's veins.

A plague there is, too many know;
Too seldom perfect cures befal it:
The muse may term it beauty's foe;
In physic, the small-pox we call it.

From Turks we learn this plague t' assuage,
They, by admitting, turn its course:
Their kiss will tame the tumor's rage;
By yielding, they o'ercome the force.

Thus Rutland did its touch invite,
While, watchful in the ambient air,
Thus little, guardian, subtil spright
Did with the poison in repair.

Th' infection from the heart it clears;
Th' infection, now dilated thin,
In pearly pimples but appears,
Expell'd upon the surface skin.

And now it, mouldering, wastes away:
'Tis gone!—doom'd to return no more!
Our animalcule keeps its stay,
And must new labyrinths explore.

And now the noble's thoughts are seen,
Unmark'd, it views his heart's desires!
It now reflects what it has been,
And, rapturous, at his change admires!

Its pristine virtues kept, combine,
To be again in Rutland known
But they, immers'd, no longer shine,
Nor equal, nor increase his own.

TO MRS. ELIZABETH HAYWOOD,

On her Novel, called, "The Rash Resolve."

Doom'd to a fate which damps the poet's flame,
A muse, unfriended, greets thy rising name!
Unvers'd in envy's, or in flattery's phrase,
Greatness she flies, yet merit claims her praise;
Nor will she, at her withering wreath repine,
But smile, if fame and fortune cherish thine.
The sciences in thy sweet genius charm,
And, with their strength, thy sex's softness arm.
In thy full figures, painting's force we find,
As music fires, thy language lifts the mind.
Thy power gives form, and touches into life
The passions imag'd in their bleeding strife:
Contrasted strokes, true art and fancy show,
And lights and shades in lively mixture flow.
Hope attacks fear, and reason, love's controul,
Jealousy wounds, and friendship heals the soul:
Black falsehood wears bright gallantry's disguise,
And the gilt cloud enchants the fair-one's eyes.
Thy dames, in grief and frailties lovely shine,
And when most mortal half appear divine.
If, when some godlike, favourite passion sways,
The willing heart too fatally obeys,
Great minds lament what cruel censure blames,
And ruin'd virtue generous pity claims.
Eliza, still impatient love's powerful queen!
Let love, soft love, exalt each swelling scene.
Arm'd with keen wit, in fame's wide list's advance!
Spain yields in fiction, in politeness France.
Such orient light, as the first poets knew,
Flames from thy thought, and brightens every view!
A strong, a glorious, a luxuriant fire,
Which warms cold wisdom into wild desire!
Thy fable glows so rich through every page,
What mortal's force can the fierce heat assuage?
And yet—but say if ever doom'd to prove
The sad, the dear perplexities of love!
Where seeming transport softens every pain,
Where fancy'd freedom waits the winning chain;
Varying from pangs to visionary joys,
Sweet is the fate, and charms as it destroys!
Say then—if love to sudden rage gives way,
Will the soft passion not resume its sway?
Charming, and charm'd, can love from love retire!
Can a cold convent quench th' unwilling fire?
Precept, if human, may our thoughts refine,
More we admire! but cannot prove divine.

AN APOLOGY TO BRILLANTE,

FOR HAVING LONG OMITTED WRITING IN VERSE.

In Imitation of a certain Mimic of Anacreon.

Can I matchless charms recite?
Source of ever-springing light!
Could I count the vernal flowers,
Count in endless time the hours;

Count the countleſs ſtars above,
Count the captive hearts of love;
Paint the torture of his fire,
Paint the pangs thoſe eyes inſpire!
(Pleaſing torture, thus to ſhine,
Purify'd by fires like thine!)
Then I'd ſtrike the ſounding ſtring!
Then I'd thy perfection ſing.
Myſtic world!—Thou ſomething more!
Wonder of th' Almighty's ſtore!
Nature's depths we oft deſcry,
Oft they're pierc'd by learning's eye;
Thou, if thought on thee would gain,
Prov'ſt (like heaven) enquiry vain.
Charms unequal'd we purſue!
Charms in ſhining throngs we view!
Number'd then could nature's be,
Nature's ſelf were poor to thee.

AN EPISTLE

TO MRS. OLDFIELD, OF THE THEATRE-ROYAL.

While to your charms unequal verſe I raiſe,
Aw'd, I admire, and tremble as I praiſe:
Here art and genius new refinement need,
Liſtening, they gaze, and, as they gaze, recede!
Can art or genius, or their powers combin'd,
But from corporeal organs, ſketch the mind?
When ſound embody'd can with ſhape ſurpriſe,
The muſe may emulate your voice and eyes.
Mark rival arts perfection's point purſue!
Each rivals each, but to excel in you!
The buſt and medal bear the meaning face,
And the proud ſtatue adds the poſture's grace!
Imag'd at length, the bury'd heroine, known,
Still ſeems to wound, to ſmile, or frown in ſtone!
As art would art, or metal ſtone ſurpaſs,
Her ſoul ſtrikes, gleaming through Corinthian braſs!
Serene, the ſaint in ſmiling ſilver ſhines,
And cherubs weep in gold o'er ſainted ſhrines!
If long-loſt forms from Raphael's pencil glow,
Wondrous in warmth the mimic colours flow!
Each look, each attitude, new grace diſplays;
Your voice and motion life and muſic raiſe.
Thus Cleopatra in your charms refines;
She lives, ſhe ſpeaks, with force improv'd ſhe ſhines!
Fair, and more fair, you ev'ry grace tranſmit;
Love, learning, beauty, elegance, and wit.
Cæſar, the world's unrival'd maſter, ſir'd,
In her imperial ſoul, his own admir'd!
Philippi's victor wore her winning chain,
And felt not empire's loſs in beauty's gain.
Could the pale heroes your bright influence know,
Or catch the ſilver accents as they flow,
Drawn from dark reſt by your enchanting ſtrain,
Each ſhade were lur'd to life and love again.
Say, ſweet inſpirer! were each annal known,
What living greatneſs ſhines there not your own!
If the griev'd muſe by ſome lov'd empreſs roſe,
New ſtrength, new grace, it to your influence owes!
If power by war diſtinguiſh'd height reveals,
Your nobler pride the wounds of fortune heals!
Then could an empire's cauſe demand your care,
The ſoul, that juſtly thinks, would greatly dare.
Long has feign'd Venus mock'd the muſe's praiſe,
You dart, divine Ophelia! genuine rays!
Warm through thoſe eyes enlivening raptures roll!
Sweet through each ſtriking feature ſtreams your ſoul!
The ſoul's bright meanings heighten beauty's fires:
Your looks, your thonghts, your deeds, each grace inſpires!
Know then, if rank'd with monarchs, here you ſtand,
What fate declines, you from the muſe demand!
Each grace that ſhone of old in each fam'd fair,
Or may in modern dames refinement wear;
Whate'er juſt, emulative thoughts purſue,
Is all confirm'd, is all ador'd in you!
If godlike boſoms pant for power to bleſs,
If 'tis a monarch's glory to redreſs;
In conſcious majeſty you ſhine ſerene,
In thought a heroine, and in act a queen.

VERSES.

OCCASIONED BY READING MR. AARON HILL'S POEM, CALLED "GIDEON."

The lines marked thus ' ' are taken from Gideon.

Let other poets poorly ſing
Their flatteries to the vulgar great!
Her airy flight let wandering fancy wing,
And rival nature's moſt luxuriant ſtore,
To ſwell ſome monſter's pride, who ſhames a ſtate;
Or form a wreath to crown tyrannic power!
Thou, who inform'dſt this clay with active fire!
Do thou, ſupreme of powers! my thoughts refine,
And with thy pureſt heat my ſoul inſpire,
That with Hillarius' worth my verſe may ſhine!
As thy lov'd Gideon once ſet Iſrael free,
So he with ſweet, ſeraphic lays
' Redeems the uſe of captive poetry,' [praiſe.
Which firſt was form'd to ſpeak thy glorious
Moſes, with an enchanting tongue,
Pharoah's juſt overthrow ſublimely ſung!
When Saul and Jonathan in death were laid,
Surviving David felt the ſoftening fire!
And, by the Great Almighty's tuneful aid,
Wak'd into endleſs life his mournful lyre.
Their different thoughts, met in Hillarius' ſong,
Roll in one channel more divinely ſtrong!
With Pindar's fire his verſe's ſpirit flies,
' Wafted in charming muſic through the air!'
Unſtop'd by clouds, it reaches to the ſkies,
And joins with angel's hallelujahs there,
Flows mix'd, and ſweetly ſtrikes th' Almighty's ear.
Rebels ſhould bluſh when they his Gideon ſee!
That Gideon born to ſet his country free.
O that ſuch heroes in each age might riſe,
Brightening through vapours like the morning-ſtar,
Generous to triumph, and in council wiſe!
Gentle in peace, but terrible in war!
When Gideon, Oreb, Hyram, Shimron ſhine
Fierce in the blaze of war as they engage!

Great bard! what energy but thine,
Could reach the vaſt deſcription of their rage?
Or when, to cruel foes betray'd,
Sareph and Hamar call for aid,
Loſt, and bewilder'd in deſpair,
How piercing are the hapleſs lover's cries!
What tender ſtrokes in melting accents riſe!
Oh, what a maſterpiece of pity's there?
Nor goodly Joah ſhows thy ſweetneſs leſs,
When, like kind heaven, he frees them from diſtreſs!

Hail thou, whoſe verſe, a living image, ſhines,
In Gideon's character your own you drew!
As there the graceful patriot ſhines,
We in that image bright Hillarius view!
Let the low crowd, who love unwholeſome fare,
When in thy words the breath of angels flows,
Like groſs-fed ſpirits, ſick in purer air,
Their earthly ſouls by their dull taſte diſcloſe!
Thy dazzling genius ſhines too bright! [light.
And they, like ſpectres, ſhun the ſtreams of
But while in ſhades of ignorance they ſtray,
Round thee rays of knowledge play,
And ſhow thee glittering in abſtracted day.'

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

BESSY, COUNTESS OF ROCHFORD,

Daughter of the late Earl Rivers—when with Child.

As when the ſun walks forth in flaming gold,
Mean plants may ſmile, and humble flowers unfold,
The low-laid lark the diſtant æther wings,
And, as ſhe ſoars, her daring anthem ſings;
So, when thy charms celeſtial views create,
My ſmiling ſong ſurmounts my gloomy fate.
Thy angel-embryo prompts my towering lays,
Claims my fond wiſh, and fires my future praiſe:
May it, if male, its grandſire's image wear;
Or in its mother's charms confeſs the fair;
At the kind birth may each mild planet wait;
Soft be the pain, but prove the bleſſing great. [reſt!
Hail, Rivers! hallow'd ſhade! deſcend from
Deſcend and ſmile, to ſee thy Rochford bleſt: [run,
Weep not the ſcenes through which my life muſt
Though fate, fleet-footed, ſcents thy languid ſon.
The bar that, darkening, croſs'd my creſted claim,
Yields at her charms, and brightens in their flame:
That blood which, honour'd, in thy Rochford reigns,
In cold, unwilling wanderings trac'd my veins.
Want's wintery realm froze hard around my view;
And ſcorn's keen blaſts a cutting anguiſh blew.
To ſuch ſad weight my gathering griefs were wrought, [thought!
Life ſeem'd not life, but when convuls'd with
Decreed beneath a mother's frown to pine,
Madneſs were eaſe, to miſery form'd like mine!
Yet my muſe waits thee through the realms of day,
Where lambent lightnings round thy temples play.
Sure my fierce woes will, like thoſe fires, refine,
Thus loſe their torture, and thus glorious ſhine!
And now the muſe heaven's milky path ſurveys,
With thee, 'twixt pendent worlds, it wondering ſtrays,
Worlds which, unnumber'd as thy virtues, roll
Round ſuns—fix'd, radiant emblems of thy ſoul!
Hence lights refracted run through diſtant ſkies,
Changeful on azure plains in quivering dyes!
So thy mind darted through its earthy frame,
A wide, a various, and a glittering flame.
Now a new ſcene enormous luſtre brings,
Now ſeraphs ſhade thee round with ſilver wings;
In angel-forms thou ſeeſt thy Rochford ſhine;
In each ſweet form is trac'd her beauteous line!
Such was her ſoul, ere this ſelected mould
Sprung at thy wiſh, the ſparkling life t' infold!
So amidſt cherubs ſhone her ſon refin'd,
Are infant-fleſh the new-form'd ſoul enſhrin'd!
So ſhall a ſequent race from Rochford riſe,
The world's fair pride—deſcendants of the ſkies.

TO THE EXCELLENT MIRANDA,

CONSORT OF AARON HILL, ESQ. ON READING HER POEMS.

Each ſoftening charm of Clio's ſmiling ſong,
Montague's ſoul, which ſhines divinely ſtrong,
Theſe blend, with graceful eaſe, to form thy rhyme,
Tender yet chaſte; ſweet-ſounding, yet ſublime;
Wiſdom and wit have made thy works their care;
Each paſſion glows, refin'd by precept, there:
To fair Miranda's form each grace is kind;
The muſes and the virtues tune thy mind.

VERSES TO A YOUNG LADY.

Polly, from me, though now a love-ſick youth,
Nay, though a poet, hear the voice of truth!
Polly, you're not a beauty, yet you're pretty;
So grave, yet gay; ſo ſilly, yet ſo witty;
A heart of ſoftneſs, yet a tongue of ſatire;
You've cruelty, yet, ev'n with that, good nature:
Now you are free, and now reſerv'd awhile;
Now a forc'd frown betrays a willing ſmile.
Reproach'd for abſence, yet your ſight deny'd;
My tongue you ſilence, yet my ſilence chide.
How would you chide me, ſhould your ſex defame!
Yet, ſhould they praiſe, grow jealous, and exclaim.
If I deſpair, with ſome kind look you bleſs;
But if I hope, at once all hope ſuppreſs.
You ſcorn; yet ſhould my paſſion change, or fail,
Too late you'd whimper out a ſofter tale.
You love; yet from your lover's wiſh retire;
Doubt, yet diſcern; deny, and yet deſire.
Such, Polly, are your ſex—part truth, part fiction,
Some thought, much whim, and all a contradiction.

THE GENTLEMAN.

ADDRESSED TO JOHN JOLIFFE, ESQ.

A decent mein, an elegance of dreſs,
Words, which, at eaſe, each winning grace expreſs;
A life, where love, by wiſdom poliſh'd, ſhines,
Where wiſdom's ſelf again, by love, refines;
Where we to chance for friendſhip never truſt,
Nor ever dread from ſudden whim diſguſt;
To ſocial manners, and the heart humane;
A nature ever great, and never vain;
A wit, that no licentious pertneſs knows;
The ſenſe, that unaſſuming candour ſhows;

Reaſon, by narrow principles uncheck'd,
Slave to no party, bigot to no ſect;
Knowledge of various life, of learning too;
Thence taſte; thence truth, which will from taſte
enſue:
Unwilling cenſure, though a judgment clear;
A ſmile indulgent, and that ſmile ſincere;
An humble, though an elevated mind;
A pride, its pleaſure but to ſerve mankind:
If theſe eſteem and admiration raiſe;
Give true delight, and gain unflattering praiſe,
In one wiſh'd view, th' accompliſh'd man we ſee;
Theſe graces all are thine, and thou art he.

CHARACTER

OF THE REV. JAMES FOSTER.

* * * * * * *
* * * * * * *
* * * * * * *
* * * * * * *

From Codex hear, ye eccleſiaſtic men,
This paſtoral charge to Webſter, Stebbing, Ven;
Attend, ye emblems of your P———'s mind!
Mark faith, mark hope, mark charity, defin'd;
On terms, whence no ideas ye can draw,
Pin well your faith, and then pronounce it law;
Firſt wealth, a croſier next, your hope enflame;
And next church-power—a power o'er conſcience,
claim;
In modes of worſhip right of choice deny;
Say, to convert, all means are fair;—add, why?
'Tis charitable—let your power decree,
That perſecution then is charity;
Call reaſon error; forms, not things, diſplay;
Let moral doctrine to abſtruſe give way;
Sink demonſtration; myſtery preach alone;
Be thus religion's friend, and thus your own.
But Foſter well this honeſt truth extends—
Where myſtery begins, religion ends.
In him, great modern miracle! we ſee
A prieſt, from avarice and ambition free;
One, whom no perſecuting ſpirit fires;
Whoſe heart and tongue benevolence inſpires:
Learn'd, not aſſuming; eloquent, yet plain;
Meek, though not timorous; conſcious, though
not vain;
Without craft, reverend; holy, without cant;
Zealous for truth, without enthuſiaſt rant.
His faith, where no credulity is ſeen,
'Twixt infidel and bigot, marks the mean;
His hope, no mitre militant on earth,
'Tis that bright crown, which heaven reſerves for worth.
A prieſt, in charity with all mankind,
His love to virtue, not to ſect confin'd:
Truth his delight; from him it flames abroad,
From him, who fears no being, but his God.
In him from Chriſtian, moral light can ſhine;
Not mad with myſtery, but a ſound divine;
He wins the wiſe and good, with reaſon's lore;
Then ſtrikes their paſſions with pathetic power;
Where vice erects her head, rebukes the page;
Mix'd with rebuke, perſuaſive charms engage;
Charms, which th' unthinking muſt to thought
excite;
Lo! vice leſs vicious! virtue more upright:
Him copy, Codex, that the good and wiſe,
Who ſo abhor thy heart, and head deſpiſe,
May ſee thee now, though late, redeem thy name,
And glorify what elſe is damn'd to fame.
But ſhould ſome churchman, apeing wit ſevere,
The poet's ſure turn'd Baptiſt---ſay, and ſneer;
Shame on that narrow mind ſo often known,
Which in one mode of faith, owns worth alone.
Sneer on, rail, wrangle! nought this truth repels---
Virtue is virtue, whereſoe'er ſhe dwells;
And ſure, where learning gives her light to ſhine,
Her's is all praiſe---if her's, 'tis Foſter, thine.
Thee boaſt diſſenters; we with pride may own
Our Tillotſon; and Rome, her Fenelon *.

THE POET'S DEPENDANCE

ON A STATESMAN.

Some ſeem to hint, and others proof will bring,
That, from neglect, my numerous hardſhips ſpring.
Seek the great man! they cry---'tis then decreed,
In him, if I court fortune, I ſucceed.
What friends to ſecond? who for me ſhould ſue,
Have intereſts, partial to themſelves, in view.
They own my matchleſs fate compaſſion draws;
They all wiſh well, lament, but drop my cauſe.
There are who aſk no penſion, want no place,
No title wiſh, and would accept no grace.
Can I entreat, they ſhould for me obtain
The leaſt, who greateſt for themſelves diſdain?
A ſtateſman, knowing this, unkind, will cry,
Thoſe love him: let thoſe ſerve him:—why
ſhould I?
Say, ſhall I turn where lucre points my views;
At firſt deſert my friends, at length abuſe?
But, on leſs terms, in promiſe he complies:
Years bury years, and hopes on hopes ariſe;
I truſt, am truſted on my fairy gain;
And woes on woes attend, an endleſs train.
Be poſts diſpos'd at will!—I have, for theſe,
No gold to plead, no impudence to teaze.
All ſecret ſervice from my ſoul I hate;
All dark intrigues of pleaſure, or of ſtate.
I have no power, election-votes to gain;
No will to hackney out polemic ſtrain;
To ſhape, as time ſhall ſerve, my verſe, or proſe,
To flatter thence, nor ſlur, a courtier's foes;
Nor him to daub with praiſe, if I prevail;
Nor ſhock'd by him with libels to aſſail.
Where theſe are not, what claim to me belongs?
Though mine the muſe and virtue, birth and wrongs.
Where lives the ſtateſman, ſo in honour clear,
To give where he has nought to hope, nor fear?

---

* In this character of the Rev James Foſter, truth guided the pen of the muſe. Mr. Pope paid a tribute to the modeſt worth of this excellent man: little did he imagine his Rev. Annotator would endeavour to convert his praiſe into abuſe. The character and writings of Foſter will be admired and read, when the works of the bitter controverſialiſt are forgotten.

No!—there to seek, is but to find fresh pain:
The promise broke, renew'd, and broke again;
To be, as humour deigns, receiv'd, refus'd;
By turns affronted, and by turns amus'd;
To lose that time, which worthier thoughts require;
To lose the health, which should those thoughts inspire;
To starve and hope; or, like camelions, fare
On ministerial faith, which means but air.
But still, undrooping, I the crew disdain,
Who, or by jobs, or libels, wealth obtain.
Ne'er let me be, through those, from want exempt;
In one man's favour, in the world's contempt:
Worse in my own!—through those, to posts who rise,
Themselves, in secret, must themselves despise;
Vile, and more vile, till they, at length, disclaim
Not sense alone of glory, but of shame.
What though I hourly see the servile herd,
For meanness honour'd, and for guilt preser'd;
See selfish passion, public virtue seem;
And public virtue an enthusiast dream;
See favour'd falsehood, innocence belied,
Meekness depress'd, and power-elated pride;
A scene will show, all-righteous vision haste;
The meek exalted, and the proud debas'd!—
Oh, to be there!—to tread that friendly shore,
Where falsehood, pride, and statesmen are no more!
But ere indulg'd—ere fate my breath shall claim,
A poet still is anxious after fame.
What future fame would my ambition crave?
This were my wish—could ought my memory save,
Say, when in death my sorrows lie repos'd,
That my past life no venal view disclos'd;
Say, I well knew, while in a state obscure,
Without the being base, the being poor;
Say, I had parts, too moderate to transcend:
Yet sense to mean, and virtue not t' offend;
My heart supplying what my head denied,
Say that, by Pope esteem'd I liv'd and died;
Whose writings the best rules to write could give;
Whose life the nobler science how to live.

AN EPISTLE

TO DAMON AND DELIA.

Hear Damon, Delia hear, in candid lays,
Truth without anger, without flattery, praise!
A bookish mind, with pedantry unfraught,
Of a sedate, yet never gloomy thought:
Prompt to rejoice, when others pleasure know,
And prompt to feel the pang for others woe;
To soften faults, to which a foe is prone,
And, in a friend's perfection, praise your own;
A will sincere, unknown to selfish views;
A heart of love, of gallantry a muse;
A delicate, yet not a jealous mind;
A passion ever fond, yet never blind,
Glowing with amorous, yet with guiltless fires,
In ever-eager, never gross desires:
A modest honour, sacred to contain
From tattling vanity, when smiles you gain;
Constant, most pleas'd when beauty most you please:
Damon! your picture's shown in tints like these.
Say, Delia! must I chide you or commend?
Say, must I be your flatterer or your friend?
To praise no graces in a rival fair,
Nor your own foibles in a sister spare;
Each lover's billet, bantering, to reveal,
And never know one secret to conceal;
Young, fickle, fair, a levity inborn,
To treat all sighing slaves with flippant scorn;
An eye, expressive of a wandering mind:
Nor this to read, nor that to think inclin'd;
Or when a book, or thought, from whim retards,
Intent on songs or novels, dress or cards;
Choice to select the party of delight,
To kill time, thought, and fame, in frolic flight;
To flutter here, to flurry there on wing;
To talk, to teaze, to simper, or to sing;
To prude it, to coquet it—him to trust,
Whose vain, loose life, should caution or disgust;
Him to dislike, whose modest worth should please.—
Say, is your picture shown in tints like these?
Your's!—you deny it—Hear the point then tried,
Let judgment, truth, the muse, and love decide.
What your's!—Nay, fairest trifler, frown not so:
Is it? the muse with doubt—Love answers no:
You smile—Is't not? Again the question try!—
Yes, judgment thinks, and truth will yes, reply.

TO MISS M H*,

SENT WITH MR. POPE'S WORKS.

See female vice and female folly here,
Raillied with wit polite, or lash'd severe:
Let Pope present such objects to our view;
Such are, my fair, the full reverse of you.
Rapt when, to Loddon's stream * from Windsor's shades,
He sings the modest charms of sylvan maids;
Dear Burford's hills in memory's eye appear,
And Luddal's spring † still murmurs in my ear:
But when you cease to bless my longing eyes,
Dumb is the spring, the joyless prospect dies:
Come then, my charmer, come! here transport reigns!
New health, new youth, inspirits all my veins.
Each hour let intercourse of hearts employ,
Thou life of loveliness! thou soul of joy!
Love wakes the bird—oh, hear each melting lay!
Love warms the world—come charmer, come away!
But hark!—immortal Pope resumes the lyre!
Diviner airs, diviner flights, inspire:
Hark where an angel's language tunes the line!
See where the thoughts and looks of angels shine!
Here he pour'd all the music of your tongue,
And all your looks and thoughts, unconscious, sung.

* Alluding to the beautiful Episode of Loddona, in Windsor Forest.

ON THE RECOVERY OF

A LADY OF QUALITY

From the Small-Pox.

Long a lov'd fair had bleſs'd her conſort's ſight
With amorous pride, and undiſturb'd delight;
Till death, grown envious with repugnant aim,
Frown'd at their joys, and urg'd a tyrant's claim.
He ſummons each diſeaſe!---the noxious crew,
Writhing, in dire diſtortions, ſtrike his view!
From various plagues, which various natures know,
Forth ruſhes beauty's fear'd and fervent foe.
Fierce to the fair, the miſſile miſchief flies,
The ſanguine ſtreams in raging ferments riſe!
It drives, ignipotent, through every vein,
Hangs on the heart, and burns around the brain!
Now a chill damp the charmer's luſtre dims!
Sad o'er her eyes the livid languor ſwims!
Her eyes, that with a glance could joy inſpire,
Like ſetting ſtars, ſcarce ſhoot a glimmering fire.
Here ſtands her conſort, ſore, with anguiſh, preſt,
Grief in his eye, and terror in his breaſt.
The Paphian graces, ſmit with anxious care,
In ſilent ſorrow weep the waining fair.
Eight ſuns, ſucceſſive, roll their fire away,
And eight ſlow nights ſee their deep ſhades decay.
While theſe revolve, though mute each muſe appears,
Each ſpeaking eye drops eloquence in tears.
On the ninth noon, great Phœbus, liſtening bends!
On the ninth noon, each voice in prayer aſcends!---
Great god of light, of ſong, and phyſic's art,
Reſtore the languid fair, new ſoul impart!
Her beauty, wit, and virtue claim thy care,
And thine own bounty's almoſt rival'd there.
Each paus'd. The god aſſents. Would death advance?
Phœbus, unſeen, arreſts the threatening lance!
Down from his orb a vivid influence ſtreams,
And quickening earth imbibes ſalubrious beams;
Each balmy plant, increaſe of virtue knows,
And art, inſpir'd, with all her patron, glows.
The charmer's opening eye, kind hope, reveals,
Kind hope, her conſort's breaſt enlivening feels.
Each grace revives, each muſe reſumes the lyre,
Each beauty brightens with re-lumin'd fire.
As health's auſpicious powers gay life diſplay,
Death, ſullen at the ſight, ſtalks ſlow away.

THE FRIEND.

AN EPISTLE TO AARON HILL, ESQUIRE.

O my lov'd Hill, O thou by heaven deſign'd
To charm, to mend, and to adorn mankind!
To thee my hopes, fears, joys, and ſorrows tend,
Thou brother, father, nearer yet!---thou friend!
If worldly friendſhips oft cement, divide,
As intereſts vary, or as whims preſide;
If leagues of luxury borrow friendſhip's light,
Or leagues ſubverſive of all ſocial right:
O ſay, my Hill, in what propitious ſphere,
Gain we the friend, pure, knowing, and ſincere?
'Tis where the worthy and the wiſe retire;
There wealth may learn its uſe, may love inſpire;
There may young worth, the nobleſt end obtain,
In want my friends, in friends may knowledge gain;
In knowledge bliſs; for wiſdom virtue finds,
And brightens mortal to immortal minds.
Kind then my wrongs, if love, like yours, ſucceed;
For you, like virtue, are a friend indeed.
Oft when you ſaw my youth wild error know,
Reproof, ſoft-hinted, taught the bluſh to glow.
Young and unform'd, you firſt my genius rais'd,
Juſt ſmil'd when faulty; and when moderate prais'd.
Me ſhun'd, me ruin'd, ſuch a mother's rage!
You ſung, till pity wept o'er every page.
You call'd my lays and wrongs to early fame;
Yet, yet, th' obdurate mother felt no ſhame.
Pierc'd as I was! your counſel ſoften'd care,
To eaſe turn'd anguiſh, and to hope deſpair.
The man who never wound afflictive feels,
He never felt the balmy worth that heals.
Welcome the wound, when bleſt with ſuch relief!
For deep is felt the friend, when felt in grief.
From you ſhall never, but with life, remove
Aſpiring genius, condeſcending love.
When ſome, with cold, ſuperior looks, redreſs,
Relief ſeems inſult, and confirms diſtreſs;
You, when you view the man with wrongs beſieg'd,
While warm you act th' obliger, ſeem th' oblig'd.
All-winning mild to each of lowly ſtate;
To equals free, unſervile to the great;
Greatneſs you honour, when by worth acquir'd;
Worth is by worth in every rank admir'd
Greatneſs you ſcorn, when titles inſult ſpeak;
Proud to vain pride, to honour'd meekneſs meek
That worthleſs bliſs, which others court, you fly;
That worthy woe, they ſhun, attracts your eye.
But ſhall the muſe reſound alone your praiſe;
No—let the public friend exalt her lays!
O trace that friend with me!—he's your's!—he's mine!—
The world's—beneficent behold him ſhine!
Is wealth his ſphere? If riches, like a tide,
From either India pour their golden pride;
Rich in good works, him others wants employ;
He gives the widow's heart to ſing for joy.
To orphans, priſoners, ſhall his bounty flow;
The weeping family of want and woe.
Is knowledge his? Benevolently great,
In leiſure active, and in care ſedate;
What aid, his little wealth perchance denies,
In each hard inſtance his advice ſupplies.
With modeſt truth he ſets the wandering right;
And gives religion pure, primæval light;
In love diffuſive, as in light refin'd,
The liberal emblem of his Maker's mind.
Is power his orb? He then, like power divine,
On all, though with a varied ray, will ſhine.
Ere power was his, the man he once careſs'd,
Meets the ſame faithful ſmile, and mutual breaſt:
But aſk his friend ſome dignity of ſtate;
His friend, unequal to th' incumbent weight?
Aſks it a ſtranger, one whom parts inſpire
With all a people's welfare would require?

His choice admits no pauſe; his gift will prove
All private, well abſorb'd in public love.
He ſhields his country, when for aid ſhe calls;
Or, ſhould ſhe fall, with her he greatly falls:
But, as proud Rome, with guilty conqueſt crown'd,
Spread ſlavery, death and deſolation round,
Should e'er his country, for dominion's prize,
Againſt the ſons of men a faction riſe,
Glory in hers, is in his eye diſgrace;
The friend of truth; the friend of human race.
Thus to no one, no ſect, no clime confin'd,
His boundleſs love embraces all mankind;
And all their virtues in his life are known;
And all their joys and ſorrows are his own.
These are the lights, where ſtands that friend conſeſt;
This, this the ſpirit, which informs thy breaſt.
Through fortune's cloud thy genuine worth can ſhine; [thine?
What would'ſt thou not, were wealth and greatneſs

AN EPISTLE

TO MR. JOHN DYER, AUTHOR OF GRONGAR-HILL,

*In Anſwer to his from the Country .

Now various birds in melting concert ſing,
And hail the beauty of the opening ſpring:
Now to thy dreams the nightingale complains,
Till the lark wakes thee with her cheerful ſtrains;
Wakes, in thy verſe and friendſhip ever kind,
Melodious comfort to my jarring mind. [ſee,
Oh could my ſoul through depths of knowledge
Could I read nature and mankind like thee,
I ſhould o'ercome, or bear the ſhocks of fate,
And e'en draw envy to the humbleſt ſtate.
Thou canſt raiſe honour from each ill event,
From ſhocks gain vigour, and from want content.
Think not light poetry my life's chief care!
The muſe's manſion is, at beſt, but air;
But, if more ſolid works my meaning forms,
Th' unfiniſh'd ſtructures fall by fortune's ſtorms.
Oft have I ſaid we falſely thoſe accuſe,
Whoſe godlike ſouls life's middle ſtate refuſe.
Self-love, I cry'd, there ſeeks ignoble reſt;
Care ſleeps not calm, when millions wake unbleſt;
Mean let me ſhrink, or ſpread ſweet ſhade o'er all,
Low as the ſhrub, or as the cedar tall!—
'Twas vain! 'twas wild!—I ſought the middle ſtate,
And found the good, and found the truly great.
Though verſe can never give my ſoul her aim;
Though action only claims ſubſtantial fame;
Though fate denies what my proud wants require,
Yet grant me, heaven, by knowledge to aſpire:
Thus to inquiry let me prompt the mind;
Thus clear dimm'd truth, and bid her bleſs mankind;
From the pierc'd orphan thus draw ſhafts of grief!
Arm want with patience, and teach wealth relief!
To ſerve lov'd liberty inſpire my breath!
Or, if my life be uſeleſs, grant me death;
For he, who uſeleſs is in life ſurvey'd,
Burthens that world, his duty bids him aid.

* See Dyer's Poems.

Say, what have honours to allure the mind,
Which he gains moſt, who leaſt has ſerv'd mankind?
Titles, when worn by fools, I dare deſpiſe;
Yet they claim homage, when they crown the wiſe.
When high diſtinction marks deſerving heirs,
Deſert ſtill dignifies the mark it wears.
But, who to birth alone would honours owe?
Honours, if true, from ſeeds of merit grow.
Thoſe trees, with ſweeteſt charms, invite our eyes,
Which, from our own engraftment, fruitful riſe.
Still we love beſt what we with labour gain,
As the child's dearer for the mother's pain.
The great I would not envy nor deride;
Nor ſtoop to ſwell a vain ſuperior's pride;
Nor view an equal's hope with jealous eyes;
Nor cruſh the wretch beneath who wailing lies.
My ſympathizing breaſt his grief can feel,
And my eye weep the wound I cannot heal.
Ne'er among friendſhips let me ſow debate,
Nor by another's fall advance my ſtate;
Nor miſuſe wit againſt an abſent friend:
Let me the virtues of a foe defend! [weight;
In wealth and want true minds preſerve their
Meek, though exalted; though diſgrac'd, elate;
Generous and grateful, wrong'd or help'd they live;
Grateful to ſerve, and generous to forgive.
This may they learn, who cloſe thy life attend;
Which, dear in memory, ſtill inſtructs thy friend.
Though cruel diſtance bars my groſſer eye,
My ſoul, clear-ſighted, draws thy virtue nigh;
Through her deep woe that quickening comfort gleams,
And lights up fortitude with friendſhip's beams.

VERSES

OCCASIONED BY THE VICE-PRINCIPAL OF ST. MARY-HALL, OXFORD.

Being preſented by the Honourable Mrs. Knight, to the Living of Godſfield in Eſſex.

While by mean arts and meaner patrons riſe
Prieſts, whom the learned and the good deſpiſe;
This ſees fair Knight, in whoſe tranſcendent mind,
Are wiſdom, purity, and truth enſhrin'd.
A modeſt merit now ſhe plans to lift,
Thy living, Godsfield! falls her inſtant gift.
Let me (ſaid ſhe) reward alone the wiſe,
And make the church-revenue virtue's prize.
She ſought the man of honeſt, candid breaſt,
In faith, in works of goodneſs, full expreſt;
Though young, yet tutoring academic youth
To ſcience moral, and religious truth.
She ſought where the diſintereſted friend,
The ſcholar, ſage, and free companion blend;
The pleaſing poet, and the deep divine, [thine.
She ſought, ſhe found, and, Hart! the prize was

FULVIA.

A POEM.

Let Fulvia's wiſdom be a ſlave to will,
Her darling paſſions, ſcandal and quadrille;
On friends and foes her tongue a ſatire knows,
Her deeds a ſatire on herſelf alone.

On her poor kindred deigns she word or look?
'Tis cold respect, or 'tis unjust rebuke;
Worse when good-natur'd, than when most severe:
The jest impure then pains the modest ear.
How just the sceptic! the divine how odd!
What turns of wit play smartly on her god!
The fates, my nearest kindred, foes decree:
Fulvia, when piqu'd at them, strait pities me.
She, like Benevolence, a smile bestows,
Favours to me indulge her spleen to those.
The banquet serv'd, with peeresses I sit:
She tells my story, and repeats my wit.
With mouth distorted, through a sounding nose
It comes, now homeliness more homely grows.
With see-saw sounds, and nonsense not my own,
She skrews her features, and she cracks her tone.
How fine your bastard! why so soft a strain?
What, such a mother? satirise again!
Oft I object—but fix'd is Fulvia's will—
Ah! though unkind, she is my mother still!
The verse now flows, the manuscript she claims.
'Tis fam'd—The fame each curious fair enflames:
The wild-fire runs; from copy, copy grows:
The Brets, alarm'd, a separate peace propose.
'Tis ratified—How alter'd Fulvia's look!
My wit's degraded, and my cause forsook.
Thus she: What's poetry but to amuse?
Might I advise—there are more solid views.
With a cool air she adds: This tale is old:
Were it my case, it should no more be told.
Complaints—had I been worthy to advise—
You know—But when are wits, like women, wise?
True it may take; but, think whate'er you list,
All love the satire, none the satirist.
I start, I stare, stand fix'd, then pause a while;
Then hesitate, then ponder well, then smile.
Madam—a pension lost—and where's amends!
Sir, (she replies) indeed you'll lose your friends.
Why did I start? 'twas but a change of wind—
Or the same thing—the lady chang'd her mind.
I bow, depart, despise, discern her all:
Nanny revisits, and disgrac'd I fall.
Let Fulvia's friendship whirl with every whim!
A reed, a weathercock, a shade, a dream:
No more the friendship shall be now display'd
By weathercock, or reed, or dream, or shade;
To Nanny fix'd unvarying shall it tend,
For souls, so form'd alike, were form'd to blend.

EPITAPH ON A YOUNG LADY.

Clos'd are those eyes that beam'd seraphic fire;
Cold is that breast which gave the world desire;
Mute is the voice where winning softness warm'd,
Where music melted, and where wisdom charm'd,
And lively wit, which, decently confin'd,
No prude e'er thought impure, no friend unkind.
Could modest knowledge, fair untrifling youth,
Persuasive reason and endearing truth,
Could honour, shown in friendships most refin'd,
And sense, that shields th' attempted virtuous mind;
The social temper never known to strife,
The heightening graces that embellish life;
Could these have e'er the darts of death defied,
Never, ah! never had Melinda died;
Nor can she die—ev'n now survives her name,
Immortaliz'd by friendship, love, and fame.

THE GENIUS OF LIBERTY.

A POEM.

OCCASIONED BY THE DEPARTURE OF THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF ORANGE.

(Written in the Year 1734.)

Mild rose the morn! the face of nature bright
Wore one extensive smile of calm and light;
Wide, o'er the land, did hovering silence reign,
Wide o'er the blue diffusion of the main;
When lo! before me, on the southern shore,
Stood forth the power, whom Albion's sons adore;
Blest Liberty! whose charge is Albion's isle;
Whom reason gives to bloom, and truth to smile;
Gives peace to gladden, sheltering law to spread,
Learning to lift aloft her laurel'd head,
Rich industry to view, with pleasing eyes,
Her fleets, her cities, and her harvests rise.
In curious emblems every art, express,
Glow'd from the loom, and brighten'd on his vest.
Science in various lights attention won,
Wav'd on his robe, and glitter'd in the sun.
My words, he cried, my word observance claim:
Resound, ye muses; and receive them, fame!
Here was my station, when, o'er ocean wide,
The great, third William, stretch'd his naval pride:
I with my sacred influence swell'd his soul;
Th' enslav'd to see, th' enslaver to controul.
In vain did waves disperse, and winds detain:
He came, he sav'd; in his was seen my reign.
How just, how great, the plan his soul design'd,
To humble tyrants, and secure mankind!
Next Marlborough in his steps successful trod:
This, godlike plann'd; that, finish'd like a god!
And, while oppression fled to realms unknown,
Europe was free, and Britain glorious shone.
Where Nassau's race extensive growth display'd,
There freedom ever found a sheltering shade.
Still heaven is kind!—See, from the princely root,
Millions to bless, the BRANCH auspicious shoot!
He lives, he flourishes, his honours spread;
Fair virtues blooming on his youthful head:
Nurse him, ye heavenly dews, ye sunny rays,
Into firm health, fair fame, and length of days!
He paus'd, and casting o'er the deep his eye,
Where the last billow swells into the sky,
Where, in gay vision, round th' horizon's line,
The moving clouds with various beauty shine;
As dropping from their bosom, ting'd with gold,
Shoots forth a sail, amusive to behold!
Lo! while its light the glowing wave returns,
Broad like a sun the bark approaching burns.
Near, and more near, great Nassau soon he spy'd,
And beauteous Anna, Britain's eldest pride!
Thus spoke the Genius, as advanc'd the sail—
Hail, blooming hero! high-born princess, hail!
Thy charms thy mother's love of truth display,
Her light of virtue, and her beauty's ray;
Her dignity; which, copying the divine,
Soften'd, through condescension, learns to shine.

Greatneſs of thought, with prudence for its guide;
Knowledge, from nature and from art ſupply'd;
To nobleſt objects pointed various ways;
Pointed by judgment's clear, unerring rays.
What manly virtues in her mind excel!
Yet on her heart what tender paſſions dwell!
For ah! what pangs did late her peace deſtroy,
To part with thee, ſo wont to give her joy! [mien!
How heav'd her breaſt, how ſadden'd was her
All in the mother then was loſt the queen.
The ſwelling tear then dimm'd her parting view,
The ſtruggling ſigh ſtopp'd ſhort her laſt adieu:
Ev'n now thy fancied perils fill her mind;
The ſecret rock, rough wave, and riſing wind;
The ſhoal, ſo treacherous, near the tempting land;
Th'ingulphing whirlpool, and the ſwallowing ſand;
Theſe fancied perils all, by day, by night,
In thoughts alarm her, and in dreams affright;
For thee her heart unceaſing love declares,
In doubts, in hopes, in wiſhes, and in prayers!
Her prayers are heard!---For me, 'tis thine to brave
The ſand, the ſhoal, rock, whirlpool, wind, and wave:
Kind ſafety waits, to waft thee gently o'er,
And joy to greet thee on the Belgic ſhore. [tell
May future times, when their fond praiſe would
How moſt their favourite characters excel; [clare,
How bleſt! How great!—then may their ſongs de-
So great! ſo bleſt!---ſuch Anne and Naſſau were.

E GRÆCO RUF.

Qui te videt beatus eſt,
Beatior qui te audiet,
Qui baſiat ſemideus eſt,
Qui te potitur eſt Deus. BUCHANAN.

THE FOREGOING LINES PARAPHRASED.

HAPPY the man, who, in thy ſparkling eyes,
His amorous wiſhes ſees, reflecting, play;
Sees little laughing Cupids, glancing, riſe,
And, in ſoft-ſwimming languor, die away.

Still happier he! to whom thy meanings roll,
In ſounds which love, harmonious love, inſpire;
On his charm'd ear ſits, rapt, his liſtening ſoul,
Till admiration form intenſe deſire.

Half-deity is he who warm may preſs
Thy lip, ſoft-ſwelling to the kindling kiſs;
And may that lip aſſentive warmth expreſs,
Till love draw willing love to ardent bliſs!

Circling thy waiſt, and circled in thy arms,
Who, melting on thy mutual melting breaſt,
Entranc'd enjoys love's whole luxurious charms,
Is all a God!---is of all heaven poſſeſt.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF BEAUTY.

A POEM.

Addreſſed to Mrs. Bridget Jones, a young Widow Lady of Llanelly, Caermarthenſhire.

ONCE beauty, wiſhing fond deſire to move,
Contriv'd to catch the heart of wandering love.
Come, pureſt atoms! beauty aid implores;
For new ſoft texture leave æthereal ſtores.
They come, they crowd, the ſhining hues unfold;
Be their's a form, which beauty's ſelf ſhall mould!
To mould my charmer's form ſhe all apply'd---
Whence Cambria boaſts the birth of Nature's pride.

She calls the Graces---Such is beauty's ſtate,
Prompt, at her call, th' obedient Graces wait.
Firſt your fair feet they ſhape, and ſhape to pleaſe;
Each ſtands deſign'd for dignity and eaſe.
Firm, on theſe curious pedeſtals, depend
Two poliſh'd pillars; which, as fair, aſcend;
From well wrought knees, more fair, more large, they riſe;
Seen by the muſe, though hid from mortal eyes.
More poliſh'd yet, your fabric each ſuſtains;
That pureſt temple where perfection reigns,
A ſmall, ſweet circle forms your faultleſs waiſt,
By beauty ſhap'd, to be by love embrac'd.
Beyond that leſſening waiſt, two orbs deviſe,
What ſwelling charms, in fair proportion, riſe!
Freſh peeping there, two bluſhing buds are found,
Each like a roſe, which lilies white ſurround.
There feeling ſenſe, let pitying ſighs inſpire,
Till panting pity ſwells to warm deſire:
Deſire, though warm, is chaſte; each warmeſt kiſs,
All rapture chaſte, when Hymen bids the bliſs.
Rounding and ſoft, two taper arms deſcend;
Two ſnow-white hands, in taper fingers, end.
Lo! cunning beauty, on each palm, deſigns
Love's fortune and your own, in myſtic lines;
And lovely whiteneſs, either arm contains,
Diverſified with azure wandering veins;
The wandering veins conceal a generous flood,
The purple treaſure of celeſtial blood.
Rounding and white your neck, as curious, rears
O'er all a face, where beauty's ſelf appears.
Her ſoft attendants ſmooth the ſpotleſs ſkin,
And, ſmoothly oval, turn the ſhapely chin;
The ſhapely chin, to beauty's riſing face,
Shall, doubling gently, give a double grace,
And ſoon ſweet opening, roſy lips diſcloſe
The well rang'd teeth, in lily-whitening rows;
Here life is breath'd, and florid life aſſumes
A breath, whoſe fragrance vies with vernal blooms;
And two fair cheeks give modeſty to raiſe
A beauteous bluſh at praiſe, though juſt the praiſe.
And nature now, from each kind ray, ſupplies
Soft, clement ſmiles, and love-inſpiring eyes;
New graces, to thoſe eyes, mild ſhades, allow;
Fringe their fair lids, and pencil either brow.
While ſenſe of viſion lights up orbs ſo rare,
May none, but pleaſing objects, viſit there!
Two little porches, (which, one ſenſe empowers,
To draw rich ſcent from aromatic flowers)
In ſtructure neat, and deck'd with poliſh'd grace,
Shall equal firſt, then heighten, beauty's face.
To ſmelling ſenſe, oh, may the flowery year,
Its firſt, laſt, choiceſt incenſe, offer here!
Tranſparent next, two curious creſcents bound
The two-fold entrance of inſpiring ſound,
And, granting a new power of ſenſe to hear,
New finer organs form each curious ear;
Form to imbibe what moſt the ſoul can move,
Muſic and reaſon, poeſy and love.

Next, on an open front, is pleasing wrought
A pensive sweetness, born of patient thought:
Above your lucid shoulders locks display'd,
Prone to descend, shall soften light with shade.
All, with a nameless air and mein, unite,
And, as you move, each movement is delight.
Tun'd is your melting tongue and equal mind,
At once by knowledge heighten'd and refin'd.
The virtues next to beauty's nod incline;
For, where they lend not light, she cannot shine;
Let these, the temperate sense of taste reveal,
And give, while nature spreads the simple meal.
The palate pure, to relish health design'd,
From luxury as taintless as your mind.
The virtues, chastity and truth, impart,
And mould to sweet benevolence your heart.
Thus beauty finish'd—Thus she gains the sway,
And love still follows where she leads the way.
From every gift of heaven, to charm is thine;
To love, to praise, and to adore, be mine.

SENT TO MRS. BRIDGET JONES,

WITH THE WANDERER.

Alluding to an Episode, where a young Man turns Hermit, for the loss of his Wife Olympia.

When with delight fond love on beauty dwelt,
While this the youth, and that the fair expressed,
Faint was his joy compar'd to what I felt,
When in my angel Biddy's presence blest.

Tell her, my muse, in soft, sad, sighing breath,
If she his piercing grief can pitying see,
Worse than to him was his Olympia's death,
From her each moment's absence is to me.

ON FALSE HISTORIANS.

A SATIRE.

Sure of all plagues with which dull prose is curst,
Scandals, from false historians, spot the worst.
In quest of these the muse shall first advance,
Bold, to explore the regions of romance;
Romance, call'd history—Lo! at once she skims
The visionary world of monkish whims;
Where fallacy, in legends, wildly shines,
And vengeance glares from violated shrines;
Where saints perform all tricks, and startle thought
With many a miracle that ne'er was wrought;
Saints that never liv'd, or such as justice paints,
Jugglers, on superstition palm'd for saints.
Here, canoniz'd, let creed-mongers be shown,
Red-letter'd saints, and red assassins known:
While those they martyr'd, such as angels rose!
All black enroll'd among religion's foes,
Snatch'd by sulphureous clouds, a LIE proclaims
Number'd with fiends, and plung'd in endless flames.
History, from air or deep draws many a spright,
Such as, from nurse or priest, might boys affright;
Or such as but o'er feverish slumbers fly,
And fix in melancholy frenzy's eye.
Now meteors make enthusiast wonder stare,
And image wild portentous wars in air!
Seers fall entranc'd! some wizard's lawless skill
Now whirls, now fetters nature's works at will!
Thus history, by machine, mock-epic, seems,
Not from poetic, but from monkish dreams.
The devil, who priest and sorcerer must obey,
The sorcerer us'd to raise, the parson lay,
When Echard wav'd his pen, the history shows;
The parson conjur'd, and the fiend uprose.
A camp at distance, and the scene a wood,
Here enter'd Noll, and there old Satan stood:
No tail his rump, his foot no hoof reveal'd;
Like a wise cuckold, with his horns conceal'd:
Not a gay serpent, glittering to the eye;
But more than serpent, or than harlot fly:
For, lawyer-like, a fiend no wit can 'scape,
The demon stands confest in proper shape!
Now spreads his parchment, now is sign'd the scroll;
Thus Noll gains empire, and the devil has Noll.
Wondrous historian! thus account for evil,
And thus for its success—'tis all the devil.
Though ne'er that devil we saw, yet one we see,—
One of an author sure, and—thou art he.
But dusky phantoms, muse, no more pursue!
Now clearer objects open—yet untrue.
Awful the genuine historian's name!
False ones—with what materials build they fame?
Fabrics of fame, by dirty means made good,
As nests of martins are compil'd of mud.
Peace be with Curll—with him I wave all strife,
Who pens each felon's, and each actor's life;
Biography that cooks the devil's martyrs,
And lards with luscious rapes the cheats of Charters.
Materials, which belief in gazzetes claim,
Loose-strung, run gingling into history's name.
Thick as Egyptian clouds of raining flies;
As thick as worms where man corrupting lies;
As pests obscene that haunt the ruin'd pile;
As monsters floundering in the muddy Nile;
Minutes, memoirs, views, and reviews appear,
Where slander darkens each recorded year.
In a past reign is feign'd some amorous league;
Some ring or letter now reveals th' intrigue:
Queens, with their minions, work unseemly things;
And boys grow dukes, when catamites to kings.
Does a prince die? What poisons they surmise!
No royal mortal sure by nature dies.
Is a prince born? What birth more base believ'd?
Or, what's more strange, his mother ne'er conceiv'd!
Thus slander popular o'er truth prevails,
And easy minds imbibe romantic tales.
Thus, stead of history, such authors raise
Mere crude wild novels of bad hints for plays.
Some usurp names—an English garreteer,
From minutes forg'd, is Monsieur Mesnager *.

* The Minutes of Monsr. Mesnager; a book calculated to vilify the administration in the four last years of Queen Anne's reign. The truth is, that this libel was not written by Monsr. Mesnager, neither was any such book ever printed in the French tongue, from which it is impudently said in the title page to be translated.

Some, while on good or ill ſucceſs they ſtare,
Give conduct a complexion dark or fair:
Others, as little to inquiry prone,
Account for actions, though their ſpring's unknown.
One ſtateſman vices has, and virtues too;
Hence will conteſted character enſue.
View but the black, he's fiend; the bright but ſcan,
He's angel: view him all—he's ſtill a man.
But ſuch hiſtorians all accuſe, acquit;
No virtue theſe, and thoſe no vice admit;
For either in a friend no fault will know,
And neither own a virtue in a foe.
Where hear-ſay knowledge ſits on public names,
And bold conjecture or extols or blames,
Spring party libels; from whoſe aſhes dead,
A monſter, miſnam'd Hiſtory, lifts its head.
Contending factions crowd to hear its roar!
But when once heard, it dies to noiſe no more.
From theſe no anſwer, no applauſe from thoſe,
O'er half they ſimper, and o'er half they doze.
So when in ſenate, with egregious pate.
Perks up Sir * * * * * in ſome deep debate;
He hems, looks wiſe, tunes thin his labouring throat,
To prove black white, poſtpone or palm the vote:
In ſly contempt, ſome, Hear him! Hear him! cry;
Some yawn, ſome ſneer; none ſecond, none reply.
But dare ſuch miſcreants now ruſh abroad,
By blanket, cane, pump, pillory, unaw'd?
Dare they imp falſehood thus, and plume her wings,
From preſent characters and recent things?
Yes: What untruths! or truths in what diſguiſe!
What Boyers and what Oldmixons ariſe!
What facts from all but them and ſlander ſcreen'd!
Here meets a council, no where elſe conven'd;
There, from originals, come, thick as ſpawn,
Letters ne'er wrote, memorials never drawn;
To ſecret conference never held they yoke,
Treaties ne'er plann'd, and ſpeeches never ſpoke.
From, Oldmixon, thy brow, too well we know,
Like ſin from Satan's far and wide they go.
In vain may St. John ſafe in conſcience ſit;
In vain with truth conſute, contemn with wit:
Confute, contemn, amid ſelected friends;
There ſinks the juſtice, there the ſatire ends,
Here, though a century ſcarce ſuch leaves uncloſe,
From mould and duſt the ſlander ſacred grows.
Now none reply where all deſpiſe the page;
But will dumb ſcorn deceive no future age?
Then, ſhould dull periods cloud not ſeeming fact,
Will no fine pen th' unanſwer'd lie extract?
Well-ſet in plan, and poliſh'd into ſtyle,
Fair and more fair may finiſh'd fraud beguile;
By every language ſnatch'd, by time receiv'd,
In every clime, by every age believ'd:
How vain to virtue truſt the great their name,
When ſuch their lot for infamy or fame?

A CHARACTER.

Fair truth, in courts where juſtice ſhould preſide,
Alike the judge and advocate would guide;
And theſe would vie each dubious point to clear,
To ſtop the widow's and the orphan's tear;
Where all, like Yorke, of delicate addreſs,
Strength to diſcern, and ſweetneſs to expreſs,
Learn'd, juſt, polite, born every heart to gain,
Like Cummins mild; like * Forteſcue humane,
All eloquent of truth, divinely known,
So deep, ſo clear, all ſcience is his own.
Of heart impure, and impotent of head,
In hiſtory, rhetoric, ethics, law, unread;
How far unlike ſuch worthies, once a drudge,
From floundering in low caſes, roſe a judge.
Form'd to make pleaders laugh, his nonſenſe thunders,
And, on low juries, breathes contagious blunders.
His brothers bluſh, becauſe no bluſh he knows,
Nor e'er † "one uncorrupted finger ſhows."
See, drunk with power, the circuit lord expreſt!
Full, in his eye, his betters ſtand conſeſt: [looſe,
Whoſe wealth, birth, virtue, from a tongue ſo
'Scape not provincial, vile, buffoon abuſe.
Still to what circuit is aſſign'd his name,
There, ſwift before him, flies the warner—Fame.
Conteſt ſtops ſhort, conſent yields every cauſe;
To coſt; delay, endures them, and withdraws.
But how 'ſcape priſoners? To their trial chain'd,
All, all ſhall ſtand condemn'd, who ſtand arraign'd.
Dire guilt, which elſe would deteſtation cauſe,
Prejudg'd with inſult, wonderous pity draws.
But 'ſcapes e'en innocence his harſh harangue?
Alas!—e'en innocence itſelf muſt hang;
Muſt hang to pleaſe him, when of ſpleen poſſeſt;
Muſt hang to bring forth an abortive jeſt.
Why liv'd he not ere ſtar-chambers had fail'd,
When fine, tax, cenſure, all but law prevail'd;
Or law, ſubſervient to ſome murderous will,
Became a precedent to murder ſtill?
Yet ev'n when patriots did for traitors bleed,
Was e'er the job to ſuch a ſlave decreed,
Whoſe ſavage mind wants ſophiſt-art to draw,
O'er murder'd virtue, ſpacious veils of law?
Why, ſtudent, when the bench your youth admits; [ſits;
Where, though the worſt, with the beſt rank'd he
Where found opinions you attentive write,
As once a Raymond, now a Lee to cite,
Why pauſe you ſcornful when he dins the court?
Note well his cruel quirks, and well report.
Let his own words againſt himſelf point clear
Satire more ſharp than verſe when moſt ſevere.

EPITAPH ON MRS. JONES,

GRANDMOTHER TO MRS. BRIDGET JONES, OF LLANELLY IN CAERMARTHENSHIRE.

In her, whoſe relics mark this ſacred earth,
Shone all domeſtic and all ſocial worth:
Firſt, heaven her hope with early offspring crown'd;
And thence a ſecond race roſe numerous round.
Heaven to induſtrious virtue bleſſing lent,
And all was competence, and all content.

* The Honourable William Forteſcue, Eſq. one of the Juſtices of his Majeſty's Court of Common Pleas.

D. of WHARTON.

Though frugal care, in wiſdom's eye admir'd,
Knew to preſerve what induſtry requir'd;
Yet, at her board with decent plenty bleſt,
The journeying ſtranger ſat a welcome gueſt.
Preſt on all ſides, did trading neighbours fear
Ruin, which hung o'er exigence ſevere?
Farewell the friend, who ſpar'd th' aſſiſtant loan—
A neighbour's woe or welfare was her own.
Did piteous lazars oft attend her door?
She gave—farewell the parent of the poor.
Youth, age, and want, once cheer'd, now ſighing
ſwell,
Bleſs her lov'd name, and weep a laſt farewell.

VALENTINE'S DAY.

A POEM.

Addreſſed to a young Widow Lady.

Adieu, ye rocks that witneſs'd once my flame,
Return'd my ſighs, and echo'd Chloe's name!
Cambria, farewell!—my Chloe's charms no more
Invite my ſteps along Llanelly's ſhore;
There no wild dens conceal voracious foes,
The beach no fierce, amphibious monſter knows;
No crocodile there fleſh'd with prey appears,
And o'er that bleeding prey weeps cruel tears;
No falſe hyæna, feigning human grief,
There murders him, whoſe goodneſs means relief:
Yet tides, conſpiring with unfaithful ground,
Though diſtant ſeen, with treacherous arms, ſurround.
There quickſands, thick as beauty's ſnares, annoy,
Look fair to tempt, and whom they tempt, deſtroy,
I watch'd the ſeas, I pac'd the ſands with care,
Eſcap'd, but wildly ruſh'd on beauty's ſnare.
Ah!—better far, than by that ſnare overpow'r'd,
Had ſands engulf'd me, or had ſeas devour'd.
Far from that ſhore, where ſyren beauty dwells,
And wraps ſweet ruin in reſiſtleſs ſpells; [boaſt,
From Cambrian plains; which Chloe's luſtre
Me native England yields a ſafer coaſt.
Chloe, farewell!—Now ſeas, with boiſterous pride,
Divide us, and will ever far divide:
Yet while each plant, which vernal youth reſumes,
Feels the green blood aſcend in future blooms;
While little feather'd ſongſters of the air
In woodlands tuneful woo and fondly pair,
The muſe exults, to beauty tunes the lyre,
And willing loves the ſwelling notes inſpire.
Sure on this day, when hope attains ſucceſs,
Bright Venus firſt did young Adonis bleſs.
Her charms not brighter, Chloe, ſure than thine;
Though fluſh'd his youth, not more his warmth than mine.
Scqueſter'd far within a myrtle grove,
Whoſe blooming boſom courts retiring love;
Where a clear ſun, the blue ſerene diſplays,
And ſheds, through vernal air, attemper'd rays;
Where flowers their aromatic incenſe bring,
And fragrant flouriſh in eternal ſpring;
There mate to mate each dove reſponſive coos,
While this aſſents, as that enamour'd woos,
There rills amuſive, ſend from rocks around,
A ſolitary, pleaſing, murmuring ſound;
Then form a limpid lake. The lake ſerene
Reflects the wonders of the bliſsful ſcene.
To love the birds attune their chirping throats,
And on each breeze immortal muſic floats.
There ſeated on a riſing turf is ſeen,
Graceful, in looſe array, the Cyprian queen;
All freſh and fair, all mild, as Ocean gave
The goddeſs, riſing from the azure wave;
Diſhevel'd locks diſtil celeſtial dews,
And all her limbs, divine perfumes diffuſe.
Her voice ſo charms, the plumy, warbling throngs,
In liſtening wonder loſt, ſuſpend their ſongs.
It ſounds—"Why loiters my Adonis?"—cry,
"Why loiters my Adonis?"—rocks reply.
"Oh, come away!"—they thrice, repeating, ſay;
And echo thrice repeats,—"Oh, come away!"—
Kind zephyrs waft them to her lover's ears;
Who, inſtant at th' enchanting call, appears.
Her placid eye, where ſparkling joy refines,
Benignant, with alluring luſtre ſhines.
His locks, which, in looſe ringlets, charm the view,
Float careleſs, lucid from their amber hue.
A myrtle wreath her roſy fingers frame,
Which, from her hand, his poliſh'd temples claim;
His temples fair, a ſtreaking beauty ſtains,
As ſmooth white marble ſhines with azure veins.
He kneel'd. Her ſnowy hand he trembling ſeiz'd,
Juſt lifted to his lip, and gently ſqueez'd;
The meaning ſqueeze return'd, love caught its lore
And enter'd, at his palm, through every pore.
Then ſwell'd her downy breaſts, till then enclos'd,
Faſt heaving, half-conceal'd and half-expos'd:
Soft ſhe reclines. He, as they fall and riſe,
Hangs, hovering o'er them, with enamour'd eyes,
And, warm'd, grows wanton—As he thus admir'd,
He pry'd, he touch'd, and with the touch was fir'd,
Half-angry, yet half pleas'd, her frown beguiles
The boy to fear; but, at his fear, ſhe ſmiles.
The youth leſs timorous and the fair leſs coy,
Supinely amorous they reclining toy.
More amorous ſtill his ſanguine meaning ſtole
In wiſtful glances, to her ſoftening ſoul:
In her fair eye her ſoftening ſoul he reads:
To freedom, freedom, boon, to boon, ſucceeds.
With conſcious bluſh, th' impaſſion'd charmer
burns; [turns.
And, bluſh for bluſh, the impaſſion'd youth re-
They look, they languiſh, ſigh with pleaſing pain,
And wiſh and gaze, and gaze and wiſh again.
'Twixt her white, parting boſom ſteals the boy,
And more than hope preludes tumultous joy;
Through every vein the vigorous tranſport ran,
Strung every nerve, and brac'd the boy to man.
Struggling, yet yielding, half o'erpower'd, ſhe
pants,
Seems to deny, and yet, denying, grants.
Quick, like the tendrils of a curling vine,
Fond limbs with limbs, in amorous folds, entwine.
Lips preſs on lips, careſſing and careſt,
Now eye darts flame to eye, and breaſt to breaſt.
All ſhe reſigns, as dear deſires incite,
And rapt he reach'd the brink of full delight.
Her waiſt compreſs'd in his exulting arms,
He ſtorms, explores, and rifles all her charms;

Claſps in ecſtatic bliſs th' expiring fair,
And, thrilling, melting, neſtling, riots there.
How long the rapture laſts, how ſoon it fleets,
How oft it pauſes, and how oft repeats;
What joys they both receive and both beſtow,
Virgins may gueſs, but wives experienc'd know:
From joys, like theſe, (ah, why deny'd to me?)
Sprung a freſh, blooming boy, my fair, from thee.
May he, a new Adonis, lift his creſt,
In all the florid grace of youth confeſt!
Firſt let him learn to liſp your lover's name,
And, when he reads, here annual read my flame.
When beauty firſt ſhall wake his genial fire,
And the firſt tingling ſenſe excite deſire;
When the dear object, of his peace poſſeſt,
Gains and ſtill gains on his unguarded breaſt:
Then may he ſay, as he this verſe reviews,
So my bright mother charm'd the poet's muſe.
His heart thus flutter'd oft 'twixt doubt and fear,
Lighten'd with hope, and ſadden'd with deſpair,
Say, on ſome rival did ſhe ſmile too kind?
Ah, read---what jealouſy diſtracts his mind!
Smil'd ſhe on him? He imag'd rays divine.
And gaz'd and gladden'd with a love like mine.
How dwelt her praiſe upon his raptur'd tongue!
Ah!---when ſhe frown'd, what plaintive notes he ſung!
And could ſhe frown on him---Ah, wherefore, tell!
On him, whoſe only crime was loving well?
Thus may thy ſon his pangs with mine compare,
Then wiſh his mother had been kind as fair.
For him may love the myrtle wreath entwine;
Though the ſad willow ſuits a woe like mine!
Ne'er may the filial hope, like me, complain!
Ah! never ſigh and bleed, like me in vain!—
When death affords that peace which love denies,
Ah, no!—far other ſcenes my fate ſupplies;
When earth to earth my lifeleſs corſe is laid,
And o'er it hangs the yew or cypreſs ſhade:
When pale I flit along the dreary coaſt,
An helpleſs lover's pining plaintive ghoſt;
Here annual on this dear returning day,
While feather'd choirs renew the melting lay;
May you, my fair, when you theſe ſtrains ſhall ſee,
Juſt ſpare one ſigh, one tear, to love and me,
Me, who, in abſence or in death, adore
Theſe heavenly charms I muſt behold no more.

TO JOHN POWELL, ESQUIRE,

BARRISTER AT LAW.

In me long abſent, long with anguiſh fraught,
In me, though ſilence long has deaden'd thought,
Yet memory lives, and calls the muſe's aid,
To ſnatch our friendſhip from oblivion's ſhade.
As ſoon the ſun ſhall ceaſe the world to warm,
As ſoon Llanelly's* fair that world to charm,
As grateful ſenſe of goodneſs, true like thine,
Shall e'er deſert a breaſt ſo warm as mine.
When imag'd Cambria ſtrikes my memory's eye,
(Cambria, my darling ſcene!) I, ſighing, cry,
Where is my Powell? dear aſſociate!—where?
To him I would unboſom every care;
To him, who early felt, from beauty, pain;
Gall'd in a plighted, faithleſs virgin's chain.
At length, from her ungenerous fetters, freed,
Again he loves! he woos! his hopes ſucceed!
But the gay bridegroom, ſtill by fortune croſt,
Is, inſtant, in the weeping widower loſt.
Her, his ſole joy! her from his boſom torn,
What feeling heart, but learns, like his to mourn?
Can nature then, ſuch ſudden ſhocks, ſuſtain?
Nature thus ſtruck, all reaſon pleads in vain!
Though late, from reaſon yet he draws relief,
Dwells on her memory; but diſpels his grief.
Love, wealth, and fame (tyrannic paſſions all!)
No more enflame him, and no more enthral.
He ſeeks no more, in Rufus' hall, renown;
Nor envies Pelf the jargon of the gown;
But pleas'd with competence, on rural plains,
His wiſdom courts that eaſe his worth obtains.
Would private jars, which ſudden riſe, encreaſe?
His candour ſmiles all diſcord into peace.
To party ſtorms is public weal reſign'd?
Each ſteady patriot-virtue ſteers his mind.
Calm, on the beach, while maddening billows rave,
He gains philoſophy from every wave;
Science, from every object round, he draws;
From various nature, and from nature's laws.
He lives o'er every paſt hiſtoric age;
He calls forth ethics from the fabled page.
Him evangelic truth, to thought excites;
And him, by turns, each claſſic muſe delights.
With wit well-natur'd; wit, that would diſdain
A pleaſure riſing from another's pain;
Social to all, and moſt of bliſs poſſeſt,
When moſt he renders all, around him, bleſt:
To unread 'ſquires illiterately gay;
Among the learn'd, as learned full as they;
With the polite, all, all-accompliſh'd eaſe,
By nature form'd, without deceit, to pleaſe.
Thus ſhines thy youth; and thus my friend, elate
In bliſs as well as worth, is truly great.
Me ſtill ſhould ruthleſs fate, unjuſt, expoſe
Beneath thoſe clouds, that rain unnumber'd woes;
Me, to ſome nobler ſphere, ſhould fortune raiſe,
To wealth conſpicuous, and to laurel'd praiſe;
Unalter'd yet be love and friendſhip mine;
I ſtill am Chloe's, and I ſtill am thine.

LONDON AND BRISTOL DELINEATED*.

Two ſea-port cities mark Britannia's fame,
And theſe from commerce different honours claim.
What different honours ſhall the muſes pay,
While one inſpires and one untunes the lay?
Now ſilver Iſis brightening flows along,
Echoing from Oxford ſhore each claſſic ſong;
Then weds with Tame; and theſe, O London, ſee
Swelling with naval pride, the pride of thee!
Wide, deep, unſullied Thames, meandering glides
And bears thy wealth on mild majeſtic tides.
Thy ſhips, with gilded palaces that vie,
In glittering pomp, ſtrike wondering China's eye

* The Author preferr'd this title to that of London and Briſtol compared: which, when he began the piece, he intended to prefix to it.

And thence returning bear, in ſplendid ſtate,
To Britain's merchants, India's eaſtern freight.
India, her treaſures from her weſtern ſhores,
Due at thy feet, a willing tribute pours;
Thy warring navies diſtant nations awe,
And bid the world obey thy righteous law.
Thus ſhine thy manly ſons of liberal mind;
Thy change deep-buſied, yet as courts refin'd;
Councils, like ſenates, that enforce debate,
With fluent eloquence and reaſon's weight.
Whoſe patriot virtue, lawleſs power controls;
Their Britiſh emulating Roman ſouls.
Of theſe the worthieſt ſtill ſelected ſtand,
Still lead the ſenate, and ſtill ſave the land:
Social, not ſelfiſh, here, O learning, trace
Thy friends, the lovers of all human race!
In a dark bottom ſunk, O Briſtol now,
With native malice, lift thy lowering brow!
Then as ſome hell-born ſprite in mortal guiſe,
Borrows the ſhape of goodneſs and belies,
All fair, all ſmug, to yon proud hall invite,
To feaſt all ſtrangers ape an air polite!
From Cambria drain'd, or England's weſtern coaſt,
Not elegant, yet coſtly banquets boaſt!
Revere, or ſeem the ſtranger to revere;
Praiſe, fawn, profeſs, be all things but ſincere;
Inſidious now, our boſom-ſecrets ſteal,
And theſe with ſly ſarcaſtic ſneer reveal.
Preſent we meet thy ſneaking treacherous ſmiles;
The harmleſs abſent ſtill thy ſneer reviles;
Such as in thee all parts ſuperior find,
The ſneer that marks the fool and knave combin'd;
When melting pity would afford relief,
The ruthleſs ſneer that inſult adds to grief.
What friendſhip canſt thou boaſt? what honours claim?
To thee each ſtranger owes an injur'd name.
What ſmiles thy ſons muſt in their foes excite!
Thy ſons, to whom all diſcord is delight;
From whom eternal mutual railing flows;
Who in each other's crimes, their own expoſe:
Thy ſons, though crafty, deaf to wiſdom's call;
Deſpiſing all men, and deſpis'd by all;
Sons, while thy cliffs a ditch-like river laves,
Rude as thy rocks, and muddy as thy waves,
Of thoughts as narrow as of words immenſe,
As full of turbulence as void of ſenſe?
Thee, thee, what ſenatorial ſouls adorn!
Thy natives ſure would prove a ſenate's ſcorn.
Do ſtrangers deign to ſerve thee; what their praiſe?
Their generous ſervices thy murmurs raiſe.
What fiend malign, that o'er thy air preſides,
Around from breaſt to breaſt inherent glides,
And, as he glides, there ſcatters in a trice
The lurking ſeeds of every rank device?
Let foreign youths to thy indentures run!
Each, each will prove, in thy adopted ſon,
Proud, pert, and dull—though brillant once from ſchools,
Will ſcorn all learning's as all virtue's rules;
And, though by nature friendly, honeſt, brave,
Turn a ſly, ſelfiſh, ſimpering, ſharping knave.
Boaſt petty-courts, where 'ſtead of fluent eaſe,
Of cited precedents and learned pleas;
'Stead of ſage counſel in the dubious cauſe,
Attornies, chattering wild, burleſque the laws—
(So ſhameleſs quacks, who doctors rights invade,
Of jargon and of poiſon form a trade.
So canting coblers, while from tubs they teach,
Buffoon the goſpel they pretend to preach.)
Boaſt petty courts, whence rules new rigour draw,
Unknown to nature's and to ſtatute-law;
Quirks that explain all ſaving rights away,
To give th' attorney and the catchpoll prey.
Is there where law too rigorous may deſcend,
Or charity her kindly hand extend?
Thy courts, that, ſhut when pity would redreſs,
Spontaneous open to inflict diſtreſs.
Try miſdemeanours!---all thy wiles employ,
Not to chaſtiſe the offender, but deſtroy;
Bid the large lawleſs fine his fate foretel;
Bid it beyond his crime and fortune ſwell;
Cut off from ſervice due to kindred blood,
To private welfare and to public good,
Pitied by all, but thee, he ſentenc'd lies;
Impriſon'd languiſhes, impriſon'd dies.

THE LIFE OF HILL.

AARON HILL was the eldeſt ſon of George Hill, Eſq. of Malmeſbury Abbey, in Wiltſhire, and born in Beauſort Buildings, in the Strand, London, February 10. 1784-5.

His father having, by his miſmanagement, deprived him of the ſucceſſion to the family eſtate of about 2000 l. a-year, he was left to the care of Mrs. Gregory, his grandmother, "a woman of uncommon underſtanding, and great good nature."

At nine years old, he was ſent to the ſchool of Barnſtaple in Devonſhire, under the care of Mr. Rayner; from whence he was removed to Weſtminſter ſchool, under the care of Dr. Knipe, where his genius ſoon became conſpicuous, and often made him ample amends for his very ſcanty allowance of pocket-money, by enabling him to perform the taſks of others who had not his capacity.

He left Weſtminſter ſchool, on account of his narrow circumſtances, in 1699, at fourteen years of age. Soon after, he formed a reſolution of paying a viſit to his relation, Lord Paget, then ambaſſador at Conſtantinople; and meeting with no oppoſition from his grandmother, he accordingly embarked on board a veſſel going there, March 2. 1700.

On his arrival, he was received with the utmoſt kindneſs and cordiality, by Lord Paget, who was no leſs pleaſed than ſurpriſed at that ardour for improvement, which could induce a youth of his tender years, to run the hazard of ſuch a voyage, to viſit a relation whom he only knew by character.

The ambaſſador immediately provided him a tutor in his own houſe; under whoſe care he very ſoon ſent him to travel through Egypt, Paleſtine, and the greateſt part of the Eaſt, being deſirous of gratifying that laudable curioſity, and thirſt of knowledge, which ſeemed ſo ſtrongly impreſſed on the amiable mind of his young relation.

He returned home with Lord Paget, about the year 1703; and, on his journey, had an opportunity of ſeeing great part of Europe, at moſt of the courts of which his Lordſhip made ſome little ſtay.

It is ſuppoſed that Lord Paget would have made ſome proviſion for him at his death, had not the malevolence of a certain female, who had great influence with him, prevented his kind intentions towards him.

A few years after, his abilities and ſobriety recommended him to Sir William Wentworth, Bart. of Yorkſhire, who was then going to make the tour of Europe, with whom he travelled two or three years.

In 1709, he publiſhed a Hiſtory of the Ottoman Empire, compiled from the materials which he had collected in his travels, and during his reſidence at the Turkiſh court. This work, though it met with ſucceſs, he afterwards very ſeverely criticiſed, and with ſome juſtice; for there are in it a great number of puerilities. It is the production of youthful genius, rather chooſing to indulge the imagination of the poet, than to make uſe of the plainneſs and perſpicuity of the hiſtorian. Sprat, however, uſed to obſerve that "there is certainly in that book, the ſeeds of a great writer;" a prediction which was amply verified by the merit of his ſubſequent writings.

The ſame year, he publiſhed his firſt poetical piece, intituled Camillus, in vindication of the Earl of Peterborough; who was ſo well pleaſed with the compliment, that he appointed him his ſecretary, and introduced him to Harley, and St. John, and other leaders of the Tory party, of which he appears to have been an adherent.

In 1710, he quitted the ſervice of Lord Peterborough, and married the only daughter of Edmund Morris, Eſq. of Stratford, in Eſſex, a young lady of great merit and beauty, with whom he had a very handſome fortune.

The ſame year, he was appointed Manager of the theatre in Drury Lane, and, at the deſire of Booth the player, wrote his firſt tragedy of Elfrid, or, the Fair Inconſtant, which was favourably received on the ſtage, though he has himſelf deſcribed it to be "an unpruned wilderneſs of fancy, with here and there a flower among the leaves, but without any fruit of judgment." To this play was annexed, in the repreſentation, a dramatic piece, called The Walking Statue; or, the Devil in the Wine Cellar: the plot of which is farcical, and the incidents beyond the limits of poſſibility.

The year following, he wrote the opera of Rinaldo, which was performed at the theatre in the Hay-Market, of which he was director, and met with very great ſucceſs. The muſic was the firſt that Handel compoſed after his arrival in England.

His genius ſeems to have been admirably adapted to the buſineſs of the ſtage; and while he held the management, he conducted both theatres, highly to the ſatisfaction of the public; but having a miſunderſtanding with the Duke of Kent, then Lord Chamberlain, he relinquiſhed it in a few months; and though he was not long after very earneſtly ſolicited by a perſon of the firſt diſtinction, to reſume the theatrical direction, he ſtill declined it.

It is probable, however, that neither pride nor reſentment were the motives of this refuſal, but an ardent zeal for general improvement, and the public good, which ſeems to have been his darling paſſion, and to which, on different occaſions, he ſacrificed not only his eaſe, but large ſums of money.

In 1713, he undertook to make an oil as ſweet as that from olives, from beech nuts, and obtained a patent for the purpoſe; but being an undertaking of too great extent for his private fortune, he took a ſubſcription of 25,000 l. on ſhares and annuities, in ſecurity of which, he aſſigned over his patent in truſt for the ſubſcribers, forming a Company who were to act in concert with the patentee, under the denomination of The Beech Oil Company.

The ſucceſs of this undertaking, at a time when profits were already ariſing from it, was fruſtrated, by the erroneous warmth and impatience of thoſe perſons with whom he was obliged to unite himſelf; and after three years labour and application, came to nothing.

In 1716, he publiſhed An Impartial State of the Caſe between the Patentee, Annuitants, and Sharers in the Beech Oil Company, by which it appeared that all the money that had been employed, had been fairly expended for the benefit of the Company, and that the patentee had not availed himſelf of the advantages to which, by the agreement, he had been entitled.

After the failure of this project, he was concerned with Sir Robert Montgomery, in a deſign for eſtabliſhing a plantation in that part of South Carolina, which has ſince been extenſively cultivated under the name of Georgia; yet, through inequality of his fortune, it never proved of any advantage to him.

In 1716, he brought on the ſtage at Lincoln's Inn-fields, The Fatal Viſion; or, The Fall of Siam, a tragedy; which was acted with ſucceſs. The ſcene is laid in Siam, but the fable is fictitious, and the characters imaginary. The moral is to expoſe the dangerous conſequences of giving way to rage and raſhneſs of determination. It is dedicated to the two critics, Dennis, and Gildon. He prefixed to it this motto from Horace, to which he declared his conſtant adherence.

I not for vulgar admiration write,
To be well read, not much, is my delight.

The ſame year, he publiſhed the two firſt books of an epic poem, called Gideon, in twelve books, on the foundation of the ſtory of the redemption of Iſrael by Gideon, in the book of Judges; of which he afterwards wrote ſix books more, which made eight; but did not finiſh it.

In 1718, he wrote a poem called The Northern Star, a panegyric on Peter the Great; for which he was afterwards complimented with a gold medal from the Empreſs, Catherine, according to the Emperor's deſire before his death. By an advertiſement to the fifth edition of this poem, printed in 1739, it appears that he was to have wrote the life of Peter, from his papers which were to have been ſent to him; but the death of the Empreſs prevented it.

In 1720, he wrote The Fatal Extravagance, a tragedy in one act, which he gave to Mr. Joſeph Mitchell, at that time in great diſtreſs, and got it acted at the theatre in Lincoln's Inn-fields, and ſupported it on the ſuppoſed author's third night, with all that ardour of benevolence which conſtituted his character. It was afterwards enlarged into five acts, and exhibited at Drury Lane, in 1726, with great ſucceſs. It is one of the moſt intereſting dramas in the Engliſh language.

In 1723, he brought on the ſtage, at Drury Lane, his tragedy of Henry V. or, The Conqueſt of France by the Engliſh; which is juſtly eſteemed a very good play. The plot and language are in ſome places borrowed from Shakſpeare; yet, on the whole, it is greatly altered, and a ſecond plot is introduced by the addition of a new female character, a niece to Lord Scroope, who has been formerly ſeduced by the king.

In 1724, for the benefit of a diſtreſſed officer in the army, he began a periodical paper, called, The Plain Dealer, in conjunction with William Bond, Eſq. whom Savage called the two contending powers of light and darkneſs. They wrote by turns, each ſix eſſays; and the character of the work was obſerved regularly to riſe in Hill's weeks, and fall in Mr. Bond's.

"I am particularly indebted" ſays Savage, in the preface to his 'Miſcellany,' "to the author of 'The Plain Dealer,' who was pleaſed, in two of his papers (which I entreat his pardon for reprinting before my Miſcellany), to point out my unhappy ſtory to the world, with ſo touching a humanity, and ſo good an effect, that many perſons of quality, of all ranks, and of both ſexes, diſtinguiſhed themſelves with the promptneſs he here hinted to the noble minded, and not ſtaying till they were applied to, ſent me the honour of their ſubſcriptions, in the moſt liberal and handſome manner. I ought here to acknowledge ſeveral favours from Mr. Hill, whoſe writings are a ſhining ornament of this Miſcellany; but I wave detaining my readers, and beg leave to refer them to a copy of verſes called "The Friend," which I have taken the liberty to addreſs to that gentleman."

Mallet communicated to Hill the firſt ſketch of his beautiful ballad of "William and Margaret," originally printed in The Plain Dealer.

In 1728, he made a journey into the north of Scotland, where he had been about two years before, having contracted with the York-Buildings Company, to apply the timber upon their eſtates, on the river Spey, to the uſes of the navy. In this undertaking, however, he found various obſtacles; for when the trees were by his order chained together into floats, the ignorant Highlanders refuſed to venture themſelves on them down the Spey, till he firſt went himſelf, to ſhow there was no danger.

The rocks in the river were another impediment, which his ſagacity and perſeverance overcame; by ordering fires to be made on them, where they were moſt expoſed, and throwing great quantities of water on them, they were, by the help of proper tools, broken to pieces, and a free paſſage opened for the floats.

"The ſhore of the Spey," ſays he, in a letter to his wife, from the Golden Groves of Abernethy, Auguſt 18. 1728, "is all covered with maſts, from 50 to 70 feet long, which they are daily bringing out of the wood, with ten carriages, and above a hundred horſes, and bring down from forty to fifty trees a-day, one day with another.

"In the middle of the river lie at anchor, a little fleet of our rafts, which are juſt putting off for Findhorn harbour; and it is one of the pleaſanteſt ſights poſſible, to obſerve the little armies of men, women, and children, who pour down from the Highlands, to ſtare at what we have been doing."

The undertaking was for ſome time carried on with great vigour, and conſiderable advantage, till the directors thought proper to call off the men and horſes from the woods of Abernethy, to work their lead mines.

What private emolument he received from this project, is not certainly known; but, during his reſidence in the Highlands, the Magiſtrates of Aberdeen, Inverneſs, &c. complimented him with the freedom of their reſpective towns; and he met with diſtinguiſhed civilities from the Duke of Gordon, and other perſons of rank in that part of the country. His prophetic Verſes, in compliment to Scotland, are generally known.

In his return from the north, he ſpent ſome time in Yorkſhire, where his wife then was, with ſome relations, for the recovery of her health; which afforded an opportunity to ſome perſons to be guilty of a breach of truſt, that would have been of very unhappy conſequence to his fortune; but he returned time enough to fruſtrate their villainous intentions.

During his peregrination in the north, he wrote an allegorical poem, intituled, The Progreſs of Wit, a Caveat for the uſe of an eminent Writer, which gave great uneaſineſs to Pope, who had been the aggreſſor in "The Dunciad."

About the ſame time, he wrote his Advice to the Poets, in which he praiſes worthy poetry, cenſures the miſapplication of poetry in general, and reproves Pope for deſcending below his genius.

While every meaner art exerts her aim,
O'er rival arts to lift her queſtion'd fame;
Let half-ſoul'd poets' ſtill on poets fall,
And teach the willing world to ſcorn them all.
But let no muſe, pre-eminent as thine,
Of voice melodious, and of force divine,
Stung by wits, waſps, all rights of rank forego,
And turn and ſnarl, and bite at every foe;
No—like thy own Ulyſſes make no ſtay,
Shun monſters—and purſue thy ſtreamy way.

In 1731, he had the affliction to loſe his wife, to whom he had the ſincereſt and tendereſt attachment. By her he had nine children; four of whom (a ſon and three daughters) ſurvived him.

Her amiable worth and elegant accompliſhments are finely delineated by Savage, in his verſes To the Excellent Miranda, Conſort of Aaron Hill, Eſq. on reading her Poems.—

Each ſoftening charm of Clio's ſmiling ſong,
Montague's ſoul, which ſhines divinely ſtrong:
Theſe blend, with graceful eaſe, to form thy rhyme,
Tender, yet chaſte, ſweet-ſounding, yet ſublime,
Wiſdom and wit have made thy works their care,
Each paſſion glows, refin'd by precept there;
To fair Miranda's form each grace is kind,
The muſes and the virtues tune thy mind.

The thought of the following epitaph for a monument he deſigned to erect over her grave, though not original, is truly poetical.

Enough, cold ſtone! ſuffice her long-liv'd name,
Words are too weak to pay her virtue's claim:
Temples, and tombs, and tongues, ſhall waſte away,
And power's vain pomp in mould'ring duſt decay,
But e'er mankind a wife more perfect ſee,
Eternity, O Time! ſhall bury thee.

The ſame year, he brought his tragedy of Athelwold upon the ſtage in Drury Lane, written on the ſubject of his Elfrid; or, The Fair Inconſtant. The difference of time and judgment is viſible in favour of Athelwold. The language is poetical and ſpirited, the characters chaſte and genuine, and the deſcriptions affecting and picturesque.

In 1733, his tragedy of Zara, taken from Voltaire, was acted for the benefit of Mr. Bond, at the Long-room in Villars Street, York-Buildings, who performed the part of Luſignan, but died before the run of the play was over. It was afterwards brought on the ſtage at Drury Lane, 1735, where the part of Zara was played by Mrs. Cibber, being her firſt attempt in tragedy. This is juſtly eſteemed one of his beſt plays.

In 1735, he projected a periodical paper, called The Prompter, designed to correct the imperfections of the ſtage, to which he contributed the papers ſigned B.

In 1736, his Alzira, or, The Spaniſh Inſult Repented, a tragedy, taken from Voltaire, was acted at Lincoln's Inn-fields. This play has been much improved in the Engliſh verſion; as was generouſly acknowledged by Voltaire himſelf: the language is nervous and forcible, but it abounds in declamation, rather than paſſion, which, however ſtrongly it may be ſupported, renders it tedious to an Engliſh audience.

In 1737, he publiſhed The Tears of the Muſes, a ſatire, which he calls a "Species of Poetry that can only be reconciled to humanity by the general benevolence of its purpoſe, attacking particulars for the public advantage."

In 1738, he publiſhed An Inquiry into the merit of Aſſaſſination, with a view to the Character of Cæſar; on whoſe death he had written a tragedy the year before, named The Roman Revenge, which was acted at the theatre in Bath, 1753, with ſucceſs. "The tragedy," ſays Bolingbroke, to whom it was dedicated, "is finely wrote; the characters are admirably well drawn, the ſentiments are noble, beyond the power of words, and the expreſſion, dignified as it is, can add nothing to their ſublime. By inſcribing to me one of the nobleſt dramas that our language, or any age can boaſt, you tranſmit my character to poſterity with greater advantage, than any I could have given it."

About this time, he withdrew himſelf from the world, and ſettled at Plaiſtow in Eſſex, where he devoted himſelf entirely to his ſtudy, family, and garden; and the perfection of many profitable improvements; one of which only he lived to complete, though not to reap any benefit from it himſelf, the Art of making Pot Aſh, equal to that brought from Ruſſia.

In his ſolitude he wrote an heroic poem, called The Fanciad, inſcribed to the Duke of Marlborough, 1743, The Impartial, a poem, inſcribed to Lord Carteret; a poem upon Faith, 1746, the Art of Acting, a poem, dedicated to Lord Cheſterfield, 1747; a tract on War, and another on Agriculture, which he left unfiniſhed, with ſeveral other pieces.

In 1749, he reviſed the eight books he had finiſhed of his epic poem, called Gideon, and publiſhed three of the books to which he gave the title of Gideon, or, The Patriot, with a dedication to Lord Bolingbroke; in which he accounts for the alterations he had made ſince the firſt publication of two books.

He alſo adapted to the Engliſh ſtage, Voltaire's tragedy of Merope, which was acted at Drury-Lane, 1749, with great applauſe, and was the laſt work he lived to complete.

This play, which he has made entirely his own, by his manner of tranſlating it, ſtill continues to be acted with applauſe, and the uſe which has been made of the deſign, in "Barbaroſſa, Creuſa, Douglas," &c. affords a ſtrong evidence in its favour.

He juſt lived to ſee his tragedy introduced to the public, and to write a dedication to Lord Bolingbroke, in which there is a melancholy preſage of his approaching diſſolution.

> Cover'd in fortune's ſhade I reſt reclin'd,
> My griefs all ſilent, and my joys reſign'd;
> With patient eye life's evening gloom ſurvey,
> Nor ſhake th' out-haſting ſands, nor bid them ſtay;
> Yet while from life my ſetting proſpects fly,
> Fain would my mind's weak offſpring ſhun to die;
> Fain would their hope ſome light through time explore,
> The name's kind paſſport, when the man's no more;

Mallet had made intereſt with the Prince of Wales, to have it performed for his benefit; but the day before it was, by the command of the Prince, to have been repreſented, he died, Feb. 8. 1749-50, before he had completed his 68th year, as it is ſaid, in the very minute of the earthquake, after enduring a twelvemonth's torment of body, with great fortitude and reſignation.

He was buried in the ſame grave with his wife, in the great cloiſter of Weſtminſter Abbey, near Lord Godolphin's tomb.

A collection of his Original Poems and Letters, was printed for the benefit of the family, by subscription, in 4 vols. 8vo, 1751; with a poetical dedication to the princess of Wales, by his daughter, Mrs. Urania Johnson, who seems to have inherited a large portion of his taste, and amiable benevolence.

His dramatic works, including the plays above-mentioned, and The Roman Revenge, a tragedy, 1753, The Insolvent, or, Filial Piety, a tragedy, 1758, Merlin in Love, an occasional prelude, The Muse in Mourning, a comic opera, The Snake in the Grass, a dramatic satire, Saul, a tragedy, and Daraxes, a tragedy, were printed in 2 vols. 8vo, 1759. A selection from the mass of his miscellaneous compositions is now, for the first time, received into a collection of classical English poetry.

The character of Hill was in every respect perfectly amiable. His person was, in his youth, extremely fair and handsome. He was tall, not too thin, yet genteelly made. His eyes were a dark blue, bright and penetrating, his hair brown, and his face oval. His countenance was generally animated by a smile. His address was most engagingly affable, yet mingled with a native unassumed dignity, which rendered him at once respected and admired. His voice was sweet, and his conversation elegant; and so extensive was his knowledge in all subjects, that scarcely any could occur, on which he did not acquit himself in a most masterly and entertaining manner. His temper, though naturally warm when roused by injuries, was equally noble in a readiness to forgive them; and so much inclined was he to repay evil with good, that he frequently exercised that christian lesson, to the prejudice of his own circumstances. He was a generous master, a sincere friend, an affectionate husband, and an indulgent and tender parent; and, indeed, so benevolent was his disposition in general, even beyond the power of the fortune he was blessed with, that the calamities of those he knew, and valued as deserving, affected him more deeply than his own. In consequence of this he bestowed the profits of many of his works for the relief of his friends, and particularly his dramatic pieces, none of which he could ever be prevailed on to accept of a benefit for, except his Merope, which, at the very close of his life was commanded to be represented for the relief of its author, from those difficulties out of which he had frequently been the generous instrument of extricating others. His manner of living was temperate to the greatest degree, in every respect but that of late hours, which his indefatigable love of study frequently drew him into. No labour deterred him from the prosecution of any design that appeared to him to be praise-worthy and practicable; nor was it in the power of misfortune, which from his birth he seemed destined to encounter, to overcome, or even shake his fortitude of mind.

He seems to have lived in perfect harmony with all the writers of his time, except Pope, with whom he had a short controversy, greatly to his advantage, occasioned by the following lines in the "Dunciad."

> Then H— essay'd; scarce vanish'd out of sight,
> He buoys up instant, and returns to light;
> He bears no token of the sabler streams,
> And mounts far off among the swans of Thames.

This, though the gentlest piece of satire in the whole poem, and conveying at the same time an oblique compliment, he retaliated in his Progress of Wit, which begins with the following lines, in which Pope's well known disposition is elegantly, yet very severely characterised.

> Tuneful Alexis, on the Theme's fair side,
> The ladies' play-thing and the muse's pride;
> With merit popular, with wit polite,
> Easy, though vain, and elegant, though light;
> Desiring, and deserving others praise,
> Poorly accepts a fame he ne'er repays;
> Unborn to cherish, sneakingly approves,
> And wants the soul to spread the worth he loves.

The "sneakingly approves" in the last couplet affected Pope extremely; who, indeed, through the whole controversy, seems rather to express his repentance by denying the offence, than to vindicate himself, supposing it to have been given.

"That the letters, A. H." says he, "were applied to you in the papers, I did not know, (for I seldom read them) I heard it only from Mr. Savage, as from yourself, and sent my assurance to the contrary. But I don't see how the annotator to the Dunciad could have rectified that mistake publicly, without particularising your name in a book, where I thought it too good to be inserted, &c."

"I should imagine," he adds, in another place, "the Dunciad meant you a real compliment, and so it has been thought by many, who have asked to whom that passage made that oblique panegyric. As to the notes, I am weary of telling a great truth; which is, that I am not the author of them; though I love truth so well, as fairly to tell you, I think even that note a commendation, and should think myself not ill used to have the same words said of me.—But I ask you not to believe this, except you are vastly inclined to it. I will come closer to the point; would you have the note left out? It shall. Would you have it expressly said you were not meant? It shall, if I have any influence on the editors."

"As to your oblique panegyric," says Hill, "I am not under so blind an attachment to the goddess I was devoted to in the Dunciad, but that I knew it was a commendation, though a dirtier one than I wished for; who am neither fond of some of the company in which I was listed, the noble reward for which I was to become a diver, the allegorical muddiness in which I was to try my skill, nor the instituter of the games you were so kind to allow me a share in."

"Your offer is very kind," he adds, "to prevail on the editor of the Dunciad to leave out the note, or declare that I was not meant in it; but I am satisfied:—It is over, and deserves no more of your application."

The controversy ended in a perfect reconciliation; and Pope ever afterwards treated Hill with a degree of respect, that implied a sense of superiority, bordering on reverence.

The passage in the Dunciad relating to Hill, stands thus in the later editions:

Then * essay'd; scarce vanish'd out of sight, &c.

With this note under it. "A gentleman of genius and spirit, who was secretly dipt in some papers of this kind, on whom our poet bestows a panegyric instead of a satire, as deserving to be better employed than in party quarrels, and personal invectives."

As a great and general writer, Hill must be allowed to stand in a very exalted rank of merit. His tragedies, particularly Zara and Merope, are generally known and admired. His poems seem not to have hitherto obtained so much notice as they deserve. Dr. Warton has unjustly represented him as "an affected and fustian writer," who, "by some means or other, gained Pope's confidence and friendship." Although it may be allowed, that the rigid correctness with which he constantly re-perused his compositions for alteration, the frequent use of compound epithets, singularity of sentiment, bold experiments in language, and an ordo verborum peculiar to himself, have justly laid him open to the charge of being, in some places rather too turgid, and in others somewhat stiff and obscure; yet, the nervous power, force, and weight of sentiment, opulence of imagery, and intrinsic sterling sense with which his writings abound, amply atone for the harshness of the style, and the peculiarity of the diction. They are evidently the production of a genius truly poetical; they have an air of originality, which has no resemblance of any contemporary writer; and the versification and sentiments have a cast peculiar to themselves, which cannot be successfully imitated. The images are animated, though sometimes indistinct; the descriptions forcible, though sometimes quaint; the language elevated, though sometimes forced; and the numbers majestic and flowing, though sometimes encumbered and sluggish. His faults are, not want of fire or enthusiasm, of which he has an ample share; but an elaborate exactness of language, that rather obscures than heightens the beauty and force of the thought, and a studied refinement of sentiment, supported by the utmost effort of language, which has more magnificence than sublimity, more dignity than grace.

In extenuation of his faults, it ought to be observed, that the versatility of his genius was unfavourable to the attainment of excellence; and that he cultivated poetry only as a relaxation from the study of history, criticism, geography, physic, commerce, agriculture, war, law, chemistry, and natural philosophy, to which he devoted the greatest part of his time.

"In all events," says he, "I will be easy, who have no better reason to wish well to poetry, than my love for a miſtreſs I ſhall never be married to; for, whenever I grow ambitious, I ſhall wiſh to build higher, and owe my memory to ſome occaſion of more importance than my writings."

Of the poetical pieces which he at different times compoſed, the preſent collection exhibits but a ſmall number. The epic poem of Gideon, his greateſt work, has been omitted, for a reaſon which he has himſelf given, in one of his letters to Clio, the poetical name of the celebrated Mrs. Sanſom; "It will require a good ſhare of your patience, for it is a very long one. I will have it writ fair, book by book, for your peruſal, if you have courage enough to reſolve on going through with ſo formidable a mortification, as to pick out the fine things of the ſtory from the dull ones of the author." It has been praiſed by Savage; and muſt be allowed to have ſome fine paſſages; but the meaſure is injudiciouſly choſen, and the ſtory tedious and unintereſting. All the riches of poetic diction are required to inveſt epic poetry in ſuitable ſplendor; but it rejects the variety of meaſure which is appropriated to lyric compoſition. The Fanciad is not liable to the ſame objections; but a copy of it could not be procured. An epiſode from Gideon, is inſerted among his Original Poems, &c. but the Fanciad, and many of his earlier pieces, are omitted in the collection of his works.

The liſt of his pieces which have been ſelected for republication, might perhaps have been augmented without any injury to his reputation; but, it is hoped, the ſelection, imperfect as it is, when every deduction is made which criticiſm requires, will make good his claim to more notice than he has hitherto obtained, and juſtify the revival of his writings.

It conſiſts of pieces in various kinds of compoſition, ſerious, ſentimental, humorous, ſatirical, deſcriptive, and amatory, which have all their brighter paſſages; but require no diſtinct conſideration, nor particular criticiſm.

On the character of Hill, it is unneceſſary to enlarge, as the teſtimonies to his merit, by Bolingbroke, Pope, Cheſterfield, Voltaire, Thomſon, Mallet, Savage, Richardſon, Sewell, Dyer, Fielding, Victor, and Garrick, are ſufficiently known to the general readers of Engliſh poetry. The following complimentary epigram by Richardſon does not appear extravagant; and it is hoped this article will not be thought too long, when it is remembered that Hill, however neglected in later days, was celebrated by the moſt eloquent of his poetical contemporaries, and commended by the excellent author of "Clariſſa," and "Sir Charles Grandiſon."

When noble thoughts with language pure unite,
To give to kindred excellence its right,
Though unencumber'd with the clogs of rhime,
Where tinkling ſounds, for want of meaning chime,
Which like the rocks in Shannon's midway courſe,
Divide the ſenſe and interrupt its force;
Well may we judge ſo ſtrong and clear a rill,
Flows higher from the Muſes' ſacred HILL.

THE WORKS OF HILL.

MISCELLANEOUS POEMS.

TO CLIO.

Snar'd in entangling mazes of thy charms,
Teach me to ſhake theſe ſilky chains away:
Slow, thy ſweet force, my ſtubborn mind diſarms,
'Till ev'n ambition bends beneath thy ſway.

What ſhall I do to free my ſtruggling ſoul,
Bow'd to the ſoft'ning bias of thy ſong?
As circling ſtraws in whirlwinds driving roll,
So are my hurry'd paſſions ſwept along.

Fool as I was!—I felt thy diſtant fire,
E'er from thoſe eyes it flaſh'd undying flame;
Yet ſure, ſaid I—for once—I may aſpire,
And view that heav'n whence all this bright-neſs came.

So the light cork that on the Thames' ſmooth ſide
Embay'd, glides buoyant, and juſt ſkims the ſhore,
Edges, ambitious, to the rapid tide,
And ruſhing down the ſtream returns no more.

Late my free thoughts, unbounded as the air, [ſky;
Could, with an eye beam's ſwiftneſs, ſcale the
Wander in ſtarry worlds, and buſy'd there,
From human cares and human paſſions fly.

Down to dark earth's deep centre could I roam,
And through her chaſmy lab'rinths wind my way;
See gold unripen'd in its duſky home,
And mark how ſprings in veiny bendings ſtray.

Oft as th' alarming trumpet ſtruck my ear, [roſe,
Or the big drum's dead beat hoarſe-thund'ring
My ſummon'd ſoul ſprung out to war's wiſh'd ſphere,
And plung'd me in the ranks of fancy'd foes.

Wide as unmeaſur'd nature's trackleſs ſpace,
Untir'd imagination reſtleſs flew;
Diſdain'd to fix on object, or on place,
And every moment ſome freſh labour knew.

Clio was then unſeen, unread, unknown;—
Now, lovely tyrant, ſhe uſurps my mind;
Devoted fancy vows itſelf her own:
And my whole thought is to one theme confin'd.

Yet, pow'rful as ſhe is—ſhe doubts her lays;
Blind, like the ſun, to her own blazing flame,
Tranſports the liſt'ning ſoul—engroſſes praiſe;
Yet humbly wiſhes—an immortal name.

Oh! that I could but live, till that late day
When Clio's unremember'd name ſhall die!
Then ſhould I hope full leiſure to diſplay
Thoſe unborn deeds which in my boſom lie.

But, as it is, our fleeting ſands ſo faſt
Ebb to their end, and lead us to decay,
That ere we learn to ſee, our daylight's paſt,
And, like a melting miſt, life ſhrinks away.

TO MR. POPE.

The glow-worm ſcribblers, of a feeble age,
Pale twinklers of an hour, provoke my rage;
In each dark hedge we ſtart an inſect fire,
Which lives by night and muſt at dawn expire.
Yet ſuch their number, that their ſpecks combine,
And the unthinking vulgar ſwear they ſhine.
Poets are prodigies, ſo greatly rare,
They ſeem the taſks of heaven, and built with care.
Like ſuns unquench'd, unrivall'd, and ſublime,
They roll immortal o'er the waſtes of time:
Ages in vain cloſe round, and ſnatch in fame,
High over all ſtill ſhines the poet's name:
Lords of a life, that ſcorns the bounds of breath,
They ſtretch exiſtence—and awaken death.
Pride of their envy'd climes! they plant renown,
That ſhades the monarch's by the muſe's crown:
To ſay that Virgil with Auguſtus ſhin'd,
Does honour to the lord of half mankind.
So, when three thouſand years have wan'd away,
And Pope is ſaid to've liv'd when George bore ſway,
Millions ſhall lend the king the poet's fame,
And bleſs, implicit, the ſupported name.

STUNG BY A NETTLE.

Revenge, you ſee, is ſure, though ſometimes ſlow:
Take this—'tis all the pain I'd have you know!
There's odds enough yet left betwixt our ſmart,
I ſting your fingers, and you ſting my heart.

THE SNUFFERS.

Deſpis'd and worthleſs though I ſeem to be,
Yon new-top'd flames owe their beſt light to me.

Though ſcorn'd—you ſee I can do ſervice ſtill!
Some good lies hid in every ſeeming ill.
And hence let fortune's fav'rites learn to know,
That virtue's virtue though in rags it go.

TO A SATIRICAL YOUNG LADY.

Forbear, loud thing! to live in laugh and jeſt,
Wit is like love—the ſofteſt is the beſt!
If thou, by this, wouldſt lively thought proclaim,
If empty praiſe is thy wild fancy's aim;
A while this ſalt may ſeaſon ſingle life,
But no man's taſte approves a piquant wife.
Be wiſe, and match, and charm by judgment's aid,
Or witty, and deſpis'd, and die—a maid.
So the thin razors which young learners pleaſe,
Grow notch'd and edgeleſs, by unmark'd degrees,
Till worn and blunted, by too frequent uſe,
Th' experienc'd hand detects the ſteel's abuſe;
Then cheaply thrown aſide, they gather duſt,
Like thee neglected, till conſum'd by ruſt.

TO THE EXCELLENT DAUGHTERS

OF A DECEASED LADY.

Why ſhould ye thus, to prove but vainly kind,
And a weak body to a ſickly mind?
Could but your pious grief recal her breath,
Or tears of duty win her back from death,
We would not blame the paſſion you expreſs,
But ſhare it with you, if 'twould make it leſs!
But oh! when certain death's uncertain hour
Exerts his known, his unreſiſted pow'r;
When we are ſummon'd from our cares below,
To joys which living merit muſt not know;
When ſouls, like your dear mother's, quit their clay,
And change earth's darkneſs for eternal day:
From their bliſs-circled ſeats, perhaps, they view
Theſe humbler regions, which themſelves once knew. [kind,
And ſwell'd with thoughts, which make the angels
Pity the pledges they have left behind.
'Tis true, the loſs you mourn is vaſtly great,
But in that loſs your country ſhares your fate;
The public good her wiſhes would have done,
Made ev'ry man in ev'ry land her ſon:
Thence, lovely mourners! give us leave to prove,
We ought to ſhare your grief, who ſhar'd your mother's love.
Yet may all parties make their ſorrow leſs,
And you, and we, concern enough expreſs;
You may with comfort calm your ruffled mind,
To think your mother left her cares behind;
And we, though loſers, ſhould be thankful too,
Since we are ſtill left rich, poſſeſſing you.

PARAPHRASE

ON THE THIRD CHAPTER OF HABAKKUK.

God of my fathers! ſtretch thy oft-try'd hand,
And yet, once more, redeem thy choſen land:
Once more, by wonders, make thy glories known,
And, 'midſt thy anger, be thy mercy ſhown!
O, I have heard thy dreadful actions told,
And my ſoul burns thy terrors to unfold!

At Iſrael's call, th' Almighty's thunder hurl'd,
From Paran's ſummit ſhook the aſtoniſh'd world;
The flaming heav'ns blaze dreadful through the ſky,
And earth's dark regions gleam beneath his eye.
High, in his undetermin'd hands, he bore [ſtore;
Judgment's heap'd horn, and mercy's ſtruggling
Meagre before him, death, pale horror, trod!
And, grinning ſhadowy, watch'd the Almighty nod:
Gath'ring beneath his feet flaſh'd light'nings broke,
And the aw'd mountain ſhook, conceal'd in ſmoke.
He ſtood; and, while the meaſur'd earth he ey'd,
The ſtarting nations dropp'd their conſcious pride;
High-boaſting Cuſhan ſtruck her tents, in ſhame,
And Midian groan'd beneath repented fame.
He mov'd; and, from their old foundations rent,
The everlaſting hills before him bent;
He ſtept; and all th' upriſing mountains ſtray
And roll in earthquakes, to eſcape his way:
From their enormous chaſms, with roaring tide,
Earth-cleaving rivers ſpout, and deluge wide:
The ſea, alarm'd, climb'd faſt, its God to ſpy,
And in outrageous triumph ſwept the ſky.
Conſcious of wrath divine, the ſun grew pale,
And o'er his radiance drew a gloomy veil.
Thus did my God (to ſave th' endanger'd land)
March forth, indignant, with vindictive hand;
This, when I hear, chill blaſts my ſoul o'erſpread,
And my lips quiver with the riſing dread:
Trembling all o'er, my limbs I faintly draw,
And my bones crumble with ideal awe. [yield;
Now, though the fig-tree ne'er ſhould bloſſom
Though ſterile coldneſs curſe th' unrip'ning field;
Though vines and olives fail their loady cheer;
Nor fainting herds out-live the pining year;
Yet ſhall my ſoul in God's ſure aid rejoice,
And earth's High Sov'reign claim my heav'n-tun'd voice.

THE

MUSE'S EXPOSTULATION WITH A LADY,

Who denied herſelf the freedom of Friendſhip, from too delicate an apprehenſion of the World's miſtaken Cenſure.

O born to pity woes, yet form'd to give,
Shut from whoſe preſence 'twere a pain to live!
Who make all converſe tedious but your own;
And, that withheld, leave the forſaken none.
Urg'd by what motives would you wiſh to ſhun
The ſight and voice of him whoſe ſoul you won?
On what falſe fears does this cold flight depend?
What fancy'd foe does prudence apprehend?

When bodies only are to bodies dear,
The danger there conſiſts in being near;
And when the fair the ſoft contagion ſpy,
Diſcretion calls 'em—and 'tis wiſe to fly.
But where aſſociate ſpirits catch the flame,
Flight is a cruel, and a fruitleſs aim.
Souls have no ſexes; and if minds agree,
Parting is dying, to ſet fancy free.

Nor let miſtaken virtue wrong the breaſt,
That opens kindly to ſo ſweet a gueſt;

Not ſaints in heav'n a purer warmth expreſs,
Than reaſon feels, when touch'd by tenderneſs.
Relenting wiſdom dignifies deſire,
And rais'd ideas fan the bright'ning fire;
Till the white flame, aſcending to the ſky,
Spreads its low ſmoke in envy's darken'd eye.

Whence grew ſociety, ſo wiſh'd an art,
If the mind's elegance betrays the heart?
Were it a crime in flaſhing ſouls to riſe,
And ſtrike each other through the meeting eyes?
Thoſe op'ning windows had not let in light,
Nor ſtream'd ideas out, to voice the ſight.

Why are you form'd ſo pow'rful in your charms,
If beauty ought to fly the wiſh it warms?
Vainly did heav'n inſpire that tuneful tongue,
With notes more ſweet than ever ſeraph ſung!
If, juſtly, all that harmony you hide,
Your muſic uſeleſs, and its pow'r untry'd.
Have wit and eloquence in vain conſpir'd,
And giv'n you brightneſs, but to ſhine retir'd?
Muſt you be loveliеſt, yet be never ſhown?
Than all be wiſer, yet be heard by none?
Oh, 'tis too delicate!—'tis falſely nice,
To bar the heart againſt the mind's advice.

But you will ſay that honour's call you hear;
That fame is tender—reputation dear:
That from the world's malignant blaſt you fly,
Fear the fool's tongue, and the diſcerner's eye.
The ſpleen of diſappointed wiſhes dread,
Or envy's whiſpers, by detraction ſpread?
Alas! what bounds can limit your retreat?
Where will ſought ſafety reſt your flying feet?
Is there a corner in the globe ſo new,
That malice will not find as ſure as you?
The very flight that ſhuns, attracts the wrong?
And every cenſure fear'd, you force along. [ſay,
"There's cauſe, no doubt, for her retreat, they'll
"A fearleſs innocence had dar'd to ſtay!"
Scandal has, either way, an edge to ſtrike,
And wounds diſtinction every where alike:
Superior excellence is doom'd to bear
The ſtings of ſland'rous hate, and raſh deſpair:
'Tis the due tax your rated merit pays,
And ev'ry judging ear will call it praiſe.

Think—and be kind—convert this fruitleſs pain
To a fix'd firmneſs, and a calm diſdain.
Since cautious abſence can no more be free
From falſe reproach, than preſent ſmiles will be,
Diffuſe thoſe gifts which heav'n deſign'd ſhould bleſs,
Nor let their greatneſs make their pity leſs.
Indulging freedom ev'ry fear diſarm,
And, with a conſcious ſcorn of ſlander, charm.
Bold in your guarded ſtrength your heart unbind,
And to be ſafe—ſuppoſe yourſelf all mind.

Yet needleſs that! ſince ſuch reſpect you draw,
That ev'n your tenderneſs is arm'd with awe:
Permitted love would ſilently admire,
And a ſoft rev'rence tremble through deſire;
The warmeſt wiſhes, when inſpir'd by you,
Strike—but as heav'nly inſpirations do.
The op'ning heart makes room for joys refin'd,
And ev'ry groſs idea ſhrinks behind.

You need not then the gentle ſound reject,
Should love's fear'd name be given to ſoft reſpect:
When ill-diſtinguiſh'd meanings are the ſame,
How poor the diff'rence which they draw from name!
There are, in love, th' extremes of touch'd deſire,
The nobleſt brightneſs, or the coarſeſt fire!
In vulgar boſoms vulgar wiſhes move;
Nature guides choice, and, as men think, they love.
But when a pow'r like yours impels the wound,
Like the clear cauſe, the bright effect is found.
In the looſe paſſion, men profane the name,
Miſtake the purpoſe, and pollute the flame:
In nobler boſoms, friendſhip's form it takes,
And ſex alone, the lovely diff'rence makes.
Love's generous warmth does reaſon's pow'r diſplay,
And fills deſire, as light embodies day.
Love is to life what colour is to form:
Plain drawings oft are juſt, but never warm.
Love, in a blaze of tints, his light'ning throws;
Then the form quickens, and the figure glows.

AN EPIGRAM,

Occaſioned by ſome Verſes on a Monument in Weſtminſter Abbey.

How loſt this pomp of verſe! how vain the hope,
That thought can dwell on Craggs, in view of Pope!
When upon Rubicon's fam'd bank is ſhown
Cæſar's preſs'd foot, on the remember'd ſtone;
No traveller once aſks the quarry's name,
Whence the coarſe grit, by chance diſtinguiſh'd came;
But thinks, with reverence, here great Julius trod,
And hails the footſtep of a Roman god!

TO MRS. L——R,

PLAYING ON A BASS VIOL.

While o'er the dancing chords your fingers fly,
And bid them live, till they have made us die;
Trembling, in tranſport, at your touch they ſpring,
As if there dwelt a heart in every ſtring.
Your voice, ſoft riſing, through the lengthen'd notes,
The marry'd harmony, united, floats;
Two charms, ſo join'd, that they compoſe but one;
Like heat and brightneſs from the ſelf-ſame ſun.
The wiſhful viol would its wealth retain,
And, ſweetly conſcious, hugs the pleaſing pain,
Envious, forbids the warbling joys to roll,
And, murm'ring inward, ſwells its ſounding ſoul.
Proud of its charming pow'r, your tuneful bow
Floats o'er the chords majeſtically ſlow;
Careleſs and ſoft, calls out a tide of art,
And, in a ſtorm of muſic, drowns the heart.
So when that god, who gave you all your ſkill,
To angel forms (like yours) intruſts his will,
Calm they deſcend, ſome new-meant world to found,
And, ſmiling, ſee creation riſing round!

THE CHANGE;

TO THE LOVELY CAUSE OF IT.

Sweet enſlaver! can you tell,
Ere I learnt to love ſo well,
How my hours had wings to move,
All unbuſied by my love!
'Tis amazement now to me,
What could then a pleaſure be!
But you, like God, new ſenſe can give,
And now, indeed, I feel I live.
Oh! what pangs his breaſt alarm,
Whom ſoul and body join to charm!
Endleſs tranſports dance along,
Sweetly ſoft! or nobly ſtrong!
Flaming fancy! cool reflection!
Fierce deſire! and aw'd ſubjection!
Aching hope! and fear encreaſing!
Struggling paſſions, never ceaſing!
Wiſhing! trembling! ſoul adoring!
Ever bleſt, and ſtill imploring.
Let the dull, the cold, and tame,
All thoſe dear diſorders blame;
Tell 'em that in honour's race,
Charm'd by ſome ſuch heav'nly face,
Lovers always foremoſt ran;
Love's a ſecond ſoul to man.
Eaſe is languid, low, and baſe;
Love excites a generous chaſe:
Glory! wealth! ambition! wit!
Thoughts for boundleſs empire fit!
All at love's approach are fir'd,
Bent more ſtrong, and never tir'd,
He who feels not love's ſweet pain
Lives at eaſe—but lives in vain!
Little dream you what is due,
Angel form! to love and you:
'Tis from you I joy poſſeſs;
'Tis by you my grief grows leſs:
Sadly penſive, when alone,
I the ſhades of life bemoan;
If ſome voice your name impart,
Care lies lighten'd at my heart;
Ev'ry woe diſarms its ſting,
And I look down on Britain's king.
When my fancy brings to view
Works which wealth and pow'r can do;
All my ſpurr'd excitements wake,
And fortune charms me for your ſake.
Oh! I cry—'twere heaven poſſeſt,
To make her great who made me bleſt.
In the morning when I riſe,
If the ſun-ſhine ſtrikes my eyes,
All that pleaſes in his view,
Is my hope to look on you.
When the ſable ſweep of night
Drowns diſtinction from my ſight,
I no inward darkneſs find;
You are day-light to my mind.
All my dreams are lives of joy,
Which, in waking, I deſtroy:
You, a ſlave to cuſtom made,
Are of forms and rules afraid:
But your happier image, free
From fantaſtic tyranny;
Independent, kind, and wiſe,
Scorns reſtraint, and knows no ties.
Oh! the dear, the racking pain;
Who that ſleeps thus would wake again.

A SONG.

Oh! forbear to bid me ſlight her,
Soul and ſenſes take her part;
Could my death itſelf delight her,
Life ſhould leap to leave my heart.
Strong, though ſoft, a lover's chain,
Charm'd with woe, and pleas'd with pain.

Though the tender flame were dying,
Love would light it at her eyes;
Or, her tuneful voice applying,
Through my ear my ſoul ſurpriſe.
Deaf, I ſee the fate I ſhun;
Blind, I hear I am undone.

A SONG.

Now ponder well, ye huſbands dear,
The fate of wives, too bright;
A woeful cauſe you have to fear,
Their day will turn to night.

At firſt all gay, and rais'd with joy,
They charm the poor man's heart;
With ſmiling eyes they ſport and toy,
And gild the nuptial dart.

But ah! too ſoon they quench their fire;
(Alas! good hearer, weep)
Then gape, and ſtretch, and yawn, and tire,
And hum their ſouls to ſleep.

HINT FROM SOME OLD VERSES,

On a Stone in Stepney Churchwall.

Two thouſand years, ere Stepney had a name,
In Carthage walls I ſhar'd the punic fame;
There to the ſtrongeſt, added ſtrength I lent,
And proudly propp'd the world's beſt ornament.
Now to cold Britain a torn tranſport thrown,
I piece a church-yard pile unmark'd, unknown:
Stain'd, and half ſunk in dirt, my ſculpture lies,
And moulders, like the graves which round me riſe. [claim,
Oh! think, blind mortals! what frail duſt you
And laugh at wealth, wit, beauty, pow'r, and fame;
Short praiſe, can fleeting hopes like yours ſupply,
Since times, and tongues, and tow'rs, and empires die.

ON CLIO'S BIRTH-DAY.

O'er the blue violet, while the amorous wind
Bends and perfumes his wings, to fan this day;
Why has pale ſickneſs winter'd o'er my mind,
And, with chill agues, check'd the warmth of May?

Is it not Clio's birth-day?—Toil of thought!
Height beyond all that e'er ambition trod.
Sum of refin'd deſire! by angels taught,
To look, and think, and act a female god!

Oh! my rapt ſoul ſits trembling in my eyes,
Starting, impatient, at her pow'rful name:
Dearer than life, to that ſweet ſound it flies,
And health rides roſy on the living flame.

Wak'd into ſudden ſtrength, I blaze again,
Love, the reſtorer, dreſs'd in Clio's ſmile,
Triumph'd o'er nature, gave delight to pain,
Sweeten'd affliction, and could death beguile.

May joys unnumber'd, as the charmer's ſweets,
Bleſs this revolving day's eternal round;
Till the proud world its dawn with rapture greets,
Conſcious of her who made it firſt renown'd.

Long—let 'em ſay—long ere our father's days,
Three thouſand years ago, on this ſweet day,
That Clio, whom contending nations praiſe,
Embloom'd, by her ſweet birth, the firſt of May.

Britain, illuſtrious by the ſtarry lot,
Far in the north, diſtinguiſh'd iſland, lies,
Now known by later names—oh, envy'd ſpot!
Why did ſhe not in our warm climates riſe?

Sure ſhe was heav'nly grac'd; for to this hour,
After ſuch length of ages roll'd away,
Fame of her charms, augments her ſexed pow'r,
And her thought's luſtre gives our wits their ſway.

TO A LADY,

DESIRING HER LETTERS MIGHT NOT BE EXPOSED.

No! thou beſt ſoul that e'er this body knew,
Unhappy I may be, but not untrue.
Bleſt, or unbleſt, my love can ne'er decay,
Nor could I, where I could not love, betray.
Cold, and unjuſt, the ſhocking caution kills,
And, in one meaning, ſpots me o'er with ills.
Silent, as ſacred lamps, in bury'd urns,
The conſcious flame of lovers inward burns:
Life ſhould be torn, and racks be ſtretch'd in vain,
And vary'd tortures tire their fruitleſs pain,
Ere but a thought of mine ſhould do thee wrong,
Or ſpread thy beauties on the public tongue.
Yet thou canſt fear me—oh! be loſt the ſhame,
Nor heap diſhonour on my future name!
Have I been never lov'd?—yet, cruel, tell,
Whom I betray'd to thee, though lov'd ſo well?
Take thy ſweet miſchief back, their charms eraſe,
Oh! leave me poor, but never think me baſe.
Not e'en when death ſhall veil thy ſtarry eyes,
Shall thy dear letters from my aſhes riſe;
Fix'd to my heart, the grave ſhall give 'em room
To charm my waking ſoul in worlds to come.
While in my verſe, with far more faint eſſay,
Thy wonders I to after times convey;
Tell thy vaſt heav'n of ſweets, and ſing thy name,
Till, fir'd by thee, whole kingdoms catch thy flame.

EPITAPH ON SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

More than his name were leſs.—'Twould ſeem to fear, [here.
He who increas'd heav'n's fame could want it
Yet when the ſuns he lighted up ſhall fade,
And all the worlds he found are firſt decay'd;
Then void and waſte eternity ſhall lie,
And time and Newton's name together die.

TO MR. DYER, ON HIS ATTEMPTING CLIO's PICTURE.

Soul of your honour'd art! what man can do
In copying nature may be reach'd by you:
Your peopling pencil a new world can give,
And, like Deucalion, teach the ſtones to live.
From your creating hand a war may flow,
And your warm ſtrokes with breathing action glow:
But, from that angel form to catch the grace
And kindle up your ivory with her face;
All unconſum'd to ſnatch the living fire,
And limn th' ideas which thoſe eyes inſpire;
Strong to your burning circle to confine
That awe-mix'd ſweetneſs, and that air divine;
That ſparkling ſoul, which lightens from within,
And breaks in unſpoke meanings through her ſkin.
This, if you can—hard taſk, and yet unprov'd!
Then ſhall you be adorn'd, as now belov'd.
Then ſhall your high-aſpiring colours find
The art to picture thought and paint the wind:
Then ſhall you give air ſhape, impriſon ſpace,
And mount the painter to the maker's place.

WHITEHALL STAIRS.

From Whitehall Stairs, whence oft, with diſtant view,
I've gaz'd whole moon-ſhine hours on hours away,
Bleſt but to ſee thoſe roofs which cover'd you,
And watch'd beneath what ſtar you ſleeping lay.

Launch'd on the ſmiling ſtream, which felt my hope,
And danc'd and quiver'd round my gliding boat,
I came this day to give my tongue free ſcope,
And vent the paſſion which my looks denote.

To tell my dear, my ſoul-diſturbing muſe,
(But that's a name can ſpeak but half her charms)
How my full heart does my pen's aid refuſe,
And bids my voice deſcribe my ſoul's alarms.

To tell what tranſports your laſt letter gave,
What heav'ns were open'd in your ſoft complaint;
To tell!—what pride I take, to be your ſlave,
And how triumphant love diſdains reſtraint.

But when I miſs'd you, and took boat again,
The ſympathetic ſun condol'd my woe;
Drew in his beams, to mourn my pity'd pain
And bid the ſhadow'd ſtream benighted flow.

Sudden, the weeping ſkies unſluic'd their ſtore,
And torrents of big tears unceaſing ſhed;
Sad I drove downward to a flooded ſhore,
And, diſappointed, hung my dripping head.

Landed at length, I ſable coffee drink,
And ill ſurrounded by a noiſy tribe,
Scornful of what they do, or ſay, or think,
I, rapt in your dear heav'n, my loſs deſcribe.

TO THE SAME.

Yes—now 'tis time to die—deſpair comes on;
Who keeps the body when the ſoul is gone?

She fet---fair light, that ſhow'd me all my joy,
And, like the ſun's, her abſence muſt deſtroy.
She, who once wept my fancy'd loſs of breath,
Now, crimeleſs murd'rer! gives me real death.

Yet have a care, touch'd heart, nor ſigh one thought,
That ſtains ſuch goodneſs with a purpos'd fault.
Soft as her tears, her gentle meanings move;
Her ſoul ſheds ſweetneſs though her look is love.
Her voice is muſic, tun'd to heav'n's low note:
Her touch bids tranſport, through each art'ry, float;
Her ſtep is dignity, by pity check'd;
At once ſhe fans deſire and plants reſpect.
Unconſcious of her charms, ſhe dreams of none,
And doubling other's praiſes ſhuns her own.
Modeſt in pow'r, as kneeling angels pray,
Noiſeleſs as night's ſoft ſhade, though bright as day.
Wiſe unaſſumingly; ſerenely deep,
Eaſy as air, and innocent as ſleep:
Blooming like beauty, when adorn'd for ſin;
Yet like the bud unblown all bluſh within.

O! 'tis impoſſible, to quit ſuch bliſs,
Yet live ſuperior to a loſs like this!
Where will ſhe next her thouſand conqueſts make?
On what new climate will her ſun-ſhine break?
Where will ſhe next (ſweet taſker of my care!)
Teach our charm'd ſex, to hope, to wiſh, to dare?
Far from her fruitleſs guardian's watchful eye,
What may ſhe hear! what anſwer! oh! I'll die.
Bleſs'd by her ſight—time's race were one ſhort ſtage;
She gone---one widow'd moment were an age.

A SONG.

Clio! ſmiling, ſoul-invader!
Soft amuſer of my days,
Be my ſilent paſſion's aider,
Teach my tongue to ſpeak thy praiſe.

Thou, like heroes, ſcarr'd all over,
Wanting room to ſuffer more:
Pil'd with praiſe, can'ſt hear no lover
Tell thee ought, untold before.

Truth, with modeſt bounds contented,
Rightly praiſing thee, muſt ſay,
More than falſehood e'er invented,
When ſhe wideſt went aſtray.

WRIT ON A BLANK LEAF OF AN OBSCENE POEM.

The ſacred nine, firſt ſpread their golden wings,
In praiſe of virtue, heroes, and of kings:
Chaſte were their lays, and ev'ry verſe deſign'd
To ſoften nature, and exalt the mind.
Looſely the moderns live, and looſely write,
And wno their muſe, as miſtreſs, for delight.
Thick in their lays obſcenities abound,
As weeds ſpring plenteous in the rankeſt ground:
All who write verſe, to taint a guiltleſs heart,
Are vile profaners of the ſacred art.
Cloy'd the ſick reader from the work retires;
And e'er the writer dies his fame expires.

TO MRS. T——T.

Where in this land (Alzira cry'd)
Shall Indian virtues reſt?
Who will be here the ſtranger's guide,
And lead her to be bleſt?

Seek, ſaid the whiſpering muſe, ſome fair
Of England's beauteous race;
Who does herſelf thoſe virtues ſhare
Which moſt Alzira grace.

One who has taſte as nobly ſtrong,
And charms as ſoftly ſweet,
Will guard her ſiſter ſoul from wrong,
While graces graces meet.

I took the muſe's kind advice,
Look'd round the fair and bright,
And found Alzira, in a trice,
Was matchleſs T——t's right.

A SONG.

O Celia! be wary when Celadon ſues,
Theſe wits are the bane of your charms:
Beauty play'd againſt reaſon will certainly loſe,
Warring naked with robbers in arms.

Young Damon, deſpis'd for his plainneſs of parts,
Has worth that a woman ſhould prize;
He'll run the race out, though he heavily ſtarts,
And diſtance the ſhort-winded wiſe.

The fool is a ſaint in the temple of love,
And kneels all his life there to pray:
The wit but looks in, and makes haſte to remove;
'Tis a ſtage he but takes in his way.

THE RECONCILIATION.

Sick of the worthleſs world, and courting reſt,
My ſullen ſoul, with penſive weight oppreſt,
Diſturb'd and mournful ſought the ſilent ſhade,
And fed reflection in the breezy glade:
Stretch'd on the graſſy margent of a brook,
Whoſe murm'ring fellowſhip my mind partook,
Actively idle I repining lay,
Gaz'd on the flood and ſigh'd the ſtream away.

Who knows, I cry'd, what courſe thou haſt to paſs,
Sweet ſtream, that thou creep'ſt ſoftly through this graſs?
How wilt thou flow!—Anon, perhaps, ſlid hence,
Thy deep'ning channel fills ſome moated fence,
Hems in ſome farm, where homely ruſtics meet,
And their ſweet bread, prize of hard labour, eat;
Thence, through ſome lord's delightful garden, led,
Thou may'ſt thy vegetative influence ſpread;
Where, as through fragrant beds, thy purlings ſlide,
The grateful flow'rs ſhall kiſs 'em as they glide:
There, charm'd and ling'ring, thou may'ſt wiſh to ſtay,
And, hoarſely murm'ring, roll diſpleas'd away.

But while, with careleſs pace, thou journey'ſt ſlow,
Oft halting to look back at this fair ſhow,

Some precipice, that in close ambush lies,
Thy virgin current shall at once surprise,
Cross whose broad shoulders thrown, and tumbling o'er, [roar.
Thy frighted stream shall rush with unavailing
Next may thy silver current's brightness die,
And muddily some stagnate fen supply;
Where shadow'd reeds in thy slow stream shall shake, [make:
And floods fly trembling from the gloom they
Frighted, are glad to 'scape this horrid place,
Thou may'st wind short, and new-direct thy race,
Through verdant meads, o'erjoy'd, may'st dancing go,
'Till cattle sip thy whirpools, as they flow:
Thence, for protection of thy ruffled charms,
Thou may'st rush swift to some great lover's arms;
Some stately stream by keely courtship prest,
And mark'd with wealth's proud furrows on his breast: [brace,
Grave Thames may next receive thy mix'd em-
And fam'd Augusta see thy fully'd face;
From her wash'd foot thy scatter'd flood may stray,
And to the swallowing ocean roll away:
There, wasted stream, in wind-driv'n billows tost,
Thy oft-chang'd being shall be wholly lost.
So, gentle brook, I cry'd, does human life,
'Midst endless changes, and in endless strife,
Glide, with impatience, through unknown events,
'Till nature asks repose and death consents.
Why then is such a life so much desir'd?
By what pursuits is vain ambition fir'd?
Friendship is lost on earth; love goes astray;
And men, like beasts, each on the other prey:
Ev'n the soft sex their downy bosoms hide
With inward artifice or outward pride.
Beauty's spoil'd shafts no more the soul can hit,
Dull'd by gross folly or misguided wit.
Nothing is now worth wishing for on earth,
And death is grown a much less woe than birth
While thus I mourn'd---back roll'd th' astonish'd brook, [shook;
The trees bow'd down, the earth beneath me
All heav'n descended to the glowing ground,
And radiant terror dazzling shone around:
Blind with the strong refulgence, fix'd I lay
Bury'd in brightness and o'erwhelm'd with day.
Listen, a sound broke out---impatient youth,
Listen and mark the voice of sacred truth,
Rous'd at that name, I would have bless'd my sight,
But strove in vain to stem the tide of light;
Still as I rais'd my eyes, their balls struck fire,
And wat'ry gushings wept the rash desire:
The unseen phantom's voice, sudden and loud,
Startled the ear as thunder rends a cloud;
But soft'ning more and more, grew sweet and kind,
And dy'd away like music in the wind:
I come, continues she, to bring thee peace,
To bid thy diffidence in friendship cease;
Again to reconcile thee to mankind,
New-wing thy transports, and unclog thy mind;
To guide thy wand'ring choice, to find that joy
Distrust of which does thy sad hours employ:
There lives a charmer, whom divinely fir'd
E'en her whole sex's virtues have inspir'd;
Where all that's manly joins with all that's sweet,
And in whose breath engross'd perfections meet;
Her mind no conscious pride of merit stains;
O'er her wide soul unfully'd reason reigns:
Blind to her worth, she feels not her own flame,
Enriches merit, yet despises fame.
Her unaffected charms what words can paint?
She looks an angel, and she speaks a saint:
While sparkling gayness wantons in her eye,
In her wise soul the laughing Cupids die.
A thousand graces round her person play,
And all the muses mark her fancy's way:
To hear her speak, the soul with rapture fills,
Her looks alarm—but when she writes she kills.
Rise, then, and meet her, as she this way strays,
And thy own wonder shall outspeak my praise.
The goddess vanish'd to her native skies,
And the recover'd shade unbarr'd my eyes;
I look'd, and lo! within the honour'd wood,
Lovely Cleora hid in bay leaves stood;
Cleora—but her wonders to reveal,
Were to describe what I can only feel!
Now reconcil'd to the shunn'd world I'll live:
Her friendship—joys worth living for can give.

ON THE BIRTH-DAY OF MISS ———

Care, be banish'd far away—
Fly, be gone, approach not here:
Mirth and joy demand this day,
Happiest day of all the year!

Summers three times sev'n have shone,
All outshin'd by Delia's eyes:
Winters three times sev'n are gone,
All whose snows her breast supplies!

Dance we then the cheerful round,
Music might have stay'd away;
She but speaking, organs sound:
She but smiling, angels play.

'Tis her birth-day—let it blaze;
Born to charm and form'd for bliss;
Live she lov'd a world of days,
Ev'ry day as bless'd as this,

Let her beauty not increase;
Too, too strong, already there;
But let heav'n augment her peace,
'Till she's happy as she's fair.

THE GLOVE.

Tell me, sweet glove! what name the charmer bears,
Whose downy hand thy snowy cov'ring wears?
'Tis a dear name I am forbid to tell,
But these distinguish'd marks may paint her well:
She gently awful, winningly severe,
Charms when she speaks, yet rather loves to hear;
Wise as a god; as fancy'd angels fair;
Lovely as light, and soft as upper air.
Enough, sweet glove! by this plain picture taught,
H———e, I find, is the dear name I sought.

RONALD AND DORNA:

BY A HIGHLANDER, TO HIS MISTRESS.

From a literal Tranſlation of the Original.

Come, let us climb Skorr-urran's ſnowy top;
Cold as it ſeems, it is leſs cold than you:
Thin through its ſnow theſe lambs its heath-twigs crop;
Your ſnow, more hoſtile, ſtarves and freezes too.

What though I lov'd of late in Skie's fair iſle;
And bluſh'd—and bow'd—and ſhrunk from Kenza's eye;
All ſhe had power to hurt with was her ſmile;
But, 'tis a frown of your's for which I die.

Aſk why theſe herds beneath us ruſh ſo faſt
On the brown ſea-ware's ſtranded heaps to feed?
Winter, like you, with-holds their wiſh'd repaſt,
And, robb'd of genial graſs, they brouſe on weed.

Mark with what tuneful haſte Sheleila flows,
To mix its wid'ning ſtream in Donnan's lake;
Yet, ſhould ſome dam the current's courſe oppoſe,
It muſt, per force, a leſs lov'd paſſage take.

Born, like your body, for a ſpirit's claim,
Trembling, I wait, unſoul'd, till you inſpire:
God has prepar'd the lamp, and bids it flame;
But you, fair Dorna, have with-held the fire.

High as yon pine; when you begin to ſpeak,
My light'ning heart leaps hopeful at the ſound;
But fainting at the ſenſe, falls, void and weak,
And ſinks and ſaddens like yon moſſy ground.

All that I taſte, or touch, or ſee, or hear,
Nature's whole breadth reminds me but of you;
Ev'n heav'n itſelf would your ſweet likeneſs wear,
If, with its power, you had its mercy too.

ABSTRACT FROM PSALM CXIV.

When from proud Egypt's hard and cruel hand,
High-ſummon'd Iſrael ſought the promis'd land,
The opening ſea divided at her call,
And refluent Jordan roſe, a wat'ry wall:
Light as met lambs the ſtarting hills leap'd wide,
And the ſlow mountains roll'd themſelves aſide.
Why, O thou ſea! did thy vaſt depth divide?
And why, O Jordan! fled thy back'ning tide?
Why leapt your lines, ye frighted hills, aſtray?
And what, O mountains! rent your roots away?
Hark! I will tell—proud earth confeſs'd her God,
And mark'd his wond'rous footſteps as he trod.
While bent to bleſs, He cheer'd his thirſty flock,
And into floods of liquid length diſſolv'd the looſening rock.

THE SINGING BIRD.

Pope, in abſence of his pain,
Eaſy, negligent, and gay,
With the fair in am'rous vein,
Lively as the ſmiling day,
Talk'd, and toy'd the hours away,

Tuneful, o'er Belinda's chair,
Finely cag'd, a linnet hung;
Breath'd its little ſoul in air,
Flutt'ring round its manſion ſprung,
And its carols ſweetly ſung.

Winding, from the fair one's eye,
On her feather'd ſlave to gaze;
Meant, cry'd Pope, to wing the ſky,
Yet, a captive all thy days,
How doſt thou this muſic raiſe!

Since a priſoner thou can'ſt ſing,
Sportive, airy, wanton, here,
Hadſt thou liberty of wing,
How thy melody would cheer!
How tranſport the liſt'ning ear!

No, reply'd the warbling ſong.
Rais'd—articulate, and clear!
Now, to wiſh me free were wrong;
Loftier in my native ſphere,
But with fewer friends than here.

Though with grief my fate you ſee,
Many a poet's is the fame;
Aw'd, ſecluded, and unfree,
Humble avarice of fame,
Keeps 'em fetter'd, own'd, and tame.

To our feeders, they and I
Lend our lives in narrow bound;
Perch'd within our owner's eye,
Gay we hop the gilded round,
Changing neither note nor ground.

For, ſhould freedom break our chain,
Though the ſelf-dependent flight
Would to heav'n exalt our ſtrain,
Yet unheard and out of ſight,
All our praiſe were forfeit by't.

A SONG.

Gentle love, this hour befriend me,
To my eyes reſign thy dart;
Notes of melting muſic lend me,
To diſſolve a frozen heart.

Chill as mountain ſnow her boſom,
Though I tender language uſe,
'Tis by cold indiff'rence frozen,
To my arms, and to my muſe.

See! my dying eyes are pleading,
Where a breaking heart appears:
For thy pity interceding,
With the eloquence of tears,

While the lamp of life is fading,
And beneath thy coldneſs dies,
Death my ebbing pulſe invading,
Take my ſoul into thy eyes.

MY SOUL'S LAST SIGHS,

TO THE DIVINE LOTHARIA.

Let plaintive thoughts in mournful numbers flow,
Proſe is too dull for love, too calm for woe.
Has ſhe not bid thee quit thy faithful flame;
Sell her and truth for equipage and name?
Nay, ſhe has bid thee go—Whence this delay?
Whence this fond, fruitleſs, ling'ring wiſh to ſtay?
Lotharia bids thee go—ſhe, who alone
Makes all life's future bleſſings, means thee none!

Begone then—let thy ſtruggling heart obey,
And in long diſtance ſigh ſad life away.
Still, ſtill, vain flatt'ring hope miſleads deſire,
Fed by faint glimm'ring ſhoots of glow-worm fire.
What though ſhe ſweetly writes to eaſe thy grief,
Or points kind comfort by the folded leaf:
Such pity muſt thy grateful rev'rence move,
But judge it right—nor think compaſſion love.
What though each word ſhe marks, like ſpring's ſoft ſhow'rs,
Flows ſweet as new-blown breath of op'ning [flow'rs,
Such borrow'd ſounds ſhe need not have apply'd,
Her own, more tuneful, thou too oft has try'd.
To ſpeak in muſic ever was her claim,
And all grows harmony that bears that name.
Had'ſt thou e'er touch'd her heart with one ſoft pain,
And bleſs'd in loving been belov'd again,
All her cold reaſoning doubts had ceas'd to move,
And her whole gen'rous breaſt conceiv'd but love.
She who believes not, loves not---Feel thy fate:
Friendſhip from her pains more than other's hate.
All the kind paſſions, wanting one, ſhe'll own;
But, that one wanting, all the reſt are none.
Would love and ſhe diſperſe the threat'ning ſtorm,
Let her believe, and truſt, and break through form:
Let her command thy ſtay to know ſucceſs,
Nor fear the god-like attribute to bleſs:
Born to diſtinguiſh her from womankind,
To court her converſe and to taſte her mind;
Fram'd for her empire, with her image fill'd,
Charm'd by her form, and in her temper ſkill'd;
Piercing her tim'rous heart's moſt ſecret thought,
And knowing, and adoring each dear fault,
How art thou pain'd---to find her ſoft'ning will
Held againſt love by ev'ry guard of ſkill!
How art thou doom'd to lengths of op'ning woe,
Should ſhe feel love---yet fear to tell thee ſo?
If ſhe diſtruſts thy truth---all hope muſt fall,
Doubting her pow'r, ſhe diſbelieves thee all.
And none who doubts her lover dares to love.
Go, then---to climes cold as her heart remove;
A diſtant fate thy gloomy choice prefers,
Preſent thou can'ſt not live and not live hers.
Farewell, kind, cautious, unreſolving fair!
To hear the bleſs'd will charm amidſt deſpair.
'Tis death to go---'tis more than death to ſtay,
Reſt will be ſooneſt reach'd the firſt dark way.
Ne'er may'ſt thou know a pain; ſtill cheerful be,
Nor check life's comforts, with one thought of me.

TO MR. JAMES THOMSON,

On his aſking my advice to what Patron he ſhould addreſs his Poem, called Winter.

Some peers have noble ſkill to judge, 'tis true,
Yet, no more proſpect bounds the muſe's view:
Firm, in your native ſtrength, thus greatly ſhown,
Slight ſuch deluſive props, and ſtand alone:
Fruitleſs dependance oft has prov'd too late,
That greatneſs dwells not always with the great.
Patrons are nature's nobles, not the ſtate's,
And wit's a title no broad ſeal creates: [flow,
E'en kings, from whoſe high ſource all honours
Are poor in pow'r when they would ſouls beſtow.
He who ſtoops ſafe beneath a patron's ſhade,
Shines, like the moon, but by a borrow'd aid:
Truth ſhould, unbiaſs'd, free and open ſteer,
Strong as heav'n's heat, and as its brightneſs clear;
Heedleſs of fortune, then, look down on ſtate,
Balanc'd within by merit's conſcious weight:
Divinely proud of independent will,
Prince of your wiſhes live a ſov'reign, ſtill;
Oh! ſwell not, then, the boſoms of the vain,
With falſe conceit you their protection gain,
Poets, like you, their own protectors ſtand,
Plac'd above aid from pride's inferior hand.
Time, that devours a lord's unlaſting name,
Shall lend her ſoundneſs depth to float your fame?
On verſe like yours no ſmiles from pow'r expect,
Born with a worth that doom'd you to neglect.
Yet, would your wit be prais'd—reflect no more,
Let the ſmooth veil of flatt'ry ſilk you o'er,
Aptly attach'd, the court's ſoft climate try;
Learn your pen's duty from your patron's eye.
Ductile of ſoul each pliant purpoſe wind,
And, following int'reſt cloſe, leave doubt behind:
Then ſhall your name ſtrike loud the public ear,
For through good fortune virtue's ſelf ſhines clear.

But, in defiance of our taſte---to charm,
And fancy's force with judgment's caution arm,
Diſturb with buſy thought ſo lull'd an age,
And plant ſtrong meanings o'er the peaceful page.
Impregnate ſound with ſenſe, teach nature art,
And warm ev'n winter, 'till it thaws the heart:
How could you thus your country's rules tranſ-greſs,
Yet think of patrons, and preſume ſucceſs!

A SONG.

Vainly now ye ſtrive to charm me,
All ye ſweets of blooming May;
How can empty ſunſhine warm me,
While Lotharia keeps away?

Go, ye warbling birds; go, leave me,
Shade, ye clouds, the ſmiling ſky:
Sweeter notes her voice can give me,
Softer ſunſhine fills her eye.

VERSES,

Writ for and ſent to a Widow Gentlewoman, on occaſion of her Son's melancholy, upon their loſſes and diſappointments in life.

Welcome, ah! welcome, life's laſt friend, decay!
Faint on tir'd ſoul, and lapſe, unmourn'd, away;
Now I look back, aſham'd at hope's falſe blaze,
That ſhone, delightful, on my happier days;
In their true colours now, too late, I ſee
What youth, and pride, and mirth, and praiſe, muſt be!
Bring, then, great curer, death, thy dark relief,
And ſave me from vain ſenſe of hopeleſs grief.
Shut me for ever from the ſuffering ſcene,
And leave long voids for ſilent reſt between;
Thy hand can ſnatch me from a weeping ſon,
Heir to my woes, and born to be undone!
Place me where I no more his wrongs ſhall hear,
Nor his told ſorrows reach my ſhelter'd ear.

Thus while I mourn'd, retir'd from hated light,
Sleep came, and hid affliction in the night;
The night, inſtructive to my bold complaint,
In a long dream did that ſad march repaint,
That pomp of tears which did for Sheffield flow,
Who lately blacken'd half our ſtreets with woe.
There, cry'd a pointing ſeraph, look! compare!
And bluſh, forgetful of your light deſpair!
What has this mother loſt, as far diſtreſs'd
Beyond her ſex, as late beyond 'em bleſt.
Son of her ſoul! her child, by mind and birth,
Bright by her fires, and guardian of her worth;
Promiſe of virtues to the riſing age.
Yet, ah! how blaſted is the lov'd preſage!
Think of her loſs, her weight of woe bemoan,
And, humbly conſcious, ſigh not for your own.

ST. MATTHEW, CHAP. VI.

Part of the Sermon on the Mount.

Let ſhining charity adorn your zeal,
The nobleſt impulſe gen'rous minds can feel:
But have a care you take this virtue right,
And ſhun the glare of the proud hypocrite.
Miſtaken men! who, fond of public fame,
Diſgrace the act, while they affect the name!
On earth, vain-glorious zeal may meet regard,
But heav'n nor owns it, nor vouchſafes reward.
Thou, on the contrary, whoſe pitying breaſt
Wou'd, as it ought, give eaſe to the diſtreſt;
Scarce tell thy right hand, what thy left will do,
But be at once reſolv'd and ſilent too.
Secret, as night, thy pious alms convey;
For God, who ſees by night, rewards by day.
So, when thy ſoul approaches God in pray'r,
Be not deceiv'd, as thoſe falſe zealots are,
Who daily into crowded temples preſs,
And there, with feign'd devotion, heav'n addreſs;
But, when thou pray'ſt, all public notice ſhun,
And, private, to thy inmoſt cloſet run:
There, cloſe and earneſt, to thy duty fall,
And God will ſhow thee that he hears thy call.
Swell not thy forms of pray'r with wild deſires,
Exceſs of fuel chokes the brighteſt fires;
The erring heathen ſo miſtake their way,
And think they beſt are heard who moſt can ſay.
But ſhun thou this, and know God's piercing eye
Sees all thy wants before thy words come nigh.
From riſing malice guard thy yielding will,
Nor proudly dare to take revenge for ill:
Thou muſt forgive, that God may pardon thee;
For none who pities not ſhall pitied be.
Miſled by av'rice, ſeek not wealth to gain,
By hoarding treaſures which are got in vain:
Deceitful riches, which the moth deſtroys,
Which ruſt conſumes, or the bold thief enjoys!
In heav'n's high ſtorehouſe, let your heaps be laid,
A wealth which no deſtroyer can invade;
No moth there enters, ruſt corrupts not there,
Nor plund'ring thief alarms the owner's care:
Safe, therefore, in that place, your treaſures lay;
For where your riches are, your heart will ſtay.
Secure of heav'n's regard, live free from care,
Nor toil, life's common comforts to prepare:
Baniſh vain forecaſt for thy needful gain,
Nor let meat, drink, and clothing, give thee pain.
Obſerve the fowls—they neither reap, nor ſow,
Yet find their wants ſupply'd, where'er they go.
Look on the lilies of the ripening field:
No toil of theirs does thoſe ſweet colours yield;
Yet was not Solomon, when dreſt to pleaſe,
So glorioufly adorn'd as one of theſe.
If, therefore, God ſo feeds the feather'd train,
So clothes the graſs, which withers on the plain;
How much more careful will he be of you,
O, faithleſs man! who yet diſtruſts him too?

TO THE LOVELY MRS. H——E,

On her Deſcent from the firſt Saxon Kings of our Iſland.

H——E, ſweet name! whoſe princely meaning ſhows,
From what high ſpring your blood's rich current flows,
With needleſs awe, reminds us of your race,
Since heav'n has ſtampt dominion on your face.
Still in your ſov'reign form, diſtinctly live
All royal rights your father kings could give.
In your commanding air, we mark their ſtate,
And, in your words, their wiſdom and their weight.
Warm in your noble breaſt, their courage lies,
And all their pow'r and mercy in your eyes.

THE GARDEN WINDOW.

Here, Amanda, gently bending,
Sweetly penſive, loves to lean
O'er the groves, her ſight extending
Through the walks that ſhoot between;

Plac'd, ſays ſhe, within this window
Screen'd, I diſtant charms ſurvey,
Taught by poor deceiv'd Olindo,
Nothing's ſafe that looks too gay.

Here, I view, in ſoften'd ſhadings,
Am'rous flow'r to flow'r incline,
Too remote to mourn their fadings,
When with hanging heads they pine.

Here I ſmell the fragrant breezes,
Safe from ev'ning's chilly blaſt;
Here the noonday ſunſhine pleaſes,
Fearleſs when 'twill overcaſt.

Hence I hear the tempeſt riſing,
See the grovy greatneſs ſhake,
Ev'ry diſtant ill deſpiſing,
While I every good partake.

So commanding life's gay garden,
Let me thornleſs wear the roſe;
Choice like mine let faſhion pardon,
Taſting charms but ſhunning woes.

AT SETTING DAY.—A SONG.

Since ſounding drums, and riſing war,
Invite my love to danger,
I'll aſk of every ſmiling ſtar
To ſhield my roving ranger.

While o'er the field, unfearing wounds,
You preſs the foe retreating,

I'll trace the dear remember'd bounds
Of our more gentle meeting.

I'll paſs whole days in yon ſweet grove,
Where firſt thy tongue deceiv'd me,
When, liſt'ning dumb, I bluſh'd my love,
And no fear'd abſence griev'd me.

On ev'ry bank thy ſide hath preſt,
I'll ſleep, and dream I'm near thee;
And each ſweet bird, that ſtrains its breaſt,
Shall wake my hopes to hear thee.

To all our haunts I will repair,
And cold on yon bleak mountain,
Trace all thy once-trod footſteps there,
And weep o'er each ſad fountain.

There will I teach the trees to wear
Thy name, in ſoft impreſſion,
And borrow ſighs from ev'ning air,
To ſwell my ſoul's confeſſion.

EPILOGUE,

For a Lady who acted Eudocia, in the Siege of Damaſcus, repreſented at the Duke of Bedford's at Woburn.

I've heard of maids, who firſt reſolve to faſt,
And then weigh arguments, when facts are paſt;
Young, though my reaſon is not ſo, it ſtray'd;
But firſt found pleadings for the part I play'd.
Play'd, ſaid I,—ſecond thought that word retracts;
Fancies and follies play, but paſſion acts:
Paſſion! the ſpring that all life's wheels employs,
Winds up the working thought—and heightens joys.
Paſſion! the great man's guide, the poor man's blame;
The ſoldier's laurel, and the ſigher's flame.
Paſſion! that leads the grave, impels the gay,
Bids the wife tremble, and the fool betray.
Ev'n at this hour, what's here our paſtime made,
Gives the court buſineſs, and the kingdom trade;
When factions quarrel, or when ſtateſmen fall,
Each does but act his part at paſſion's call.
Like our's, to night, Lord Paſſion ſets their taſk;
Their fears, hopes, flatt'ries, all are paſſion's maſque.
The world's wide ſtage, for this one practice, fill'd,
Sees ſome act nobly, others play unſkill'd.
Triflers and ſmarts, who toy time's dream away,
Sots, beaux, and hounds of party, theſe but play.
Sons of their country's hope, ſublimely rack'd
For other's reſt.—Theſe do not play, but act.
Who play the pooreſt parts?—the bought, the vain,
The light believer, and the perjur'd ſwain;
The dull dry joker, the coarſe ill-bred bear,
The friends of folly, and the foes of care [juſt,
Who act their parts with praiſe—the firm, the
Who ſell no ſentiments, and break no truſt;
The learn'd, the ſoft, the ſocial, and the kind,
The faithful lover, and the plain good mind.
Such the beſt actors—form'd for honour's ſtage!
Who play no farces, and diſgrace no age.
But copying nature, with true taſte, like ours,
Pleaſe, and are pleas'd, and wing the guiltleſs hours.

APOLOGY FOR DEATH.

Whence this reluctance, when we ceaſe to run
Life's flow ſad race, and leaves its toy unwon?
Death's but our tide of ebb, to that dark ſea,
Time's ſhoreleſs ſwallower, void eternity!
'Tis reſt from labour—'tis eſcape from care;
'Tis ſhunn'd oppreſſion, and reliev'd deſpair.
'Tis but to rediſſolve to formleſs flow,
And join the mingled maſs, that feels no woe.
Fluid to fade, as all things round us do,
Or from old being launch, to find out new.
Emerging, or emerg'd, life rolls away,
Foams into note, or flattens to decay.
Round, with unceaſing wheel, diſtinction glides,
And through time's maze, in ſhort ſucceſſion ſlides:
Flames its hot hour, like humbler houſehold fires,
Shines but to leave us, and in uſe expires.
'Tis the flaſh'd ſpark of thought, that burſts to ſight,
Strains ſoon, and big, and ruſhes into night:
So the proud ſtorm, that frights us with its roar,
Breathes itſelf weary, and is heard no more.
See that ſoft flow'r, whoſe ſighs perfume the gales,
Blooms into duſt, and its ſnuff'd life exhales.
All nature heaves, and ſets, like human breath,
And life's looſe links but ſtretch the chain of death.
Why then does erring fancy fright the mind?
Why call that cruel, nature meant for kind?
Who knows but fates we tremble at may bleſs,
And length of happieſt life be found diſtreſs?
Murder! that blaſt of thought, that bane of law,
The good man's horror, and ev'n villain's awe!
Murder! that nature dreads, and conſcience flies,
Perhaps but ſpurs us to ſome waiting prize!
Elſe, why ſhould creature ſtill with creature jar?
And claſh'd exiſtence wage eternal war?
Beaſt bleeds by beaſt; fiſhes on fiſhes prey;
And birds act murder with more waſte than they;
Ev'n the ſweet thruſh, that bribes us with her ſong,
To guard her dread of death from beaks more ſtrong,
Sav'd from the kite, ſtrait bloodier grows than he,
And ſnaps the ſhiv'ring inſect from the tree.
Life ſtarts but up, to anſwer death's due call,
And one myſterious darkneſs wraps us all!

PASSING A LADY,

IN THE PARK, WITHOUT SEEING HER.

So ſlide our comforts by, unmark'd, unknown,
While our ill-fate comes felt, and all our own!
Too cruel world! where things we wou'd refuſe,
We ſtart upon—and, what we wiſh we loſe!
And yet Lotharia would be hid in vain,
She cannot be conceal'd whom thoughts retain.
Air, and Lotharia, every where are found;
Held by our breath, and to our being bound!
Darkneſs itſelf wants pow'r to cover friends,
Whom the ſoul dwells with, and the ſenſe attends.

TO THE [illegible] THAT LAUGHS,

IN METAPHOR.

And why [illegible], does that meaning eye
Smile in contempt, when lovers ſwear they die?

'Twixt death and love, but one ſmall diff'rence lies,
The ſoul, in both, from its left body flies:
In death 'tis gone, like ſmoke diſſolv'd in air.
Loſt in expanſe, the loſer knows not where:
In love we trace it with ſuch willing pain,
'Twere to die twice to take it back again.

MODESTY.

As lamps burn ſilent, with unconſcious light,
So modeſt eaſe, in beauty, ſhines moſt bright:
Unaiming charms, with edge reſiſtleſs fall,
And ſhe who means no miſchief does it all.

TO A LADY,

Who ſent back the top of a Sweet briar Branch, and retained the worſt end of it.

While the way of the world is, to keep all the beſt,
And then in due form oblige friends with the reſt,
You, Madam, who would lend ev'n triſles a grace,
Teach your meanings to borrow a ſmile from your face;
And polite to your pain, when a preſent you ſend,
Give the thorn to yourſelf, and the roſe to your friend.

TO THE LADY,

Who ſends me all her good Wiſhes.

Suppose that the ſun had a tongue, and ſhou'd ſay,
May your journey be bleſs'd with a very fine day:
Then, withdrawing his face, ſlip aſide with his light, [night;
And ſurround me, at once, with the coldneſs of
What would Florimel ſay to this trick of the ſun?
I would ſay, cry'd the charmer, 'twas cruelly done.
Would you ſo, anſwer'd I!—have a care what you own, [none.
Who have wiſh'd me all bleſſings, yet granted me

Writ upon a Pane of Glaſs in Weſtminſter Houſe, under the names of his four Children.

All happy, then while o'er their ſmiling air,
A living mother breath'd her guardian care;
But, joyleſs, ſince their ſweet ſupporter dy'd,
They wander now through life with half a guide.

Auguſt 25. 1731.

BELLARIA AT HER SPINET.

Sweetly confus'd, with ſcarce conſenting will,
Thoughtleſs of charms, and diffident of ſkill;
See! with what bluſhful bend, the doubting fair
Props the rais'd lid—then ſits with ſparkling air,
Tries the touch'd notes—and, haſt'ning light along, [wrong.
Calls out a ſhort complaint, that ſpeaks their
Now back'ning, awful, nerv'd, erect, ſerene,
Aſſerted muſic ſwells her heighten'd mein.
Fearleſs, with face oblique, her formful hand
Flies o'er the ivory plain, with ſtretch'd command;
Plunges, with bold neglect, amidſt the keys,
And ſweeps the ſounding range with magic eaſe.
Now, two contending ſenſes—ear and eye,
In pride of feaſted taſte, for tranſport vie;
But what avails two deſtin'd ſlaves debate,
When both are ſure to fall, and ſhare one fate?
Whether the god within, evolving round,
Strikes in her notes, and flows diſſolv'd in ſound;
Or ſilent in her eyes, enthron'd in light,
Blazes, confeſs'd to view, and wounds our ſight.
This way, or that, alike his pow'r we try,
To ſee, but kills us—and to hear, we die.
Oh! far-felt influence of the ſpeaking ſtring,
Prompt at thy call the mounting ſoul takes wing;
Waves in the gale, fore-runs th' harmonious breeze,
And ſinks and riſes to the changeful keys.
But, hark! what length'ning ſoftneſs, thrilling new,
Steals, 'twixt the ſolemn ſwells, and threads 'em through:
'Tis her tranſporting voice!—ſhe ſings—be ſtill,
Sweet ſtrings, forbear!—ye hurt her ſweeter ſkill.
Yet, no—ſound on—the ſtrong and ſweet ſhould join;
With double pow'r, mix'd oppoſites combine.
'Tis plain! my captive ſenſes feel it true;
Ah, what dire miſchief may not union do!
Cou'd ſhe not ſave delight from half this ſtrain?
Heard and beheld at once!—'tis hopeleſs pain.
Fly and eſcape—let one preſs'd ſenſe retire;
The rais'd hat ſhades it from the darted fire.
Alas, vain ſcreen!—the ſoul's unclouded ray
Sees from within by a new blaze of day:
Sees the ſpread roof, with op'ning glories crown'd,
And radiant deities deſcending round!
Throng'd in bright lines, or wing'd in ambient air,
Spirits, in fairy forms, encloſe the fair.
Some, on the keys, in am'rous ambuſh lie,
And kiſs the tune-tipt fingers dancing by.
Some hov'ring wide, expiring ſhakes prolong,
And pour 'em back to ſwell the riſing ſong.
Gods, in abridgment, crowd their needleſs aid,
And pow'rs, and virtues, guard th' unconſcious maid.
Pity, with tears of joy, ſtands weeping near;
Kneeling devotion hangs her liſt'ning ear;
Candour and truth firm fix'd on either hand,
Propping her chair, two ſure ſupporters ſtand!
Round her, while wrong'd belief imbibes new ſtrength, [length,
And hugs th' inſtructive notes, and aids their
Love, and his train of Cupids craftier cares,
Scatter, with plumy fans, the dreaded airs.
Pride, from a diſtant corner, glooms a leer,
And longs, yet hopes not, to be call'd more near:
But charity ſits cloſe—a well known gueſt,
Bold, and domeſtic—and demands her breaſt.
High o'er her cheeks, to ſhade their tempting glow,
Shame and ſoft modeſty their mantles throw.
While, from her brow, majeſtic wiſdom ſeen,
Tempers her glory, and inſpires her mein.
Such, and perhaps more ſweet, thoſe ſounds ſhall riſe,
Which wake rewarded ſaints, when nature dies:

When heaven's heard blaſt ſhall ſhake the ſtubborn mind,
And one mix'd melody unite mankind!
When time's laſt wreck ſhall ſink in ſeas of flame,
And void eternity reſumes its name.

CELIA IN THE GARDEN.

Come, walk, and rouſe the languid year:
All nature blooms when you appear;
Each leafleſs oak would bud a-new,
And puſh out ſhade, to ſhelter you.
Your ſight would ſummer's want ſupply;
You gone---'tis winter---and we die.

Yon warbling nightingale complains,
Your praiſe, too ſeldom, tempts her ſtrains:
The tow'ring lark but hears you ſing,
And ſoars to heav'n with ſilent wing.
Come, angels come (he cries)---and ſee
Yourſelves as much outdone as me.

Each violet ſighs itſelf to death,
To ſcent the gales that fans your breath:
Stop but, and ſee th' unfolding roſe,
With emulative bluſhes glows:
While hood-wink'd lilies proſtrate lie,
Aſham'd to ſee your breaſt ſo nigh.

Look round, and ſmile---and ev'ry flow'r
Smiles too---and charms, with ten-fold pow'r.
Depart, and lo they bend and fall,
And weeping dew-drops waſte 'em all.
'Tis thus your love inflames my joy,
And thus your coldneſs might deſtroy.

THE RECOLLECTED COMPLAINER.

All mother as I am, and loth to part
With this poor playful gladd'ner of my heart,
I know too well, and I confeſs my crime,
'Tis not my right, but heav'n's, to limit time:
Parent at once, of progeny and pain,
Of what would my regardleſs grief complain?
I gave him birth, but ah, diſcern'd not why!
Children are born, poor ſuff'rers, but to die!

Pity, 'tis true, revolves their leapful ſprings,
Smil'd thanks, atoning pray'rs, embracing clings,
Sallies of guiltleſs joy, gay gleams of ſenſe,
Soft ſtroking flatt'ries—active impotence;
Tricks of dumb love, which grateful wills expreſs,
And all their nameleſs pow'rs of prettineſs!
Theſe the fond mother's feeling mem'ry ſeize,
And then the tear of nature flows for eaſe.

But reaſon's voice corrects the bold complaint,
Enjoins ſubmiſſion, and inſtructs reſtraint.
Thus wipes the plaintive parent's weeping eye,
And bids the unpermitted drop—be dry.
What is it, thou thyſelf, miſtaking mind!
Haſt found in this bad world, or hop'ſt to find?
That thy preſumptuous wiſh would dare retain,
Whom heaven's kind call exempts from future pain:
Grant that the worſt thou fear'ſt, ſhould end this blow,
And death's dark ſcreen defends thy child from woe!
Are not thy ſad forebodings, too, no more?
Are not thy fears for all his perils o'er? [way!
Of what proud wrongs might clog his life's long
What crimes might blaſt him, or what wiles betray!
What follies draw down ſcorn, what vice diſgrace!
What loſs of honour might beſpot thy race!
What want of duty might neglect thy tears!
What want of prudence grind his waning years!
What bloody dangers might cut ſhort his fame,
Or hooting infamy prolong his ſhame!

Look up, fond ſorrower! ſee the morning's ray;
Now, if you canſt fore-judge the riſing day:
Shall its aſcending ſhine continue bright?
Or ſhall o'ercaſting tempeſts call down night?
Canſt thou not tell?—Why then doſt thy bold gueſs
Preſume to call an infant's death diſtreſs?
Blind to the future, thank a watchful God,
That ſnatch'd the child from ſchool, to ſpare the rod.

THE RESIGNATION.

Well, be it ſo!—Sorrow, that ſtreams not o'er,
Spares but the eye, to wound the heart the more;
Dumb, infelt pangs, too well ſupply the woe,
That grief, in ſuff'ring ſilence, ſhuns to ſhow.
Yet let my will's reluctant pride ſubmit,
And learn to love the lot that heav'n hath fit.
All I can loſe, God gave---and, when 'tis flown,
Whom does he wrong, who but reſumes his own?
Should I in fruitleſs agony complain,
Fretting my wound but multiplies my pain:
While they, who patiently embrace diſtreſs,
Teach ſhame to ſatisfy, and grief to bleſs.
Whate'er has been, 'tis madneſs to regret;
Whate'er muſt be, ſhocks leaſt when braveſt met.
Learn then, my ſoul, thy courſe reſign'd to run,
And never pray thy will---but God's be done.

COPIES

FOR CHILDREN TO LEARN TO WRITE.

The body's beauty dwells in ſhape and face,
The ſoul's in mildneſs, modeſty, and grace;
The firſt but charms an earthly lover's eye,
The laſt draws angels from beyond the ſky;
One, for a moment, man's frail heart procures,
The other makes your God for ever yours.

ADVICE

TO THE VIRGINS, TO GUARD AGAINST FLATTERY.

Faireſt, forgive the too officious lay,
That ſend the muſe you charm to ſmooth your way;
I, though admiring, act no lover's part,
Nor bid ſoft ſounds ſeduce your liſt'ning heart:
Candidly touch'd my pen's obtruſive ſear,
Nor dares to ſhock, nor aims to ſoothe your ear;
Needleſs, 'tis true, to bid ſuch nymphs beware,
Who ev'ry grace and virtue make their care:
Yet modeſt excellence will oft deſcend
To thank unwanted caution in a friend.
A faithful pilot, fervent in his fears,
And, trembling, anxious for the worth he ſteers.

'Twere mortal pain, to see such beauty mourn,
By bold distress, or impious falsehood, torn.
Love's gay delusion tempts a thousand ways;
Now wounds with softness, now destroys with praise.
Thy veil, O flattery! hides a traitor's heart,
And gives up confidence---a prey to art:
Unbridled youth, to consequences blind,
Indulging body, hears no call of mind.
Feeble discretion, so by warmth o'er-run,
Does, with a peacock's feather, fan the sun.
Beauty, that trusts too fast, is beauty's bane,
A self-betrayer, that embraces pain.
Oh, hear suspicious, when the lover sues!
She most attracts, who longest can refuse.
Poise the try'd terms on which his hope depends,
Prop'd on the parent's counsel, and the friend's;
So, leaning safe, and wanting space to stray,
Love's guardian angels crown your nuptial day.
Or should the gilded hypocrite at last
Show, that he meant your spotless fame to blast,
Fly the found tempter, each low lure despise,
And lift your heart's wrong'd wish above surprise.
Nature, that form'd you loveliest, doubly kind,
To like perfection rais'd your conquering mind.
Fram'd you to truth, to virtue turn'd your taste,
For honour dress'd you, and for rev'rence grac'd.
Freedom regain'd, pursue the shining track,
And leave the base repenter to his rack.
Then bless the verse, that from such ruin sav'd
An artless conqu'ror, by success enslav'd:
Now happy, painless hours shall unperplex
The best-lov'd pattern of the loveliest sex.

LESBIA'S LAMENTATION

ON THE DEATH OF HER SPARROW.—ALTERED FROM MR. CARTWRIGHT.

Tell me not of joy—there's none,
Now my little sparrow's gone:
He, just like you,
Would toy and woo:
He would chirp, and flatter me:
And, till he saw me look, and smile,
Lord, how sullen he would be!

He would catch a crumb, and then,
Sporting, let it go again;
He from my lip
Would sit and sip;
From my plate he lov'd to feed;
Here would hop, and there would run,
And ev'ry look and motion heed,
Till my very heart he won.

O, how eager he would fight,
And never hurt, though often bite!
He perch'd, alas!
Upon my glass,
And ev'ry thing I did would do:
Ruffling now his feathers all,
Now as sudden let them fall,
And then grew proud, and sleek'd 'em too.

Would'st thou, Cupid, reach a heart?
With his feathers wing thy dart?
Love might that way
Sure wounds convey.

But my faithful bird is gone;
Mournful turtles murmur on.
Hop, ye red-breasts, o'er his stone;
Cease to sing, and learn to mourn.

THE MESSENGER.

Go, happy paper, gently steal,
And soft beneath her pillow lie:
There, in a dream, my love reveal,
A love that awe must else conceal,
In silent doubt to die.

Should she to flames thy hope consign,
Thy suff'ring moment soon expires,
A longer pain, alas is mine,
Condemn'd in endless woe to pine,
And feel unslack'ning fires.

But if inclin'd to hear and bless,
While in her heart soft pity stirs;
Tell her---her beauties might compel
A hermit to forsake his cell,
And change his heav'n for her's.

Oh, tell her---were her treasures mine,
Nature and art would court my aid;
The painter's colours want her shine;
The rainbow's brow not half so fine
As her sweet eye-lids shade!

By day the sun might spare his rays;
No star make ev'ning bright;
Her op'ning eyes, with sweeter blaze,
Should measure all my smiling days,
And, if she slept, 'twere night.

THE GNAT.

While in the Mall my Celia shone,
And drew th' adoring world to gaze,
A wanton gnat came buzzing on,
To gambol in her blaze.

Enliven'd by her lucid beams,
And urging bliss too nigh,
Th' attractive beauty's pow'rful streams
O'erwhelm'd him in her eye.

The glowing orb swift catching fire,
Now heat was mix'd with light;
The wing, that durst so high aspire,
She rubb'd to dust in spite.

Mean while the clouded sight shone dim;
Her sun through mists appears;
Moist anguish rose above the brim,
And flow'd away in tears.

O Gnat! too happy thus to die!
My Celia weeps thy fate;
She kills me ev'ry day—yet I
No pity can create.

Mysterious sex! by custom led,
Mere trifles, most to prize!
O, truth, to turn a lover's head!
They murder men, and weep for flies.

THE KISS THROUGH A WINDOW.

Sav'd on a shoal the shipwreck'd sailor stands,
And views with wat'ry eyes, and wringing hands
Soul-cheering prospects from the neighb'ring lands;

But if he tempts the waves, he toils in vain,
Big, buoyant billows rise between, and float him back again.
Oh! shameful loss of an invited kiss!
Can brittle glass impede so near a bliss?
Frail is our am'rous hope, if love must be
Subservient to a thing so weak as thee!
We knew before, nor sought thy aid to prove,
That light's a nat'ral enemy to love!
But now, thy malice does new arts employ;
First, give the hope, then dash the proffer'd joy.
Thus absent fanciers dream they meet the ghost
Of some dead partner, whom they value most:
But when, with op'ning arms, they rush to greet,
And, mix'd in mutual grasp, would warmly meet,
Cold blasts of wind divide the starting pair,
And the thin phantom flows away in air.

EPITAPH,

ON THE TOMB OF HENRY JERNEGAN, ESQ.

All that accomplish'd body lends mankind,
From earth receiving, he to earth resign'd:
All that e'er grac'd a soul from heav'n he drew,
And took back with him as an angel's due.

THE HAPPY MAN.

High o'er the winding of a cliffy shore, [roar;
From whose worn steep the black'ning surges
Freeman—sweet lot! in quiet plenty lives;
Rich in the unbought wealth which nature gives;
Unplanted groves rise round his shelter'd seat,
And self-sown flow'rs attract his wand'ring feet;
Lengths of wild garden his near views adorn,
And far seen fields wave with domestic corn.
The grateful herds, which his own pastures feed,
Pay their ask'd lives, and, in due tribute bleed.
Here, in learn'd leisure he relaxes life,
'Twixt prattling children, and a smiling wife.
Here, on dependent want he sheds his care,
Moves amid smiles, and all he hears is pray'r.
The world lies round him like a subject soil,
Stor'd for his service, but beneath his toil.
Hence, in a morning walk, his piercing eye
Skims the green ocean to the circling sky.
And marks at distance some returning sail,
Wing'd by the courtship of a flatt'ring gale.
The fearless crew concluding danger o'er;
With gladd'ning shouts salute the op'ning shore;
They think how best they may their gains employ,
And antedate thin scenes of promis'd joy.
Till a near quick-sand checks their shorten'd way,
And the sunk masts point through the rising spray.
Freeman starts, sad! revolves the changeful sight,
Where mis'ry can so soon succeed delight;
Then shakes his head in pity of their fate,
And sweetly conscious, hugs his happier state.

THE POWER OF ROYAL PITY.

Verses made for a Young Gentleman in Despair, and sent to Queen Caroline, by N. C—p—r.

From a moist bank, beneath a silent shade,
Whose dark'ning arch depending willows made,
A death-devoted youth, in day's cool dawn,
Weary of insults, and from woes withdrawn,
Long on the sullen surface fix'd his view,
And sigh'd—resolv'd to bid loath'd life adieu.
'Tis but to plunge, he cry'd, one moment there
Saves me from sorrow, and outleaps despair;
Cover'd with calmness in this lulling bed,
No fear shall reach my heart, no pain my head:
Terror, and shame, and want, shall with me die,
And anguish be no more alive than I.
Yet, one dear mourner will my death distress,
Whom I would live for, could I live to bless!
Her tears are tortures which I cannot bear;
Her charms give madness, and her wants despair.
Just at this word the dear distruster came,
Pierc'd the deep gloom, and catch'd the fatal aim.
Trembling with horror, yet by love impell'd,
Timely she grasp'd him; and, convulsive held:
Ah! let me keep thee, though we beg, she cry'd;
Life has no want, but what's by love supply'd:
Wretched with thee, there's recompence in pain,
And bless'd without thee, I were bless'd in vain.
Hope, suffer, think, resolve, submit, contend,
Move every foe—solicit every friend!
Die not thus young—e'er half our days are past,
Love has long years to come; death pulls too fast.
I will not feel distress while you are kind;
Nor bear a joyless world you leave behind.
See! be advis'd: turn there your hopeless eye,
View those sweet rising shades that spread so nigh.
Think, did their royal planter hear my pray'r,
How would she pity my poor heart's despair!
She the best wife, best mother, daughter, queen;
Ah! that she, now, beheld this dreadful scene!
Think on her smiles—and do but live to try!
And, if that hope proves vain—I, too, will die.

THE WEDDING DAY.

'Twas one May morning when the clouds un-
drawn,
Expos'd, in naked charms, the waking dawn;
When night-fall'n dews, by day's warm courtship
won,
From reeking roses, climb'd to kiss the sun.
Nature, new-blossom'd, shed her odours round,
The dew-bent primrose kiss'd the breeze-swept ground.
The watchful cock had thrice proclaim'd the day,
And glimmering sun-beams faintly forc'd their way: [went,
When, join'd in hand and heart, to church we
Mutual in vows, and pris'ners by consent.
Aurelia's heart beat high with mix'd alarms,
But trembling beauty glow'd with double charms.
In her soft breast a modest struggle rose,
How she should seem to like the lot she chose,
A smile she thought would dress her looks too gay;
A frown might seem too sad, and blast the day:
But, while, nor this, nor that, her will could bow,
She walk'd, and look'd, and charm'd—and knew not how.
Our hands, at length, th' unchanging fiat bound
And our glad souls sprung out to meet the sound.

Joys meeting joys unite, and ſtronger ſhine;
For paſſion purify'd grows half divine.
Aurelia, thou art mine, I cry'd---and ſhe
Sigh'd ſoft---now, Damon, thou art lord of me.
But wilt thou, whiſper'd ſhe, the knot now ty'd,
Which only death's keen weapon can divide,
Wilt thou, ſtill mindful of thy raptures paſt,
Permit the ſummer of love's hope to laſt?
Shall not cold wint'ry froſts come on too ſoon?
Ah, ſay! what means the world by honeymoon?
If we ſo ſhort a ſpace our bliſs enjoy,
What toils does love for one poor month employ?
Women thus us'd like bubbles blown with air,
Owe to their outward charms a ſun-gilt glare.
Like them we glitter to the diſtant eye;
But, graſp'd like them, we do but weep and die.
Leſt more, ſaid I, thou ſhould'ſt profane the bliſs,
I'll ſeal thy dang'rous lips with this cloſe kiſs;
Not thus the heav'n of marriage hopes blaſpheme,
But learn from me to ſpeak on this lov'd theme.
There have been wedlock joys of ſwift decay,
Like lightning, ſeen at once, and ſhot away:
But theirs were hopes, which, all unfit to pair,
Like fire and powder, kiſs'd and flaſh'd to air.
Thy ſoul and mine, by mutual courtſhip won,
Meet, like two mingling flames, and make but one.
Union of hearts, not hands, does marriage make;
'Tis ſympathy of mind keeps love awake.
Our growing days increaſe of joy ſhall know,
And thick-ſown comforts leave no room for woe.
Thou, the ſoft ſwelling vine, ſhall fruitful laſt;
I, the ſtrong elm, will prop thy beauties faſt:
Thou ſhalt ſtrow ſweets to ſoften life's rough way,
And, when hot paſſions my proud wiſhes ſway,
Thou, like ſome breeze, ſhall in my boſom play.
Thou for protection ſhalt on me depend;
And I, on thee, for a ſoft faithful friend.
I, in Aurelia ſhall for ever view,
At once my care, my fear, my comfort too!
Thou ſhalt firſt partner in my pleaſures be,
But all my pains ſhall laſt be known to thee.
Aurelia heard, and view'd me with a ſmile,
Which ſeem'd at once to cheriſh and revile!
O, God of Love! ſhe cry'd, what joys were thine,
If all life's race were wedding days like mine!

THE DREAM.

SLOW-RISING night had her black flag unfurl'd,
And ſpread her ſooty mantle o'er the world;
The waining moon ſhed pale, a ſickly light,
And ſtars ſcarce twinkled to th' inquiring ſight.
Half the loſt earth by darkneſs over-run,
Wept in cold dews the abſence of the ſun.
The waves were huſh'd; the winds forgot to roar,
And ſtorms detach'd in breezes cours'd the ſhore.
The mix'd creation was involv'd in ſleep;
Fiſhes roll'd ſlumb'ring through the ſtagnate deep,
Beaſts, birds, and ſerpents, various beds poſſeſt,
Some in thick woods, ſome in dark caverns reſt.
Antipathies in common ſleep took part;
Care curs'd not thought, and woe forgot to ſmart.
Immerg'd in reſt my drowſy ſenſes lay,
And death's proud image practis'd on my clay.
But while, diſdainful of the mean controul,
No dull deſires invade my wakeful ſoul;
Active the inſpirer, ſkilful to purſue
Through the wild tracks of mazy mem'ry flew;
There ſcatter'd images to union brought,
And form'd this wond'rous viſion to my thought:
I found myſelf at dead of deepeſt night,
Cheer'd, by no glimm'ring ſpark of remnant light,
Lock'd in that ancient venerable pile,
Which holds her ſacred duſt, who, lately bleſt our iſle;
Aſcending damps the gloomy concave fought,
And hung impriſon'd to th' impervious vault:
While my ſhod feet trac'd ſwift the duſky round,
Hoarſe echoes multiply'd the trampling ſound,
The ſweating ſtones diſtill'd a noiſome dew,
And earthy ſcents my death-fed noſtrils drew.
Cold froſts of fear pierc'd keen through ev'ry part,
And ſhiv'ring agues ſhook my ice-bound heart.
A hollow wind from whiſtling murmurs bore
As gath'ring din more high, and ſtrove to roar!
The tatter'd trophies fann'd the priſon'd air,
And chill amazement ſtiffen'd up my hair.
While fix'd I ſtood, intent on rumblings near,
And diſtant groans alarm'd my aching ear;
Sudden, the temple ſhone, with ruſhing light,
And new-born terrors overwhelm'd my ſight.
Ghoſts from the loos'ning pavement rais'd their head,
And yawning graves diſcloſe their ſhrouded dead.
Shot up in ſtreams, a miſt of ſpirits riſe,
As morning exhalations ſtreak the ſkies.
Soul-freezing horror tingled through my blood,
And curdling fear bound hard the vital flood!
Unbending nerves their dying vigour loſt,
And drooping life ſcarce held her dang'rous poſt!
Large drops of ſweat, from every finger ſhed,
And the whole frame of nature ſhook with dread!
From the eaſt end, where mould'ring monarchs lie,
And worms, luxuriant, feaſt on royalty;
Where each proud tomb ſome duſt of princes boaſts,
There marches out a troop of ſov'reign ghoſts:
Each in his ſhadowy hand a ſceptre brings,
Th' acknowledg'd mark of pow'r in living kings.
A glittering diadem each forehead wore,
Their robes trail'd looſe, and ſwept the honour'd floor.
With ſlow and ſtately ſtride, the monarchs tread,
And ev'ry meaner ſpirit bows its head.
In foremoſt rank, as lateſt known to fame,
The grave-brow'd ghoſt of awful ANNA came;
Calm and ſerene the ſilent walks they trace,
And halt, regardful, at each ſolemn place:
Viſit each tomb, and in myſterious ſtate,
Hail the dry remnants of the waſted great.
This pomp of death, thus, wore half night away,
And came, at length, where DENMARK's body lay:
There ANNA ſtaid, and looking careful round,
With ſhadowy ſceptre, touch'd the conſcious ground.
'Tis ſtrange, ſhe ſigh'd, that he whom moſt I bleſt,
Has never thank'd me, ſince I came to reſt.
The willing ghoſt his marbly fetters broke,
And roſe up, ſlowly, at the pow'rful ſtroke;

An air of ſorrow bent his ſerious head,
His eyes ſome ſeeming tears, reluctant, ſhed;
With folded arms, and diſcontented look,
Thrice bow'd he, gently, and thus faintly ſpoke:
Hail, happy ſhade! reſt here, unforc'd to reign,
Nor toil, to ſave a ſtubborn land in vain:
How did juſt pity ſweeten thy controul?
How did'ſt thou ſtrain thy virtue-propping ſoul?
How did'ſt thou wiſh th' unfiniſh'd courſe to run?
And act in will, what pow'r has left undone!
For this, ſince death, detraction wounds thy fame,
And inſolent reproach corrodes thy name.
Ungrateful people! unrepenting ſtate!
Haſt thou, O queen! deſerv'd th' ungentle fate?
He ceas'd:—Each liſt'ning monarch ſhook his head,
While ſhe to whom he ſpoke, thus anſw'ring ſaid:
O DENMARK! wonder not at ills like thoſe;
Angels, if crown'd in England, would have foes!
Deſert like mine, with living glories paid,
Can fear no ſcandal, when become a ſhade.
If aught's left wanting to my people's pray'r,
Mourn not th' unfiniſh'd progreſs of my care:
When princes ſome wiſh'd good in vain purſue,
By them not done, 'tis left for heav'n to do.
Let us in peace enjoy our ſilent bed,
Truth always triumphs when ſhe ſerves the dead.

THE NORTHERN STAR.

BORN in an age, when virtue veils her face,
And bold corruption turns the bluſh on grace;
Where reptile genius winds, at pow'rs controul,
And fortune's whelmy tides ingulf the ſoul:
Where ſenſe by flatt'ry; ſhame by want is weigh'd,
And ſervile poets make their art a trade,
Riſe, gen'rous muſe! out-ſoar the venal view;
For praiſe is inſult where 'tis giv'n undue.
Though penſion'd fame can fawn, till fools are taught
To boaſt th' imputed wit their brib'ry bought;
Yet man to man's reſpect is rais'd, not born,
And dullneſs dignifi'd, but doubles ſcorn.
Ah! narrow hearts! that know not wiſdom's weight,
But impudently call the proud the great.
Spread the broad wings of truth, impartial muſe!
Dare a new theme—nor, now, let fancy chooſe;
Serious, and ſad, the faults of cuſtom mend,
To friendleſs genius fame's due ſuccour lend—
If, in ſome duſky corner, thou ſhalt find
A ragged fortune hide a nobler mind,
Diſperſe the cloud; and be the labour thine,
To teach the ſhame-fac'd virtue, how to ſhine.
Or, ſhould ſome wealth-encumber'd churl withhold
Th' enlivening uſe of unpartaken gold,
If meanly proud, the wretch diſdains to weigh,
The wiſe man's wants, againſt the treaſur'd clay.
With ceaſeleſs ſatire, goad his ſneaking ſoul,
Till his pride, ſuff'ring, gives his taſte controul.
Then, muſe! from life's low wrongs, indignant, turn,
With loftier flame, for ſuff'ring nations, burn.
On flatter'd ſtateſmen, ſcowl a patriot eye;
Strip their badg'd poets, when they write, to lie.
If, rais'd by chance, ſome tarniſher of ſway,
Blund'ring through ſhifts, miſtakes th' unwinding way,
If, lumb'ring clogg'd, he drags, be-mir'd, along,
Cow'rs, to be ſafe—yet, injures, to be ſtrong,
Tell him,—that hair-breadth 'ſcapes, and life-long fear,
Buy pow'r, and pomp, and infamy, too dear.
Paſs, paſs, theſe ſulph'ry meteors, of a day;
Their blaze too dang'rous! and too loſt, their way!
On ſuns, not comets, fix thy eagly ken,
Touch the proud hearts of monarchs, into men.
Thence, flows contagion: light muſt generate light,
Or mimic millions catch the royal blite:
Kings, who are kings, ſhed luſtre o'er mankind;
But dim-ey'd princes make whole nations blind.
—So, godlike Cæſar rul'd ungrateful Rome,
And ſhort-liv'd virtue ſhot a blaſted bloom:
But, when lewd Nero ſtain'd imperial ſway,
Vice, with a rapid ſtream, ſwept ſhame away.
Let the low muſe, that ſtrikes the venal ſtrings,
Tune her tame lyre, and ſwell the pomp of kings.
Undreading, thou, where'er the cenſure falls,
Enter proud palaces imperious walls.
There,—good, or evil—ſeize th' unſhadow'd fact,
And call truth, truth, however princes act.
Sublimely fir'd, I ſnatch the glorious aim!
'Twere great, indeed, to give the royal, fame!
But,—where, O ſpotleſs light, of reaſon's eye!
Where, among princes, wilt thou greatneſs ſpy?
Shall Britain's boaſt o'erload my lab'ring lines?
No—with known force, domeſtic glory ſhines!
Flatt'ry were baſe: and needleſs the deſign,
To ſay (to angels), heav'n is all divine.
Northward, departing muſe, extend thy flight;
There, a new ſun inflames the land of night;
There, arts and arms, the worlds fifth empire raiſe;
There dateleſs times ſhall hail my prophet praiſe;
Thy line, great Czar! ſhall ſtretch that ſhorten'd name,
To more than Cæſar's pow'r, and all his fame.
Taught, by thy plans, to reign victorious ſtill,
And length'ning down, through time, thy deathleſs ſkill,
Legions of kings, ſhall wait their doomful nod,
As hoſts, from Moſes, watch'd th' inſpiring God!
O! pride, celeſtial, of my muſe's praiſe!
Thou! beſt invok'd!—inſpire my riſing lays,
Kindle my glowing ſoul, with fires, like thine,
And lend me light, to make my off'ring ſhine!
Though right to mark, how tow'ring eagles fly,
Aſks the try'd ſharpneſs of an eagle's eye;
Though high-rais'd view, can beſt, a proſpect ſhow,
Which he but ill deſcribes, who ſtands too low;
Yet, if, aſpiring to the theme,—I feel
Thy glory's love propel my trembling zeal,
O, prince! the grateful arrogance forgive;
No genuine muſe, ſo charm'd, can ſilent live.
Periſh the pride, in poor diſtinction ſhown,
That makes man blind, to bleſſings not his own!

Briton and Ruſſian differ, but in name:
In nature's ſenſe, all nations are the ſame.
One world, divided, diſtant brothers ſhare,
And man is reaſon's ſubject---every where.
So, does dark Nile's myſterious torrent ſtray,
And oozy wealth, in annual flood, convey.
Memphia's rich plains, imbibe th' impregnate flow,
And pleas'd Egyptians ſee proud harveſts grow.
Yet while on Egypt partial harveſts ſmile,
Egypt's glad ſons engroſs not all their Nile.
Egypt, and all the world, the river claim:
Egypt in influence, and the world in fame.
So, Ruſſia feels her Czar's intenſeſt heat:
But the warm'd world his diſtant brightneſs greet.
Ages, obſcurely loſt to ſlighted fame,
Rob'd the dim empire of its bury'd name;
One city's bounds uſurp'd her monarch's rights,
And ſhrunk his thouſand ſtates to Muſcovites.
Unmeaſur'd realms lay hid in noiſeleſs reign,
And Ruſſia cover'd half the world in vain!
Till rip'ning time this giant-genius ſent;
Divinely ſiz'd---to ſuit his crown's extent!
He breath'd prolific ſoul, inſpir'd the land,
And call'd forth order, with directive hand.
Then pow'r's whole energy, at once ſpread wide,
And old obſtruction ſunk beneath its tide.
Then, ſhad'wing all, the dread dominion roſe,
Which late no hope, and now no danger knows!
Did not, O prince! thy love of art's ſoft charms
Suſpend the keener influence of thy arms,
Aſtoniſh'd Europe, envious of thy ſway,
Muſt wink malignant, in thy ſtream of day!
But 'tis thy generous taſk, to ſteer thy reign,
'Twixt the two wide extremes of mean and vain.
To teach fierce conqu'rors all that arts beſtow,
Yet hold back arms till juſtice names the foe.
Not ſo, of old, when, ſtern in horrid arms,
The needy north pour'd forth her Gothic ſwarms;
Roughly they warr'd, on arts they could not taſte.
And, blindly laid the tracks of learning waſte.
This heav'n remember'd, and, with kind command,
Call'd for atonement from the barb'rous land.
The prince, diſdainful of his country's crime,
Guiltleſs, ſprings forward, to uncurſe the clime:
And, nobly juſt, has taught the nations more,
Than the world's empire ruin'd---loſt before!
How vaſt the engine!---and the force how great! [weight!
That could, ſo ſwiftly, move ſuch pond'rous
Enormous boaſt of kings! who,---though his reign
Stretch'd empire's endleſs line, from main to main,
Counts not his greatneſs by his country's length,
Nor from dependent millions ſteals his ſtrength.
But, to himſelf (like heav'n) his effluence owes,
And gives---not takes---what pow'r from number flows. [ſchemes,
Born, for eternal growth---and ſtor'd with
For whit'ning time, with ever-blooming themes.
Wonders on wonders gild a glowing land,
That almoſt ow'd diſtinction to his hand!
From frozen climes, where nature, ſtiff with cold,
Nouriſh'd no hope; and time in tears grew old:
Warm'd by the monarch's worth, we riſing ſaw
Springs of gay virtue---and ripe fruits of law!
Doubly ſupreme! thy unreſtrain'd controul
Directs the body, and empow'rs the ſoul!
While vulgar kings their views ſupinely ſcan,
And limit what they would by what they can;
Thy nobler pow'r, with more than martial ſway,
Commands---and makes men able to obey!
Tranſporting thought!---let me indulge it long,
Hence realms grow mighty and their influence ſtrong.
Ah! why by civil broils ſhould patriots bleed,
For parts in pow'r, they nor enjoy nor need?
Leſs factious ſubjects happier freedom ſhare;
Miſ-reckon'd ſlaves in ſuch a ſovereign's care.
Slaves are blind buſt'lers, who, deceiv'd by names,
Promote, unknowingly, their ſpoiler's aims:
Who (told ſedition ſets a nation free)
Hug the new chain---and call it liberty.
Then---walking gall'd, beneath th' incumbent weight,
Grind a curb'd curſe, and bear th' impos'd deceit.
If juſt Athenians, by a Theſeus led,
Their ſcatter'd country's ſtrength-uniting head!
To laſting praiſe conſign'd his cheriſh'd fame,
And, conſcious of his bounty, bleſs'd his name;
If hard Lycurgus, now immortal grown,
Sheds deathleſs glory round a realmleſs throne;
If, Romulus! thy mem'ry triumphs ſtill,
For teaching Rome to rob with ſafer ſkill;
For reining rapine in from private harms,
To mightier miſchief in confed'rate arms:
What praiſe, prodigious Czar! ſhall dare to tread,
In awful circles, near thy ſacred head?
To whom, not one ſmall portion ſingly kneels,
In thanks for ſep'rate benefits it feels:
But nations, numberleſs as Lybian ſands,
Share the long bounties of thy reaching hands---
Thy hands! to whom delighted with thy praiſe,
God gave not thrones to reign on---but to raiſe.
Thy catching luſtre fires the north's wide ſoul,
And thaws the icy influence of the pole.
The ſhaggy Samoid, ſhaking off the ſnow,
Warms his cold breaſt with new deſire to know.
The rugged Tartar, from whoſe ſwarthy bands
A gloom of horror us'd to ſhade thy lands,
Charm'd by thy gen'rous daring, checks his own,
Aſſumes new nature, and adorns thy throne.
Beams of young learning, active as the wind,
Radiant, flame out, and light up half mankind:
Stern ſuperſtition's miſty cloud diſpell'd, [held:
Quits her chief throne, through long dark ages
And Ruſſian arms a glitt'ring terror caſt, [paſt!
O'er realms, where ſcarce the Ruſſian name had
Bluſh, ye bought bards! of our degen'rate days,
Whom penſion proſtitutes to high-way praiſe:
Who fear it fruitleſs for a muſe to roam,
Thence, poorly, pin your venal hearts at home!
The world's my country: born, no matter where,
Man is a denizen of earth and air:
Native to truth, 'tis his all worth to ſhow,
And love the hoſtile virtues of a foe.
Ah! how too weak my willing verſe purſues,
And flags beneath new heights of op'ning views!
Touch my charm'd heart, thou God! that didſt inſpire
His force! and let me feel th' impulſive fire.

Sunk amid fens, in fortune's ſtagnate tract,
And curs'd myſelf, with want of power to act.
Let me at leaſt deſcribe, with conſcious blaze,
And, from another's triumph, force ſome praiſe.
O! great Eternal Pow'r, that bounds our minds,
What circling darkneſs human foreſight blinds?
Where are the loſt effects of ſtateſmen's dreams?
Whoſe erring envy ſpun ſuch cobweb ſchemes!
Long—each vain terror beat one devious road;
And ſigh'd at growing France with falſe forebode:
While, unobſerv'd, th' exulting northern bear
Grin'd over gen'ral empire, riſing there.
Henceforth, let none the ſtrength of ſtates compare:
Nor what they may be, judge from what they are.
Low the lord's genius, all his realms the ſame:
The king's breaſt wid'ning, ſwells his throne to fame.
Then, pow'r effulging, diſtanc'd equals find,
That man's whole boundleſs diff'rence dwells in mind.
This truth,—dread dark'ner of each rival throne!
Well has thy life's long tract of wonders ſhown;
What ſudden fleets have ſhadow'd diſtant ſeas,
With flags that ſtart to pow'r, and ſcorn degrees;
Glooming at pleaſure, ev'ry hoſtile ſhore,
Far-trembling nations hear new thunders roar;
Th' intrepid Swede does fortune's change upbraid,
And ſees th' aſſaulted enemy invade!
The Dane finds gratitude too weak for fear,
And hates his helper's ſtrength, diſplay'd too near.
The furrow'd Baltic a new lord obeys,
And to ſtrange keels reluctant homage pays.
The virgin Caſpian, he, bold lover! woes;
Nor vainly, for her envy'd favour ſues:
Graſp'd to his wiſh, ſhe has her love confeſs'd,
And giv'n him leave to wander o'er her breaſt.
Perſia's heap'd wealth ſhall her huge portion be,
And India's ſovereign's give her lord the knee.
From nameleſs outlets, endleſs naval hoſts,
Black'ning, ſtill more, the ſable Euxine's coaſts,
Shall teach the Porte's imperial walls to ſhake,
And the fell ſultan's iron ſceptre break.
Grecia's loſt ſoul ſhall be reſtor'd by thee!
Great ſaver! ſetting empire's genius free!
Then, Helleſpont, whoſe ſtream indignant glides,
And a ſubjected world's two bounds divides;
Shall feel, while reaching both, thy thunder roars,
Europe and Aſia, trembling to her ſhores.
Then, may thy floating empire's conq'ring ſweep
New greet vaſt Ruſſia round th' Atlantic deep.
So ſpring the ſeeds of pow'r, when wiſely ſown!
So pregnant genius plans the future throne!
Mean while, great founder! gath'ring ſtrength from blows,
They ſpread thy glory who thy arms oppoſe.
The ſelf-priz'd lords of China's boaſtful land,
Feel their pride ſhrink beneath thy bord'ring hand:
The trackleſs wilds, which both vaſt ſtates disjoin,
Are ev'n, when arm'd with ſhiv'ring winter, thine!
O'er realms of ſnow thy furry ſquadrons fly,
And bring, at eaſe, the dreadful diſtance nigh!
In vain oppos'd, th' enormous wall they ſee;
Proclaim'd defiance can but quicken thee.
Zembla's white cliffs—eternal hoards of froſt,
Where proud diſcov'ry has ſo oft been loſt;
Through every period of the world till now,
Have check'd all keels that would thoſe oceans plow.
Nature's laſt barrier! they all ſearch withſtood,
And bound ambition up in freezing blood.
Reſerv'd by heav'n, and for thy reign deſign'd,
Thy piercing eye ſhall that dark paſſage find.
Or, caſt's and weſt's embracing confines ſhown,
Join two emerging world's; and both thy own.
Stop, headlong muſe!—Ah! whither would'ſt thou go?
Look down with caution on the depths below:
Proſpects too vaſt the raſh preſumer fright;
And, dazzling, wound an uncollected ſight.
Congratulate a while our church's gain,
And mingling joy, relax thy wonder's ſtrain.
Shall then, at laſt, beneath propitious ſkies,
The croſs triumphant o'er the creſcent riſe?
Shall we behold earth's long ſuſtain'd diſgrace
Reveng'd in arms on Oſman's haughty race?
Shall Chriſtian Greece ſhake off a captive ſhame,
And look unbluſhing at her Pagan fame?
'Twill be.—Prophetic Delphos claims her own:
Hails her new Cæſars on a Ruſſian throne.
Athens ſhall teach once more! once more aſpire!
And Spartan breaſts reglow with martial fire:
Still, ſtill, Bizantium's bright'ning domes ſhall ſhine,
And rear the ruin'd name of Conſtantine, [be!
Tranſcendent prince! how happy muſt thou
What can'ſt thou look upon, unbleſs'd by thee?
What inward peace muſt that calm boſom know,
Whence conſcious virtue does ſo ſtrongly flow!
Each fame, of ages paſt, in ruin lies:
How timely, therefore, does thy greatneſs riſe,
To fire forgetful thrones, with thirſt of praiſe;
And build example for theſe feeble days! [ſhine,
Such, are the kings, who make God's image
Nor bluſh to dare aſſert their right divine!
No earth-born bias warps they climbing will:
No pride their power—no av'rice whets their ſkill.
They poiſe each hope which bids the wiſe obey,
And ſhed broad bleſſings from their wid'ning ſway.
To raiſe th' afflicted, ſtretch the healing hand,
Drive cruſh'd oppreſſion from each reſcu'd land.
Bold in alternate right, or ſheath or draw
The ſword of conqueſt, or the ſword of law.
Spare what reſiſts not; what oppoſes, bend;
And govern cool, what they with warmth defend.
How bleſs'd were man! would heav'n hereafter pleaſe,
That all earth's princes ſhould be form'd like theſe!
Wiſh it, O muſe! howe'er the wiſh be vain;
It gives ſome joy to hope th' unlikelieſt gain.
Adieu—dread flame! that bids the pole out-ſhine
The torrid brightneſs of the burning line!
Drawn by thy beamy force, I ſtill would gaze;
But my eyes ake beneath th' oppreſſive blaze,
Deſcend, raſh muſe!—'tis decent to retire;
Thy fall were dang'rous, if thy flight were higher.
Thou, too, great prince! forbear th' ador'd exceſs!
Reſt—for thy life, and make thy glory leſs.

Heav'n must reclaim thee—nor thy absence bear,
When earth yields no new wonder worth thy care.
Mourn'd, the near prospect! yet not mourn'd by all!
There are, whose humbler glory waits thy fall.
When thou, great sun of royalty! shalt set,
And pay sad nature's last and surest debt:
Then earth's low lords may boast their poor designs,
And ev'ry upstart twinkler think—he shines.
Then, when no more thy wonders wake mankind,
But dying envy leaves delight behind,
Here, while thy steps admiring ages trace,
Where shall amazement first encomium place?
Arduous decision! which most honour won?
Thy actions, or the speed with which they're done.
When Rome, that glitt'ring, that immortal name!
Aspir'd to rule, and panted after fame;
Age copying age, spun length of patient will,
And ek'd th' oft-breaking thread, with lab'ring skill.
Nor till sev'n hundred hard-press'd years were past,
The late propitious fortune smil'd at last.
Not such slow rise, O prince! thy Russia fears:
Thou dragg'st not glory from such depth of years.
At once resolv'd, at once the columns rise,
Which lift thy dreadful fabric to the skies.
Form and degrees, let bounded spirits need:
Thy soul, eccentric, moves with in-bred speed:
Makes nature shake, and raises in a day,
What with less ease in ages shall decay.
So, when young time its first great birth-day kept,
And huddled nature yet in chaos slept;
Th' eternal Word, to set distinction free,
But spoke th' almighty fiat—Let there be.
Millions of ways the starting atoms flew;
Like clung to like—and sudden order grew:
Struggling in clouds, a while confusion lay,
Then died at once and lost itself in day.

THE PICTURE OF LOVE.

Love is a passion by no rules confin'd,
The great first mover of the human mind:
Spring of our fate! it lifts the climbing will,
Or sinks the soften'd soul in seas of ill:
Science, truth, virtue, sweetness, glory, grace,
All are love's influence, and adorn his race;
Love, too gives fear, despair, grief, anger, strife,
And all th' unnumber'd woes which tempest life,
Fir'd with a daring wish, to paint him right,
What muse shall I invoke to lend me light?
Something divine there lives in love's soft flame,
Beyond our spirit's pow'r to give it name!
How shall I paint it then? or why reveal
A pleasure and a pain which all must feel?
Soul of thy sex's sweetness! aid my hope,
Pride of my reason, and my passion's scope!
Thou, whose least motion can delight inspire!
And whose sweet eye-beams shed celestial fire!
Thou, at whose heav'n-tun'd voice the dead might wake!
And from whose face we fatal learning take,
Teach me thy godlike pow'r the heart to move,
Smile on my verse and look the world to love?
Far, ye profane, from my chaste subject fly,
Nor stain its brightness with a tainted eye;
What if a thousand ills the wanton prove,
Whose earth-born heat usurps the name of love?
Lovers, indeed, are cast in no coarse mould,
How few have yet been form'd, though time's grown old!
No wild desire can this proud bliss bestow,
Souls must be match'd, in heav'n, though mix'd below,
As fire, by nature, climbs direct and bright,
And beams in spotless rays, a shining light;
But if some gross obstruction stop its way,
Smokes in low curls and scents the sullied day:
So love itself, untainted and refin'd,
Borrows a tincture from the colour'd mind;
The great grow greater while its force they prove,
But little hearts want room and cripple love.
Cautious, ye fated, who frequent the fair!
Your breasts examine, nor too rashly dare,
Curb your untrusted hearts while yet they're free,
Love is resistless when you feel 'tis he. [dart,
Small is the soul's first wound, from beauty's
And scarce th' unheeded fever warms the heart.
Long we mistake it, under liking's name,
A soft indulgence that deserves no blame;
A pleasure we but take to do her right, [light;
Whose presence charms us, and whose words de-
Whose sweet remembrance broods upon our breast,
And whose dear friendship is with pride possest.
Excited thus the smother'd fire at length,
Bursts into blaze, and burns with open strength:
That image which before but sooth'd the mind,
Now lords it there, and rages unconfin'd.
Mixing with all our thoughts it wastes the day,
And when night comes, it dreams the soul away,
Pungent impatient tingles in each vein,
And the sick bosom throbs with aching pain,
Absent from her, in whom alone we live,
Life grows a bankrupt and no bliss can give;
Friends are importunate, and pleasure's lost,
What once most charm'd us now, disgusts us most:
Fretful to silent solitude we run,
And men, and light, and noisy converse shun;
Pensive in woods, on river's sides we walk,
And to th' unlist'ning winds and waters talk;
How next we shall approach her pleas'd we weigh,
And think in transport all we mean to say:
Tenderly bowing, thus will we complain,
Thus court her pity, and thus plead our pain;
Thus sigh at fancy'd frowns, if frowns should rise,
And thus meet favours in her soft'ning eyes.
Restless on paper we our vows repeat,
And pour our souls out on the missive sheet:
Write, blot, restore—and, in lost pieces rend
The mute entreaters, yet too faint to send;
Unbless'd if no admission we procure,
'Tis heav'n at distance to behold her door!
Or to her window we by night repair,
And let loose fancy to be feasted there;
Watch her lov'd shadow as it glances by,
And to imagin'd motions chain our eye;
Has she some field, or grove, or garden bless'd?
Pleas'd we retread the paths her feet have press'd;
Near her, by chance, at visits or at plays,
Our rushing spirits crowd in speaking gaze;

Light on her varied airs our eye-balls ride,
Blind as the dead to the full world beſide.
If bleſs'd by ſome kind letter from her hand,
The cheriſh'd flame is into madneſs fann'd;
Trembling we half devour the ſacred prize,
And lend our thoughts and lips to aid our eyes;
No wild extravagance of joy's too much,
For aught once warm'd by her enlivening touch.
Theſe are the ſweet effuſions of deſire,
When abſence wounds us, or when wiſhes fire;
But when in preſence we our vows addreſs,
Who can the tumults of the ſoul expreſs?
Boundleſs deſire, aw'd hope, and doubtful joy,
Stormy by turns the veering heart employ;
Sick'ning in fancy's ſunſhine, now we faint,
And licence wounds us deeper than reſtraint:
Fix'd in her opening door ſurpris'd we ſtay;
Dumb and depriv'd of all we meant to ſay:
Our eyes flaſh meanings but our rooted feet
Pauſe till due rev'rence ſaints the hallow'd heat:
Soft tremblings ſeize us and a gentle dread,
Speechleſs our thought, and all our courage fled.
Slowly reviving, we from love's ſhort trance,
Softly with bluſhful tenderneſs advance;
Bowing we kneel, and her giv'n hand is preſt,
With ſweet compulſion to our bounding breaſt;
O'er it in ecſtacy our lips bend low,
And tides of ſighs 'twixt her graſp'd fingers flow:
High beats the hurried pulſe at each forc'd kiſs,
And ev'ry burning ſinew aches with bliſs:
Life in a ſouly deluge ruſhes o'er,
And the charm'd heart ſprings out at ev'ry pore.
The firſt fierce rapture of amazement paſt,
Confuſion quits us, and deſire grows faſt;
We ſit, and while her gaz'd-at beauties riſe,
A humid brightneſs ſparkles from our eyes:
Modeſt diſquiet ev'ry action wears,
And each long look the mark of paſſion bears!
Diſorder'd nature no cold medium keeps,
Tranſport now reigns, and dull reflection ſleeps:
All that we feel, or wiſh, or act, or ſay,
Is above thought and out of reaſon's way;
Joy murmurs, anger laughs, and hope looks ſad;
Raſhneſs grows prudent and diſcretion mad:
Reſtleſs we feel our am'rous boſom burn,
Now this way look we, and now that way turn.
Now in ſweet ſwell of thought our lifted eyes,
Loſe their low langour and attempt to riſe,
Now ſinking ſuppliant ſeek the charmer's feet,
And court wiſh'd pity in their glanc'd retreat,
Oft, in fix'd gaze, they dwell upon her face,
Then ſtart aſtoniſh'd from ſome dazzling grace;
Now in bold liberty fly out unbid,
Now aw'd, 'ſcape inward 'twixt the cloſing lid.
If we dare ſpeak, and would our wiſh purſue,
The words fall feath'ry like deſcending dew;
The ſoft'ning accents ev'n in utt'rance die,
And the tongue's ſweetneſs here out-charms the eye;
'Till mingled ſighs the fainting voice confound,
But lover's meanings ſpeak though robb'd of ſound.
Is there no more? oh! yet the laſt remains!
Crown of our conqueſt! ſweet'ner of our pains!
There is a time when love no wiſh denies,
And ſmiling nature throws off all diſguiſe;
But who can words to ſpeak thoſe raptures find?
Vaſt ſea of ecſtacy that drowns the mind!
That fierce tranſfuſion of exchanging hearts!
That gliding glimpſe of heav'n in pulſive ſtarts!
That veiny ruſh! that warm tumultuous roll!
That fire which kindles body into ſoul!
And on life's margin ſtrains delight ſo high,
That ſenſe breaks ſhort, and while we taſte we die.
By love's ſoft force, all nature is refin'd,
The dull made ſprightly and the cruel kind:
Gently the ſtubborn paſſions learn to move,
And ſavage hearts are humaniz'd by love:
Love in a chain of converſe bound mankind,
And poliſh'd and awak'd the rugged mind:
Juſtice, truth, pity, openneſs of heart,
Courage, politeneſs, eloquence and art,
That gen'rous fire with which ambition flames,
And all th' unſleeping ſoul's divineſt aims,
Touch'd by the warmth of love burn up more bright,
Proud of the godlike pow'r to give delight.
Thus have I vainly ſtrove, with ſtrokes too faint
Love in his known and outward marks to paint;
Unmindful that of old they veil'd his face,
And wiſely cover'd what they could not trace.
Lovely creator of my ſoul's ſoft pain,
Pity the pencil that aſpir'd in vain:
Vers'd in love's pangs and taught his pow'r by you,
Skill'd, I preſum'd that what I felt I drew;
But I have err'd; and with delirous aim,
Would picture motion and impriſon flame.
He who can lightning's flaſh to colours bind,
May paint love's influence on the burning mind.
Then when we maſter him and give him law,
Then may we chain him and his image draw:
But who would bind this god muſt captive take
A power which all mankind can captive make:
I am too weak of heart, yet I can tell
Thoſe who dare ſeize him, where he loves to dwell.
I ſee him now; in his own heaven he lies,
Cloſe at ſweet ambuſh in Miranda's eyes.

ADVICE TO THE POETS.

Too long provok'd, immortal muſe, forgive;
Rouſe a dead world, and teach my verſe to live.
Not the low muſe, who lends her feeble fire,
To fluſh pale ſpleen, or light up looſe deſire;
But that bright influence, that expanſive glow,
Which firſt in angel's numbers learn'd to flow;
Ere time had ſtruck eternity with ſhade,
Or day, or night, or ſpace, or form, was made:
Tun'd the rais'd notes at which creation grew,
And worlds, and ſtars, and ſuns, and heav'ns, ſhot new.
She, ſhe, the muſe---Oh, ne'er to be defin'd;
Thou flame of purpoſe! and thou flow of mind!
Thou path of praiſe, by heav'n's firſt fav'rites trod!
Thou voice of prophets! and thou breath of God!
I feel her now---th' invader fires my breaſt;
And my ſoul ſwells, to ſuit th' heav'nly gueſt:
Hear her, O Pope! ſhe ſounds th' inſpir'd decree,
Thou great archangel of wit's heav'n! for thee,

Let vulgar genii, four'd by ſharp diſdain,
Piqu'd and malignant words, low war maintain,
While ev'ry meaner art exerts her aim,
O'er rival arts, to lift her queſtion'd fame;
Let half-ſoul'd poets ſtill on poets fall,
And teach the willing world to ſcorn them all.
But let no muſe, pre-eminent as thine,
Of voice melodious, and of force divine,
Stung by wit's waſps, all rights of rank forego,
And turn, and ſnarl, and bite, at every foe.
No like thy own Ulyſſes, make no ſtay;
Shun monſters, and purſue thy ſtreamy way.
Wing'd by the muſe's god to riſe ſublime,
What has thy fame to fear from peeviſh rhyme?
Shalt thou, decreed till time's own death to live,
Yet want the nobleſt courage---to forgive?
Slander'd in vain, enjoy the ſpleen of foes;
Let theſe from envy hate; from int'reſt thoſe!
Guilt, like the firſt, your gratitude requires,
Since none can envy, till he firſt admires:
And nature tells the laſt his crime is none,
Who to your int'reſt but prefers his own.
Diſgrac'd by victory where we ſtrike too low,
And meanly furious ſtretch the ſtooping blow,
Pride, that provokes revenge, miſleads it too;
Return of ſlander is the weak man's view:
The wiſe expect it with a cold diſdain;
And, while they not receive, retort the pain.
Should ev'n hot raſhneſs erring javelins throw,
And ſtrike our friendly breaſt, ſuppos'd a foe?
How nobler ſtill to undeceive than blame!
And chaſten inſult with the bluſh of ſhame?
Never ah, never ſhall that worth be found,
Which neither malice nor miſtake can wound!
Thus far might ev'ry ſtrength of heart extend;
Thus far can ethic ſprings our tempers bend:
Thus far the thoughts of ſaints or kings may riſe,
And each known greatneſs of earth's uſual ſize:
But far more tow'ring ſtill the poet's fires!
Whoſe breaſt a ray from God's own heart inſpires.
Heroes and ſaints riſe rare---yet ſtill they riſe;
And time's full ſtream each common art ſupplies.
Philoſophy's proud heights are hourly gain'd,
And painting's charms, and muſic's force attain'd;
But when the deathleſs poet is to ſhine,
Long-lab'ring ages ſwell the ſlow deſign.
At length he comes: the birth of time appears!
And heav'n ſmiles ſatisfy'd a thouſand years.
Strange greatneſs this! with' which compar'd, prieſt, ſaint,
King, hero, and philoſopher, ſound faint!
He's none of theſe, whom time ſhall poet call,
But more than either, and creates them all.
Learn, poets, learn, th' importance of your name;
And, conſcious of your pow'r, exalt your aim.
Soul-ſhaking ſov'reigns of the paſſions, you
Hold wider empire than the Cæſars knew.
While clam'rous rhet'ric but ſuſtends the mind,
And whiſp'ring morals ſigh, unheard, behind;
While frail philoſophy but ſtarts deſigns,
And revelation's light to diſtant ſhines,
Ardent and cloſe the muſe maintains her ſway,
And the conſenting wiſhes make her way:
Ev'n pride's raſh plunge, the poet's curb endures;
And ev'ry paſſage to the heart is yours.

Scorn, then, the ſervile imitator's name,
Nor humbly ſplendid were caſt coats of fame:
Lean not ſuſtain'd---a weight no muſe allows:
Pilf'ring the faded bays from claſſic brows;
Nor creep contented in the modern way;
A dry, dull, ſoft, low, languid, tireſome lay!
But, ſtrongly ſacred, and ſublimely warm,
Strike the aw'd ſoul, and the touch'd paſſions charm;
Till the ſtern cynic, ſoft'ning at your ſtrain,
Feels himſelf mov'd, and hugs the pleaſing pain.
While lazy lovers from their langour ſtart,
And gain a conqueſt, though they loſt a heart.
Such wond'rous change can harmony command!
For heav'n lent nature to the poet's hand;
Gave him the paſſion's boundleſs pow'r to know;
And, like a god, diſtribute joy and woe: [ſpring,
Taught the tun'd nerves at each known ſound to
And bound obedient to the warbling ſtring
And the blood's current in compliance roll;
And the charm'd ſpirits ruſh in tides of ſoul. [lent,
Ye who feel ſtrong this power that heav'n has
Be your rais'd hearts with equal ardour bent:
Dare to praiſe virtue, though unprais'd before;
Lance your keen ſatires at oppreſſive pow'r:
Be worth obſcure by your bright genius ſought,
And gild its paleneſs in your ſun of thought:
Lift it to notice; give it ſtrength to move,
And teach dull greatneſs how to know and love.
With nerves of thought invig'rate manly themes;
Nor idly ſport in fancy's empty beams;
Let no baſe flatt'ry tempt your verſe aſtray,
Nor a light laughter a low taſte diſplay.
In wit's cold ſhallows wade, for ſhame! no more,
Her ſoundleſs ocean tempts you from the ſhore:
Up her vaſt ſteeps launch with intrepid climb,
And ſwim through ages down the ſtream of time.
Though faint, through modiſh miſts religion ſhines,
Oft let her ſacred ſoarings lift your lines:
Oft let your thoughts take fire at that firſt flame,
From whoſe bright effluence inſpiration came.
Th' Almighty God, who gave the ſun to blaze,
Voic'd the great poet for his Maker's praiſe:
Firſt, for his glory, form'd the world's extent;
Then form'd a language for that glory meant.
Hence have all tow'ry minds, ſublimely ſir'd,
With in-born ſtrength to their own heav'n aſpir'd;
While conſcious pertneſs, for ſuch heights unfit,
Safe to ſlight ſubjects pins its puny wit. [glows?
Lives there a man, whoſe breaſt with honour
Who, wrong'd by friends, forgives and pities foes;
Who, ſtill deſerving, never gains ſucceſs,
But lives oppreſs'd, by ſhunning to oppreſs?
Who can all grief for his own woes reſtrain,
Yet melts in generous tears at other's pain?
Teach him, O muſe! to wiſh no monarch's ſway,
Greater in want, than in dominion they! [mind,
For, oh!---what diff'rence! 'twixt th' effulgent
That longs for light, leſt others ſhould be blind,
And him, who, wanting nothing, graſping all,
Seems great himſelf, becauſe all round look ſmall!
Or does a ſofter ſubject ſuit your mind?
Fond of the fair, and to their int'reſt kind;
Pity ſome maid, whom modeſt wiſhes move,
Unbleſs'd by fortune, yet inſpir'd by love;

Fair without followers, without art ſincere,
Prais'd without hope, and without conqueſt dear:
There let the muſe the rights of beauty prove,
For all are equal by the laws of love.
There let the muſe perſuade on virtue's ſide,
And teach lame love to leap the bars of pride:
The pains of paſſion let the muſe impart,
And to ſoft yieldings mould the ſtubborn heart.
Are there, whoſe rais'd diſtinction ſweetly ſhines,
And whom high fortune fills with high deſigns?
Who greatly bleſſing all o'er whom they riſe,
Smile on th' inferior world with friendly eyes?
Or whom the love of uſeful arts inſpires?
Or whom faith, gratitude, or friendſhip fires?
Or whom by charity's ſoft glowings warm'd?
All vice has fled from, and all virtue charm'd:
Theſe, and all theſe, deſerve the muſe's ſtrain;
At once adorn, and are adorn'd again.
Shines there a captain, form'd for war's controul,
Born with the ſeeds of conqueſt in his ſoul?
By envy driv'n to truſt his in-bred ſtore,
And ſtill the leſs ſupply'd renown'd the more?
'Gainſt foes and friends, at once compell'd to guard,
But hardeſt preſs'd by thoſe for whom he warr'd;
Victor alike, ſupported or betray'd,
And obſtinate in his oppreſſor's aid;
Pointing ſuperior from the heights he won,
To teach his raſh ſupplanters what to ſhun.
Diſclaiming vengeance, while ſecure of fame,
And griev'd, not angry, at his country's ſhame:
Fearleſs of flattery here, confeſs the great,
And ro wrong'd glory lend the muſe's weight.
To crowns and ſenates hold a daring light,
And, 'ſpite of M——'s, do a M—— right.
Should wit's high guardians e'er their charge neglect,
Nor watch her waning, nor her growth protect,
Cold and unmov'd ſee tragic warmth decay,
And epic ſplendour fade, unfelt, away;
While in their place low taſtes the land defame,
Jeſts without words, and laughter without ſhame!
Poets expell'd the ſtage, ſupremely theirs,
And the bays with'ring round the heads of play'rs;
Then ſhould the muſe indignant wake the throne,
And the whole thunder of her voice be ſhown.
O that all verſe would ſenſeleſs ſound expel,
And the big ſubject bid the numbers ſwell!
But, ah, far ſhort th' unſolid tinklers riſe,
Nor ſoar, but flutter, in the muſe's ſkies!
Shame on your jingling, ye ſoft ſons of rhyme!
Tuneful conſumers of your reader's time!
Fancy's light dwarfs! whoſe feather-footed ſtrains
Dance in wild windings through a waſte of brains!
Your's is the guilt of all, who, judging wrong,
Miſtake tun'd nonſenſe for the poet's ſong.
Provoking dulneſs! what a ſoul has he,
Who fancies rhyme and meaſure poetry!
He thinks profanely, that this gen'rous art
Stops at the ear, with power to ſhake the heart.
For twice nine cent'ries, why has partial fame,
O'er worthier Romans, ſwell'd th' Auguſtan name?
O'er Julius, nobler, and of mightier mind?
O'er ev'n Veſpaſian, darling of mankind?
What but the muſe this laſting diff'rence made?
Pleas'd poets lent the world's great lord their aid:
And from their grateful praiſe conſent firſt grew,
That he, who rais'd the arts, ſurpaſs'd them too.
Think, ye vain ſtateſmen! whoſe ſelf-pointed aims
Die with your duſt, nor ſave your bury'd names,
Think on the crowds of buſy cyphers loſt,
Who once, like you, their ſov'reign's ſmiles engroſs'd!
Cloudily buſtling fill'd a realm alone, [throne:
And, with ſtate curtains, ſcreen'd the darken'd
'Twixt crowd and ſubject, ſtood an envy'd wall,
Bought, built, clear'd, clouded, and decided all:
Yet, dead for ever, in dumb graves are laid,
And reſt, forgotten, with the noiſe they made.
No Richelieu's they—nor knew the poet's pow'r,
Nor, ſkill'd to plant, invok'd the genial ſhow'r:
Hence their dry names in happy haſte decay,
And ev'ry barren glory fades away.
In peace, ſuch themes demand the poet's fire,
Such ſubjects raiſe th' exalted art ſtill higher:
But, if provok'd too far, ſome wav'ring ſtate,
Puſh'd and inſulted in perplex'd debate,
Feels her ſlow patience bluſh—and, tir'd at length,
Weighs her mean wrongs againſt her mighty ſtrength;
If then wiſh'd war th' exerted genius warms,
And glowing verſe would rouſe a realm to arms,
Then the joint muſes animate the ſong,
And the whole godhead pours the ſound along:
Then the big notes in tun'd excitement roll,
Bid the blood boil, and wing the wafted ſoul:
Courage impatient burns in ev'ry breath;
And a taught brav'ry leaps the lines of death.
Theſe are the ſeaſons, O, ye muſe-inſpir'd!
When ſtates unwarlike may to war be fir'd;
Then pow'rful verſe ſhould long-loſt heroes raiſe,
And kindle glory at the catching blaze:
Arthur's great ghoſt unreſting and aſham'd,
That William's brav'ry ſaw the brave defam'd,
Shining, redeem'd in honour of our land,
Would ſmile to 'ſcape the knighted tort'rer's hand,
Then might our great third Edward's awful ſhade,
Hem'd with ris'n ſtandards dreadfully diſplay'd,
Pale from his tomb in epic ſtrides advance,
And ſhoot cold horror through the heart of France.
Wide o'er the reading world extend alarms,
And warn proud ſtates to ſhun Britannia's arms.
Or, ſince the muſes ſons in courts are known,
And pleas'd pay homage round a reigning throne,
Why are they ſlow to ſing the Saxon fame?
From whoſe long lineage ſov'reign Brunſwick came:
When their white courſer, by brave Hengiſt born,
Did firſt in Albion war's wav'd pomp adorn:
While German aids thy cliffs, O Britain, ſcal'd
To triumph, where ev'n Rome's great help had fail'd!
To ſave, and give forgetful England name;
To plant a race, that know not whence they came:
To lend us language to expreſs our fires,
In grateful railings at our German ſires.
Thus, O ye happy few! for glory born,
Whoſe ſtarry wreathes your country's fame adorn,
Waſte not, on vulgar themes, your breathing fire,
But tune, for gen'rous ends, your living lyre:
Teach the miſtaken world a juſter rate,
court your praiſes, and to dread your hate.

Then, when kind heav'n inſpires the vaſt ſublime,
And your verſe lives, and claims the ſtamp of time,
Hiſt'ry ſhall die, and ſcarce preſerve a name;
While poets flouriſh in immortal fame
How have endanger'd balancers of ſtate
Liv'd in light ign'rance of the muſe's weight?
How might a guided ſtage men's wills prepare,
To brook tame peace, or wiſh reluctant war!
How might the ſubtle ſcene our paſſions wind!
And the watch'd arms of young ſedition bind!
How timely might this pow'rful art perſuade!
How make light lovelier, and illumine ſhade!
Eaſe ſtateſmen's labours, animate their aims,
Adorn their actions, and embalm their names.
Should W——'s ſelf, unconſcious of the muſe,
Provoke her vengeance, or her rev'rence loſe,
In vain were votes! ſhe could his pow'r defy,
And bid his blacken'd mem'ry never die:
Shade his beſt virtues, widen each miſtake,
And his hop'd fame from unborn ages take.
Or ſhe could force unwilling praiſe to climb,
And float him, topmoſt, on the tide of time;
Bid millions bleſs him ages after death,
And give new life in a charm'd people's breath:
When no ſkill'd antiquary finds his buſt,
And his proud buildings ſhall be loſt in duſt.
Pardon, ye living lights! where'er you ſhine,
Ye bleſt elect! ye prophets of the nine!
Pardon that I, whom fainter flames inſpire,
Have thus preſum'd to point your heav'nly fire:
To make the great more great, requires your ſkill;
I want the pow'r, nor ev'n poſſeſs the will.
While to myſelf I live obſcurely bleſs'd,
Look round the buſy world, and hug my reſt;
Plac'd below greatneſs, and above diſtreſs,
I pity pow'r, and hold faſt happineſs;
Purſue no int'reſt, no mean proſpect raiſe,
Reject no cenſure, and invite no praiſe.

THE IMPARTIAL.

Are theſe the marks then of our promis'd ſhame?
Or did detraction ſteal the patriot's name?
Weak if we were, how roſe we now ſo ſtrong?
Or whence, if pow'rful, were we ſcorn'd ſo long?
Burn, ſooty ſlander, burn thy blotted ſcroll:
Greatneſs is greatneſs, 'ſpite of faction's ſoul.
I gaze, aſtoniſh'd kingdom, o'er thy face,
And each weigh'd wonder to its fountain trace.
Glory flows in where infamy was ſpread:
And long loſt triumph lifts her tow'ring head.
Warm o'er the icy north thy influent awe
Bids hoſtile leagues diſſolve in friendly thaw.
Up Rhine's ſtrong ſtream Britannic thunders wind,
And Alpine mountains ſhake, and ſtates, behind.
Auſtria's plum'd eagle beak'd, and wing'd once more,
Sees baffled Bourbon driv'n from ſhore to ſhore.
Sea-ſhook Auſonia red with warring hoſts,
Starts from her Adrian to her Tyrrhene coaſts.
Ev'n Rome's imperious mitre learns to bow,
And Spain's Thaleſtris is but woman now! [fear:
Whence this amazing change?—'twas late all
No warring god invok'd, inclin'd his ear.
Tyrants combin'd, found freedom's rights betray'd:
Faith faſt expiring, ſaw the falſe invade,
Commerce cajol'd, reluctance brib'd, rage tame:
Ev'n empire trod on—yet uncouch'd by ſhame!
Then was the criſis; then fate's hand appear'd?
Then might the world be deaf, for Britain heard.
Wave-worſhipp'd Britain! one to all oppos'd!
By friends deſerted, and by foes incloſ'd;
Fills the world's eye—diſpels the doubter's care;
Bids the bold tremble, and the backward dare:
High to the nations points their guardian's throne,
And acts, and arbitrates, and ſhines alone.
And have ſuch fires inflam'd a patient reign?
Immortal heav'n! and muſt we ſtill complain?
Still muſt we rail, and blacken, and ſuſpect?
At once curb vigilance and goad neglect?
Deep let my ſoul deteſt th' adheſive pride,
That changing ſentiment unchanges ſide:
True to contempt of truth repents within,
Yet ſcreens conviction, and ſtrains hard to ſin.
Shame on this craft to ſcare!—this toil to ſeem!
O heart indignant, fly th' unmanly ſcheme!
Bluſh for thy paſt injuſtice—ſhrink no more;
But wake, and wonder, thou wert dark before!
Learn from whoſe hand th' unlook'd-for effluence came;
And, in the teeth of inſult, ſound his name.
What though ſome friend thou lov'ſt had narrower ſight?
Truth knows no parties, and involves like light.
Shadows and names fright cowards—but the ſtrong
Ne'er call that lightneſs, which is ſcorn of wrong.
Dare to be juſt, 'tis all that brav'ry means;
He ſtoops too baſely, who to flatt'ry leans:
But whom pale prejudice has taught his part,
Born for a ſlave, wears fetters on his heart;
Sees undiſcerning; feels without his touch;
Judges too little, and decides too much.
Poets have nobler ſouls: fame's paths they ſhow;
They glow themſelves, and teach the world to glow.
Satire's whole pow'r their own—yet praiſe they chooſe,
Ev'n of unconſcious kings, who ſlight the muſe.
Proud of neglected force, each heav'n touch'd mind
Open to reaſon is, to int'reſt blind.
Self, all unthought of, can for others think;
Swim till the ſtate rides ſafe, then ſmile, and ſink.
Lift ev'n the worth that hates him—love is ſhown;
And, for his country's joys, exclude his own;
This is to think like muſes, act like man:
This princes ought to feel—and poets can.
Ye, once miſguided! is retraction vain?
Truſt the brave injur'd; nor perſiſt to ſtain.
Why ſhould ſuſpicion penitence outlive?
None doubt forgiveneſs, but who ne'er forgive.
Heav'n has been wrong'd, yet ſtill goes on to bleſs;
For ſins of blindneſs err beneath diſtreſs.
So wrong'd, ſo pard'ning, Cart'ret heeds no foe;
But ſaves—unangry at the rage below.
Oft with theſe ſhackly quoils of twin'd intrigue,
Theſe nets for liberty, theſe links of league.
Trite, venal cant! which envy's arts can teach,
To cenſure ev'ry pow'r we fail to reach.
No gen'rous heart, miſdrawn to devious beat,
When truth's new luſtre ſhines, diſclaims its heat.
Charm'd and ſurpris'd, I hug my country's fame;
Compar'd, O heav'n! with years of length'ning ſhame.

Ye ſons, who love her, weigh the threat'ning ſwell
Of Spain, France, faction, calumny, and hell!
Weigh with what ſpeed, repell'd from mound to mound.
Subſiding danger fought her bidden bound!
Hail the white cliffs of Albion held ſerene,
While round her redd'ning rolls the bloody ſcene,
I hail it all;---and hail th' acknowledg'd cauſe;
Hail the mind's reach, that gives earth's uproar laws!
Safe mid ſurrounding menace, guards mankind;
Guides ev'ry council, buſies ev'ry wind, [main,
Shakes the world's ſhakers, hears for land and
And binds fell tyrants, while they bite their chain.
Ye muſe-made Mentors! rais'd on fancy's wings,
To think for heroes, and to reign for kings;
When cou'd your ſons of time's feign'd births do more?
For ne'er true ſtory reach'd theſe heights before.
Fav'rites have oft, in many a troubled ſtate,
Poiz'd the king's love againſt the people's hate;
Oft the firm leader, in ſome patriot ſcheme,
Has, with bold ſteerage, ſtemm'd the royal ſtream:
And ſometimes too---yet rare, too rare, that praiſe!
The ſafe at home, abroad, have gather'd bays;
But none, till Cart'ret roſe, e'er hop'd to ſee
One maſt'ring genius graſp th' unwilling three!
Prince half confiding---people all unjuſt---
Abroad all diſcord, and at home diſtruſt---
Propp'd on himſelf, like the world's weight he lay,
And through contention's impulſe ſhap'd his way;
Heard the claſh'd elements, deſpis'd their brawl,
Roll'd on ſelf-centred---and inorb'd 'em all.

THE LOVER'S COMPLAINT.

If on the tow'ring Alps' amazing height,
Whoſe cliffy tops our climbling eyes affright,
And with chill horror ſtrike the ſtartled ſight;
If there, Celinda, thou had'ſt chanc'd to be
The piny product of ſome teeming tree;
Taſteleſs of human pity might'ſt thou grow,
And forc'd to bend, when ruffling tempeſts blow,
Nod angry at the plains that ſpread below.
Ev'n pines and oaks can bend to ſtones, and be
More flexible, than thy ſtrong hate to me!
The greedy ocean, whoſe inſatiate waves
Flow to devour; whoſe ſmootheſt ſmiles are graves;
Of all its monſtrous forms, has none ſo cold,
Nor does one rock, in its vaſt boſom, hold,
That, had it ſenſe, ſuch cruelty would ſhow,
To triumph in the ſhipwreck'd ſailor's woe:
Nothing in nature does ſo fix'd remain,
But love's ſoft fire can gradual entrance gain,
And all but thee, once lov'd, will love again.

THE STATESMAN.

See'ſt thou yon mountain, ſo immenſely high,
Around whoſe ſky-crown'd head raw tempeſts fly!
How low'ring darkly o'er the ſhadow'd plain,
It hangs the genuine ſeat of horror's reign!
Its craggy ſides hold thin a ſterile ſoil,
Which, promiſing no harveſt, tempts no toil!
No grazing cattle crop ſubſiſtence there,
Nor flow'r-fed breezes feaſt the hungry air!
No ſoft meand'ring current glides along,
To court the meadows with its murm'ring ſong;
No lofty ſpires a wand'ring glance invite,
Nor wind-ſhook woods arreſt the raviſh'd ſight!
All rough and wild, it rears its rocky head,
Severely awful, and unlovely ſpread:
From its cold top, ſoil-ſweeping torrents flow,
Form'd by unfruitful floods of native ſnow!
Sorrow ſits brooding on its furrow'd face,
And deſolation covers all the place. [ſtate?
See'ſt thou all this, fond youth! ſo charm'd with Such is the envy'd bliſs that gilds the great.
Such are the barren honours they enjoy;
For ſuch diſtinction, they their cares employ.
They move our pity, while they tempt our ſight;
High above all indeed, but fruitleſs in their height.

SOLITUDE.

Welcome cool breeze, to fan my glowing mind,
Cinder'd with feveriſh cares and conſtant woe!
Welcome ſoft bliſs, by gracious heav'n deſign'd,
The out-worn paths of ancient peace to ſhow,
The road which wiſdom loves to go,
And teach aſpiring man true happineſs to know.
In thy ſweet ſhades uninterrupted reigns,
Free from care-toil'd nature's ſtrains,
The downy god of eaſe!
In the innocent and life-bliſs'd ſwains,
Unſway'd, by low deſire of worldly gains,
Their uncorrupted ſenſes juſtly pleaſe,
Nor know the penetrating curſe of pains,
But travel ſmoothly up to death, by mild and ſlow degrees.

On thy calm coaſts no whirlwind doubts we find,
No terrifying blaſts to break ſoft ſleep,
No ſelf-rais'd tempeſts ſhake man's hurry'd mind,
For queſtion'd riches which the wild winds ſweep,
Along the furrow'd boſom of the deep;
And which, ev'n e'er we gain, we fear to loſe.
No watchful guards in thee we need to keep,
But reſt in peaceful ſlumbers duly find,
Nor feel the killing cares, which great men madly chooſe.

Smoothly revolving years,
Unloaded with a needleſs weight of fears,
Slide unperceiv'd and ſteadily away;
Safe in the humble ſhelter of content,
Our apprehenſion, eaſy and unbent,
Sometimes but ſeldom looks abroad to know,
How things about us go.
Sometimes we upward deign to caſt our eye,
And view, with curious ſcorn, the gath'ring clouds,
Which warring princes, plac'd for miſchief high,
Supinely ſit and bid againſt each other fly:
From coverts, where our choice our fortune ſhrouds.
We ſee all this, and hear the noiſe it makes;
As one well hous'd, ſees the blue light'ning fly,
And hears the rolling thunder ſhake the ſky;

While he, regardleſs where the tempeſt breaks,
Without the danger, the delight partakes;
Thus, while on earth, our bodies happy ſtay,
While here our joy-fin'd moments ſwim away.
Our elevated minds, above the ſpheres,
Forget their weak-built tenement of clay;
And by the trying fire of reaſon, grow
So pure, ſo free, from thought-diſord'ring ſin,
That when from life on their laſt call they go,
In large expanſe of ſoul, they upwards flow,
And rather mix with heav'n, than dwell therein.

ON MR. COWLEY'S INTRODUCING PINDARIC VERSE.

Sacred ſoul, harmonious ſwan!
Whoſe ſweeteſt notes long before death began;
And the long tuneful race unwearied ran,
Long before death began the ſong; and ſtill the
ſong improv'd, [mov'd!
And ſtill new ſtrings, and ſtill new pleaſure
How, mighty muſe! didſt thou, and thou alone,
(For the gigantic taſk was all thy own)
Find means to draw ſuch unexhauſted ſtore,
From ſprings which were ſo poor?
From fountains chok'd with blood, and made by
duſt impure.
How, 'midſt an iron age,
The dreadful and the over-acted ſtage,
Of undiſtinguiſh'd ſcenes of rage,
Where ſtriving merit, ſtruck by mis'ry, fell:
And all that learning then could teach, was how to ſuffer well.
How, in this toilſome age,
Did'ſt thou, immortal man! when arts were overthrown,
When all the muſes garden was o'ergrown,
And whole Parnaſſus tumbled down,
Stand on its ruins, and erect a new one of thy own.

Yet, as within the all-enlight'ning ſun,
Some ſpots our glaſſes find, amidſt the blaze;
Too ſmall, tho' viſible, to look on long,
Becauſe encircled with eye-dazzling rays;
So thou, great king of fancy! led aſtray
By thy high melted muſe, uncurb'd and gay,
And prancing proudly on, in wit's unmeaſur'd way!
Haſt err'd in judgment, where thou did'ſt deſign
Thy judgment moſt ſhould ſhine! [vine.
But all that's human in thy verſe, is loſt in the di-
Immortal man! thou doſt too raſhly blame
The waſteful ſpirit of thy gloomy times,
Ev'n of that age of crimes,
Which gave the fate of ſuff'ring Charles to fame!
Short-ſighted man, ſcarce ever aiming right,
Though eagle-ey'd, in mortal ſight,
Oft thus miſtakes, for chance, heav'n's well-re-
ſolv'd decree,
And does againſt it fight!
That which lights to ſhadows are,
Or peace to war;
Such was that age to thee!
Such contraries Almighty wiſdom finds,
And ſtamps on human minds;
That virtue's viſage, made thereby more bright,
May, when ſet oppoſite to ſin's black night,
To ſtrike all eyes that ſhall her luſtre ſee,
Shine out with double force, and doubly charming be.
So fell the royal martyr, to convince
The wond'ring ages ſince,
How bleſt their fathers were, in ſuch a prince;
Oh, wond'rous myſtic, undiſcover'd maze!
What man can ſearch his God's untrodden ways?
Hence our ſlow learners late are taught, loſt worth to idolize!
And hence our long poſterity ſhall know,
(What heav'n thence meant to ſhow)
How many curſes three torn nations owe
To zeal's hot ſons, who really had no eyes,
And pride, who ſaw truth plain, and ſeeing durſt
deſpiſe.
So, too immortal ſubject of my muſe,
The fav'rite theme ſhe loves to chooſe!
So, too, the fable ignorance of that age,
Like foils, which luſtre can to diamonds give,
Inſpir'd thy ſacred muſe with that juſt rage,
Which greatly handing up to fame,
Thine and thy ſov'reign's reſcu'd name,
Shall ev'n thy Pindar's praiſe, but in thy works,
outlive.

THE MIRACLE AT CANA.

Tranſlated from Craſhaw.

When Chriſt, at Cana's feaſt, by pow'r divine,
Inſpir'd cold water with the warmth of wine,
See! cry'd they, while in redd'ning tide it guſh'd,
The baſhful ſtream hath ſeen its God and bluſh'd.

ARRIA AND PÆTUS, FROM MARTIAL.

When, from her breaſt, chaſte Arria dragg'd the ſword,
And faintly reach'd it her expecting lord;
My wound, ſaid ſhe, but waſtes unvalu'd breath,
'Tis thine, dear Pætus, gives the ſting to death.

ON THE DEATH OF

PRINCE GEORGE OF DENMARK.

Since ſhe by whom her people all live bleſt,
To ſorrow's reign, has giv'n her ruling breaſt,
Grief ſhould be loudly heard as well as ſeen,
To noiſe his death, and mourn our widow'd queen,
The friends of Anna muſt not ſilent weep;
Of ſtreams, 'tis ſaid, the gentleſt are moſt deep!
But grief is paſſion; and where paſſion reigns,
Nature ſcorns decency, and breaks her chains:
Like ſome fierce wind-driv'n ſhow'r true grief appears;
'Tis but a breeze that is allay'd by tears,
She does, indeed, with ſighs and tears complain,
Like ſpring-born zephyrs, mix'd with ſprinkling
rain! [ſpread,
But we, the cloud with thunder charg'd, ſhould
And gen'ral woe ſpeak big, to ſuit the virtue dead.
Great as his mercy ſhould our pity be:
Ah! who unmov'd, can yon fair ſorrow ſee?
The royal Dane that treaſure long poſſeſt,
Dear to her ſoul, and faithful to her breaſt!

Free from ambition, innocently great,
'Twixt faction's shoals he piloted the state!
And temp'ring pow'r, though lord of sov'reign sway,
Shone bright, yet scorch'd not like the sun in May.

THE DISCOVERY.

This comes to let Liberia know,
That beauty is so much heav'n's care,
That all fine women say or do,
Is mark'd and treasur'd in the air.

Hence I, a stranger to your sight,
Whose hand perhaps you do not know,
Learn all you do by day or night,
As by these presents I shall show.

Your memory cannot but retain
Some hint of little Pope's bold muse,
Who, made by lady's secrets vain,
Did once a tell-tale subject choose.

Have you not read him where he prates,
Of Arabella's ravish'd hair;
And stories of those sylphs relates,
Whose sweet task is to guard the fair.

I am that happy sylph assign'd,
To screen Liberia's breast from harms;
To flutter round her in the wind,
And feast my fancy with her charms.

Have you always in my view:
And, t'other day employ'd my wit,
With nameless lines to puzzle you,
On the grief-wither'd sun-flow'r, writ.

I, at that time, in ambush plac'd,
Snug, under Mopsy's left ear lay,
And laugh'd to hear how wrong you guess'd,
Who thought they came another way.

'Twas I, your faithful sylph, 'twas I,
That, ever studious of your ease,
My skill in verse, resolv'd to try,
In verse which most the fair can please.

Perhaps, 'twill startle you to hear,
How I your actions hourly watch;
That though you see me not, I'm near;
And fly each straggling sigh to catch!

Sometimes in this shape, sometimes that,
My various duties I perform;
Sometimes astride your rambling cat,
I hide in fur, and shade my form.

But, when your stroking hand I feel,
From the soft back I leap with joy;
My fairy fabric still conceal,
But Puss's active paws employ,
And sportful, with your milky fingers toy.

Oft as you sit to sip your tea,
In a fly's shape, your charms to search,
Seeking some place, where, best to see,
I, on the lumps of sugar perch,

There, while one day divinely pleas'd,
I gaz'd in raptures on your face,
Your sugar tongs the Captain seiz'd,
And me between two lumps he squeez'd,
Half dead upon the place.

But I was even with him soon,
For catching him all gay,
At the Park door one afternoon,
With hands too full of play:
I took the figure of a gnat,
And, midst his am'rous strains,
Whisk'd from your bosom where I sat,
And stung his fingers for his pains.

But, oh! I tremble to relate,
How, by your smile-blest looks, bewitch'd,
I lately 'scap'd a far worse fate;
While you, with red and yellow mix'd,
At work, on yonder threshold fix'd,
Your silky mazes stitch'd.

There I again, a luckless fly,
Not dreaming any danger near,
Lay basking in your sunny eye,
My little aching heart to cheer.

When, on a sudden, through and through,
Your piercing needle careless pass'd,
And the dragg'd silk, swift-following, too,
Bound down my tiny body fast.

There, had I stay'd, transfix'd till now,
Nor miss'd, nor mourn'd, perhaps by you!
But that the stitch, the Lord knows how,
You lik'd not, and, thank heav'n, withdrew.

When once with you your sister Celia stood,
Celia! that sweet and lovely maid! [rude,
Two thoughtless bold park-wond'ring fops were
And you two charmers both afraid,
Rush'd in, and fled dismay'd,

I, then, fair charge! unknown to you,
By love, and vow'd revenge, inspir'd,
Did, like a wasp, the fools pursue,
And slily down their throats retir'd.

Then to their tongue's presumptuous root I flee,
And both with tingling venom fir'd;
Now learn, said I, when next you see
You tempting pair adorn their gate,
How sacred modest loveliness should be,
And what the insolent profaner's fate!

Thus, all day long, is Seraphil
Liberia's wakeful sylph employ'd;
So rich a charge claims ten-fold skill,
And care, so charm'd, can ne'er be cloy'd.

But, when at night the happy bed
Receives her snowy limbs to rest,
I sleep's soft mist about her spread;
Then stretch me, blissful, on her breast.

There, till the full grown morning smiles,
In downy heavings, lost, I lie,
Or wander o'er these charms 'twixt whiles,
For which a thousand lovers die.

At last, unwillingly I rise,
And seizing fast her rubied lip,
In a sharp-biting flea's disguise,
I, from her breath the nectar sip.

And then, Liberia ſtarting cries,
Deuce take this ugly ſharp-mouth'd flea!
But, now I'm wak'd, I think I'll riſe:
So dreſſes—and ne'er dreams of me!

Thus have I honeſtly at laſt confeſs'd,
What ſort of little ſcribbling thing I be;
Leſt, growing curious, you might wrong have gueſs'd,
And thought ſome other ſent what came from me.

TO LIBERIA,

WITH A SQUIRREL.

These, my laſt lines, I write with bleeding heart,
For, oh! Liberia and her ſylph muſt part!
I muſt no more engroſs that envy'd care,
Which angels now in crowds have begg'd to ſhare.
Now, I no more muſt flutter in your ſight,
And, from your eye-beams, gild my wings with light:
No more in fields of air when ſylphs rejoice,
Dance to the ſoft tun'd muſic of your voice!
Liſten no more while in the Mall you walk,
What the admiring crowds that meet you talk.
On your right ſhoulder's tip no more ſhall blaze,
Bright with the flaſh of eyes, which paſſing gaze!
And when ſometimes you're ſad, no more ſhall I
See myſelf weep, by peeping in your eye!
Theſe comforts paſt, and mention'd now in vain,
Serve but to make remembrance ache with pain!
Little, alas! I thought, when laſt I writ,
That I, ſo ſoon my boaſted charge muſt quit!
But our great king, whom all we ſylphs obey,
Wretch that I am! commanded me away:
Far off, to eaſtern ſhores I was to go;
Where the proud Turk keeps love, and woman low:
Where full twelve hundred rival beauties ſtrive,
To keep one lover's lazy flame alive:
Where female charms are taught the humble ſkill,
To court the fancy, and not bow the will:
To this new poſt preferred, I was to fly;
And paſt before the haughty ſultan's eye;
There, in his glitt'ring palace, gay with ſtate,
On his new fav'rite ſultaneſs to wait:
But, ah, Liberia! by thy ſweetneſs won,
Thy doating ſylph was doom'd to be undone;
Theſe proffer'd honours had no charm for me
I cou'd not taſte a joy, remote from thee!
Thou art my pride, and, where thou art not ſeen,
Sorrow would catch me, though I ſerv'd a queen!
This, when I told our prince, he never weigh'd
My grief's juſt cauſe, but thought I diſobey'd,
Swift he o'ertook me, with an angry vow,
And chang'd me to the ſhape I come in now.
Scarce had I time to write my wretched fate,
And begg'd a friend to bring me to your gate;
Helpleſs and dumb, ah! whither ſhould I go,
But to her breaſt, whoſe pitying ſoul I know?
She who to Puſs and Mopſy kind can be,
Will ſure, thought I, have ſome concern for me.
Weak though I am, ſome gratitude is due;
I claim your care, for my paſt care of you.
Elſewhere I will not my new wants ſupply,
And when you ſtarve me 'twill be time to die.
I may hereafter ſome ſmall ſervice do,
For yet my body's weak and form but new.
If you ſhall pleaſe to help me through my youth,
And with milk-ſoften'd biſket ſave my tooth;
Grateful when I grow up, I'll keep your's ſtrong,
And crack nuts for you, all the glad day long;
If kindly, you ſhall bleſs me with your care,
And ſhield me from the pinching wint'ry air,
Cloſe round your neck, like ſome warm tippet roll'd,
In froſty nights, I'll guard you from the cold;
And while in your ſoft hand you let me play,
I'll growl the Captain's rivals all away.
Refuſe not then, though chang'd, to keep me ſtill,
And oh! remember, Pug was Seraphil.

To my dear and ever honoured Mother, in anſwer to ſome Verſes which ſhe ſent me about Spirits, from Malmſbury Abbey.

Madam, your lovely muſe's late employ
Was read with wonder, and a pride-mix'd joy:
Fortune, in vain, her batt'ring engines bends,
'Gainſt ſouls, which ſuch a wit-rais'd ſtrength defends!
Secure within, you outward ſtorms defy,
And look ſerenely on a ruffled ſky:
So Philomel, by night, diſdaining reſt,
Sings o'er the pointed thorn which galls her breaſt.
The buſy ghoſts your fancy ſeems to hear,
Have no deſign to fright your liſt'ning ear:
Nor ſprings their reſtleſſneſs, from Rome's old pride,
Nor vain regret, that ſo long ſince they dy'd;
A purer race theſe buſtling ſpirits are,
And a more noble aim inſpires their care!
Some beauteous band of nuns they ſeem to be:
Stript to the naked ſoul, and ſo ſet free.
Through death's dark ſhade your ſhining form they ſpy,
And trace your virtues, with a raviſh'd eye!
Hence ev'ry night allur'd by freſh deſire,
They preſs to view the charms they ſo admire.

A DIALOGUE

BETWEEN DAMON AND PHILEMON,

Concerning the Preference of a Town Life to a Country Life.

Philemon.

Why does not Damon, unaſpiring ſwain!
Chooſe rather not to live, than live in vain?
From bright examples thy ambition fire,
Let others honours whet thy dull deſire;
Let ruſtic ſports engage the lab'ring hind,
And cultivated acres plough his mind;
Let him to unfrequented woods repair,
And ſnuff, unenvy'd, his lean mountain air;
'Till death, unfought, o'ertakes his heavy pace,
And unſam'd duſt conſumes his mould'ring race!
Do thou to warmer joys thy wiſhes raiſe,
And taſte the pleaſure of deſerving praiſe!
If ſparkling genius does thy fancy fill,
In muſe-led ſtages, try thy journeying ſkill;

Or, if thy soul more roughly is possest,
And struggling valour swells thy glowing breast;
To war's red toils let glory call thee hence,
And draw thy untry'd sword, in Britain's just defence.

Damon.

And why, Philemon, to the vicious town,
Not that way lies the road to just renown;
No virtue prospers in that barren soil,
That nursery of unregarded toil:
There fools, and knaves, by purchas'd favour rise,
And shine beyond the valiant and the wise.
Shall hope allure me to the wretched state,
Of cringing at the levees of the great;
With servile awe to court a stately nod,
And treat some glorious folly like a god?
No! sooner I'll the clown's free labour's share,
And with their brutes a nobler burden bear!
The wars, I must allow, a gen'rous thought,
A glory by fame-thirsty spirits sought;
Who scorch'd within, by hot ambition's flood,
Quench passion's fever in a lake of blood!
'Tis great to see 'em march through cannon's roar,
While sweat-wash'd wounds all-gild their faces o'er:
To brave the northern blasts, and with swoln veins,
Bear scorchings when the sultry dog-star reigns.
But will your unnerv'd youth encounter these?
Ah no! effeminate they rust in ease!
And should our sinewy hinds forsake the field,
France will stand high when Britain learns to yield.

Philemon.

Can Damon whose bright genius strongly shines,
Through the soft beauties of his tuneful lines;
Can he defend, or muses bless the strife,
Th' unglorious preference of a country life?
'Tis not alone for honour or renown,
The seat of wit and pleasure is the town:
To her, ungrateful, all those darts you owe,
Which, now, against her battlements you throw.
For sure, no rural dictates could inspire,
The rapt'rous energy of Damon's fire!
The cot-bred soul with ignorance content,
Is meanly miserable by consent:
Proud in his native sloth he scorns to think,
And has no end in life, but meat and drink;
While the brave learn'd, whose knowledge bids him try,
The mystic gulf of deep philosophy,
Wades 'cross the narrow bounds to reason giv'n,
Spurns back the measur'd earth, and fathoms heav'n!
Had glory's props in ages long since past,
In the rough mould of country life been cast;
A blind stupidity the world had sway'd,
And mother ignorance been still obey'd:
No deathless wit had crown'd the Grecian stage,
Nor skill-mix'd courage grac'd the Julian age!
No sun of thought had shin'd, with glorious beams,
No seas of knowledge spread their silver streams;
Then Damon come, to courtly pleasures fly,
Nor thus th' attractive charms of wealth and pow'r deny.

Damon.

Oh! would this tuneful youth whose numbers flow,
Soft as the love-inspiring zephyrs blow;
Sweet as maids look, when first they own their loves,
Smooth as the down which feathers Venus' doves.
Sweet as the dulcid streams, from Hybla run,
Or as the bloom, displaying to the sun!
Oh would he to our sylvan shades repair,
To taste our wholesome, our inspiring air!
Would he but leave that fable-clouded soil,
On which Aurora never seems to smile;
What bright, what glorious images would rise,
From all his thoughts to emulate the skies!
For if such charms, there, in his numbers shine,
Here, they would prove ecstatic and divine.
But why is Damon so ungrateful thought;
As if the town his humble sashes taught!
What muse could e'er endure your smoke and noise;
Your night alarms and your tumultuous joys?
No 'tis the murm'ring brook, the shad'wy grove,
And flow'r-dress'd valley, that invite their love!
Then haste, Philemon, to our blissful state,
And learn to live, before it grows too late.

Philemon.

If truth, dear swain! with freedom might advise,
Thou may'st be happy, for I know thee wise;
Quit for a trial once, this meagre air,
And all impartial to thy friend repair.
Then wilt thou ever fix'd with me remain,
And envious rustics tempt thee back in vain.
Thus some raw youth, on a domestic shore,
With terror hears th' encircling surges roar;
Trembling, he sees the threat'ning tempest roll,
And ev'ry rising billow lifts his soul:
But when a riper age has call'd him o'er,
To try the pleasures of some foreign shore,
Sad he returns, nor will at home remain,
But pants to taste abandon'd joys again.
Your muse, in vain, of boasted prospect sings;
Your flow'ry meadows, and your murm'ring springs:
Poor short-liv'd scenes of shadow-skimming joy,
Whose pride a change of season can destroy!
The rising floods your valleys over-flow,
And winter spreads your hills, with sheets of snow:
Autumnal winds strip bare your gawdy trees,
And cold December nights your purling currents freeze.
But we, more happy, constant blessings share,
Nor hang our comforts in the changeful air:
Our diff'ring seasons have their different sport,
The park, the play, the tavern, and the court!
Our rolling hours can sweetly wear away,
The utmost moments of the longest day:
When tir'd with business, we would care decline,
We drown the weight of thought in gen'rous wine:
By that made sprightly, to the park repair,
And eloquently silent, court the fair:
Thence, to the theatre, inspir'd we move,
And feast at once, on mingled wit and love!
These and a thousand nameless new delights,
Make our days fruitful, and enrich our nights;

While you, 'midſt few repeated paſtimes live,
Nor ever taſte the joy which changing pleaſures give.

Damon.

'Tis true, Philemon, our autumnal ſtorms
Diſrobe our trees, and ſtrip their quiv'ring forms:
'Tis true, our liveliеſt beauties are but ſhort,
Short as the joys which recommend your court:
But theſe new charms, in following ſprings obtain,
While thoſe, once ſet, ſhall never riſe again,
In vain your plays allure; all there, that's fine,
Does faintly to our artleſs beauties ſhine.
Their ſcenes as groſsly imitate our groves,
As their lewd actors our ſoft paſt'ral loves.
Frequent their comedies to pleaſe the town,
Deſcend to borrow, hence, ſome wit-grac'd clown.
The park, their folly's larger ſtage charms leſs;
An ill-mix'd ſcene of noiſe, grimace, and dreſs!
'The court, 'tis true, ſhines out with tempting ſtate;
For ruin, angling there, to catch the great,
Hides the hook, wiſely, with attractive bait!
The joy which wine can give, like ſmoky fires,
Obſcure their ſight whoſe fancy it inſpires.
Thus, like old Sodom's fruit, that ſeat of ſin,
Your pleaſures, fair without, are worms and duſt within.

Philemon.

Aſſiſt me, ſacred ſiſters! aid my voice,
And guide loſt Damon to a nobler choice!
The crowds of ruſtics, who to town repair,
And quit, for vulgar hopes, their native air,
Are groſs-form'd vapours heavily exhal'd,
Where profit's ſunny influence has prevail'd;
But thoſe alone, my friend, are beams for me
Which draw ſuch limpid innocence as thee!
What pleaſures reap you from the unprun'd field,
Which cities cannot more completely yield?
If, to ſome peace-bleſt cot we would retire,
An hour's ſhort journey crowns the ſoft deſire:
There, ſtrait we taſte the ſweets ſo prais'd by you,
And then return to thoſe you never knew!
Ev'n heav'n approves not ſolitude, elſe why
Did his great will direct ſociety?
Why did the ancients elſe to towns repair,
And quit, for houſes, tents and open air?
Would the great Hebrew favourite of Heav'n,
To whom both pow'r and wiſdom's charms were giv'n,
Would he on Sion's hills have fix'd his ſeat,
Had rural pleaſures been, in truth, moſt ſweet?

Damon.

While here the roſy-fronted morning's light
Shines o'er the hills, and charms the diſtant ſight;
While heav'n's gay choriſters in clouds ariſe,
And, with harmonious warblings, ſhake the ſkies;
While we our mirth with moderation crown,
And ſhun th' exceſſes of the dangerous town.
Why would Philemon, unadviſ'd, obtrude
On us the unfelt woes of ſolitude?
What though the Hebrew, whom you well call great,
Made Sion, for her temple's ſake, his ſeat?
What knowledge did his city life impart?
But that 'twas empty all, and vanity of heart!

Cowley, that ſhining bard, had try'd and known
The whole heap'd pleaſure of your boaſted town;
And, finding all its beauties falſe and baſe,
Retir'd, and ever after loath'd the place.
Great Dioclеſian, when he reach'd the height
Of human glory, ſhook off cumb'rous ſtate,
Wak'd into man, and ſhun'd th' alluring bait.
To rural peace, his ſearch he next addreſs'd,
And there his crown deſpiſing choice was bleſt.

Philemon.

Immortal Cowley's tuneful verſe I own,
Spoke pow'rful arguments againſt the town;
So Æſop's fox in vain exerts his pow'r,
And then, like Cowley, cries—the grapes are ſow'r.
Had court indulgence ſmil'd as he deſir'd,
He never had to rural ſhades retir'd.
Your Dioclеſian, from plebeian birth,
Rais'd to the rule of a dependant earth,
Stagger'd, with giddy ſteps, beneath the weight,
And, trembling at his danger, caſt his ſtate:
But, if examples can thy genius fire,
And move the ruſty ſprings of dead deſire;
Behold great Plato, whoſe acknowledg'd fame
Has, from his worth, immortaliz'd his name:
Big with town hopes to Dionyſius fly,
And to ambition tune philoſophy.
Far-fam'd Charibdis threaten'd him in vain,
Nor Scylla's terrors fright him back again.
Sicilian grandeur, like the golden fleece,
Drew all the men of excellence from Greece;
Pythagoras to town invites his friends,
And Socrates our city life defends.
But, leſt you ſhould the pow'r of truth deny,
And, in a cauſe ſo bad, unmov'd reply;
Know, though aſſembled nature's ſweets combin'd,
And art the country's honour had deſign'd,
Their joint endeavours would allure in vain,
While heav'n-fought Anna does with us remain:
For as thoſe parts where Phœbus fulleſt ſhines,
Though rough and wild, are ſtor'd with ſilver mines,
Whoſe wealth, attractive, draws from lovelier lands
Advent'rous thouſands to thoſe barren ſtrands:
So, though the city no delights poſſeſt,
Did Anna chooſe it for a place of reſt,
Millions would hurry thither and be bleſt.

Damon.

Farewell, ye once belov'd, retir'd abodes!
Ye murm'ring ſprings! and unfrequented woods!
Farewell, ye winged choirs that warble there,
And fill with melody the fluid air!
Ye ſoft amuſements which indulge and pleaſe,
And life's bent ſprings relax with bliſsful eaſe!
Farewell, ye rural ſports, the eager chaſe,
The mountain falcon, and the nimble race!
Philemon calls, the charming ſwain invites,
And wakes my drowſy ſoul to new delights.
Impregnated with fire, from his bright lines
My mind unfreezes, and my boſom ſhines.
We not to all our country pleaſures owe
Such ſoft delights as in thy numbers flow.
Leſs bright the roſy bluſhes of the morn
Than thoſe ideas which thy thoughts adorn.
Not tuneful Philomel, ſo muſical,
Nor murm'ring ſprings, with ſweeter accents, fall!

The god of oracles inſpires thy ſongs,
And all is truth which to that god belongs.
Let others then th' unequal ſtrife maintain,
And, with Philemon's muſe contend in vain:
I yield; and in his conqueſt take more pride,
Than if I'd conquer'd all the ſwains beſide.
Farewell, ye once belov'd, retir'd abodes,
I'll to Auguſta now, the darling of the gods!

Philemon.

Welcome, dear Damon! in a high degree;
Welcome, ſweet ſwain! to London and to me.
To love the late ſhun'd field I now begin,
For, yielding thus, you more than conqueſt win.
Such tender warmth in thy ſoft ſoul I ſee,
That I could dwell in woods, to dwell with thee.
Secure of thee, I may with eaſe defy
Th' attempt of any future enemy.
Abandon'd nymphs will now forſake the plains,
And dew-drench'd valleys weep departed ſwains:
Envy ſhall leave the loneſome cottage free,
For wit and virtue both muſt follow thee.

A DIALOGUE

BETWEEN DAMON AND PHILEMON.

Concerning the preference of Riches to Poverty.

Damon.

Accurſed gold! till thou begot'ſt offence,
All nature ſmil'd with artleſs innocence.
Men's days ſlid ſmoothly on in ſoft delights,
Nor fear'd they villains to diſturb their nights:
No blooming virgins then were baſely ſold,
Slaves to the ſordid tyranny of gold! [preſs'd,
But ſwains, with honeſt hearts, kind truths ex-
And nymphs, unbluſhing, their felt flames confeſs'd:
Aſtræa then, with unſtain'd glory reign'd;
The judge's ear, by brib'ry yet ungain'd.
No avarice, with her foul train, was known,
But his was theirs, and ours was no man's own.
War had not yet, with ſtains of blood and rage,
Her mangled offſpring brought upon the ſtage;
But all beneath the peaceful olive ſat,
Fill'd and delighted with their bliſsful ſtate.
But when thy birth, O gold! diſturb'd the world,
Nature was into ſwift confuſion hurl'd:
Her charms were loſt, and her all-pleaſing forms
O'erwhelm'd by tempeſts, or diſguis'd by ſtorms:
Noiſe and deſtruction, with gigantic ſtrides,
And all their horrid children at their ſides,
March'd round the frighted globe in ſearch of thee,
And plow'd up murder, ſhame, and perjury!
Philemon then th' inglorious chaſe refrain,
Nor waſte thy life in ſearch of ſordid gain.

Philemon.

Gold! thou gay quinteſſence of earth refin'd;
Which heav'n, to balance ſtruggling pow'r, de-
ſign'd.
Till thy deciſive weight depreſs'd the ſcale,
Contenders did alternately prevail.
Now, reign'd as lord, ſome chance-aſcending
ſwain;
Another conquers him, yet wins in vain;
A third dethrones 'em both, nor can his pow'r maintain.
Each would be chief, but all unhelp'd by thee,
Stick in the mire of mean equality.
Gold firſt the famiſh'd mouth of learning fed,
And drew the curtain which dark ign'rance ſpread.
No lab'ring induſtry alarm'd the day,
For there was no reward ſuch toil to pay.
None to the ſearch of knowledge would aſpire,
Since wit's increaſe could raiſe their wealth no higher.
Supine ſtupidity forbade all ſtrife,
And ſleep refreſh'd not, but impriſon'd life.
But, ſince thy worth, O gold! was greatly known,
Arts have ſprung thick, and hope is wider grown.
Men, bleſt with thee, the murm'ring world command,
And tread down diſcord in each rebel land:
In hopes of thee, the ſtupid aim to think,
And ſin's broad eye, for profit, learns to wink.
The ſea's vaſt depth, for thee, we boldly ſound,
And ſleep, undreading, upon hoſtile ground.
For thee, the hind with plenty-ſpreading hand,
Lifts lazy nature from his ſluggiſh land:
Thou, gold! can'ſt melt the froſty-breaſted fair,
And dry damp ſorrows, and ſoul-drenching care:
In ſhort, by gold alone we happy live;
O Damon! joys are goods which only gold can give.

Damon.

Thus does the glitt'ring fiend debauch our wills,
And ſmiles to ſee us ſtroke his ſting-hid ills:
Baſe dirt! the fools who are enſlav'd by thee,
Slaves to a ſlave confeſs themſelves to be.
'Tis true thou art the origin and ſource,
Whence pow'r firſt roſe, and which maintains her
courſe:
But, what is power, which wealth, not juſtice gives?
How ill-diſtinguiſh'd ſuch a ſov'reign lives.
Could men but read the Gallic monarch's breaſt,
And trace ſwift tumults through his broken reſt,
How would they curſe his ſhadow-circled ſtate,
And laugh at envy, which maligns the great.
Sometimes, O ſhame! the fair thy pow'r adore,
And feign to love, where they diſdain'd before.
But, ah! the tempters who this charm have try'd,
Gain'd not the woman, but the woman's pride.
Can then Philemon, whoſe alluring ſtrains,
Lov'd by the nymphs, and envy'd by the ſwains,
Might reconcile antipathies, and move
The cruel hearts of ſavages to love.
Can he eſteem that baneful ore divine?
Or kneel diſhonour'd at blind fortune's ſhrine?
No—rather in her lewdeſt form, deſcribe
That ſtain affixing foe to virtue's ſnow-waſh'd tribe.

Philemon.

Damon, I love thee, and thy welfare ſeek;
Thence lend my truth the liberty to ſpeak:
Juſt as I wiſh, my friendſhip would adviſe,
And have thee rich and mighty, as thou'rt wiſe:
Thy keen-wrought edge of ſatire cuts too deep,
Not always ills we from wealth's harveſt reap.
Gold is the gift of heav'n; and heav'n is wiſe,
And knows the worth of virtue's far-wiſh'd prize.
The ſtarts which ſhake the Gallic monarch's breaſt,
Thoſe night-born tumults which diſtract his reſt,
Spring not from gold, my Damon, but from pride,
Which ſwell'd ambition with too high a tide.

Had he been pleas'd with glories gain'd before,
Fate had not dash'd his hopes in search of more:
Though gold the engine of man's fortune is,
The pilot wisdom must direct the bliss:
Calm moderation ought to measure choice,
And high-flown wishes stoop at reason's voice.
The sun, which at such distance paints the year,
Would scorch it, Damon, if it came too near.
You may, with ease, o'er shining millions reign,
And never be a slave to flowing gain.
But he whose birth directing stars decree,
That he shall wear out life in poverty,
Let him be cast in nature's choicest mould,
And lord of every gift of heav'n but gold;
While that alone he wants, to crown the rest,
Not all his other charms can make him blest.

Damon.

Philemon's lines do gold so far outshine,
So far more radiant, dazzling, and divine,
That ev'n the praise he gives it serves to show,
What more to wisdom than to wealth we owe!
But oh! 'tis false that gold can give us friends,
Flatt'ry and friendship have wide-diff'ring ends:
They who crowd round us while our hopes look gay,
Will in the dusk of fortune shrink away.
Timon, the brave! the gen'rous! and the great!
Timon, the wise! but wise, alas! too late!
Who dragg'd of wealth's proud dross a mighty load,
And shed his blessings round him like a god!
Timon who heal'd the woes of half mankind!
What curs'd returns did wretched Timon find!
Content is bliss, I'll with Philemon hold;
But that was never purchas'd yet by gold;
Our affluence but serves to spur desire,
And dang'rous flights attain'd but tempt us higher.

Philemon.

Oh! let me triumph in a golden fate!
If I am rich I can be wisely great.
With nice-tim'd aids can fainting worth assist,
And make the wretched happy when I list:
But if on fortune's barren strands I lie,
My fruitless pity shall unpity'd die!
You tell me, Damon, friends are bought and sold,
And that assistance comes and goes with gold.
If help in life affords the greatest bliss,
Sure, that which buys that help the greatest comfort is.

Damon.

All your strong arguments no proof produce,
Of gold's intrinsic value but its use!
Your generous soul your friends would entertain,
And general bliss with wide-spread aids maintain,
Call forth dim virtue on the world to shine!
'Tis great! 'tis wond'rous great! 'tis all divine!
But still Philemon, this sublime delight,
Springs not from gold's access, but from its flight!
You praise the use, yet cannot bear the sight.
Should villains aid me some worse foe to kill,
I'd love the act, but hate the villain still;
I'd prize a truth sent in the devil's name,
But still abhor that devil from whom it came.
So gold, pernicious in its nature, may
By souls like your's be bent a nobler way;
Thus, as the needle, by magnetic force
Once touch'd, still to the magnet guides its course.
Trembling, while wand'ring thence, and finds no rest,
'Till clasp'd and fasten'd to its darling breast.
So though our thoughts on diff'rent points design,
Meeting at last we in one centre join,
And in the union lose the terms of mine and thine.

Philemon.

I praise, dear swain, the use of gold, 'tis true;
But use includes intrinsic value too;
Whence but from use does estimation rise?
And ev'ry thing is worth what ev'ry thing supplies.
'Tis true, a diamond cannot keep out cold,
Nor can we eat or drink our heaps of gold;
Yet bless'd with either, Damon, we can buy
What neither in their nature can supply.
And since for wealth the joys of life are sold,
There's an intrinsic value sure in gold.
I hold with Damon gold should be a slave,
I treat as such the moderate sums I have.
And as kind fortune shall increase my store,
I'll make a slave of that and ten times more.
Yet gold possesses every healing pow'r;
Not love alone falls in a golden show'r.
Gold makes men wise as well as gives 'em rule;
For who e'er knew a wealthy man a fool?
Ev'n in the shades below the rich were blest,
And born by Charon to the fields of rest.
While the poor beggar, shiv'ring on the shore,
Wanting his penny found no passage o'er.
So poverty with shame to death was hurl'd,
And drew down scandal to the other world.
But since, my Damon, whom the muses bless,
Affects not gold and bids me love it less,
I'll listen to his sweet bewitching voice,
And guide my soul to meet him in his choice.
Since then, nor you nor I can happy be,
You with much gold, nor I with poverty,
Let's bend our search to find some freer fate,
And crown our wishes in the middle state.

TO A LADY,

Desiring to know what Love was like.

Love is a treacherous heat, a smothering spark,
Blown up by children's breath who shun the dark;
At first, the fire is innocently bright,
Glows gently gay and scatters warm delight:
But left neglected and unquench'd too long,
The nourish'd flame grows terrible and strong;
Till blazing fierce, it spreads on every side,
And burns its kindler with ungrateful pride.

PLAIN TRUTH.

Chloe, you talk with joy of Celia's face,
Admire her wit, and ape her fancy'd grace;
The praise you give is sure sincere respect,
Your practice proves what airs your thoughts affect.
But since you know that friendship should be free,
Give her this hint, and say—it came from me.
A face like her's, if manag'd well, might please,
But no charm strikes that is not arm'd with ease.
Striving too eagerly, she strives in vain;
These studied airs put beauty to the strain;

Would ſhe wound ſure and conquer with a grace,
Tell her, the careleſs runner wins the race.

CELINDA IN THE SNOW.

Celinda riding in a ſnowy day,
The wind-driv'n flakes about her hov'ring flew,
Some to her tempting boſom made their way,
And melting, chill'd her beauties through and through.

Some aiming with leſs art her clothes beſet,
And froze to little buttons as they fell;
Others, which could not ſuch fair quarters get,
Flew by unbleſt and miſs'd the ſhiv'ring belle.

Quite tir'd at laſt, and freezing as ſhe rode,
Her ivory teeth all chattering in her head;
Was ever ſuch a day? ſhe cry'd, good God!
If it much longer ſnows I ſhall be dead.

Madam, ſaid I, 'tis true, your lovely breaſt
Is far more us'd to give than ſuffer pain;
Yet of this accident to make the beſt,
'Tis better I ſhould preach than you complain.

All nature's works in ſome degree alike,
Confeſs the wiſdom of their Maker's will,
And bear hid meanings man's dark mind to ſtrike
With myſtic hints that try comparing ſkill.

Thus ſome with envy fill'd, envenom'd look, [ſee;
And gnaw themſelves when happier men they
Some can ſucceſs in others gladly brook,
Though they, perhaps, ſteep'd o'er in miſery be.
Others, again, by outward winds unſhook,
All chances but their own indifferent ſee.

So, my Celinda, 'tis with the ſharp ſnow,
Thoſe feath'ry flakes have each a ſev'ral aim;
The envy-acted ſee your boſom glow,
And ruſh, malicious, to aſſault the flame.

But ſhock'd to find themſelves, when neſted there,
So far exceeded in their boaſted white;
With melting grief their humbled pride they bear,
And weep themſelves to death to ſhun the light.

Others, of this white tribe that ſee and know,
With rev'rence ſhun that bliſs-warm breaſt of thine,
But ſtrive t' adorn thy dreſs with ſome new ſhow,
And froze to glitt'ring gems about thee ſhine.

A third ſort, unattracted ev'n by thee;
And cold indeed ſuch ſnow we ought to call;
With dull indiff'rence all thy charms can ſee,
And, diſregardful, round thee ſcattering fall.

Celinda liſt'ning, anſwer'd with a ſmile,
You poets keep your fancies always warm;
Could but this inward heat the froſt beguile,
We need not ſtop at yonder ſmokey farm.

TO CELINDA,

In Excuſe for looking on her at Church.

If fix'd on your's my eyes in pray'r you ſee,
You muſt not call my zeal idolatry;
For ſince our Maker's throne is plac'd ſo high,
That only in his works the God we ſpy:
And what's moſt bright, moſt gives him to our view,
I look moſt near him when I look on you.

GOOD-FRIDAY.

Am I awake? or is my ſoul miſled,
Through the bold tracks of mem'ry's mazy deep,
The empty realms of mimic ſleep,
Horrors by wild imagination bred,
Skim ſhadowy, and about me circling ſpread,
Oh! who can tell the cauſe of theſe new fears?
Whence theſe loud groans which tortur'd fancy hears?
Whence this loud thund'ring in my ears?
Why ſeems the ſtarting ſun to hold back day?
Why does he leap at once out of his fire-pav'd way?
And half-extinguiſh'd upward fly,
To ſhrowd his beams behind a ſabbled ſky? [hurl'd?
Why every way at once are theſe ſwift lightnings
Trembling nations to amaze,
And terribly adorn with quiv'ring blaze,
The horrors of a ſhade-benighted world?

Why breaks yon riſing ocean o'er the lands?
Diſdainful of its old appointed bounds: [ſands,
Why does it open far behind its brine-delighted
And leaving dry its roomy bed,
Let looſe at once high liſt its frightful head,
To ſeek forbidden grounds?
And hugely ſwelling from afar, with earth-aſſault-
ing roar, [the kingdoms o'er.
Riſe o'er the ſwallow'd mountain tops, and ſweep
Why does this circle-ſpreading earthquake ſwell,
Deep-flowing like a ſubterraneous tide?
Frighted fancy, canſt thou tell,
Why this ſtrong foe, aſham'd, his face ſhould hide?
'Tis not ſure for want of pride,
He ſhakes down cities with his mildeſt ſhocks;
Plows in the hill he rolls beneath, and harrows up the rocks!
Unſeen, he dreadful does appear;
The marble-hearted mountains quake for fear:
And as they find the danger drawing near,
With huge unwieldy terror leap aſide,
And, ſhook with agues, caſt their ſnowy pride.

The dead themſelves, by nature's charter bleſt,
With promis'd beds of laſting reſt,
Are from their graves, their dark long homes thrown up and diſpoſſeſt.
See the pale ghoſts of our forefathers riſe!
Horribly ſerene they glide,
And ſnuff, with ſhadowry noſtrils, ſcents of day,
Which fled ſo lately, all at once, away.
See how to earth they bend their beamleſs eyes,
And ſeem to wander, guideleſs, every way,
Unwilling through our hated world to ſtray,
In ſearch of the forgotten graves where once their bodies lay
Too conſcious ſoul! I feel it now:
Well may the ſtubborn pride of nature bow.
Well may trembling nations moan,
And mem'ry, ſick with conſternation, groan.
God, who to man his ev'ry bleſſing gives,
From whom, ungrateful, he receiv'd his breath:

That God, by whom alone man lives,
That very God, this day, by man met death.

THE DISPARITY,

FROM A HINT OF SIR HENRY WOTTON.

Ye ſtarry ſparks, on which, by night, we gaze,
That meanly ſatisfy our diſtant eyes,
More by your number than your blaze,
Ye common people of the ſkies:
What are ye when the ſun ſhall riſe?

Ye warbling rangers of the groves,
That ſweetly ſtrain your little throats:
And, perch'd on boughs, to ſing your loves,
Charm the ſtill foreſt with your notes;
Who will admire your tuneful lays,
When Philomel her voice ſhall raiſe?

Ye violets that in early ſpring appear,
And, cloth'd in purple, wait upon the ſun,
Adorning earth's damp face, with blooming cheer,
And making ev'ry verdant bank your own,
What are ye when the roſe is blown?

So, when my charmer ſhall be ſeen,
Gaz'd on, and wonder'd at by all,
Beauty muſt own her rightful queen,
And ev'ry fair uſurpreſs fall:
For ſhe was ſure by heav'n deſign'd,
Th' eclipſe and glory of her kind.

BELINDA'S GRAVE.

Here, woe-mark'd ſpot! once dear Belinda lay;
Here her cold boſom mix'd with colder clay;
And here, deſpairing and afflicted I
Planted this tree, which now makes haſte to die:
While this lov'd cypreſs a ſad ſhelter made,
Oft would I loſe myſelf beneath its ſhade;
Guide, with a painful pleaſure, each dear ſhoot,
And water with my tears the rich-fed root.
Sigh through the boughs, like ſome moiſt April breeze,
And the graſp'd trunk in am'rous rapture ſqueeze.
And when ſome warbling ſongſter, neſted there,
Belinda's voice, methought, ſhook ſoft the air!
The murm'ring branches, bending from the wind,
Breath'd a cool comfort o'er my love-ſhook mind.
Thus, ſeven long years, I learnt to hear and ſee
My loſt Belinda, in her funeral tree.
But, mad at laſt, and all impatient grown,
To make my fruitleſs paſſion ſtill more known:
Fatally fond, I put a cruel mark,
And carv'd my name upon the ſhrinking bark.
Wretch that I was! the tree, from that curs'd day,
In ſad reſentment, pin'd itſelf away!
And that new life, which dead Belinda gave,
Wither'd with pain, crept downward to her grave.

THE ROYAL SEPULCHRE.

Is this the boaſtful pride of mortal ſtate?
Is it for this we covet to be great?
What ſhort-liv'd bliſs from envy'd grandeur ſprings,
When theſe poor relics once were mighty kings!
O frail uncertainty of earthly pow'r!
Where graves can majeſty itſelf devour!
How naked now does royalty appear!
Alas, how vaſt, how ſad a change is here!
Tell me, dumb duſt, how wide was thy command?
Where's now the ſceptre that once fill'd this hand?
Where are thoſe brawny guards which aw'd thy ſtate? [wait?
Where the gay crowds which once were proud to
Can narrow limits, dark like theſe, contain
The chang'd extent of thy contracted reign?
Canſt thou, at whoſe leaſt frown a nation ſhook,
And, trembling, watch'd the light'nings of thy look:
Canſt thou, at laſt grown humble, be content
To let bold ſearch profane thy monument?
And common men, grown rude and wanton too,
Thus poiſe your duſty bones, and wonder at the view.

MAY-DAY.

Welcome, dear dawn of ſummer's riſing ſway,
Fair fav'rite of the year! ſoul-ſoft'ning May!
Late I have learnt, by love's ſweet queen inſpir'd,
Why, from my youth, this day my boſom fir'd;
'Twas for her birth that blooming nature ſprung,
'Twas in her notes the ſky's ſoft rangers ſung.
The breeze blew ſoft, to ſigh her ſoul's ſweet frame,
And the boughs bent in homage to her name.
Thick ſhot the meads, to paint her fruitful mind,
And flow'rs, that roll'd her breath, enrich'd the wind;
For her the ſun wak'd out to bleſs our iſle,
And lighted up half heav'n to paint her ſmile.
Oh! we are lovers all! our Celia reigns,
And the warm'd world is ſick with my ſweet pains.

MOSES'S SONG OF THANKSGIVING,

On the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea,

FROM EXODUS, CHAP. XV.

The firſt Part only.

Temples and altars let us raiſe,
Ours, and our father's God, provokes our praiſe.
God is our ſtrength, God is our theme:
Where is Egypt's fall'n eſteem?
Pharaoh wakes from his proud dream;
Wakes to feel a warrior's hand.
Lord of a pow'r more vaſt than his, that ſhakes
his wond'ring land!
Vainly the following foes our God defy'd,
Their rapid wheels in vain tore up the ſtrand;
In vain they mock'd the waving wand;
Not all their noiſe could the loud ſea withſtand;
The wat'ry world flow'd fearleſs o'er their pride,
A drowning army beat th' involving tide.
On wave-waſh'd chariots, half ſuſtain'd, the trembling captains ride.
Up-lifted hoofs paw'd looſe the liquid way,
And round 'em, black'ning through the foam, the floating legions lay.
Down, down, th' ungrounded footſteps go;
Strain'd to feel for ſands below,
Sands where wat'ry mountains flow!

Sinking, like rocks, they clog the deep with prey,
High-cov'ring roſe the briny flood, and ſwept their rage away.

Saving God! thy hand was here:
Thou protecting, who can fear?
Threat'ning aloud, the thund'ring legions roſe,
And at thy choſen ſhook th' extended ſpear:
Behind, amaz'd, we ſaw th' o'ertaking foes,
Hearts anticipating blows.
But while thy blaſt, O baſe deſpair! blew keen,
Safely from heav'n ſhot down between!
Dreadful, in wrath, thy lifted arm but ſhone,
And all th' unnumber'd thouſands melt away:
O'er ſtubbly fields, ſo wind-driv'n fire rolls on,
And ſweeps the blazing breadth with crackly ſway.
Th' Almighty's voice but ſpoke a loud command,
And ſtrait th' unlinking ſurges backward riſe.
High climbing waves in quiv'ring mountains ſtand,
And hang their billowy horrors in the ſkies.
In murm'ring cleft th' obedient deep yawns wide,
And ſhad'wy glooms lour dark from either ſide.
Down through the horrid vale's moiſt concave led,
Safe and dry bold Iſrael tread;
Gay, 'twixt terrors, round her ſpread,
Her tearful eye now ſmil'd once more and hail'd her guardian God.

Hark! aloft the wond'ring foe!
Look! they cry'd, all pointing low,
Shall the cowards 'ſcape us ſo;
'Twixt the dividing waves they go!
Their forc'rer cleaves the ſea with magic ſkill:
Haſte, prevent, o'ertake and kill.
They hear, they march—they dare the mad command;
The ſhouting ſquares invade the cover'd ſtrand;
Chariots, impell'd on fiery wheels, gore wide th' incumber'd ſand.
Mix'd horſe and foot, in bann'ry pomp deſcend;
See, from each horn th' inclining length'ners bend,
Looſe ſlides the weeping ooſe to ſhun their weight,
And the deep murm'ring mourns th' unuſual ſtate.

Hark! the burſting thunder ſpeaks!
Waves your wat'ry ranks diſband!
Oh! behold how vain, how weak
Strength that dares its God withſtand!
Down at once from either hand,
Hoarſe ſounding hills, o'er hills let looſe, devour the vaniſh'd ſand!
Helpleſs, ingulf'd, th' immerging ſquadrons roll:
Pharaoh, proud-ſinking, drinks down brine that chills his fiery ſoul.
Mix'd on th' involving ſurge, a-while they ſtrive,
Then, like ſunk plumbets, to the bottom dive.
Of all the gods, no god like ours is found!
Join heav'n and earth, applauſe like his let men and angels ſound.

DAVID'S ELEGY

For the Death of Saul and Jonathan.

2 KINGS, CHAP. I.

O Iſrael! how does all thy beauty fade!
How are the mighty fall'n, the ſtrong betray'd!
Ne'er may this woe in Gath's full ſtreets be told;
Never let Aſcalon our fate unfold.

Mountains of Gilboa! may ye drink no dew;
Let rain's mourn'd want turn red the verdant hue;
Let your vines wither, and your olives die,
And your parch'd fields no grainy wealth ſupply;
For there, abandon'd Saul, brave monarch, bled,
As if no awful oil had hemm'd his head.

Never in vain drew Jonathan his bow;
Never Saul's ſword fell fruſtrate on a foe:
Lovely and loving, one dear life they led,
Nor parted dying, but together bled.
Swifter than eagles, to the fight they flew,
Stronger than lions, they could foes purſue.

Daughters of Iſrael! weep the loſs of Saul:
In ſcarlet and in gold he cloth'd you all:
Peaceful, beneath his warlike ſhade, you ſmil'd;
And triumph'd, by their toil, whoſe hoſts he ſpoil'd.

Thee, Jonathan, my brother! thee I mourn;
With grief ſtill growing muſt thy loſs be borne.
Soft and delightful partner of my ſoul:
Two halfs divided made us one dear whole.
Vaſt was thy love, and wonderful to me;
And never woman lov'd as I lov'd thee.

TO A LADY,

ON CALLING ME JEALOUS.

He whoſe whole treaſure one dear veſſel bears,
Through ſeas on which deſtructive pirates ſwarm,
Muſt be excus'd a thouſand fears and cares,
And bend his ſoul to ev'ry ſtrong alarm.

Ill do they love, and feel thee at their heart,
Who ſeem unmov'd, while others hope thee theirs;
My kindling boſom burns with open ſmart,
For my proud ſoul her unveil'd meaning wears.

Nice as thy own, and all refin'd as thine,
My tow'ring paſſion climbs with gen'rous flame;
But, ſhrinking from neglect, in ſad decline,
Burns downward, and forgoes a fruſtrate aim.

Tender as infant ſighs, in ſlumb'ring eaſe,
My ſoft'ning ſoul admits and owns thy ſway:
'Tis my life's ſweeteſt care thy taſte to pleaſe,
And in thy ſunſhine melt my griefs away.

Woes are too weak to wound me through thy ſmiles;
The pole's fix'd froſt were warm as heav'n to me;
I tread down malice through her mazy wiles,
And triumph over all things charming thee.

What taſk ſo dang'rous, or what toil ſo vaſt,
Would not thy love inſpire me to deſy:
Soul'd with immortal fire my flame muſt laſt,
And I ſhould conquer worlds beneath thy eye.

O that my ſtruggling thoughts which heave within,
Could borrow but a voice and ſpeak my ſoul;
Then would this heart thy grateful paſſions win,
Till—oh, vaſt empire! I ſhould claim the whole.

Yet as it is indulge my trembling fear,
And give thy lover's counſel leave to ſpeak:
Fools are all falſe, nor long can hold thee dear,
For ſoon they find whateer they know to ſeek.

Boastful, ungenerous, vain, and grossly mean
On all thy charms they only feed their sense;
Thou art by them but as mere woman seen,
Blind to thy heav'n of inward excellence.

Sudden the wretches' smoky flames expire;
Such earthly fuel must of course decay;
But I, while adoration lifts desire,
Light up a love that ne'er can burn away.

ALONE IN AN INN AT SOUTHAMPTON.

April 25. 1737.

Twenty lost years have stol'n their hours away,
Since in this inn, ev'n in this room, I lay:
How chang'd! what then, rapture, fire, and air,
Seems now sad silence all and blank despair!
Is it that youth paints every view too bright,
And life advancing, fancy fades her light?
Ah, no!—nor yet is day so far declin'd,
Nor can time's creeping coldness reach the mind.
'Tis that I miss th' inspirer of that youth;
Her, whose soft smile was love, whose soul was truth.
Her, from whose pain I never wish'd relief,
And for whose pleasure I could smile at grief.
Prospects that view'd with her inspir'd before,
Now seen without her can delight no more.
Death snatch'd my joys, by cutting off her share,
But left her griefs to multiply my care.
Pensive and cold this room in each chang'd part
I view, and, shock'd from every object, start: [day,
There hung the watch, that beating hours from
Told its sweet owner's lessening life away.
There her dear diamond taught the sash my name;
'Tis gone! frail image of love, life, and fame.
That glass, she dress'd at, keeps her form no more;
Not one dear footstep tunes th' unconscious floor,
There sat she—yet those chairs no sense retain,
And busy recollection smarts in vain.
Sullen and dim, what faded scenes are here!
I wonder, and retract a starting tear,
Gaze in attentive doubt—with anguish swell,
And o'er and o'er on each weigh'd object dwell.
Then to the window rush, gay views invite,
And tempt idea to permit delight.
But unimpressive, all in sorrow drown'd,
One void forgetful desert glooms around.
Oh life!—deceitful lure of lost desires!
How short thy period, yet how fierce thy fires!
Scarce can a passion start (we change so fast),
Ere new lights strike us, and the old are past.
Schemes following schemes, so long life's taste explore,
That e'er we learn to live, we live no more.
Who then can think—yet sigh, to part with breath?
Or shun the healing hand of friendly death?
Guilt, penitence, and wrongs, and pain, and strife,
Form the whole heap'd amount, thou flatterer, life!
Is it for this, that tost'd 'twixt hope and fear,
Peace, by new shipwrecks, numbers each new year?
Oh take me, death! indulge desir'd repose,
And draw thy silent curtain round my woes.
Yet hold—one tender pang revokes that pray'r,
Still there remains one claim to tax my care.
Gone though she is, she left her soul behind,
In four dear transcripts of her copy'd mind.
They chain me down to life, new task supply,
And leave me not at leisure yet to die!
Busied for them I yet forego release,
And teach my wearied heart to wait for peace.
But when their day breaks broad, I welcome night,
Smile at discharge from care, and shut out light.

THE SHIPWRECK.

'Twas on the day whose unauspicious fate,
With dismal news alarm'd Britannia's state;
And in our admiral's shipwreck let us see,
That courage cannot stem mortality!
The sea's grim sov'reign in a calmer place,
Unbent the wrinkly terrors of his face:
Where, stretch'd at ease, the wanton monarch lay,
And, hemm'd with nereids, laugh'd the hours away;
Soft knots of unform'd coral swell'd his bed,
And oozy samphire crown'd his bushy head.
A watchful guard the best arm'd fishes keep,
And wind-rock'd billows lull'd their lord to sleep.
While thus he lay, thick-gathering shouts were heard
From ev'ry part the scaly nation steer'd;
With sudden force the swelling sea ran high,
And moving mountains swept the darken'd sky.
Disturb'd, the monarch rais'd his wond'ring head,
And started, doubtful, from his briny bed:
Angry, his awful trident thrice he shook,
And swift possession of his chariot took:
Fix'd in the stately seat, he drives, he raves!
The frighted steeds divide the foamy waves;
And plunging fiercely through retorted tides,
Dash the drops both ways from their panting sides.
Soon he arriv'd, where shoals on shoals amaz'd,
In gath'ring swarm, as on some wonder, gaz'd:
Triumphant tumult spoke unusual joys,
And growing numbers swell'd the savage noise.
The god advanc'd; and, as he nearer drew,
The shooting fishes fled his awful view!
He came; and curious what the cause could be,
That had at once alarm'd th' assembled sea!
He saw—and, starting back, declin'd his head,
The well-known Clou'sly, Britain's admiral, dead!
Stretch'd on the sands, the wave-swol'n warrior lay,
To death's wide jaws an unexpected prey!
Swift he descends, o'erjoy'd at what he found,
And rais'd the body from th' unwilling ground;
Invok'd the soul to re-inform his breast:
The late ejected spirit, greatly blest,
Return'd, and joyful its own seat possess'd;
The waking hero felt a strange surprise,
And starting, open'd wide his sea-wash'd eyes:
Look'd round, with curious horror all amaz'd,
While thus the god bespoke him as he gaz'd.
Illustrious rival of my wat'ry throne!
Welcome to regions more than half your own.
Long have my seas been practis'd to your sway;
Scarce would my doubtful slaves my laws obey,
Unknowing, till surpris'd, they saw you die,
Who was most god of oceans, you or I!

Live now confeſs'd, from this propitious hour,
Imperial partner of divided pow'r. [pride,
Grateful, the chief bow'd low, unmov'd with
And to the gen'rous offer thus reply'd:
You tempt me with a pow'r I would not loſe,
Had I my queen's conſent that pow'r to uſe.
She bid me rule the ſeas to my laſt breath,
But gave me no commiſſion after death.

THE FRENCH PROPHETS.

Prophecy, no—'tis luxury of ſoul!
No cataracts down religion's rivers roll! [clear,
Her ſtreams, though deep, are ever ſmooth and
And from their bottoms all things plain appear.
On ſuperſtition's ſea theſe veſſels ride,
Foul with the daſhings of her muddy tide.
What marks, what tokens, can they boaſt from heav'n?
Knowledge is ſtill with inſpiration giv'n!
While theſe the duſky paths of ignorance tread,
And impudently prophecy for bread!
With counterfeited ſhocks of ſoul they ſwell,
And in forc'd ſweats, convulſive falſehoods tell.
To heights like this religion would not fly;
Ev'n zeal grows madneſs, when 'tis ſcrew'd too high.
Now law, methinks, moſt wholeſomely ſevere,
Might truth's fair garden from this rubbiſh clear;
Which long deſpis'd, may ſtrike too vig'rous root,
And into groves of godly error ſhoot!
'Twere eaſy, now, to ſweep looſe weeds away,
Which may deſtroy the flow'rs by ſhort delay.
So, in the bottom of ſome goodly plain,
Flows a ſmall rill, increas'd by caſual rain;
Near which, with careful ſteps, and ſounding hands,
Some cautious clown with needleſs terror ſtands;
Loth to attempt a nimble paſſage o'er,
While ſtill the ſwelling ſtream increaſes more;
Till faint eſſays protracting time in vain,
The riſing river drowns the cover'd plain.
Then ſtagg'ring with affright he gazes round,
And forc'd to paſs at laſt miſtakes his ground:
Till deeply wading toward the wide miſs'd ſhore,
The current ſweeps him, and he's ſeen no more.

CELIA TO AMINTOR.

Since God, whom we continually offend,
Is ſtill ſo merciful, that he forgives,
Man ſure a pitying ear may juſtly lend,
When woman penitent in ſorrow lives.

The mournful dove, when abſent from her mate,
Sits brooding melancholy all alone;
Pines and bemoans her ſeparated ſtate,
And all the groves can ne'er the loſs atone.

So I, depriv'd of all I hold moſt dear,
My much-mourn'd lover, and my tend'reſt friend,
Hear reaſon whiſper in my conſcious ear,
That only your bleſt ſight my grief can end.

Sure, if I ſee you not before I ſleep,
A ſecond Niobe I ſhall become;
Fly then, Amintor, give my woe relief;
Rather than vex you, I'll be always dumb.

AMINTOR'S ANSWER.

If you too frequently provoke your God,
That God, who merciful, forgives you ſtill,
You muſt expect at laſt to feel his rod;
His rod, the fitteſt ſcourge of head-ſtrong will.

But I, long vers'd in women's winding ways,
Unmov'd with patient phlegm their follies ſee;
And, like men tir'd with dirty wint'ry days, [be.
Would wiſh 'twere ſpring, but know it cannot

No longer then in ſpite of nature pine;
Thoſe tiny eyes can ſpare no room for tears;
Your wand'ring dove has ſnatch'd the firſt glad ſign,
And with the peaceful olive-branch appears.

For ſhould your tuneful clack be ſtricken dumb,
More wonders would ariſe than you have ſhown;
Not Celia only ſtatue would become,
But all th' aſtoniſh'd town would turn to ſtone.

TO MIRANDA, AFTER MARRIAGE;

WITH MR. LOCK'S TREATISE ON EDUCATION.

Since every day with new delight I ſee
Theſe lively little images of thee,
I would their tender minds to virtue bow,
And have 'em never leſs belov'd than now.
Take then, thou gentle partner of my care,
A glaſs, to ſhow thee what theſe infants are:
By this juſt light direct their opening way,
Leſt road-met folly lead their ſteps aſtray: [owe,
Firſt, teach 'em what to heav'n's high throne they
Then—whence on earth the wiſe man's comforts flow:
Teach 'em, while fortune ſmiles to uſe her right,
And nobly ſcorn her when ſhe takes her flight.
The rare-found charms of friendſhip let 'em know,
And learn, that love's ſoft dreſs is lin'd with woe.
Form with progreſſive care the wid'ning mind,
And, growing, bid 'em leave the world behind:
Till having learn'd whate'er becomes the free,
You laſtly teach 'em, how to charm like thee.

EPITAPH

ON A YOUNG LADY, WHO DIED UNMARRIED.

Ripe in virtue, green in years,
Here a matchleſs maid lies low:
None could read, and ſpare their tears,
Did they but her ſweetneſs know.

Humbly wiſe, and meekly good,
No earthly lover's arms ſhe bleſt;
But full of grace, her Saviour woo'd,
And hides her bluſhes in his breaſt.

AUGUSTA'S COMPLAINT TO HER THAMES.

Near the ſoft ſolitudes of Hampton's plain,
Where the moiſt banks perpetual ſpring maintain;
The gentle Thames has form'd a deep'ning bay,
Where ſportful ſtreams in wanton whirlpools play.
In this ſweet place the clouds no terrors wear;
Here no bold tempeſts diſcompoſe the air;

No ruffling billows here affault the ſhore,
Nor wint'ry floods with ſwell'd ambition roar;
But all, ſerene and calm, is form'd to pleaſe,
And the ſmooth ſtream reflects the bord'ring trees;
Hither no winds, but zephyrous breaths repair,
Soft as the ſighs of love-ſick virgins are!
Here ſafety reigns, and on the ſilent brink,
Cud-chewing cattle watch their fleeting drink:
While fiſhes, conſcious of no foes to ſhun,
Turn up their ſcaly noſes to the ſun. [bred,
Here, ſick with grief, which Anna's abſence
Auguſta's genius hid her mournful head;
And, with low accents, ſpeaking inward pains,
Thus to the gliding river ſhe complains:
When gentle ſtream to ſhun the briny tide,
Anon thy ſea-met waves ſhall backward glide;
Then, gentle ſtream be kind, one moment ſtay,
And, on thy ſurface, bear my ſighs away;
Tell the great miſtreſs of this happy iſle,
Auguſta, ſtript of joy, forgets to ſmile. [ſtate,
What though yon tow'ring ſpires have ris'n in
The city's genius feels an humbler fate.
Shou'd art and nature toil to make me fair,
Cou'd I taſte glory, and my queen not there?
But, oh! too fondly I to thee complain;
Thou know'ſt, unkindly know'ſt, 'tis all in vain!
Thy ſtreams their eye-bewitching pleaſures join,
To raiſe thy Windſor's ſtate to ruin mine!
Windſor has other boaſts, but help'd by thee,
Grows proudly charming and out-rivals me.
But turn ſweet current! bid thy waters ſtray,
And guide their mazy bends ſome other way.
Strip the gay cottage of its boaſtful pride,
Nor longer through th' imperious proſpect glide.
So to thy care this glory ſhall remain,
T' have given Auguſta back her queen again.
Grave Thameſis thrice ſhook his dripping head,
And ſlowly riſing from his oozy bed, [ran,
While the huſh'd ſtream with awful ſmoothneſs
He to the mournful genius thus began:
Yon queen of cities ought to learn content;
Her gratitude ſhou'd theſe complaints prevent.
Have I not rais'd her to an envy'd ſtate?
Is ſhe not rich, licentious, pow'rful, great?
And would ſhe thus make every bliſs her own?
And muſt our Anna live for her alone.
Do not yon ſun-beams with unwearied race,
Whelm their enliv'ning light from place to place?
Why, then, muſt Britain's glory ceaſe to move,
And bleſs her world with her divided love?
Go, go, retire! your tears with pain I ſee,
And this complaint renew'd ſhall dang'rous be!
He ſaid, and gliding from her preſence went,
And ſad Auguſta ſtrove, but could not be content.

TO THE UNKNOWN AUTHOR

Of the beautiful new Piece, called Pamela.

Bleſt be thy pow'rful pen, whoe'er thou art,
Thou ſkill'd great moulder of the maſter'd heart!
Where haſt thou lain conceal'd? or why thought
At this dire period to unveil thy wit? [fit,
O! late befriended iſle! had this broad blaze,
With earlier beamings bleſs'd our fathers days,
The pilot radiance pointing out the ſource,
Whence public wealth derives its vital courſe;
Each timely draught ſome healing pow'r had ſhown,
Ere general gangreen blacken'd to the bone.
But ſeſt'ring now, beyond all ſenſe of pain,
'Tis hopeleſs, and the helper's hand is vain.
Sweet Pamela! forever blooming maid!
Thou dear enliv'ning (yet immortal) ſhade!
Why are thy virtues ſcatter'd to the wind?
Why are thy beauties flaſh'd upon the blind?
What though thy flutt'ring ſex might learn from thee,
That merit forms a rank above degree?
That pride, too conſcious, falls from ev'ry claim,
While humble ſweetneſs climbs beyond its aim.
What though religion, ſmiling from thy eyes,
Shows her plain pow'r, and charms without diſguiſe?
What though thy warmly-pleaſing moral ſcheme,
Gives livelier rapture than the looſe can dream?
What though thou build'ſt by thy perſuaſive life,
Maid, child, friend, miſtreſs, mother, neighbour, wife?
Though taſte like thine each void of time can fill,
Unſunk by ſpleen, unquicken'd by quadrille?
What though 'tis thine, to bleſs the lengthen'd hour,
Give permanence to joy, and uſe to pow'r?
Lend late-felt bluſhes to the vain and ſmart,
And ſqueeze cramp'd pity from the miſer's heart?
What though 'tis thine, to huſh the marriage breeze,
Teach liberty to tire, and chains to pleaſe?
Thine though from ſtiffneſs to diveſt reſtraint,
And to the charmer reconcile the ſaint.
Though ſmiles and tears obey thy moving ſkill,
And paſſion's ruffled empire waits thy will.
Though thine the fancy'd fields of flow'ry wit,
Thine art's whole pow'r in nature's language writ.
Thine to convey ſtrong thought with modeſt eaſe,
And, copying converſe, teach its ſtyle to pleaſe;
Though thine each virtue that a God could lend;
Thine every help that every heart can mend:
'Tis thine in vain, thou wak'ſt a dying land,
And lift'ſt departed hope with fruitleſs hand.
Death has no cure—thou haſt miſtim'd thy aim:
Rome had her Goths—and all beyond was ſhame.

ON CORINNA'S FIRST ATTEMPT IN POETRY.

With eyes unbrib'd, by your enchanting view,
I trac'd impartial your ſoft numbers through.
Your looſe-dreſs'd fancy in each ſparkling line,
Gilds the gay current of your deep deſign.
Your poem, ſtrongly fine, and ſoftly bold,
Is ſilkworm's labour ſpun with threads of gold.
Go on, bright maid! nor doubt the world's applauſe;
Wit arm'd with looks, like yours the critic awes.
Though years may knit and lengthen your ſucceſs,
Think not your youth will your due praiſe oppreſs;

Ev'n the broad ſun, when firſt his glories riſe,
With ſtruggling tincture, ſtreaks the eaſtern ſkies;
But ſoon, through heav'n's enlighten'd orbs, the conquering luſtre flies.

THE VALENTINE.

Why, be it ſo! it matters not what name
Yon river bears, ſince ſtill it flows the ſame.
Whate'er I call you, this I'm ſure I feel,
No name can ſpeak of you with half my zeal.
In vain, love's meaning, this or that we call,
The comprehenſive lover takes in all!
Yet ſince to cuſtom's bent we all incline,
You ſhall, to pleaſe you, be my valentine.
And ſince my charming trifler aſks a gift,
The myſtic value of this preſent ſift.
Accept theſe gloves, and if they worthleſs ſeem,
Learn, thus, what pleas they bring for your eſteem.
Their ſpotleſs white preferr'd their choice to me,
As the beſt emblem of your chaſtity.
Their ſmoothneſs may almoſt the honour win,
To repreſent the velvet of your ſkin. [find,
Their ſupp'neſs, which join'd with ſtrength, you
Is the juſt fabric of your well mix'd mind.
The kid, that wore 'em, had ſome faint pretence,
To be the type of your ſweet innocence.
How then can I a fitter preſent chooſe?
Or you theſe emblematic gloves refuſe.
One ſtronger reaſon, too, my fear has found;
Women, they ſay, oft ſlight the breaſt they wound.
And when dark abſence ſhades us from their view,
They look not after us, but ſeek out new.
To ſhun this fate theſe gloves your lover ſends,
That you may have him at your fingers ends.

THE REVENGE.

High on the ſummit of a craggy rock,
Whoſe harden'd ſides reſiſt the billows ſhock;
Whoſe cliffy brow, mens eyes with horror view,
O'erlooking, proudly, land and ocean too:
There ſtands a roomy cave by nature made,
To knit, in juſt embraces, light and ſhade:
Its ſpacious mouth the ſun's up-riſing greets,
Admits his luſtre, but repels his heats!
No glaring gold on this rough portal ſhines,
But creeping ivy round its entrance twines.
Wall-flow'rs, wild thyme, and juniper grow there,
And with their odorous influence feed the air.
Surrounding groves, at diſtance, graceful riſe,
Shades for the little ſongſters of the ſkies.
And near the cave, a torrent guſhing o'er,
Daſhes the ſea beneath with tributary roar.
Stretch'd on a bed of freſh-blown roſes here,
Serene the region, and the proſpect clear,
Reſts, when grown weary by her ſummer toil,
The wakeful genius of our happy iſle.
Hence, her unbounded ſight can trace the ſhore,
And look high-poſted the proud ocean o'er.
And hence, while hoſtile winds grow hoarſe in vain, [main.
Guide ſafe her wide-watch'd Britons 'croſs the
'Twas here of late, on an ill-fated day,
The awful nymph, o'ercharg'd with buſineſs, lay;
Now ſwelling winds deficient fails to fill;
Now ſoft'ning tempeſts with reductive ſkill,
Now with wide bleſſings looks ſhe through the iſle,
And calls forth harveſts with a fruitful ſmile.
Then t'wards Auguſta's ſpires ſhe loves to lean,
And guide ſtray'd comforts to Auguſta's queen.
But, whether tir'd with her long line of care,
Or lull'd to reſt by the unacted air,
A riſing languor o'er her ſenſes creeps,
And in a fatal hour the guardian ſleeps.
Now was the time! the prompted Gallic foe
Call'd out to ſtrike a chance-invited blow,
With ſhameful odds, in ſtrength advanc'd to meet,
Th' unfearing convoys of a Britiſh fleet!
With deadly ſhock th' unequal ſquadrons join,
And death-wing'd fires fly ſwift from either line.
In jetty pomp black terrors force their way,
And ſulph'rous ſmoke puts out the eye of day.
Juſt in the thunder of the growing fight,
The waking genius ſtarted at the ſight!
In ſad ſurpriſe ſhe rolls her ſparkling eyes,
Springs from her couch, and to the ocean flies!
Arriv'd, incumbent on the ruffled air,
She ſees rude globes the floating foreſt tear:
Her ſons o'ermatch'd, like men untaught to yield,
Scud, unreſolv'd, about the watry field:
The ſpacious ſeas with ſcatter'd veſſels charg'd,
To double length the breaking line enlarg'd.
Averſe to fly, nor deaf to ſafety's call,
They hang, like ſcatt'ring clouds, about to fall.
But while the foe, encourag'd at his view,
Preſſing triumphant on, would dare purſue;
Again united they the fight reſtore,
Again dart vengeance fiercer than before:
Again the big-mouth'd cannon rends the ſky,
And the unconquer'd ſuff'rers ruſh to die.
Thus, while the hunted panther ſpent with fight;
Looks round diſtreſt, and meditates a flight;
If then prevented, he with ſudden roar
Turns back, and dyes the field with hoſtile gore;
Diſdaining life upon the ſpears he flies,
And heap'd on piles of victims proudly dies.
All this the trembling nymph with grief beheld;
At length her care the victor's force repell'd;
Then waſtes no time the ruin'd to deplore,
But guides the rich remainder ſafe to ſhore:
Thence to the cave with threat'ning tranſport flew,
Revolving what her hop'd revenge ſhould do!
There, while depreſs'd with melancholy thought,
Her working fancy diff'rent projects taught,
From heav'n's bright orb a youth divinely fair,
With wings extended, cleav'd th' enlighten'd air;
Juſt at the mourning charmer's feet he ſtay'd,
Look'd lovely on her, bow'd him low, and ſaid:
Mourn not this little loſs, nor blame thy fate;
Decreed revenge ſhall on thy wiſhes wait:
Look up, bright maid! read Ramilies writ there,
And pay thyſelf large int'reſt for this care!
He ſaid: and ſtrait his wings their plumes advance,
And bear him glitt'ring through the wild expanſe;
The raviſh'd nymph beholds his ſtarry flight,
And fill'd with promis'd glory bleſt the ſight.

JOSTLING IN SNOWY WEATHER.

Forgive me, Chloris! nor my rudeneſs blame;
Strange as it is, this froſt has bred a flame!

Driv'n from your breaſt, I glow with new deſire;
And melt like ſtraggling ſnow that falls on fire.
Had you been black you might have ſhunn'd this blow;
For diff'rent colours would each other ſhow;
But, oh! you're fair, and cold, and ſoft, and every way like ſnow.

LIBERIA WATCH'D AT MIDNIGHT.

As from a window in the wane of night,
With ſtarry views I feaſted wand'ring ſight,
I ſaw Liberia watch the riſing day,
Whoſe luſtre was to light her friend away!
That friend whoſe kindred paſſion ſerv'd to prove
The promis'd ardour of her brother's love!
That brother's love, which though it meets regard,
Remains uncrown'd with the yet-hop'd reward!
As in ſome overcaſt and diſmal day,
We ſtart to ſee the ſun at once break way;
So, at that hour, to ſee ſuch charms advance,
When ghoſts are ſaid to riſe, and fairies dance!
With more than uſual pleaſure fill'd my ſight,
And mix'd ſome wonder with much more delight!
While arm in arm they trac'd the garden walk,
The love-huſh'd air hung liſt'ning to their talk,
The dancing breeze which had till then been gay,
At their appearance ſigh'd and dy'd away.
As they drew near the moon more ſtrongly ſhone,
To view their brightneſs, not to boaſt her own.
A gen'ral ſtillneſs ſeem'd to ſoothe their cares,
And nature's face grew ſad, to ſuit with theirs:
Shrill-barking Mopſy ſmother'd her own joys,
Fearing to drown her miſtreſs' charming voice:
Liberia ſpoke, but ſeem'd to ſpeak in vain,
As if unable to deſcribe her pain!
When grief is true, no words its force can paint;
A ſilent ſorrow far outſpeaks complaint!
A thouſand leaves the deſtin'd ſiſters took;
A thouſand unſpoke meanings fill'd each look:
Oft they gaz'd upward to the dawning ſky,
And curs'd th' expected hour for drawing nigh:
If now, thought I, ſome gentle zephyr blew,
Thus ſhould it whiſper as it round her flew:
Think, ſince your pitying ſoul does abſence hate,
Abſence from you muſt ſharper pangs create!
Think, if to loſe the ſiſter gives you woes;
What loſing you the brother undergoes!
Who every night from your lov'd preſence ſent,
Does long repeated abſences lament!
And if this parting does yourſelf diſpleaſe,
Be taught by ſympathy to give him eaſe.

TO LORD GEORGE GRAHAM;

On his Action near Oſtend, on the 24th of June 1745.

'Twas finely tim'd! third Edward's brighteſt days
Had from ſuch captains claim'd increaſe of praiſe,
But now, 'tis tenfold greatneſs thus to riſe,
Where ſenſe of victory, loſt in purſe-craft lies!
Where war but pilfers, and but bags conteſt;
And public honour is the public jeſt.
At ſuch a time, to dare the ſneerer's joke;
To ruſh on danger when but foes provoke;
Unbrib'd by profit's impulſe, fight for bays,
And court no premium but his country's praiſe,
'Tis prodigy! 'tis out of nature's road;
'Tis ſcorn of prudence, and offence to mode.
Shake, Dunkirk! and retract thy bold extent,
Doom'd to due duſt, ſtands each proud battlement:
Swell high, propitious ſurge, hide Tournay's ſtains,
And waſh off infult, from our cow'rd campaigns.
Look up, ye ſea-driv'n ghoſts! whom pleas'd Toulon
Saw ſink in fruitleſs fight, forgot too ſoon!
O'er the ſalt wave triumphant thunders hear,
Hail the wiſh'd vengeance that at laſt draws near!
While France ſtarts wide, and wonders whence it came,
Pale to her trembling genius point a Graham!
Tell her, 'tis his to feel his country's fire,
Hold her paſt fame in view to urge it higher:
Tell her, rewaking glory waits his call,
To pour atonement o'er the pride of Gaul;
Reclaim aſſerted ocean's queſtion'd ſway,
And teach the doubtful nations to obey.
Say, pitying Heav'n, that ſav'ſt a blund'ring ſtate,
Whom haſt thou late inſpir'd to lend us weight?
Blow, ye broad winds, expand his op'ning light,
Tell us, whence roſe he? Do his country right;
Born on thy bleaks, Albania! nurſe of kings!
From gen'rous ſtock this gen'rous ſcion ſprings.
Son of thy ſoul, Montroſe! There, known, too well!
Prop of a crown when three loſt kingdoms fell!
Far be the omen from thy filial fire,
In every wreathe but death's tranſcend thy ſire,
Far from thy great foreſather's ſuff'rings rais'd,
For more than all his virtues lov'd and prais'd;
Down through time's tide tranſmit his length'ning fame:
O born above his fate to lift his name.
Oh, Mallet this was he—ſweet heav'n-fac'd boy!
Thy friend congratulates thy conſcious joy:
Pride of thy care, thou led'ſt his earlieſt youth,
To court plain glory, white as roheleſs truth;
To ſcorn dark liſts, which men diſtinction call,
And climb, ſelf-ſinew'd—or not riſe at all.
Courage by nature his—thou taught'ſt him taſte,
And innate warmth with poliſh'd brightneſs grac'd.
Breath'd o'er his liſt'ning heart reflection's breeze,
Gave him deſire to know, with pow'r to pleaſe:
Thine, half the triumphs of his riſing fame!
And Britain's future flag ſhall bleſs thy name.

IN A BLANK LEAF OF A BOOK

SENT TO MIRANDA.

Go, happy book,——
Who, void of life, art from life's cares ſo free,
Thou canſt before my lovely charmer lie,
Unſcorch'd by all the lightnings of her eye.
'Midſt her inſpiring touch thou canſt remain,
Taſteleſs of pleaſure, and ſecure from pain:
While abſent beauty breaks thy author's reſt,
And hope and fear by turns diſtract his breaſt.
My angel miſtreſs muſt henceforth be thine,
And I devote thy offerings to her ſhrine:
On varied themes divert her wand'ring eye,
As o'er thy honour'd leaves her glances fly:
But when her thoughts on ſofter ſubjects rove,
And lead her where thy pages talk of love;
Oh, then, ſo mindful of thy author be,
To bid her in a whiſper think on me.

THE PROGRESS OF WIT;

A CAVEAT.

Tuneful Alexis, on the Thames' fair ſide,
The ladies play-thing and the muſes pride;
With merit popular, with wit polite,
Eaſy though vain; and elegant though light:
Deſiring, and deſerving others praiſe,
Poorly accepts a fame he ne'er repays;
Unborn to cheriſh, ſneakingly approves,
And wants the ſoul to ſpread the worth he loves.
This to the juniors of his tribe gave pain,
For mean minds praiſe but to be prais'd again;
Henceforth renouncing an ungracious Baal,
His altars ſmoke not, and their off'rings fail:
The heat his ſcorn had rais'd, his pride inflam'd;
Till what they worſhip'd firſt they next defam'd;
Depos'd at length, from Pindus' top he roll'd,
While infect wirlings pleas'd, his fall behold,
And each cold-croaking Heliconian frog
Leaps ſcornful, and beſtrides th' unreigning log.
Far-fall'n Alexis, who ſo ill aſpir'd,
Sick of ſucceſsleſs war, from wounds retir'd,
Where, while in ſleep, his ſorrows ebb'd away,
And huſh'd in darkneſs, indignation lay;
Fancy, fair miſtreſs of the poet's mind,
For ever changing, yet for ever kind;
Soft o'er his dreams her formful radiance ſhed,
And his rapt ſoul through heav'n's thin purlieus led;
Seated beſide the ſtar-invading dame, [flame.
Whoſe ſteeds, wind-footed, paw'd the lambent
High as a widow'd lover's grief can climb,
Her air-built chariot roſe, and hung ſublime.
Unveiling, thence, the world's bleak waſtes below,
They ſaw the ſtream of life beneath 'em flow;
Dim from the ſable ſea of birth it roſe,
In a ſlow, ſilent, ſullen, dread repoſe:
For, round th' emerging ſource that glimmer'd pale,
Mountains of midnight darkneſs roll'd a veil:
But, as the evolving ſurge ſwell'd into day,
Quick'ning it mov'd, and roar'd, and ruſh'd away.
Broad on the left from low oblivion's ſhore,
Quickſands and rocks reach'd half the current o'er:
Lucid, like truth, the treach'rous water ſhone,
And o'er gay gilded ſhoals ran tuneful on;
Pebbles of gem-like hue, with painted pride,
Glow'd through the wave, and burnt amid the tide;
Wantonly kind, the ſun's enliv'ning beams
Shower'd in light ſpangles on the dancing ſtreams,
While infect nations, gnats, and waſps, and flies,
Ting'd in the rainbow's ever-changing dyes,
Sheathing their ſtings, and ſmiling like the fair,
Peopled the funſhine, and adorn'd the air.
Leſs lively, on the right the ſtreams deep flow,
There no falſe colours mix'd their varied glow;
No gawdy bottom catch'd the downcaſt eye:
Above no flutt'ring infect wing'd the ſky:
Serenely ſolemn all—One equal whole
Flaſh'd not upon the ſenſe, but touch'd the ſoul:
Inſtead of rocks green iſlands flouriſh'd here,
Silent and fruitful as the full-grown year;
In place of flies, grave ſwans of ſnow-like hue,
Sweetly majeſtic in ſlow circles flew:
But though theſe iſles the diſtant proſpect cheer'd,
No bay, no port, no landing-place appear'd;
Kind birds alone gave entrance o'er the mound,
Nor from the ſtream below was inlet found.
Then fancy thus—Fame's future regions theſe,
Where nothing ſurfeits, yet where all things pleaſe;
Here memory ſtands fix'd while time runs on,
And worth blooms freſh when life itſelf is gone;
Danger keeps diſtance, ſoften'd ſpleen grows kind,
Ambition temperate, and love refin'd:
Nor pride nor jealouſy can here annoy,
Nothing is eceſtaſy, though all is joy:
Peace without languor, labour void of pain,
Glory unenvied, and unſlander'd gain.
Though diff'ring thus the ſtreams unſocial ſides,
Yet one broad gulf abſorb'd the double tides;
From birth devolving, death's blind ſea below,
Boundleſs, and formleſs, ſnatch'd the mingled flow;
Both rounding oceans backward ſeem'd to tend,
And vaſt beneath their ſable ſurges blend:
But far more frightful this!—whoſe dark profound,
A depth eternal! life wants line to ſound:
Unbottom'd ſhade roll'd looſe, o'er ſwallowed light—
Fancy grew giddy, nor ſuſtain'd the ſight:
But ſtarting into fear, tranſpos'd remark,
And ſought the ſource leſs dreadful, though as dark.
Thick on the riſing ſtream's emitted tide,
Millions of ſhapeleſs bodies ſeem'd to glide;
Whoſe breathing bulks to life and motion blown,
Shot into human forms completely grown;
Mix'd rank and ſex ſprung through the liquid jet,
But pouring outward, clear diſtinction met;
Some wading naked, trode the ſlipp'ry plain,
Some cut the fluent wave—ſome tir'd with pain,
Failing to float, or wade, neglected fell,
And ſunk unſnatch'd at in the troubled ſwell:
To others, riſing happier and ſerene,
Fortune, dark buſtling pow'r, obſcurely ſeen,
Reach'd with blind bounty, and with haſty hand,
Thin boats—and buoy'd 'em o'er the ſhining ſand:
Of diff'rent form theſe boats---a ſingle oar
Diſtinguiſh'd ſome---ſome wing'd their ſides with more:
Others, with oars and ſails conjoin'd, made way,
And mow'd the murm'ring ſurge with ſweepy ſway:
While ſome ſlow pole-men, o'er their toil reclin'd,
Puſh'd their check'd barks, and lab'ring, lagg'd behind.
While ſome eſſay'd to croſs, and veering wide,
Would with ſtrong ſtem the ſtubborn ſtream divide,
And ſlowly ſlanting, fought the ſilent ſide;
Swift to the ſhelvy ſhore light gallies flew,
As the fierce channel's rapid current drew,
'Twixt rocks, and whirlpools, driv'n obliquely gay,
And through the ſhoaly ſunſhine danc'd away.
Caught by a gulfy void that gloom'd below,
Theſe from the current's fair deſcending flow,
In-drawn at once by darkneſs ſwallow'd o'er,
Sunk from their ſunny ſcene and roſe no more:

Still gap'd th' unclosing deep, o'er millions gone,
Yet still insatiate, hourly swallow'd on!
Titles, distinctions, forms, rush mingled down,
Not levity itself wants weight to drown;
Gamesters, beaux, casuists, jinglers, jesters, drinkers,
Fox-hunters, politicians, and free-thinkers,
Prudes, devotees, coquets, grave, light, young, old,
In one mix'd night, the covering waves infold:
Swept from the noise they fought, to rest they
shun'd,
They plunge for ever into death's profound;
While abler pilots, who resolv'd, stood o'er,
And edging broad, gain'd slow the safer shore:
Snatch'd from their sinking seats, were borne to land,
By watchful swans, whose wings the surface fann'd:
There, on green islands reign'd, escap'd from cares,
Lords of a blooming world, for ever theirs.
Wide o'er the scene, Alexis winds his eye,
Swift as the progress of the gliders by;
A strange confusion rose---of all who past,
With earnest emptiness and barren haste,
Few cross the flood, repugnant strove to steer,
Fewer had strength of oars to hold them near!
Tir'd by the current's ill-resisted force,
Or bulg'd by envious prows which cross'd their course,
The boldest keels, pursuing, or pursu'd,
Entangling and perplex'd, were lost in feud:
While others, heedless of their sleeping oars,
Drove in light negligence, nor shun'd the shores;
But pendant o'er the helm each shoal explor'd,
And snatch'd in transport, shells and stones on board:
Or leaping wanton, catch'd the glittering prey,
That buzz'd and gambol'd in their sportive way.
Mean while, most mournful of the motley scene,
Cherish'd effect of pride, and food of spleen!
Boat over boat destructive passage made,
And weeping pity mourn'd defective aid:
Sailing presumers, pressing proudly on,
Bore down each envied rower who nearest shone,
The oar-wing'd vessel eye'd, with dumb disdain,
The creeping pole-man's slow-availing pain,
And lordly wanton, with invasive beak,
Sunk the faint struggler, criminally weak!
He too, in concert with superior hate,
Loth to exert less guilt than match'd his state,
Triumphant, in his turn, fought equal prey,
And, o'er the naked wader sore'd his way.
Alexis pondering in suspended thought,
What meaning all these mazy mixtures taught,
Sudden a shout, from every distant side,
Eddied the air, and broke the back'ning tide;
Acclamatory thousands rose alarm'd,
All eyes attracted, and each hearing charm'd;
Pointing in transport, all their helms forsook,
And on one object hung their length'ning look.
Down from the gloomy source in side-long float,
Proudly descending, mov'd a glitt'ring boat:
Her silken sails a colour'd radiance threw,
And ting'd the sunny beams through which they flew;
While oars of silver dash'd the wat'ry spray,
That rain'd in gemmy show'rs, and dazzled day:
High on the painted stern a youth appear'd,
Who rather happily than strongly steer'd;
Faint and unstriking was his anguish'd mien,
Sadden'd by sickness, and o'ercast with spleen;
Yet, from his eyes, there beam'd a living light,
Keen and intent as a fir'd eagle's sight:
And from his voice, (for as he sail'd he sung)
Such magic sounds of melting music sprung,
That the hush'd heav'n all downward seem'd to bend,
And, against nature, the charm'd earth ascend.
Careless he look'd, yet heedful of his way,
Broke the kind current's unobstructing sway,
That kiss'd his oars, and hasten'd to obey:
Scarce was his course oblique, for each glad boat,
That envious stem'd all other's rival float,
Fix'd and enchanted, when this youth drew nigh,
Hung on his passing notes, and help'd him by:
The muses row'd him, and the graces care
Trimm'd his light sails, and spread them to the air;
In his boat's bottom, green-ey'd envy lay,
And serv'd as ballast, while she clogg'd his way;
Down from her chariot, light-wing'd fancy flew,
And o'er him, loose, her starry mantle threw;
Pleasure, praise, beauty, 'twixt his shrouds trod
gay,
And danc'd the measur'd moments soft away;
Sportful as zephyrs, in his smiles they strove,
And the young loves forsook their mother's grove.
Thus fortunate, thus favour'd, and thus bright,
Luckily negligent, and aptly light;
He touch'd no shoal, safe rounded every rock,
Despis'd all danger, and sustain'd no shock;
Till to that calmer coast approaching nigh,
And gliding 'twixt green islands safely high,
Circles of hov'ring swans with joyful note,
Clapp'd their broad wings in triumph o'er his boat,
Charm'd, that so soon, he reach'd their solemn side,
Ere yet one third of the stream's length was try'd.
Steering from isle to isle, with joyless awe,
Thin o'er each height, their white rob'd lords he saw,
Pleas'd, without transport, how the palms they bore,
To hail his passage near their silent shore:
Cold and uncharm'd, he sought his fav'rite crowd,
Immensely distant now, though late so loud:
All was serene, the air was hush'd around,
The waters calm!—Lost ev'n his music's sound!
Back to the life, impatient looks he cast,
And long'd for ev'ry shining insect past;
Distant he saw them, wings o'er wings display,
And in light chases thread the colour'd ray:
Eager for these, contending pilots strove,
And catch'd them, careless how their vessels drove;
Then with their trophies dress'd each gaudy sail,
While humming drones, in swarms, their fortune
hail;
Record past leaps, foretel their next essays,
And buz, melodious, in the fly-men's praise.
Warm'd and misled, by this false fire of fame,
His beaming eyes with emulation flame;
And have I, recreant, thus renounc'd a field,
Where baffled danger can such glory yield?
Lives there a catch-fly of yon vent'rous press,
More brave than I am? or, who fears them less?

Show me the warring wasp, whose threat'ning wing
I dare not strike at, and provoke his sting!
Swans give me way! your shoreless islands keep,
Too safe your clime is, and too calm your deep;
I choose a rapid glory, not a flow,
Shoals are fought harbours, where these jewels grow.
He said, and rising, push'd with liquid sweep
Th' inverted helm, and goar'd the groaning deep:
Flaming erect, re-sought the surgy side,
And bounded, threat'ning, o'er the foaming tide;
Sailing athwart the swarms, and skipping high,
He snatch'd, triumphant, every tempting fly:
Gave his loose rudder to the current's claim,
And drove, disdainful, through his rival's game;
Press'd by invaded wasps excited stings,
He warr'd, revengeful, on the falling wings:
Through dust of slaughter'd gnats, he fought in shade, [made;
And squeez'd them, deathful, on the wounds they
Fleets of cold opposites from all sides join,
And wedg'd against this general foe combine;
Vainly indignant they resist his sway,
Yet block his passage and obstruct his way:
Still though he stagnates he the fight maintains,
While drones, applausive, with their ductile strains,
Homage the rising hero's new renown.
And prince of fly-catchers the champion crown.
The swans, mean while, which from the calmer side,
Forsaken, saw him trust the fatal tide;
Mournful, with pendent wing, his triumph griev'd,
And wish'd his wasted vigour less deceiv'd:
Trembling they mark'd his vessel downward bent,
Hang o'er th' engulfing oceans's dark descent,
While he, regardless still, new trophies won,
And bent to conquer, saw not what to shun.
Fancy still busied, still enamour'd, staid,
And still concurring, lent his rashness aid;
To her far distant, touch'd Alexis cry'd,
And with strain'd voice, to reach her notice try'd:
" O! save him, warn him, bid him turn and think,
" Let not his bark in yon black ocean sink!
" Teach me to call him by his pow'rful name,
" Point out his danger, quench his devious flame;
" Rash spleen of heart, that could such war advise!
" Blind rage! to lose himself and catch but flies!
" Oh teach my tongue his name:"—Then fancy heard,
And smiling, at her chariot's side appear'd:
" Why dost thou ask, she cry'd, what nations know,
" Even all whom wit or worth inspire below?
" His is a name that dwells on ev'ry mind,
" Tunes every tongue, and fails with every wind!
" Not surer is that river life's extent,
" Or by those oceans birth, and death,
" Not surer fortune, is that dark pow'r's name,
" That left oblivion, and that right side fame.
" Than that, no son of wit dares justly hope,
" Fame dwell in folly's paths, but thou, O Pope!
Alexis starting, heard his own lov'd name,
Felt his pride shrink, and blush'd with conscious shame!
Pitch'd from the chariot, lost to fancy's call,
And had not waiting judgment broke the fall,
Contempt's cold vale had caught him wak'd and stunn'd,
And deep intomb'd him in his own profound.

THE ART OF ACTING.

DEDICATED TO THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD.

Why sleep the silent pow'rs that guard the stage,
While yawning opiates lull the tasteless age?
Shall trite cold themes catch fire from wit's essays,
Yet, hov'ring chillness damp theatric blaze?
Mourn it, ye sons of spleen, whose hands (mistaught)
Tore up this seed of sense, this plant of thought:
Whence reasoning shoots might bloom life's garden o'er,
And weedy wildness choke her walks no more.—
Horror (at alien woes) by genius mov'd,
To sense of home-felt bliss, be there improv'd:
Wits ent'ring hand dissect sedition's breast,
Show the malignant springs and call forth rest.
There the touch'd heart, in secret silence chid,
Might learn to hate the guilt it once but hid:
There, scorn from note of pity's praise—catch grace,
Start and pause conscious—in pride's slack'ning race.
There heedless beauty, warn'd of man's false fire,
Might chain down wav'ring love, and edge desire:
Each maid's mild eye correct her heart's warm truth,
Dull pens grow pensive, and false thinkers just.
There (now) fits mummery, thron'd on passion's urn!
There noisier fires than wit's (unbright'ning) burn:
There vice with laughter shares divided rule,
And only serious purpose marks the fool!
Vain the lost pray'r that courts a muse's aid,
By foes untasted, and by friends betray'd:
Patrons immers'd 'twixt faction's rapid tides!
Poets in flattery's, pow'r absorb'd in pride's!
Gone is the learned leisure once rever'd,
And the still voice of genius sighs unheard.
Happier Ierne! mourn our drains no more;
Richly reverg'd, thou drain'st a nobler store.
Poor in our turn, see wit's lost channel dry,
Robb'd of her fountain—for thy full supply.
Yet, while home ruin wrings the heart distrest,
'Tis recompence to fall for others blest:
Less thy doom'd distance (soul of absent joys)
Pains the shook realm, whose hope it half destroys;
Conscious thou go'st to warm one sister's fears
To transports, lasting as the others tears.
Long in sad silence on the willows hung,
Now she resumes her harp, for praise new strung:
Tires her tun'd hand to pour her grateful soul,
Wide as her chief can charm, from pole to pole.
Genius, from ages hers, 'midst want and wrongs,
How will she now transcend past poets songs!
At once of every nations grace made free,
By every added muse, bestow'd with thee!
There, 'midst the toils of empire's manag'd weight,
Law's lights extended, and embellish'd state;

Find a calm hour to lend the ſtage thy care,
And times unborn ſhall feel a Stanhope there.
Dark'ning mean while, our muſe s lamps expire,
Blank is their proſpect, and unfann'd their fire:
Friendleſs, neglected, laugh'd at, and unfelt,
No now-crown'd conq'ror cares where Homer dwelt.
Baniſh'd from court, from ſenate, city, ſcene,
Wit's ſons, all tongue-tied! mute, even Harlequin!
Yet, let the thinker ſcorn ſuch dumb ſuſpenſe,
Nor (flattering cuſtom) ſneak his aid from ſenſe:
Wing'd for the future o'er the preſent riſe,
Spurn the times cloud, and ſtrike benigner ſkies.
Not always ſhall ambition's muddied brain
Work to perſuade—yet hold example vain!
Bribe to each further'd intereſt's venal cue,
Yet dream diverſion all the ſtage's view.
The time ſhall come (indulge it ſoon ſlow fate!)
When power ſhall taſte that wit can think with weight:
The time ſhall come (not far the deſtin'd day)
When ſoul-touch'd actors ſhall do more than play:
When paſſion, flaming from the aſſerted ſtage,
Shall to taught greatneſs fire a feeling age:
Tides of ſtrong ſentiment ſublimely roll,
Deep'ning the dry diſgraces of the ſoul:
Pity, fear, ſorrow, waſh'd from folly's foam,
Knock at man's breaſt, and find his heart at home.
Then plaintful grief ſhall drop her whiney drawl,
And heart-felt anger nerve the inſenſate bawl;
Then ſhall the moving art old powers poſſeſs;
Wake valour, call forth joys, and ſtamp diſtreſs.
Then ſhall the player take pains in pleaſure's right,
Sweat for his praiſe, and labour to delight:
Then ſhall he thank the hand (in death long cold)
That fir'd his languor, and his fame foretold.
Taſteful ev'n now, there want not ſome choice few
Whoſe hope-warm'd hearts can hail the diſtant view:
Hearts that the ſubject's lov'd importance know,
And feel the fire they bear with conſcious glow.
Why was the actor ſtain'd by law's decree?
Loſt time's recov'rer! truth's awak'ner he!
Paſſion's refiner! life's ſhoal coaſt ſurvey'd—
The wiſe man's pleaſer, and the good man's aid.
Precept and practice in one teacher join'd,
Bodied reſemblance of the copied mind!
Nature confirms, art dignifies his claim,
And only cant's low crawl deſiles his name.
If but by comprehenſion we poſſeſs,
And every greater circles hold the leſs,
No rank's high claim can make the player's ſmall,
Since, acting each, he comprehends them all.
Off to due diſtance half ye ſtalking train!
Blots of a title your low taſtes profane!
No dull cold mouther ſhares the actor's plea,
Rightly to ſeem is tranſiently to be.
How ſhall this goal be reach'd, that, ſeen moſt nigh,
Still glides more diſtant from th' advancing eye?
Like the ſky's ſea-dipt arch, heaven's fancied bound,
For ever fail'd to, and yet never found.
How ſhall trac'd practice hit th' untrodden way,
Where life is travell'd out, in arts to ſtray?
Arduous the taſk, and aſks a climbing brain,
A head for judgment, and a heart for pain,
E'er ſenſe, impreſs'd, reflects adopted forms,
And changeful nature ſhakes with borrow'd ſtorms;
E'er ductile genius turns as paſſions wind,
And bends to fancy's curve the pliant mind.
Mark when th' expanding ſeed from earth's moiſt bed,
Starting at nature's call, prepares to ſpread; [cend
Firſt, the prone root breaks downward, thence aſ-
Shot ſtems, whoſe joints collateral boughs extend:
Twigs from thoſe boughs lend leaves—each leaf contains
Side-leſs'ning ſtalks, tranſvers'd by fibry veins.
So, from injected thought, ſhoots paſſion's growth;
No ſprout ſpontaneous, no chance child of ſloth:
Idea lends it root—firm on touch'd minds,
Fancy (ſwift planter!) firſt th' impreſſion binds;
Shap'd in conception's mould, nature's prompt ſkill
Bids ſubject nerves obey th' inſpiring will:
Strung to obſequious bend the muſe'ly frame
Stamps the ſhown image Pleaſure, pity, ſhame,
Anger, grief, terror, catch the adaptive ſpring,
While the eye darts it, and the accents ring.
See art's ſhort path!—'tis eaſy to be found,
Winding delightful through the mazy round!
Tempt the try'd ſkill, to no ſole proof confin'd;
Shift the ſhort ſhadowings o'er your figur'd mind.
Mournful, recal ſome friend's lamented fate;
Sad on each feature hangs the mind's felt weight.
Seek you ſtrong ſenſe of joy? looks firſt impart,
Then the nerve ſtricture bounds it from the heart:
Does rage inflame? no viſage can conceal
What the mark'd muſcle bids the ſpirit feel:
Still as the nerves conſtrain the looks obey,
And what the look enjoins the nerves diſplay:
Mutual their aid, reciprocal their ſtrain,
Will but commanding, face and nerves explain.
Light'ning and thunder, ſo concurring, ſtrike;
One their joint origin, though form'd unlike:
So to the look th' attentive nerves reply,
As from the flaſh ſucceeding thunders fly.
'Tis cauſe and conſequence; nor flows more grace
From beauty's ſmile than the touch'd actor's face:
Poiſe the rule's practice; turn it o'er and o'er;
Nor think it tedious, though conceiv'd before:
'Tis but to look and will. Th' imprinted eye
Moves the ſtruck muſcles, and the limbs comply:
Geſture is meaning's ape—grave, furious, gay,
Changeful as cloud-form'd ſhapes when winds make way;
Imag'd conception firſt, but face inflames,
Then the mein paints it, and the tone proclaims.
Is there who doubts an art thus briefly ſhown?
Call out proof's pow'r, and make that art his own:
Bid him, with mournful brow, ſwell ſounds of joy,
Half the mock'd ſenſe th' unbracing nerves deſtroy:
Tun'd to the tearful ey's retentive woe,
Rapture's check'd phraſe ſhall quench its fiery glow:
Painfully plaintful, each flat note ſhall die,
And his look's anguiſh give his words the lie.
Next while ſoft ſmiles reſtrain his voic'd eſſay,
Bid angry ſounds give rage its thund'ring way;

Vainly mouth'd menace ſwells th' attempted ſtorm,
Kind as conſent th' unfright'ning accents form:
While his look frown'd not, ſenſe could ſound but ſweet;
No nerve concurring help'd th' unſinew'd heat.
But had his eyes th' impatient fire diſplay'd,
Each note had ſnatch'd it, and each ſtop convey'd:
Thus one plain practice paints whole nature right,
And all her changeful pictures move delight.
Is there who loves not joy?—There then begin,
Search the ſoul-pleaſing paſſion's pow'r within;
Find your ſmile's force before ſome faithful glaſs,
Heedful to let no faint impreſſion paſs: [train,
There to touch'd gladneſs thought-form'd features
'Till each criſp'd fibre feels th' enrapt'ring ſtrain;
Then (ſtretch'd) behold your op'ning forehead
Back'ning in boaſtful ſenſe of ſparkling eyes. [riſe,
Broadly majeſtical your breaſt expands,
Brac'd your preſs'd joints—neck, knee, feet, ſhoulders, hands,
Treading on air, each ſtep new ſoul diſplays,
Your limbs all lighten, and your looks all blaze:
Then ſpeak,—joy anſwers; every ſound its own;
Muſic and rapture mix'd in tranſport's tone!
Fall from this height (ah! 'tis but fortune's road!)
Down to deep ſenſe of ſorrow's pungent goad;
Damp your looſe feature's into thought's diſtreſs,
Fade fancy's gloſs to dim-ey'd wretchedneſs:
The ſad look ſick'ning, ſtraight the ſpirits break,
Unbending nerves grief's lax impreſſion take:
Faint hangs the clouded eye, ſhort ſteps drag ſlow,
And every heedleſs geſture bends with woe:
Now to the heart-touch'd ſenſe the voice complains,
And ſighing pityers catch th' infectious pains.
Say, ſhould ſome ſlack'ner of the paſſion's care,
Form'd for gay flights, and ſtruggling from deſpair,
Bow'd from his native bent to doubt's new part,
Find fear's cold caſt aſſign'd a fearleſs heart?
What could he do? where houſe th' intruſive gueſt?
Let his eye lodge him—'twill prepare his breaſt.
From the ſoul's optic ſhoots th' admitted ſhape,
Nor let one tim'rous wavering ſtate eſcape.
Fear is eluſive ſorrow, ſhunning pain;
Active, yet ſtopp'd, it dims the doubtful brain;
Spirit ſnatch'd inward, ſtagnating by dread, [lead:
Slow through the limbs crawls cold the living
Form'd to the look that moulds th' aſſumer's face,
His joints catch tremblings, life's moiſt ſtrings unbrace;
This road and that th' alarmful paſſion tries,
Halts in the motion, flutters in the eyes;
Checks the clipt accent's heſitative way,
And on th' evaſive muſcles hangs delay.
Anger is pride provok'd (ſo felt, ſo known),
Strange! its ſtage influence is ſo faintly ſhown!
Yet, with what abſent ſenſe of all its flame
See we rage meek, fire cold, and fury tame!
Bid the face redd'ning warm'd idea take,
Straight the ſoul's wildfires all obſtruction break:
Stung by inflicted thought's imagin'd pain,
Hard heave the muſcles, rolling eye-balls ſtrain:
Twixt the cloſ'd teeth, indignantly ſuppreſt,
Or ſtorm-like loud out pours th' unguarded breaſt:
Slack'ning exclaiming, ſwift, ſlow reſtleſs change,
Wings the voic'd tempeſt in its whirlwind range;
Quick turns and ſtartings face and air deform,
And thick ſhort breathings paint the inſelt ſtorm.
Nor ſea, nor life, eternal tempeſt ſweeps,
Huſh'd calms ſucceed it, and the thunder ſleeps:
Such the ſoft ſilent tide, that floods the mind,
To mov'd compaſſion's pain-touch'd warmth inclin'd:
Aidful idea ſprings to pitied woe,
Thence every quiv'ring ſinew learns to glow:
Back from the panting boſom to the eye,
Kind ſigh-wing'd dews in ſoft ſenſation fly:
So from earth's op'ning breaſts, in flow'r-dreſs'd May,
Steams the ſipt fragrance to the ſun's felt ray;
Lightly ſuſtain'd, to morn's faint claſp it clings,
Yet oft (let go) falls back, oft upward ſprings:
So learn to ſteal ſoft pity's copied grace; [face;
Languor's moiſt cloud marks firſt the mournful
Then hope's kind tenſion warms the muſcly mein,
Dragg'd diff'rent ways contending contraſts lean;
Claſh'd looks 'gainſt movements paint internal fight,
'Twixt the heart's anguiſh and the help's delight:
Then touch'd attention's hark'ning huſh creeps round,
And breathleſs mouths devour th' expected ſound.
Nature loſes change—Cold night ſucceeds to morn,
And pity's dark'ning oppoſite is ſcorn: [face;
Far be this brow-ſtretch'd arrogance of air
From miſery's doomful claim, in ſons of care.
Ah! minds (too apt) turn but the look within,
We find pride's image there as ſure as ſin!
Yet with ſuch bias rolls man's will from right,
That ſearch firſt miſſes what is moſt in ſight:
Elſe how unneedful to deſcribe a rage
No player wants power to feel—but on the ſtage.
Cautious (life's ſpeaking picture) wear that ſtain,
Rightly to ſhow be thine, but not retain!
Scorn is calm careleſs anger flagg'd of wing,
Bruſh'd ſenſe of harmleſs wrong, too weak to ſting:
Safe in ſuſpended power, eas'd warmth diſclaims
Exertion, and with ſlack remiſſneſs flames:
Now ſmiles, now frowns, yet both with eye ſerene,
While half-ſtrung nerves play ſprings of painleſs ſpleen.
Cloſe-following ſcorn, amazement ought to riſe;
Angels feel wonder, men ſhould dare deſpiſe!
Born to miſtakes, and erring out life's ſpan,
Man, as if heaven were his, looks down on man.
Say then what wonder is—trace its taught cauſe,
Mark its true features, and make known its laws.
Wonder is curious doubt—will's check'd retreat,
Shrinking from danger it prepares to meet;
'Tis fear's half-brother, of reſembling face,
But fix'd, unwavering, and bound down to place:
Earneſt, alarmful gaze, intently keen,
Notes the weigh'd object, yet diſtruſts it ſeen;
As in pale churchyards, gleam'd by ſilent night,
Should ſome croſs'd ſpectre ſhade the moon's dim light,

Shudd'ry, the back'ning blood, revolving swift,
Clogs the press'd heart—stretch'd fibres fail to lift:
Lost in doubt's hard'ning frost, stopt motion lies,
While sense climbs gradual to the straining eyes.
Hatred is sullen fury long retain'd;
'Tis willing mischief warily restrain'd;
'Tis thought's corrosion acridly perplex'd;
'Tis self in pain, lest others live unvex'd.
This to touch vivid—(pencil! pleas'd and free, Paint the coil'd serpent thou abhorr'st to see.)
Veil the malignant leer that burns with spite,
Bid the brow's lour o'erhang the sick'ning sight;
Swell the blown cheek, th' unopening lip restrain;
Stretch'd the wide nostril marks th' impatient pain.
Ardent, yet heedless, half th' averted eye
Skims the loath'd object, and disdains it nigh.
Hard back-brac'd nerves in sett'ry fervour toil,
And the curv'd system heaves in check'd recoil.
Hast from taught pain---shun hatred's baneful shade,
And to love's sunshine lend the muse's aid.
Love is intense desire, by rev'rence check'd;
'Tis hope's hot transport, streak'd with fear's respect;
'Tis passion's every soul-felt power disjoin'd;
'Tis all th' assembled train's whole force combin'd.
'Tis like soft air, through which admitted light
Peoples pleas'd fancy, and lends shape to sight:
Yet, like that air disturb'd, man's quiet breaks,
Tempests his reason, and his triumph shakes.
You who infuse this pow'r must first have felt;
No heart, unmov'd itself, bids others melt:
Yet, would chalk'd outline sketch th' imagin'd grace?
Dumb earnest gaze tongues o'er th' unvocal face:
Soft'ning in apprehension's awe-check'd air,
Each limb beseeches, each slow step's a prayer:
While high-brac'd raptures imag'd pride confess,
Meekness sits guardian o'er the mild address:
Doubt dissipating hope, to blanch desire,
Hangs the mind's curb upon the body's fire.
Snatch'd from the scene, claim this the box's care;
It paints and warns for every beauty there:
But there love's shafts (of late) all pointless lie,
Blunt from bold mein, and dead'ning in the eye:
Naked of heart, and hateful of delay,
Erring time-short'ner! meeting wish half way!
Woman, outstradling art's old lureful skill,
Mann'd o'er with invitation, drives back will;
Falls her past price, owns patient hope buys dear,
Hawks for quick market, and hawls chapmen near;
Talks loud, struts, elbows, calls a grace a fool;
Dress'd like a scarecrow, manner'd like a mule:
Pall'd, the press'd cheap'ner dreads th' out-blustring air,
Eyes the braw'd swaggerer, and rejects her ware.
Turn, coarse conceiver! all unsex'd by mode,
Maid that trot'st uglying in the monster's road!
Proud, yet immodest! light, rude, witless, pert,
Bold, jostling, hoid'ning, blushness, pow'rless flirt!
Emptier than air thy coloury gewgaws play,
While every hour's new forms push o'd away:
Trifler! for cards and contradictions born!
Panting for conquest, yet compelling scorn!
Lab'ring from nature to grow loath'd by art,
And for man's manners forfeiting his heart! [just;
But hold—contempt wrong plac'd becomes unPerhaps stage whiners gave love's friends disgust:
For (goblin-like) there lovers walk unshown,
Talk'd of in every play, yet seen in none:
Lost in unfeeling cold affected drawl,
They touch no tenderness, attempting all.
Lump'd lazy lifeless indolence one cause,
And one th' admiring fool's misjudg'd applause.
Why should pain sweat for praise, proud ease can win,
By the rais'd footstep and exalted chin?
By the heav'd halt, that swings its load along,
Clumsily solemn, and serenely wrong?
By the big, broad, round, mellow, trounding troll,
That means no passion, and conveys no soul:
Half swells, then sinks, like sails of ships becalm'd,
A dry dead sweat, man's mummied voice embalm'd.
Shame on the whineling, sleep-inductive tone!
Not by such glow-worm glimse love's fires are shown:
Heart, voice, mein, visage, all pay love their aid,
Cupid exacts more strict alliance made; [he
'Twixt the mind's states than once 'twixt Europe's,
Who bound all princes, yet left none unfree.
Not such loose treaties please th' all-buckling god,
Punctual he yokes tun'd sounds to meaning's nod:
Pardons no void vain voluble harangue,
And hates to hear the unaiming bowstring twang.
Say, female shades of love, who haunt the stage,
What fiend, close-treading, rags desire with rage?
If in your hospitable bosoms bred,
Th' unresting fury thrives, by beauty fed,
Tell the dire name.—But if you silent feel
Th' impressive tooth, and no gnaw'd thought reveal, [bite,
Speak, tell-tale muse. Thou shar'st th' envenom'd
For jealousy ne'er sleeps when poets write.
The Janus jealousy two faces wears,
Each diff'ring, apt as form'd by diff'rent cares;
While infant-wing'd the callow harpy lies,
Too dim for daylight, too unfledg'd to rise:
'Tis doubt-mix'd anger, struggling to confide,
Floating half-sunk on pity's pleading tide:
Here hope-fed softness soothes the affiant heart,
There rage vindictive bids the spirit smart:
'Twixt the two wav'ring scales, by turns depress,
The eye's short wand'rings mark the mind distress;
Languidly strung, slow-nerv'd, half-sinewy strain,
Paints an unsettled, half-determin'd pain:
Whence rous'd resentment, catching hasty flame,
Cool'd by met pity, blushes into shame:
But does weigh'd proof confirm th' ideal wrong,
Then the eye lightens, and the brace binds strong;
Not vengeance burns more turbulently stern,
Though (through it) pain'd affection sighs concern.
Thus has the muse, in passion's changeful dress,
Led enr'ring art through nature's dark recess;
Fair to her eye one source of action shown,
Whence every branch'd meander flows her own:

Brief let precision's ſcale contract the view;
Then graſp it mem'ry, and remit the clue.
Previous to art's firſt act (till then all vain)
Print the ideal pathos on the brain;
Feel the thought's image on the eyeball roll;
Behind that window ſits th' attentive ſoul:
Wing'd at her beck th' obedient muſcles fly,
Bent or relaxing to the varied eye:
Preſs'd, moderate, lenient, voice's organ'd ſound
To each felt impulſe tones the tuneful round:
Form'd to the nerves, concurring mein partakes,
So the mov'd actor moves, and paſſion ſhakes.

THE DEDICATION OF THE BEECH-TREE,

Occaſioned by the late Diſcovery of making Oil from the Fruit of that Tree.

High in thy ſtarry orb,
Great ruling planet of our brighten'd ſphere,
The muſe invokes thee, and demands thy ear!
Her Harley's ear! O yet confeſs the name!
Thy titles borrow luſtre from thy fame.
Fearleſs to fall, my rein-loos'd fancy ſoars
High as thy deeds, nor common aid implores.
Let conſcious fawners blow their ſmoky fire,
And vainly bid th' unliſt'ning gods inſpire,
My muſe, diſdainful of their ſullied wings,
Views the vaſt height, and dauntleſs upward ſprings,
Inſpir'd like angels by the worth ſhe ſings.
Yet, Oh! miſtake not my aſpiring lays;
They would but ſpeak my duty, not your praiſe;
Praiſes like yours, who lives and does not know;
The pooreſt debtors count the ſums they owe;
But I, impatient of the growing ſcore,
Would pay you ſomething ere I owe you more.
Accept, great guider of the ſtormy ſtate,
An off'ring worthy of the brave and great:
Accept what heav'n, propitious for your ſake,
Smiles on this peace-bleſs'd land, and bids her take:
This art of old had been ſome altars due,
Now, fir'd with purer zeal, ſhe kneels to you.
That awful pow'r who guards our Anna's throne,
And to that Anna made your virtues known,
To place ſuch worth above all wiſh'd controul,
Bleſs'd the long labours of your peaceful ſoul.
But one thing wanted,—fam'd Minerva's tree,
The gift of peace from gods to men like thee;
That oleous plant, the pride of funnier climes,
Chief in the poets ſongs of ancient times;
Too long profan'd for thy chaſte brow to wear,
Fled the cool influence of the northern bear.
Heaven's voice was heard, deficient nature groan'd,
Felt his new will, and the correction own'd.
The humbleſt foreſt of our favour'd land
Grew proud beneath this bounty of his hand;
Confeſs'd the ſecret he vouchſaf'd to teach,
Diſdain'd the olive, and enthron'd the beech.
Hail, happy tree! wou'd after-ages know,
To whom their ſons thy oily harveſts owe,
Oxford's lov'd name, deep on thy boſom grave,
Who from his country did his country ſave;
Who gave our haraſs'd land its long-wiſh'd reſt,
And forc'd unwilling nations to be bleſt;
Whoſe known eſteem of arts gave birth to thee,
Omen of greater, which e'er long ſhall be.
Thy pious hand, which made war's thunder ceaſe,
Shall cultivate the nobler arts of peace;
Till murm'ring faction owns, with thankleſs joy,
'Tis far more great, to build than to deſtroy.
Nor ſhall thy riſing country's ſons alone,
Thy wiſer care of their loſt int'reſt own,
The boundleſs bleſſings of thy lib'ral hand,
Shall ſhed their influence on our fruitful land:
The long-mourn'd abſence of th' inſpiring plant,
Whoſe pow'rful juice ungrinds the edge of want,
Whoſe ſov'reign ſtrength makes glad the lab'rers toil,
Shall now no more reproach our injur'd ſoil;
Our teeming glebe, if I a right divine,
E'er long ſhall ſwell with floods of gen'rous wine,
France ſhall no more her courted vineyards boaſt;
But look with envy on our northern coaſt,
Which now enrich'd, with matchleſs oil and corn,
Unequal'd vintages ſhall ſoon adorn.
Nor this alone! on, on, prophetic fire!
Though boundleſs is the flight, diſdain to tire;
Unwearied all his glorious aims purſue,
'Till ſick'ning envy dies to ſhun the view,
Fir'd with the ſure preſage, methinks I ſee
The ſtruggling eaſt reſign her morian tree;
The roughеſt Dryads of our oaken iſle,
Charm'd with the gentle ſtranger, learn to ſmile;
The dancing boughs their breezy homage pay,
The oak nods welcome, and the beech gives way.
And now, glad ſpring, by riſing warmth renew'd,
The various inſect ſeeks its leafy food,
Spins out its little life's induſtrious thread,
In grateful toil, to find its feeder's bread.
Dies a rich recompenſe of female care,
And leaves its ſilken treaſures to the fair;
The fair, long mindful, whence th' advantage came,
Shall teach their ſons to ſpeak, by liſping Harley's name.
From views, like thine, with thy vaſt knowledge join'd,
What bleſſings may not happy Britain find?
Fierce emulation ſhall new pow'rs impart,
Till ev'ry wiſh grows poſſible to art;
Rivers ſhall roll, where now huge mountains grow,
And tides, new channel'd, wonder how they flow.
For thee, proud Thames his wealthy arms ſhall ſpread,
And take the ſwift Sabrina to his bed.
Enamour'd Trent ſhall love-ſick Avon meet,
And diſtant ſeas in mix'd alliance meet.
Dear, to thy care, ev'n th' unhoping Scot
Shall bleſs the union, and hold faſt the knot;
Britain no longer ſhall explore from far,
The coſtly magazines of naval war;
High on the mountains of her northern ſhore,
The gummy pine ſhall ſhed her pitchy ſtore;
Tall firs, which uſeleſs, have long ages grown,
Shall fright the ſeas, and viſit worlds unknown;
Till the check'd ſons of Norway's timber'd ſtate,
Learn love by force, while we diſarm their hate.
And here rejoice, ye Caledonian ſhores,
Whoſe empty ſtrands my friendly muſe deplores:

Shortly, ſtrong fleets ſhall plow your ſtormy ſeas,
And wealth's warm breath your icy ports unfreeze!
The Belgic ſpoiler ſhall no more purſue [you;
Thoſe finny ſhoals which court your guides and
Summon'd to greatneſs, worthy of your fame,
Nor ill-ſupported in the gen'rous aim,
Approaching time ſhall ſee you, juſtly brave,
Aſſert the right which God and nature gave.
Then ſhall that fire which now your boſom fills,
With virtues uſeleſs on your barren hills,
New-nerve the graſp of application's hand,
And rouſe the latent glories of your land.
Wide lies a tract beneath the ſunny line,
Where rays direct with burning luſtre ſhine;
Where ribs of ſilver bind the ſea-waſh'd plains,
And virgin wealth unmix'd with av'rice, reigns.
This the proud Spaniard never yet poſſeſs'd,
So much has heav'n the happy natives bleſs'd;
Reſerv'd for Britiſh rule, their iſthmus free,
Divides the northern from the ſouthern ſea.
Nor this, the hapleſs tract, the direful ſpot,
Dear to the brave, the unpermitted Scot.
North of that ſad, that ill-remember'd ſhore,
A happier work does happier hands implore.
Here ſhall the ſons of our advent'rous land,
Through unborn ages ſtretch decreed command;
Here ſhall they draw both oceans to their ſway,
And through repugnant mountains cut their way:
'Tis done! methinks I hear their cannons roar,
Hoſtile repiners ſhun the envied ſhore,
And round vaſt capes a tedious courſe purſue;
While we, and only we, poſſeſs the new.
Hence ſhall the ſhorten'd diſtance guard our health,
Secure our traffic and increaſe our wealth:
The weſtern bullion to our merchants ſold,
Shall ſend us weight for weight in eaſtern gold.
Nor then ſhall Aſia's aromatic ſtore
Pile the proud markets of a neighb'ring ſhore;
All ſhall be ours, and while we all maintain,
No bloody war ſhall the chaſte victory ſtain.
O blind profaners of obtruded bliſs!
Who wanting ſoul to fathom depth like this,
Inſtead of owning debts, you cannot pay,
Strike at the friendly hand which points the way.
Forgive, thou great inſpirer of my ſong,
If ending here, thy wider views I wrong;
If arts more wiſh'd, or worlds leſs known there were,
Thy ne plus ultra had not reſted there.

HOR. LIB. I. ODE V.

Quis multâ gracilis.

Coot within the grotto toying,
Soft on ſcatter'd roſes laid,
What young bud art thou deſtroying;
Why to-day thoſe charms diſplay'd?

Trimly plain in ſubtle ſweetneſs,
What fond heart is here beſet?
Why, with negligent completeneſs,
Looſely curls that treſſy net?

Soon by ſufferings taught to know thee,
O! ye changeful gods! he cries,
Too, too light, thy falſehoods ſhow thee,
Late the fond believer's wiſe:

Then with fooliſh wonder ſtarting,
He compares thy ſunſhine paſt,
With thoſe ſtorms of ſpleen's preparing,
Which thy preſent looks o'ercaſt!

Silly truſter! vain ſuppoſer!
In his am'rous empty mind,
Soft he forms thee joy's diſpoſer:
Ever grateful, huſh'd and kind.

But alas! and ſhame upon thee!
Little dreams he what a ſky,
Heaping clouds in whirlwinds on thee,
Soon ſhall dim thy future eye.

Pity, gods! thoſe faithful creatures,
Yet unbroke to woman's arts:
Fondly truſting lovely features,
And for ſmiles exchanging hearts.

As for me, by heaven befriended,
Long ago I 'ſcap'd the ſtorm:
Safe with all my ſails extended,
Flying from that fraudful form:

Broad my pictur'd ſtory flaming,
Now ſhall love's gay temple grace:
From ſome pillar's height proclaiming
Warnings, to the riſing race.

VERSES

ON THE DEATH OF MR. DENNIS.

Adieu! unſocial excellence! at laſt
Thy foes are vanquiſh'd, and thy fears are paſt:
Want, the grim recompence of truth like thine,
Shall now no longer dim thy deſtin'd ſhine.
Th' impatient envy, the diſdainful air!
The front malignant, and the captious ſtare!
The furious petulence, the jealous ſtart,
The miſt of frailties that obſcur'd thy heart,
Veil'd in thy grave ſhall unremember'd lie,
For theſe were parts of Dennis, born to die!
But, there's a nobler Seity behind,
His reaſon dies not—and has friends to find!
Though here, revenge and pride withheld his praiſe, [days:
No wrongs ſhall reach him through his future
The riſing ages ſhall redeem his name,
And nations read him into laſting fame!
In his defects untaught! his labour'd page,
Shall the ſlow gratitude of time engage.
Perhaps ſome ſtory of his pitied woe,
Mix'd in faint ſhades may with his memory go,
To touch futurity with gen'rous ſhame,
And backward caſt an unavailing blame,
On times too cold to taſte his ſtrength of art;
Yet warm contemners of too weak a heart!
Reſt in thy duſt, contented with thy lot,
Thy good remember'd, and thy bad forgot:
'Tis more than Cæſar and his world cou'd give!
Spread o'er his virtues his few errors live:
Till reaſoning brutes, whoſe ſpeck of ſoul wants room,
To lodge the juſt conception of his doom,

Dare with lewd licenſe noiſe his queſtion'd fame,
And blot the ſacred rev'rence of his name.

WRIT ON A WINDOW,

In the Highlands of Scotland.

SCOTLAND! thy weather's like a modiſh wife!
Thy winds and rains forever are at ſtrife:
So termagant a-while her thunder tries,
And, when ſhe can no longer ſcold—ſhe cries.

VERSES

Made for Mr. Savage; and ſent to my Lady Macclesfield, his Mother.

HOPELESS, abandon'd, aimleſs, and oppreſs'd,
Loſt to delight, and every way diſtreſs'd:
Croſs his cold bed, in wild diſorder thrown,
Thus ſigh'd Alexis, friendleſs, and alone.
Why do I breath? what joy can being give,
When ſhe who gave me life forgets I live!
Feels not theſe wint'ry blaſts—nor heeds my ſmart;
But ſhuts me from the ſhelter of her heart?
Saw me expos'd to want! to ſhame! to ſcorn!
To ills!—which make it miſery to be born!
Caſt me, regardleſs, on the world's bleak wild,
And bad me be a wretch while yet a child!
Where can he hope for pity, peace or reſt,
Who moves no ſoftneſs—in a mother's breaſt?
Cuſtom, law, reaſon, all! my cauſe forſake;
And nature ſleeps, to keep my woes awake!
Crimes, which the cruel ſcarce believe can be,
The kind are guilty of, to ruin me!
Even ſhe who bore me blaſts me with her hate,
And, meant my fortune, makes herſelf my fate!
Yet has this ſweet neglecter of my woes
The ſofteſt, tend'reſt breaſt, that pity knows!
Her eyes ſhed mercy whereſo'er they ſhine,
And her ſoul melts at every woe—but mine.
Sure, then, ſome ſecret fate for guilt unwill'd,
Some ſentence pre-ordain'd to be fulfill'd,
Plung'd me thus deep in ſorrow's ſearching flood,
And waſh'd me from the mem'ry of her blood.
But, oh! whatever cauſe has mov'd her hate,
Let me but ſigh in ſilence at my fate;
The God within, perhaps, may touch her breaſt;
And when ſhe pities, who can be diſtreſs'd?

ON LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGUE'S BRINGING WITH HER, OUT OF TURKEY, THE ART OF INOCULATING THE SMALL-POX.

WHEN Greece reviving into ſhort delight,
Felt pride and comfort at our muſe's ſight,
The rival'd nine no ſooner ſaw her face,
But ev'n their envy gave their wonder place.
Charm'd into love of what eclips'd their fame,
They wak'd Apollo with her powerful name.
See, god of Grecian wit! Urania cries,
How ſweet a muſe the weſtern world ſupplies:
Say, ſhould ſhe aſk ſome favour from your throne,
What could you bid her take, that's not her own?
Sparkling in charms, the heavenly ſtranger view,
So grac'd, ſhe ſcarce can owe a beam to you.
Beauty with love her power to your's prefers;
And wit and learning are already her's.
Rous'd at her name, receding from her eyes,
The gazing god roſe ſlow in ſoft ſurpriſe!
Fair miracle! (he ſaid)—and paus'd a while:
Then thus—ſweet glory of your envy'd iſle!
Charm'd and oblig'd leſt we ungrateful ſeem,
Bear hence at leaſt one mark of our eſteem.
One of my three great claims your wiſh may ſit;
Whoſe voice is muſic, and whoſe thoughts are wit.
Phyſic alone remains to grant you here—
A ſkill! your godlike pity will endear. [cure,
Form'd to give wounds, which muſt no eaſe pro-
Atone your influence by new arts to cure.
Beauty's chief foe, a fear'd and fierce diſeaſe!
Bows at my beck, and knows its god's decrees.
Breath'd in this kiſs, take power to tame its rage,
And from its rancour free the reſcued age:
High o'er each ſex in double empire ſit;
Protecting beauty, and inſpiring wit.

TO CLELIA, IN THE COUNTRY.

ON THE PULLING DOWN ST. MARTIN'S CHURCH.

WHILE from the noiſy crowd you lean retir'd,
In ſilent ſhades by love of thought inſpir'd,
I, vex'd by various cares, to buſineſs chain'd,
Mourn'd your loſt converſe, and in town remain'd:
Dark as the midnight world, your ſunſhine gone,
Guideleſs in ſullen gloom, I wander'd on:
Paſſion's wild influence ebb'd and flow'd my mind,
As ſeas drive diff'rent with the changing wind:
But to what point ſoe'er my will was bound,
In vain I turn'd th' unreſting compaſs round:
Doubtful a while th' wav'ring needle hung,
Then, trembling, backward to your image ſprung.
Penſive I view'd a ſacred pile of late,
Which falls, like man, to riſe in nobler ſtate;
The doors thrown wide, it ſeem'd unveil'd to lie,
And reverend ruin ſtruck my ſtartled eye.
Ent'ring amidſt the buſy hammer's ſound,
I ſaw time's duſty trophies ſcatter'd round:
Each violated pillar ſtood bedew'd;
And wept in ſolemn grief a fate ſo rude.
From tombs, by force diſjoin'd, reluctant ſtones
Roll'd, mix'd with clouds of duſt, and human bones:
From faithleſs walls defac'd inſcriptions fled,
And to long night conſign'd the nameleſs dead:
The pew's pale ſquares, in their whole lengthen'd row,
Gave way, and open'd a ſad ſcene below!
Beauty, youth, wealth, and power, reduc'd to clay,
Lard'ed with bones, yet moiſt, unſhelter'd lay:
Remnants of eyeleſs ſkulls, with hollow ſtare,
Mock'd the proud looks which living charmers wear:
Coffins roſe broke, unfaithful to their truſt,
And fleſh flew round me in unjointed duſt.
Scarce a ſhort ſpan beneath that opening floor,
Where kneeling charmers pray'd the week before;
Where forms like yours rejoic'd th' admiring eye,
Forms once like yours, in naked atoms lie.
O fate of failing life! O flatt'ring dream!
What wint'ry ſunſhine is thy ſhadowy gleams!
Thus while I mus'd, thy ſoul approach'd my ear;
Thy ſoft-wing'd ſoul, that always hovers near.
See'ſt thou, it ſigh'd—how theſe ſad relics lie;
And doſt thou fear that Clelia thus can die?

No—she's all mind; and her immortal name,
Eluding death's short reach shall tread on fame.
Tongues yet unthought of, Clelia shall adorn,
And charm adoring nations---yet unborn.
Heroes, at whose resolves the world will shake,
Shall treat thy sex with reverence for thy sake;
And each fair tyrant who would empress be,
Form but one wish---to think and look like thee.

ANSWER TO THE RESOLVE.

Whilst empty coxcombs blast a woman's fame,
In ev'ry state and ev'ry age the same:
With their own folly pleas'd, each fair they toast,
And where they least are happy, swear they're most;
No diff'rence marking 'twixt the gay and lewd,
But dreaming all who fly would be pursued:
While thus they vainly think, and vainly live,
Lost to that reverence love's soft lessons give;
Let this great maxim be my passion's guide;
May I ne'er hope where I am ne'er deny'd,
Nor gain a woman willing to be try'd.

ANSWER TO A SCURRILOUS OBSCENE POEM, Intituled, An Epistle from Mrs. Robinson to Senesino.

From thy loose lines I turn my eyes away,
Nor know, o'erspread with blushes, what to say:
The modest muses, wounded by thy strain,
For me, and for themselves, do thus complain.
O thou, our country's folly and expence!
Dull foe to tragedy and godlike sense;
Too long, mean mercenary shade, too long,
Has't thou these isles enchanted with thy song.
Music's soft god unbinds the charm he rais'd,
He blest thy tongue, and while he blest we prais'd:
By thee polluted, he disclaims his choice,
And will no longer warble in thy voice.
His trembling notes where melting softness hung,
And every grace will seek a chaster tongue.
No more the lover shall thy song repeat,
No more the fair one sigh—'tis wond'rous sweet!
Oh, guilty Senesino! thou no more
Shalt bravo! bravo! hear---or loud encore.
The loose and dull shall all thy audience be;
The chaste and witty shall resent for me.
All unattended shall thy awkward form,
To sad uncrowded scenes, or whine, or storm.
Thy wretched ha! shall unapplauded grow,
And ill-plac'd bays fall with'ring from thy brow.
Know, Songster, Julius, God-like chief, disdains
Thy shrill, unnatural, ungraceful strains:
With rage redoubled, Pompey's ghost must burn,
To find such tears profane his sacred urn.
Remember, echo, soon thou'lt know the time,
Strip'd of thy robes, thy legions, and thy rhyme;
Thou poor machine of mean delusive sound,
When I shall see thy temples all unbound,
And those who heroes act, like heroes crown'd.
Thou to thy famish'd Italy shalt go,
And rival Faustus in the shades below.

THE CHOICE, TO A FRIEND.

Oh greatly blest! who can, as fate requires,
By ductile wisdom temper your desires!
Balanc'd within, you look abroad serene,
And marking both extremes pass clear between.
Oh, could your lov'd example teach your skill!
And as it moves my wonder, mend my will!
Calm would my passions grow, my lot might please,
And my sick soul should think itself to ease,
But to the future while I strain my eye,
Each present good slips undistinguish'd by.
Still what I would, contends with what I can;
And my wild wishes leap the bounds of man.
If in my power it lies to limit hope,
And my unchain'd desires can fix a scope; [poor,
This were my choice---oh! friend, pronounce me
For I have wants which wealth can never cure.
Mean is that soul which its own good can fill;
A prosp'rous world alone could feast my will.
He's poor at best who others misery sees,
And wants the wish'd-for power to give it ease.
He's rich who sole supreme and unconfin'd,
Can with unbounded influence bless mankind.
A glory this, unreach'd!---but on a throne!
All were enough---but less than all is none.
This my first wish---but since 'twere wild and vain,
To grasp at glitt'ring clouds with fruitless pain,
More safely low let my next prospect be;
And life's mild evening this fair sun-set see.
Far from a lord's loath'd neighbourhood---a state,
Whose little greatness is a pride I hate! [plac'd,
On some lone wild should my strong house be
Surrounded by a vast and healthy waste:
Sterile and coarse the untry'd soil should be;
But forc'd to flourish, and subdued by me.
Seas, woods, meads, mountains, gardens, streams, and skies,
Should with a changeful grandeur charm my eyes,
Still where I mov'd, new marks of my past pains
Should plume the mountain tops, and paint the plains:
Greatly obscure, and shunning courts, or name
Widely befriended, but escaping fame.
Peaceful in studious quiet would I live;
Lie hid for leisure, and grow rich to give.

TO THE EDITOR OF CLARISSA.

Painters to poets owe their noblest praise;
Mute are their tints, till voic'd by living lays:
Passive the semblant forms but seem to breathe;
Delusive surface holds no depth beneath.
Far other lines Clarissa's painter drew;
Far other force his pensive colours knew:
There in round fulness active pictures glow,
Turgid with speaking life, and thinking woe.
His the soul's pencil, whose warm strokes impart
Mind to the form, and passion to the heart.
A delegate creator, calm he lies,
And sees the worlds he calls for round him rise.
Oh, might he live till his Clarissa's death!
But life immortal suits not mortal breath.
Let him but live till all who read are taught,
What aided influence beauty draws from thought.
Then would his length'ning years all bounds defy,
And nature and her friend together die.
So would he charm whole time---yet vainly too,
Reach every conscious heart---to change---how few!

Let him not hope too much---nor heaven nor he
Set human minds from human frailties free:
Though each can own where all the reſt are hit,
And every flaw, remote from ſelf, admit;
Though marks external catch the viſual ray,
All in-ſhut objects ſhun the ſearch of day.
Each ugliеſt likeneſs for another ſhown,
Strikes all; but none find eyes to note their own.
Yet his---whate'er ſtage, preſs, or pulpit can;
Whate'er the heart's touch'd feelings lend to man:
All that from all is learn'd, one genius gives,
And in collective right of virtue lives. [ply'd,
Whence was his more than magic power ſup-
So ſkill'd to ſtart life's game on every ſide?
Where could his line th' unmeaſur'd vaſtneſs find,
To fathom all the depths of all mankind?
Piercing as light from heaven, to earth he flows,
And every ſtain and every beauty ſhows.
The three great powers that ſhake the human heart,
Are muſic, eloquence, and paintive art:
Picture and eloquence already charm,
In every tearful page divinely warm.
Oh, let tun'd numbers fill th' illuſtrious trine!
In ſome new work let added muſic ſhine;
Let his next wreath the poet's ivy claim,
And his own verſe immortalize his name.
Verſe ſo inſpir'd, inſpiring, and combin'd,
Would pour th' enrapt'ring virtues o'er the mind;
Rouſe from their roots in earth, hearts hard as ſteel,
And teach once more the trees and beaſts to feel!

TO THE

TWO GENEROUS MASTERS ST. QUINTIN,

On their tender Affection to each other, in their Progreſs through, and Recovery from the Small-Pox.

Sexes are needleſs aids in love's pure claim,
Since ſouls (not bodies) light our ſocial flame.
Lamps of impriſon'd life miſplac'd we ſhine,
Leap, lean our lengthening points—and long to join.
So long'd your brother minds to mix embrace,
As light meets light, and ſpace is loſt in ſpace.
Death, with ſuſpended hand, beheld your ſtrife,
Call'd off diſeaſe's rage, and ſet free life.
Why ſhould they die, the ghaſtly pauſer cry'd,
Whom names but ſeparate, and but forms divide?
See with what ſpring th' elaſtic ſtrugglers flew;
Clung to their fate, and to death's horrors grew!
In vain eruptive fires their faces ſcreen;
Fever's hot anguiſh vainly burnt between.
Wolves that behind ſome thicket ſcent their prey,
Not with more fierce delight o'er thorns make way,
Than, fir'd by danger, one with rapture ſought
Th' infectious grasp that his beſt half had caught.
There ſmil'd their twiſted ſouls, farewell all fear;
We riſe together to a heaven not here.
No---let 'em ſtay, to earth's dim duſt confin'd,
Croſs'd in their clouded way t'ward realms of mind.
'Twas not death's drift to ſtrike for---added bliſs,
In next world angels---You're but men in this.

SENT TO A LADY

WITH A POCKET LOOKING-GLASS.

See, my ſoul's ſerene invader,
See the face I firſt ador'd:
Heaven for love and pity made her,
And with angel's graces ſtor'd.

Mark her forehead's awful riſing,
See her ſoul-ſubduing eyes,
Every look and air ſurpriſing,
Modeſt, lively, ſoft, and wiſe.

Next to you I own I love her;
But your ſweet diſcerning eye,
Muſt not now be jealous of her:
She's ne'er ſeen but you are by.

TO DAVID MALLET, ESQ.

On a miſtaken ſuppoſition that I had forgot him.

Wit like yours---and yet forgot?
Dreamy doubt? believe it not.
Faith in ſilence loves to dwell,
Fill'd with ſenſe it ſhuns to tell.
Shoaly waters loudeſt daſh;
Diſtant light'nings longeſt flaſh:
Spare pretence's empty drum,
Deepeſt joys are oft'neſt dumb:
Bodies part---but mutual mind
Stretch'd immenſe, contiguous join'd,
Ever tangent, always ſeen,
Souls embrace, with worlds between.
Pride, indeed, avows it fit,
Men forgotten ſhould forget:
Reaſon more to juſtice owes;
Reaſon loves---becauſe it knows.
Debt can ne'er for traffic ſtay;
Unreceiving it muſt pay:
Taſte of other's worth---ſhould none
Lend a weight to aid our own---
Don't, howe'er, the balance fail,
Tofs in ſelf to turn the ſcale.

THE ACTOR'S EPITOME.

If comprehenſion beſt can pow'r expreſs,
And that's ſtill greateſt which contains the leſs;
No rank's high claim can make the player's ſmall,
Since acting each he comprehends them all.
Off, to due diſtance, half the ſtalking train!
Blots of a title your low taſtes prophane:
No dull cold mouther ſhares the actor's plea,
Rightly to ſeem is tranſiently to be.
Arduous the taſk, and aſks a climbing brain;
A head for judgment, and a heart for pain:
E'er ſenſe impreſs'd reflects adopted forms,
A changeful nature ſhakes with borrow'd ſtorms.
Then ſtrong-mark'd paſſions ſigns external bear,
And ſtamp aſſum'd diſtinctions on the player;
Joy, grief, fear, anger, pity, ſcorn, and hate,
Wonder, ſhame, jealouſy, and love's ſoft weight.
Theſe, when he paints, did he but firſt conceive,
Each on his fancy would its image leave;
Thence ductile fibres catch the expreſſive ſpring,
And the eyes dart it, and the accents ring.

You who would joy's triumphant pride expreſs,
What moſt you wiſh, imagine you poſſeſs.
Strait flames th' idea to the kindling eye,
And every nerve in concord braces high:
Treading on air, each joint a ſoul diſplays;
The looks all lighten---and the limbs all blaze.
But you who act unhoping grief's diſtreſs,
Touch fancy with ſome home-felt wretchedneſs.
Then ſlack'ning nerves the looſe impreſſion take;
Each ſad look ſickens: the ſhock'd ſpirits break:
Dim falls the faded eye;---the ſteps drag ſlow,
And ev'ry heedleſs geſture heaves with woe.
Fear is but active grief, avoiding pain,
Yet flies too faintly, and avoids in vain:
While ſtagnate ſpirits, thick'ning as they ſpread,
O'er the cold heart, crawls ſlow, the living lead.
What though the eye's prompt ray keen light'ning dart;
'Tis fruitleſs:---loos'ning fibres lame the heart.
Anger is pride provok'd beyond controul,
When ſome ſelt inſult fires the ſmarting ſoul:
Then the will's warmth, repelling fancy'd ſhame,
Strings the nerves hard, and bids the eye-balls flame;
Then marks of menace, air, and face deform;
And ſhort thick breathings paint the inſelt ſtorm.
Pity is active ſenſe of alien grief;
Think ſome dear dying ſuff'rer begs relief:
Aidful idea ſprings to ſuccour woe,
And ev'ry quivering ſinew learns to glow,
While mild as ſighing ſaints, the ſadd'ning face
Clouds into anguiſh with relenting grace.
Scorn is cold anger, careleſs and at eaſe,
Calm ſenſe of wrongs too harmleſs to diſpleaſe;
Bold in undoubted ſafety, 'twould diſclaim
Defiance—and with proud remiſſneſs flame.
Now ſmiles, now frowns,—yet both with eye ſerene;
And lets the nerves play looſe with painleſs ſpleen.
Hatred is ſullen fury long retain'd;
'Tis willing miſchief warily reſtrain'd:
This to paint ſtrong the back-brac'd nerves ſhould toil
In fetter'd ſtrain, and heave in curv'd recoil;
While, with impatient frown, th' averted eye
Shuns the loath'd object it diſdains too nigh.
Pain-ſeeking jealouſy feels doubtful rage,
Which truſtful pity ſtruggles to aſſuage;
Thence frets uncertain pain, with penſive glow,
And look and action ſhare divided woe.
Sad in the face the heart's felt ſoftneſs reigns,
While each tugg'd ſinew angry vengeance ſtrains.
Wonder is curious fear—Suppoſe by night,
Some pale met ſpectre croſs'd the moon's dim light.
Sudden the back'ning blood, retreating ſwift,
Swells the preſs'd heart:—each fibre fails to lift;
Loſt in ſhort pauſe arreſted motion lies,
And ſenſe climbs doubtful to the ſtraining eyes.
Love is at once intenſe and ſlack deſire;
There hope inflames, while reverence cools the fire.
Fear of repulſe, bold ſenſe of joy withdraws;
Sighs in each accent; every movement awes.
Soft, earneſt looks bluſh o'er th' inclining face,
And fireſwy tranſport borrows ſhade from grace.

THE LORD'S PRAYER IN VERSE.

Almighty Father! of high heaven poſſeſs'd:
Be thy name holy, and thy power confeſs'd.
Teach us, on earth, to know and do thy will;
As heaven's bright train thy great commands fulfil.
Gracious our daily bread of life beſtow;
And ſhow us mercy, as we mercy ſhow:
Guard us from ſtrong temptation's powerful call;
Nor, when we meet with evil, let us fall.

AN ADDRESS

FROM THE STATUES AT STOWE,

To Lord Cobham, on his return to his Garden.

From every muſe and every art thy own;
Thy bowers our theatres, thy mind our throne:
Hail to thy virtues, manumiz'd from ſtate;
Hail to thy leiſure, to be wiſely great.
Fetter'd by duties, and to forms enſlav'd,
How timely has thy life a remnant ſav'd!
To taſte that freedom which thy ſword maintain'd;
And lead, in letter'd eaſe, a life unpain'd:
So Scipio, Carthage fall'n, reſign'd his plume,
And ſmil'd at the forgetfulneſs of Rome.
O, greatly bleſs'd! whoſe evening ſweetlieſt ſhines,
And in unclouded ſlowneſs calm declines:
Now free reflection, with reverted eye,
Wan'd from hot noon-tide, and a troubled ſky,
Divides life well—the largeſt part long known
Thy country's claim—the laſt and beſt thy own.
Go, like the maſters of the world, go ſhine;
Be Charles' life, and Diocleſian's thine:
Form thy own power, dependent peace create,
And ſhade diſtinction from the ſtorms of ſtate:
With pray'rs and praiſe, thy toil (like heaven's) be paid,
And guard the growing world thy hands have made
There, while detach'd, thy ſelf-ſupported ſoul
Reſumes dominion, and eſcapes controul;
Moves with a grandeur monarchs ſeek in vain,
Above all forms, all dangers, and all pain:
The muſe ſhall find thee in thy bleſs'd retreat,
And breathe this honeſt wiſh at Cobham's feet:
Freſh as thy lakes, may all thy pleaſures flow;
And breezy, like thy groves, thy paſſions blow;
Wide as thy fancy be thy ſpreading praiſe;
And long and lovely as thy walks—thy days.

TO LADY W——,

On ſeeing her in the Park, after her recovery from a long Illneſs.

Pleas'd at your wiſh'd return, to cheer the ſhade,
For your long life, a penſive neighbour pray'd;
Shock'd and diſguſted at the modern fair,
Vacant of thought and turbulent of air;
He hail'd your health, reſtor'd who live to prove,
How women once compell'd the wife to love.
How unaffected eaſe in motion charms!
How knowledge holds the heart that ſweetneſs warms!
How thinking ſpirit quickens every grace,
Till the ſoul lightens through the meaning face!

Griev'd to obſerve what now the ſex employs,
Whoſe wit is laughter, and whoſe converſe noiſe.
Who loudly ignorant, and coarſely light,
Repel men's reaſon, and offend their ſight;
Make youth diſtaſteful, dignity deſpis'd,
And every claim of beauty paſs unpriz'd:
Charm'd, he beheld once more your air ſublime,
In all but wiſdom, ſtill unchang'd by time.
Patterns, like you, may teach the faithleſs eye,
What, in your abſence, wou'd be judg'd a lie;
Shou'd it be told theſe quenchers of love's fire,
That woman once was ſoft and mov'd deſire;
By modeſt tenderneſs compell'd reſpect,
And, arm'd with influ'nce, never fear'd neglect.
That friend, and lover both, ſhe cou'd impart
Peace to the mind, and paſſion to the heart,
'Twould now be thought a dream—but that in you
They ſee ſuch proof, that they muſt own 'tis true.
Live then a lengthening age of painleſs hours,
Your ſex's envy—and the wiſh of ours.

TO MR. GARRICK,

On his united Ideas of Actor and Writer.

Form'd for each other's aid, theſe powers but meet,
As nature's ſelf ſhows light combin'd with heat:
Oh! born to grace their union, let 'em ſhare
Thy thoughts exertion, and reward thy care.
The willing arts bid all their praiſe be thine,
For thee, tun'd diſcords into muſic join;
What others, lab'ring hopeleſs, hardly gain,
'Twas thine at once to ſtart for and obtain.
To inſtant growth without gradation drawn,
High-noon leapt backward to embrace the dawn;
Time and experience ſunk to ſpeed thy way,
And genius craſp'd creation in a day.
Nor let malignant envy blaſt thy claim,
Since wit and virtue triumph in thy fame.
Oh! let no rogue of damn'd Iago's race,
To wile-try'd torture rack that honeſt face:
Seem what thou art, brave, faithful, amorous, gay;
The nobleſt paſſions pleaſe the nobleſt way.
Heart humaniz'd, head clear, hands clean, ſoul great,
Sharp ſenſe, mild manners, eaſe, adorning weight,
Sun of our ſtage ſhine on: we feel thy light:
Thy warmth how fruitful, and thy beam how bright!
Each guilt thou paint'ſt by borrow'd art is ſhown;
But every goodneſs native, and thy own.

ON SIR ISAAC NEWTON.

O'er nature's laws God caſt the veil of night,
Out-blaz'd a Newton's ſoul—and all was light.

TO CLIO,

On her praiſing Mr. Dyer, and ſhowing me ſome of his Verſes.

Matchless inſpirer of my muſe and me,
Thou heaven of blended ſmiles and majeſty!
Thou, by whoſe light all others worth is ſhown,
While thou art dark as midnight to thy own,
Praiſing deſert, like his, you charm me too,
And for your bleſſing him my thanks are due.
Mean are the minds, who but their own poſſeſs,
And reap no joy from other's happineſs.
I groan beneath their pains, whom ſorrow wrings,
And when their hope is riſing, mine has wings.
O Clio! to deſerve ſuch praiſe from thee,
Points out thy friend, a boſom one for me;
My ſympathetic ſoul reveres his name,
And my warm heart beats anxious for his fame.
Sweet are his thoughts, and ſoft as evening air;
Joy gilds his ſmiles—his ſighs invite deſpair:
Strong is his ſenſe, and his reflection deep,
Wide as his proſpects—as his mountains ſteep:
Oh, may he ſtill be bleſt with thy eſteem!
Oh, may thy charms for ever be his theme!
Vaſt is my wonder at his fancy's flight,
Till I remember whence his ſtore was drawn;
Clio, the inſpirer Clio! lent him light,
And ſpread ſoft influence o'er his wid'ning dawn.
Warm'd by the enliv'ning luſtre of her beams,
His rip'ning reaſon burnt with conſcious glow;
Blaz'd in the radiant charmer's ſtarry ſtreams,
And ſhed diffuſive heav'n on all below.
Oh! thou ſoft ſun of wit, and love's gay clime,
Point but one ray of thy broad ſhine on me;
Then ſhall my kindl'd ſoul flame out ſublime,
And glitter proudly with thy friend and thee.

ON TWO LOVELY AND LOVING SISTERS.

When equal charms, in different colours dreſs'd,
Have two ſweet ſiſters, rival perſons, bleſs'd:
How kind is heaven, their minds with love to ſtrike,
And teach 'em both to look and think alike.

TO THE EDITOR OF ALBANIA.

A POEM.

Addreſſed to the Genius of Scotland, and dedicated to General Wade.

Known, though unnam'd, ſince ſhunning vulgar phraſe,
Thy muſe would ſhine, and yet conceal her rays;
Think thyſelf hid, and hope in vain to be
Unſeen, like light, that ſhows us all we ſee.
But while thy readers are deny'd thy name,
They feel thy genius, and atteſt thy flame.
They pity too, in death, thy noteleſs friend,
Poor by the generous aid thy wealth wou'd lend,
Preface'd by thee, his feeble lights expire;
Ev'n in producing, thou obſcur'ſt his fire.
Not but the muſe had warm'd his youthful ſong!
Bold were his notes, and his ideas ſtrong;
But where domeſtic dearneſs warp'd his lays,
And partial birth miſled the patriot praiſe;
Wilt thou not join to blame the bounded zeal,
That bids us only for our country feel?
Yes—thou wilt cenſure this too ſcanty care,
That ſhuts out pity, and appropriates prayer.
Thou wilt enlarge affection, till it ſees
Beyond itſelf, and pants for public eaſe.

Stretch liberty to diſengage mankind,
And ev'n from nature's biaſs free the mind.
What though (we know not why) ſoft inbred pride,
Makes home ſeem ſweeteſt, and can choice miſ-guide;
Till native darkneſs erring taſte conſtrains,
And Lapland deſarts rival Perſia's plains.
Let the ſoul's reach the heart's reſtraint reprove,
And widen to the world our country's love.
Baſe are theſe local limits to men's hearts,
That canton out humanity in parts.
Truth has no diſtricts to divide her toil;
And virtue is at home in every ſoil.
Since, on one common globe, we neighb'ring dwell,
What narrower line ſhou'd man from man expel.
Each born alike, and ſons of nature all,
Human can ne'er from care of human fall.
But paſſion's rapine, nature's union breaks,
Not ſoil but int'reſt all this difference makes:
Born brothers, each from each wou'd ſomething draw,
Till ravag'd equity is ſhrunk to law.
Blindly forgetful, that the whole is duſt,
We hate for parts, nor feel ourſelves unjuſt:
Confine repute to place, and praiſe or rail,
As ſelf or ſtranger turns the varied ſcale;
Till ſenſe grown harden'd in her partial plea,
Juſtice is crippled into bribery.
Thou!—ſon of liberty!—can'ſt ſhun this ſhelf;
Looſ'ning reflection, and out-launching ſelf:
Can'ſt burſt the chain of cuſtom round the heart,
And from worſt ſlavery—(that of reaſon)—ſtart.
Thou, on thy country's hills, can'ſt praiſe beſtow,
Yet ſtoop not the encomium to her ſnow!
So wants confeſs'd, but ſtrengthen merit's claim,
And right from wrong diſtinguiſh'd fixes fame.
When rock-fenc'd Scotland boaſts her hardy race,
Or Engliſh beauty claims but matchleſs grace;
When France the praiſe of ſprightlieſt wits aſ-ſumes,
And German plainneſs ſpreads its honeſt plumes;
Concurring plaudits grant unqueſtion'd dues,
And truth and reaſon ſanctify the muſe.
But ſhou'd Teutonic heavineſs aſpire,
From French vivacity to raviſh fire,
Or Caledonia's manlike virgins vie,
With the ſoft ſunſhine of an Engliſh eye,
Juſtice wou'd bluſh at nature's erring pride,
And each forc'd trophy be by truth deny'd.
More juſt thy mind, more gen'rous is thy muſe!
Albanian born, this Engliſh theme to chooſe:
No partial flattery need thy verſe invade,
That in the ear of Scotland ſounds a Wade.
Such as thy muſe, ſuch is thy patron's aim;
Nor north nor ſouth can bound his ſpirit's claim.
Warm'd from within, he burns with Roman fires;
Shines for the world, and for mankind aſpires;
Adorning power, he beautifies a ſtate;
Endears dominion, and abſolves the great.
Kind by his care, rapacious licenſe grows,
And poliſh'd jealouſy no hatred knows:
Felt in their hearts, to love of faith he charms,
And ſoftly conqu'ring, needs no aid of arms.
When (ages hence) his laſt line's length'ner dies,
And his loſt duſt reveals not where it lies;
Still ſhall his living greatneſs guard his name,
And his works lift him to immortal fame.
Then ſhall aſtoniſh'd armies, marching high,
O'er cauſeway'd mountains that invade the ſky,
Climb the rais'd arch, that ſweeps its diſtant throw,
Croſs tumbling floods, which roar unheard below,
Gaze, from the cliff's cut edge, through midway air,
And, trembling, wonder at their ſafety there!
Pierce ſenny deeps with firm unſinking tread,
And o'er drain'd deſarts wholeſome empire ſpread.
While charm'd, the ſoldier dwells on wonders paſs'd,
Some chief, more knowing and more touch'd—laſt,
Shall, (pointing) to the attentive files, explain,
How (many a cent'ry ſince)—in George's reign,
Wade's working ſoul, that grac'd his prince's throne,
Built theſe vaſt monuments---and ſpar'd his own.

VERSES WRITTEN ON WINDOWS,

In ſeveral Parts of the Kingdom, in a Journey to Scotland.

Letters from abſent friends extinguiſh fear,
Unite diviſion, and draw diſtance near:
Their magic force each ſilent wiſh conveys,
And waſts embody'd thought a thouſand ways:
Could ſouls to bodies write, death's power were mean,
For minds could then meet minds, with heaven between.

Order! thou eye of action! wanting thee,
Wiſdom works hoodwink'd in perplexity;
Entangled reaſon trips at every pace,
And truth beſpotted, puts on error's face.

Tener-handed ſtroke a nettle,
And it ſtings you for your pains;
Graſp it like a man of mettle,
And it ſoft as ſilk remains.

'Tis the ſame with common natures,
Uſe 'em kindly they rebel:
But be rough as nutmeg-graters,
And the rogues obey you well.

How is the world deceiv'd by noiſe and ſhow!
Alas! how diff'rent to pretend and know!
Like a poor high-way brook, pretence runs loud
Buſt'ling, but ſhallow, dirty, weak, and proud:
While, like ſome nobler ſtream, true knowledge glides,
Silently ſtrong, and its deep bottom hides.

Whig and Torry ſcratch and bite,
Juſt as hungry dogs we ſee:
Toſs a bone 'twixt two they fight,
Throw a couple they agree.

Women talk of love for fashion,
So they do of spirits walking:
But no more they feel the passion,
Than they see the ghost of which they're talking.

Have a care, gay, young, and wanton,
Give no ground for love to plant on;
Guard against the fair deceiver,
See and hear, but don't believe her:
Or if nothing seems unjuster,
Than to love, and yet distrust her:
On your side to turn the laughter,
Try her first, and trust her after.

Here in wet and windy weather,
Muse and I two mopes together,
Far from friends, and short of pleasure,
Wanting every thing but leisure:
Scarce content in any one sense,
Tell the showers, and scribble nonsense.

Where'er the diamond's busy point could pass,
See what deep wounds have pierc'd the middle glass!
While partial and untouching all the rest,
Highest and lowest panes shine unimpress'd!
No wonder this!—For e'en in life 'tis so;
High fortunes stand unreach'd—unseen the low,
But middle states are marks for every blow.

As in a journey just begun,
We think the distance vast,
Yet while we travel gaily on,
Insensibly 'tis past.

So in our youth we measure flow,
Long views of promis'd breath:
'Till like a shadow out we go,
And vanish into death.

Were women wise, their names on glass,
Light froth of empty fashion!
Would to their lovers sorrow pass,
For proofs of brittle passion.

Love should in secret, like the sun,
Burn though a world should shade it;
But shows its source of heat to none,
Except that God who made it.

THE DISTINCTION OF AGES.

The seven first years of life, (man's break of day)
Gleams of short sense, a dawn of thought display;
When fourteen springs have bloom'd his downy cheek,
His soft and blushful meanings learn to speak;
From twenty-one proud manhood takes its date,
Yet is not strength complete 'till twenty eight;
Thence to his five-and-thirtieth, life's gay fire
Sparkles, burns loud, and flames in fierce desire:
At forty-two, his eyes grave wisdom wear,
And the dark future dims him o'er with care;
On to the nine-and-fortieth, toils increase,
And busy hopes and fears disturb his peace;
At fifty-six, cool reason reigns entire,
Then life burns steady, and with temp'rate fire;
But sixty-three unbinds the body's strength,
E'er th' unwearied mind has run her length;
And when from seventy, age surveys her last,
Tir'd she stops short—and wishes all were past.

THE MUSE TO THE WRITER.

A TRANSLATION FROM THE FRENCH OF DUBARTAS.

Scarce was the April of my life begun,
When anxious to immortalize my name,
Pleasure and soft repose I learn'd to shun,
And lab'ring upward, fought the mounts of fame.

But as a traveller, in viewless plains,
Stops amid crossing roads, and doubts his way;
Pensively searchful, and unsure remains,
Eager to journey on, yet loth to stray.

So stop'd, and so unfix'd, I mark'd around,
The flow'ry paths that led to groves of bays;
But pausing, doubtful, long confusion sound,
Which best to choose of all those tempting ways.

One while my genius plann'd the glowing scene,
And from the Grecian source example drew;
Taught pride to pity, ignorance to mean,
And form'd the many, by the suff'ring few.

Anon domestic discord snatch'd my pen,
My country's woes I now aspir'd to feel;
Historic truths, and wrongs of injur'd men,
Impell'd my justice, and inflam'd my zeal.

Then sinking sudden, from the glorious height,
Low mercenary praises quench'd my fire;
Poorly a flatt'rer, I for profit write,
And to my fortune tune my tortur'd lyre.

At length grown lazy, I by love was caught,
And finding age, and taste, and will to fit,
In warm light sallies, wanton lessons taught,
And to the size of Cupid crop'd my wit.

While roving thus uncenter'd and unstaid,
I lik'd by turns, and did by turns refuse;
Sudden before me a descending maid,
Confess'd the shape of a celestial muse.

All that we dream of angels form'd her air;
Sweet was her gesture and her step divine:
But when she spoke, she would have charm'd despair,
And taught the gloom of wither'd age to shine.

High from her head, aspir'd a starry crown,
Immensely beaming its effulgence round;
An azure mantle flow'd obliquely down,
And bright with lamps of silver swept the ground.

Mortal! she cry'd, Urania's face behold!
Urania—muse of all the heavenly nine;
Best skill'd the paths of glory to unfold,
And make the poet (like his art) divine.

I through the dancing numbers breathe a soul,
And to the sound of reason tune mankind;
I teach true pleasures, false ones to controul,
And warm the yielding heart, to stamp the mind.

Mark me, and keep my image long in sight,
And when departed to my starry sphere,
Strike this new harp, and from it draw delight,
By sounds that list'ning angels love to hear.

Long have I mourn'd my sister's sully'd fame,
By friendless mirth or cheerless malice stain'd;
Cramp'd by cold flatteries that blight their name,
Or by wild warmths of loose desire profan'd.

But most I grieve that rebel waste of wit,
Which boldly pushing its infernal claim,
With darkness for such blind presumption fit,
Turns its own arms on heaven with impious aim.

Learnt are the vulgar arts—but poets draw, [fire:
From heaven alone the gift that wings their
Not the best lights that ever learning saw,
Could living verse by study'd strength inspire.

Thence 'tis that Homer, powerless, poor, and blind,
Beggar, himself has taught e'en kings to shine:
Buoy'd sinking heroes by fresh floods of mind,
And stretch'd the human grasp with reach divine.

Thence 'tis that Ovid could not speak in prose,
But wept in measure, and expir'd in verse:
Thence the Jessæan lyre to music rose,
Which seraphs in their Maker's ear rehearse.

Read, meditate, reflect, grow wise—in vain;
Try every help; force fire from every spark;
Yet, shall you ne'er the poet's power attain,
If heav'n ne'er stamp'd you with the muses mark.

Man must be out of man sublimely swell'd,
Whose wreckless verse would swim the storms of time,
By force, not fury, meaningly impell'd,
To scorn the puny prostitutes of rhyme.

The warmth of fury but compassion moves,
And less than man makes man to man appear:
But warmth of genius, man from man removes,
And lifts his wid'ning soul to Heaven's high sphere.

Mark this soft flute—when void of vocal wind,
In tuneless silence rests the sleeping sound:
Yet, when thus breath'd in, hark! what power 'twill find,
To waft the modulated raptures round!

So, till the whisp'ring Godhead bids—begin,
The poet's silent spirit stands unbent:
But when he feels th' inspiring power within,
Tuneful he spreads the transports heaven has lent.

Since, therefore, all that makes his genius shine,
Is heaven's own gift,—how dares he subjects choose,
Base and unworthy of that warmth divine,
And poorly noxious to the passive muse?

Why is his pen employ'd on idle themes?
Why is his fancy light? his purpose low?
Why does he waste his fire in fruitless dreams?
And with a tide of wanton wishes flow?

Why does he stoop to praise unletter'd pride?
Why celebrate defects in those who rule?
Why does his wit soft am'rous trains provide,
And bid love's wild-fire catch from fool to fool?

Ah! 'tis too much that he himself has crimes,
Which, unrepented, ne'er unpunish'd go:
Why would he lend his guilt to distant times,
And teach an unborn race to merit woe?

As on the yielding wax the seal we find,
Left in strong likeness with imprinted glow;
So does the reader steal the poet's mind,
And to the bias's lent inclining go.

Shame on your pens, ye flexible of heart!
Whose poorness does not hurt yourselves alone,
But teaches blockheads to despise your art;
Judg'd by false patterns you have lightly shown.

Conscious of this, would you but turn at last,
And bid true genius with true lustre shine;
All would, admiring, lose th' impression past,
And feel and own you of a stamp divine.

Then as my Moses his Jehovah sung,
And Israel wafted by the guardian rod:
Poets from every kindling country sprung,
Shall in a thousand tongues uncover God.

O you, who would the deathless laurel win,
No king's vile badge, but time's all-rev'rend crown!
High as the fountain of your verse begin,
And with the god you write for, share renown.

This is a subject, that outstretching thought,
Through depths unsounded, wit's long plummet draws:
There by immense effects immensely taught,
Pour out your straining souls, and claim applause.

There, and there only, find the road to fame;
The hardiest themes the noblest glory yield:
On low light subjects scorn to build a name;
But ent'ring boldly, plough th' untrodden field.

Vainly shall envy blast your budding praise;
Malice and hatred vainly press you down:
Slow shall you rise, indeed, but sure to blaze,
And hourly broad'ning reach decreed renown.

Envy's a cur, that at all strangers barks;
But on the known and licens'd creeps to fawn:
Its hov'ring smoke hangs hard on kindling sparks,
But when the fire burns up 'tis strait withdrawn.

On then, be mine—Urania hears your pray'r;
Glows in your breast and fans it gen'rous flame:
Write to be read—be times to come your care,
And bloom for ever fragrant still the fame.

She said: and breath'd ambrosial o'er my face:
The circling sweetness swell'd my ravish'd mind;
She rose, and left me in an empty space;
But left her pow'rful influence still behind.

AN ODE TO ASTRÆ:

FROM THE FRENCH OF DUBARTAS.

FAIREST pattern from above,
Though I only live for love,
'Tis not for those sparkling eyes;
Though the stars that gild the skies,
When the twinklers shine most bright,
So compar'd have lost their light.
Though the sun in all his blaze,
Sees that smile, and hides his rays.

'Tis not that my fancy dips,
In the rainbow's red thy lips,
'Tis not ev'n thy lips that pleaſe:
Though the happieſt Hybla bees,
When they rob the flow'ry ſpring,
Never ply'd the buſy wing,
Charg'd with honey half ſo ſweet,
As it would be thoſe lips to meet.

'Tis not your neglect of air,
Far outcharming others care;
Nor thoſe locks that fall reſign'd,
Catch'd and courted by the wind:
Though the drifts of glitt'ring ſand,
Strow'd o'er Afric's yellow ſtrand,
Ne'er to charm ambition, roll'd
Half ſuch tempting veins of gold.

'Tis not to thoſe poliſh'd rows,
'Twixt whoſe openings muſic flows,
That I find my offerings due,
Vows ſo tender and ſo true!
Though the pearl-producing eaſt
Ne'er did Europe's wonder feaſt,
Spite of all its toothy ſtore,
With ſuch ivory before.

'Tis not that declining waiſt,
Nor that neck ſo ſweetly grac'd;
Nor the pantings of that breaſt,
(Soft as pity, and as bleſt!)
I could even that breaſt defy:
Though were Læda's ſwan but nigh,
All its down would fail to ſhow,
Half ſo white and ſoft a ſnow.

When that forehead I behold,
(Smooth as flatt'ry and as cold!)
'Tis not its majeſtic frown
Throws my heart's defences down;
Though the ſilver moon at height,
Shines leſs awful through the night,
Than the meanings of that brow
Shoot correction at me now.

'Tis not that this azure vein
Marks your arm with heav'n's own ſtain,
While along the white it flows,
Swell'd with triumph as it goes:
'Tis not this engaging hand,
Holds my heart in ſoft command;
Though to hear it touch the lute,
Rocks would ſpeak—and birds grow mute.

Teach me, then, myſterious fair,
What your power to charm, and where?
If this flame of my deſire,
Did not at your eyes catch fire:
If thoſe lips (how ſweet they be!)
Have not thus entangled me;
Tell me what my heart could move?
Teach me whence aroſe my love?

If thoſe ringlets of your hair
Did not ſtring this amorous ſnare;
If that beauteous mouth has fail'd,
Nor thoſe ivory teeth prevail'd?
Tell me what reſiſtleſs cauſe,
Felt unknown my fancy draws?
Still unpleas'd but where you are,
Still untaught what pleaſes there!

Since thoſe breaſts—(how ſoft they riſe!)
Reach no farther than my eyes;
Since I count a thouſand charms,
None of which my heart diſarms:
Let your ſtill-uncounted ſtore
Guide my ſearch to find out more,
Till the cauſe I learn to know,
Pleaſing cauſe! that charms me ſo.

Ah! 'tis found—delightful truth!
Senſe with beauty, temp'ring youth.—
'Tis that peerleſs ſoul of thine,
Breaks like day-light into mine;
Charg'd with heav'ns etherial flame!
Full of charms without a name!
'Tis thy converſe turn'd to move,
Claims reſpect and forces love.

EPIGRAM,

On giving the Name of Georgia to a Part of Carolina.

While rip'ning ſlow the future purpoſe lay,
And conſcious ſilence plann'd the op'ning way;
Kind o'er the riſing ſcheme an angel hung,
And dropt this counſel from his guardian tongue:
Wiſh you this way the royal pair inclin'd?
To Carolina be a Georgia join'd—
Then ſhall both colonies ſure progreſs make,
Endear'd to either for the other's ſake:
Georgia ſhall Carolina's favour move;
And Carolina bloom by George's love.

A LETTER

From a departed Spirit to the Author (Mr. Pope), of a Lady's Character, lately publiſhed in a Thurſday's Journal.

Stipt to the naked ſoul, eſcap'd from clay,
From doubts unfetter'd, and diſſolv'd in day;
Unwarm'd by vanity, unreach'd by ſtrife,
And all my hopes and fears thrown off with life;
Why am I charm'd by friendſhip's fond eſſays,
And though unbody'd conſcious of thy praiſe?
Has pride a portion in the parted ſoul?
Does paſſion ſtill the formleſs mind controul?
Can gratitude out-pant the ſilent breath?
Or a friend's ſorrow pierce the glooms of death?
No—'tis a ſpirit's nobler taſte of bliſs!
That feels the worth it left in proofs like this:
That not its own applauſe, but thine approves,
Whoſe practice praiſes, and whoſe virtue loves!
Who liv'ſt to crown departed friends with fame,
Then dying late, recall all thou gav'ſt reclaim.

THE CIV. PSALM.

Let my exalted harp be doubly ſtrung!
High-tune thy praiſe, my ſoul! and let thy God
be ſung!
See! how around his throne the conſcious rays
Shoot quiv'ring, with continuous curve, and tremble in their blaze! [diſplays!
See! what ſoul-ſhaking majeſty, effulgent he

Cloth'd with embodied light, see! where he stands!
Pointing wide his dread commands!
As earth's dim flames, o'erwhelm'd by stream-
ing day,
Beneath the sun-beams die away;
The sun full met, with cover'd face, retires,
Burns inward and rolls back his frighted fires!
Gracious, th' unequal eye of man to skreen!
See! where the maker kindly shades the too resplendent scene!
And like a curtain widely drawn, spreads out whole heaven between.
Look! now, amazing! where he glides!
Look! where yon gathering host of clouds he dreadfully bestrides!
And, awful on those self-roll'd chariots rides!
He moves! he walks upon the swift-wing'd wind!
He steps, from world to world at once, and leaves
even thought behind!

Myriads of hovering angels crowd the God-grac'd scene to fill!
Angels! fit heralds for th' Almighty's will!
Ten thousand firey light'nings sweep his way!
Nimble couriers of his sway!
And round his temples, hissing swift, in blue
meanders play
The firm-fix'd balance of the self pois'd globe,
To neither bias partial sway'd, [obey'd!
Became thus just, at his great word, and lastingly
At his command the covering deep, drew off the world's wet robe;
Gave back, and fill'd the channels he had made!
But peeping o'er the hills reluctant staid;
Displeas'd with its new bounds, but more afraid,
Its old to re-invade!
E'en yet the stubborn-hearted flood, no more
High-licens'd as before,
Disdains to give its proud repinings o'er:
Oft, with bold murmurs, it alarms the shore,
And, now and then, with rebel rage breaks out in general roar!
But when presumptuous billows swell too high,
And sprinkle heaven's eternal eye:
Streight all the thunders of God's voice in loud
resentment rise;
The starting flood hears, shakes, and flies!
Down sinks the quash'd aspirer from the skies,
And hush'd in humble flatness lies!
Yet if the Sovereign will but nods, black oceans
quit their bed!
Foamy they lash each other on, with high discovering head,
And curling climb the steepy hills, and o'er
drown'd mountains spread;
Thence call'd again, again they rush, confessing
God's controul!
Again let loose, re-seek their sandy beds,
Tumble for haste o'er one another's heads!
And, sweeping with resistless breadth, o'er delug'd kingdoms roll!
Fierce as they are, they're subject to his check!
They know th' appointed bounds, and watch
th' imperious beck!

From the huge treas'ry of the briny deep,
Through thousand earth-form'd lab'rinths taught
to slide,
In search of springs the salt-stript waters creep,
And trickling thence into sweet rivers glide.
Smooth-travelling to seek their mazy way,
And devious 'twixt th' enamour'd hills, slowly
delightful stray;
These God appointed thus to flow, exhaustless
stores of drink,
Where every beast may quench his thirst, that seeks the smiling brink!
And in the shady groves, which on their borders rise,
He hous'd the warbling songsters of the skies!
The pride-swoln mountains, which ambitious grow, [below;
And neighb'ring heaven disdain the world
Nor will to humble brooks refreshment owe,
He waters with th' ætherial seas or coronets of snow!
Amazing goodness! where's the smallest space,
That does not feel and boast his grace?
For cattle's food green flourishes the flow'r-em-
broider'd mead;
For man's free use is every fruit decreed:
For him th' inspiring grape was taught to bleed;
Bread-bearing corn makes glad the labourer's
toil; [oil.
And his rough skin grows supple, smooth'd with

When, at fix'd times, up rolls the changeful
moon,
God shoots her shadowy gleam through night's black noon!
Rapid as is the ever-wheeling sun,
He dares not measure heaven one thought
too soon?
Yet at God's word the flag of day is furl'd,
And licens'd darkness rises o'er the world:
Then does the gloomy forest quake,
And all th' assembled savage kind their holiday
then make:
Leaf-trembling trees in silent horror shake,
And panting herds creep terrified away,
While the stern lion, hungry, roars and stalks abroad for prey.
God suffers him the needful prey to take,
And then new-wakes the day:
Out breaks the sun, and to their dens the beasts
fly swift away. [found!
Almighty Power! how dost thou thought con-
What human search can trace thy mazy round?
How wisely, and how vastly, Lord! are all thy wonders done:
Not earth alone does with thy wealth abound,
But all above, and all beneath the sun.

The sea's wild herds, as well as those on land,
Rough-moulded sons too of thy formal hand,
All live and move by thy command. [ing eye;
The horrid wonders of that scene fatigue the ach-
There wave-tost's ships the op'ning depths defy;
And circly through th' imprison'd winds their
diff'rent courses ply:
There does Leviathan wide-wallowing lie;

And while his broad unwieldy ſports the ſcaly people fly, [at the ſky.
He, dreadful monſter! ſucks in ſeas and ſpouts 'em
On thee, obedient, all thy creatures wait;
And, in due ſeaſon, all by thee are fed:
Thy ſingle bounty does their bliſs create;
They gather what thy op'ning hand has ſpread;
If thou but hid'ſt thy face they fall away:
Thou tak'ſt their breath and they decay;
At once return to unform'd duſt and old paternal clay.
Again thou doſt but ſpeak thy potent will,
And life, rekindling, glows within 'em ſtill!
For ever ſhall thy glorious power endure:
The pillars of thy majeſty ſtand ſtedfaſtly and ſure:
Approach'd by thee, the conſcious mountains ſmoke,
And earth diſſolv'd, flows looſe beneath thy ſtroke!

TO HIS MUSE.

Thy country! blaſt it, if it once diſdains
To prop thy virtues, or reward thy pains:
If there I proſper, here was only born
That claims my duty: this deſerves my ſcorn.
O muſe! 'tis mean to ſtoop to helpleſs moan;
Try if no clime is gentler than thy own:
Offer, on diſtant ſhores, a faithful hand;
In vain, not uſeleſs, in thy mother land.
When fortune frowns, and care's black harveſt ſprings,
A change of place, a change of proſpect brings:
Far off thy reaſon's force uncurb'd may reign;
But even the prophets preach'd at home in vain.
Yet hold; and e'er it quite determin'd grows,
Let me ſome ſudden ſtarts of hope diſcloſe:
E'er, widely wand'ring, led by falſe diſtruſt,
From my wing'd feet I ſhake their native duſt.
Perhaps my doubt clouds ſome domeſtic ray,
And hides a proſpect bordering on my way:
Though men of title ſeem exempt from thought,
And pride's aſſiſtance is but vainly ſought;
Though truth, oft try'd, this known advice imparts,
That noble blood may warm ignoble hearts:
Hid in a cloud of pomp which hems the throne,
There may be greatneſs, to my hopes unknown;
How'er unfought, howe'er unſeen by me,
There may ſome ſoul-diſtinguiſh'd nature be:
Some gen'rous breaſt, whoſe mind, divinely warm,
Has taught him how uncourted favours charm.
If ſuch there be, ſo rich, ſo ſtrong a mind,
And thou, bleſt muſe, ſhall his bright boſom find,
Whiſper, in gentle notes; thy maſter's pray'r,
And in ſoft accents this ſad truth declare:
There lives, O brighteſt gem of honour's crown,
Thou angel-acted theme of juſt renown!
There lives, who, ſkill'd in fortune's wanton ſports,
Hopes, with ſuch faintneſs, for regard from courts,
That, though not blind to worth, which all men ſee,
He ſends me, half deſpairing, even to thee.
No gain-polluted aim inſpires his views;
He ſeeks not office, nor reward purſues: [ſign,
More nobly fir'd, his thoughts high ſchemes de-
To ſtretch dominion, and make empire ſhine.
Oh! were his wiſhes bleſt, and thy kind ear
Would once, impartial, his conceptions hear;
Th' important moment might reſolves produce,
And clothe ideas with ſubſtantial uſe.
Stop there, O muſe! 'twere needleſs more to ſay;
And with unwilling ſlowneſs glide away:
If, mov'd, he calls thee back, regardful, go;
If not, return ungriev'd; all vain complaint is low.

THE TEARS OF THE MUSES.

A POEM.

Germanicus, for love and empire born,
At once to govern kingdoms, and adorn;
Too good for greatneſs, but that kings can bleſs;
Too firm for fear, but of his friend's diſtreſs.
Fore-temp'ring pow'r, by reaſon's generous plan,
To taſk the monarch, meditates the man.
In a town grove, whence Driad's noiſe exclude,
And huſh loud ſtreets to ſylvan ſolitude,
Veil'd by a verdant ſkreen's encircling ſhade,
Whoſe angly ſides eight arching lights pervade;
Friend to mankind their penſive fav'rite ſtood,
Revolving previous plans of purpos'd good.
Soft to his ſight a female ſuppliant preſs'd,
In all the ſpeaking marks of mis'ry dreſs'd;
Down-look'd, relax'd of mien, oft bending low,
Now ſtopping ſhort, now re-advancing ſlow:
Pardon, ſhe cry'd, th' intruding ſighs of grief
Hope is the friendleſs wretch's laſt relief.
Germanicus, who, when diſtreſs draws nigh,
Catches quick ſorrow from the ſuff'rer's eye;
With gentle waft invites her back'ning fears,
And ſmiles the warmth of pity on her tears.
Her, while advancing, heedful he ſurvey'd,
Chance ſtretch'd his eye to the remoter ſhade;
Where, dimly obvious, from the bord'ring wood,
Dark'ning the arches, eight new phantoms ſtood,
All like the firſt, thin forms of ſhiv'ring woe,
Wept all—in dumb, ſad, ſolemn, circl'y ſhow.
Think, cry'd th' approacher, proſtrate at his feet,
How ſharp is inſult, and relief how ſweet:
Pity a wretched ſiſterhood of tears,
Nine friendleſs mourners, whom no comfort cheers.
All arts were ours, that poliſh'd life could gain;
But arts, and poliſh'd life, were ours in vain.
See what reward wiſh'd knowledge could impart,
Where fool is faſhion, ignorance is art.
Urg'd by deriſion, and eſcaping hate,
We ſad, flow exiles, ſeek ſome gentler fate.
To the bleak north's new-riſing coaſts we go,
Leſs cold than theſe, amidſt eternal ſnow.
Glory's gay beams, to whoſe felt warmth we run,
More than ſupply the abſence of their ſun.
There mourning merit cannot miſs relief,
Where watchful pow'r ſupplants prevented grief.
Fam'd for munificence, thy princely hand
Singly abſolves an unbeſtowing land.
Ah! ſave the friendleſs—help the wrong'd away;
Too poor to go, yet too unlov'd to ſtay.
Pay but wiſh'd paſſage from this cruel ſhore,
And never, never will we truſt it more.
Scarce had th' imploring accents voic'd her pray'r,
When the known ſounds and recollected air

Through the falſe ſemblance, natively convey'd
To the charm'd prince, a ſpeaking muſe betray'd.
Round, while uncrediting the ſtoried woe,
His curious eyes diſcov'ring glances throw.
Th' examin'd umbrage, as he turn'd, reveal'd
Each muſe that ev'ry diſtant arch conceal'd.
Waiting impatient for the finiſh'd tale,
Quit your vain hope, he cry'd, by want's thin veil
Unhid, to 'ſcape the rev'rence of my zeal,
Who all your power through all your changes feel.
Joyful he ſnatch'd th' implorer from the ground,
Then, turning graceful, bow'd progreſſive round;
Preſs'd their joint acccſs, undiſguis'd and gay,
And ſhone receptive of each effluent ray.
Seated and circled by the beamy train,
Their ſhapes reſuming, and themſelves again;
Tell me, ſaid he, ye ſoul inſpiring nine!
Ye living fires that give the great to ſhine,
Who, quick'ning regal courage into flame,
Guide it, by juſtice, to immortal fame.
Why would ye leave a land diſtinguiſh'd long
For love of valour, and for hate of wrong;
Where freedom unreſtrain'd her empire holds,
And legal monarchy new bloom unfolds?
He paus'd—and Clio anſwering, thus began:
Periſh pale malice!—It oblit'rates man.
Where envy blaſts, the muſe inſpires in vain;
No human culture there extends its reign.
Loſt in malignity by civil hate,
Virtues that claſh with virtues, curſe a ſtate.
Stifled in faction, arts unfriended ſink,
Or pigmy'd into partial flatt'ry ſhrink.
Hiſt'ry muſt bluſh the wiles of ſpleen to pen,
And grace the bloodleſs broils of angry men.
Smother'd in ſelf there breathes no public ſoul,
Where ſep'rate ſtrugglings general ſtrength controul;
There policy's old gen'rous ſtraitneſs bends;
And ſhifting medium crawls to ſidelong ends:
There fraud triumphant, tempts the juſt to fall;
And every one man's gain is loſs to all:
There love internal, checking ſighs that roam,
Begins and ends all charity—at home.
Each pray'r appropriates one man's modeſt aim,
And humbly truſts to God, the common claim.
Cruſh'd by contempt of praiſe exertion dies,
And public ſpirit, laugh'd at, ſhuns to riſe.
Thither when hope miſleads th' hiſtoric muſe,
Swift let her ſeek ſome ſcene of nobler views;
Where guileleſs pow'r no praiſe to craft aſcribes,
Where courage ſcorns deceit and duty—bribes;
Where nervous meaning dares directly ſpeak,
And crooked windings teach no truth to ſneak.
'Tis found—for ſee—the icy pole diſſolves;
Honour's new warmth with ſunny force involves.
There glows event, there more than Roman arms
Claſh their prophetic thunder's fear'd alarms:
There the puls'd public beats in ev'ry vein;
Strong to one purpoſe, lifts with equal ſtrain.
No vile pretenſion there at titles aims;
No pride-ſwoln lumber lazy lordſhip ſhames:
There ſhines the ſword in honour's guarded track;
No knighthood bluſhes on a miſer's back;
No bought emblaz'nings eminence efface;
No dirty dignity ſublimes diſgrace;
There heroes multiply; and labouring fame
Grows buſy—to record each ſparkling name.
She ceaſed—the prince, his patriot eyes withdrew; [true;
Weigh'd the long charge, and wiſh'd it half un-
Sigh'd at the waſte domeſtic diſcord made,
And mourn'd unfriended arts by ſpleen betray'd:
Then view'd the ſiſters, re-prepar'd to hear,
While Erato, ſoft ſighing, charm'd his ear.
Lur'd, ſaid the am'rous muſe, from realms above,
Pleas'd I deſcended on this land of love:
Look'd and approv'd; and form'd aërial ſchemes
Of heart-felt ties, and hope's eluſive dreams;
Vainly propos'd—each ſex by each to mend,
And ſmooth the rugged paths of life with friend.
Snatch'd at one ſweet example new to fame,
Urg'd its dear pow'r th' unhappier to reclaim.
Miſguided millions hail'd th' acknowledg'd charms,
And lov'd perfection when it bleſs'd thy arms.
But ah! too loſt at length themſelves were gone;
They worſhipp'd and confeſs'd—but ſtill ſinn'd on.
Yet I, vain hoper, ſtill new helps apply;
And, ever failing, would for ever try.
To ſlighted beauty would new powers impart,
And ſtretch the aided empire of the heart.
Teach man that woman's ſtrength in ſoftneſs lies;
Teach woman why the modeſt charm the wiſe.
Uſeleſs to either I from both remove;
Money's th' inſpiring muſe of modiſh love:
O'er truth and paſſion avarice prevails,
All vows are venal, and all ſighs are ſales.
Int'reſt and vanity, and ſelf, diſarm
Mutual eſteem, till neither ſex can charm:
The blank unnat'ral whims pervert deſire,
Attraction failing they exchange attire.
Then man's lac'd lightneſs apes the lady's air;
And bluff big boldneſs maſculates the fair.
With changing ſexes, love's loſt motives change,
From wiſh to wiſh, the ſhort-liv'd paſſions range;
Recorded conſtancy becomes romance,
And, among millions, two may love—by chance!
Why ſhould I then ſupporting preſent ſcorn,
Stretch my too patient hope to times unborn?
When to the north, where nature ſhines unſtain'd,
Confiding ſexes love with faith unfeign'd,
Their native beauties, in no clime excell'd,
To riſing force by conſcious worth impell'd;
While through the ſparkling eye taught ſpirit breaks,
And the felt luſtre of their fame partakes.
The lover prince unwillingly believ'd,
Faults which his nobler nature ſcarce conceiv'd;
Touch'd for the honour of the human heart,
His own glow'd painful with ideal ſmart:
When loftier accents from Urania broke,
And ſnatch'd his liſt'ning ſoul, while ſcience ſpoke.
From heav'n's unſounded depth, ſhe cry'd, I ſtole
Angelic fire, and form'd a Newton's ſoul;
Taught him the ſecret walks of God to tread,
And 'twixt the ſtarry worlds his ſpirit led.
All æther op'ning to a mortal's eyes,
Till earth ſent colonies, and held the ſkies.
What king for this magnificently juſt,
Bleſs'd him in life, or dignified his duſt?

What voted honours mark the aspirer's race?
What thinking statues emulate his face?
He who immortaliz'd his country's name,
Beyond ten thousand conqu'rors bounded fame,
He, who to list mankind, new heav'ns display'd,
And every human breather nobler made;
Did he to public fame all nature raise?
And is he poorly left to private praise?
In such a land, ah! what can arts expect,
What claim has hopeless science, but neglect.
O fate of wint'ry worth, by climate crost'd!
Budding untimely to be nip'd in frost!
Newton has multiplied the suns!—yet pours
In vain the light of all their orbs on ours,
When will the incurious courts for which he found
New worlds, find will to trace an old one round?
What promis'd pension ships th' unshaken soul,
To dare discov'ry and ungloom the pole?
What coasting keel indenting southern strands,
Starts the long shores of cloud-benighted lands?
No annual bounty persevering kind,
Draws the dark veil that covers half mankind.
What regal influ'nce easing learning's birth,
Now adds new stars to heav'n, or arts to earth?
Who sows munificence to root up sloth,
And call forth harvests of eternal growth?
Hail to the land where war makes science room!
Where realms from desarts rise, and ruins bloom!
Where conquest spreading to embrace distress,
Lets loose ambition, not to waste, but bless:
There pow'r inverts destruction into birth,
And the prolific sword empeoples earth!
There desolation, fruitful in decay,
Fades into opulence, and strengthens sway.
There ports (unnative) indrawn seas confine,
And climbing streams o'er channel'd mountains shine;
There public splendor swallows private pride,
And claims which all men share in all men guide;
There art rewarded strains excited skill,
Till dazzling wonders wid'ning empire fill:
The fierce free Tartar, sees the Tartar taught,
Grins at advancing rule, and pants for thought;
Then in long link, new nations forward draw,
And the drain'd wilds of nature crowd to law.
Hail promis'd land!—All now that seems severe,
Is—that removing hence we leave you here.
Urania stopp'd and bow'd.—The prince whose heart
Inly confess'd the pow'r of cherish'd art,
Nobly approving praise so justly warm,
Smil'd conscious of his inborn right to charm.
Next rose Terpsichore,—melodious muse!
Soft her first accents like descending dews;
Sweet, and flow swelling, till in livelier sound,
Gay to the ravish'd ear quick transports bound.
Tim'd to the tuneful voice each trembling tree
Strain'd its tugg'd roots, and labour'd to be free:
Warm'd through the wak'ning stone the sculptur'd ear
Of every starting statue seem'd to hear;
Air catch'd, and length'ning back the mazy notes,
Curls, while the undulating music floats.
Earth lift'ning to inhale harmonious pain,
Sigh'd it in soft vibration back again.
Pardon a mourning muse that leaves with tears
The land that lov'd Germanicus endears;
But ah, what toils! what anguish shalt thou bear!
What endless labour must o'erload thy care!
Ere thy last views a taste like thine inspire,
And sparkling kingdoms catch thy manly fire!
Near operas fribling fugues what muse can stay,
Where wordless warblings winnow thought away;
Music when purpose points her not the road,
Charms to betray, and softens to corrode:
Empty of sense, the soul-seducing art
Thrills a slow poison to the sick'ning heart:
Soft sinks idea dissolute in ease,
And all life's feeble lesson is to please.
Spirit, and taste, and generous toil, take flight,
And lazy love, and indolent delight,
And low luxurious weariness of pain,
Lull the lost mind,—and all its powers are vain.
Hence to the realms of fame ye muses fly,
There to the drum's big beat the heart leaps high;
There sighing flutes but temp'ring martial heat,
Teach distant pity and revenge to meet;
The manly pipe there scorns th' expanded shakes,
That wind wav'd nothings, till attention akes;
There now concurring keys and chords increase,
The heart's soft social ties, and cherish peace;
Then trumpets answ'ring trumpets shrill and far,
Swell to the sounding wind th' inspiring war;
There the rous'd soul in exercise grows strong,
Nor pools to puddly foulness stopp'd too long:
Strength'ning and strengthned by the poet's fire,
There music's meaning voice exalts desire;
There harmony not drowns but quickens thought,
And fools unfeeling words by notes are caught.
Soft sigh'd the prince, for suff'ring music pain'd,
And Polyhymnia rising warm complain'd:
Deign to be told impartial, gen'rous, wise,
Why fruitless eloquence indignant flies;
Gall'd at lost time in cases vainly clear'd,
At truths untouching, and at sounds unheard;
Blushing, while oratory's lab'ring strains
On pre-decision waste derided pains;
And flourish'd periods to no purpose fine,
Like suns in desarts, without notice shine;
Hating grave insult, I disdain to stay,
Where talk but trifles, and where tropes but play:
If serious rhet'ric sweats where sneering mutes
Hast'ning the hurried question, crop disputes;
If law sells argument, yet forms must reign,
And custom pleading, equity is vain;
If the dark pulpit's short mysterious art,
Lifts faith to heav'n, and damns the moral heart;
Bear me, dishonour'd God! to some plain state,
Where truth, in spite of aye and no, is weight;
Where pleas of right a reas'ning bench persuade,
And justice scorns in precedent to trade;
Where no bold blasphemy would faith enslave,
But humble, honest, doubting works, can save.
Euterpe, watchful of her sister's close,
Snatch'd her sunk cadence, and impatient rose:
Pleasure, she cry'd, is mine, mine the gay skill,
To paint the fancy, and adorn the will.
But where dry avarice has taste betray'd,
Pleasure is robbery in masquerade;

Contending ſexes puſh one common aim,
And youth, and wit, and beauty, meet to game;
At cards to conquer, or at dice to ſweep,
Is all the humble joy the poliſh'd reap.
Or, if aſpiring to robuſter praiſe,
Some livelier genius warmth more active ſways;
Then frock'd in groomy fleekneſs, tight and ſmart,
The pert cap'd racer dares the jockey's art;
At ſtake and plate his ſkill profoundly ſhown,
He from his horſe's worth preſumes his own.
Or, nobly ſtung by John the coachman's claim,
Climbing th' advent'rous box, diſputes his fame;
Scatt'ring malignant duſt, cracks voice and thong,
Glows for a livery's right, and burns along:
Proudly diſplay'd, looks back, and ſhouts to find
Poor conſcious John, leſs glorious, hang behind.
Not ſo th' Olympian rivals charm'd of old,
When fiery youths in whirling chariots roll'd;
Then the watch'd ſignal bade the rank disjoin,
And ruſhing wheels diſſolv'd the breaking line:
Strain'd to th' expanded whip's impulſive ſound,
Light leap'd th' exulting axles o'er the ground,
'Twixt crowding nations, partial, panting, gay,
The prais'd, plum'd hero ſkim'd the leſs'ning way,
The ſmoking ſteeds obey'd the watchful rein,
And winding warlike, ſwept the ſhouting plain.
Now graceful rais'd, now pendent in career,
High and far-glitt'ring, ſhone the charioteer,
Firm in his ſeat, ſuperior in his mien,
Flew o'er the courſe, and flam'd along the green;
Martial in geſture, eminent in grace,
His birth and grandeur light'ning from his face.
Or, if to ſweeter conteſt match'd he mov'd,
Aud in ſome ball, led the kind hand he lov'd,
The modeſt fair, ſlow through the mazy dance,
Swam to the love-ſick ſoul in ſoft advance;
No light coarſe friſking kick'd off woman's air,
No ſtrong ſtretch'd limb out-trod attraction there,
Decent their pleaſures, and diſcreetly weigh'd,
Active the youth, and delicate the maid:
Honour by elegance its right maintain'd,
And thought correcting rapture, prudence reign'd.
Mournful Melpomene, with tragic frown,
Spoke next; and thus deplor'd a taſteleſs town.
Why ſtrove the ſcenic muſe to ſhine in vain,
Where wit is levity, and art is gain?
Where law's blind hope would curb corruption's rage,
Yet leſt undue contempt to taint the ſtage?
Hence theatres neglected into ſhame,
Catching at concourſe, purity diſclaim.
By pow'r deſerted, make their humbler court
To rake and rancour, or to fool and ſport:
Piqu'd to repriſal, unconfed'rate wit,
Noting the popular, evades the fit.
Then the play plots on ſtate-craft, laughs at truth,
Miſguides allegiance, or unſinews youth;
Thither crowds faction to be taught complaint,
Where pow'r, the martyr, might have reign'd the ſaint.
There wiſdom bleeds, by pleaſure's feath'ry dart,
And love's looſe hand unſtrings the ſlacken'd heart;
There diſcontent firſt tries her tim'rous force,
Hints and finds help and dares her dang'rous courſe;
There froth, farce, flatt'ry, chance, ſedition, ruſe;
And virtue ſcarce finds place in virtue's ſchool.
Farewell, forſaken ſtage—when courts refuſe
To urge wit's wand'ring rein, ſhe ſhames a muſe;
Hail, from afar! thou fate-foretelling light!
Beaming prognoſtic through the eye of night!
Kindling a hundred realms, th' enliv'ning flame
Wings the wak'd energy of courted fame.
There empire flaſhing into glory's blaze,
Conſcious intention bluſhes not at praiſe;
There ſpurring virtue, wit has leave to mean,
And pow'r exciting paſſion prompts the ſcene.
So muſt it be ere tragic fire is felt, [pelt,
But where grave thoughts are marks for fools to
Where tir'd illit'rate viewleſs yawning pride
Muſt hear unliſt'ning, and untaught decide,
There let loſt ſentiment miſpoint no beam,
To hope were blindneſs, and to wiſh a dream.
Up leap'd Thalia, glowing red with rage,
Fir'd and indignant at a farceful age;
Shall comedy's inſulted muſe, ſhe cry'd,
Hold hoops to tumblers———
She paus'd—unable to proceed;—ſigh'd ſtrong:
Repell'd the big diſdain—and trac'd her wrong.
Shall comedy for ſworded harlequin
Split lathes, and arm him for the mimic ſcene?
While he, proud impotence, with modiſh ſtrut,
Cocks bluff, diffuſive of his wooden cut:
Muſt ſhe ſwing gypſies o'er the winnow'd pit,
Mounting poſteriors in defect of wit;
Or clap ſome human whirlwind's bluſt'ring rage,
That o'er twelve heads deſcending ſhakes the ſtage.
Stare while th' unmanly reptile's wriggling twiſt
Threads the ſtarv'd ladder, and deſcends unhiſs'd?
Or, for the rope-aſpirer's jirkful tread,
Shall ſhe poiſe right their emblematic lead?
No---let implor'd expulſion wing me hence!
Far let me fly to ſome fair ſeat of ſenſe; [grace,
Where life's ſtoll'n humour glows with mirthful
And comic picture copies nature's face;
Where imag'd paſſion, dear to the polite,
Leaves low buffoon'ry to the rabble's right.
Tir'd, yet untaſk'd, let me no longer wait,
Laughing unheeded---at the laughing great;
While with the roar of boys to tricks they run,
Which mobs ſhould ſhout at, and the wiſe ſhould ſhun.
Gravely, good ſouls! reſerving ſolid ſcorn, [born.
For thoughts to feel whoſe force themſelves were
Warm'd in wit's cauſe, lamenting genius loſt,
Nor taſting ecſtaſy at judgment's coſt,
Liſt'ning Germanicus, with penſive grace,
Revolv'd with'd ſoft'nings for a pitied race;
When like a trumpet pouring muſic's flood,
Speaking Calliope thrill'd through his blood.
There was a prince! ah, bid me add, ere long
There is!---impulſive of the epic ſong.
Flame of imperial prominence he ſhin'd;
Terror at once, and charm of human kind!
All the ſoft praiſe of ſocial life his due:
All the rais'd pow'rs of arms and arts he knew;
Fearleſs, impell'd his father's fortune on;
And in youth's dawn a dazzling victor ſhone:
In force reſiſtleſs, yet undaring wrong;
Honeſt in vengeance, and in pity ſtrong.

Without dwelt war, in all her thund'ring din;
While peace in all her ſtillneſs wept within.
Form'd for a lover, for a thinker taught;
Bloodleſs reflective eminence he ſought:
Born to be greateſt, choſe but to be beſt;
But heav'n that knew his uſe, forbad his reſt:
Then from the calms of conqu'ring thought he roſe,
Glow'd in tempeſtuous war, and ſcorn'd repoſe.
Uncrown'd, gave crowns at will, their thorns untry'd;
And more than reigning, without reigning died.
Such, though the land I leave could ſhow me ſtill,
Calm ſeaſons call not for a pilot's ſkill.
Peace is the bleſſing commerce loves to chooſe;
But war and glory taſk the epic muſe.
Farewell, ſure ſubject of my future ſong.
When riſing ſhameful at a people's wrong,
In times yet diſtant, thy rememb'ring hand
Lets looſe correction at ſome foreign land.
Then loud as thy applauſe, reclaim us all;
And every muſe of nine ſhall wait thy call.
Speaking, ſhe roſe; and with her riſing flow,
Her eight ſad ſiſters, ſighing, turn'd to go.
Lively, upſtarting from his ſhadow'd ſeat,
Stay (cry'd the prince alarm'd)---ſuſpend retreat.
Juſt though your anger, yet revenge forbear;
Leſt taught by muſes, man forgets to ſpare.
Too ſoon degen'rate nature warps awry,
The bad to copy, and the good to fly.
Have you beheld wit's ſtream diſcolour'd glide,
And pour'd loſt azure on th' unconſcious tide?
Think the blame yours, who heav'n's beſt tincture bring,
To ſtain the current, yet neglect the ſpring.
Would you at once Cœrulean depth renew?
And gayly bright'ning flush th' improvement through?
High at the ſource th' infuſive tinge beſtow;
And ev'ry downward drop ſhall tinctur'd flow.
But while a vagrant inſpiration ſtrays,
And here and there unlicens'd pow'r diſplays;
Though ſep'rate individual ſtrollers ſhare
Some uncollective ſcatt'rings of your care;
This way and that though ſome faint hint of light
Gleams like a meteor, and ſhrinks back in night,
Or, ming'ling beams to form ſome deathleſs blaze,
Once in an age you Popes or Thomſons raiſe:
All the loſt labour ſerves but to expreſs
How wide our wants! how thinly we poſſeſs!
Till the day breaks expect no gen'ral glow;
For the ſky darken'd keeps all dark below.
Here for wit's fountain dream not of a court,
Falſe and injurious ſlight th' unweigh'd report.
Meant for a clime where thrones appropriate pow'r,
And one man's paſſions all mens rights devour.
But in free ſtates where liberty may chooſe,
Taſte knows no monarch, and obeys no muſe.
Senates their muſes, property their aim;
Their boaſt but ſafety—and their plaything fame.
No—would your willing culture waſte no toil?
Would your bays thrive in a reluctant ſoil?
Ductile of form, and changing ſhapes at will,
Aſſume new ſex, new names, new views, new ſkill.
Safe in ſage politics conceal your wit;
Then by my bounty qualify'd to ſit,
Nine Corniſh boroughs might aſſign you place,
Where mix'd unthought of you may ſhun diſgrace.
There, breathing unſuſpected influence lurk,
Till patient progreſs crowns your arduous work.
Thence ſhall deſcending radiance taſte convey;
And willing kingdoms make the muſes way.
Till time ſlow fav'ring you may quit diſguiſe,
And wear wit plain among th' unlaughing wiſe.
Pauſing, he ſmil'd humanity ſo kind, [mind:
That ev'ry muſe was touch'd, and chang'd her
All bow'd conſent to his grave purpoſe wrought;
And thus Uranla voic'd her ſiſter's thought.
Born to a people's hearts, their darling ſhine;
Let ev'ry wiſh, and hope, and joy, be thine.
Mov'd by the magic mercy of thy view,
We feel good counſel, and embrace it too.
One ſole condition grant, and we obey;
No dang'rous notice muſt detect our ſtay.
Hid in thy grove, each menial muſe ſhall claim
Domeſtic ſhelter from reproach and ſhame;
Till by thy ſcheme their yet unrivall'd friend,
Their influence widens, and their ſuff'rings end.
Then ſhown the world, and privileg'd to pleaſe,
And gath'ring face and faſhion by degrees,
Seen at aſſemblies belles may jokes forbear;
Nor ſhocking modeſt ſtrangers turn and ſtare!
Thus, in his ſhade from public pain exempt,
Sleeping, the viſionary poet dreamt. [there;
Then wak'd, and found his ſparkling prince was
But ev'ry empty muſe was loſt in air.

CAMILLUS: A POEM.

Humbly inſcribed to the Right Honourable Charles Earl of Peterborough and Monmouth. Written in the year 1707.

When injur'd heroes ſuffer in their fame,
Juſtice unſummon'd ſhould their wrongs proclaim:
But Phœbus' ſon ſhould raiſe reſentment higher,
And light up vengeance with poetic fire.
For where injuſtice clouds a noble name,
The patron's ſcandal is the poet's ſhame.
Permit, great Sir, my humble muſe to raiſe
A private monument of public praiſe:
Unbend your mighty ſoul, and ſtoop to fame,
Whoſe voice ſhall ſound to heaven your glorious name.
Minds that are great like yours diſdain applauſe,
Their inborn virtue gives their reaſon laws:
Above the reach of malice bleſt they live,
Proud to be envy'd, and like heaven forgive.
What depth of line muſt my rais'd fancy find,
To ſound th' unfathom'd ocean of thy mind!
Or through the lab'rinth of thy wonders wind!
How dares my untry'd pen attempt a verſe,
Worthy thy godlike actions to rehearſe?
How dares my ſtutt'ring muſe invade that ſky,
Where Virgil, eagle-wing'd, would fail to fly?
Dark in my breaſt tumultuous terrors roll,
And riſing paſſions ſhake my lab'ring ſoul:
Encount'ring reaſons through my judgment ſhine,
Some urge and ſome forbid the vaſt deſign:

Here juſtice ſummons---there my youth denies;
Duty to this, to that my will replies.
Reſolv'd at laſt you ſafe return to greet,
I throw my worthleſs numbers at your feet;
Aſſur'd the generous goodneſs of your eye
Will ſee my zeal, and paſs my errors by.
But if my feeble genius chance to fail,
Nor ardent pray'rs can with the nine prevail;
Think, Sir, how various your great acts appear!
There war and glory---wit and honour here:
One glitt'ring moment ſpreads your wond'rous fame,
Battles and bloodſhed celebrate your name.
Now the great hero in a purple flood
Plunges through ſtormy ſeas of hoſtile blood.
Now ſtrides with ſkilful courage from afar,
To ſtop ſome gap of unſucceſsful war:
Another moment ſmoothly gilds his face
With lovely ſweetneſs and delightful grace:
Calmly he tunes his mind to ſofter ſports,
And lives the matchleſs paragon of courts.
No wonder then if my preſumptuous eye,
Viewing thy ſun of excellence too nigh,
Dazzled with light, is forc'd to look awry!
A traveller, who thus without a guide,
O'er ſome unmeaſur'd tract attempts to ride;
Where thouſand paths of equal breath appear,
And each fair courſe ſeems ſafe alike to ſteer,
May ſpite of ſtricteſt caution loſe his way,
And ſcarce be juſtly ſaid to go aſtray.
In peace the fam'd Hiſpania long had ſlept,
And free poſſeſſion of her Indies kept:
Made poor by plenty, dull content ſhe knew,
Her ſtrength declining as her riches grew;
Till forc'd to valour ſhe begins too late,
And climbs unwilling but to pull down fate.
Their ſecond Charles reſign'd his princely breath,
And ſwift-wing'd fame proclaim'd th' expected death:
Sudden the trumpet echoes from afar,
And friendly nations riſe to furious war:
The hardy veterans their arms prepare,
And waving banners fan the heated air:
The ſprightly ſteeds with lofty bounds advance,
And curb'd by ſkillful riders proudly prance:
A wild confuſion o'er the globe is hurl'd,
And warlike earthquakes ſhake the Chriſtian world.
The Auſtrian prince, heir in affirm'd deſcent,
To graſp the crown his ſtrong endeavours bent:
Bourbon oppos'd, and in the vacant throne
Would place a royal offspring of his own.
Doubtful the right---but pow'r which all obey,
Appear'd to juſtify the ſecond's ſway:
The arms of France allure the voice of Spain,
And Anjou ſeated will his poſt maintain.
Sighing the young prevented Auſtrian ſtands,
And lifts to gracious heaven his eyes and hands;
Implores ſwift juſtice to an injur'd man;
And heaven directs his prayers to heaven's vicegerent Anne.
Thither they fly whom pow'ful wrongs oppreſs,
And find a certain ſhelter from diſtreſs:
By her the proud aſpirer daily bleeds,
And biaſs'd monarchs wait her dreaded deeds.
Aw'd though diſpleas'd, to her decrees they ſtand,
And own the fate of Europe in her hand.

Thither with tow'ring hopes and longing eyes,
The young excluded monarch ſwiftly flies;
Whiſpers in Anna's ear his weighty grief,
And from her pitying ſoul extracts relief.
At her command th' intrepid Britons fly,
Exert their inborn worth, and proudly die:
Pleas'd with their fate they dearly ſell their breath,
And ſmile amidſt the raging pangs of death.
A choſen band of theſe who all things dare,
For diſtant war their mighty ſouls prepare:
Through ev'ry ear their glorious cauſe they ring
To curb proud France, and right an injur'd king.
O'er theſe a chief by art and nature grac'd,
Renown'd in war and policy was plac'd;
Beyond mankind his judgment could diſcern,
And much improve what others could not learn:
He ow'd no virtue to a dread of ſhame,
No ſeeming honeſty to promis'd fame:
On its own baſe in him true honour ſtood,
Waſh'd by a generous tide of noble blood.
Him the great Anna choſe---Camillus go
Revenge my brother on his haughty foe;
Guard him to Spain---there let my will be known,
And ſeat the monarch in his raviſh'd throne.
The valiant chief without ambition brave,
Humbly receiv'd the weighty charge ſhe gave:
Deſtin'd in ſpite of malice to be great,
His daring ſoul contemns the tricks of ſtate:
Swiftly he bids his glad commanders meet,
And lead their army to the waiting fleet.
Their ſwelling hopes the ſwelling gales invite,
And heaven and they propitiouſly unite;
In loud ſalutes the deep-mouth'd cannons roar,
Anſwer'd by zealous wiſhes from the ſhore:
Whence mingled crowds their hearty prayers repeat,
Till riſing waves obſcure the ſailing fleet.
On the extremeſt limits of that land,
Through which the Tagus rich in golden ſand,
His rapid courſe in depths of waters bends,
And twice two hundred miles his ſtream extends;
Old Barcelona ſtrong by nature ſtands,
And rules a vaſt extent of fertile lands:
With rocky mountains half environ'd round,
The other half by bogs and marſhy ground:
Beneath her walls ſurrounding trenches lie,
Beyond thoſe depths riſe bulwarks vaſtly high:
Walls within walls the ſolid place defend,
Where watchful centinels their charge attend:
Whence trains of hollow braſs with fiery breath,
Vomit black ſulph'rous meſſages of death;
Ramm'd with deſtruction, burſt with horrid roar,
And ſcatter'd terrors round the trembling ſhore.
Hither with crowded ſails the Britons bent,
Big with the meſſage their great miſtreſs ſent.
Their warlike ſouls to emulation riſe,
And breathe out pious wiſhes to the ſkies:
And now thoſe powers which brave deſigns attend,
Had brought their voyage to a happy end.
From Barcelona's tow'rs with wild affright,
The trembling foe beholds th' unwelcome ſight;
A mighty fleet approaching by degrees,
In graceful order ploughs the ſmiling ſeas;
Harmonious muſic ſpreads the joy they bring,
And clam'rous ſhouts proclaim the coming king:

The ſounding trumpets his intent declare,
And waving ſtreamers flouriſh in the air:
Arriv'd at length the cannons loudly roar,
And ſhake with panic fright the wond'ring ſhore.
Mean while the Spaniards all their force prepare,
And arm confus'dly for defenſive war:
Blind with amazement and ignoble fear,
They double all the Britons that appear:
All think with horror England now had bent
Her utmoſt force, to form one grand deſcent.
But when they ſaw ſo ſmall a number land,
And boldly tread the ſurface of their ſand,
The paler marks of fear forſook their face,
And wonder far more great ſupplies the place.
An equal force within their walls they found,
Yet fear'd to meet their foes on equal ground:
They ſaw, with wonder at an act ſo vain,
Th' undaunted Britons win the neighb'ring plain,
Where ſoon their ſquadrons form'd a camp, and then [men.
They thought or dreaded they were more than
Thus had the great Camillus forc'd his way,
And void of fear in midſt of dangers lay:
Impatient of delays, the Auſtrian youth,
Deep-touch'd with ſorrow, liſten'd to the truth;
He ſaw the weakneſs of his daring few,
And with concern his foe's advantage knew:
The brazen tubes of death were mounted high,
And clouds of rolling ſmoke obſcur'd the ſky;
All this and more from his ſmall camp was ſeen,
And death diſguis'd with horror ſtalk'd between.
The aged chiefs in cautious war grown old,
Would rather be too backward than too bold:
Therefore adviſ'd the prince to haſte away,
Since 'twas ſcarce poſſible to live and ſtay.
The prince with melancholy thoughts oppreſt,
Came to Camillus and unlock'd his breaſt;
Told him the pangs of ſorrow, ſhame, and rage,
Which ſhook the blooming comforts of his age:
Told him the flames in which his ſoul would burn,
Should he thus unſucceſsfully return.
With grief the gen'rous Briton heard him tell
The deep misfortunes he but knew too well:
He rolls his eyes, accuſes partial fate,
And tells the Auſtrian that he ſhould be great.
Reſolv'd to act, the council ſpeak in vain,
And by debates protract the fall of Spain:
Camillus had a ſoul whoſe heavenly fire
Could compaſs all things, and to all aſpire.
Himſelf alone could with himſelf debate,
And mov'd obſcurely like the hand of fate.
Hard by the towers of Barcelona ſtands,
High on the rocks o'erlooking neighb'ring lands,
A ſtrong-built caſtle, whoſe extended ſway
Obliges ev'n the city to obey.
Five hundred men the ſolid ramparts keep,
On rocks beyond imagination ſteep:
Whence rolling ſtones invading foes can chaſe,
When with an aching eye they climb the dreadful place.
This was the ſource whence victories muſt flow,
Hither the Britiſh chief reſolv'd to go:
Unus'd to fear, and more unus'd to boaſt,
With temp'rate words he cheer'd his wond'ring hoſt;
Strove not to hide the hazard of the taſk,
Nor cover danger with a gilded maſk:
He bids each ſoldier like himſelf perform,
And by example wins 'em to the ſtorm.
The roſy morning uſher'd in the ſun,
Which was to ſee a bloody buſineſs done;
His beams ſhone bright to guide the battle well,
And drank their blood in pity as it fell:
Eight hundred Britons on this glorious day,
O'er pathleſs foreſts force their oblique way;
In tedious march o'er high aſcents they paſt,
And won the dangerous precipice at laſt.
With ſtrange ſurpriſe the Spaniards ruſh to arms,
And bells rung backward in confus'd alarms:
The ſummon'd ſoldiers hurry'd to their poſt,
And pour whole vollies on the climbing hoſt:
Repeated charges from the cannons fly,
Like fiery meteors blazing through the ſky:
The ſhatter'd limbs of men who nobly dare,
Are borne on bullets through the flaming air:
The diſmal proſpect ſhocks the braveſt hearts,
And adds new motion to disjointed parts;
The brave Camillus with a fierce delight,
Drives on the headlong fury of the fight;
Urges his bleeding troops ſtill higher and higher,
And ſcatters death for death, and fire for fire.
Thus, when of old the mighty giants ſtrove
To check the boundleſs power of angry Jove;
With force like this, but in a cauſe leſs good,
The huge Briareus, their great leader, ſtood;
The ſolid centre ſhakes beneath his weight,
Who, all-unknowing, or unfearing fate,
Kicks at the thunder which with horror flies;
And while ſwift lightning flaſhes in his eyes,
Tears up a hundred rocks and hurls 'em at the ſkies.
But now aloft the mingled war grows high,
On heaps promiſcuous numbers fall and die;
Rivers of blood from the mix'd battle flow,
Till death ſcarce ſees to guide a deſtin'd blow.
The walls are won, the Spaniards loſe the day,
And crowding Britons win the cover'd way:
While ſome on high the conquer'd paſs defend,
Others below by mutual help aſcend:
No more the driven foes their fortune try,
But quit their bloody battlements and fly:
Deſpair and horror fill the diſmal place,
And terror ſits enthron'd on every face.
Deſtructive fate grows cruel to exceſs,
And rages blindly in her blackeſt dreſs:
Matrons and virgins weep with bitter cries,
And noiſy ſorrows pierce the diſtant ſkies.
But ceaſe, miſtaken wretches! ceaſe your moan,
Proud of your conqu'ror your conqueſt own;
Your friends victorious might tyrannic be,
Your foes but conquer you to ſet you free.
No baſe deſign diſtains a Briton's cauſe,
But pity guides the ſword which juſtice draws.
With ſuch ſucceſs was that great day begun,
Which not the army but their general won:
While he impatient his great taſk to end,
Which heaven appear'd ſo early to befriend,
Cheers his glad ſoldiers with divided gain,
And leads 'em down undreading to the plain

Ranges 'em widely near the city's bound,
Resolv'd to force a place they scarce surround.
Thus moves he brightly like some wand'ring star,
And scorns the heavy arts of common war:
In their own fire his matchless actions blaze;
He needs no counsel, and he seeks no praise:
While other generals tedious projects form,
He thinks and acts, and wins applause by storm;
With furious courage stands and tempts his fate,
But heaven still spares the man to bless the state.
With threat'ning look each ready Briton stands,
And sharp-edg'd weapons grace their warlike hands;
Obsequious silence waits the general's nod,
As ancient Grecians watch'd the Delphian god.
Mean while, each trembling tow'r with horrid dread,
Loosen'd its walls and shook its batter'd head:
The lofty works which should the town defend,
The shocks of hostile thunder widely rend;
Amidst these crowds of terror and despair,
The Britons for a sharp assault prepare;
The Spaniards see and shun the louring fates,
And widely open their submissive gates.
And now the mighty deed is greatly done;
A king reliev'd, and kingdoms bravely won.
The warlike chief, with glory fir'd his breast,
Forgot his pleasures and forsook his rest;
The Austrian fix'd—He bravely onward bent,
And conquer'd rebel countries as he went:
The stubborn Catalans unus'd to bow,
Gladly submit to firm subjection now.
With joyful shouts their happy monarch greet,
And leave their mountains for the regal seat;
That strong-built fort whose state the rest excell'd,
And thrice ten thousand Gallic foes repell'd,
Afraid to strive, her iron gates unlock'd,
And gladly open'd when Camillus knock'd.
To his successful arms whole nations yield,
And freely give him up an untry'd field.
At his bless'd feet the rich Tortosa lay,
And matchless conduct gain'd him Lerida.
Valencia's kingdom gloriously he won,
And triumph'd o'er the prostrate Arragon.
But hold, unwary muse! no higher soar;
He who did this, alas, must do no more!
Oh that thy numbers could but reach my aim,
How would I celebrate his glorious name!
How would I paint the battles he has won,
And all the noble actions he has done!
How would I paint him spilling gen'rous blood,
And tempting death for his dear country's good!
How would I drag his two illustrious sons,
Proud of their mangled flesh and shatter'd bones!
How would I tune my elevated song,
And shame the men who do Camillus wrong!
But since his works through clouds are forc'd to shine,
How could I hope success from such as mine?
Let virtue be rewarded if it can,
When gratitude forgets so great a man.

FREE THOUGHTS UPON FAITH:

OR, THE RELIGION OF REASON.

Oh Thou! who'er, whate'er, where'er thou art,
Sole—or associated—conceiveless power!
In search of whom o'erstretch'd idea burns;
And sense rolls back on darkness—cause unsaus'd!
Progressive unbeginner—without end!
Giver of thought, oh guide it.—Arm a mind,
Tremblingly struck,—to stem but one short glimpse,
One distant, transient, momentary flash
Of thy keen light—and live!—oh, far from dream
To draw th' Almighty's deign'd approach too near—
All that my soul's touch'd sense aspires to tell
Is, that she dares not view thee, thou who know'st
The muse's conscious rev'rence, aid her song.
Awfully shrinking from th' assumer's hand,
That points me to thy place, thy power, thy will,
Astonish'd at his pride! I start—and fly.
O pitier of presumption! whence aspires
Awak'ning dust's brief glance of shadowy life,
To launch its little plummet---into depths
Profounder than Eternity!—how dare
O'erweening, mole-blind furrowers of dark earth
Engross to their low selves, their Gods whole care?
Slight nobler orbs, as skirts to this dim ball,
That day by day rolls round its eyeless bulk,
To beg light's needful alms from one kind sun,
While tracts superior to conception's bound,
See suns in millions o'er new worlds pour blaze,
Yet reach but confines of new suns, and die.
Require not these vast works of God, God's grace
Proportion'd to their vastness?—how then dares
Conceit's proud pref'rence of its own clay'd cott
O'erleap those azure voids, where thought, and space,
And number, and immensity, are lost,
And comprehension aches to scale repulse!
Whence had man's insect arrogance of guess
Such impotent outstarting, to presume
His momentary nothingness of grasp
Could know, task, limit, and describe his God!
Say, bigot boaster of unmanner'd zeal,
Thou that art impudently sure of heaven!
And, cov'ring blasphemy behind faith's name,
Sinn'st deepest where most sanctified!---weigh, pause,
Think---answer not from custom's light assent,
But the try'd soul's true test unwarp'd within.
Is it in revelation's awful claim [will
That dust should dare misplead th' Almighty's
For insult on his justice? Dare men pass
For intimates of heaven, who thus degrade
Th' all-gladd'ning Lord of all those wid'ning worlds
To one poor partial care of one poor part
Of one poor corner of one world's poor clan?
Out with this av'rice of fanatic scrape!
That, pinching to itself God's nibbled grants
Hedg'd in th' Eternal's common! Greedily
Forestall'd all power of op'ning mystery's gate
For its own pick-lock tribe, unkey'd by heaven.
Why, if enlighten'd most, should will most dark
Bid these few fav'rite handled spies of grace
Conceal from modest doubt their arts to know?
Why, if possess'd of some eductive clue,
That shews lost diffidence truth's lucid ray,
Claim they consent implicit? Why submits
Belief to bold assumption?---Tasteless faith

Dishonours where it worships. Heaven disdains
Obedience from the blind: and every sect
Were orthodox, if to believe is proof.
To me---nor let the rev'rence of my pause
Offend the power that caus'd it! it should seem
More impious to decide of God than doubt.
Oft when I pant for aid to shake distrust,
Humbling imperious reason; while I bend
With meek attention to the calls of faith,
Where pious fury lends the pastor gall;
And what falls short in proof o'erflows in rage.
While revelation, thund'ring on my ear, [ven!
Low-rates my heart's admission, help me, Hea-
To check th' impassive struggler's infelt hint,
That asks how God's almighty? if his will
Who made this captious world whereon we crawl
Could to the worm call'd man be shown in vain.
If 'twas the Maker's law to man proclaim'd,
By man's resistless God, my trembling soul
Whispers in shiv'ring horror! Oh 'tis strange!
God will'd---God spoke that will---yet man--- proud dirt!
Divides, disputes, examines, disobeys!
Had Heav'n requir'd, could Heav'n want force
to cause?
Or, not requiring, why was Heav'n profan'd?
Hum from thy dusky hive, unreas'ning drone,
Stretch thy tame wings, heave thy dull search
along, [wide.
Leave thy cav'd home behind, and look more
Seest thou not every where earth's emmet swarms,
Scheming their busy mount's loose crumbling hope
For the next cataract shower, that sweeps down
all.
Such are the toils of Mustis, Popes, Pauwaus,
Lhamas and Rabbis, Morabuhts, Bonzees,
All the long-labouring props of faith's lost boast,
Fabrics of tow'ry air, that fright and die.
O'er worships thus distinct have sep'rate gods
Presided? or beneath but sep'rate names
Did one sole power inspire divided prayers,
And smilingly accept 'em? Nature feels
This question; and methinks I hear her voice
Bid reason thus reply---If but one light
Insur'd salvation's course, unsocketed,
Unlanthern'd, it had known no curtail'd shine.
All dark had been illumin'd:---ne'er with-held
Just Heaven, from more than half th' ex'tended globe, [caus'd.
All glimpse of dawn, yet curs'd the gloom he
Or, grant some race indulg'd with kinder smile,
Why partial to the proud, sin's haughtiest sons?
Yet heedless of unfolded flocks, more meek,
More aw'd, more simply serious, in faith's field,
Anxious in adoration's twilight gleam,
And prostrate, though neglected. Why again
In truth's appropriate and selected seats
Shoots Eden's heaven-watch'd tree, for ever prun'd,
For ever fruitless, into monstrous growths
Of thorn-branch'd oppolition? If to doubt
Religion's lifeless form were to destroy
The essence of her purpose, why o'er lands
That boast high claims to systems heav'n inspir'd,
Spread schemes of diff'rent texture? Each avow'd
God's own enjoin'd sole path reveal'd to save.

Alas! 'tis man's proud heart, that, idly fill'd
With self-paid rev'rence for desert misclaim'd,
Grown impious in imagin'd rectitude,
Hugs his own day-dreams, idoliz'd within,
And styles 'em revelation! Hence the buz
Of honeyless and stingful wasps of zeal,
Alike on all sides heard, and felt on all! [hell!
Each charg'd in heaven's pretence with menac'd
Jews, Tartars, Bramins, bord'ring Ganges flood,
Swift hoards of hot Arabia's swarthy sons,
Far China's dateless race, long Nile's old claim
To superstition's childhood. Each heav'n's choice,
Yet each from each distinct, all spurn'd by all,
Split revelation into canton'd snarls,
And murder to show mercy; damn to save!
Ev'n these divisions, subdividing on, [points,
Break from their centre like the wind's wide
Yet every radius right, and every wrong;
All err---but each---peace be to that alone;
The rest let war involve, and curse their creeds.
Where art thou found, fair charity? sweet
power
That stills the stormy soul! soft cherub's eye!
That weep'st at all this mischief---sceest man's pride
Mistaken for his virtue; arguing low
In the calm voice of pity's whisp'ring God,
The od'rous breathings of thy balmy hush
Fly scatter'd on the winds of keen debate.
Lost and benighted in this warring wild,
How shall a lightless wand'rer find which front
Bears heav'n's commission'd stamp? and which bold brow,
Fright'ning credulity, miscals it faith?
Bid miracles decide contested claim.
Where are they? call aloud; they shun to hear.
Prudent restraint forbids expectant prayer
To court renewal of old eye-sight proofs, [dumb.
Which deign'd in days long past to strike doubt
Dead time's departed ghost recorded holds
Millions of wonders done---Faith's grey supports
—But millions of pretences too diffus'd
O'er earth's contentious face, each unlike each,
As night's dim veil compar'd with sun-gilt day.
Match miracles 'gainst miracles array'd,
And push back ev'ry angel's vain descent
Who comes on errands hostile to their own.
Where miracles try truth no faith is false.
What nameless corner of the world, untouch'd
By trade's far-furrowing keel, even safely new
To the unquenchable and sacred thirst
Of missionary rapine's holy ken,
But boast believ'd descent of some kind God
That chose their lov'd forefathers, blest their race,
And taught 'em for his glory? Fill'd with trust
In their transmitted tale, th' invited guests
Take place at heaven's high table, upmost all.
The white-fac'd, olive-hu'd, the sably jet,
The grease-anointed, woolly-headed, shorn, [elect,
Long-hair'd and short-hair'd, curl'd and cropt
All sagely satisfied, all else must err—
Swol'n with inflative zeal, catch martyrs flame,
And die, to live again in scorn of pain.
Since then th' extremest polar tracts of faith,
Where reason's one eye winks unbeam'd for day,

Plead miracles in proof which none can try,
Becauſe but heard, not ſeen, let learning ſhun
Such hoary feebleneſs of palſied plea,
Which error muſt aſſert, or truth diſclaim.
But off! ſtand wide, make room, ye coarſe profane!
Ye vulgar of religion's ſuburb world!
Ye goats unſhepherded! unſiſh'd-for ſhoals!
Unmelch'd by myſtics union's indragg'd net
Of never-erring ſweep, deduc'd from heaven!
Room for the papal pontiff's triple crown!
Now, heretic preſumer! bow, convinc'd
Infallibility unwinds her ſcroll:
Saints, martyrs, angels, ſeventeen cent'ries down
Link power to power, and, length'ning truth's old rod,
Lend faith tradition's line to hook mankind.
Hail, venerable weakneſs! awful dream!
Shade of a ſhadow! thou that blindly hop'ſt,
By twice nine age's loud-concurring noiſe,
To drown ſoft reaſon's evidence, yet ſhun'ſt
To recollect how thrice ten cent'ries join'd
Their vain ſupport, yet ſaw Jove's fabric fall.
Plead'ſt thou duration? plead'ſt thou breadth of ſpace?
What art thou but an infant's tott'ring ſtep,
Compar'd to mightier growths now ſound no more?
Where are the deities of muſe-tongu'd Greece?
Greece, from whoſe hundred ſtates ſtrong ſcience flow'd;
And arms and arts in one mix'd blaze of power
Held out high freedom's torch to half mankind!
Where is her Phœbus? where her Neptune now?
Turn thy ſight eaſtward o'er the time-huſh'd plains, [o'er
Now graves of vaniſh'd empire, once gleam'd
From flames on hallow'd altars, hail'd by hymns
Of ſeers, awakeners of the worſhip'd ſun.
Aſk ſilent Tigris---bid Euphrates tell [frown
Where is the grove-crown'd Baal, to whoſe ſtern
Bow'd haughty Babylon? Chaldea, fam'd
For ſtar-taught ſages; hard Phœnicia's ſons,
Fierce, fear-ſurmounting, curbers of the deep,
Who ſtretch'd a floating ſceptre o'er the ſeas,
And made mankind one empire? Where is now
Egypt's wide-homag'd Iſis? where the Mars
That ſhook the ſhakers of the Roman world?
Where the Teutonic Woden?---in his name
Alone ſtill reverenc'd each revolving week
Even in fair Albion's iſles.---If age bore proof,
Why have theſe ſunk? why all the lifeleſs gods,
Loſt demi-gods, long, nameleſs, countleſs, powers
That fill'd th' adoring world with fabled fame?
Are they not dead? whelm'd o'er in time's black tide?
And known but by contempt to mem'ry's claim?
How was this poſſible, had noiſe beep proof
Of faith's extent in ſpace, with realms for guard,
Mellow'd miſtake to equity? Far ſhort
Of heaven falls time's perſpective---vainly climbs
Guile-founded god-craft. Let proud fortune ſpread
The lie-tipt pyramid's broad covering baſe,
Till earth groans wounded at th'oppreſſive weight,
Still but the wider ruins mark its fall.

Let him who boaſts blind multitudes convinc'd,
Or builds on time for truth's imagin'd teſt,
Aſk his unjudging raſhneſs what rent heart
Of Celtic druid but had ſhook more bow'd [ſhade
Than his ſtorm-lab'ring oak, could ſome pale
That ſcann'd futurity, pointing through fate,
Have ſhown him his inſulted Godhead's doom?
Nor let vain pref'rence of our own touch'd ſenſe,
Our own ſeen ſurer light, our own ſafe truſt,
Degrading ancient ſtubbornneſs in faith, [ſtrong.
O'er-rate attachment's warmth, as now moſt
What aw'd allegiance, what more firm belief,
What haughtier fureneſs more imprints the ſoul,
By modern truth's new caſt of thought inſpir'd,
Than ſway'd the ſolemn Pagan's breaſt, of old,
When bow'd before his idols?—Idols, (now)—
But (then)—vindictive gods, who ſhook mankind.
Where are faith's certainties—if time's beſt boaſts,
Sacred to arts, arms, numbers, learning—all!—
All fam'd beyond fate's dread, ſound all unſure?
Whence then the imperious poſitive diſdain,
That ſpurns back modeſt doubt—and damns debate?
Where the foundation of that holy ſcorn,
Which lifts the bigot's brow, to ſcowl reproach?
To pity ſects that hurl his pity back,
And hate him—for his hatred?—If nor time,
Nor numbers who ſuſtain'd the atteſted cauſe,
Nor miracles renown'd in reverend hords,
So awful that no ſacrilegious mouſe
Dare ſatiate hunger on the duſt-veil'd roll,
But dies to leave untouch'd the dry record—
If evidence like theſe falls ſhort of proof,
Where in what dark domain, of thought's deep maze, [drawn,
Shall reaſon—through doubt's crooked windings
Find truth's white face unſpotted?—think, and tell.
What if we ſeek her in man's moral walks?
Judge her by life's try'd practice!—what more juſt,
Than to conclude, the ſaint's uncenſur'd deeds
Lend ſanction, to his doctrine?---here, methinks,
Truth loves to chooſe her teſt. Yet here (again)
We wander-- into new deſect of plea, [life
That proves too much---or nothing.---Cou'd looſe
Infer falſe faith,---how ſtain'd even Chriſtian zeal!
Where avarice and revenge, and pride's big bloat,
Taught guilt's blood-colour'd hat to hint church ſpleen: [riſe,
Whence murders, robb'ries, treach'ries, perj'ries,
Like taints effluvient from infectious fens,
Diſpeopling in their progreſs!---unaton'd,
Till death-bed ſanctity abſolves remorſe,
By ſcar'd conformity to faith's flat modes---
To mock'ries of belief---and rotes of prayer.
Since then bad life muſt leave no ſtain on faith,
Try if life's purity refines coarſe creeds?
Try if the good man's virtues church his claim?
No---if they cou'd--then pole from pole but bounds
Th' extenſive true-nam'd church's general pale.
Dreadful indeed were (then) th' excluder's power!

Then---excommunication's reachful hand
Had push'd off exiles to new worlds---ere dead!
For this had all been church---one truth's known claim: [mopes,
Turks, Jews, wild Afra's wood-men---India's
Who pine in pangful abstinence from sin,
And shudder but to crush the trodden fly:
Australia's art untasting solitudes,
Where all ambition's wealth is ease from care;
And hope's consumptive diet starves desire:
Columbia's many peopled bow'ry groves,
Fanning in feath'ry pomp her tawny tribes,
From the sun's down-driven ray:—cold Zembla's cots,
Of fish-fed shiv'rers furr'd in shaggy mail,
Trampling the ice-bound ocean whiten'd o'er
With endless snows, to spoil the spoilful bear:
All among these who love not vice, draw claim
From lives of simplest sanctity---to heaven:
And multiply th' elect---were virtue faith.
Pause here encompass'd soul. Look round, reflect.
Engulf'd and central to this whirl of tides,
With each proud vortex threat'ning---all to shun
Seems safer than trust itself. Hark! they roar.
Look with what rage they whiten!---All foam sure:
All climb to drown each other. None recede:
None conquer. Universal uproar reigns---
And faith's a fighting chaos---is this truth?
This revelation's word disclos'd by heaven?
Boldly refuse consent---it cannot be.
What then must be believ'd?---believe God kind---
To fear, were to offend him. Fill thy heart
With his felt laws: and act the good he loves.
Rev'rence his power. Judge him but by his works:
Know him but in his mercies. Rev'rence too,
The most mistaken schemes that mean his praise.
Rev'rence his priests---for every priest is his,---
Who finds him in his conscience---by what name
So-e'er distinguish'd---howsoe'er misdrawn,
They deviously believe---what though they preach
Perdition to the mod'rate! truth dares owe
Respect to error: if its end is grace,
And aims at reformation. Mindful yet,
Men are but men. Where most thou trust'st beware.
Stretch not esteem to homage: be nor slave,
Nor censurer: but hear strong reason's voice,
Tongu'd by the power who loves it. And since that
Cries liberty too loud for law to drown,
Free thy chain'd thought from fears unworthy God,
And know him for himself---were one prim form,
One forc'd identity the maker's wish,
Ne'er had that wish prov'd frustrate. Dare not doubt [pels,
But he, whose will was power---whose wish com-
Had moulded all to that one form he lov'd.
Loves he not unity? he does.---But know,
The unity God loves, is lodg'd in mind.
'Tis the heart's conscious glow---that beats to thank,
Not scrutinize his bounty. 'Tis the chain,
That links intention---in one warmth of will:
Not binds to one forc'd act, of outward form.
Thus thinking,---thou wilt feel the Godhead right:
Uncloſing in a house of jointed stone,
Him in whose temple twenty thousand suns
Serve but as lamps---and all their spangly worlds
Form footsteps to his altar——this believe:
And dread no vengeance on mistaken man,
Unadequate to man's brief power in sin,
Offending grain of animated dust! [fire!
'Gainst him, beneath whose smile the stars catch
Fill'd with ideas thus becoming Heaven,
Pity the hag-ridd'n quiv'rer who contracts
To superstition's gloom religion's joy,
And humbles adoration into dread.
Who ekeing his inch'd measure from within,
Peeps through his narrow soul's dim loop-hole wink,
And insolently by his own scale takes
The altitude of heaven. But, if compell'd
To lend thy patient ear,---and press'd too hard,
By self-sufficiency of teazing faith,
—That—nothing knowing,—will be sure of all—
Hear, with dumb smile: and ask'd why reason's range
Acquits dissention---teach thy judging eye
To read God's answer in his works for man:
Where do they tell thee, fameness was his choice?
How various are his creatures! various all,
His animal, his vegetable tribes:
Earth's, air's, wide ocean's products---all unlike.
In qualities, forms, colours, diff'rent all. [fields,
---Tread but th' enamell'd mead---or o'er yon
'Twixt the wind-waving corn indent thy way.
Or partial to the garden's painted proofs,
Lend there thy first pleas'd nothing---snuff this air:
How numberless the scents, yet each distinct,
Of every tree's known bloom---lean o'er these flow'rs---
Lowliest, yet loveliest! excellence depress'd!
Worth trod on by despisers! short-liv'd sweets!
How oppositely soft the streak-touch'd shades,
That tinge their fragrant families!---turn short,
From pity due, to life so lov'd, so brief!
Wish'd long, by ev'ry short'ner!---now look out,
On yon fair op'ning plain---there herb meets herb,
All green---yet none resembling! shades less deep,
Touch lights more soft'ning: feastful to the eye,
That dwells on their distinctions!---still new glows
Diversify the verdure's fluid surge:
And dance delightful to the breezy bend!
Next, up this steepy shelve ascending slow,
Win we the Down's high top---whose carpet mound
Ends at the jutting cliff, that shades the shore,
Hence to the wing-divided air extend
Survey's charm'd outlet---o'er this upper sea,
Where meditation founders,---flights immense
Cross-cut the winnow'd æther. Black, white, gray,
Red, blue, brown, golden, verdant, motley-stain'd,
Distant in size as colours!---'mongst 'em all,

None looks nor calls like other. No ſweet bird,
That beats the pathleſs void, but pours new notes,
Diſtinct from every plumy rival's ſong.
Stop thy endanger'd foot. Recal the range
Of thy recovering eye--bend o'er the brow
Of this touch'd precipice: and hence look down,
Where the broad ſea ſcarce heard, rolls murmuring in.
Ponder the deep's dumb legions---infinite
Their numbers! ſtill more infinite their ſhapes,
Bulks, movements!---ſwift, ſlow, timid, fierce, horn'd, barb'd,
Coatleſs, finn'd, ſcaly, ſhell'd, wing'd, motionleſs:
All diff'ring---till immenſity grows tir'd
To note their changeful natures!---can it be,
That he who fill'd each crowded element,
With unreſembling ſons of endleſs change---
Peopled each puny drop with varied ſtates---
Each leaf, with new-ſhap'd nations, too minute
To dread ambition's ravage---veil'd each path
To heaven's blue lawns with clouds that ſhift each hour.
Form, texture, hue---to ſuit their painted glow
To man's undazzled gaze---attemp'ring lights,
That teach the ſun's too fervid beam to break
In coloury rays and touch the ſight more ſafe!
---Can it be poſſible that he,---pleas'd power!
Who o'er creation's glebe ſow'd ſeeds of change,
Should but from unity, bald harveſt reap!
And burn---for tares---thoſe beauteous growths he rais'd,
To ſmile ſuch lov'd variety!---'Twere ſin---
'Twere blaſphemoſly blind---to dream ſuch wrong.
No, let me fill'd with awe think fear a fault.
Fear but affronts the God, I'm born to love.
I am, but by his pity: and want weight
To juſtify his anger.——If I err
'Gainſt in-lodg'd impulſe, by his goodneſs lent,
To guide man's choice to virtue ſome ſure fate,
From ſuff'rings adequate muſt puniſh guilt.
But what, where, how---he who decreed can tell.
---If, by miſtake, on life's blind rocks I ſplit,
By no falſe pilot pointed out to ſhun,
There---erring weakneſs meets avoidleſs ſin:
And needs no pardon: for it meant no wrong.
Doubt all faiths boldly then, undoubting God,
Appendant to no pride, miſ-rob'd like zeal,
Hope all men bleſs'd alike---and injure none.
Grateful, I'll trace the fainter lights I find,
Un-envying other's blazing:---humbly own
My aw'd conviction of man's reachleſs power
To pierce omnipotence---and know it near.
Let me, with diſtant rev'rence, pond'ring, dumb,
Dread arrogant deciſion; perſecute
No fancied hereſy---but cloſing calm,
Opinion's dazzled eye, bow darkly down,
And hail th' unfathom'd vaſtneſs! through the duſk
Thought fails to penetrate, revere what is---
Undaring to deſcribe it. Let no pomp
Of poſitive preſumption ſwell my ſoul,
To ſelf-preferring ſcorn of alien creeds,
Uncertain in my own: yet---ſure of this,
That virtue cannot err, but judgment may.
Peaceſully patient let me travel out
Life's unoffending journey. Mark, well-pleas'd,
New proſpects, manners, taſtes, beliefs, chang'd modes,
New ſyſtems---every view that ſides my way,
Unprejudic'd to any: till---at laſt
Death opening truth's barr'd gate, 'tis time to ſee
God's meanings---in the light his preſence lends.

THE JUDGMENT-DAY.

A POEM.

Hover no more, my muſe! o'er idle themes;
Sliding ſhadows, flipp'ry dreams!
By heaven's high call, from human bias freed,
Imagination climbs with dreadful ſpeed.
Unfetter'd from earth's humble heights I riſe,
And ſtretch ſublime a dang'rous flight, which none untrembling tries.
Tremendous Maker! arm my aching eyes;
Aid and ſupport, O God! my failing power;
Teach my bold thought to wing the blazing ſkies!
Fearleſs to ſtem deſtruction's driving ſhower,
And ſafe 'twixt burning worlds ambitious tower,
O! let my hot, my ſtruggling boſom glow,
Swol'n by a burſting flood of bright deſire,
'Till the aſtoniſh'd ſoul is taught with ſtarting dread to know,
How groaning nature ſhall diſſolv'd expire,
And tumbling orbs, with orbs involv'd, flow looſe in ſeas of fire.
How this blue void's immenſe, and concave frame,
Spangled with ſtarry worlds, to pieces broke,
Shall feel heaven round it ſhrivel from the flame,
And melted ſuns, from diſtant ſpheres, pour liquid through the ſmoke.

Now, now on fancy's ſaily wings I riſe,
Aw'd and confounded, through deep wilds of air,
Millions of opening wonders ſtrike my eyes,
And reaſon's finite view is dazzled here!
Globes behind globes unnumber'd hence appear!
The twinkling ſtars, that from yon earth remote,
Seem heaven-ſet gems, and ſcatter'd ſeeds of day;
Here wid'ning into flaming worlds, 'midſt ſeas of æther float,
And o'er blue kingdoms hold a fiery ſway.
In diſtant orbits, round each reigning ſtar,
Huge earths and moons their circly homage pay;
Millions of countleſs miles are loſt between,
And ſick'ning thought grows tir'd to ſtretch ſo far.
How vaſt the concave ſpheres, which hence are ſeen,
Th' enormous vaults with wheeling worlds glow round:
Rolling ſublime they ſlide oblique, yet none their paths confound!
A thouſand bright croſs-currents cauſe no jars,
Nor one the others progreſs bars;
Wide round their central worlds of fire their various tours they make;
Yet no proud planet dares his line forſake;
Partial, an intercepted ray to break.

They take and lend by turns the ſtreaming light,
And ſilent form in ſolemn round, alternate day and night;
Yet beauteous as this heavenly fabric ſhines,
An hour ſhall come when it muſt all decay;
When ſtarting man from midnight ſleep ſhall ſee
th' incumbent ſigns,
That time is ſick, and nature melts away.

Hark! the diſſolving trumpet roars! thunders o'er thunders roll!
A trembling angel ſounds th' eternal call!
The unbounded notes whirl higher and higher, and rend my ſhiv'ring ſoul!
Echoing from world to world they burſt o'er all;
And gathering horrors, cold as death, in ſhow'ry ſhadows fall;
The conſcious planets ſtart to hear the ſound,
And from their orbits bound;
Now void of motion, and depriv'd of force,
Th' arreſted ſyſtems ſtop at once their courſe.
The languid orbs, grown dim, their ſhine withhold,
And night creeps o'er them in a deadly cold.
The guardian angels hear the alarming blaſt,
And from their ſeveral ſtations wing their way;
Upward, in glittering crowds, they tower in haſte,
And, looking back, ſigh ſad and feel the day.
Thin troops of naked ghoſts, long ſtript of clay,
That, wand'ring 'twixt the ſpheres, admiring gaz'd,
Start in looſe ſhoals, and glide like miſts away;
Gathering above, expecting and amaz'd!
Again th' intollerable ſound I hear!
The dreadful ſummons tears my deafen'd ear.
The trembling air unbracing lets me fall;
O, ſave me heaven! I ſink apace to yon benighted bail.

Hail, doom'd dominions! hail, my native clay!
O, what a bleſſing here were vaniſh'd day!
Again, what rumbling horror burſts its way?
Save me, my God!---a flood of flaſhing light
Gleams its red luſtre through the depth of night.
The poles ſtart ſudden from the frightful buſt,
And earth's ſnap'd axis groaning quits its truſt.
No more th' ungravitated globe goes round,
Inward convulſions power and form confound,
Wan deſolation fades her cind'ry cruſt, [duſt.
And active life creeps through the quick'ning
Vales aw'd beneath me at th' impending doom,
In billowy heaving, roll upright along th' incumbent gloom.
Torn from their roots, the groaning foreſts lie,
And hills leap headlong and invade the ſky:
Mankind now, firſt united, join in prayer,
Shrieks from a thouſand kingdoms rend the air,
And ghaſtly horror ſtalks o'er all, and leads on pale deſpair.

See, how deſtructive flaſhes wind their way!
And point the following thunder where to rend.
Mark! how the ſpouted rivers upward ſtray,
And hiſs againſt the light'nings which deſcend
Heaven! how the falling cities buried lie,
Entomb'd in their proud palaces earth's humbled monarchs die. [give,
See! through the flaſh'd diſtinction, fires can
Naked crowds who wiſh to live.
Mix'd in confuſion, to the mountains run;
Mountains which more afraid than they have their own flight begun,
And rolling o'er the ſwallow'd tribe bring on the fate they ſhun.
On every ſide, from every part,
Diſjointed realms aſunder ſtart;
Wide gaping clefts earth's inmoſt entrails ſhow, [below,
And from th' uprooted mountain's chaſms
Unpriſon'd ſeas in roaring torrents flow.
Commiſſion'd ocean, breaking looſe, diſdains his crumbling bounds,
And hoarſely climbing o'er the rocky mounds,
Swallows Pyrene's ſnowy top, and Alpine barriers drowns.
Now all is ocean! and a dreadful blaſt
Burſts from beneath and ſwells it to the ſky!
Torn from their ſeats, the ſea-toſs'd hills are 'gainſt each other daſh'd,
And bulging on the foaming ſurface lie.
On floating oaks the wond'ring lion rides,
And clings majeſtic to th' unſtable ſeat;
The elephant bears up his buoyant ſides,
And paws the groaning waves with his broad feet.
Th' aſſembled birds in clouds ſkim low in air,
Wind-ſhaken, ſcorch'd, and waſh'd by driving rains;
In circly flight ſhrill ſcreams their woe declare,
To find no remnant of their ſheltry plains.
Deep-ſwallow'd earth, meanwhile, ſtill loos'ning more,
Lets in old ocean to her central fires;
Th' aſtoniſh'd deluge, ne'er ſo check'd before,
Shrinks from the pain, and in loud roar retires.
Cloſe in purſuit, the burſting flame breaks through th' unuſual vent,
O'ertakes the rolling floods flow flight, and climbs th' immenſe extent.
On all ſides now the fire-aſſaulted waves
Feel themſelves boil, and curl to ſhun the heat;
A night of ſteam climbs, dark and broad, from their voracious graves; [meet,
And plunging whales, which no cool comfort
Spout the hot flood to heaven in rage, and the froath'd billows beat.

Melting within earth's ſulph'ry ſolids flow,
Pierc'd by the force of her expanding flame;
Metals, diſſolv'd in blazing lakes below,
With liquid burnings daſh her concave frame.
Victor at length outburſts the flooding fire,
And rolls triumphant o'er the bellow'ing ſea!
Rivers of flaming gold in ſpouts aſpire,
And ſtruggling through repugnant ſtorms a labr'ing paſſage free.
As when from furnaces thick ſmoke expires,
And towers in inky volumes to the ſky; [ſpires,
The warring wind beat down th' unyielding
And ſpreads the ſable eddies broad and high.

So rising hills of liquid flame, by cov'ring waves oppress'd,
In glowing whirlpools, driving round, torment the [ocean's breast;
Furious the battl'ing element engage,
And twisting hostile hiss with mutual rage;
Coated with fire in strong and rampant tides,
Reluctant ocean less'ning fast subsides;
Mix'd with the melted world it flames all round,
And seas that drown'd the earth themselves are drown'd.

How low proud earth are all thy honours laid!
Where are thy late contested empires found?
Where the big boasts of arts and arms display'd?
Where are the dreadful pomps which hemm'd thee round? [mains?
What difference now 'twixt rich and poor re-
The ruler's sceptre and the captive's chains?
Where lie the properties of boastful wealth?
Distinction and degrees now clash no more;
Pale sickness here flows mix'd with ruddy health, [before.
And scorn and pity now unite, which never join'd
Melting like wax thy kindled rocks in tow'ry flames aspire,
And liquid kingdoms undulate in fire.
From the sad sight tir'd fancy turn thy eye,
See what amazing changes blot the sky!
Longer and louder the last trumpet's sound
Rolls its encreasing clangor to the sun;
The starting fires convolve, and backward run,
Struck to the heart he darkens and decays, [blaze;
And strongly trembles through his breadth of
As when in living man, some swift surprise
Chills the warm region of his beating breast,
The failing members feel th' oppression rise,
And hang of force and motion dispossest:
So when the sov'reign sun forgets his care,
Dependant worlds in sympathetic woe,
Halt in their course, and sick'ning with despair
Their vast etherial rounds forego,
And rolls in devious mischief down the air.
Yon wat'ry moon, dissolving broad, now seems a dusky flood,
And now at once, O horrid change, she reddens into blood!

Wide from its centre, see th' escaping sun,
With random dread revolves his icos'ning spires;
Cold orbs which plac'd remote his influence shun,
Now feel th' attraction of his bordering fires.
Suck'd to his burning breast averse they flow,
And icy regions roar to meet his glow.
Plung'd in embracing frost unquench'd he lies;
And the thaw'd clime round his hot convex fries.
Worlds by his absence from dependance freed,
Scud in loose liberty along the sky;
Wild and licencious drive with headlong speed,
Till 'gainst some shoaly comet bulg'd they lie:
So rebel kingdoms struggling to be free,
Shun regal power and split on anarchy.
See, see where blazing orbs in spheres remote,
Wrecks of lost worlds through storms of æther float. [high,
With spiry climb, vast tongues of fire stretch'd
In dreadful cones to sweep each other try,
While skies between shrink up and warp their frame,
As crackling bay-leaves curl in circling flame.

Involv'd at length, th' attracted planets throng,
And burn confounded with their central suns;
Tumbling from every part they strike, and thund'ring rend along!
Th' unhinging shock the list'ning angels stuns.
Worlds against worlds, with clashing horror driv'n,
Dash their broad ruins to the throne of heav'n!
Through flaming regions of the burning air,
Down rain distilling suns in liquid rills,
Mix'd with red mountains of unmelted fire!
Hissing, perplex'd, with showers of icy hills, [er;
And cat'ract seas that roar from worlds still high-
Mingled, like driving hail they pour along,
And thund'ring on our ruin'd system fall;
Flames grappling flames combine to grow more strong,
And in wild blaze sweep boundless over all;
One fiery deluge, wasteful, boils below,
And crumbled worlds in liquid millions flow.

Th' accomplish'd ruin sleeps, creation dies!
And untask'd angels rove o'er empty skies!
The soft'ning trumpet breathes harsh strains no more; [roar.
But in sunk sounds grows sweet and falls its
Celestial voices swell 'twixt warbling notes,
And thrilling joy on circly rapture floats!
O'er the vast void melodious praises flow,
And list'ning fiends from the red lake below,
Hush, for a while, the creeping flames and half suspend their wo!
But while in deep and fix'd attention charm'd,
Their hungry souls devour the blissful sound,
By sudden silence struck, they start alarm'd,
And mark a sad, an awful stillness round!
Conscious of coming judgment, down they sink,
Diving by thousands through the burning lake;
Calm with incumbent dread from brink to brink,
Th' unheaving ocean scarce is seen to quake,
Nor swells one daring billow up in fiery foam to break!

From shore to shore, wide round the laky flame,
High-arching heav'n contracts its springy frame.
Broad as the ruin spreads, the unmeasur'd dome
Tow'rs in full compass o'er the waste below!
Assembling angels now no longer roam,
But in throng'd radiance gild the roofy bow;
A solemn black does the vast concave line,
Where streaky waves of rubied redness glow;
'Twixt their loose curls, white beams of silv'ry shine,
Involv'd with rolling tides of azure flow!
Currents of mingled black, red, gold, and blue,
In glitt'ring chases sport, perplex'd and wind unceasing through. [darts,
Stream'd through the whole a quiv'ring lustre
Which, as bright groups of angels interpose,
A twinkling change of coloury rays imparts,
And, from their wings a show'ry light'ning throws!

Far above all through the dome's op'ning crown,
Broad as a world, th' Almighty's eye looks down;
Clouds of deep glory shadowing round his keen refulgence hide,
And dazzled angels turn their eyes aside.

Hark! what transporting majesty of sound,
In solemn sweetnels rolls its force along?
Soft and yet loud it leads its thunder round,
And strikes chill rev'rence through th' angelic throng! [waken death!
'Tis the Eternal's pow'rful voice that calls to
And resurrection waits th' Omnific breath!
The lake groans deep! the labour will begin!
O'er its broad face life-heaving billows curl;
And burning bowels sep'rate flow within,
And smoky clouds expire in pitchy whirl!
Bodies of men in ages long since past, [forms
Whose wand'ring dust has chang'd a thousand
Purg'd by the boiling fires evaporate fast,
And steaming upward rise in misty swarms!
Sexes conjoin'd in shoaly atoms swim,
And sallying loose, the fiery surface skim!
Kings, slaves, and patriots undinguish'd flow,
And mount entangled from the gulf below!
In the mid air dispers'd unnumber'd ways,
Each in his fellow's search instinctive strays!
Circling like flaky show'rs of driving snow,
Which whirlwinds into mazy wav'rings blow.
In endless intricacies winding through,
Atoms join atoms and lost forms renew.
With sympathetic cling together fly,
And limb'd for life in cumb'rous millions lie!

Once more sublime th' enliv'ning voice I hear!
"Souls, descend! your bodies join."
Sudden thin clouds of hov'ring lives appear,
And leaning anxious in soft squadrons shine!
Loos'd at th' Almighty's word distinct they fly,
Swift as the sight-beams of a human eye!
Ardent with longing shoot each strikes his own,
And smiles to fill his long-lost home again;
Bodies supine by ent'ring breath new-blown,
Flash sudden into life and start up men!
They wake! they pant! they try their limbs!
they gaze!
Lost in short horror and severe amaze!

Armies unnumber'd throng th' etherial space,
Paternal Adam views at once his whole collected race,
And with big tears for conscious woe bedews his reverend face:
Parents meet children, and transported, cling,
Long-parted friends in mutual raptures greet,
Th' obliger and th' oblig'd together spring,
And trembling traitors injur'd fov'reigns meet!
Cæsar on Brutus looks serenely down,
And cloudy Cato stalks with sullen will,
Glares on him envious with inferior frown,
And wonders that in spite of death he feels him conqu'ror still!
Majestic in the solemn front of Stuart's injur'd race,
The kingly martyr rears his awful brow!
Pierc'd by the force of his forgiving face,
A gloomy host of back'ning rebels bow!
And fear too late that sovereign pow'r they never own'd till now!
Decrepit age, to more than youth restor'd,
And pining sickness freed from aching pain,
Exert the vigour their new limbs afford,
And move transported at th' apparent gain
Pale murd'rers meet alive whom once they kill'd,
And rush through crowds th' alarming sight to shun;
Usurpers fly from kings whose thrones they fill'd,
And loaded with their guilt unwieldy run.

Fancy, thou fail'st me here! I feel the weak!
I feel thee sink beneath th' o'erpow'ring weight!
Aid me, O Saviour! teach my soul to speak;
Thron'd on thy Father's red right hand in all thy dreadful state!
Thou seest the humbl'd pride of nature wait,
Mankind collected into life, the lowly and the great:
And thus th' eternal doom thou speak'st, the sentence of their fate:
"Come, my blest remnant, ye selected few!
"Who practis'd but the obvious good ye knew
"Who, safely pointed by the guide within,
"Struggled to virtue and resisted sin;
"Who, or by prophets or by conscience taught,
"Have or discover'd truth, or humbly sought;
"Who from the guilt of choice have still liv'd free,
"Or done or suffer'd for my name and me!
"Who by no conscious weight depress'd of unrepented sin,
"Feel yourselves light and uncondemn'd within,
"Rais'd from yon dark and sinking crowd, to heav'n's high thrones aspire!
"Enter with me to joys which drown desire;
"And leave th' accurs'd to prove by pain eternity in fire!"

'Tis spoke: and lo! th' unroofing arch rends wide;
Swift descends a radiant tide!
An opening breadth rolls down of sparkling day;
And like a scroll unfolds huge length of more than milky way!
They go! th' admitted saints tread light as air,
They mount with more than human eyes, and stem the streamy glare!
Bright as they move th' encircling angels throng;
Heard hallelujahs shake th' inferior sky!
In distant thrills expiring notes prolong,
And with transporting fall of sound in gradual soft'nings die.
See! through the portal, how attracted day,
Like a swift current's spiral ebb glides after 'em away!
Now all is dark and dismal as yon scene;
Ah! why does closing heaven so soon th' entrancing prospect screen.
What does beyond those glitt'ring confines lie!
And why no room till death makes way for such a wretch as I?

But murmur not, proud thought! if here delay'd
A wand'ring pilgrim through this life's cold shade,

I muſt not yet with heav'nly choirs rejoice;
O! be the will of God, not mine, obey'd!
Wait, my impatient ſoul, his wiſer choice!
Truſt the ſtrong hand by which thoſe worlds were made,
And to his pleaſure tune thy willing voice!
If I not yet ſhake off this earthly load,
Sure there is bus'neſs worth my life's heſt aim;
He who ſubmits to tire upon the road,
Is fairly foul'd or travels not for fame;
For me, ſuffice it to have taught my muſe
The tuneful triflings of our tribe to ſhun,
And rais'd her warmth ſuch heav'nly themes to chooſe,
As in paſt ages her beſt garlands won,
He who beyond the pow'r of man could write,
Would ſtill fall ſhort of him who acted well;
To flow in ſound or turn a period right,
Is but in fairy tow'rs of praiſe to dwell!
To pardon wrongs and benefits requite,
Is in ſubſtantial meaning to excel!
Why are my wiſhes bent beyond my power,
But to provoke my ſpeed to reach that goal,
Whence on the afflicted I may comforts ſhow'r,
And with eas'd pity feaſt my hungry ſoul!
Be action, then, henceforth my life's wide ſphere,
A thouſand glorious things I wiſh to do;
All has been ſaid that's worth a wiſe man's ear,
But much may be perform'd that's greatly new.

CLEON TO LYCIDAS.

A TIME-PIECE.

The Date not marked by the Painter.

Faith and the muſe have err'd. 'Twas juſt advice,
Skill'd Lycidas! that check'd too haſty praiſe.
I ſhould have cool'd pre-currence into pauſe,
And weigh'd the public voice oppos'd to mine:
Then had I ſound the future in the paſt;
Nor falſely charg'd contractions puny graſp
With compaſs it conceiv'd not. Share, my friend,
In pity ſhare the pain my ſoul ſuſtains,
To find ſuch hope ſo faded. Hope too rais'd
To ſtoop at humble ſelf: Hope wing'd for all.
All was my blaſted proſpect. Fond ſurmiſe
O'er-rated and out-ſtretch'd a people's bliſs.
Bid throb the muſe's pulſe—for thy ſweet call;
What muſe uncharm'd can hear?—Bid burn the brow
Vindictive and appeal due ſatire's frown.
Due to the flagg'rers that made drunk by pow'r,
Forget paſt thirſt's dry promiſe; and preſume,
Dark dreamers! that the world forgets it too.
Bid the prieſt poet conſecrate the rage
Of a wrong'd nation's curſes. Rage at zeal
From ranc'rous gall, hot envy's acrid hell!
Long under cloak of patriot ſemblance hid,
Guileful to lurk in wait, till av'rice ſnapt
Corruption's watch'd-for lure: then, off at once
Flew wide th' obſtructive virtue. Veil'd no more,
Scramblers in broad expoſure's bluſhleſs brawn,
Light from the duſt, lick'd prone th' admiſſive gold,
Deep-ſtain'd with cank'ry ordure. Lambent ſlaves!
Fiend-cloven tongues! grac'd once to ſhame belief:
And make diſtruſt ſeem virtue!—yet, vain truth!
No ſooner hears the muſe her poet's call,
Than venal calumny whets every ſting,
To wound his honeſt purpoſe. Public ſenſe
With her is private feeling: Satire's frown
Mean warmth from diſappointment. Spurn the hag:
Or let her err neglected. Periſh warmth,
That acts, or wills, or thinks from partial pique,
Unfaithful to its ſeemings! Self avaunt!
Self is beneath reſentment; nor deſcends
The muſe to note ſuch waſte of wild impute.
Unperſonal the cheeks indignant glow,
That bluſhes but for others. Fall diſgrace
On ears of daſtard ſtart that dare not hear:
Or tongues that dare not own truth's boldeſt call!
Fall even contempt on worth, where fac'd for ſcorn,
Tort of revulſive brow bids pride with-hold
Thy ſmile, cheap gratitude! which craft's low guile
Oft lends the beggar'd heart that wants within.
Shame on the painful ſtretch that racks the great!
Needleſs extenſion! dignity like light,
Dwells in itſelf, diſplayer, undiſplay'd.
How have I ſeen the native courtier ſhine!
Warp'd to no four ſublime, enchant men's eyes;
Charm dreſs'd in eaſy honour's effluent air,
Fill out diſtinction's voids without pomp's aid,
Strike in deſcending; and attract ſupreme!
Oh thou! to whom loſt Anna's evening ray
Ow'd love's allegiant luſtre: flame of joy,
Wit, genius, tide of art, whence letter'd hope
Drew depth to ſail ungrounded. Soul of taſte!
Shade without chill! ſoft'ning ſuperior height
With acceſs and urbanity!—what need
Thy name here added? Day's meridian blaze
Marks the known hour untold.—O ſay, beſt judge,
Thou, who ſo nobly trod'ſt th' illuſtrious ſteep,
Oft clouded ſince thou left'ſt it!—Teach th' untaught,
Why are the rais'd look'd up to?—'Tis to try
Their claim to ſit ſo mounted. 'Tis to taſk
Their ſtrength to lift low climbers. Down proud ſnails [expoſe!
That crawl'd too high, your ſlime track'd ſhells
Out with theſe ſnuffs in blaze that ſhine to ſtink!
What have the lame to do with wreſtler's toils?
'Tis impudence that prompts deformity
To prink itſelf like beauty. Want of light
Were flatt'ry to the ugly. Drag 'em out,
And leave 'em in the eye of ſcorn impall'd.
Theſe are the minds that diſavow the muſe!
Dead to the formful glow that figures thought,
Blots low ſenſation from the wid'ning heart;
Lends an elaſtic nerve to every ſenſe;
Puſhes exerted virtue into act;
Feels for a world embrac'd, and warms mankind.
—Nothing of this, poor ſouls, diſturbs their calm.
Cloſing their tortois'd lump of cold content;
Diſtant, perhaps, they hear the poet's name;
Leſs probably, ſometimes perhaps, half deign
To turn th' untaſted page; there, lumb'ring on,

Find nothing in the nobleſt verſe but rhyme:
And equal Durfey's froſt to Dryden's fire!
Sleep, genius ſleep—the times invite repoſe.
No ſource of all Britannia's ſilv'ry ſtreams,
Shall feed hope's with'ring root, where hearts thus dry,
Have drunk like ſponges fortune's ponded ſwell;
And o'er th' unmoiſten'd virtues ſhake no drop.
O Lycidas! how climbing zeal will lie!
Come help me to deplore thoſe bluſt'ring gales,
Whoſe ventilative heave puff'd out their void,
With ſhows of airy ardour. Till up-driv'n
O'er ſkreenful clouds, there burſt the bubbly forms!
There ſhrunk their ſatiate bulk to trackleſs huſh!
Speak ye forgotten graces, if unſworn
To hold dumb diſtance, round the ſeats of power,
And rev'rence unapproaching ſtep more near:
Untarniſh thoſe bald ſtars; tell 'em, their lights
Were lent to be reflected. Every muſe,
By ev'ry art attended, ſighing, prone,
Complains of interception. Each in vain
Invokes one beam; but pines in ſhiv'ring ſhade.
Why, Lycidas, were ends and means misjoin'd?
Why am I born to pain for pity will'd? [heart,
Why chooſe the God, that charm'd thy widening
To curb thy ſhorten'd hand, and preſs down fire?
What ſhall we ſay, to touch theſe ſons of noiſe
With ſenſe, how boldly death diſſects their name?
What ſhall we do to break th' imperious blinds,
That riſe 'twixt power and taſte, to pierce their miſt? [form?
And teach th' incumbent reeks, what clouds they
How ſhall a noteleſs, nameleſs, ſilent, friend,
To thought's obſcure retreats, unnerv'd like me,
By dignity's bold brace, or fame's felt ſpring,
Shake thoſe cloſe groves of ſtate, whence kings catch gloom? [wiſh'd,
Oh, were their reach but thine! or lot more
Happier and ſafer, moſt remote from thrones!
O, were thy will but theirs!—Then, Lycidas,
No ſelf-expoſing halt, in place poſſeſs'd,
Wou'd ſhame remember'd ſweep to diſtant hope,
Corrective care wou'd change what once it charg'd.
Watchful diſcernment ſeize unſhould'ring worth,
That crowds not into notice. Taſte wou'd dare
Feel uninſus'd diſtinction; take no cue
From int'reſts venal nod—leſs wait for prayer,
From virtue's baſhful pang, or art's dumb claim.
For excellence hugs cloſe her modeſt veil,
But (actively inquiſitive for woe,
For wit's gueſs'd wants, for ſorrow's cover'd tear,
For pains, wrongs, penury of every good,
With-held by every evil) drag back weight,
That holds down worth depreſs'd,—and bid it ſpring.
So cou'd my verſe, ah! fruitleſs dream, inſpire
Then ſhou'd I feel I breathe, nor life's dim track
Touch'd languid, loſe each footſtep's feeble mark,
And leave no ſtreak on time to note my name.
—But huſh, vain ſtruggler, bid thy breaſt contract,
And ſatisfy with will thy pow'rleſs ſoul.
How ſhou'd ſuch lot be mine, who drink wit's dregs
In deſarts, where ſeduction's drowth has chok'd,
With venal duſt, Caſtalia's dwindled rill!
How ſhall I raiſe my voice till greatneſs hears?
Write, ſays the whiſp'ring impulſe, that aſſumes
Ambition's airieſt hope, yet hates her name.
Write, but be read. Write rugged truth, untun'd
To flatt'ry's dulcid lentor, roughly loud,
As when the laſt heard call ſhall wake the dead.
Court ſome kind angel's aid to voice thy theme.
Alas! no angel dwells where avarice reigns.—
Oh! for ſome hoarſe Teutonic note more ſtern
Than Runic bard, o'er hoſtile ſcalp e'er ſung,
When Woden's hall reſounded to his clang.
Then ſhould ſatiric ſervor, ſharply ſtrong,
Roar like the muſes's bull, till the wak'd nine
Concurr'd in frightful conſort; while intenſe,
Up the ſteep cliffs of Pindus' pathleſs brow,
Rumbling, I roll'd my tumbril theme along.
Wrong not by numbers tun'd to concord's ſhell,
The brawl-devoted taſte that tans thy times.
Softneſs be opera's claim: be ſharpneſs thine.
Softneſs in ſatire aſks good ſenſe in guilt:
'Twere loſt on power's blind puddlers. Wit's light gnat,
Humming its courteous buz, is bruſh'd from note.
Her waſp, cloſe-faſt'ning, bids th' unliſt'ner feel.
Sting then, and force from pain what pride with-holds.
So ſhall thy verſe at leaſt out-ſoar contempt;
And lend diſtaſte diſcernment.—Touch no praiſe.
'Tis idol ſacrifice to gods of ſtone. [friend,
Praiſe has but one pleas'd reader, ſcarce one
Satire can ſqueeze kind looks from bitt'reſt gall.
Looſen the reins to ſpleen, cries angry truth;
Where phlegmful fogs diſtil their lazy damp
'Tis wholeſome to be mad. Nor pauſe for thought;
Who that but ſees or hears needs think for fame.
Born to no paſt'ral plain's romantic range,
Calm and cool-fann'd by reaſon's temp'rate gale,
Feel that thou breath'ſt in paſſion's hazieſt fen,
Contagious air by ſenſual ſuns inflam'd:
Where carnate emulation, ſtript of mind,
Glows muſcularly ſtrong: where licenſe reigns
Uncurb'd by law's reſtraint: where youth's fed fire
Bids baſhful diffidence of ſelf be bold.
Where not to rev'rence is to know mankind:
Where diſreſpect is eaſe, noiſe taſte in life,
And modeſty low breeding: where deſcent
Drives literally downward; till, behold!
Yon coachman's copy'd ſoul propels the peer,
And dim-ſtar ſtouchers ſhine by glare of ſhame,
Downcaſt decorum ſwells the public laugh.
Judgments and views run backward. Nature nods.
Ends but ſucceed as means prepoſt'rous err.
Malice grows faſt, water'd by pity's tear;
And factions but contend for rank in wrong.
Up from rhyme's popy'd vale, aſcend fame's hill:
Soft to the ſoft, thy theme be tempeſt—on.
Write with a whirlwind's fury. Snatch the God,
That thunders in blank verſe to ride thy ſtorm.
So may they hear though cricket ſtakes were pitch'd;
Though the won plate's broad triumph ſhook the field; [rings;
Though cock's hard-conqu'ring crow to ſhouting

Or Briton's coarſe debates out-quarrel Rome's.
—Muſe, I begin! Aſſiſt with all your ſail
Ye proſe-inflating hawks of Helicon?
Lend me your wing's wide ſtretch to aid my ſweep?
Come, let the ſoul of freedom's reinleſs power,
Vaſt and unconſcious of conſtraint inſpire!
Wild let her lift me from the lawns of ſong,
Muſic's hedg'd boundlets, mem'ry's meaſur'd meads,
Where rhyme-trac'd cadence in harmonious cloſe,
Rivets recorded ſenſe, and pins down thought.
Light and diſrob'd of ſoftneſs let her drive,
Looſe to the voids of fancy's viewleſs ſcope;
Vague and unſhap'd, and pathleſs as the air.
What ſhall be ſung, ye ſons of vaſtneſs ſay?
What ſubject, ſadly ſoundful like the ruſh [roar?
Of hoarſe broad cat'racts, ſhall blank numbers
Shall it be ſorrow's energetic plaint,
That groans away the ſun, and lends new gloom
To midnight's mournful umbrage? Tim'd too well,
Too lately Albion's boreal waſtes had wept
The ſuited theme; when tears from raſh revolt
Waſh'd ruthleſs priſons; when th' acceſsleſs wilds
Of bleak-brow'd mountains ſhriek'd with vocal woe;
Mothers and orphan's cries! whom famine found,
Where only famine cou'd. Deſpair's pale tribe,
Weeping in death's chill graſp, their own unfelt,
Some paſt or future fate of friend more dear.
Why ſhou'd the gen'rous muſe inſult the fall'n?
Why not deplore the pangs of hoſtile pain?
Juſt if they thought their cauſe their crime ſeem'd faith.
Guiltleſs in will by taſte involv'd in wrong,
From educative cuſtom's devious warp,
Spare the perſiſting blind; unhoping grace;
Truſtleſs of regal virtues; erring on
From doubt of mercy. For, alas! no voice
Of truth in deſarts heard had taught 'em kings,
Who laſt can fear offence, can firſt forgive.
Paint then their pity'd anguiſh: nobly feel,
To make ſublimely felt this brave man's teſt:
That hearts, unſhaken by reſiſter's rage,
Are conquer'd by their ſorrow.—Vain attempt!
Spread the ſonorous wing for flights of joy.
Sorrow renounces latitude of range: [chain'd,
Dwells in confinement's cave; where thought ſits
Muſes are ſhunn'd; and horror's winking lamp,
Ghaſtlying night's ebon eye, ſees woes on woes,
Tear following tear, ſigh echoing ſigh combin'd,
Move in cloſe conſonance of ſiſt'ring ſound.
Shall it be love, ſoft whiſp'ring out the ſoul
From its own manſion, tenderly exhal'd
To reach ſome ſweeter ſelf? No: dare not touch
That theme, 'tis ſacred to the rights of rhyme,
Union will ne'er by diſſonance be ſung.
Love's links are married couplets: hand in hand
The willing yoke-mates ſhare confederate fall:
Soft as the zephyr ſkims the dew-drop'd roſe.
—But even had rhyme conſpir'd to tempt—forbear.
Awful reſign a wreath more nobly won,
Saint John, his country's boaſt, his country's crime,
When courts at leiſure left his youth to love.
Saint John, the muſe's lord, this theme once ſung:
Sung it in verſe more ſoft than beauty's eye:
More ſtrong than her attraction! Almahide,
Immortal Almahide! by Saint John lives.
Who ſhall attempt to touch the theme he choſe?
He who was voic'd by muſic; mien'd by love!
He who by turns has every muſe poſſeſs'd,
And every art protected: Every grace
Through every fortune led—Supreme in all.
St. John! whom woman wiſh'd, man envied; realms [hate!
Made war on; yet whom none found power to
Nor grief thy theme nor love. What choice remains?
Shall it be death's grim waſte, war's field of fire?
Aptlier the ſubject would have warm'd our iſle,
When England's ſun ſhot wide th' irradiate flame
Of her fam'd Edward's day-dawn.—Yet who knows,
But at ſome far thrown moment, whit'ning broad,
Some light new riſing may (perhaps) once more
Off-roll the ſullen ſhade that glooms our fame.
Rekindling ſenſe of martial fire may glow,
Till the rous'd nation blazes. Then the ſons
Of fires unſkill'd to think defeat no ſhame,
Starting to deſtin'd vengeance, the ſtruck drum
No more ſhall bid the form-dreſs'd ſoldier ſleep:
But roll its deep'ning baſs to wake due death;
Then too, no more the trumpets clang'ry ſhrill,
Fright'ning the opera dame, ſhall to her ear
Call her affected hand, and ſhut out claim
To promiſe of a ſon like him ſhe loves.
Hail the wiſh'd wonder: give him birth, O time!
And into fame's rough ocean launch his name.
But when he riſes bid him hate no muſe.
Fan his impatient blaze to letter'd love.
Pour the enthuſiaſt fervour through his ear,
That fir'd the conqu'ring Ammon's thirſty ſoul—
Born for the poet's praiſe, teach him to know,
That war's wing'd bolt by love of verſe impell'd,
Burſts every bar to glory. Verſe to war
Lends ardour: war to verſe new warmth imparts.
So join'd that never hero reach renown,
Or reach'd, ne'er held; who wrong'd the muſes claim.
Oh what ye Gothic renders of the ear!
Ye blank verſe burſters of Pierian bars!
Strong beyond chaining comet; ſwerves of thought!
Giant ſurmounters of wit's loftieſt Alps!
Ye hurlers of proſe rocks at muſic's heaven!
What ſhall deſerve the dread your thunder bears?
Faction deſerves and claims it: cries a howl,
That paints th'attentive ſoul—Come learn her laws.
Give to the deity that ſhakes down thrones,
Th' allegiance of thy muſe. Blank verſe be mine.
Guideleſs and boundleſs in aſpiring graſp,
And frownful in majeſtic ſullenneſs,
Her muſic dwells in murmur. Let her growl
For faction: taſte her luſt of loud complaint,
And hang on empire's wheels the drag of hate.
Range ſafe beneath her ſtandard: mark its ſweep!
Unfurling into length, the dreadful wave [ſhade!
Sees earth's chill'd kingdoms ſhake beneath its
Kneel and be her's: enroll thy name—and rail.
Thou ſtart'ſt!—alas, for verſe that dares not rail!

What canſt thou hope from praiſe? it wounds no name. [hoards
Art thou to learn thou liv'ſt where greatneſs
Regard, to bribe repugnance? o'er aſſur'd,
And cheaply negligent of zeal inclin'd.
So muſt it be where party's billowy ſurge
Bids wave puſh wave from power. There ſcience ſleeps.
Uproar and conteſt reign. Deep to the root,
Pain-trod Parnaſſus ſhakes; and each ſap'd ſprig
That green'd the muſe's grove finds dry decay.
While pelted into fright, or laugh'd to ſpleen,
Deaf miniſterial ears abſorb'd in fret;
Or dirtily engroſs'd by craft's low buzz,
Taſte not the calm ſurveys of leiſure's range:
Share no delight in ſong; nor woo nor weigh
The power that dwells in gen'rous praiſe, to guide
A nation's doubtful heart to find her friend.
Waſte not the warmth of verſe on things like theſe,
Or ſtain their mem'ry with effaceleſs gall.
Yet ſince ſometimes in power's obſcureſt night,
Through ſably jet pale threads of white may part,
Should vice ſhame one, to virtue lend him light.
Faction, that loves no truth, muſt own this one;
That never friend to verſe malign'd the juſt.
Virtues, however thankleſs, forc'd or few,
Compel the poet's praiſe—But would thy ſong
Wake theſe ſublime inſolvents into ſenſe
Of what they owe attachment? Let it rail.
Rail horrible: in accents like their own
When envy's acrimonious rage impells
Detraction's venal inſult. Nerve in ſounds
Like thunder's gath'ring menace, the rais'd arm
Of oppoſition's onſet. Tell the preſs
Where public plunder bawds for private thrift;
Where grandeur holds a ſtalking horſe to ſhame,
And ſcreens guilt's aim at honeſty. Why laws
Bent and rebent like wire, crack ſhort, ſtart wide,
And with two ends bind nothing. Tell whoſe thirſt
By taſte unguided ſnaps at bubbly froth,
And leaves the ſapid depth untouch'd below:
Teach where bought ſtrength was weakneſs, wiſdom craft,
And infamy long due where chance gave joy.
Begin, deſcribe, diſcolour. Spread abroad
Sedition's fluid taints, and ſtain a ſtate.
So ſhall attracted notice deign regard,
And ſlander ſnatch the perquiſite of praiſe.
Such are the taſtes of office! ſuch the ſouls
That actuate half the mighty! Note it, you
Who rev'rence high diſtinction. This unmark'd,
Hope's empty ſwell plumes broad her feathery creſt:
But bald in diſappointment, frights belief,
Court crocodiles are ſcal'd: they feel no tweak.
He who would wake muſt wound: ſeen danger ſtrikes
More forcibly than all thy pathos, wit!
Say, Tacitus,—thy ſkill the ſecret found:
In what ſtate-ſcale five hundred inſults pois'd,
Weigh'd down five hundred thanks in grateful gold.
Dream not thy Roman's genius mov'd ſuch boon:

Not his fam'd father's vict'ries ten times won,
And to thy claim tranſferr'd had there ſo charm'd.
Oh power of prompt reproach to raſp reward;
And flaſh conception's fire from flint moſt cold!
Call it not bounty: blaſt it angry muſe;
And from the fame of Albion blot that tale.
Th' embitter'd hand of calumny bows down
The heart; its gall corrodes, to ſmile through wrongs,
And pay compell'd reſpect to dreaded ſcorn:
While on the candid courtſhip of the kind,
No ſoft'ring glance deſcends!—untott'ring power
Takes compliment as tribute. Over-cramm'd
With ſelf, and ſurfeiting on brief ſucceſs,
The narrow-compaſs'd heart wants room for taſte.
—Or grant ſome glimm'ry ray give light to gueſs
Th' effect of ſkill'd applauſe: what thence reſults
But inſolent contempt of aid unſought?
The buſy breaſt that pants in poſt hard held,
Wants leiſure to be grateful: 'Tis the taſk
Of grandeur in diſgrace to thank a friend.
So ſpoke th' innrbane voice. The muſe ſigh'd ſad:
Paus'd long, withheld conſent; and thus reply'd:
Faction is fam'd for falſehood—If ſhe now
Hints truth, 'tis infamy too poor for verſe:
Leave it to proſe-tongu'd party's cool diſplay—
Nor love the meaſures; nor malign the men.
Grant imag'd worth by erring fancy form'd,
Ideal as the dreamer's empty graſp,
Who ſuffers but the ſhown? unmaſk'd and found!
What has miſtaken candour loſt but faith?
When miſcomputing their unſounded ſwell,
Deep'ning proud ſhallows thou o'er-rat'ſt deſign,
And wrong'ſt the guiltleſs by reſpect undue,
Bluſh and be dumb: repent; and ſin no more.
Where, arrogant in virtue, conſcious claim
Looks cold on praiſe conſign'd to lenghth'ning time,
Or uninſpir'd to judge, reads flat: nor finds
Diſtinction 'twixt the bellman's power and thine,
Smile and forgive the blind: but ſtill be juſt,
Still be the worth thy theme: the taſte thy ſcorn,
And thou, fled ſoul of Pope! diſrob'd from duſt,
And in that duſt depoſing each faint ſtain
That ſpeck'd, while here, thy part divine with man!
If from that ſource of truth where now thou ſhin'ſt,
Spirits like thine look down and love it ſtill;
Hear and atteſt. Sarcaſtic as thou waſt,
All ſcorn of flatt'ry ſleeps not in thy grave.
There lives who dares aſſert the poet's fire,
Undimm'd by venal ſmoke. Who boaſt no muſe:
Yet owns the rights of all; and loves their fame.
Who from retreat's ſafe depth feels virtue's wounds;
Adopts th' impropriate pang, and flies from reſt.
Who from the ſummit point of fortune's ſpire
There could his fate ſtand rais'd, would, touch'd as now,
Bow proſtrate as the worm to hail the wrong'd;
Then greateſt when moſt leſſen'd by falſe fears,
From envy's miſcreant arts, and ſtripp'd of name!
And you, whoe'er you are, where'er you pine,
Who glow perhaps unmark'd, perhaps o'erlook'd,
Perhaps untaſted by ſublime deſect
Of dignity in ſenſe; which kings may want,
But none 'midſt all his titles can beſtow:

Grieve not to seem too little to the great.
What lose the gen'rous, who profusely waste
On high-plac'd weakness all the muse's strength?
Shines the sun faintlier for those beams he pours,
Vain and unthank'd to warm th' insensate rock?
Tell the big blanks, that he who courts neglect,
And loves to praise unpaid, is paid within.
Is greater than the great: pities their scorn;
And bids their merit live by verse they wrong'd.

THE EXCURSION OF FANCY:

A PINDARIC ODE.

And why ye empty names of things unfound!
Ye almost shadows e'en of sound!
Fame, glory, fortune, fate, and all the fairy fancy round:
Or rather would ye but vouchsafe to tell
The cause of ills, ye know too well;
Say, ye proud tracers of disdainful state;
Who buy distinction at the world's low rate!
Ye mean aspirers to be great,
By aims which earth-born hopes, not heavenly truths, create!
Why must the sacred spring of honour's flood,
Be us'd to rince the dusty robes of pride,
With blood and purple doubly dy'd?
Why foully trampled in by wealth's bold feet?
Why there must lep'rous vices meet?
And why must poverty, however sweet,
And naked innocence unstain'd and neat,
Be rudely driv'n away: or terribly withstood,
By giant forms! chimeras stain'd with blood!
Who dreadful stalk about, within—and raise th' uncleanly mud?

Say, coward learning! long, too long misled!
If yet thou dar'st erect thy dizzy head!
And art not yet heart-conquer'd quite,
By power fight! and custom join'd; too, too unequal
If yet once more thou dar'st assert thy eyes,
Once more undazzled view truth's beamy skies;
And can'st with strong unstagg'ring sight,
Firm-fix'd in steddy gaze take in the o'erwhelming light!
Say, nor fear th' oppressive hate,
Which truth told plainly must create!
The foes of truth, in bulk though great,
Lifted boldly want in weight!
Say to what sad cause we owe,
That naked virtue must regardless go!
Or, shiv'ring stand in fortune's snow:
Till chance does some gay mantle o'er her throw,
And notice does not from her worth, but her adornments flow?
Immortal heav'n! if man may dare
Climb thither to refresh his care!
What means our God! when he requires,
That man in virtue's rugged paths shou'd tread,
If to blessings he aspires?
And yet, strange paradox! permits to virtue's foes,
The mounts of power, from whence to aim their blows,
And hurl red ruin down in furer throws,
With levell'd malice nicely pois'd to hit the climbing head,
While they sit safe, and laugh above to see th' aspirer dead!

Why? If reasons may be giv'n
To earth for laws which pass in heav'n!
Why am I doom'd to toil with vain desire?
Be ever climbing and yet never higher?
Why am I curs'd with scenes of helpless woe,
Which since to cure I must not reach the pow'r,
Why am I not permitted—not to know?
Why feels not yon proud lord his share,
Of my heart-piercing care,
For suff'rings I can neither help, nor which my bus'ness are?
Why sleep princes void of pain,
For those sad thousands who complain;
And wash with tears their deep-dy'd grief in vain?
These men could lend compassion hands to reach
The sinking mis'ries which their help beseech!
I, who my own misfortunes cannot cure,
With barren sorrow other men's endure!
While they whose smiles might heal and voice might chear,
Have eyes, and cannot see!—have ears, and will not hear?

'Tis wond'rous strange all this!—but man should never gaze,
With search too curious on the mystic ways,
Which form the soul-bewild'ring maze!
It is enough for us that there must be
Ends in this we cannot see!
And since 'tis vain to tug at fate,
With unavailing human weight,
Let us throw down this load of doubt with which no race is won:
And swift to easier conquests lighter run,
The way which reason is not bid to shun!
Let us with never-yielding courage strive,
In spite of villany to thrive;
And from our resolution's spring long streams of bliss derive!
Like the gay ball struck down still higher let us rise,
And obstinate dispute th' unwilling prize!
Rebound with ten fold vigour at each blow!
And that to wounds we may a victory owe,
Antæus like spring fresh from ev'ry throw:
Till short-breath'd fortune tir'd and sick with our unthought defence,
At once, permits us to enjoy both her and innocence.

Well then! resolve we!—be it so:
Further thought we shall not need:
That we fet forward stands decreed!
But hold! what journey shall we choose to go?

I will embark me, on yon boundleſs ſea!
The ſea of knowledge! proud! imperious ſtore! [ſhore,
Of heaven-aſſaulting waves which gnaw the
On ev'ry ſide with hungry roar!
Yet always gaping always ſwallowing more,
Still flows forever, and will flow—voracious as before!
Well! I am ſail'd!—I plow the foamy deep,
And now my climbing veſſel mounts on high,
And now I ſweep the ſtarry ſky!
And now! ſtand firm my brain! ruſh down the wat'ry ſteep! [try!
Ah me! half-founder'd now, in vain all arts I
This way and that, immortal heaven I drive!
Currents encount'ring currents, ſtrive!
The fruitleſs rudder ill-obey'd in vain,
Struggles oppreſs'd againſt the madding main,
Eddies croſs eddies whirl—and whelm it back again!

Hold! I am ſick, I'll ſail no more:
Pilot give thy labours o'er!
Put in and ſeek repoſe on yonder peaceful ſhore.
Where am I now?—'Tis wond'rous dark all round!
What means this ſhadow-cover'd ground!
This is the land of ignorance wild and rude!
Bleak comfortleſs and bare:
A dreary ſoil! an empty air!
By ſhadowy nothings I am here purſued;
A gape, and yawn, and tire in ſleepy ſolitude!
Let me turn which way I will,
Sight has narrow quarters ſtill!
Scarce can I ſee above a fathom round;
I tread on ſoft and ſandy ground!
At ev'ry ſtep I take, my feet ſink in;
Already I to fear I know not what begin!
Hark! what ſtrange noiſe is that which whiſtles round my head?
Ghoſts and gobblings this way tread!
Aſtoniſh'd eyes! what ſcenes about me draw!
Now ſtagg'ring reaſon, where's thy law?
My ſoul grows weak with childiſh awe:
Fancy has courage captive led;
Empty ſomethings ſtill I dread!
Ha! ſee—at once what objects riſe!—How horribly they ſpread!
I trod too loud, and with the noiſe have wak'd the ſilent dead.

Fly, fly, night-wand'ring feet! explore loſt day.
If this the land of ignorance be,
I'll drive again on learning's ſea!
Here I dare no longer ſtay!
And yet I ſee not how to get away!
What's this?—methinks I ſee the ruſhy brink
Of ſome deep current in my way!
Help, help me, fortune, or I ſink!
Now I am in, whelm'd o'er amidſt the flood!
Ha! though the chance was bad th' effect is good!
It is not water this, but fluid mud.
Stagnate and thick the ſleepy depth I tread with unhop'd eaſe!
And now I ſee the land again; and now
The liquid field I up before me plough:
Wade out and climb the bank by ſlow degrees!
I've 'ſcap'd the lake, thank heav'n! but all this while
I wander guideleſs in the ſame dark iſle.
What's this which would be thought a wind?
Which heaves by ſluggiſh fits the drowſy air?
Which creeps in broken murmurs far behind,
And idly ſeems to ſlumber in its care? [aſſuage;
Now ſwells in ſudden guſts, now does at once
Like drunken men who ſtrive to talk, but ſleep amidſt their rage?
Curſe on his ſoul-condenſing ſolitude!
This land of ignorance appears as rude;
And far more dangerous theſe unactive ills,
Than all the buſy frightfulneſs which fills
Yon ſea, where ſtorms my devious bark purſued!
Tell me then, directive ſtar,
Thou that guid'ſt me from afar,
If learning's voyage is not ſafe to take,
And ign'rance, dreadful ſhore, I now forſake,
What more inviting land my next look-out ſhall make?

I ſee, methinks, far off a ſudden glare!
Ha! look—a mountain riſes to the ſea!
From which ten thouſand flames ſhot through the air,
Spread circling brightneſs wide to ſuch degree,
That a kind trail of light darts outward ev'n to me!
Bleſs'd with this glorious unexpected guide,
I look about me now with pride!
And lo! a narrow cauſeway thither leads:
Narrow indeed it is, and ſeems to ſhow,
That few ſhould hence to yon gay mountain go!
Care and diligence there needs;
For ev'ry tott'ring ſtep I ſtumble ſo,
That ſcarce I 'ſcape the waves which foam and break below!
Would I had never landed on this ſhore;
This cauſeway is a dangerous paſſage o'er;
And I was nearer to the mount before, [roar!
When my bark miſs'd its ſight amidſt the ocean's
Courage, my ſoul, I ſhall anon be there!
I know the country now as I draw near:
It is the far-fam'd realm of war!
How red the ſkies about it are!
Oh, let me climb the cliffy ſteep, and ſtrike yon topmoſt ſtar!

Thank heaven! my aching foot has reach'd the ſtrand:
What's this?—the earth is iron; and ſulphur all the ſand.
Inſtead of air, here's ſmoke;—but flame does light ſupply!
And from within where ſtrongly fed they lie,
Torrents of fiery day break up and ſtreak the ſooty ſky!
Hark! as up the hill I go, [roar,
From the wide top huge full-mouth'd thunders
While far within and more below,
Hoarſe infant noiſes faintly blow;
And, ſlowly riſing, more and more,
Grumble, in horrid notes, their new-taught leſſons o'er:
Some the ſhrill trumpet imitate, and ſome
Buffet, unſkill'd, the ſullen drum.

Through my aſtoniſh'd ear, harſh-mingling paſs
The ſound of bells, claſh'd ſwords, and clatt'ring braſs.
Loud-neighing horſes, ſtorms of vollied ſhot,
Shouts, groans, and words confounded all, heard, but diſtinguiſh'd not.
Well, I am up at laſt; and now I'm here,
Let me look round and ſee how things appear.
Oh! my glad ſoul---what proſpects open there,
My hope-enlivening heart to cheer?
Now I am in my wiſh'd, my proper ſphere;
What is there in yon fair-ken'd world which hence we may not ſhare?
Oh, Heaven! what falſe appearance dwells below;
How is man deceiv'd by ſhow!
Yon Viceroys (as they would be thought) of fate;
Yon poppet managers of ſtate;
Thoſe things which bid life-waſting followers wait
For bubbles, which at jewel's price they rate;
And puff and ſwell with empty pride---and call themſelves the great.
Ye ſtars!---How humbly they all look this way,
As who would ſeem to ſay,---
Great Sirs! permit us ſtill to cheat the fools with whom we play;
They turn to us the cringing ſide, and ſtrut the other way.

Soul recline and take thy eaſe;
Look about thee by degrees;
The proſpect's wide enough to pleaſe.
Since the commanding top is thus attain'd,
Uſe with care th' advantage gain'd.
What wilt thou do that thus I feel thee ſwell?
In ſtruggling ſilence loves deſign to dwell.
Or are thy views too vaſt to tell? [well.
Go on, form boldly, ſwift reſolve---and execute it
Send out fancy, ſhe can fly;
Nimbly wing'd, her own beſt ſpy;
Every danger, ere drawn nigh,
Th' air-ſooted Amazon diſcerns, and ſcatters with her eye.
Fancy then, proud goddeſs! riſe;
From earth extend thy ſtretching ſize,
And puſh thy active head through the diſcover'd ſkies.
Stamp, ambitious, with thy foot,
And bid the threaten'd world look to't;
For thou haſt mighty work to do, and power enough to do't.
Graſp yon eſcaping earthquake, 'twould depart;
Blow new vigour to its heart.
Take it and give the lazy globe a ſhake;
And when ſcar'd nature's broad awake,
All her coy aid demand and take.
Break open ev'ry inmoſt part;
Through all the gloomy chaſms of matter dart;
Let in light to find out art;
And ſmile to ſee the blaze-ſhot nymph with ſudden wonder ſtart.
Seize her quickly, bind her faſt,
Diſtant elſe behind her caſt; [paſt.
A thouſand mazy turnings firſt muſt tediouſly be

Doubly arm'd, and ſeated thus,
Who is now a match for us?
Begin, begin the glorious taſk!
Deſcend at once and ſtrip yon kings of power's ill painted maſk!
Tell 'em they the nymph diſgrace;
Power ſhould wear a lovely face;
And hideouſly to hide her charms is horrible and baſe. [for place,
Bid 'em, in empire's maſquerade, elbow no more
But bravely dare put on plain truth, and ſcorn a borrow'd face.
Are they diſturb'd?---Is all the hive in arms?
See they buz in hoſtile ſwarms!
But 'tis no matter, let 'em bring
Hoarded malice in their ſting;
They cannot pierce, much leſs diſplume, the pinions of thy wing.
What is that they ſeek to know?
What commiſſion we can ſhow.
Tell me, Fancy, was it ſo?
Commiſſions ſay are ſometimes forms which men to cuſtom owe;
A ſhape of power which tyrants ſteal, and having ſtol'n, beſtow.
Yet, to pleaſe 'em, be they told,
From higher hands than theirs we hold!
From juſtice, truth, and reaſon ſay,
That great triumvirate of power!---which they
Pretend, and but pretend t' obey!
This our authority; and if theſe not ſuffice,
We can ſhow 'em large ſupplies
Of vengeance, force, and ſtubborn will; our ſworn auxiliaries.
Now they tremble, now they mourn,
Now with helpleſs rage they burn!
Well may they rave indeed to ſee their friends againſt 'em turn.
Stay! and e'er we farther go,
Let our great meaning be aloud proclaim'd:
Our deeds ſhall be as juſt as fam'd.
Friends and enemies ſhall know
Why we make war, and what we mean to do.
Herald vengeance! ſwift ariſe!
Shall with ſteel thy flinty heart!
And ſince by nature blind thou art,
Bury thy lifted hand in yonder ſkies,
And pluck two comets down to ſerve for eyes.
Dawb thy diſmal face with blood!
And with extenſive ſtride, croſſing the trembling flood [ſhook robe,
Of fire-embroider'd ſmoke, throw on a wind-
And ſhoot thy ſhadow over half the globe.
In thy right hand lift quiv'ring light'nings high!
Hardly held, and mad to fly!
From thy rais'd left let heaven's loud bolt be hurl'd;
And roll th' alarming thunder round the world.
When wak'd attention pricks her frighted ear,
And ſtalking apprehenſion pants with fear;
When all the ſtarting nations upward look,
By convulſive horror ſhook,
Borrow the northern wind's big voice, and then
Three times pronounce O yes! and thus addreſs the ſons of men:

Hear, ye people! far and wide;
Reaſon's force will now be try'd;

Tremble, ye tyrants! at the near defence
Of long oppreſs'd and helpleſs innocence.
Where is the wretch, who, deep entrench'd in ſtate,
Impiouſly defies his fate;
And dares be wicked without bounds becauſe immenſely great?
Him let injur'd virtue ſhow,
And we proclaim ourſelves his foe.
Fortunate uſurpers quake! [take,
Let the forc'd thrones, whoſe ſeats uncall'd ye
Beneath your pond'rous ruin ſhake;
Or let 'em ſwell to throw you out; or with your fortunes break [wealth.
Rapine diſguis'd in law, oppreſſion arm'd with
Rock-hearted cruelty, and ſcornful pride,
Hear and tremble when ye know,
We the great healers bring th' unhappy—health,
And draw the thorn from virtue's bleeding ſide.
Ye ſap-engroſſing weeds which but for miſchief grow;
Pay plunder'd excellence, ye ſlaves! the vaſt arrears you owe,
Or we pronounce ourſelves your mortal foe.
Wiſdom, knowledge, juſtice, art,
Peace, meekneſs, truth, and ſanctity of heart;
Diſcourag'd induſtry, unfriended grief,
Charity, gentleneſs, and to be brief,
Each weeping virtue that deſerves and has not found relief,
March and join us; we are friends.
What though your numbers are but few?
Our muſter's well-weigh'd ſtrength attends;
Where ſhow is wanting ſubſtance makes amends,
We, your allies, can lend you arms—and give you courage too.

They come from ev'ry part, they, gathering, fly;
But, trembling, backward caſt a doubtful eye,
Aſtoniſh'd at the hoſtile ſwarms which round 'em ſhad'wing lie!
Safety from ſilent caves ariſe:
Yon cryſtal pillar from heaven's palace break,
And cope it down to our allies,
'Twill a glitt'ring cauſeway make.
So they are paſt, encamp 'em on th' aſcent;
Stretch out the bright diviſions line by line;
Unfold our milky enſigns to the wind;
Draw the battalions down in juſt extent;
And bid the iron face of battle ſhine.
What's this! the raſh audacious foe,
Far from fear, and mad with pride,
Scorns to wait a threaten'd blow,
And this way turns invaſion's tide:
They will not ſtay it ſeems to be a ſecond time defy'd. [part,
They weigh, they ſail, they ſpread from ev'ry
Numbers following numbers ſtart.
Their navies hide the ſea through which they ſweep;
And th' o'er-labour'd wind grown ſick at heart,
After the flagging canvaſs ſeems to creep;
And groans behind, oppreſs'd with weight ſo ſtrong,
And puffing ſtorms, with cheeks half-burſt, ſcarce puſh it ſlow along.

'Tis worth our wonder, Fancy, ſince we are
Poſſeſs'd at once of the whole realm of war,
Whence thoſe prodigious magazines ſhould ſpring, [bring.
Which nations, ill-ally'd, do thus againſt us
At times exported hence, at firſt they went
Like naval ſtores from Chriſtendom, to Barbary rovers ſent;
And hoarded long, to be at laſt ill ſpent,
Come now againſt their mother's boſom bent.
Since it is thus we'll diff'rent arms prepare!
Our terrors ſhall new unknown habits wear;
And like our cauſe, our weapons too ſhall huge advantage bear!
Nature our confederate ſound,
And Proteus' art our captive hound;
What force can earth againſt us bring which theſe ſhall not confound!
Hear, thou tall foreſt, from thy loos'ning root
Hither thy piny offſpring ſhoot:
And thou, proud hoſt of gloom-arreſting oak,
Through whoſe cloſe ranks the day's light horſe ne'er broke,
With reverend awe confeſs the mighty call!
Nod conſent—and groaning fall! [join
Now ſwift together ruſh again, once more cloſer
With animated, ſympathetic twine!
Embrace at once, and new in form with concave beauty ſhine!
Deſcend complete, and plough the flood in naval-bodied line!
Scorn the help of canvaſs wings!
Art ſhall lend ſelf-moving ſprings!
Your active forms ſhall never need attend the humorous wind;
Self-oar'd with ſpoky fins your furrowing keels
Shall daſh the billows back with living wheels;
And ſtriking ſwiftly every mark deſign'd,
Sweep on through winds and tides averſe, and leave the gales behind.

Mountain, open thy hot breaſt, thy iron ſinews ſtrain!
Bleed at every nit'rous vein!
Yawn horrible, and with convulſive pains
Burſt thy flame-lab'ring head, and ſhoot thy mineral brains
Take 'em, art, and mix 'em well!
Thou canſt the dark proportions tell!
Let death the bitter kernel be, and forge thou thick the ſhell!
Kindle a fire like light'ning blue!
And that its dreadful work it may unerring do,
Breathe a living ſpirit through,
And give the deadly compound fight, and force and ſwiftneſs too!
Take this new gigantic mould;
And by it form ſuch tubes as may befit
The maſs which their impregnate wombs muſt hold!
Ram their greedy throats with it;
And teach new thunders to out-mouth the old!
Hold, it not ſuffices yet!
Not one advantage ſhall the proud foe boaſt;
'Tis not enough that victory we get,
Unleſs the gain is ours with nothing loſt!

Bid yon aërial ſubſtance ſhed its down;
Spin it thick, and weave it ſtrong!
Draw out the force-repelling texture long!
And with it fence each veſſel round, like ſome
well bulwark'd town;
Now we are proof againſt their gather'd pride,
Be all their batteries on us hourly try'd!
Breathleſs and dead their fruitleſs force ſhall
kiſs our ſoft'ned ſide.

Embark, ye well-appointed few, embark!
Put out, and meet the number-truſting foe!
Their circling fleet has made the day look dark, [blow!
And ſeems in ſable dreſs'd to mourn the coming
Ruſh againſt 'em—gore 'em through!
Bear 'em down beneath the ſea!
As weeds before the furrowing plough torn up and buried be!
If while onward ye purſue,
On either ſide they flank ye too; [throats,
At once clear all your thunder's dreadful
And roar deſtruction out in paſſant notes!
'Tis done; and glorioufly the baniſh'd day,
Which late their gloomy ſquadrons chas'd
away,
Reſtor'd triumphant ſhines with ten-fold light:
Their curling ruin ſhines to heaven, and makes the ſun more bright!
See, ſee, mark well this ſcene-recording fame!
The hiſſing ocean toils with vain deſire,
To quench with ſpouting waves the batt'ling
flame;
But ſcorch'd with clinging heat, and mad
with ſhame,
Does every way at once in blazing tides retire,
And flying frights th' aſtoniſh'd world with floods
of liquid fire. [feels;
Pride-ſwoll'n oppreſſion now hot vengeance
Their falling flags bluſh deep in blood!
And hide their ſhame within the flood!
Their maſts turn downward, and th' uplifted
keels
Float reverſe with wave-waſh'd reels! [gay,
And all th' extended ſtrength but now ſo proudly
Like ſnow-top'd fields o'er-run by fire, melts all at once away.

Whither ſhall we now proceed?
Turn your heads to yon white ſhore;
Follow fortune ſtill with ſpeed,
Ye who would engage her more!
It matters nothing what we now have done;
Or vict'ry muſt be well purſued, or ſhe is never won.
Ha! what means yon op'ning ſcene?
The warlike land is gilded o'er
With glitt'ring arms in diſtant marches ſeen,
And graceful troops that edge the guarded ſhore!
And from behind to cloſe us up between,
A huge half moon of naval ſtrength,
Stretch'd in gay and pompous length,
Advances on us ſlow and well aſſur'd:
Theſe cannot of the number be, who late ſuch loſs
endur'd!
Mark the impatient haſte of thoſe behind!
As if o'erjoy'd an enemy to find;
Their wanton ſtreamers laſh the lazy wind,
And like their genius hov'ring in the air!
See that glorious ſomething there!
Which does a form unuſual ſeem to bear;
Moving awful; looking kind;
Now glides before to light 'em on; now cheers
'em up behind.
In ſhape a lion fierce, and ſtrong it ſeems,
But like ſome figure fancy-form'd that fills mens
active dreams;
An eagle's talons and keen bill it dreadful ſeems
to bear;
An eagle's broad and ſhad'wy wings direct it
through the air!

Obſerve what's he, who ſolemnly ſevere,
With grave and awful ſenſe of majeſty,
Hemm'd with reverence does appear!
Whoſe eye ſo piercing ſeems to be!
Whoſe forehead wears beneficence to temper dignity!
Who marches ſtately down yon hill to ſee;
But not to ſee with fear!
To look and judge what we may be!
Ye powers, where are we?——How did fancy
ſteer?
I know the hero; now he draws more near!
How came we blindly thus to touch a ſhore?
Thus hoſtilely a land explore,
Where heaven does only bleſſings ſtore?
Where wailing ſorrow ſhall be heard no more,
Nor virtue e'er in vain the help of power im-
plore!
Away! heave anchor! we've no buſineſs here!
Yet ſtay! divinely led, I err th' unmeant good to blame!
Inſpir'd at once I ſee and own 'twas heaven's un-
erring aim!
Hail, immortal ſon of fame!
Take theſe legions, they are thine!
With theirs thy navy ſhall reſiſtleſs join;
And virtue's ſquadrons led by thee, o'er earth's whole ſurface ſhine.
Root out oppreſſion whereſoe'er ſhe grows,
Let ſtubborn tyranny fall dead beneath thy pond'-
rous blows!
And over all the wide-watch'd world leave innocence no foes.

OF

DR. WILLIAM BROOME.

THE LIFE OF BROOME.

William Broome was born in Cheſhire, as is ſaid, of very mean parents. Of the time and place of his birth, or the early part of his life, no intelligence is to be found. He was educated upon the foundation at Eton, and had the misfortune of being captain of the ſchool for one whole year, 1707, without any vacancy, by which he might have obtained a ſcholarſhip in King's College, Oxford.

Being by this delay, ſuch as has happened but four times in 160 years, in 1619, 1653, 1707, and 1756, ſuperannuated, his friends ſent him to St. John's College, where, by their aſſiſtance, and a ſmall exhibition, he was maintained till he entered into orders.

At his college he had the reputation of being an excellent Greek ſcholar and a ſkilful verſifier, but he is deſcribed, as being a contracted ſcholar, and a mere verſifier, unacquainted with life, and unſkilful in converſation. He was ſo much addicted to verſifying, that his companions familiarly called him Poet. When he had opportunities of mingling with mankind, he cleared himſelf, it is ſaid, from great part of his ſcholaſtic ruſt.

He appeared early in the world as a tranſlator of the "Iliad" into proſe, in conjunction with Ozell and Oldiſworth; but his ſhare in that verſion, which is now neglected, is not known. He was introduced to Pope, who was then upon a viſit to Sir John Cotton at Madingley near Cambridge, and gained ſo much of his eſteem, that he was employed with Jortin to make extracts from Euſtathius for the notes to the tranſlation of the "Iliad;" and in the ſecond volume of "Miſcellaneous Poems, Tranſlations, and Imitations," publiſhed by Lintot, commonly called "Pope's Miſcellanies," twelve of his early pieces were inſerted. That he furniſhed "the greater part of the Remarks from Euſtathius," together with ſeveral excellent obſervations, is acknowledged by Pope; who, it has been ſaid, promiſed him a handſome gratuity for his trouble; and, when the work was finiſhed, quarrelled with him, and diſappointed him of the promiſed reward. It is certain that Broome thus repreſented the ſtory to his friends; yet, in a letter to Lord Hervey from Pope, who had been charged with "ſelling Broome's works, printed with Pope's name," he tells his Lordſhip he printed not his name before a line of the perſon's his Lordſhip mentions; beſides, my Lord, when you ſaid I ſold another man's works, you ought in juſtice to have added that I bought them, which very much alters the caſe. What I gave was 500 l.; his receipt can be produced to your Lordſhip."

Ruffhead relates that Broome, in conjunction with Fenton, had formed a deſign of tranſlating the Odyſſey, while Pope was employed upon the "Iliad," and went through ſeveral books of the Odyſſey, which they deſired him to peruſe; and having made a conſiderable progreſs in the tranſlation himſelf, adopted what he found thus ready for the advancement of his work.

It is ſome confirmation of what is thus related, that among the poems in "Pope's Miſcellany" there is one To a Gentlemen who corrected ſome of my Verſes, the title of which he afterwards thus changed, To Mr. A. Pope, who corrected my Verſes.

That the verſion of the Odyſſey was not wholly Pope's was always known. He had mentioned the aſſiſtance of two friends in his propoſals; and at the end of the work ſome account is given by Broome of their different parts, which, however, mentions only five books as written by the coadjutors; the fourth and twentieth by Fenton, the ſixth, the eleventh, and eighteenth, by himſelf; though Pope, in an advertiſement prefixed afterwards to a new volume of his works, claimed only twelve.

The books allotted to Fenton were the firſt, the fourth, the nineteenth, and the twentieth; to the lot of Broome fell the ſecond, ſixth, eighth, eleventh, twelfth, ſixteenth, eighteenth, and twenty-third, with all the notes.

The price at which Pope purchaſed this aſſiſtance was 300 l. to Fenton, and 500 l. to Broome, with as many copies to his friends as made one hundred more. The payment made to Fenton is not certainly known. Lord Orrery ſays "it was an errant trifle:" Broome's is very diſtinctly told by Pope in the notes to the "Dunciad."

It is evident, that, according to Pope's own eſtimate, Broome was unkindly treated. If four books could merit 300 l. eight and all the notes, equivalent at leaſt to four, had certainly a right to more than ſix.

Broome, probably finding that Pope got more than either of them expected, was deſirous of a ſhare; but though Pope was not generous on this occaſion, if Broome received what they agreed for, there ſeems no juſt ground of complaint.

There was for ſome time, from whatever cauſe, more than coldneſs between Broome and his employer. He always ſpoke of Pope, as did his friend Fenton, as too much a lover of money, and Pope purſued him with avowed hoſtility; for he not only named him diſreſpectfully in the "Dunciad," but quoted him more than once in the "Bathos" as a proficient in the "Art of Sinking;" and in his enumeration of the different kinds of poets diſtinguiſhed for the profound, he reckons Broome among "the parrots who repeat another's words in ſuch a hoarſe odd tone as makes them ſeem their own."

It appears by a letter from Pope to Broome, in 1730, in which he communicated to him an account of the death of Fenton, which is noticed in the life of that amiable and elegant poet, that they were afterwards reconciled, but their peace was probably without friendſhip.

In 1727, he publiſhed his Poems on Several Occaſions, with a dedication to Lord Townſhend, dated Jan. 16. 1726; being at that time rector of Sturſton in Suffolk, and chaplain to Charles Lord (afterward Earl) Cornwallis.

At Sturſton he married a widow lady who had a good fortune, which enabled him to take the degree of Doctor of Laws, when the king went to Cambridge, April 25. 1728.

Upon his reſignation of the living of Sturſton, he was preſented by the Crown to the rectory of Pulham in Norfolk, in Auguſt 1733, which he held with Oakley Magna in Suffolk, given him by Lord Cornwallis, who added the vicarage of Eye in Suffolk; he then reſigned Pulham, and retained the other two till his death.

Towards the latter end of his life, he amuſed himſelf with tranſlating Odes of Anacreon, which he publiſhed in the "Gentleman's Magazine," under the ſignature of Cheſter.

He died at Bath, November 16. 1745, and was buried in the Abbey Church, by Dr Gooch biſhop of Norwich. He left an only ſon, Charles, who died of the ſmall-pox in 1747, an under graduate of St. John's College, Cambridge.

His Poems on Several Occaſions were reprinted in 1739, and again in 1750, with ſeveral additions and variations, which are retained in the preſent edition.

The character of Broome, though he never roſe to a very high dignity in the church, ſeems to have been amiable and reſpectable. At college he was univerſally beloved; and in more advanced life he was diſtinguiſhed by his exemplary obſervance of the ſocial and domeſtic duties, and his piety and diligence in the exerciſe of his paſtoral function. He is mentioned by Shuckford (Sacred and Profane Hiſtory Connected, vol. iii. p. 60.) under the title of "the ingenious Annotator on the Engliſh Homer, whoſe real worth, as well as learning, makes it a pleaſure to me to ſay, that I have a friend [illegible]"

As a poet, his compoſitions are characteriſed by correctneſs of judgment, elegance of diction, and harmony of numbers, rather than by force of genius, or grace of fancy; neither of which, however, are wanting. To examine his performances one by one, would be tedious. One of his pieces is intituled, Melancholy; an Ode, occaſioned by the Death of a beloved Daughter, 1723; but it is not quite certain that it was written on a daughter of his own. His Verſes on the Death of a Friend, which were printed in 1727, were afterwards very happily enlarged, and applied to Fenton, who died in 1730. His Verſes to Mrs. Elizabeth Townſhend, on her Picture at Rainham, are elegant and poetical in a high degree. Of his Paraphraſes from Scripture, nothing very favourable can be ſaid; yet the third chapter of Habakkuk, and the Paraphraſes from Job and Eccleſiaſticus, have merit; the language not being deficient either in ſtrength or melody. His Tranſlations are ſmooth, claſſical, and ſpirited; and moſt of his original pieces have ſomething to be praiſed, either in the thought or the expreſſion. Dr. Warton thinks the books he tranſlated for Pope, in the Odyſſey, are inferior to Fenton's; but it is no ſmall honour to him, that the readers of poetry have never been able to diſtinguiſh his books from thoſe of Fenton and Pope.

"Of Broome," ſays Dr. Johnſon, "though it cannot be ſaid that he was a great poet, it would be unjuſt to deny that he was an excellent verſifier; his lines are ſmooth and ſonorous, and his diction is ſelect and elegant. His rhymes are ſometimes unſuitable. In his Melancholy he makes breath rhyme to birth in one place, and to earth in another. Thoſe faults occur but ſeldom; and he had ſuch power of words and numbers, as fitted him for tranſlation; but in his original works, recollection ſeems to have been his buſineſs more than invention. His imitations are ſo apparent, that it is part of his reader's employment to recal the verſes of ſome former poet. Sometimes he copies the moſt popular writers; for he ſeems ſcarcely to endeavour at concealment; and ſometimes picks up fragments in obſcure corners." His lines to Fenton,

> Serene the ſting of pain thy thoughts beguile,
> And make afflictions objects of a ſmile,

brought to my mind ſome lines on the death of Queen Mary, written by Barnes, of whom I ſhould not have expected to find an imitation.

> But thou, O muſe! whoſe ſweet Nepenthean tongue
> Can charm the pangs of death with deathleſs ſong;
> Can ſtinging plagues with eaſy thoughts beguile;
> Make pains and tortures objects of a ſmile.

"To detect his imitations, were tedious and uſeleſs. What he takes he ſeldom makes worſe; and he cannot be thought a mean man, whom Pope choſe for an aſſociate; and whoſe co-operation was conſidered by Pope's enemies as ſo important, that he was attacked by Henley with this ludicrous diſtich."

> Pope came off clean with Homer; but they ſay,
> Broome went before, and kindly ſwept the way.

DEDICATION.

To the Right Honourable

CHARLES LORD VISCOUNT TOWNSHEND;

Late one of his Majeſty's Principal Secretaries of State, and Knight of the Moſt Noble Order of the Garter, &c.

My Lord,

I Beg leave to publiſh the following poems under your patronage: a preſent, I confeſs, unworthy of it, and of little value, excepting what gratitude gives it: but, I fear, it may be eſteemed a boaſt rather than an acknowledgment, or at beſt an oſtentatious kind of gratitude, to tell the world that I have received the higheſt obligations from the Lord Townſhend: it is an honour to be regarded by a perſon of ſo diſtinguiſhed a character: I am proud of it, and, not being of a nature to be content with a ſilent gratitude, am not deterred from owning it, though it be liable to be miſcalled vanity.

You have, my Lord, the happineſs to enjoy what that great ſtateſman Walſingham, who held the ſame office which you fill with ſo much honour, frequently wiſhed, but never obtained: a retirement from buſineſs in the declenſion of life, to enjoy age in peace and tranquillity: this laſt action ſpeaks you truly great; for that perſon who by a voluntary retreat, could induſtriouſly renounce all the grandeur of the world, muſt evidently have a ſoul above it.

Tully in his Tuſculum was never more happy, than the Lord Townſhend in his Rainham:

" ——Where majeſtically plain
" Pure nature reigns, where varied views from
" views [woods,
" Diffuſive proſpects yield *: here ſhagg'd with
" Here rich with harveſt, and there white with
" flocks,
" And all the gay horizon ſmiles around
" Full of thy genius! Lo! between yon groves
" The dome with eaſy grandeur, like the ſoul
" Of its great maſter, riſing overlooks
" The ſubject regions, and commands the charms
" Of many a pleaſing landſcape, to the eye
" Delightful change! here groves of loftieſt ſhade
" Wave their proud tops, and form of ſtatelieſt view
" A ſylvan theatre! while nature's hand [lawn,
" Pours forth profuſe, o'er hill, o'er vale, o'er
" Her choiceſt bleſſings: ſee! where yonder lake
" Spreads its wide liquid plain: now ſtands un-
" mov'd, [flects
" Pure as th' expanſe of heaven, and heaven re-
" From its broad-glittering mirror; now with
" waves
" Curl'd gently by the breeze, ſalutes the flowers
" That grace its banks! in ſtate the ſnowy ſwans
" Arch their proud necks, and fowls of various
" plume
" Innumerous, native or exotic, cleave [lawns
" The dancing wave! while o'er th' adjoining
" Obverted to the ſouthern ſuns, the deer
" Wide-ſpreading graze, or ſtarting bound away
" In crowds, then turning, ſilent ſtand and gaze!
" Such are thy beauties Rainham, ſuch the haunts
" Of angels in primæval guiltleſs days,
" When man imparadis'd convers'd with God."

This, my Lord, is but a faint picture of the place of your retirement, which no one ever enjoyed more elegantly: no part of your life lies heavy upon you; there is no uneaſy vacancy in it; it is all filled up with ſtudy, exerciſe, or polite amuſement: here you ſhine in the moſt agreeable, though not moſt ſtrong and dazzling light: in your public ſtation you commanded admiration and honour; in your private, you attract love and eſteem: the nobler parts of your life will be the ſubject of the hiſtorian; and the actions of the great ſtateſman and patriot will adorn many pages of our future annals: but the affectionate father, the indulgent maſter, the condeſcending and benevolent friend, patron, and companion, can only be deſcribed by thoſe who have the pleaſure and happineſs to ſee you act in all thoſe relations: I could with delight enlarge upon this amiable part of your character; but am ſenſible that no portion of your time is ſo ill ſpent as in reading what I write. I will therefore only beg the honour to ſubſcribe myſelf,

My Lord,
Your Lordſhip's moſt obliged,
And moſt obedient ſervant,
William Broome.

Pulham in Norfolk, 1739.

PREFACE.

I AM very ſenſible that many hard circumſtances attend all authors: if they write ill, they are ſure to be uſed with contempt; if well, too often with envy. Some men, even while they improve themſelves with the ſentiments of others, rail at their benefactors, and while they gather the fruit, tear the tree that bore it. I muſt confeſs, that mere idleneſs induced me to write; and the hopes of entertaining a few idle men to publiſh. I am not ſo vain as not to think there are many faults in the enſuing poems; all human works muſt fall ſhort of perfection; and therefore to acknowledge it, is no humility: however, I am not like thoſe authors, who, out of a falſe modeſty, complain of the imperfections of their own works, yet would take it very ill if the world ſhould believe them: I will not add hypocriſy to my other faults, or act ſo abſurdly as to invite the reader to an entertainment, and then tell him that there is nothing worth his eating; I have furniſhed out the table according to my beſt abilities, if not with a ſplendid elegance, yet at leaſt with an innocent variety.

But ſince this is the laſt time that I ſhall ever, perhaps, trouble the world in this kind, I will beg leave to ſpeak ſomething not as a poet, but a critic; that if my credit ſhould fail as a poet, I may have recourſe to my remarks upon Homer, and be pardoned for my induſtry as the annotator in part upon the Iliad, and entirely upon the Odyſſey,

I will therefore offer a few things upon criticiſm in general, a ſtudy very neceſſary, but fallen into contempt through the abuſe of it. At the reſtoration of learning, it was particularly neceſſary; authors had been long buried in obſcurity, and conſequently had contracted ſome ruſt through the ignorance and barbariſm of preceding ages: it was therefore very requiſite that they ſhould be poliſhed by a critical hand, and reſtored to their original purity: in this conſiſts the office of critics; but, inſtead of making copies agreeable to the manuſcripts, they have long inſerted their own conjectures; and from this licenſe ariſe moſt of the various readings, the burdens of modern editions; whereas books are like pictures, they may be new varniſhed, but not a feature is to be altered; and every ſtroke that is thus added, deſtroys in ſome degree the reſemblance; and the original is no longer an Homer or a Virgil, but a mere ideal perſon. the creature of the editor's fancy Whoever deviates from this rule, does not correct, but corrupt his author: and therefore, ſince moſt books worth reading have now good impreſſions, it is a folly to devote too much time to this branch of criticiſm; it is ridiculous to make it the ſupreme buſineſs of life to repair the ruins of a decayed word, to trouble the world with vain niceties about a letter, or a ſyllable, or the tranſpoſition of a phraſe, when the preſent reading is ſufficiently intelligible. Theſe learned triflers are mere weeders of an author; they collect the weeds for their own uſe, and permit others to gather the herbs and flowers: it would be of more advantage to mankind, when once an author is faithfully publiſhed, to turn our thoughts from the words to the ſentiments, and make them more eaſy and intelligible. A ſkill in verbal criticiſm is in reality but a ſkill in gueſſing, and conſequently he is the beſt critic who gueſſes beſt: a mighty attainment! and yet with what pomp is a trivial alteration uſhered into the world! ſuch writers are like Caligula, who raiſed a mighty army, and alarmed the whole world, and then led it to gather cockle-ſhells. In ſhort, the queſtion is not what the author might have ſaid, but what he has actually ſaid; it is not whether a different word will agree with the ſenſe, and turn of the period, but whether it was uſed by the author; if it was, it has a good title ſtill to maintain its poſt, and the authority of the manuſcript ought to be followed rather than the fancy of the editor: for can a modern be a better judge of the language of the pureſt of the ancients, than thoſe ancients who wrote it in the greateſt purity? or if he could, was ever any author ſo happy, as always to chooſe the moſt proper word? experience ſhows the impoſſibility. Beſides, of what uſe is verbal criticiſm when once we have a faithful edition? it embarraſſes the reader inſtead of giving new light and hinders his proficiency by engroſſing his time, and calling off the attention from the author to the editor; it increaſes the expence of books, and makes us pay an high price for trifles, and often for abſurdities. I will only add, with Sir Henry Saville, that various lections are now grown ſo voluminous, that we begin to value the firſt editions of books as moſt correct, becauſe leaſt corrected.

Of partial Critics.

There are other critics who think themſelves obliged to ſee no imperfections in their author: from the moment they undertake his cauſe, they look upon him as a lover upon his miſtreſs; he has no faults, or his very faults improve into beauties: this, indeed, is a well natured error, but ſtill blameable, becauſe it miſguides the judgment. Such critics act no leſs erroneouſly, than a judge who ſhould reſolve to acquit a perſon, whether innocent or guilty, who comes before him upon his trial It is frequeat for the partial critic to praiſe the work as he likes the author; he admires a book as an antiquary a medal, ſolely from the impreſſion of the name, and not from the intrinſic value: the copper of a favourite writer ſhall be more eſteemed than the fineſt gold of a leſs acceptable author: for this reaſon many perſons have choſen to publiſh their works without a name, and by this method, like Apelles, who ſtood unſeen behind his own Venus, have received a praiſe, which perhaps might have been denied if the author had been viſible.

Of envious and malicious Critics.

But there are other critics who act a contrary part, and condemn all as criminals whom they try: they dwell only on the faults of an author, and endeavour to raiſe a reputation by diſpraiſing every thing that other men praiſe; they have an antipathy to a ſhining character, like ſome animals, that hate the ſun only becauſe of its brightneſs: it is a crime with them to excel: they are a kind of Tartars in learning, who, ſeeing a perſon of diſtinguiſhed qualifications, immediately endeavour to kill him, in hopes to attain juſt ſo much merit as they deſtroy in their adverſary. I never look into one of theſe critics but he puts me in mind of a giant in romance: the glory of the giant conſiſts in the number of the limbs of men whom he has deſtroyed; that of the critic in viewing

" ——— Diſjecti membra Poetæ." HOR.

If ever he accidentally deviates into praiſe, he does it that his enſuing blame may fall with the greater weight; he adorns an author with a few flowers, as the ancients thoſe victims which they were ready to ſacrifice: he ſtudies criticiſm as if it extended only to diſpraiſe; a practice, which, when moſt ſucceſsful, is leaſt deſirable. A painter might juſtly be thought to have a perverſe imagination, who ſhould delight only to draw the deformities and diſtortions of human nature, which, when executed by the moſt maſterly hand, ſtrike the beholder with moſt horror. It is uſual with envious critics to attack the writings of others, becauſe they are good; they conſtantly prey upon the faireſt fruits, and hope to ſpread their own works by uniting them to thoſe of their adverſary. But this is like Mezentius in Virgil, to join a dead carcaſs to a living body; and the only effect of it, to fill every well-natured mind with deteſtation: their malice becomes impotent, and, contrary to their deſign, they give a teſtimony of their enemy's merit, and ſhow him to be an hero by turning all their weapons againſt him: ſuch critics are like dead coals; they may blacken, but cannot burn. Theſe writers bring to my memory a paſſage in the Iliad, where all the inferior powers, the Plebs Superûm, or rabble of the ſky, are fancied to unite their endeavours to pull Jupiter down to the earth: but by the attempt they only betray their own inability; Jupiter is ſtill Jupiter, and by their unavailing efforts they manifeſt his ſuperiority.

Modeſty is eſſential to true criticiſm: no man has a title to be a dictator in knowledge, and the ſenſe of our own infirmities ought to teach us to treat others with humanity. The envious critic ought to conſider, that if the authors he dead whom he cenſures, it is inhumanity to trample upon their aſhes with inſolence; that it is cruelty to ſummon, implead, and condemn them with rigour and animoſity, when they are not in a capacity to anſwer his unjuſt allegations: If the authors be alive, the common laws of ſociety oblige us not to commit any outrage againſt another's reputation; we ought modeſtly to convince, not injuriouſly inſult; and contend for truth, not victory: and yet the envious critic is like the tyrants of old, who thought it not enough to conquer, unleſs their enemies were made a public ſpectacle, and dragged in triumph at their chariot-wheels: but what is ſuch a triumph but a barbarous inſult over the calamities of their fellow-creatures? the noiſe of a day, purchaſed with the miſery of nations? However, I would not be thought to be pleading for an exemption from criticiſm; I would only have it circumſcribed within the rules of candour and humanity: writers may he told of their errors, provided it be with the decency and tenderneſs of a friend, not the malice and paſſion of an enemy; boys may be whipped into ſenſe, but men are to be guided with reaſon.

If we grant the malicious critic all that he claims, and allow him to have proved his adverſary's dulneſs, and his own acuteneſs, yet, as long as there is virtue in the world, modeſt dulneſs will be preferable to learned arrogance: Dulneſs may be a misfortune, but arrogance is a crime; and where is the mighty advantage, if, while he diſcovers more learning, he is found to have leſs virtue than his adverſary? and, though he be a better critic, yet proves himſelf to be a worſe man? Beſides, no one is to be envied the ſkill in finding ſuch faults as others are ſo dull as to miſtake for beauties. What advantage is ſuch a quickſightedneſs even to the poſſeſſors of it? It makes them difficult to be pleaſed, and gives them pain, while others receive a pleaſure: they reſemble the ſecond-ſighted people in Scotland, who are fabled to ſee more than other perſons; but all the benefit they reap from this privilege, is to diſcover objects of horror, ghoſts, and apparitions.

But it is time to end, though I have too much reaſon to enlarge the argument for candour in criticiſm, through a conſciouſneſs of my own deficiency: I have in reality been pleading my own cauſe, that if I appear too guilty to obtain a pardon, I may find ſo much mercy from my judges, as to be condemned to ſuffer without inhumanity: But whatever be the fate of theſe works, they have proved of uſe to me, and been an agreeable amuſement in a conſtant ſolitude. Providence has been pleaſed to lead me out of the great roads of life, into a private path; where, though we have leiſure to chooſe the ſmoothеſt way, yet we are all ſure to meet many obſtacles in the journey: I have found poetry an innocent companion, and ſupport from the fatigues of it; how long, or how ſhort, the future ſtages of it are to be, as it is uncertain, ſo it is a folly to be over-ſolicitous about it; he that lives the longeſt, has but the ſmalleſt privilege of creeping more leiſurely than others to his grave; what we call living, is in reality but a longer time of dying: and if theſe verſes prove as ſhort-lived as their author, it is a loſs not worth regretting; they only die, as they were born, in obſcurity.

HABBAKKUK, CHAP. III. PARAPHRASED.

AN ODE,

Written in 1710, as an Exercise.

When, in a glorious terrible array,
From Paran's towering height th' Almighty took his way;
Borne on a cherub's wings he rode,
Intolerable day proclaim'd the God;
No earthly cloud
Could his effulgent brightneſs ſhroud:
Glory, and majeſty, and power,
March'd in a dreadful pomp before;
Behind, a grim and meagre train,
Pining ſickneſs, frantic pain,
Stalk'd widely on! with all the diſmal band,
Which heaven in anger ſends to ſcourge a guilty land.

With terror cloth'd, he downward flew,
And wither'd half the nations with a view;
Through half the nations of th' aſtoniſh'd earth
He ſcatter'd war, and plagues, and dearth!
And when he ſpoke,
The everlaſting hills from their foundations ſhook;
The trembling mountains, by a lowly nod,
With reverence ſtruck, confeſs'd the God:
On Sion's holy hill he took his ſtand,
Graſping omnipotence in his right hand;
Then mighty earthquakes rock'd the ground,
And the ſun darken'd as he frown'd:
He dealt affliction from his van,
And wild confuſion from his rear;
They through the tents of Cuſhan ran,
The tents of Cuſhan quak'd with fear,
And Midian trembled with deſpair.
* I ſee! his ſword wave naked in the air;
It ſheds around a baleful ray,

VARIATION.

* I ſee his ſword wave with redoubled ire,
Ah! has it ſet the very clouds on fire?
The clouds burſt down in deluges of ſhowers;
Fierce lightning flames, vindictive thunder roars.

The rains pour down, the lightnings play,
And on their wings vindictive thunders bear.
When through the mighty flood
He led the murmuring crowd,
What ail'd the rivers that they backward fled?
Why was the mighty flood afraid?
March'd he againſt the rivers? or was he,
Thou mighty flood! diſpleas'd at thee?
The flood beheld from far
The Deity in all his equipage of war;
And lo! at once it burſts! in diverſe falls
On either hand! it ſwells in cryſtal walls!
Th' eternal rocks diſcloſe! the toſſing waves
Ruſh in loud thunder from a thouſand caves!
Why tremble ye, O faithleſs! to behold
The opening deeps their gulfs unfold?
Enter the dreadful chaſms! 'tis God, who guides
Your wond'rous way! the God who rules the tides!
And lo! they march amid the deafening roar
Of tumbling ſeas! they mount the adverſe ſhore!
Advance, ye choſen tribes!——Arabia's ſands
Lonely, uncomfortable lands!
Void of fountain, void of rain,
Oppoſe their burning coaſts in vain!
See! the great prophet ſtand,
Waving his wonder-working wand!
He ſtrikes the ſtubborn rock, and lo!
The ſtubborn rock feels the Almighty blow!
His ſtony entrails burſt, and ruſhing torrents flow.

* Then did the ſun his fiery courſers ſtay,
And backward held the falling day;

VARIATION.

* Ah, what new ſcenes unfold, what voice I hear!
Sun, ſtand thou ſtill; thou moon, thy courſe forbear:
Ah, ... ſun, thy wheels obedient ſtay,
Doubling the ſplendours of the wondrous day.
The nimble-footed minutes ceaſe to run
And urge the lazy hours on.
Time hangs his unexpanded wings,
And all the ſecret ſprings
That carry on the year
Stop in their full career;

The nimble-footed minutes ceas'd to run,
And urge the lazy hours on.
Time hung his unexpanded wings,
And all the secret springs
That carry on the year,
Stopp'd in their full career:
Then the astonish'd moon
Forgot her going down;
And paler grew,
The dismal scene to view,
How through the trembling Pagan nation,
Th' Almighty ruin dealt, and ghastly desolation.

But why, ah! why, O Sion, reigns
Wide wasting havock o'er thy plains?
Ah, me! destruction is abroad!
Vengeance is loose, and wrath from God!
See! hosts of spoilers seize their prey!
See! slaughter marks in blood his way!
See! how embattled Babylon
Like an unruly deluge rushes on!
Lo! the field with millions swarms!
I hear their shouts! their clashing arms!
Now the conflicting hosts engage,
With more than mortal rage!——
Oh! heaven! I faint——I die!——
The yielding powers of Israel fly!——
Now banner'd hosts surround the walls
Of Sion! now she sinks, she falls!——
Ah! Sion, how for thee I mourn!
What pangs for thee I feel!
Ah! how art thou become the Pagans' scorn,
Lovely, unhappy Israel!
A shivering damp invades my heart,
A trembling horror shoots through every part;
My nodding frame can scarce sustain
Th' oppressive load I undergo:
Speechless I sigh! the envious woe
Forbids the very pleasure to complain:
Forbids my faultering tongue to tell
What pangs for thee I feel,
Lovely, unhappy Israel!

Yet though the fig-tree should no burthen bear,
Though vines delude the promise of the year;
Yet though the olive should not yield her oil,
Nor the parch'd glebe reward the peasant's toil;
Though the tir'd ox beneath his labours fall,
And herds in millions perish from the stall;
Yet shall my grateful strings
For ever praise thy name,
For ever thee proclaim,
Thee everlasting God, the mighty King of Kings.

TO BELINDA,

ON HER SICKNESS AND RECOVERY.

Sure never pain such beauty wore,
Or look'd so amiable before!

You graces give to a disease,
Adorn the pain, and make it please:
Thus burning incense sheds perfumes,
Still fragrant as it still consumes.

Nor can even sickness, which disarms
All other nymphs, destroy your charms;
A thousand beauties you can spare,
And still be fairest of the fair.

But see! the pain begins to fly;
Though Venus bled, she could not die:
See! the new phœnix paint her eyes,
And lovelier from her ashes rise:
Thus roses, when the storm is o'er,
Draw beauties from th' inclement shower.

Welcome, ye hours! which thus repay
What envious sickness stole away!
Welcome as those which kindly bring,
And usher in the joyous spring;
That to the smiling earth restore
The beauteous herb, and blooming flower,
And give her all the charms she lost
By wintery storms, and hoary frost!

And yet how well did she sustain,
And greatly triumph o'er her pain!
So flowers, when blasting winds invade,
Breathe sweet, and beautifully fade.

Now in her cheeks, and radiant eyes,
New blushes glow, new lightnings rise;
Behold a thousand charms succeed,
For which a thousand hearts must bleed!
Brighter from her disease she shines,
As fire the precious gold refines.

Thus when the silent grave becomes
Pregnant with life, as fruitful wombs;
When the wide seas, and spacious earth,
Resign us to our second birth;
Our moulder'd frame rebuilt assumes
New beauty, and for ever blooms;
And, crown'd with youth's immortal pride,
We angels rise, who mortals dy'd.

TO BELINDA,

ON HER APRON EMBROIDERED WITH ARMS AND FLOWERS.

* The listening trees Amphion drew
To dance from hills, where once they grew:
But you express a power more great;
The flowers you draw not, but create.

Behold your own creation rise,
And smile beneath your radiant eyes!
'Tis beauteous all! and yet receives
From you more graces than it gives.

But say, amid the softer charms
Of blooming flowers, what mean these arms?

VARIATION.

At once th' astonish'd moon
Forgets her going down,
And paler grows,
To view th' amazing train of woes;
While through the trembling Pagan nation
Th' Almighty ruin deals, and ghastly desolation.

VARIATION.

* The lovely Flora paints the earth,
And calls the morning flowers to birth:
But you display a power more great;
She calls forth flowers, but you create.

So round the fragrance of the roſe,
The pointed thorn, to guard it, grows.

But cruel you, who thus employ
Both arms and beauty to deſtroy!
So Venus marches to the fray
In armour, formidably gay.

It is a dreadful pleaſing ſight!
The flowers attract, the arms affright;
The flowers with lively beauty bloom,
The arms denounce an inſtant doom.

Thus, when the Britons in array
Their enſigns to the ſun diſplay,
In the ſame flag are lilies ſhown,
And angry lions fiercely frown;
On high the glittering ſtandard flies,
And conquers all things—like your eyes.

PART OF THE XXXVIII. AND XXXIX. CHAPTERS OF JOB.

A PARAPHRASE.

Now from the ſplendors of his bright abode
On wings of all the winds th' Almighty rode,
And the loud voice of thunder ſpoke the God.
Cherubs and ſeraphs from celeſtial bowers,
Ten thouſand thouſand! bright ethereal powers!
Miniſtrant round, their radiant files unfold,
Arm'd in eternal adamant and gold!
Whirlwinds and thundrous ſtorms his chariot drew
'Twixt worlds and worlds, triumphant as it flew:
He ſtretch'd his dark pavilion o'er the floods,
Bade hills ſubſide, and rein'd th' obedient clouds;
Then from his awful gloom the Godhead ſpoke,
And at his voice affrighted nature ſhook.

Vain man! who boldly with dim reaſon's ray
Vies with his God, and rivals his full day!
* But tell me now, ſay how this beauteous frame
Of all things, from the womb of nothing came;
When nature's Lord, with one almighty call,
From nowhere rais'd the world's capacious ball?
Say if thy hand directs the various rounds
Of the vaſt earth, and circumſcribes the bounds?
How orbs oppos'd to orbs amid the ſky,
In concert move, and dance in harmony?
What wondrous pillars their foundations bear
When hung ſelf-balanc'd in the fluid air?
Why the vaſt tides ſometimes with wanton play
In ſhining mazes gently glide away;
Anon, why ſwelling with impetuous ſtores
Tumultuous tumbling, thunder to the ſhores?
By thy command does fair Aurora riſe,
And gild with purple beams the bluſhing ſkies;
The warbling lark ſalutes her cheerful ray,
And welcomes with his ſong the riſing day;
The riſing day ambroſial dew diſtils,
Th' ambroſial dew with balmy odour fills
The flowers, the flowers rejoice, and nature ſmiles.

VARIATION.

* But tell me, mortal, when th' Almighty ſaid,
Be made, ye worlds! how worlds at once were made;
When hoſts of angels, wrapt in wonder, ſung
His praiſe, as order from diſorder ſprung?

Why night, in ſable rob'd, as daylight fades,
O'er half the nations draws her awful ſhades?
Now peaceful nature lies diffus'd in eaſe;
A ſolemn ſtillneſs reigns o'er land and ſeas.
* Sleep ſheds o'er all his balm! to ſleep reſign'd,
Birds, beaſts lie huſh'd, and buſy human-kind.
No air of breath diſturbs the drowſy woods,
No whiſpers murmur from the ſilent floods!
The moon ſheds down a ſilver-ſtreaming light,
And glads the melancholic face of night:
Now clouds ſwift-ſkimming veil her ſullied ray,
† Now bright ſhe blazes with a fuller day:
The ſtars in order twinkle in the ſkies,
And fall in ſilence, and in ſilence riſe:
Till, as a giant ſtrong, a bridegroom gay,
The ſun ſprings dancing through the gates of day:
He ſhakes his dewy locks, and hurls his beams
O'er the proud hills, and down the glowing ſtreams:
His fiery courſers bound above the main,
And whirl the car along th' ethereal plain:
The fiery courſers and the car diſplay
A ſtream of glory, and a flood of day.
Did e'er thy eye deſcend into the deep
Or haſt thou ſeen where infant tempeſts ſleep?
Was e'er the grave, or regions of the night,
Yet trod by thee, or open'd to thy ſight?
Has death diſclos'd to thee her gloomy ſtate,
The ghaſtly forms; the various woes that wait
In terrible array before her awful gate?
Know'ſt thou where darkneſs bears eternal ſway,
Or where the ſource of everlaſting day?
Say, why the thriving hail with ruſhing ſound
Pours from on high, and rattles on the ground?
Why hover ſnows, down-wavering by degrees,
Shine from the hills, or glitter from the trees?
Say, why in lucid drops the balmy rain
With ſparkling gems impearls the ſpangled plain?
Or, gathering in the vale, a current flows,
And on each flower a ſudden ſpring beſtows?
Say, why with gentle ſighs the evening breeze
Salutes the flowers, or murmurs through the trees?
Or why loud winds in ſtorms of vengeance fly,
Howl o'er the main, and thunder in the ſky?
Say, to what wondrous magazines repair
The viewleſs beings, when ſerene the air?
Till, from their dungeons loos'd, they roar aloud,
Upturn whole oceans, and toſs cloud on cloud,
While waves encountering waves, in mountains driven,
Swell to the ſtarry vault, and daſh the heaven.
Know'ſt thou, why comets threaten in the air,
Heralds of woe, deſtruction, and deſpair,
The plague, the ſword, and all the forms of war?
On ruddy wings why forky light'ning flies,
And rolling thunder grumbles in the ſkies?

VARIATIONS.

* No more the monſters of the deſert roar,
Doubling the terrors of the midnight hour.
The fowl, the fiſhes, to repoſe reſign'd,
All, all lie huſh'd, and buſy human-kind.
The fainting murmur dies upon the floods,
And ſighing breezes lull the drowſy woods.

† Now bright ſhe blazes, and ſupplies the day.

Say, can thy voice, when sultry Sirius reigns,
And suns intensely glowing cleave the plains,
Th' exhausted urns of thirsty springs supply,
And mitigate the fever of thy sky? [clouds,
Or, when the heavens are charg'd with gloomy
And half the skies precipitate in floods,
Chase the dark horror of the storm away,
Restrain the deluge, and restore the day?
By thee does summer deck herself with charms,
Or hoary winter lock his frozen arms?
Say, if thy hand instruct the rose to glow,
Or to the lily give unsullied snow?
Teach fruits to knit from blossoms by degrees,
Swell into orbs, and load the bending trees,
Whose various kinds a various hue unfold,
With crimson blush, or burnish into gold?
Say, why the sun arrays with shining dyes
The gaudy bow that gilds the gloomy skies?
He from his urn pours forth his golden streams,
And humid clouds imbibe the glittering beams;
Sweetly the varying colours fade or rise,
And the vast arch embraces half the skies.
Say, didst thou give the mighty seas their bars,
Fill air with fowl, or light up heaven with stars,
Whose thousand times ten thousand lamps display
A friendly radiance, mingling ray with ray?
Say, canst thou rule the courlers of the sun,
Or lash the lazy sign, Boötes, on?
Dost thou instruct the eagle how to fly,
To mount the viewless winds, and tower the sky?
On sounding pinions borne, he soars, and shrouds
His proud aspiring head among the clouds;
Strong-pounc'd, and fierce, he darts upon his prey,
He sails in triumph through th' ethereal way,
Bears on the sun, and basks in open day.
Does the dread king, and terror of the wood,
The lion, from thy hand expect his food?
Stung with keen hunger from his den he comes,
Ranges the plains, and o'er the forest roams:
* He snuffs the track of beasts, he fiercely roars,
Doubling the horrors of the midnight hours:
With sullen majesty he stalks away,
And the rocks tremble while he seeks his prey:
Dreadful he grins, he rends the savage brood
With unsheath'd paws, and churns the spouting blood.
Dost thou with thunder arm the generous horse,
Add nervous limbs, or swiftness for the course?
Fleet as the wind, he shoots along the plain,
And knows no check, nor hears the curbing rein;
His fiery eye-balls, formidably bright,
Dart a fierce glory, and a dreadful light:
Pleas'd with the clank of arms, and trumpets' sound,
He bounds, and prancing paws the trembling ground;
He snuffs the promis'd battle from afar, [war:
Neighs at the captains, shouts, and thunder of the
Rous'd with the noble din and martial sight,
He pants with tumults of severe delight:
His sprightly blood an eyen course disdains,
Pours from his heart, and charges in his veins;
He braves the spear, and mocks the twanging bow,
Demands the fight, and rushes on the foe.

VARIATION.

* He mocks the beating storms and wintery showers,
Making night hideous as he sternly roars.

MELANCHOLY:

AN ODE.

Occasioned by the Death of a beloved Daughter. 1723.

Adieu vain mirth, and noisy joys!
Ye gay desires, deluding toys!
Thou, thoughtful melancholy, deign
To hide me in thy pensive train!
If by the fall or murmuring floods,
Where awful shades embrown the woods,
Or if, where winds in caverns groan,
Thou wanderest silent and alone;
Come, blissful mourner, wisely sad,
In sorrow's garb, in sable clad,
Henceforth, thou care, my hours employ!
Sorrow, be thou henceforth my joy!
By tombs where sullen spirits stalk,
Familiar with the dead I walk;
While to my sighs and groans by turns,
From graves the midnight echo mourns.
Open thy marble jaws, O tomb,
Though earth conceal me in thy womb!
And you, ye worms, this frame confound,
Ye brother reptiles of the ground!
O life, frail offspring of a day!
'Tis puff'd with one short gasp away!
Swift as the short-liv'd flower it flies,
It springs, it blooms, it fades, it dies.
With cries we usher in our birth,
With groans resign our transient breath:
While round, stern ministers of fate,
Pain, and disease, and sorrow wait.
While childhood reigns, the sportive boy
Learns only prettily to toy;
And while he roves from play to play
The wanton trifles life away.
When to the noon of life we rise,
The man grows elegant in vice;
To glorious guilt in courts he climbs,
Vilely judicious in his crimes.
When youth and strength in age are lost,
Man seems already half a ghost;
Wither'd and wan to earth he bows,
A walking hospital of woes.
Oh happiness, thou empty name!
Say, art thou bought by gold or fame?
What art thou, gold, but shining earth?
Thou, common fame, but common breath?
If virtue contradict the voice
Of public fame, applause is noise;
Ev'n victors are by conquest curst,
The bravest warrior is the worst.
Look round on all that man below
Idly calls great, and all is show!
All, to the coffin from our birth,
In this vast toy-shop of the earth.

Come then, O friend of virtuous woe,
With ſolemn pace, demure, and ſlow:
Lo! ſad and ſerious, I purſue
Thy ſteps—adieu, vain world, adieu!

DAPHNIS AND LYCIDAS;

A PASTORAL.

[They ſing the different ſucceſs and abſence of their loves.]

To the Right Honourable the Lord Viſcount Townſhend, of Rainham in Norfolk.

——"Sylvæ ſunt Conſule dignæ."—VIRG.

Daphnis.

How calm the evening! ſee the falling day
Gilds every mountain with a ruddy ray!
In gentle ſighs the ſoftly whiſpering breeze
Salutes the flowers, and waves the trembling trees;
Hark! the night-warbler, from yon vocal boughs,
Glads every valley with melodious woes!
Swift through the air her rounds the ſwallow takes,
Or ſportive ſkims the level of the lakes.
The timorous deer, ſwift-ſtarting as they graze,
Bound off in crowds, then turn again, and gaze.
See! how yon ſwans, with ſnowy pride elate,
Arch their high necks, and ſail along in ſtate!
Thy friſking flocks ſafe-wandering crop the plain,
And the glad ſeaſon claims a gladſome ſtrain.
Begin——Ye echoes liſten to the ſong,
And with its ſweetneſs pleas'd, each note prolong!

Lycidas.

Sing, muſe—and oh! my Townſhend deign to view
What the muſe ſings, to Townſhend this is due!
Who carrying with him all the world admires,
From all the world illuſtriouſly retires;
And calmly wandering in his Rainham, roves
By lake, or ſpring, by thicket, lawn, or groves;
Where verdant hills or vales, where fountains ſtray,
Charm every thought of idle pomp away;
Unenvy'd views the ſplendid toils of ſtate,
In private happy, as in public great.
Thus godlike Scipio, on whoſe cares reclin'd
The burden and repoſe of half mankind,
Left to the vain their pomp, and calmly ſtray'd,
The world forgot, beneath the laurel ſhade;
Nor longer would be great, but void of ſtrife,
Clos'd in ſoft peace his eve of glorious life.
Feed round, my goats; ye ſheep, in ſafety graze;
Ye winds, breathe gently while I tune my lays.
The joyous ſpring draws nigh; ambroſial ſhowers
Unbind the earth, the earth unbinds the flowers;
The flowers blow ſweet, the daffodils unfold
The ſpreading glories of their blooming gold.

Daphnis.

As the gay hours advance, the bloſſoms ſhoot,
The knitting bloſſoms harden into fruit;
And as the autumn by degrees enſues,
The mellowing fruits diſplay their ſtreaky hues.

Lycidas.

When the winds whiſtle, and the tempeſt roars,
When foaming billows laſh the ſounding ſhores,
The bloomy beauties of the paſtures die,
And in gay heaps of fragrant ruin lie.

Daphnis.

Severe the ſtorms! when ſhuddering winter binds
The earth! but winter yields to vernal winds.
Oh Love! thy rigour my whole life deforms,
More cold than winter, more ſevere than ſtorms!

Lycidas.

Sweet is the ſpring, and gay the ſummer hours,
When balmy odours breathe from painted flowers;
But neither ſweet the ſpring, nor ſummer gay,
When ſhe I love, my charmer, is away.

Daphnis.

To ſavage rocks, through bleak inclement ſkies,
Deaf as thoſe rocks, from me my fair one flies:
Oh virgin, ceaſe to fly! th' inclement air [ſpare!
May hurt thy charms!—but thou haſt charms to

Lycidas.

I love, and ever ſhall my love remain,
The faireſt, kindeſt virgin of the plain;
With equal paſſion her ſoft boſom glows,
Feels the ſweet pains, and ſhares the heavenly woes.

Daphnis.

With a feign'd paſſion, ſhe I love beguiles,
And gayly falſe the dear diſſembler ſmiles;
But let her ſtill thoſe bleſt deceits employ,
Still may ſhe feign, and cheat me into joy!

Lycidas.

On yonder bank the yielding nymph reclin'd,
Gods! how tranſported I, and ſhe how kind!
There riſe, ye flowers, and there your pride diſplay,
There ſhed your odours where the fair-one lay!

Daphnis.

Once, as my fair-one in the roſy bower
In gentle ſlumbers paſs'd the noon-tide hour,
Soft I approach'd, and raptur'd with the bliſs,
At leiſure gaz'd, then ſtole a ſilent kiſs:
She wak'd; when conſcious ſmiles, but ill repreſt
Spoke no diſdain!—Was ever ſwain ſo bleſt?

Lycidas.

With fragrant apples from the bending bough
In ſport my charmer gave her ſwain a blow:
The fair offender, of my wrath afraid,
Fled, till I ſeiz'd and kiſs'd the blooming maid;
She ſmil'd, and vow'd if thus her crimes I pay,
She would offend a thouſand times a day!

Daphnis.

O'er the ſteep mountains, and the pathleſs mead,
From my embrace the lovely ſcorner fled;
But ſtumbling in the flight, by chance ſhe fell:
I ſaw—but what—her lover will not tell.

Lycidas.

From me my fair-one fled, diſſembling play,
And in the dark conceal'd the wanton lay;
But laugh'd, and ſhow'd by the directing ſound
She only hid, in ſecret to be found.

Daphnis.

Far hence to happier climes Belinda ſtrays,
But in my breaſt her lovely image ſtays;
Oh! to theſe plains again, bright nymph, repair,
Or from my breaſt far hence thy image bear!

Lycidas.

Come, Delia, come! till Delia bleſs theſe ſeats,
Hide me, ye groves, within your dark retreats!
In hollow groans, ye winds, around me blow!
Ye bubbling fountains, murmur to my woe!

Daphnis.

Where'er Belinda roves, ye zephyrs, play!
Where'er she treads, ye flowers, adorn the way!
From sultry suns, ye groves, my charmer keep!
Ye bubbling fountains, murmur to her sleep!

Lycidas.

If streams smooth-wandering, Delia, yield delight;
If the gay rose, or lily, please thy sight;
Smooth streams here wander, here the roses glow,
Here the proud lilies rise to shade thy brow!

Daphnis.

Aid me, ye muses, while I loud proclaim
What love inspires, and sing Belinda's name:
Wast it, ye breezes, to the hills around;
And sport, ye echoes, with the favourite sound.

Lycidas.

Thy name, my Delia, shall improve my song,
The pleasing labour of my ravish'd tongue:
Her name to heaven propitious zephyrs hear,
And breathe it to her kindred angels there!

Daphnis.

But see! the night displays her starry train,
Soft silver dews impearl the glittering plain;
An awful horror fills the gloomy woods,
And bluish mists rise from the smoking floods:
* Haste, Daphnis, haste to fold thy woolly care,
The deepening shades imbrown th' unwholesome air.

THE FIRST ODE OF HORACE,

TRANSLATED.

MÆCENAS, whose high lineage springs
From a long race of ancient kings,
Patron and friend! thy honour'd name
At once is my defence and fame.

There are, who with fond transport praise
The chariot thundering in the race;
Where conquest won, and palms bestow'd,
Lift the proud mortal to a god.

The man who courts the people's voice,
And doats on offices and noise;
Or they who till the peaceful fields,
And reap what bounteous nature yields,
Unmov'd, the merchant's wealth behold,
Nor hazard happiness for gold;
Untempted by whole worlds of gain
To stem the billows of the main.

The merchant, when the storm invades,
Envies the quiet of the shades;
But soon relaunches from the shore,
Dreading the crime of being poor.

Some careless waste the mirthful day
With generous wines, and wanton play,
Indulgent of the genial hour,
By spring, or rill, or shade, or bower.

Some hear with joy the clanging jar
Of trumpets, that alarm to war;
While matrons tremble at the breath
That calls their sons to arms and death.

VARIATION.

* Haste, Lycidas, to fold, &c.

The sportsman, train'd in storms, defies
The chilling blast, and freezing skies:
Unmindful of his bride, in vain
Soft beauty pleads: along the plain
The stag he chases, or beguiles
The furious boar into his toils.

For you the blooming ivy grows,
Proud to adorn your learned brows;
Patron of letters you arise,
Grow to a god, and mount the skies.

Humbly in breezy shades I stray
Where sylvans dance, and satyrs play;
Contented to advance my claim,
Only o'er men without a name;
Transcribing what the muses sing
Harmonious to the pipe or string.

But if indulgently you deign
To rank me with the lyric train,
Aloft the towering muse shall rise
On bolder wings, and gain the skies.

AN EPISTLE

To my Friend Mr. Elijah Fenton, Author of Mariamne, a Tragedy. 1726.

WHY art thou slow to strike th' harmonious shell,
Averse to sing, who know'st to sing so well?
If thy proud muse the tragic buskin wears,
Great Sophocles revives and re-appears;
While, regularly bold, she nobly sings
Strains worthy to detain the ears of kings:
If by thy hand th' Homeric lyre be strung,
The lyre returns such sounds as Homer sung.
The kind compulsion of a friend obey,
And, though reluctant, swell the lofty lay;
Then listening groves once more shall catch the sound,
While Grecian muses sing on British ground.
Thus calm and silent thy own Proteus roves
Through pearly mazes, and through coral groves;
But when, emerging from the azure main,
Coercive bands th' unwilling God constrain,
Then heaves his bosom with prophetic fires,
And his tongue speaks sublime, what heaven inspires.
Envy, 'tis true, with barbarous rage invades
What ev'n fierce lightning spares, the laurel shades;
And critics, bias'd by mistaken rules,
Like Turkish zealots, reverence none but fools.
But praise from such injurious tongues is shame;
They rail the happy author into fame:
Thus Phœbus through the zodiac takes his way,
And rises amid monsters into day.
Oh vileness of mankind! when writing well
Becomes a crime, and danger to excel!
While noble scorn, my friend, such insult sees,
And flies from towns to wilds, from men to trees.
Free from the lust of wealth, and glittering snares,
That make th' unhappy great in love with cares,
Me humble joys in calm retirement please,
A silent happiness and learned ease.
Deny me grandeur, heaven, but goodness grant!
A king is less illustrious than a saint:

Hail, holy virtue! come, thou heavenly gueſt,
Come, fix thy pleaſing empire in my breaſt!
* Thou know'ſt her influence, friend! thy cheerful mien
Proclaims the innocence and peace within;
Such joys as none but ſons of virtue know,
Shine in thy face, and in thy boſom glow.
So when the holy mount the prophet trod,
And talk'd familiar as a friend with God,
Celeſtial radiance every feature ſhed,
And ambient glories dawn'd around his head.
Sure what th' unthinking great miſtaken call
Their happineſs, is folly, folly all!
Like lofty mountains in the clouds they hide
Their haughty heads, but ſwell with barren pride;
And while low vales in uſeful beauty lie,
Heave their proud naked ſummits to the ſky.
In honour, as in place, ye great, tranſcend!
An angel fall'n, degenerates to a fiend:
Th' all-cheering ſun is honour'd with his ſhrines;
Not that he moves aloft, but that he ſhines.
Why flames the ſtar on Walpole's generous breaſt?
Not that he's higheſt, but becauſe he's beſt;
Fond to oblige; in bleſſing others, bleſt.
How wondrous few, by avarice uncontrol'd,
Have virtue to ſubdue the thirſt of gold!
The ſhining dirt the ſordid wretch enſnares
To buy, with mighty treaſures, mighty cares;
Blindly he courts, miſguided by the will,
A ſpacious good, and meets a real ill:
So when Ulyſſes plough'd the ſurgy main;
When now in view appear'd his native reign,
His wayward mates th' Æolian bag unbind,
Expecting treaſures, but out-ruſh'd a wind;
The ſudden hurricane in thunder rears,
Buffets the bark, and whirls it from the ſhores.
O heaven! by what vain paſſions man is ſway'd,
Proud of his reaſon, by his will betray'd!
Blindly he wanders in purſuit of vice,
And hates confinement, though in paradiſe;
Doom'd, when enlarg'd, inſtead of Eden's bowers,
To rove in wilds, and gather thorns for flowers;
Between th' extremes, direct he ſees the way,
Yet wilful ſwerves, perverſely fond to ſtray!
Whilſt niggard ſouls indulge their craving thirſt,
Rich without bounty, with abundance curſt;
The prodigal purſues expenſive vice,
And buys diſhonour at a mighty price;
On beds of ſtate the ſplendid glutton ſleeps,
While ſtarving merit unregarded weeps:
His ill-plac'd bounty, while ſcorn'd virtue grieves,
A dog, a fawning ſycophant receives;
And cringing knaves, or haughty ſtrumpets, ſhare
What would make ſorrow ſmile, and cheer deſpair.
Then would'ſt thou ſteer where fortune ſpreads the ſails?
Go, flatter vice! for ſeldom flattery fails:
Soft through the ear the pleaſing bane diſtills:
Delicious poiſon! in perfumes it kills!

VARIATION.

* Thou feel'ſt her power, my friend, &c.

Be all but virtuous: Oh! unwiſe to live
Unfaſhionably good, and hope to thrive!
Trees that aloft with proudeſt honours riſe,
Root hell-ward, and thence flouriſh to the ſkies.
O happier thou, my friend, with eaſe content,
Bleſt with the conſcience of a life well-ſpent!
Nor would'ſt be great; but guide thy gather'd ſails,
Safe by the ſhore nor tempt the rougher gales;
For ſure, of all that feel the wound of fate,
None are completely wretched but the great:
Superior woes, ſuperior ſtations bring;
A peaſant ſleeps, while cares awake a king:
Who reigns, muſt ſuffer! crowns with gems inlaid
At once adorn and load the royal head:
Change but the ſcene, and kings in duſt decay,
Swept from the earth the pageants of a day;
There no diſtinctions on the dead await,
But pompous graves, and rottenneſs in ſtate.
Such now are all that ſhone on earth before;
Cæſar and mighty Marlborough are no more!
Unhallow'd feet o'er awful Tully tread,
And Hyde and Plato join the vulgar dead;
And all the glorious aims that can employ
The ſoul of mortals, muſt with Hanmer die:
O Compton, when this breath we once reſign,
My duſt ſhall be as eloquent as thine!
Till that laſt hour which calls me hence away
To pay that great arrear which all muſt pay;
Oh! may I tread the paths which ſaints have trod,
Who knew they walk'd before th' all-ſeeing God!
Studious from ways of wicked men to keep,
Who mock at vice, while grieving angels weep.
Come, taſte, my friend! the joys retirement brings,
Look down on royal ſlaves, and pity kings.
More happy! laid where trees with trees entwin'd
In bowery arches tremble to the wind,
With innocence and ſhade like Adam bleſt,
While a new Eden opens in the breaſt!
Such were the ſcenes deſcending angels trod
In guiltleſs days, when man convers'd with God,
Then ſhall my lyre to loftier ſounds be ſtrung,
Inſpir'd by * Homer, or what thou haſt ſung:
My muſe from thine ſhall catch a warmer ray;
As clouds are brighten'd by the God of day.
So trees unapt to bear, by art refin'd,
With ſhoots ennobled of a generous kind,
High o'er the ground with fruits adopted riſe,
And liſt their ſpreading honours to the ſkies.

A DIALOGUE

Between a Lady and her Looking-Claſs, while ſhe had the Green-Sickneſs.

The gay Ophelia view'd her face
In the clear cryſtal of her glaſs;
The lightning from her eye was fled,
Her cheek was pale, the roſes dead.

Then thus Ophelia, with a frown:—
Art thou, falſe thing, perfidious grown!
I never could have thought, I ſwear,
To find ſo great a ſlanderer there!

Falſe thing! thy malice I defy!
Beaux vow I'm fair—who never lye.

* Dr. Broome tranſlated eight books of the Odyſſey.

More brittle far than brittle thou,
Would every grace of woman grow,
If charms so great so soon decay,
The bright possession of a day!
But this I know, and this declare,
That thou art false, and I am fair.

The glass was vex'd to be bely'd,
And thus with angry tone reply'd:

No more to me of falsehood talk,
But leave your oatmeal and your chalk!
'Tis true, you're meagre, pale, and wan;
The reason is, you're sick for man.—

While yet it spoke, Ophelia frown'd,
And dash'd th' offender to the ground;
With fury from her arm it fled,
And round a glittering ruin spread;
When lo! the parts pale looks disclose,
Pale looks in every fragment rose;
Around the room instead of one,
An hundred pale Ophelias shone;
Away the frighted virgin flew,
And humbled, from herself withdrew.

THE MORAL.

Ye beaux, who tempt the fair and young,
With snuff, and nonesense, dance, and song;
Ye men of compliment and lace!
Behold this image in the glass:
The wondrous force of flattery prove,
To cheat fond virgins into love:
Though pale the cheek, yet swear it glows
With the vermilion of the rose:
Praise them—for praise is always true,
Though with both eyes the cheat they view.
From hateful truths the virgin flies;
But the false sex is caught with lies.

A POEM ON THE SEAT OF WAR IN FLANDERS,

Chiefly with Relation to the Sieges:

WITH THE PRAISE OF PEACE AND RETIREMENT, WRITTEN IN 1710.

"Secessus mei non desidiæ nomen, sed tranquillitatis accipiant."—PLIN.

Happy, thou Flandria, on whose fertile plains,
In wanton pride luxurious plenty reigns;
Happy! had heaven bestow'd one blessing more,
And plac'd thee distant from the Gallic power!
But now in vain thy lawns attract the view,
They but invite the victor to subdue:
War, horrid war, the sylvan scene invades,
And angry trumpets pierce the woodland shades;
Here shatter'd towers, proud works of many an age,
Lie dreadful monuments of human rage;
There palaces and hallow'd domes display
Majestic ruins, awful in decay!
Thy very dust, though unistinguish'd trod,
Compos'd, perhaps, some hero, great and good,
Who nobly for his country lost his blood!

Ev'n with the grave, the haughty spoilers war,
And death's dark mansions wide disclose to air:
O'er kings and saints insulting stalk, nor dread
To spurn the ashes of the glorious dead.
See! the Britannic lions wave in air! [war!
See! mighty Marlborough breathing death and
From Albion's shores, at Anna's high commands,
The dauntless hero pours his martial bands.
As when in wrath stern Mars the thunderer sends
To scourge his foes; in pomp the God descends;
He mounts his iron car; with fury burns;
The car fierce-rattling thunders as it turns;
Gloomy he grasps his adamantine shield,
And scatters armies o'er th' ensanguin'd field:
With delegated wrath thus Marlborough glows,
In vengeance rushing on his country's foes.
See! round the hostile towers embattled stands
His banner'd host, embodied bands by bands!
Hark! the shrill trumpet sends a mortal sound,
And prancing horses shake the solid ground;
The surly drums beat terrible afar,
With all the dreadful music of the war;
From the drawn swords effulgent flames arise,
Flash o'er the plains, and lighten to the skies;
The heavens above, the fields and floods beneath,
Glare formidably bright, and shine with death;
In fiery storms descends a murderous shower,
Thick flash the lightnings, fierce the thunders roar;
As when in wrathful mood Almighty Jove
Aims his dire bolts red-hissing from above;
Through the sing'd air, with unresisted sway,
The forky vengeance rends its flaming way,
And, while the firmament with thunder roars,
From their foundations hurls imperial towers;
So rush the globes with many a fiery round,
Tear up the rock, or rend the stedfast mound.
Death shakes aloft her dart, and o'er her prey
Stalks with dire joy, and marks in blood her way;
Mountains of heroes slain deform the ground,
The shape of man half bury'd in the wound:
And lo! while in the shock of war they close,
While swords meet swords, and foes encounter foes,
The treacherous earth, beneath their footsteps cleaves,
Her entrails tremble, and her bosom heaves;
Sudden in bursts of fire eruptions rise,
And whirl the torn battalions to the skies.
Thus earthquakes, rumbling with a thundering sound,
Shake the firm world, and rend the cleaving ground;
Rocks, hills, and groves, are tost into the sky,
And in one mighty ruin nations die.
See! through th' encumber'd air the ponderous bomb
Bears magazines of death within its womb;
The glowing orb displays a blazing train,
And darts bright horror through th' ethereal plain;
* It mounts tempestuous, and with hideous sound
Wheels down the heavens, and thunders o'er the ground:

VARIATION.

* Ev'n the stern souls of heroes feel dismay;
Proud temples nod, aspiring towers give way,

Th' imprison'd deaths rush dreadful in a blaze,
And mow a thousand lives, a thousand ways;
† Earth floats with blood, while spreading flames arise
From palaces, and domes, and kindle half the skies.
Thus terribly in air the comets roll,
And shoot malignant gleams from pole to pole;
'Tween worlds and worlds they move, and from their hair
Shake the blue plague, the pestilence, and war.
But who is he, who stern bestrides the plain,
Who drives triumphant o'er huge hills of slain;
Serene, while engines from the hostile tower
Rain from their brazen mouths an iron shower;
While turbid fiery smoke obscures the day,
Hews through the deathful breach his desperate way?
Sure Jove descending joins the martial toil;
Or is it Marlborough, or the great Argyll?
Thus, when the Grecians, furious to destroy,
Levell'd the structures of imperial Troy;
Here angry Neptune hurl'd his vengeful mace,
There Jove o'erturn'd it from his inmost base:
Though brave, yet vanquish'd, she confess'd the odds;
Her sons were heroes, but they fought with gods.
Ah! what new horrors rise? In deep array
The squadrons form aloft the standards play!
The captains draw the sword! on every brow
Determin'd valour lowers! the trumpets blow!
See! the brave Briton delves the cavern'd ground
Through the hard entrails of the stubborn mound!
And, undismay'd by death, the foe invades
Through dreadful horrors of infernal shades!
In vain the wall's broad base deep-rooted lies,
In vain an hundred turrets threat the skies!
Lo! while at ease the bands immur'd repose,
Nor careless dream of subterranean foes,
Like the Cadmæan host, embattled swarms
Start from the earth, and clash their sounding arms,
And, pouring war and slaughter from beneath,
Wrap towers, walls, men, in fire, in blood, in death.
So some sam'd torrent dives within the caves
Of opening earth, ingulph'd with all his waves;
High o'er the latent stream the shepherd feeds
His wandering flock, and tunes the sprightly reed:
Till from some rifted chasm the billows rise,
And foaming burst tumultuous to the skies;
Then roaring dreadful o'er the delug'd plain,
Sweep herds and hinds in thunder to the main.
Bear me, ye friendly powers, to gentler scenes,
To shadowy bowers, and never-fading greens!
Where the shrill trumpet never sound alarms,
Nor martial din is heard, nor clash of arms;
Hail, ye soft seats! ye limpid springs and floods!
Ye flowery meads, ye vales, and woods!
Ye limpid floods, that ever murmuring flow!
Ye verdant meads, where flowers eternal blow!
Ye shady vales, where zephyrs ever play!
Ye woods, where little warblers tune their lay!
Here grant me, heaven, to end my peaceful days,
And steal myself from life by slow decays;
Draw health from food the temperate garden yields
From fruit, or herb, the bounty of the fields;
Nor let the loaded table groan beneath
Slain animals, the horrid feast of death:
With age unknown to pain or sorrow blest,
To the dark grave retiring as to rest;
While gently with one sigh this mortal frame
Dissolving turns to ashes, whence it came;
While my freed soul departs without a groan,
And joyful wings her flight to worlds unknown.
Ye gloomy grots! ye awful solemn cells,
Where holy thoughtful Contemplation dwells,
Guard me from splendid cares and tiresome state,
That pompous misery of being great!
Happy! if by the wise and learn'd belov'd;
But happiest above all, if self-approv'd!
Content with ease: ambitious to despise
Illustrious vanity, and glorious vice!
Come, thou chaste maid, here ever let me stray,
While the calm hours steal unperceiv'd away;
Here court the muses, while the sun on high
Flames in the vault of heaven, and fires the sky:
Or while the night's dark wings this globe surround,
And the pale moon begins her solemn round,
Bid my free soul to starry orbs repair,
Those radiant worlds that float in ambient air,
And with a regular confusion stray
Oblique, direct, along th' aërial way:
Or when Aurora, from her golden bowers,
Exhales the fragrance of the balmy flowers,
Reclin'd in silence on a mossy bed,
Consult the learned volumes of the dead;
Fall'n realms and empires in description view,
Live o'er past times, and built whole worlds anew;
Or from the bursting tombs in fancy raise
The sons of fame, who liv'd in ancient days:
And lo! with haughty stalk the warrior treads!
Stern legislators frowning lift their heads!
I see proud victors in triumphal cars,
Chiefs, kings, and heroes, seam'd with glorious scars!
Or listen till the raptur'd soul takes wings,
While Plato reasons, or while Homer sings.
Charm me, ye sacred leaves *, with loftier themes,
With opening heavens, and angels rob'd in flames:
Ye restless passions, while I read, be aw'd:
Hail, ye mysterious oracles of God!
Here I behold how infant time began,
How the dust mov'd and quicken'd into man;
Here through the flowery walks of Eden rove,
Court the soft breeze, or range the spicy grove;
There tread on hallow'd ground where angels trod,
And reverend patriarchs talk'd as friends with God;
Or hear the voice to slumbering prophets given,
Or gaze on visions from the throne of heaven.
But nobler yet, far nobler scenes advance!
Why leap the mountains? why the forests dance?

VARIATIONS.

Dreadful it mounts, tempestuous in its flight,
It sinks, it falls, earth groans beneath its weight.
Th' imprison'd deaths rush out in smoke and fire,
The mighty bleed, heaps crush'd on heaps expire.
† The barriers burst, wide-spreading flames arise.

* The Holy Scriptures.

Why flaſhes glory from the golden ſpheres?
Rejoice, O earth, a God, a God appears!
A God, a God, deſcending angels ſing,
And mighty ſeraphs ſhout, Behold your King!
Hail, virgin-born! Lift, lift, ye blind, your eyes!
Sing, oh ye dumb! and oh ye dead, ariſe!
Tremble, ye gates of hell! In nobleſt ſtrains
Tell it aloud, ye heavens! the Saviour reigns!
Thus lonely, though'ful, may I run the race
Of tranſient life, in no inuſeful eaſe!
Enjoy each hour, nor, as it fleets away,
Think life too ſhort, and yet too long the day;
Of right obſervant, while the ſoul attends
Each duty, and makes heaven and angels friends.
And thou, fair Peace, from the wild floods of war
Come dovelike, and thy blooming olive bear:
Tell me, ye victors, what ſtrange charms ye find
In conqueſt, that deſtruction of mankind!
Unenvy'd may your laurels ever grow,
That never flouriſh but in human woe,
If never earth the wreathe triumphal bears,
Till drench'd in heroes' blood or orphans' tears.
Let Ganges from afar to ſlaughter train
His fable warriors on th' embattled plain;
Let Volga's ſons in iron ſquadrons riſe,
And pour in millions from her frozen ſkies:
Thou, gentle Thames, flow thou in peaceful ſtreams,
Bid thy bold ſons reſtrain their martial flames.
In thy own laurel's ſhade, great Marlborough, ſtay,
There charm the thoughts of conquer'd worlds away:
Guardian of England! born to ſcourge her foes,
Speak, and thy word gives half the world repoſe;
Sink down, ye hills; eternal rocks, ſubſide;
Vaniſh, ye forts; thou, ocean, drain thy tide:
We ſafety boaſt, defended by thy fame,
And armies—in the terror of thy name!
Now fix o'er Anna's throne thy victor blade.
War, be thou chain'd! ye ſtreams of blood, be ſtay'd!
Though wild Ambition her juſt vengeance feels,
She wars to ſave, and where ſhe ſtrikes, ſhe heals.
So Pallas with her javelin ſmote the ground,
And peaceful olives flouriſh'd from the wound.

To the Right Honourable CHARLES LORD CORNWALLIS,

Baron of Eyre, Warden, Chief Juſtice, and Juſtice in Eyre of all His Majeſty's Foreſts, Chaſes, Parks, and Warrens, on the South Side of Trent.

———δῶρόν τοι τῦτο δίδωμι
Μνήμε———

Odyſſey, Lib. 15.

O THOU whoſe virtues ſanctify thy ſtate!
O great, without the vices of the great!
Form'd by a dignity of mind to pleaſe,
To think, to act with elegance and eaſe!*

Say, wilt thou liſten while I tune the ſtring,
And ſing to thee, who gav'ſt me eaſe to ſing?
Unſkill'd in verſe, I haunt the ſilent grove;
Yet lowly ſhepherds ſing to mighty Jove;
And mighty Jove attends the ſhepherd's vows,
And gracious what his ſuppliants aſks beſtows:
So by thy favour may the muſe be crown'd,
And plant her laurels in more fruitful ground;
The grateful muſe ſhall in return beſtow
Her ſpreading laurels to adorn thy brow.
Thus, guarded by the tree of Jove, a flower
Shoots from the earth, nor fears th' inclement ſhower;
And when the fury of the ſtorm is laid,
Repays with ſweets the hoſpitable ſhade.
Severe their lot, who, when they long endure
The wounds of fortune, late receive a cure!
Like ſhips in ſtorms o'er liquid mountains toſt,
Ere they are ſav'd muſt almoſt firſt be loſt;
But you with ſpeed forbid diſtreſs to grieve:
He gives by halves,* who heſitates to give.
Thus, when an angel views mankind diſtreſt,
He feels compaſſion pleading in his breaſt;
Inſtant the heavenly guardian cleaves the ſkies,
And, pleas'd to ſave, on wings of lightning flies†.
Some the vain promiſes of courts betray;
And gaily ſtraying, they are pleas'd to ſtray;
The flattering nothing ſtill deludes their eyes,
Seems ever near, yet ever diſtant flies:
As perſpectives preſent the object nigh,
Though far remov'd from the miſtaking eye;
Againſt our reaſon fondly we believe,
Aſſiſt the fraud, and teach it to deceive:
As the faint traveller, when night invades,
Sees a falſe light relieve the ambient ſhades,
Pleas'd he beholds the bright deluſion play,
But the falſe guide ſhines only to betray:
Swift he purſues, yet ſtill the path miſtakes,
O'er dangerous marſhes, or through thorny brakes;
Yet obſtinate in wrong he toils to ſtray,
With many a weary ſtride, o'er many a painful way.
So man purſues the phantom of his brain,
And buys his diſappointment with his pain:
At length when years invidiouſly deſtroy
The power to taſte the long-expected joy,
Then fortune envious ſheds her golden ſhowers,
Malignly ſmiles, and curſes him with ſtores.

ADDITION.

* Firm to thy king, and to thy country brave;
Loyal, yet free; a ſubject, not a ſlave;
Say, &c.

ADDITION.

† Few know to aſk, or decently receive;
And fewer ſtill with dignity to give:
If earn'd by flattery, gifts of higheſt price
Are not a bounty, but the pay of vice.
Some wildly laviſh, yet no friend obtain;
Nor are they generous, but abſurd and vain.
Some give with ſurly pride and boiſterous hands,
As Jove pours rain in thunder o'er the lands.
When merit pleads, you meet it and embrace,
And give the favour luſtre by the grace;
So Phœbus to his warmth a glory joins,
Bleſſing the world, and while he bleſſes ſhines.

* The Lord Cornwallis, in a moſt obliging manner, recommended the author to the rectory of Pulham.

Thus o'er the urns of friends departed weep
The mournful kindred, and fond vigils keep;
Ambrofial ointments o'er their aſhes ſhed,
And ſcatter uſeleſs roſes on the dead;
And when no more avail the world's delights,
The ſpicy odours, and the ſolemn rites,
With fruitleſs pomp they deck the ſenſeleſs tombs,
And waſte profuſely floods of vain perfumes.

THE ROSE-BUD.

To the Right Honourable the Lady Jane Wharton.

Queen of fragrance, lovely roſe,
The beauties of thy leaves diſcloſe!
The winter's paſt, the tempeſts fly,
Soft gales breathe gently through the ſky;
The lark ſweet warbling on the wing
Salutes the gay return of ſpring:
The ſilver dews, the vernal ſhowers,
Call forth a bloomy waſte of flowers;
The joyous fields, the ſhady woods,
Are cloth'd with green, or ſwell with buds;
Then haſte thy beauties to diſcloſe,
Queen of fragrance, lovely roſe!

Thou, beauteous flower, a welcome gueſt,
Shalt flouriſh on the fair one's breaſt,
Shalt grace her hand, or deck her hair,
The flower moſt ſweet, the nymph moſt fair.
Breathe ſoft, ye winds! be calm ye ſkies!
Ariſe, ye flowery race, ariſe!
And haſte thy beauties to diſcloſe,
Queen of fragrance, lovely roſe!

But thou, fair nymph, thyſelf ſurvey
In this ſweet offſpring of a day:
That miracle of face muſt fail;
Thy charms are ſweet, but charms are frail:
Swift as the ſhort-liv'd flower they fly,
At morn they bloom, at evening die:
Though ſickneſs yet a while forbears,
Yet time deſtroys what ſickneſs ſpares.
Now Helen lives alone in fame,
And Cleopatra's but a name.
Time muſt indent that heavenly brow,
And thou muſt be, what they are now.

This moral to the fair diſcloſe,
Queen of fragrance, lovely roſe.

BELINDA AT THE BATH.

While in theſe fountains bright Belinda laves,
She adds new virtues to the healing waves:
Thus in Bethſeda's pool an angel flood,
Bade the ſoft waters heal, and bleſt the flood;
But from her eye ſuch bright deſtruction flies,
In vain they flow! for her, the lover dies.

No more let Tagus boaſt, whoſe beds unfold
A ſhining treaſure of all-conquering gold!
No more the * Po! whoſe wandering waters ſtray,
In mazy errors, through the ſtarry way:

Henceforth theſe ſprings ſuperior honours ſhare;
There Venus laves, but my Belinda here.

THE COY;

AN ODE.

Love is a noble rich repaſt,
But ſeldom ſhould the lover taſte;
When the kind fair no more reſtrains,
The glutton ſurfeits and diſdains.

To move the nymph, he tears beſtows,
He vainly ſighs, he falſely vows:
The tears deceive, the vows betray;
He conquers, and contemns the prey.

Thus Ammon's ſon with fierce delight
Smil'd at the terrors of the fight:
The thoughts of conqueſt charm'd his eyes,
He conquer'd, and he wept the prize.

Love, like a proſpect, with delight
Sweetly deceives the diſtant ſight,
Where the tir'd travellers ſurvey,
O'er hanging rocks, a dangerous way.

Ye fair that would victorious prove,
Seem but half kind when moſt you love:
Damon purſues, if Celia flies;
But when her love is born, his dies.

Had Danäe the young, the fair,
Been free and unconfin'd as air,
Free from the guards and brazen tower,
She'd ne'er been worth a golden ſhower.

To the Honourable

MRS. ELIZABETH TOWNSHEND,

AFTERWARDS LADY CORNWALLIS,

ON HER PICTURE AT RAINHAM.

——περὶ ἔσσι γυναικῶν
Εἶδός τ' ἰδὲ φρένας. Odyſſey, Lib. 18.

Ah! cruel hand, that could ſuch power employ
To teach the pictur'd beauty to deſtroy!
Singly ſhe charm'd before; but by his ſkill
The living beauty and her likeneſs kill!
Thus when in parts the broken mirrors fall,
A face in all is ſeen, and charms in all!

Think then, O faireſt of the fairer race,
What fatal beauties arm thy heavenly face,
Whoſe very ſhadow can ſuch flames inſpire;
We ſee 'tis paint, and yet we feel 'tis fire.

See! with falſe life the lovely image glows,
And every wondrous grace tranſplanted ſhows;
Fatally fair the new creation reigns,
Charms in her ſhape, and multiplies our pains;
Hence the fond youth, that eaſe by abſence found,
Views the dear form, and bleeds at every wound;
Thus the bright Venus, though to heaven ſhe
ſoar'd,
Reign'd in her image, by the world ador'd.

Oh! wond'rous power of mingled light and ſhades!
Where beauty with dumb eloquence perſuades,

* "—Eridanum cernes in parte locatum cœli."
Tull. in Arateis.
"Gurgite ſidereo ſubterluit Oriona." Claud.

Where paſſions are beheld in picture wrought,
And animated colours look a thought:
Rare art! on whoſe command all nature waits!
It copies all Omnipotence creates:
Here crown'd with mountains earth expanded lies,
There the proud ſeas with all their billows riſe:
If life be drawn, reſponſive to the thought
The breathing figures live throughout the draught;
The mimic bird in ſkies fictitious moves,
Or fancy'd beaſts in imitated groves:
Ev'n heaven it climbs; and from the forming hands
An angel here, and there a Townſhend ſtands.

Yet, painter, yet, though art with nature ſtrive,
Though ev'n the lovely phantom ſeem alive,
Submit thy vanquiſh'd art! and own the draught,
Though fair, defective, and a beauteous fault:
Charms, ſuch as her's, inimitably great,
He only can expreſs, that can create.
Couldſt thou extract the whiteneſs of the ſnow,
Or of its colours rob the heavenly bow,
Yet would her beauty triumph o'er thy ſkill,
Lovely in thee, herſelf more lovely ſtill!

Thus in the limpid fountain we deſcry
The faint reſemblance of the glittering ſky;
Another ſun diſplays his leſſen'd beams,
Another heaven adorns th' enlighten'd ſtreams:
But though the ſcene be fair, yet high above
Th' exalted ſkies in nobler beauties move;
There the true heaven's eternal lamps diſplay
A deluge of inimitable day.

TO MR. POPE,

ON HIS WORKS. 1726.

Let vulgar ſouls triumphal arches raiſe,
And ſpeaking marble to record their praiſe;
Or carve with fruitleſs toil, to fame unknown,
The mimic feature on the breathing ſtone;
Mere mortals, ſubject to death's total ſway,
Reptiles of earth, and beings of a day!
'Tis thine, on every heart to grave thy praiſe,
A monument which worth alone can raiſe;
Sure to ſurvive, when time ſhall whelm in duſt
The arch, the marble, and the mimic buſt;
Nor till the volumes of th' expanded ſky
Blaze in one flame, ſhalt thou and Homer die;
When ſink together in the world's laſt fires
What heaven created, and what heaven inſpires.

If aught on earth, when once this breath is fled,
With human tranſport touch the mighty dead;
Shakſpeare, rejoice! his hand thy page refines,
Now every ſcene with native brightneſs ſhines;
Juſt to thy fame, he gives thy genuine thought,
So Tully publiſh'd what Lucretius wrote;
Prun'd by his care, thy laurels loftier grow,
And bloom afreſh on thy immortal brow.

Thus when thy draughts, O Raphael, time invades,
And the bold figure from the canvas fades;
A rival hand recals from every part
Some latent grace, and equals art with art;
Tranſported we ſurvey the dubious ſtriſe,
While the fair image ſtarts again to life.

How long untun'd had Homer's ſacred lyre,
Jarr'd grating diſcord, all extinct his fire!
This you beheld; and, taught by heaven to ſing,
Call'd the loud muſic from the ſounding ſtring.
Now wak'd from ſlumbers of three thouſand years,
Once more Achilles in dread pomp appears,
Towers o'er the field of death; as fierce he turns,
Keen flaſh his arms, and all the hero burns;
His plume nods horrible, his helm on high
With cheeks of iron glares againſt the ſky;
With martial ſtalk, and more than mortal might,
He ſtrides along, he meets the god in fight:
Then the pale Titans, chain'd on burning flores;
Start at the din that rends th' infernal ſhores;
Tremble the towers of heaven; earth rocks her coaſts;
And gloomy Pluto ſhakes with all his ghoſts.
To every theme reſponds thy various lay;
Here pours a torrent, there meanders play:
Sonorous as the ſtorm thy numbers riſe,
Toſs the wild waves, and thunder in the ſkies;
Or ſofter than a yielding virgin's ſigh,
The gentle breezes breathe away, and die.
How twangs the bow, when with a jarring ſpring
The whizzing arrows vaniſh from the ſtring!
When giants ſtrain, ſome rock's vaſt weight to ſhove,
The ſlow verſe heaves, and the clogg'd words ſcarce move;
But when from high it rolls, with many a bound,
Jumping it thundering whirls, and ruſhes to the ground:
Swift flows the verſe, when winged lightnings fly,
Dart from the dazzled view, and flaſh along the ſky:
Thus, like the radiant god who ſheds the day,
The vale you paint, or gild the azure way;
And, while with every theme the verſe complies,
Sink without grovelling, without raſhneſs riſe.

Proceed, great bard, awake th' harmonious ſtring,
Be ours all Homer, ſtill Ulyſſes ſing!
Ev'n I, the meaneſt of the muſes' train,
Inflam'd by thee, attempt a nobler ſtrain;
Adventrous waken the * Mæonian lyre,
Tun'd by your hand, and ſing as you inſpire:
So, arm'd by great Achilles for the fight,
Patroclus conquer'd in Achilles' might.
Like theirs our friendſhip! and I boaſt my name
To thine united, for thy friendſhip's ſame.
How long Ulyſſes, by unſkilful hands
Stript of his robes, a beggar trod our lands,
Such as he wander'd o'er his native coaſt,
Shrunk by the † wand, and all the hero loſt;
O'er his ſmooth ſkin a bark of wrinkles ſpread,
Old age diſgrac'd the honours of his head;
Nor longer in his heavy eye-ball ſhin'd
The glance divine forth-beaming from the mind:
But you, like Pallas, every limb infold
With royal robes, and bid him ſhine in gold;
Touch'd by your hand, his manly frame improves
With air divine, and like a God he moves.

This labour paſt, of heavenly ſubjects ſing,
While hovering angels liſten on the wing;
To hear from earth ſuch heart-felt raptures riſe,
As when they ſing, ſuſpended hold the ſkies:
Or, nobly riſing in fair virtue's cauſe,
From thy own life tranſcribe th' unerring laws;
Teach a bad world beneath her ſway to bend,
To verſe like thine fierce ſavages attend, [lay,
And men more fierce! When Orpheus tunes the

PART OF THE TENTH BOOK OF THE ILIADS OF HOMER.

IN THE STYLE OF MILTON.

Now high advanc'd the night, o'er all the hoſt
Sleep ſhed his ſoſteſt balm; reſtleſs alone
Atrides lay, and cares revolv'd on cares.
As when with riſing vengeance gloomy Jove
Pours down a watery deluge, or in ſtorms
Of hail or ſnow commands the goary jaws
Of war to roar; through all the kindling ſkies,
With flaming wings on lightnings lightnings play:
So while Atrides meditates the war,
Sighs after ſighs burſts from his manly breaſt,
And ſhake his inmoſt ſoul: round o'er the fields
To Troy he turns his eyes, and round beholds
A thouſand fires blaze dreadful; through his ears
Paſſes the direful ſymphony of war,
Of fife, or pipe, and the loud hum of hoſts
Strikes him diſmay'd: Now o'er the Grecian tents
His eyes he rolls; now from his royal head
Rends the fair curl in ſacrifice to Jove,
And his brave heart heaves with imperial woes.
Thus groans the thoughtful king; at length reſolves
To ſeek the Pylian ſage, in wiſe debate
To ripen high deſigns, and from the ſword
Preſerve his banded legions. Pale and ſad
Uproſe the monarch: inſtant o'er his breaſt
A robe he threw, and on his royal feet
Glitter'd th' embroider'd ſandals: o'er his back
A dreadful ornament, a lion's ſpoils,
With hideous grace down to his ankles hung;
Fierce in his hand he graſp'd a glittering ſpear.
With equal care was Menelaus toſs'd:
Sleep from his temples fled, his generous heart
Felt all his people's woes, who in his cauſe
Stemm'd the proud main, and nobly ſtood in arms
Confronting death: A leopard's ſpotted ſpoils
Terrific clad his limbs, a brazen helm
Beam'd on his head, and in his hand a ſpear.
Forth from his tent the royal Spartan ſtrode
To wake the king of men; him wak'd he found
Claſping his poliſh'd arms; with riſing joy
The heroes meet, the Spartan thus begun:
Why thus in arms, my prince? Send'ſt thou ſome ſpy
To view the Trojan hoſt? Alas! I fear
Leſt the moſt dauntleſs ſons of glorious war
Shrink at the bold deſign! This taſk demands
A ſoul reſolv'd, to paſs the gloom of night,
And 'midſt her legions ſearch the powers of Troy.
O prince, he cries, in this diſaſtrous hour
Greece all our counſel claims, now, now demands
Our deepeſt cares! the power omnipotent
Frowns on our arms, but ſmiles with aſpect mild
On Hector's incenſe: Heavens! what ſon of fame,
Renown'd in ſtory, e'er ſuch deeds atchiev'd
In a whole life, as in one glorious day
This favourite of the ſkies? and yet a man!
A mortal! born to die! but ſuch his deeds
As future Grecians ſhall repeat with tears
To children yet unborn.—But haſte, repair
To Ajax and Idomeneus: we wake
Ourſelf the Pylian ſage; to keep the guards
On duty be his care; for o'er the guards
His ſon preſides nocturnal, and in arms
His great compeer, Meriones the bold.
But ſay, rejoins the prince, theſe orders borne,
There ſhall I ſtay, or, meaſuring back the ſhores,
To thee return?——No more return, replies
The king of hoſts, leſt treading different ways
We meet no more; for through the camp the ways
Lie intricate and various: but aloud
Wake every Greek to martial fame and arms;
Teach them to emulate their godlike ſires;
And thou awhile forget thy royal birth,
And ſhare a ſoldier's cares: the proudeſt king
Is but exalted duſt; and when great Jove
Call'd us to life, and gave us royal power,
He gave a ſad pre-eminence of woes
He ſpoke, and to the tent of Neſtor turns
His ſtep majeſtic: on his couch he found
The hoary warrior; all around him lay
His arms, the ſhield, the ſpears, the radiant helm,
And ſcarf of various dye: with theſe array'd,
The reverend father to the field of fame
Led his bold files; for, with a brave diſdain,
Old as he was, he ſcorn'd the eaſe of age.
Sudden the monarch ſtarts, and half uprais'd,
Thus to the king aloud; What art thou, ſay?
Why in the camp alone? while others ſleep,
Why wandereſt thou obſcure the midnight hours?
Seek'ſt thou ſome centinel, or abſent friend?
Speak inſtant!—Silent to advance, is death!
O pride of Greece, the plaintive king returns,
Here in thy tent thou Agamemnon view'ſt,
A prince, the moſt unhappy of mankind;
Woes I endure, which none but kings can feel,
Which ne'er will ceaſe until forgot in death:
Penſive I wander through the damp of night,
Through the cold damp of night; diſtreſs'd! alone!
And ſleep is grown a ſtranger to my eyes:
The weight of all the war, the load of woes
That preſſes every Greek, united falls
On me——the cares of all the hoſt are mine!
Grief diſcompoſes, and diſtracts my thoughts;
My reſtleſs panting heart, as if it ſtrove
To force its priſon, beats againſt my ſides!
My ſtrength is fail'd, and even my feet refuſe
To bear ſo great a load of wretchedneſs!
But if thy wakeful cares (for o'er thy head
Wakeful the hours glide on) have aught matur'd
Uſeful, the thought unfold: but riſe, my friend,
Viſit with me the watches of the night;
Leſt tir'd they ſleep, while Troy with all her war
Hangs o'er our tents, and now, perhaps ev'n now
Arms her proud bands. Ariſe, my friend, ariſe!

To whom the Pylian : Think not, mighty king,
Jove ratifies vain Hector's haughty views ;
A ſudden, ſad reverſe of mighty woes
Waits that audacious victor, when in arms
Dreadful Achilles ſhines. But now thy ſteps
Neſtor attends : Be it our care to wake
Sage Ithacus, and Diomed the brave,
Meges the bold, and in the race renown'd
Oïlean Ajax : To the ſhips that guard
Outmoſt the camp, ſome other ſpeed his way
To raiſe ſtern Ajax and the Cretan king.
But love, nor reverence to the mighty name
Of Menelaus, nor thy wrath, O king,
Shall ſtop my free rebuke : Sleep is a crime
When Agamemnon wakes ; on him it lies
To ſhare thy martial toils, to court the peers
To act the men : this hour claims all our cares.
Reſerve, rejoins the king, for future hours
Thy generous anger : Seems the royal youth
Remiſs? 'tis not through indolence of ſoul,
But deference to our power ; for our commands
He waits, and follows when we lead the way.
This night diſdaining reſt, his ſteps he bent
To our pavilion : now the illuſtrious peers,
Rais'd at his call, a choſen ſynod ſtand
Before the gates : haſte, Neſtor, haſte away. [hands
To whom the ſage well pleas'd : In ſuch brave
No Greek will envy power : with loyal joy
Subjects obey, when men of worth command.
He added not, but o'er his manly breaſt
Flung a rich robe : beneath his royal feet
The glittering ſandals ſhone : a ſoft, large veſt,
Florid with purple wool, his aged limbs
Graceful adorn'd : tipt with a ſtar of braſs
A ponderous lance he graſp'd, and ſtrode away
To wake ſage Ithacus. Aloud his voice
He rais'd : his voice was heard, and from his tent
Inſtant Ulyſſes ſprung ; and why, he cry'd,
Why thus abroad in the chill hours of night ?
What new diſtreſs invades?—Forgive my cares,
Reply'd the hoary ſage ; for Greece I wake,
Greece and her dangers bring me to thy tent :
But haſte, our wakeful peers in council meet ;
This, this one night determines flight or war.
Swift at the word he ſeiz'd his ample ſhield,
And ſtrode along ; and now they bend their way
To wake the brave Tydides : him they found
Stretch'd on the earth, array'd in ſhining arms,
And round, his brave companions of the war :
Their ſhields ſuſtain'd their heads ; erect their ſpears
Shot through th' illumin'd air a ſtreaming ray,
Keen as Jove's lightning wing'd athwart the ſkies.
Thus ſlept the chief : beneath him on the ground
A ſavage bull's black hide was roll'd ; his head
A ſplendid carpet bore. The ſlumbering king
The Pylian gently with theſe words awakes :
Riſe, ſon of Tydeus! ill, a whole night's reſt
Suits with the brave ! and ſleep'ſt thou, while proud Troy
Hangs o'er our tents, and from yon joining hill
Prepares her war ? Awake, my friend, awake !
Sudden the chief awoke, and mildly gave
This ſoft reply : Oh ! cruel to thy age, [ceaſe
Thou good old man ! ne'er wilt thou, wilt thou
To burthen age with cares ? Has Greece no youths
To wake the peers? unwearied man, to bear
At once the double load of toils, and years !
'Tis true, he cry'd, my ſubjects and my ſons
Might eaſe a ſire and king : but reſt's a crime
When on the edge of fate our country ſtands :
Ere yet a few hours more have run their courſe,
Important ſpace ! Greece triumphs, or Greece falls !
But, ſince an old man's care thy pity moves,
Haſte, generous youth, with ſpeed to council call
Meges the brave, and in the race renown'd
Oïlean Ajax.—Strait the chief obey'd,
Strait o'er his ſhoulders flung the ſhaggy ſpoil
Of a huge tawny lion ; with dire grace
Down to his feet they hung : fierce in his hand
He graſp'd a glittering ſpear, and join'd the guards.
Wakeful in arms they ſat, a faithful band,
As watchful dogs protect the fleecy train,
Then the ſtern lion, furious for his prey,
Ruſhes through craſhing woods, and on the fold
Springs from ſome mountain's brow, while mingled cries
Of men and hounds alarm ; to every ſound
Faithful they turn : ſo through the gloom of night
They caſt their view, and caught each noiſe of Troy.
Now met th' illuſtrious ſynod ; down they ſate,
Down on a ſpot of ground unſtain'd with blood
Where vengeful Hector from the ſlaughter ſtay'd
His murderous arm, when the dark veil of night
Sabled the pole : To whom thus Neſtor ſpoke :
Lives there a ſon of fame ſo nobly brave,
That Troy-ward dares to trace the dangerous way,
To ſeize ſome ſtruggling foe ? or learn what Troy
Now meditates? to pour the flood of war
Fierce on our fleet, or back within her walls
Lead her proud legions ? Oh ! what fame would crown
The hero thus triumphant, prais'd o'er earth
Above the ſons of men ! And what rewards
Should he receive ! From every grateful peer
A fable ewe, and lamb, of higheſt worth
Memorial ; to a brave, heroic heart
The nobleſt prize! and at the ſocial feaſt
Amongſt the great, be his the ſeat of fame.
Abaſh'd they ſate, and ev'n the brave knew fear.
Not ſo Tydides : unappall'd he roſe,
And nobly ſpoke ! My ſoul ! Oh ! reverend ſage,
Fires at the bold deſign ; through yon black hoſt
Venturous I bend my way ; but, if his aid
Some warrior lend, my courage might ariſe
To nobler heights : the wiſe by mutual aid
Inſtruct the wiſe, and brave men fire the brave.
Fierce at the word upſtarted from the ground
The ſtern Ajaces, fierce bold Merion roſe,
And Thraſymedes, ſons of war : nor ſate
The Royal Spartan, nor great Neſtor's heir,
Nor greater Ithacus, his manly heart
Swell'd at the view of fame.——Elate with joy
Atrides ſaw ; and oh ! thou beſt of friends,
Brave Diomed, he cries, of all the peers
Chooſe thou the valianteſt : when merit pleads,
Titles no deference claim ; high birth and ſtate
To valour yield, and worth is more than power.
Thus, fearing for his brother, ſpoke the king,
Not long ! for Diomed diſpels his fears.
Since free my choice, can I forget a friend,

The man, for wiſdom's various arts renown'd;
The man, whoſe dauntleſs ſoul no toils diſmay,
Ulyſſes, lov'd by Pallas! through his aid,
Though thouſand fires oppoſe, a thouſand fires
Oppoſe in vain; his wiſdom points the way.
Nor praiſe, nor blame, the hero ſtrait replies;
You ſpeak to Greeks, and they Ulyſſes know:
But haſte; ſwift roll the hours of night, the morn
Already haſtens to diſplay her beams,
And in the vault of heaven the ſtars decay. [limbs
Swift at the word they ſheathe their manly
Horrid in arms: a two-edg'd ſword and ſhield
Neſtor's bold ſon to ſtern Tydides gave;
A tough bull's hide his ample helmet form'd,
No cone adorn'd it, and no plumy creſt
Wav'd in the air; a quiver and a bow,
And a huge faulchion, great Ulyſſes bears,
The gift of Merion: on his head an helm
Of leather nodded, firm within, and bound
With many a thong; without, in dreadful rows
The ſnowy tuſks of a huge ſavage boar
Grinn'd horrible. Thus arm'd, away they ſtalk
Undaunted: o'er their heads the martial maid
Sends on the right an her'n; the ambient gloom
Conceals him from the view, but loud in air
They hear the clangor of his ſounding wings.
Joyful the proſperous ſign Ulyſſes hail'd,
And thus to Pallas: Offſpring of dread Jove,
Who hurls the burning bolts! O guardian power,
Preſent in all my toils, who view'ſt my way
Where'er I move, now thy celeſtial aid,
Now, goddeſs, lend! may deeds this night adorn,
Deeds that all Troy may weep; may we return
In ſafety by thy guidance, heavenly maid!
Tydides caught the word; and oh! he cries,
Virgin armipotent, now grant thy aid,
As to my ſire! he by the gulfy flood
Of deep Æſopus left th' embattled bands
Of Greece in arms, and to imperial Thebes
Bore terms of peace; but as from haughty Thebes
Alone he journey'd, deeds, heroic deeds,
His arm atchiev'd, for Tydeus was thy care:
Thus guard his offſpring, Oh! ſtern queen of arms;
So ſhall an heifer on thy altars bleed,
Young and untam'd; to thee her blood I pour,
And point her lunar horns with burniſh'd gold.
Thus pray the chiefs, and Pallas hears their prayer;
Then, like two lions through the ſhades of night,
Dauntleſs they ſtride along; and hold their way
Through blood, and mangled limbs, o'er arms and
* Nor paſs they far, e'er the ſagacious eye [death.
Of Ithacus diſcerns a diſtant foe
Coaſting from Troy, and thus to Diomed:
See! o'er the plain ſome Trojan bends this way,
Perhaps to ſpoil the ſlain! or to our hoſt
Comes he a ſpy? beyond us o'er the field
'Tis beſt he paſs, then ſudden from behind
Ruſh we precipitant: but if in flight
His active feet prevail, thy ſpear employ
To force him on our lines, leſt hid in ſhades,
Through the duſk air he re-eſcape to Troy. [lay
Then couching to the ground, ambuſh'd they
Behind a hill of ſlain: onward the ſpy
Inceſſant mov'd: he paſs'd, and now aroſe
The fierce purſuers. Dolon heard the ſound
Of trampling feet, and panting, liſtening ſtood;
Now reach'd the chiefs within a javelin's throw,
Stern foes of Dolon! ſwift along the ſhores
He wing'd his flight, and ſwift along the ſhores
They ſtill purſued: as when two ſkillful hounds
Chaſe o'er the lawn the hare or bounding roe,
Still from the ſheltering brake the game they turn,
Stretch every nerve, and bear upon the prey!
So ran the chiefs, and from the hoſt of Troy
Turn'd the ſwift foe: now nigh the fleet they flew,
Now almoſt mingled with the guards; when lo!
The martial goddeſs breath'd heroic flames
Fierce on Tydides' ſoul: the hero fear'd
Leſt ſome bold Greek ſhould interpoſe a wound,
And raviſh half the glories of the night.
Furious he ſhook his lance, and ſtand he cry'd,
Stand, or thou dy'ſt: then ſternly from his arm
Launch'd the wild ſpear; willful the javelin err'd,
But whizzing o'er his ſhoulder, deep in earth
Stood quivering; and he quaking ſtopp'd aghaſt;
His teeth all chatter'd, and his ſlack knees knock'd;
He ſeem'd the bloodleſs image of pale fear.
Panting the ſpy they ſeize; who thus with tears
Abject entreats: Spare me, oh! ſpare, he cries;
My hoary ſire your mercy ſhall repay,
Soon as he hears I draw the vital air, [gold.
With ample wealth, with ſteel, with braſs, with
To whom Ulyſſes artfully: Be bold:
Far hence the thought of death! but inſtant ſay
Why thus alone in the ſtill hours of night
While every eye is cloſ'd? to ſpoil the ſlain
Com'ſt thou rapacious? or ſome nightly ſpy
By Hector ſent? or has thy venturous mind
Impell'd thee to explore our martial bands?
By Hector ſent, and by rewards undone,
Returns the ſpy (ſtill as he ſpoke he ſhook),
I come unwilling: the refulgent car
He promis'd, and immortal ſteeds that bear
To fight, the great Achilles: thus betray'd,
Through the dun ſhades of night I bend my way
Unproſperous, to explore the tented hoſt
Of adverſe Greece, and learn if now they ſtand
Wakeful on guard, or vanquiſh'd by our arms
Precipitant deſert the ſhores of Troy.
To whom with ſmiles of ſcorn the ſage returns:
Bold were thy aims, O youth! but thoſe proud ſteeds,
Reſtive, diſdain the uſe of vulgar hands;
Scarce ev'n the goddeſs-born, when the loud din
Of battle roars, ſubdues them to the rein
Reluctant: but this night where Hector ſleeps
Faithful diſcloſe: where ſtand the warrior's ſteeds?
Where lie his arms and implements of war?
What guards are kept nocturnal? ſay, what Troy
Now meditates? to pour the tide of fight
Fierce on our fleet, or back within her walls
Transfer the war?—To theſe demands, he cries,
Faithful my tongue ſhall ſpeak: the peers of Troy
Hector in council meets: round Ilus' tomb
Apart from noiſe they ſtand: no guards ſurround
The ſpacious hoſt: where through the gloom yon

* Verſe 339.

Blaze frequent, Trojans wake to guard their Troy;
Secure th' auxiliars sleep, no tender cares
Of wife or son disturb their calm repose,
Safe sleep their wives and sons on foreign shores.
But say, apart encamp th' auxiliar bands,
Replies the sage, or join the powers of Troy?
Along the sea-beat shores, returns the spy,
The Leleges and Carians stretch their files;
Near these the Caucons, and Pelasgian train,
And Pœons, dreadful with the battle-bow,
Extended lie; on the Thymbræan plain
The Lycians and the Mysians in array
Spread their deep ranks: there the Mæonian bands,
And Phrygians, range the fiery steeds of war.
But why this nice inquiry? if your way
Venturous you bend to search the host of Troy,
There in yon outmost lines, a recent aid,
The Thracians lie, by Rhesus led, whose steeds
Outshine the snow, outfly the winged winds,
With glittering silver plates, and radiant gold
His chariot flames; gold forms his dazzling arms,
Arms that may grace a God!—but to your tents
Unhappy me convey; or bound with chains,
Fast bound with cruel chains, sad on the shores
Here leave me captive, till you safe return,
And witness to the truth my tongue unfolds.
To whom stern-frowning Diomed replies:
Though every syllable be stamp'd with truth,
Dolon, thou dy'st: would'st thou once more return
Darkling a spy, or wage, a nobler foe, [more
New war on Greece? traitor, thou dy'st; nor
New war thou wagest, nor return'st a spy.
He spoke terrific: and as Dolon rais'd
Suppliant his humble hands, the trenchant blade
Sheer through his neck descends; the furious blow
Cleaves the tough nerves in twain; down drops the head,
And mutters unintelligible sounds.
Strait they despoil the dead: the wolf's gray hide
They seize the helm, the spear, and battle-bow:
These, as they dropp'd with gore, on high in air
Ulysses rais'd, and to the martial maid
Thus lowly consecrates: stern power of war,
Virgin armipotent, receive these arms,
Propitious to my vows, thee, goddess, thee
Chiefly I call: direct our prosperous way
To pierce the Thracian tents, to seize the steeds
Of Rhesus, and the car that flames with gold.
Then fierce o'er broken arms, through streams of blood
They move along: now reach the Thracian bands
All hush'd in sleep profound; their shining arms
Rang'd in three ranks along the plain, around
Illumin'd the dun air: chariot and horse
By every Thracian flood: Rhesus their king
Slept in the centre of the circling bands,
And his prond steeds were rein'd behind his car.
With joy Ulysses through the gloom descry'd
The sleeping king; and lo! he cries, the steeds,
Lo! Diomed, the chief of Thrace, this night
Described by Dolon: now, oh! now, thy strength
Dauntless exert! loose thou the furious steeds;
Or while the steeds I loose, with slaughtering hands
Invade the soldiery: he spoke, and now
The queen of arms inflam'd Tydides' soul
With all her martial fires: his reeking blade
On every side dealt fate; low, hollow groans
Murmur'd around, blood o'er the crimson field
Well'd from the slain: as in his nightly haunts
The surly lion rushes on the fold
Of sheep, or goat, and rends th' unguarded prey;
So he the Thracian bands: twelve by his sword
Lay breathless on the ground: behind him stood
Sage Ithacus, and, as the warrior slew,
Swift he remov'd the slain, lest the fierce steeds,
Not yet inur'd to blood, should trembling start,
Impatient of the dead: now o'er the king
He whirls his wrathful blade, now furious gores
His heaving chest: he wak'd not; but a dream
By Pallas sent, rose in his anxious thoughts;
A visionary warrior frowning stood
Fast by his head, and his aërial sword
Plung'd through his lab'ring breast: mean while the steeds
The sage unbinds, and instant with his bow
Drives through the sleeping ranks: then to his friend
Gave signals of retreat; but nobler deeds
He meditates, to drag the radiant car,
Or lift it through the threefold ranks, up-borne
High on his shoulders, or with slaughter stain
Th' ensanguin'd field; when, lo! the martial maid
Down rushes from the battlements of heaven,
And sudden cries, return, brave chief, return,
Lest from the skies some guardian power of Troy
Wrathful descend, and rouse the hostile bands.
Thus speaks the warrior queen: the heavenly voice
Tydides owns, and mounts the fiery steeds,
Observant of the high command; the bow
Sage Ithacus apply'd, and tow'rd the tents
Scourg'd the proud steeds, the steeds flew o'er the plain.

A PASTORAL,

To a Young Lady, upon her leaving, and return to the Country.

Damon.

Say, while each scene so beautiful appears,
Why heaves thy bosom, and why flow thy tears?
See! from the clouds the spring descends in showers,
The painted vallies laugh with rising flowers:
Smooth flow the floods, soft breathe the vernal airs;
The spring, flowers, floods, conspire to charm our cares.

Florus.

But vain the pleasure which the season yields,
The laughing vallies, or the painted fields.
No more, ye floods, in silver mazes flow;
Smile not, ye flowers; no more soft breezes blow:
Far, Damon, far from these unhappy groves,
The cruel, lovely Rosalinda roves.

Damon.

Ah! now I know why late the opening buds
Clos'd up their gems, and sicken'd in the woods;

Why droop'd the lily in her snowy pride;
And why the rose withdrew her sweets, and dy'd:
For thee, fair Rosalind, the opening buds
Clos'd up their gems, and sicken'd in the woods;
For thee the lily shed her snowy pride;
For thee the rose withdrew her sweets, and dy'd.

Florus.

See! where yon vine in soft embraces weaves
Her wanton ringlets with the myrtle's leaves;
There tun'd sweet Philomel her sprightly lay,
Both to the rising and the falling day:
But since fair Rosalind forsook the plains,
Sweet Philomel no more renews her strains;
With sorrow dumb, she disregards her lay,
Nor greets the rising nor the falling day.

Damon.

Say, O ye winds, that range the distant skies,
Now swell'd to tempests by my rising sighs;
Say, while my Rosalind deserts these shores,
How Damon dies for whom his soul adores.

Florus.

Ye murmuring fountains, and ye wandering floods,
That visit various lands through various roads;
Say, when ye find where Rosalind resides,
Say, how my tears increase your swelling tides.

Damon.

Tell me, I charge you, O ye sylvan swains!
Who range the mazy grove, or flowery plains,
Beside what fountain, in what breezy bower,
Reclines my charmer in the noon-tide hour!

Florus.

Soft, I adjure you, by the skipping fawns,
By the fleet roes, that bound along the lawns;
Soft tread, ye virgin daughters of the grove,
Nor with your dances wake my sleeping love?

Damon.

Return, O virgin! and if proud disdain
Arm thy fierce soul, return, enjoy my pain;
If pleas'd thou view'st a faithful lover's cares,
Thick rise, ye sighs; in floods descend, ye tears!

Florus.

Return, O virgin! while in verdant meads
By springs we sport, or dream on flowery beds;
She weary wanders through the desert way,
The food of wolves, or hungry lion's prey.

Damon.

Ah! shield her, heaven! your rage, ye beasts, forbear!
Those are not limbs for savages to tear!
Adieu, ye meads! with her through wilds I go
O'er burning sands, or everlasting snow;
With her I wander through the desert way,
The food of wolves, or hungry lions' prey.

Florus.

Come, Rosalind, before the wintery clouds
Frown o'er th' aërial vault, and rush in floods;
Ere raging storms howl o'er the frozen plains;
Thy charms may suffer by the storms or rains.

Damon.

Come, Rosalind, O come! then infant flowers
Shall bloom and smile, and form their charms by yours:
By you the lily shall her white compose;
Your blush shall add new blushes to the rose;
Each flowery mead, and every tree shall bud,
And fuller honours clothe the youthful wood.

Florus.

Yet ah! forbear to urge thy homeward way,
While sultry suns infest the glowing day:
The sultry suns thy beauties may impair!—
Yet haste away! for thou art now too fair.

Damon

Hark! from yon bower what airs soft-warbled play!
My soul takes wing to meet th' enchanting lay:
Silence, ye nightingales! attend the voice!
While thus it warbles, all your songs are noise.

Florus.

See, from the bower a form majestic moves,
And smoothly gliding shines along the groves!
Say, comes a goddess from the golden spheres?
A goddess comes, or Rosalind appears!

Damon.

Shine forth, thou sun, bright ruler of the day;
And where she treads, ye flowers, adorn the way!
Rejoice, ye groves; my heart, dismiss thy cares!
My goddess comes, my Rosalind appears!

POVERTY AND POETRY.

'Twas sung of old how one Amphion
Could by his verses tame a lion,
And by his strange enchanting tunes,
Make bears or wolves dance ridagoons:
His songs could call the timber down,
And form it into house or town;
But it is plain that in these times
No house is rais'd by poets' rhymes;
They for themselves can only rear
A few wild castles in the air;
Poor are the brethren of the bays,
Down from high strains, to ekes and ayes.
The muses too are virgins yet,
And may be—till they portions get.
Yet still the doating rhymer dreams,
And sings of Helicon's bright streams;
But Helicon, for all his clatter,
Yields only uninspiring water;
Yet ev'n athirst he sweetly sings
Of nectar and Elysian springs.
What dire malignant planet sheds,
Ye bards, his influence on your heads?
Lawyers by endless controversies,
Consume unthinking clients' purses,
As Pharoah's kine, which strange and odd is,
Devour'd the plump and well-fed bodies.
The grave physician who by physic,
Like death, dispatches him that is sick,
Pursues a sure and thriving trade;
Though patients die, the doctor's paid:
Licens'd to kill, he gains a palace,
For what another mounts the gallows.
In shady groves the muses stray,
And love in flowery meads to play;
An idle crew! whose only trade is
To shine in trifles, like our ladies;
In dressing, dancing, toying, singing,
While wiser Pallas thrives by spinning:

Thus they gain nothing to bequeath
Their votaries, but a laurel wreath.

But love rewards the bard! the fair
Attend his song, and ease his care:
Alas! fond youth, your plea you urge so ill
Without a jointure, though a Virgil:
Could you like Phœbus sing, in vain
You nobly swell the lofty strain;
Coy Daphne flies, and you will find as
Hard hearts as hers in your Belinda's.

But then some say you purchase fame,
And gain that envy'd prize, a name;
Great recompence! like his who sells
A diamond for beads and bells.
Will fame be thought sufficient bail
To keep the poet from the jail?

Thus the brave soldier in the wars,
Gets empty praise and aching scars;
Is paid with fame and wooden legs!
And starv'd, the glorious vagrant begs.

TO A LADY,
PLAYING WITH A SNAKE.

It is a pleasing, direful sight!
At once you charm us and affright!
So heaven destroying angels arms
With terror, dreadful in their charms.

Such, such was Cleopatra's air,
Lovely, but formidably fair,
When the griev'd world impoverish'd lost,
By the dire asp, its noblest boast.

Aw'd by your guardian's dangerous power,
At distance trembling we adore;
At distance, once again behold
A serpent guard the blooming gold.

Well pleas'd and harmless, lo! he lies,
Basks in the sunshine of your eyes;
Now, twists his spires, and now unfurls
The gay confusion of his curls.

Oh! happy on your breast to lie,
As that bright * star that gilds the sky,
Who ceasing in the spheres to shine,
Would for your breast his heaven resign.

Yet, oh! fair virgin, caution take,
Lest some bold cheat assume the snake.
When Jove compress the † Grecian dame,
Aloof he threw the lightning's flame;
On radiant spires the lover rode,
And in the snake conceal'd the god.

TO A LADY OF THIRTY.

No more let youth in beauty boast,
S——n at thirty reigns a toast;
And like the sun as he declines,
More mildly, but more sweetly shines.

The hand of time alone disarms
Her face of its superfluous charms;
But adds for every grace resign'd,
A thousand to adorn her mind.

Youth was her too inflaming time;
This her more habitable clime:
How must she then each heart engage,
Who blooms like youth, is wise like age!

Thus the rich orange-trees produce
At once both ornament and use:
Here opening blossoms we behold,
There fragrant orbs of ripen'd gold.

ON THE
BIRTH-DAY OF MR. ROBERT TREFUSIS,
Being three Years old, March 22. 1710-11.

Awake, sweet babe! the sun's emerging ray,
That gave you birth, renews the happy day!
Calmly serene, and glorious to the view,
He marches forth, and strives to look like you.

Fair beauty's bud! when time shall stretch thy span,
Confirm thy charms, and ripen thee to man,
What plenteous fruits thy blossoms shall produce,
And yield not barren ornament, but use!
Ev'n now thy spring a rich increase prepares:
To crown thy riper growth and manly years.

Thus in the kernel's intricate disguise,
In miniature a little orchard lies;
The fibrous labyrinths by just degrees
Stretch their swoll'n cells, replete with future trees;
By time evolv'd, the spreading branches rise,
Yield their rich fruits, and shoot into the skies.

O lovely babe, what lustre shall adorn
Thy noon of beauty, when so bright thy morn!
Shine forth advancing with a brighter ray,
And may no vice o'ercloud thy future day!

VARIATIONS.

Why, lovely babe, does slumber seal your eyes?
See, fair Aurora blushes in the skies!
The sun, which gave you birth, in bright array —
Begins his course, and ushers in the day.
Calmly serene, and glorious to the view,
He marches forth, and strives to look like you.
Fair beauty's bud! when time shall stretch thy span,
Confirm thy charms, and ripen thee to man, [plain,
How shall each swain, each beauteous nymph com-
For love each nymph, for envy every swain!
What matchless charms shall thy full noon adorn,
When so admir'd, so glorious, is thy morn!
So glorious is thy morn of life begun,
That all to thee with admiration run,
Turn Persians, and adore the rising sun.
So fair thou art, that if great Cupid be
A child, as poets say, sure thou art he.
Fair Venus would mistake thee for her own,
Did not thy eyes proclaim thee not her son.
There all the lightnings of thy mother's shine,
Their radiant glory and their sweetness join,
To show their fatal power, and all their charms in thine.

With nobler aims inſtruct thy ſoul to glow,
Than thoſe gay trifles, titles, wealth, and ſhow:
May valour, wiſdom, learning, crown thy days!
Thoſe fools admire—theſe heaven and angels praiſe.*

With riches bleſt, to heaven thoſe riches lend,
The poor man's guardian, and the good man's friend:
Bid virtuous ſorrow ſmile, ſcorn'd merit cheer,
And o'er affliction pour the generous tear.
Some, wildly liberal, ſquander, not beſtow,
And give unprais'd, becauſe they give for ſhow:
To ſanctify thy wealth, on worth employ
Thy gold, and to a bleſſing turn the toy:
Thus offerings from th' unjuſt pollute the ſkies,
The good turn ſmoke into a ſacrifice.

As when an artiſt plans a favourite draught,
The ſtructures riſe reſponſive to the thought;
A palace grows beneath his forming hands,
Or worthy of a God a temple ſtands:
Such is thy riſing frame! by heaven deſign'd
A temple, worthy of a godlike mind;
Nobly adorn'd, and finiſh'd to diſplay
A fuller beam of heaven's ethereal ray.

May all thy charms increaſe, O lovely boy!
Spare them, ye pains, and age alone deſtroy!
So fair thou art, that if great Cupid be
A child, the god might boaſt to look like thee!
When young Iülus' form he deign'd to wear,
Such were his ſmiles, and ſuch his winning air:
Ev'n Venus might miſtake thee for her own,
Did not thy eyes proclaim thee not her ſon;
Thence all the light'ning of thy mother's flies,
A Cupid grac'd with Cytheræa's eyes!

Yet ah! how ſhort a date the powers decree
To that bright frame of beauties, and to thee!
Paſs a few days, and all thoſe beauties fly!
Paſs a few years, and thou, alas! ſhalt die!
Then all thy kindred, all thy friends ſhall ſee
With tears, what now thou art, and they muſt be;
A pale, cold, lifeleſs lump of earth deplore!
Such ſhalt thou be, and kings ſhall be no more!

VARIATIONS.

If fond Narciſſus in the cryſtal ſtood,
A form like thine, O lovely infant, view'd,
Well might the flame the pining youth deſtroy;
Exceſs of beauty juſtified the boy.

ADDITION.

* To brace the mind to dignity of thought,
To emulate what godlike Tully wrote,
Be this thy early wiſh! The garden breeds,
If unimprov'd, at leaſt but gaudy weeds:
And ſtubborn youth, by culture unſubdued,
Lies wildly barren, or but gayly rude.
Yet as ſome Phidias gives the marble life,
While art with nature holds a dubious ſtrife,
Adorns a rock with graces not its own,
And calls a Venus from the rugged ſtone;
So culture aids the human ſoul to riſe,
To ſcorn the ſordid earth, and mount the ſkies,
Till by degrees the noble gueſt refines,
Claims her high birth-right, and divinely ſhines.

But oh! when ripe for death, fate calls thee hence,
Sure lot of every mortal excellence!
When pregnant as the womb the teeming earth
Reſigns thee quicken'd to thy ſecond birth,
Riſe cloth'd with beauties that ſhall never die!
A ſaint on earth! an angel in the ſky!

TO A GENTLEMAN OF SEVENTY,

Who Married a Lady of Sixteen.

What woes muſt ſuch unequal union bring,
When hoary winter weds the youthful ſpring!
You like Mezentius* in the nuptial bed,
Once more unite the living to the dead.

THE

XLIII. CHAPTER OF ECCLESIASTICUS.

A PARAPHRASE.

The ſun that rolls his beamy orb on high,
Pride of the world, and glory of the ſky,
Illuſtrious in his courſe, in bright array
Marches along the heavens, and ſcatters day
O'er earth, and o'er the main, and through th' ethereal way.
He in the morn renews his radiant round,
And warms the fragrant boſom of the ground;
But ere the noon of day, in fiery gleams
He darts the glory of his blazing beams;
Beneath the burnings of his ſultry ray,
Earth to her centre pierc'd admits the day;
Huge vales expand, where rivers roll'd before,
And leſſen'd ſeas contract within their ſhore.
O! Power Supreme! O! high above all height!
Thou gav'ſt the ſun to ſhine, and thou art light:
Whether he falls or riſes in the ſkies,
He by thy voice is taught to fall or riſe;
Swiftly he moves, refulgent in his ſphere,
And meaſures out the day, the month, and year;
He drives the hours along with flower pace,
The minutes ruſh away impetuous in their race:
He wakes the flowers that ſleep within the earth,
And calls the fragrant infants out to birth;
The fragrant infants paint th' enamel'd vales,
And native incenſe loads the balmy gales;
The balmy gales the fragrancy convey
To heaven, and to their God an offering pay.
By thy command the moon, as day-light fades,
Lifts her broad circle in the deepening ſhades;
Array'd in glory, and enthron'd in light,
She breaks the ſolemn terrors of the night;
Sweetly inconſtant in her varying flame,
She changes ſtill, another, yet the ſame!
Now in decreaſe by ſlow degrees ſhe ſhrouds
Her fading luſtre in a veil of clouds;
Now at increaſe, her gathering beams diſplay
A blaze of light, and give a paler day;
Ten thouſand ſtars adorn her glittering train,
Fall when ſhe falls, and riſe with her again;
And o'er the deſerts of the ſky unfold
Their burning ſpangles of ſidereal gold:

" * The living and the dead at his command,
" Were coupled face to face, and hand to hand."
DRYDEN's Virg. Æn. viii.

Through the wide heavens ſhe moves ſerenely bright,
Queen of the gay attendants of the night;
Orb above orb in ſweet confuſion lies,
And with a bright diſorder paints the ſkies.
The Lord of Nature fram'd the ſhowery bow,
Turn'd its gay arch, and bade its colours glow:
Its radiant circle compaſſes the ſkies,
And ſweetly the rich tinctures faint, and riſe;
It bids the horrors of the ſtorm to ceaſe,
Adorns the clouds, and makes the tempeſt pleaſe.
He, when deep-rolling clouds blot out the day,
And thunderous ſtorms a ſolemn gloom diſplay,
Pours down a watery deluge from on high,
And opens all the ſluices of the ſky:
High o'er the ſhores the ruſhing ſurge prevails,
Burſts o'er the plain, and roars along the vales;
Daſhing abruptly, dreadful down it comes,
Tumbling through rocks, and toſſes, whirls and foams:
Meantime, from every region of the ſky,
Red burning bolts in forky vengeance fly;
Dreadfully bright o'er ſeas and earth they glare,
And burſts of thunder rend th' encumber'd air;
At once the thunders of th' Almighty ſound,
Heaven lours, deſcend the floods, and rocks the ground.
He gives the furious whirlwind wings to fly,
To rend the earth, and wheel along the ſky;
In circling eddies whirl'd, it roars aloud,
Drives wave on wave, and daſhes cloud on cloud;
Where'er it moves, it lays whole foreſts low;
And at the blaſt, eternal mountains bow;
While, tearing up the ſands, in drifts they riſe,
And half the deſerts mount the burthen'd ſkies.
He from aërial treaſures downward pours
Sheets of unſully'd ſnow in lucid ſhowers;
Flake after flake, through air thick-wavering flies,
Till one vaſt ſhining waſte all nature lies:
Then the proud hills a virgin whiteneſs ſhed,
A dazzling brightneſs glitters from the mead;
The hoary trees reflect a ſilver ſhow,
And groves beneath the lovely burden bow.
He from looſe vapours with an icy chain
Binds the round hail, and moulds the harden'd rain:
The ſtony tempeſt, with a ruſhing ſound,
Beats the firm glebe, reſulting from the ground:
Swiftly it falls, and as it falls invades
The riſing herb, or breaks the ſpreading blades:
While infant flowers that rais'd their bloomy heads,
Cruſh'd by its fury, ſink into their beds.
When ſtormy winter from the frozen north
Borne on his icy chariot iſſues forth,
The blaſted groves their verdant pride reſign,
And billows harden'd into cryſtal ſhine:
Sharp blows the rigour of the piercing winds,
And the proud floods as with a breaſt-plate binds:
Ev'n the proud ſeas forget in tides to roll
Beneath the freezings of the northern pole;
There waves on waves in ſolid mountains riſe,
And Alps of ice invade the wondering ſkies;
While gulfs below, and ſlippery vallies lie,
And with a dreadful brightneſs pain the eye:
But if warm winds a warmer air reſtore,
And ſofter breezes bring a genial ſhower,
The genial ſhower revives the cheerful plain,
And the huge hills flow down into the main.
When the ſeas rage, and loud the ocean roars,
When foaming billows laſh the ſounding ſhores;
If he in thunder bid the waves ſubſide,
The waves obedient ſink upon the tide,
A ſudden peace controls the limpid deep,
And the ſtill waters in ſoft ſilence ſleep.
Then heaven lets down a golden-ſtreaming ray,
And all the broad expanſion flames with day:
In the clear glaſs the mariners deſcry
A ſun inverted, and a downward ſky.
They who adventurous plough the watery way,
The dreadful wonders of the deep ſurvey;
Familiar with their ſtorms, their ſails unbind,
Tempt the rough blaſt, and bound before the wind:
Now high they mount, now ſhoot into a vale,
Now ſmooth their courſe, and ſcud before the gale;
There rolling monſters, arm'd in ſcaly pride,
Flounce in the billows, and daſh round the tide;
There huge leviathan unweildy moves,
And through the waves, a living iſland roves;
In dreadful paſtime terribly he ſports,
And the vaſt ocean ſcarce his weight ſupports;
Where'er he turns, the hoary deeps divide;
He breathes a tempeſt, and he ſpouts a tide.
Thus, Lord, the wonders of earth, ſea, and air,
Thy boundleſs wiſdom and thy power declare;
Thou high in glory, and in might ſerene,
See'ſt and mov'ſt all, thyſelf unmov'd, unſeen:
Should men and angels join in ſongs to raiſe
A grateful tribute equal to thy praiſe,
Yet far thy glory would their praiſe outſhine,
Though men and angels in the ſong ſhould join;
For though this earth with ſkill divine is wrought,
Above the gueſs of man, or angel's thought,
Yet in the ſpacious regions of the ſkies
New ſcenes unfold, and worlds on worlds ariſe;
There other orbs, round other ſuns advance,
Float on the air, and run their myſtic dance;
And yet the power of thy Almighty hand
Can build another world from every ſand:
And though vain man arraign thy high decree,
Still this is juſt! what is, that ought to be.

THE CONCLUSION OF AN EPILOGUE

To Mr. Southern's Laſt Play, called "Money the Miſtreſs."

THERE was a time, when in his younger years,
Our author's ſcenes commanded ſmiles or tears;
And though beneath the weight of days he bends,
Yet, like the ſun, he ſhines as he deſcends:
Then with applauſe, in honour to his age,
Diſmiſs your veteran ſoldier * off the ſtage;
Crown his laſt exit with diſtinguiſh'd praiſe,
And kindly hide his † baldneſs with the bays.

* From the ſtage.

† Alluding to a vote of the Roman ſenate, by which they decreed Cæſar a crown of laurel to cover his baldneſs.

THE PARTING,

A SONG,

Set by Dr. Tudway, Professor of Music in Cambridge.

When from the plains Belinda fled,
The sad Amintor sigh'd;
And thus, while streams of tears he shed,
The mournful shepherd cry'd:

"Move slow, ye hours! thou, time, delay!
"Prolong the bright Belinda's stay:
"But you, like her, my prayer deny,
"And cruelly away ye fly.

"Yet though she flies, she leaves behind
"Her lovely image in my mind.
"O! fair Belinda, with me stay,
"Or take thy image too away!

"See! how the fields are gay around,
"How painted flowers adorn the ground!
"As if the fields, as well as I,
"Were proud to please my fair-one's eye.

"But now, ye fields, no more be gay;
"No more, ye flowers, your charms display!
"'Tis desert all, now you are fled,
"And paradise is where you tread."

Unmov'd the virgin flies his cares,
To shine at court and play:
To lonely shades the youth repairs,
To weep his life away.

ON A FLOWER

WHICH BELINDA GAVE ME FROM HER BOSOM.

O! lovely offspring of the May,
Whence flow thy balmy odours, say!
Such odours—not the orient boasts!
Though paradise adorn'd the coasts!
O! sweeter than each flower that blooms,
This fragrance from thy bosom comes!
Thence, thence such sweets are spread abroad,
As might be incense for a God!
When Venus stood conceal'd from view,
Her son, the latent * goddess knew,
Such sweets breath'd round! and thus we knew
Our other Venus here below.
But see! my fairest, see this flower,
This short-liv'd beauty of an hour!—
Such are thy charms!—yet zephyrs bring
The flower to bloom again in spring:
But beauty, when it once declines,
No more to warm the lover shines:
Alas! incessant speeds the day,
When thou shalt be but common clay!
When I, who now adore, may see,
And ev'n with horror start from thee!
But ere, sweet gift, thy grace consumes,
Show thou my fair-one how she blooms!
Put forth thy charms:—and then declare
Thyself less sweet, thyself less fair!

Then sudden, by a swift decay,
Let all thy beauties fade away;
And let her in thy glass descry,
How youth, and how frail beauty die.
Ah! turn, my charmer, turn thy eyes!
See! how at once it fades, it dies!
While thine—it gaily pleas'd the view,
Unfaded, as before it grew!
Now, from thy bosom doom'd to stray,
'Tis only beauteous in decay:
So the sweet-smelling Indian flowers,
Griev'd when they leave those happier shores,
Sicken, and die away in ours.
So flowers, in Eden fond to blow,
In paradise would only grow.
Nor wonder, fairest, to survey
The flower so suddenly decay!
Too cold thy breast! * nor can it grow
Between such little hills of snow.
Now, vain infidel, no more
Deride th' Ægyptian, who adore
The rising herb, and blooming flower;
Now, now their convert I will be,
O lovely flower! to worship thee.
But if thou 'rt one of their sad train
Who dy'd for love, and cold disdain,
Who, chang'd by some kind pitying power,
A † lover once, art now a flower;
O pity me, O weep my care,
A thousand, thousand pains I bear,
I love, I die through deep despair!-

THE STORY OF TALUS,

From the Fourth Book of Apollonius Rhodius. V. 1629.

Ἥμος δ' ἠέλιος μεσέδυ, ἀνὰ δ' ἤλυθεν ἀστὴρ
Αὔλιος, &c.

The evening-star now lifts, as day-light fades,
His golden circlet in the deepening shades;
Stretch'd at his ease, the weary labourer shares
A sweet forgetfulness of human cares;
At once in silence sink the sleeping gales;
The mast ‡ they drop, and furl the flagging sails;
All night, all day, they ply the bending oars
Tow'rd Carpathus, and reach the rocky shores:
Thence Crete they view, emerging from the main,
The queen of isles; but Crete they view in vain;
There Talus, whirling with resistless sway
Rocks sheer uprent, repels them from the bay:
A giant, sprung from giant-race, who took
Their births from entrails of the stubborn oak;
Fierce guard of Crete! by Jove assistant given
To § legislators, styl'd the sons of heaven:
To mercy deaf, he thrice each year explores
The trembling isle, and strides from shores to shores:

A form of living braſs! one part beneath
Alone he bears, a path to let in death,
Where o'er the ankle ſwells the turgid vein,

And now her magic ſpells * Medea tries,
Bids the red fiends, the dogs of Orcus riſe,
That, ſtarting dreadful from th' infernal ſhade,
Ride heaven in ſtorms, and all that breathes, invade;
Thrice ſhe applies the power of magic prayer,
Thrice, hellward bending, mutters charms in air;
Then, turning tow'rd the foe, bids miſchief fly,
And looks deſtruction as ſhe points her eye:
Then ſpectres, riſing from Tartarean bowers,
Howl round in air, or grin along the ſhores;
While, † tearing up whole hills, the giant throws,
Outrageous, rocks on rocks, to cruſh the foes:
But, frantic as he ſtrides, a ſudden wound
Burſts the life-vein, and blood o'erſpreads the ground:
As from the furnace, in a burning flood,
Pours molten lead, ſo pours in ſtreams his blood;
And now he ſtaggers as the ſpirit flies,
He faints, he ſinks, he tumbles, and he dies.
As ſome huge cedar on a mountain's brow,
Pierc'd by the ſteel, expects the final blow,
A while it totters with alternate ſway,
Till freſhening breezes through the branches play;
Then, tumbling downward with a thundering ſound,
Falls headlong, and o'erſpreads a breadth of ground:
So, as the giant falls, the ocean roars;
Out-ſtretch'd he lies, and covers half the ſhores.

FROM THE ELEVENTH BOOK OF THE ILIADS OF HOMER.

IN THE STYLE OF MILTON.

Now gay Aurora from Tithonus' bed
Roſe in the orient, to proclaim the day
To gods and men: down to the Grecian tents
Saturnian Jove ſends diſcord red with blood;
War in her hand ſhe graſps, enſigns of war;
On brave Ulyſſes' ſhip ſhe took her ſtand,
The centre of the hoſt, that all might hear
Her dreadful voice: her dreadful voice ſhe rais'd;
Jarring along the rattling ſhores it ran
To the fleet's wide extremes. Achilles heard,
And Ajax heard the ſound: with martial fires
Now every boſom burns; arms, glorious arms,
Fierce they demand; the noble Orthian ſong
Swells every heart; no coward thoughts of flight
Riſe in their ſouls, but blood they breathe and war.
Now by the ‡ trench profound, the charioteers
Range their proud ſteeds; now car by car diſplays
A direful front; now o'er the trembling field
Ruſhes th' embattled foot; noiſe rends the ſkies,
Noiſe unextinguiſh'd: ere the beamy day
Flam'd in the th' aërial vault, ſtretch'd in the van
Stood the bold infantry: the ruſhing cars
Form'd the deep rear in battailous array.
Now from his heavens Jove hurls his burning bolts;
Hoarſe muttering thunders grumble in the ſky;
While from the clouds, inſtead of morning-dews,
Huge drops of blood diſtain the crimſon ground;
Fatal preſage! that in that dreadful day
The great ſhould bleed, imperial heads lie low!
Meantime the bands of Troy in proud array
Stand to their arms, and from a riſing ground
Breathe furious war: Here gathering hoſts attend
The towering Hector: there reſulgent bands
Surround Polydamas, Æneas there
Marſhals his dauntleſs files; nor unemploy'd
Stand Polybus, Agenor great in arms,
And Acamas, whoſe frame the gods endow'd
With more than mortal charms: fierce in the van
Stern Hector ſhines, and ſhakes his blazing ſhield.
As the fierce dog-ſtar with malignant fires
Flames in the front of heaven, then, loſt in clouds,
Veils his pernicious beams; from rank to rank
So Hector ſtrode; now dreadful in the van
Advanc'd his ſun-broad ſhield, now to the rear
Swift ruſhing diſappear'd: His radiant arms
Blaz'd on his limbs, and bright as Jove's dire bolts
Flaſh'd o'er the field, and lighten'd to the ſkies.
As toiling reapers in ſome ſpacious field,
Rang'd in two bands, move adverſe, rank on rank
Where o'er the tilth the grain in ears of gold
Waves nodding to the breeze; at once they bend,
At once the copious harveſt ſwells the ground:
So ruſh to battle o'er the dreadful field
Hoſt againſt hoſt; they meet, they cloſe, and ranks
Tumble on ranks; no thoughts appear of flight,
None of diſmay: dubious in even ſcales
The battle hangs; not fiercer, ravenous wolves
Diſpute the prey; the deathful ſcene with joy
Diſcord, dire parent of tremendous woes,
Surveys exultant: of th' immortal train
Diſcord alone deſcends, aſſiſts alone
The horrors of the field; in peace the gods
High in Olympian bowers on radiant thrones
Lament the works of man; but loud complaints
From every god aroſe; Jove favour'd Troy,
At partial Jove they murmur'd: he unmov'd
All heaven in murmurs heard, apart he ſate
Enthron'd in glory: down to earth he turn'd
His ſtedfaſt eye, and from his throne ſurvey'd
The riſing towers of Troy, the tented ſhores,
The blaze of arms, the ſlayer and the ſlain.
While, with his morning wheels, the God of day
Climb'd up the ſteep of heaven, with equal rage
In murderous ſtorms the ſhafts from hoſt to hoſt
Flew adverſe, and in equal numbers fell
Promiſcuous Greek and Trojan, till the hour
When the tir'd woodman in the ſhady vale
Spreads his penurious meal, when high the ſun
Flames in the zenith, and his ſinewy arms
Scarce wield the ponderous ax, while hunger keen
Admoniſhes, and nature ſpent with toil
Craves due repaſt—Then Greece the ranks of Troy
With horrid inroad goar'd: fierce from the van
Sprung tht ſtern * king of men; and breathing death
Where, in firm battle, Trojans band by band
Embody'd ſtood, purſued his dreadful way:
His hoſt his ſtep attends: now glows the war;

Horſe treads on horſe; and man encountering man,
Swells the dire field with death; the plunging ſteeds
Beat the firm glebes; thick duſt in riſing clouds
Darkens the ſky. Indignant o'er the plain
Atrides ſtalks; death every ſtep attends.
As when, in ſome huge foreſt, ſudden flames
Rage dreadful, when rough winds aſſiſt the blaze,
From tree to tree the fiery torrent rolls,
And the vaſt foreſt ſinks with all its groves
Beneath the burning deluge; ſo whole hoſts
Yield to Atrides' arm: car againſt car
Ruſh'd rattling o'er the field, and through the ranks
Unguided broke; while breathleſs on the ground
Lay the pale charioteers, in death deform'd;
To their chaſte brides ſad ſpectacles of woe,
Now only grateful to the fowls of air.
Meantime, the care of Jove, great Hector ſtood
Secure in ſcenes of death, in ſtorms of darts,
In ſlaughter and alarms, in duſt and blood.
Still Agamemnon ruſhing o'er the field
Leads his bold bands: whole hoſts before him fly;
Now Ilus' tomb they paſs, now urge their way
Cloſe by the fig-tree ſhade: with ſhouts the king
Purſues the foe inceſſant: duſt and blood, [hands.
Blood mix'd with duſt, diſtains his murderous
As when a lion in the gloom of night
Invades an herd of beeves, o'er all the plains
Trembling they ſcatter; furious on the prey
The generous ſavage flies, and with fierce joy
Seizes the laſt; his hungry foaming jaws
Churn the black blood, and rend the panting prey:
Thus fled the foe; Atrides thus purſued,
And ſtill the hindmoſt ſlew: they from their cars
Fell headlong; for his javelin, wild for blood,
Rag'd terribly: and now proud Troy had fall'n,
But the dread ſire of men and gods deſcends
Terrific from his heavens, his vengeful hand
Ten thouſand thunders graſps; on Ida's heights
He takes his ſtand; it ſhakes with all its groves
Beneath the God; the God ſuſpends the war.

TO MRS. ELIZ. M——T,

ON HER PICTURE. 1716.

O! wondrous art, that grace to ſhadows gives!
By whoſe command the lovely phantom lives!
Smiles with her ſmiles! the mimic eye inſtills
A real frame! the fancy'd lightning kills!
Thus mirrors catch the love-inſpiring face,
And the new charmer grace returns for grace.
Hence ſhall thy beauties, when no more appears
Their fair poſſeſſor ſhine a thouſand years;
By age unmjur'd, future times adorn,
And warm the hearts of millions yet unborn,
Who, gazing on the portrait with a ſigh,
Shall grieve ſuch perfect charms could ever die:
How would they grieve, if to ſuch beauties join'd
The paint could ſhow the wonders of thy mind!
O virgin! born th' admiring world to grace!
Tranſmit thy excellence to lateſt days;
Yield to thy lover's vows! and then ſhall riſe
A race of beauties conquering with thine eyes;
Who, reigning in thy charms, from death ſhall ſave
That lovely form, and triumph o'er the grave.
Thus, when through age the roſe-tree's charms decay,
When all her fading beauties die away;
A blooming offſpring fills the parent's place
With equal fragrance, and with equal grace.
But ah! how ſhort a date on earth is given
To the moſt lovely workmanſhip of heaven!
Too ſoon that cheek muſt every charm reſign,
And thoſe love-darting eyes forget to ſhine!
While thouſands weeping round, with ſighs ſurvey
What once was you——now only beauteous clay!
Ev'n from the canvas ſhall thy image fade,
And thou re-periſh in thy periſh'd ſhade:
Then may this verſe to future ages ſhow
One perfect beauty——ſuch as thou art now!
May it the graces of thy ſoul diſplay,
Till this world ſinks, and ſuns themſelves decay;
When with immortal beauty thou ſhalt riſe,
To ſhine the loveliеſt angel in the ſkies.

PROLOGUE

To Mr. Fenton's excellent Tragedy, Mariamne.

When breathing ſtatues mouldering waſte away,
And tombs, unfaithful to their truſt, decay;
The muſe rewards the ſuffering good with fame,
Or wakes the proſperous villian into ſhame;
To the ſtern tyrant gives fictitious power
To reign the reſtleſs monarch of an hour.
Obedient to her call, this night appears
Great Herod riſing from a length of years;
A name! enlarg'd with titles not his own,
Servile to mount, and ſavage on a throne:
Yet oft a throne is dire miſfortune's ſeat,
A pompous wretchedneſs, and woe in ſtate!
But ſuch the curſe that from ambition ſprings,
For this he ſlaughter'd half a race of kings!
But now, reviving in the Britiſh ſcene,
He looks majeſtic with a milder mien,
His features ſoften'd with the deep diſtreſs
Of love, made greatly wretched by exceſs:
From luſt of power to jealous fury toſt,
We ſee the tyrant in the lover loſt.
O! love, thou ſource of mighty joy or woe!
Thou ſofteſt friend, or man's moſt dangerous foe!
Fantaſtic power! * what rage thy darts inſpire,
When too much beauty kindles too much fire!
Thoſe darts, to jealous rage ſtern Herod drove;
It was a crime, but crime of too much love!
Yet if condemn'd he falls—with pitying eyes
Behold his injur'd Mariamne riſe!
No fancy'd tale! our opening ſcenes diſcloſe
Hiſtoric truth, and ſwell with real woes.
Awful in virtuous grief the queen appears,
And ſtrong the eloquence of royal tears;
By woes ennobled, with majeſtic pace,
She meets misfortune, glorious in diſgrace!
Small is the praiſe of beauty, when it flies
Fair honour's laws, at beſt but lovely vice,
Charms it like Venus with celeſtial air?
Ev'n Venus is but ſcandalouſly fair;

VARIATION.

* What pangs, &c.

But when ſtrict honour with fair features joins,
Like heat and light, at once it warms and ſhines.
* Then let her fate your kind attention raiſe,
Whoſe perfect charms were but her ſecond praiſe:
Beauty and virtue your protection claim;
Give tears to beauty, give to virtue fame.

TO MR. A. POPE,

WHO CORRECTED MY VERSES.

If e'er my humble muſe melodious ſings,
'Tis when you animate and tune her ſtrings;
If e'er ſhe mounts, 'tis when you prune her wings.
You, like the ſun, your glorious beams diſplay,
Deal to the darkeſt orb a friendly ray,
And clothe it with the luſtre of the day.
Mean was the piece, unelegantly wrought,
The colours faint, irregular the draught;
But your commanding touch, your nicer art,
Rais'd every ſtroke, and brighten'd every part.
So, when Luke drew the rudiments of man,
An angel finiſh'd what the ſaint began;
His wondrous pencil, dipt in heavenly dyes,
Gave beauty to the face, and lightning to the eyes.
Confus'd it lay, a rough unpoliſh'd maſs;
You gave the royal ſtamp, and made it paſs:
Hence ev'n deformity a beauty grew;
She pleas'd, ſhe charm'd, but pleas'd and charm'd by you;
Though like Prometheus I the image frame,
You give the life, and bring the heavenly flame.
Thus when the Nile diffus'd his watery train
In ſtreams of plenty o'er the fruitful plain;
Unſhapen forms, the refuſe of the flood,
Iſſued imperfect from the teeming mud;
But the great ſource and parent of the day
Faſhion'd the creature, and inform'd the clay †.

VARIATION.

* Then let her fate your juſt attention raiſe,
Whoſe perfect graces were but ſecond praiſe.

ADDITION.

† To nobler themes thy muſe triumphant ſoars,
Mounts through the tracts of air, and heaven explores.
Say, has ſome ſeraph tun'd thy ſacred lyre,
Or deign'd, to touch thy hallow'd lips with fire?
For ſure ſuch ſounds exalt th' immortal ſtring,
As heaven approves, and raptur'd angels ſing.
Ah! how I liſten, while the mortal lay
Lifts me from earth above the ſolar way!
Ah! how I look with ſcorn on pompous crowns,
And pity monarchs on their ſplendid thrones,
While, thou, my guide, I trace all nature's laws,
By juſt gradations, to the ſovereign cauſe!
Pleas'd I ſurvey how varying ſchemes unite,
Worlds with the atoms, angels with the mite,
And end in God, high thron'd above all height,
Who ſees, as Lord of all, with equal eye,
Now a proud tyrant periſh, then a fly.

Weak of herſelf, my muſe forbears her flight,
Views her own lowneſs, and Parnaſſus' height;
But when you aid her ſong, and deign to nod,
She ſpreads a bolder wing, and feels the preſent god.
So the Cumean propheteſs was dumb,
Blind to the knowledge of events to come;
But when Apollo in her breaſt abode,
She heav'd, ſhe ſwell'd, ſhe felt the ruſhing god:
Then accents more than mortal from her broke;
And what the god inſpir'd, the prieſteſs ſpoke.

MONSIEUR MAYNARD IMITATED.

To the Right Honourable the Lord Cornwallis.

While paſt its noon the lamp of life declines,
And age my vital flame invades;
Faint, and more faint, as it deſcends, it ſhines,
And haſtes, alas! to ſet in ſhades.

Then ſome kind power ſhall guide my ghoſt to glades,
Where, feated by Elyſian ſprings,
Fam'd Addiſon attunes to patriot ſhades
His lyre, and Albion's glory ſings.

There round, majeſtic ſhades, and heroes' forms,
Will throng, to learn what pilot guides,
Watchful, Britannia's helm through factious ſtorms,
And curbs the murmuring rebel tides.

I tell how Townſhend treads the glorious path
That leads the great to deathleſs fame,
And dwell at large on ſpotleſs Engliſh faith,
While Walpole is the favourite theme.

How, nobly riſing in their country's cauſe,
The ſtedfaſt arbiters of right
Exalt the juſt and good, to guard her laws,
And call forth merit into light.

A loud applauſe around the echoing coaſt
Of all the pleas'd Elyſium flies.— [ghoſt,
But, friend, what place had you, replies ſome
When merit was the way to riſe?

What deanery, or prebend thine, declare?
Good heavens! unable to reply,
How like a ſtupid ideot I ſhould ſtare!
An anſwer, good my lord, ſupply.

ON A MISCHIEVOUS WOMAN.

From peace, and ſocial joy, Meduſa flies,
And loves to hear the ſtorm of anger riſe;
Thus hags and witches hate the ſmiles of day,
Sport in loud thunder, and in tempeſts play.

ADDITION.

Methinks I view the patriarch's ladder riſe,
Its baſe on earth, its ſummit in the ſkies:
Each wond'rous ſtep by glorious angels trod,
And heaven unfolding to the throne of God,
Be this thy praiſe! I haunt the lovely bower,
Sport by the ſpring, or paint the blooming flower,
Nor dares the muſe attempt the arduous height,
&c.

THE COQUETTE.

Silvia, with unconteſted ſway,
Like Rome's fam'd tyrant reigns;
Beholds adoring crowds obey,
And heroes proud to wear her chains:
Yet ſtoops, like him, to every prize,
Buſy, to murder beaux and flies.

She aims at every trifling heart,
Attends each flatterer's vows;
And, like a picture drawn with art,
A look on all that gaze beſtows.
O! may the power who lovers rules,
Grant rather ſcorn, than hope with fools!

Miſtaken nymph! the crowds that gaze
Adore thee into ſhame;
Unguarded beauty is diſgrace,
And coxcombs, when they praiſe, defame.
O! fly ſuch brutes in human ſhapes,
Nor, like th' Ægyptians, worſhip apes.

THE WIDOW AND VIRGIN SISTERS.

Being a Letter to the Widow in London.

While Delia ſhines at Hurlothrumbo,
And darts her ſprightly eye at ſome beau;
Then, cloſe behind her fan retiring,
Sees through the ſticks whole crowds admiring:
You ſip your melancholy co-ffy
And at the name of man, cry, O phy!
Or, when the noiſy rapper thunders,
Say coldly—Sure the fellow blunders!
Unſeen! though peer on peer approaches:
James, I'm abroad!—but learn the coaches.
As ſome young pleader, when his purſe is
Unfill'd, through want of controverſies,
Attends until the chinks are fill'd all,
Th' aſſizes, Weſtminſter, and Guildhall;
While graver lawyers keep their houſe, and
Collect the guineas by the thouſand;
Or as ſome tradeſmen, through ſhow-glaſſes,
Expoſe their wares to each that paſſes;
Toys of no uſe! high-priz'd commodities
Bought to no end! eſtates in oddities!
Others, with like advantage, drive at
Their gain, from ſtore-houſes in private:
Thus Delia ſhines in places general,
Is never miſſing where the men are all;
Goes ev'n to church with godly airs,
To meet good company at prayers;
Where ſhe devoutly plays her fan,
Looks up to heaven, but thinks on man.
You ſit at home; enjoy your * couſin,
While hearts are offer'd by the dozen:
Oh! born above your ſex to riſe,
With youth, wealth, beauty, titles—wiſe!
O! Lady bright, did ne'er you mark yet,
In country fair, or country market,
A beau, whoſe eloquence might charm ye,
Enliſting ſoldiers for the army?

† Mrs. S——th.

He flatters every well-built youth,
And tells him every thing but—truth.
He cries, good friend, I'm glad I hap'd in
Your company, you'll make a captain!
He liſts—but finds theſe gaudy ſhows
Soon chang'd to ſurly looks, and blows:
'Tis now, March, raſcal! what, d'ye grumble?
Thwack goes the cane! I'll make you humble.
Such weddings are: and I reſemble 'em,
Almoſt in all points to this emblem.
While courtſhip laſts, 'tis, Dear! 'tis, Madam!
The ſweeteſt creature ſure ſince Adam!
Had I the years of a Methuſalem,
How in my charmer's praiſe I'd uſe all 'em!
Oh! take me to thy arms, my beauty!
I doat, adore the very ſhoe-tie!
They wed—but, fancy grown leſs warming,
Next morn, he thinks the bride leſs charming:
He ſays, nay ſwears, my wife grows old in
One ſingle month; then falls to ſcolding,
What, madam, gadding every day?
Up to your room! there ſtitch, or pray!
Such proves the marriage-ſtate! but for all
Theſe truths, you'll wed, and ſcorn the moral.

ON THE DEATH OF MY DEAR FRIEND MR. ELIJAH FENTON, 1730.

"Calentem
"Debitâ ſparges lacrymâ favillam
"Vatis amici." HOR.

As when the King of Peace, and Lord of Love,
Sends down ſome brighter angel from above,
Pleas'd with the beauties of the heavenly gueſt,
Awhile we view him in full glory dreſt;
But he, impatient from his heaven to ſtay,
Soon diſappears, and wings his airy way;
So did'ſt thou vaniſh, eager to appear,
And ſhine triumphant in thy native ſphere.
Yet had'ſt thou all that virtue can beſtow,
All, the good practiſe, and the learned know;
Such holy rapture, as not warms, but fires,
While the ſoul ſeems retiring, or retires;
Such tranſports as thoſe ſaints in viſion ſhare,
Who know not whether they are rapt through air,
Or bring down heaven to meet them in a prayer.
Oh! early loſt! yet ſtedfaſt to ſurvey
Envy, diſeaſe, and death, without diſmay;
Serene, the ſting of * pain thy thoughts beguile,
And make afflictions, objects of a ſmile.
So the fam'd patriarch on his couch of ſtone,
Enjoy'd bright viſions from th' eternal throne.
Thus wean'd from earth, where pleaſure ſcarce can pleaſe,
Thy woes but haſten'd thee to heav'n and peace:
As angry winds, when loud the tempeſt roars,
More ſwiftly ſpeed the veſſel to the ſhores.
Oh! may theſe lays a laſting luſtre ſhed
O'er thy dark urn, like lamps that grace the dead!
Strong were thy thoughts, yet reaſon bore the ſway;
Humble, yet learn'd; though innocent yet gay;

* The gout.

So pure of heart, that thou might'ſt ſafely ſhow
Thy inmoſt boſom to thy baſeſt foe:
Careleſs of wealth, thy bliſs a calm retreat,
Far from the inſults of the ſcornful great;
Thence looking with diſdain on proudeſt things,
Thou deem'ſt mean the pageantry of kings;
Who build their pride on trappings of a throne,
A painted ribband or a glittering ſtone,
Uſeleſsly bright! 'Twas thine the ſoul to raiſe
To nobler objects, ſuch as angels praiſe!
To live, to mortals' empty fame a foe;
And pity human joy, and human woe!
To view ev'n ſplendid vice with generous hate;
In life unblemiſh'd, and in death ſedate!
Then conſcience, ſhining with a lenient ray,
Dawn'd o'er the ſoul, and promis'd endleſs day.
So from the ſetting orb of Phœbus fly
Beams of calm light, and glitter to the ſky.
Where now, oh! where ſhall I true friendſhip find
Among the treacherous race of baſe mankind?
Whom, whom conſult in all th' uncertain ways
Of various life, ſincère to blame, or praiſe!
O friend! O falling in thy ſtrength of years!
Warm from the melting ſoul receive theſe tears!
O woods! O wilds! O every bowery ſhade!
So often vocal by his muſic made,
Now other ſounds—far other ſounds return,
And o'er his herſe with all your echoes mourn!—
Yet dare we grieve that ſoon the paths he trod
To heaven, and left vain man for ſaints and God?
Thus in the theatre the ſcenes unfold
A thouſand wonders glorious to behold;
And here, or there, as the machine extends,
A hero riſes, or a god deſcends:
But ſoon the momentary pleaſure flies,
Swift vaniſhes the god, or hero dies.
Where were ye, muſes, by what fountain ſide,
What river ſporting, when your favourite dy'd?
He knew by verſe to chain the headlong floods,
Silence loud winds, or charm attentive woods;
Nor deign'd but to high *themes to tune the ſtring,
To ſuch as heaven might hear, and angels ſing;
Unlike thoſe bards, who uninform'd to play,
Grate on their jarring pipes a flaſhy lay:
Each line diſplay'd united ſtrength and eaſe,
Form'd like his manners to inſtruct and pleaſe.
So herbs of balmy excellence produce
A blooming flower and ſalutary juice:
And while each plant a ſmiling grace reveals,
Uſefully gay! at once it charms, and heals.
Tranſcend ev'n after death, ye great, in ſhow;
Lend pomp to aſhes, and be vain in woe;
Hire ſubſtitutes to mourn with formal cries,
And bribe unwilling drops from venal eyes;
While here ſincerity of grief appears,
Silence that ſpeaks, and eloquence in tears!
While, tir'd of life, we but conſent to live
To ſhow the world how really we grieve!
As ſome fond ſire, whoſe only ſon lies dead,
All loſt to comfort makes the duſt his bed,
Hangs o'er his urn, with frantic grief deplores,
And bathes his clay-cold cheek with copious flowers;
Such heart-felt pangs on thy ſad bier attend;
Companion! brother! all in one—my friend!
Unleſs the ſoul a wound eternal bears,
Sighs are but air; but common water, tears:
The proud, relentleſs, weep in ſtate, and ſhow
Not ſorrow, but magnificence of woe.
Thus in the fountain, from the ſculptor's hands,
With imitated life, an image ſtands;
From rocky entrails, through his ſtony eyes,
The mimic tears in ſtreams inceſſant riſe:
Unconſcious! while aloft the waters flow,
The gazers' wonder, and a public ſhow.
Ye hallow'd domes, his frequent viſits tell;
Thou court, where God himſelf delights to dwell;
Thou myſtic table, and thou holy feaſt,
How often have ye ſeen the ſacred gueſt!
How oft his ſoul with heavenly manna fed!
His faith enliven'd, while his ſin lay dead!
While liſtening angels heard ſuch raptures riſe,
As, when they hymn th' Almighty, charm the ſkies!
But where, now where, without the body's aid,
New to the heavens, ſubſiſts thy gentle ſhade?
Glides it beyond our groſs imperfect ſky,
Pleas'd high o'er ſtars, from world to world, to fly!
And fearleſs marks the comet's dreadful blaze,
While monarchs quake, and trembling nations gaze?
Or holds deep converſe with the mighty dead,
Champions of virtue, who for virtue bled?
Or joins in concert with angelic choirs,
Where hymning ſeraphs ſound their golden lyres,
Where raptur'd ſaints unfading crowns inwreath,
Triumphant o'er the world, o'er ſin, and death?
O! may the thought his friend's devotion raiſe!
O! may he imitate, as well as praiſe!
Awake, my heavy ſoul! and upward fly,
Speak to the ſaint, and meet him in the ſky,
And aſk the certain way to riſe as high.

TO THOMAS MARRIOT, ESQ.

I PREFIX your name to the following poem, as a monument of the long and ſincere friendſhip I have borne you: I am ſenſible you are too good a judge of poetry to approve it; however, it will be a teſtimony of my reſpect: You conferred obligations upon me very early in life, almoſt as ſoon as I was capable of receiving them: May theſe verſes on death long ſurvive my own! and remain a memorial of our friendſhip and my gratitude, when I am no more.

A POEM ON DEATH.

Τὶς οἶδεν εἰ τὸ ζῆν μὲν ἐστι κατθανεῖν,
Τὸ κατθανεῖν δὲ ζῆν; EURIP.

OH! for Elijah's car, to wing my way
O'er the dark gulf of death to endleſs day!
A thouſand ways, alas! frail mortals lead
To her dire den, and dreadful all to tread.

See! in the horrors of yon houſe of woes,
Troops of all maladies the fiend encloſe!
High on a trophy rais'd of human bones,
Swords, ſpears, and arrows, and ſepulchral ſtones,
In horrid ſtate ſhe reigns! attendant ills
Beſiege her throne, and when ſhe frowns ſhe kills:
Through the thick gloom the torch red-gleaming burns.
O'er ſhrowds, and ſable palls, and mouldering urns;
While flowing ſtoles, black plumes, and ſcutcheons ſpread
An idle pomp around the ſilent dead:
Unaw'd by power, in common heap ſhe flings
The ſcrips of beggars, and the crowns of kings:
Here gales of ſighs, inſtead of breezes, blow,
And ſtreams of tears for ever murmuring flow:
The mournful yew with ſolemn horror waves
His baleful branches, ſaddening even the graves:
Around all birds obſcene loud-ſcreaming fly,
Clang their black wings, and ſhriek along the ſky:
The ground perverſe, though bare and barren, breeds
All poiſons, foes to life, and noxious weeds;
But, blaſted frequent by th' unwholeſome ſky,
Dead fall the birds, the very poiſons die.
Full in the entrance of the dreadful doors,
Old-age, half vaniſh'd to a ghoſt, deplores:
Propp'd on his crutch, he drags with many a groan
The load of life, yet dreads to lay it down.
There, downward driving an unnumber'd band,
Intemperance and diſeaſe walk hand in hand:
Theſe, torment, whirling with remorſeleſs ſway
A ſcourge of iron, laſhes on the way.
There frantic anger, prone to wild extremes,
Graſps an enſanguin'd ſword, and heaven blaſphemes.
There heart-ſick agony diſtorted ſtands,
Writhes his convulſive limbs, and wrings his hands.
There ſorrow droops his ever-penſive head,
And care ſtill toſſes on his iron bed:
Or, muſing, faſtens on the ground his eye
With folded arms; with every breath a ſigh.
Hydrops unwieldy wallows in a flood;
And murder rages, red with human blood,
With fever, famine, and afflictive pain,
Plague, peſtilence, and war, a diſmal train!
Theſe and a thouſand more the fiend ſurround,
Shrieks pierce the air, and groans to groans refound.
O heavens! is this the paſſage to the ſkies
That man muſt tread, when man your favourite dies?
Oh! for Elijah's car to wing my way
O'er the dark gulf of death to endleſs day!
Confounded at the ſight my ſpirits fled.
My eyes rain'd tears, my very heart was dead!
I wail'd the lot of man, that all would ſhun,
And all muſt bear that breathe beneath the ſun.
When lo! an heavenly form, divinely fair,
Shoots from the ſtarry vault through fields of air;
And ſwifter than on wings of lightning driven,
At once ſeems here and there, in earth and heaven!
A dazzling brightneſs in refulgent ſtreams
Flows from his locks inwreath'd with ſunny beams:
His roſeate cheeks the bloom of heaven diſplay,
And from his eyes dart glories more than day:
A robe of light condens'd around him ſhone,
And his loins glitter'd with a ſtarry zone:
And while the liſtening winds lay huſh'd to hear,
Thus ſpoke the viſion, amiably ſevere!
Vain man! wouldſt thou eſcape the common lot,
To live, to ſuffer, die, and be forgot?
Look back on ancient times, primæval years,
All, all are paſt! a mighty void appears!
Heroes and kings, thoſe gods of earth, whoſe fame
Aw'd half the nations, now are but a name!
The great in arts or arms, the wiſe, the juſt,
Mix with the meaneſt in congenial duſt!
Ev'n ſaints and prophets the ſame paths have trod,
Ambaſſadors of heaven, and friends of God!
And thou, wouldſt thou the general ſentence fly?
Moſes is dead! thy Saviour deign'd to die!
Mortal, in all thy acts regard thy end;
Live well the time thou liv'ſt, and death's thy friend:
Then curb each rebel thought againſt the ſky,
And die reſign'd, O man ordain'd to die!
He added not, but ſpread his wings in flight,
And vaniſh'd inſtant in a blaze of light.
Abaſh'd, aſham'd, I cry, Eternal Power,
I yield! I wait reſign'd th' appointed hour!
Man, fooliſh man, no more thy ſoul deceive!
To die, is but the ſureſt way to live:
When age we aſk, we aſk it in our wrong,
And pray our time of ſuffering may be long;
The naufeous draught, and dregs of life to drain,
And feel infirmity, and length of pain!
What art thou, life, that we ſhould court thy ſtay?
A breath, one ſingle gaſp muſt puff away!
A ſhort-liv'd flower, that with the day muſt fade!
A fleeting vapour, and an empty ſhade!
A ſtream that ſilently, but ſwiftly glides
To meet eternity's immeaſur'd tides!
A being, loſt alike by pain or joy!
A fly can kill it, or a worm deſtroy!
Impair'd by labour, and by eaſe undone,
Commenc'd in tears, and ended in a groan!
Ev'n while I write, the tranſient NOW is paſt,
And death more near this ſentence than the laſt!
As ſome weak iſthmus ſeas from ſeas divides,
Beat by rude waves, and ſapp'd by ruſhing tides,
Torn from its baſe, no more their fury bears,
At once they cloſe, at once it diſappears:
Such, ſuch is life! the mark of miſery plac'd
Between two worlds, the future and the paſt;
To time, to ſickneſs, and to death a prey,
It ſinks, the frail poſſeſſion of a day!
As ſome fond boy in ſport along the ſhore
Builds from the ſands a fabric of an hour;
Proud of his ſpacious walls and ſtately rooms,
He ſtyles the mimic cells imperial domes;
The little monarch ſwells with fancy'd ſway,
Till ſome wind riſing puffs the dome away:
So the poor reptile, man! an heir of woe,
The lord of earth and ocean, ſwells in ſhow;
He plants, he builds, aloft the walls ariſe!
The noble plan he finiſhes, and——dies.
Swept from the earth, he ſhares the common fate;
His ſole diſtinction now, to rot in ſtate!
Thus buſy to no end till out of breath,
Tir'd we lie down, and cloſe up all in death.

Then bleſt the man whom gracious Heaven has led Through life's blind mazes to th' immortal dead!
Who ſafely landed on the bliſsful ſhore,
Nor human folly feels, nor frailty more!
O death! thou cure of all our idle ſtrife!
End of the gay, or ſerious farce of life!
Wiſh of the juſt, and refuge of th' oppreſt!
Where poverty, and where ev'n kings find reſt!
Safe from the frowns of power! calm thoughtful hate!
And the rude inſults of the ſcornful great!
The grave is ſacred! wrath and malice dread
To violate its peace, and wrong the dead:
But life, thy name is woe! to death we fly
To grow immortal——into life we die!
Then wiſely heaven in ſilence has confin'd
The happier dead, leſt none ſhould ſtay behind.
What though the path be dark that muſt be trod,
Though man be blotted from the works of God,
Though the four winds his ſcatter'd atoms bear
To earth's extremes through all th' expanſe of air;
Yet burſting glorious from the ſilent clay,
He mounts triumphant to eternal day.
So when the ſun rolls down th' ethereal plain,
Extinct his ſplendours in the whelming main,
A tranſient night earth, air, and heaven, invades,
Eclips'd in horrors of ſurrounding ſhades;
But ſoon emerging with a freſher ray,
He ſtarts exultant, and renews the day.

COURAGE IN LOVE.

My eyes with floods of tears o'erflow,
My boſom heaves with conſtant woe;
Thoſe eyes, which thy unkindneſs ſwells;
That boſom, where thy image dwells!
How could I hope ſo weak a flame
Could ever warm that matchleſs dame,
When none Elyſium muſt behold,
Without a radiant bough of gold?
'Tis hers in ſpheres to ſhine;
At diſtance to admire is mine:
Doom'd like th' enamour'd * youth to groan
For a new goddeſs form'd of ſtone.
While thus I ſpoke, love's gentle power
Deſcended from th' ethereal bower;
A quiver at his ſhoulder hung,
A ſhaft he graſp'd, and bow unſtrung.
All nature own'd the genial god,
And the ſpring flouriſh'd where he trod:
My heart no ſtranger to the gueſt,
Flutter'd, and labour'd in my breaſt;
When with a ſmile that kindles joy
Ey'n in the gods, began the boy:
How vain theſe tears! is man decreed,
By being abject, to ſucceed?
Hop'ſt thou by meagre looks to move?
Are women frighten'd into love?
He moſt prevails who nobly dares;
In love an hero, as in wars:
Ev'n Venus may be known to yield,
But 'tis when Mars diſputes the field:
Sent from a daring hand, my dart
Strikes deep into the fair-one's heart:
To winds and waves thy cares bequeath,
A ſigh is but a waſte of breath.
What though gay youth, and every grace
That beauty boaſts, adorn her face;
Yet goddeſſes have deign'd to wed,
And take a mortal to their bed:
And heaven, when gifts of incenſe riſe,
Accepts it, though it cloud their ſkies.
Mark! how this marygold conceals
Her beauty, and her boſom veils;
How from the dull embrace ſhe flies
Of Phœbus, when his beams ariſe:
But when his glory he diſplays,
And darts around his fiercer rays,
Her charms ſhe opens, and receives
The vigorous god into her leaves.

THE COMPLAINT.

CAELIA TO DAMON.

I WHO was once the glory of the plain,
The faireſt virgin of the virgin train,
Am now (by thee, O faithleſs man betray'd)
A fall'n, a loſt, a miſerable maid.
Ye winds, that witneſs to my deep deſpair,
Receive my ſighs, and waft them through the air,
And gently breathe them to my Damon's ear!
Curſt, ever curſt be that unlucky day,
When trembling, ſighing, at my feet he lay,
I trembled, ſigh'd, and look'd my heart away!
Why was he form'd, ye powers, his ſex's pride,
Too falſe to love, too fair to be deny'd?
Ye heedleſs virgins, gaze not on his eyes;
Lovely they are, but ſhe that gazes dies!
Oh! fly his voice, be deaf to all he ſays;
Charms has his voice, but charming it betrays!
At every word, each motion of his eye,
A thouſand loves are born, a thouſand lovers die.
Say, gentle youths, ye bleſt Arcadian ſwains,
Inhabitants of theſe delightful plains,
Say, by what fountain, in what roſy bower,
Reclines my charmer in the noon-tide hour!
To you, dear fugitive, where'er you ſtray,
Wild with deſpair, impatient of delay,
Swift on the wings of eager love I fly,
Or ſend my ſoul ſtill ſwifter in a ſigh!
I'd then inform you of your Cælia's cares,
And try the eloquence of female tears;
Fearleſs I'd paſs where deſolation reigns,
Tread the wild waſte, or burning Libyan plains:
Or where the north his furious pinions tries,
And howling hurricanes embroil the ſkies!
Should all the monſters in Getulia bred
Oppoſe the paſſage of a tender maid;
Dauntleſs, if Damon calls, his Cælia ſpeeds
Through all the monſters that Getulia breeds!
Bold was Bonduca, and her arrows flew
Swift and unerring from the twanging yew:
By love inſpir'd, I'll teach the ſhaft to fly;
For thee I'd conquer, or at leaſt would die!
If o'er the dreary Caucaſus you go,
Or mountains crown'd with everlaſting ſnow,

Where through the freezing ſkies in ſtorms it pours,
And brightens the dull air with ſhining ſhowers,
Ev'n there with you I could ſecurely reſt,
And dare all cold, but in my Damon's breaſt;
Or ſhould you dwell beneath the ſultry ray,
Where riſing Phœbus uſhers in the day,
There, there I dwell! Thou ſun, exert thy fires;
Love, mighty love, a fiercer flame inſpires:
Or if, a pilgrim, you would pay your vows
Where Jordan's ſtreams in ſoft meanders flows;
I'll be a pilgrim, and my vows I'll pay
Where Jordan's ſtreams in ſoft meanders play.
Joy of my ſoul! my every wiſh in one!
Why muſt I love, when loving I'm undone?
Sweet are the whiſpers of the waving trees,
And murmuring waters, curling to the breeze;
Sweet are ſoft ſlumbers in the ſhady bowers
When glowing ſuns inſeſt the ſultry hours:
But not the whiſpers of the waving trees,
Nor murmuring waters, curling to the breeze;
Not ſweet ſoft ſlumbers in the ſhady bowers,
When thou art abſent whom my ſoul adores!
Come, let us ſeek ſome flowery, fragrant bed!
Come, on thy boſom reſt my love-ſick head!
Come, drive thy flocks beneath the ſhady hills,
Or ſoftly ſlumber by the murmuring rills!
Ah no! he flies! that dear enchanting he!
Whoſe beauty ſteals my very ſelf from me!
Yet wert thou wont the garland to prepare,
To crown with fragrant wreathes thy Cælia's hair:
When to the lyre ſhe tun'd the vocal lays,
Thy tongue would flatter, and thine eyes ſpeak praiſe:
And when ſmooth-gliding in the dance ſhe mov'd,
Aſk thy falſe boſom if it never lov'd?
And ſtill her eye ſome little luſtre bears,
If ſwains ſpeak truth!—though dim'd for thee with tears!
But fade each grace! ſince he no longer ſees
Thoſe charms, for whom alone I wiſh to pleaſe!
But whence theſe ſudden, ſad preſaging fears,
Theſe riſing ſighs, and whence theſe flowing tears?
Ah! leſt the trumpet's terrible alarms
Have drawn the lover from his Cælia's charms,
To try the doubtful field, and ſhine in azure arms!
Ah! canſt thou bear the labours of the war,
Bend the tough bough, or dart the pointed ſpear?
Deſiſt, fond youth! let others glory gain,
Seek empty honour o'er the ſurgy main,
Or ſheath'd in horrid arms ruſh dreadful to the plain!
Thee, ſhepherd, thee the pleaſurable woods,
The painted meadows, and the cryſtal floods,
Claim and invite to bleſs their ſweet abodes.
There ſhady bowers and ſylvan ſcenes ariſe,
There fountains murmur, and the ſpring ſupplies
Flowers to delight the ſmell, or charm the eyes:
But mourn, ye ſylvan ſcenes and ſhady bowers;
Weep, all ye fountains; languiſh, all ye flowers!
If in a deſert Damon but appear,
To Cælia's eyes a deſert is more fair
Than all your charms, when Damon is not there!
Gods! what ſoft words, what ſweet deluſive wiles,
He boaſts! and, oh! thoſe dear undoing ſmiles!
Pleas'd with our ruin, to his arms we run:
To be undone by him who would not be undone?
Alas! I rave! ye ſwelling torrents, roll
Your watery tribute o'er my love-ſick ſoul!
To cool my heart, your waves, ye oceans, bear!
Oh! vain are all your waves, for love is there!
But ah! what ſudden thought to frenzy moves
My tortur'd ſoul?—perhaps, my Damon loves!
Some fatal beauty, yielding all her charms,
Detains the lovely traitor from my arms!
Blaſt her, ye ſkies! let inſtant vengeance ſeize
Thoſe guilty charms, whoſe crime it is to pleaſe!
Damon is mine!—fond maid, thy fears ſubdue!
Am I not jealous? and my charmer true?
O, heaven, from jealouſy my boſom ſave!
Cruel as death, inſatiate as the grave!
Ye powers! of all the ills that ever curſt
Our ſex, ſure man, diſſembling man, is worſt!
Like forward boys, awhile in wanton play,
He ſports with hearts, then throws the toys away:
With ſpecious wiles weak woman he aſſails;
He ſwears, weeps, ſmiles, he flatters, and prevails:
Then, in the moment when the maid believes,
The perjur'd traitor triumphs, ſcorns, and leaves,
How oft my Damon ſwore, th' all-ſeeing ſun
Should change his courſe, and rivers backward run,
Ere his fond heart ſhould range, or faithleſs prove
To the bright object of his ſtedfaſt love!
O! inſtant change thy courſe, all-ſeeing ſun!
Damon is falſe! ye rivers, backward run!
But die, O wretched Cælia, die! in vain
Thus to the fields and floods you breathe your pain!
The tear is fruitleſs, and the tender ſigh,
And life a load!—forſaken Cælia, die!
Fly ſwifter, time! O ſpeed the joyful hour!
Receive me, grave!—then I ſhall love no more!
Ah! wretched maid, ſo fad a cure to prove!
Ah! wretched maid, to fly to death from love!
Yet oh! when this poor frame no more ſhall live,
Be happy, Damon! may not Damon grieve!
Ah me! I'm vain! my death can not appear
Worth the vaſt price of but a ſingle tear.
Forlorn, abandon'd, to the rocks I go;
But they have learn'd new cruelties of you!
Alone, relenting Echo with me mourns,
And faint with grief ſhe ſcarce my ſighs returns!
Then, ſighs, adieu! ye nobler paſſions, riſe!
Be wiſe, fond maid!—but who in love is wiſe?
I rage, I rail, th' extremes of anger prove,
Nay, almoſt hate---then love thee beyond love!
Pity, kind heaven, and right an injur'd maid!
Yet, oh! yet, ſpare the dear deceiver's head!
If from the ſultry ſuns at noon-tide hours
He ſeeks the covert of the breezy bowers,
Awake, O South, and where my charmer lies,
Bid roſes bloom, and beds of fragrance riſe!
Gently, O gently round in whiſpers fly,
Sigh to his ſighs, and fan the glowing ſky!
If o'er the waves he cuts the liquid way,
Be ſtill, ye waves, or round his veſſel play!
And you, ye winds, confine each ruder breath,
Lie huſh'd in ſilence, and be calm as death!
But if he ſtay detain'd by adverſe gales,
My ſighs ſhall drive the ſhip, and fill the flagging ſails.

TRANSLATIONS

FROM

HESIOD AND APOLLONIUS RHODIUS.

" ——Vos exemplaria Græca.
" Nocturnâ verſate manu, verſate diurnâ." HOR.

THE BATTLE OF THE GODS AND TITANS.

From the Theogony of Heſiod; with a Deſcription of Tartarus, &c.

——μάχην δ' ἀμύγητον ἐγείρεν
Πάντες, &c. Θεογ. 666.

Now ſounds the vault of heaven with loud alarms,
And gods by gods embattling ruſh to arms:
Here ſtalk the Titans of portentous ſize,
Burſt from their dungeons, and aſſault the ſkies;
And there, unchain'd from Erebus and night,
Auxiliar * giants aid the gods in fight:
An hundred arms each tower-like warrior rears,
And ſtares from fifty heads amid the ſtars;
The dreadful brotherhood ſtern-frowning ſtands,
And hurls an hundred rocks from hundred hands;
The Titans ruſh'd with fury uncontroul'd;
Gods ſunk on gods, o'er giant giant roll'd;
Then roar'd the ocean with a dreadful ſound,
Heaven ſhook with all its thrones, and groan'd the ground,
Trembled th' eternal poles at every ſtroke,
And frighted heli from its foundations ſhook:
Noiſe, horrid noiſe, th' aërial region fills,
Rocks daſh on rocks, and hills encounter hills;
Through earth, air, heaven, tumultuous clamours riſe,
And ſhouts of battle thunder in the ſkies.
Then Jove omnipotent diſplay'd the god,
And all Olympus trembled as he trod:
He graſps ten thouſand thunders in his hand,
Bares his red arm, and wields the forky brand;
Then aims the bolts, and bids his lightnings play;
They flaſh, and tend through heaven their flaming way:
Redoubling blow on blow, in wrath he moves;
The ſing'd earth groans, and burns with all her groves;
The floods, the billows, boiling hiſs with fires,
And bickering flame, and ſmouldering ſmoke aſpires:
A night of clouds blots out the golden day;
Full in their eyes the writhen lightnings play:
Ev'n chaos burns: again earth groans, heaven roars,
As tumbling downward with its ſhining towers;
Or burſt this earth, torn from her central place,
With dire diſruption from her deepeſt baſe:
Nor ſlept the wind: the wind new horror forms,
Clouds daſh on clouds before th' outrageous ſtorms,
While, tearing up the ſands, in drifts they riſe,
And half the deſerts mount th' encumber'd ſkies:
At once the tempeſt bellows, lightnings fly,
The thunders roar, and clouds involve the ſky:
Stupendous were the deeds of heavenly might;
What leſs, when gods conflicting cope in fight?
Now heaven its foes with horrid inroad gores,
And flow and four recede the giant powers:
Here ſtalks Ægeon, here fierce Gyges moves,
There Cottus rends up hills with all their groves;
Theſe hurl'd at once againſt the Titan bands
Three hundred mountains from three hundred hands:
And overſhadowing, overwhelming bound
With chains infrangible beneath the ground;
Below this earth, far as earth's confines lie,
Through ſpace unmeaſur'd, from the ſtarry ſky;
Nine days an anvil of an enormous weight,
Down ruſhing headlong from th' aërial height,
Scarce reaches earth; thence toſt in giddy rounds
Scarce reaches in nine days th' infernal bounds:
A wall of iron of ſtupendous height [night:
Guards the dire dungeons black with threefold
High o'er the horrors of th' eternal ſhade
The ſtedfaſt baſe of earth and ſeas is laid;
There in coercive durance Jove detains
The groaning Titans in afflictive chains.
A ſeat of woe! remote from cheerful day,
Through gulfs impaſſable, a boundleſs way.
Above theſe realms, a brazen ſtructure ſtands
With brazen portals, fram'd by Neptune's hands;
Through chaos to the ocean's baſe it ſwells;
There ſtern Ægeon with his giants dwells;
Fierce guards of Jove! from hence the fountains riſe
That waſh the earth, or wander through the ſkies;
That groaning murmur through the realm of woes,
Or feed the channels where the ocean flows;
Collected horrors throng the dire abodes,
Horrid and fell! deteſted ev'n by gods!
Enormous gulf! immenſe the bounds appear,
Waſteful and void, the journey of a year;

* Ægeon, Cottus, Gyges.

Where beating ſtorms, as in wild whirls they fight,
Toſs the pale wanderer, and retoſs through night:
The powers immortal with affright ſurvey
The hideous chaſm, and ſeal it up from day.
Hence through the vault of heaven huge Atlas rears
His giant limbs, and props the golden ſpheres:
Here ſable night, and here the beamy day,
Lodge and diſlodge, alternate in their ſway.
A brazen port the varying powers divides:
When day forth iſſues, here the night reſides;
And when night veils the ſkies, obſequious day,
Re-entering, plunges from the ſtarry way.
She from her lamp, with beaming radiance bright,
Pours o'er th' expanded earth a flood of light:
But night, by ſleep attended, rides in ſhades,
Brother of death, and all that breathes invades:
From *her ſoul womb they ſprung, reſiſtleſs powers,
Nurs'd in the horrors of Tartarean bowers,
Remote from day, when with her flaming wheels
She mounts the ſkies, or paints the weſtern hills:
With downy footſteps ſleep in ſilence glides
O'er the wide earth, and o'er the ſpacious tides;
The friend of life! Death unrelenting bears
An iron heart, and laughs at human cares;
She makes the mouldering race of man her prey,
And ev'n th' immortal powers deteſt her ſway.
Thus fell the † Titans from the realms above,
Beneath the thunders of Almighty Jove;
Then earth impregnate felt maternal woes,
And ſhook through all her frame with teeming throes:
Hence roſe Typhœus, a gigantic birth,
A monſter ſprung from Tarturus and earth,
A match for gods in might! on high he ſpreads
From his huge trunk an hundred dragons heads,
And from an hundred mouths in vengeance flings,
Envenom'd foam, and darts an hundred ſtings;
Horror, terrific, frowns from every brow,
And like a furnace his red eye-balls glow;
Fires dart from every creſt; and, as he turns,
Keen ſplendours flaſh, and all the giant burns:
Whene'er he ſpeaks, in echoing thunders riſe
An hundred voices, and affright the ſkies,
Unutterably fierce! the bright abodes
Frequent they ſhake, and terrify the gods.
Now bellowing like a ſavage bull, they roar,
Or angry lions in the midnight hour;
Now yells like furious whelps, or hiſs like ſnakes;
The rocks rebound, and every mountain ſhakes:
He hurl'd defiance 'gainſt th' immortal powers,
And heaven had ſeiz'd with all its ſhining towers,
But, at the voice of Jove, from pole to pole
Red lightnings flaſh, and raging thunders roll,
Rattling o'er all th' expanſion of the ſkies,
Bolt after bolt o'er earth and ocean flies.
Stern frowns the god amidſt the lightnings blaze,
Olympus ſhakes from his eternal baſe;
Trembles the earth: fierce flames involves the poles,
Devours the ground, and o'er the billows rolls:
Fires from Typhœus flaſh: with dreadful ſound
Storms rattle, thunder rolls, and groans the ground;
Above, below, the conflagration roars,
Ev'n the ſeas kindled burn through all their ſhores,
Deluge of fire! Earth rocks her tottering coaſts,
And gloomy Pluto ſhakes with all his ghoſts;
Ev'n the pale Titans, chain'd on burning floors,
Start at the din that rends th' infernal ſhores:
Then, in full wrath, Jove all the god applies,
And all his thunders burſt at once the ſkies;
And ruſhing gloomy from th' Olympian brow,
He blaſts the giant with th' almighty blow;
The giant tumbling ſinks beneath the wound,
And with enormous ruin rocks the ground:
Nor yet the lightnings of th' Almighty ſtay,
Through the ſing'd earth they burſt their burning way;
Earth kindling inward, melts in all her caves,
And hiſſing floats with fierce metallic waves:
As iron fuſile from the furnace flows,
Or molten ore with keen effulgence glows,
When the dire bolts of Jove ſtern Vulcan frames,
In burning channels roll the liquid flames;
Thus melted earth, and Jove, from realms on high,
Plung'd the huge giant to the nether ſky.
Then from Typhœus ſprung the winds that bear
Storms on their wings, and thunder in the air:
But from the gods deſcend of milder kind,
The eaſt, the weſt, the ſouth, and Boreal wind;
Theſe in ſoft whiſpers breathe a friendly breeze,
Play through the groves, or ſport upon the ſeas;
They fan the ſultry air with cooling gales,
And waft from realm to realm the flying ſails:
The reſt in ſtorms of ſounding whirlwinds fly,
Toſs the wild waves, and battle in the ſky;
Fatal to man! at once all ocean roars,
And ſcatter'd navies bulge on diſtant ſhores.
Then thundering o'er the earth they rend their way,
Graſs, herb, and flower, beneath their rage decay;
While towers and domes, vain boaſts of human truſt,
Torn from their inmoſt baſe, are whelm'd in duſt.
Thus heaven aſſerted its eternal reign
O'er the proud giants, and Titanic train;
And now in peace the gods their Jove obey,
And all the thrones of heaven adore his ſway.

THE LOVE OF JASON AND MEDEA.

From the Third Book, Ver. 743. of Apollonius Rhodius.

Νὺ μὲν ἔπειτ' ἐπὶ γαῖαν ἄγεν κνέφας, &c.

ADVERTISEMENT.

The tranſlator has taken the liberty, in the following verſion of the Argonautics of Apollonius, as well as in the ſtory of Talus, to omit whatever has not an immediate relation to the ſubject; yet hopes that a due connection is not wanting; and that the reader will not be diſpleaſed with theſe ſhort ſketches from a poet who is affirmed to be every where ſublime, by no leſs a critic than Longinus; and from whom many verſes are borrowed by ſo great a poet as Virgil.

Now rising shades a solemn gloom display,
O'er the wide earth, and o'er th' ethereal way:
All night the sailor marks the northern team,
And golden circlet of Orion's beam:
A deep repose the weary wanderer shares,
And the faint watchman sleeps away his cares;
Ev'n the fond mother, while all breathless lies
Her child of love, in slumber seals her eyes;
No sound of village-dog, no noise invades
The death-like silence of the midnight shades;
Alone Medea wakes: To love a prey,
Restless she rolls, and groans the night away:
Now the fire-breathing bulls command her cares;
She thinks on Jason, and for Jason fears:
In sad review, on horrors horrors rise;
Quick beats her heart, from thought to thought she flies;
As from replenish'd urns, with dubious ray,
The sun-beams dancing from the surface play,
Now here, now there, the trembling radiance falls
Alternate flashing round th' illumin'd walls;
Thus fluttering bounds the trembling virgin's blood,
And from her shining eyes descends a flood:
Now raving with resistless flames she glows,
Now sick with love she melts with softer woes:
The tyrant god, of every thought possest,
Beats in each pulse, and stings and racks her breast:
Now she resolves the magic to betray
To tame the bulls, now yield him up a prey:
Again, the drugs disdaining to supply,
She lothes the light, and meditates to die:
Anon, repelling with a brave disdain
The coward thought, she nourishes the pain:
Thus tost, retost with furious storms of cares,
On the cold ground she rolls, and thus with tears:
Ah me! where'er I turn, before my eyes
A dreadful view, on sorrows sorrows rise!
Tost in a giddy whirl of strong desire,
I glow, I burn, yet bless the pleasing fire.
O had this spirit from its prison fled,
By Dian sent to wander with the dead,
Ere the proud Grecians view'd the Colchian skies;
Ere Jason, lovely Jason, met those eyes!
Hell gave the shining mischief to our coast,
Medea saw him, and Medea lost——
But why these sorrows? if the powers on high
His death decree, die, wretched Jason, die!
Shall I, elude my sire? my art betray?
Ah me! what words shall purge the guilt away!
But could I yield——O whither must I run
To find the man——whom virtue bids me shun?
Shall I, all lost to shame, to Jason fly?
And yet I must—If Jason bleeds, I die!
Then, shame, farewell! Adieu for ever, fame!
Hail, black disgrace! be fam'd for guilt my name!
Live! Jason, live! enjoy the vital air!
Live through my aid! and fly where winds can bear!
But when he flies, ye poisons, lend your powers,
That day, Medea treads th' infernal shores!
Then, wretched maid, thy lot is endless shame,
Then the proud dames of Colchos blast thy name:
I hear them cry—"The false Medea's dead,
"Through guilty passions for a stranger's bed;
"Medea, careless of her virgin fame,
"Prefer'd a stranger to a father's name!"
O may I rather yield this vital breath,
Than bear that base dishonour, worse than death!
Thus wail'd the fair, and seiz'd with horrid joy
Drugs foes to life, and potent to destroy;
A magazine of death! again she pours
From swoln eye-balls tears in shining showers;
With grief infatiate, and with trembling hands,
All comfortless the cask of death expands:
A sudden fear her labouring soul invades,
Struck with the horrors of th' infernal shades:
She stands deep musing with a faded brow,
Absorb'd in thought, a monument of woe!
While all the comforts that on life attend,
The cheerful converse, and the faithful friend,
By thought deep-imag'd on her bosom play,
Endearing life, and charm despair away:
Th' all-cheering suns with sweeter light arise,
And every object brightens to her eyes:
Then from her hand the baneful drugs she throws,
Consents to live, recover'd from her woes;
Resolv'd the magic virtue to betray,
She waits the dawn, and calls the lazy day:
Time seems to stand, or backward drive his wheels:
The hours she chides, and eyes the eastern hills:
At length the dawn with orient beams appears,
The shades disperse, and man awakes to cares.
Studious to please, her graceful length of hair,
With art she binds, that wanton'd with the air;
From her soft cheeks she wipes the tear away,
And bids keen lightnings from her eyes to play;
From limb to limb refreshing unguents pours,
Unguents, that breathe of heaven, in copious showers:
Her robe she next assumes; bright clasps of gold
Close to the lessening waist the robe infold;
Down from her swelling loins, the rest unbound
Floats in rich waves redundant o'er the ground:
Last with a shining veil her cheeks she shades,
Then swimming smooth along magnificently treads.
Thus forward moves the fairest of her kind,
Blind to the future, to the present blind:
Twelve maids, attendants on her virgin bower,
Alike unconscious of the bridal hour,
Join to the car the mules: dire rites to pay,
To Hecate's black fane she bends her way;
A juice she bears, whose magic virtue tames
(Through fell Persephone) the rage of flames;
It gives the hero, strong in matchless might,
To stand secure of harms in mortal fight;
It mocks the sword: the sword, without a wound,
Leaps as from marble, shiver'd to the ground:
She mounts the car *; nor rode the nymph alone;
On either side two lovely damsels shone:
Her hand with skill th' embroider'd rein controuls;
Back fly the streets, as swift the chariot rolls.
Along the wheel-worn road they hold their way,
The domes retreat, the sinking towers decay:
Bare to the knee succinct a damsel train
Behind attends, and glitters tow'rd the plain.
As when her limbs divine Diana laves
In fair Parthenius, or th' Amnesian waves,

* 869.

Sublime in royal ſtate the bounding roes
Whirl her bright car along the mountain brows;
Swift to her fane in pomp the goddeſs moves;
The nymphs attend that haunt the ſhady groves,
Th' Amneſian ſount, or ſilver ſtreaming rills;
Nymphs of the vales, or Oreads of the hills!
The fawning beaſts before the goddeſs play,
Or, trembling, ſavage adoration pay:
Thus on her car ſublime the nymph appears,
The crowd falls back, and as ſhe moves reveres;
Swift to the fane aloft her courſe ſhe bends;
The fane ſhe reaches, and to earth deſcends:
Then to her train—Ah me! I fear we ſtray,
Miſled by folly to this lonely way!
Alas! ſhould Jaſon with his Greeks appear,
Where ſhould we fly? I fear, alas, I fear!
No more the Colchian youths, and virgin train,
Haunt the cool ſhade, or tread in dance the plain:
But ſince alone;—with ſports beguile the hours,
Come chaunt the ſong, or pluck the blooming flowers;
Pluck every ſweet to deck your virgin bowers!
Then warbling ſoft *, ſhe lifts her heavenly voice;
But ſick with mighty love, the ſong is noiſe;
She hears from every note a diſcord riſe,
'Till, pauſing, on her tongue the muſic dies;
She hates each object, every face offends;
In every wiſh her ſoul to Jaſon ſends;
With ſharpen'd eyes the diſtant lawn explores,
To find the object whom her ſoul adores:
At every whiſper of the paſſing air
She ſtarts, ſhe turns, and hopes her Jaſon there:
Again ſhe fondly looks, nor looks in vain;
He comes, her Jaſon ſhines along the plain.
As when, emerging from the watery way,
Refulgent Sirius lifts his golden ray,
He ſhines terrific! for his burning breath
Taints the red air with fevers, plagues, and death;
Such to the nymph approaching Jaſon ſhows,
Bright author of unutterable woes;
Before her eyes a ſwimming darkneſs ſpread,
Her fluſh'd cheek glow'd, her very heart was dead;
No more her knees their wonted office knew,
Fix'd without motion as to earth ſhe grew:
Her train recedes; the meeting lovers gaze
In ſilent wonder, and in ſtill amaze:
As two fair cedars on the mountain's brow,
Pride of the groves! with roots adjoining grow;
Erect and motionleſs the ſtately trees
Awhile remain, while ſleeps each fanning breeze,
Till from th' Æolian caves a blaſt unbound
Bends their proud tops, and bids their boughs reſound;
Thus gazing they, till by the breath of love
Strongly at length inſpir'd, they ſpeak, they move;
With ſmiles the love-ſick virgin he ſurvey'd,
And fondly thus addreſs'd the blooming maid:
Diſmiſs, my fair, my love, thy virgin fear;
'Tis Jaſon ſpeaks, no enemy is here!
Man, haughty man, is of obdurate kind;
But Jaſon bears no proud inhuman mind,
By gentleſt manners ſofteſt arts refin'd.

Whom wouldſt thou fly? Stay, lovely virgin, ſtay!
Speak every thought! far hence be fears away!
Speak! and be truth in every accent found!
Dread to deceive! we tread on * hallow'd ground.
By the ſtern power who guards this ſacred place,
By the illuſtrious authors of thy race;
By Jove, to whom the ſtranger's cauſe belongs,
To whom the ſuppliant, and who feels the wrongs;
O guard me, ſave me, in the needful hour!
Without thy aid, thy Jaſon is no more;
To thee a ſuppliant, in diſtreſs I bend,
To thee a ſtranger, and who wants a friend!
Then, when between us ſeas and mountains riſe,
Medea's name ſhall ſound in diſtant ſkies;
All Greece to thee ſhall owe her heroes fates,
And bleſs Medea through her hundred ſtates.
The mother and the wife, who now in vain
Roll their ſad eyes faſt-ſtreaming o'er the main,
Shall ſtay their tears; the mother, and the wife,
Shall bleſs thee for a ſon's or huſband's life!
Fair Ariadne, ſprung from Minos' bed,
Sav'd the brave Theſeus, and with Theſeus fled,
Forſook her father, and her native plain,
And ſtemm'd the tumults of the furging main;
Yet the ſtern ſire relented, and forgave
The maid, whoſe only crime it was to ſave:
Ev'n the juſt gods forgave: and now on high
A ſtar ſhe ſhines, and beautifies the ſky:
What bleſſings then ſhall righteous heaven decree
For all our heroes ſav'd, and ſav'd by thee!
Heaven gave thee not, to kill, ſo ſoft an air,
And cruelty ſure never look'd ſo fair!
He ceas'd; but left ſo charming on her ear
His voice, that liſtening ſtill ſhe ſeem'd to hear:
Her eye to earth ſhe bends with modeſt grace,
And heaven in ſmiles is open'd in her face.
A glance ſhe ſteals; but roſy bluſhes ſpread
O'er her fair cheek, and then ſhe drops her head:
A thouſand words at once to ſpeak ſhe tries;
In vain—but ſpeaks a thouſand with her eyes:
Trembling, the ſhining caſket ſhe expands,
Then gives the magic virtue to his hands;
And had the power been granted to convey
Her heart—had given her very heart away.

SIXTEEN ODES OF ANACREON.

ODE XV.—HAPPY LIFE.

The wealth of Gyges I deſpiſe;
Gems are uſeleſs glittering toys.
Gold I leave, and ſuch vain things,
To the low aim and pride of kings.
Let my hair with unguents flow,
With roſy garlands crown my brow!
The preſent moment I enjoy,
Doom'd in the next, perhaps, to die!
Then, while the hour ſerenely ſhines,
Toſs the gay die, and quaff thy wines:
But ever, in the genial hour,
To Bacchus the libation pour,
Leſt death in wrath approach, and cry,
Man—taſte no more the cup of joy.

ODE XVI.—THE POWER OF BEAUTY.

Some ſing of Thebes, and ſome deſtroy
In lofty numbers haughty Troy.
I mourn, alas! in plaintive ſtrains,
My own captivity and chains!
No navy, rang'd in proud array,
No foot, no horſeman, arm'd to ſlay,
My peace alarm! Far other foes,
Far other hoſts, create my woes:
Strange, dangerous hoſts, that ambuſh'd lie
In every bright love darting eye!
Such as deſtroy, when beauty arms
To conquer, dreadful in its charms!

ODE XX.—TO HIS MISTRESS.

The gods o'er mortals prove their ſway,
And ſteal them from themſelves away:
Transform'd by their almighty hands,
Sad Niobe an image ſtands;
And Philomel, up-borne on wings
Through air, her mournful ſtory ſings,

Would heaven, indulgent to my vow,
The happy change I wiſh, allow;
The envy'd mirrour I would be,
That thou might'ſt always gaze on me;
And could my naked heart appear,
Thou'dſt ſee thyſelf—for thou art there
O! were I made thy folding veſt,
That thou might'ſt claſp me to thy breaſt!
Or turn'd into a fount, to lave
Thy naked beauties in my wave!
Thy boſom-cincture I would grow,
To warm thoſe little hills of ſnow;
Thy ointment, in rich fragrant ſtreams
To wander o'er thy beauteous limbs;
Thy chain of ſhining pearl—to deck,
And cloſe embrace thy graceful neck:
A very ſandal I would be
To tread on—if trod on by thee!

ODE XXIV.—IMITATED.

Alas! alas! I ſee each day
Steals me from myſelf away;
And every ſtep of life I tread,
I ſpeed to mingle with the dead.
How many years are paſt, my friends,
I know, and there my knowledge ends.
How many years are ſtill in ſtore,
I neither can, nor would explore.
Then, ſince the hours inceſſant fly,
They all ſhall find me crown'd with joy.
To thoſe, my cares I here bequeath,
Who meanly die for fear of death,
And daily with aſſiduous ſtrife
Contrive to live, accurs'd with life.
Then, care, begone! I'd dance and play;
Hence, with thy ſerious face away!
I'll laugh; and whilſt gay wine inflames,
I'll court the laughter-loving dames;
And ſtudy to reſign my breath
In eccſtaſy, and ſmile in death.

ODE XXV.—IMITATED.

Bring me, O bring th' enlivening draught,
Lenient of grief, and anxious thought.
Then care retires, aſham'd to ſhow
His downcaſt eye, and faded brow.
I baniſh buſineſs to the great,
To all that curſe, yet covet ſtate.
Death haſtes amain: then who would run
To meet what moſt he ſtrives to ſhun?
Or antedate the dreadful day
By cares, and aid the fiend to ſlay?
If tears could bribe his dreadful powers,
I'd weep, and bleſs the precious ſhowers;
But let our lot be joy or woe,
Alike he ſpeeds to ſtrike the blow.
Then crown the bowl!—ye ſorrows, fly
To kill ſome wretch who wants to die.

ODE XXXI.—THE PLEASING FRENZY.

Now bring, by all the powers divine,
Being me a bowl of roſy wine;
A mighty bowl of wine I crave:
When wine inſpires, 'tis ſweet to rave.
In frantic rage Alcmæon drew
His falchion, and his * mother ſlew:
Oreſtes in a furious mood
Raving ſhed his † mother's blood.
Dreadful, ſober mankind, they!—
None, harmleſs drunkard, none I ſlay:
The blood of grapes I only crave;
I quaff it, and 'tis ſweet to rave.
Alcides, frantic, graſp'd his bow;
His quiver rattled, ſtor'd with woe:
Stern Ajax ſhook his glittering blade,
And broad his ſevenfold ſhield diſplay'd:
Dangerous madman! how he drew
His ſword, and hoſts in fancy ſlew!
I, peaceful I, no falchion wield;
I bend no bow, I poiſe no ſhield.
The flowery garland crowns my hairs,
My hand the powerful goblet bears;
The powerful goblet nobly brave,
I drain, and then 'tis ſweet to rave.

ODE XXXVI.

Talk not to me of pedant rules;
I leave debates to learned fools,
Who ſolemnly in form adviſe;
At beſt, impertinently wiſe!
To me more pleaſing precepts give,
And teach the ſcience how to live;
To bury in the friendly draught
Sorrows that ſpring from too much thought;
To learn ſoft leſſons from the fair,
How life may glide exempt from care.
Alas! I'm old! I ſee my head
With hoary locks by time o'erſpread:
Then inſtant be the goblet brought,
To make me young—at leaſt in thought.
Alas! inceſſant ſpeeds the day
When I muſt mix with common clay;
When I muſt tread the diſmal ſhore,
And dream of love and wine no more.

ODE XXXVI. THE SPRING.

See, winter's paſt! the ſeaſons bring
Soft breezes with returning ſpring;
At whoſe approach the graces wear
Freſh honours in their flowing hair:
The raging ſeas forget to roar,
And, ſmiling, gently kiſs the ſhore:
The ſportive duck, in wanton play,
Now dives, now riſes into day;
The cranes from freezing ſkies repair,
And ſailing float to warmer air:
Th' enlivening ſuns in glory riſe,
And gaily dance along the ſkies.
The clouds diſperſe; or if in ſhowers
They fall, it is to wake the flowers:
See, verdure clothes the teeming earth!
The olive ſtruggles into birth:
The ſwelling grapes adorn the vine,
And kindly promiſe future wine:

* Eryphile. † Clytemneſtra.

Bleſt juice! already I in thought
Quaff an imaginary draught.

ODE XLVIII. GAY LIFE.

Give me Homer's tuneful lyre,
Let the ſound my breaſt inſpire!
But with no troubleſome delight
Of arms and heroes ſlain in fight:
Let it play no conqueſts here,
Or conqueſts only o'er the fair!
Boy, reach that volume—book divine;
The ſtatutes of the god of wine!
He, legiſlator, ſtatutes draws;
And I his judge enforce his laws;
And, faithful to the weighty truſt,
Compel his vot'ries to be juſt:
Thus, round the bowl impartial flies,
Till to the ſprightly dance we riſe;
We friſk it with a lively bound,
Charm'd with the lyre's harmonious ſound;
Then pour forth, with an heat divine,
Rapturous ſongs that breathe of wine.

ODE I. THE HAPPY EFFECTS OF WINE

See! ſee the jolly god appears;
His hand a mighty goblet bears:
With ſparkling wine full-charg'd it flows,
The ſovereign cure of human woes.
Wine gives a kind releaſe from care,
And courage to ſubdue the fair;
Inſtructs the cheerful to advance
Harmonious in the ſprightly dance:
Hail, goblet! rich with generous wines!
See! round the verge a vine-branch twines.
See! how the mimic cluſters roll,
As ready to re-fill the bowl!
Wine keeps its happy patients free
From every painful malady;
Our beſt phyſician all the year.
Thus guarded, no diſeaſe we fear,
No troubleſome diſeaſe of mind,
Until another year grows kind,
And loads again the fruitful vine,
And brings again our health—new wine.

ODE LII. GRAPES; OR THE VINTAGE.

Io! the vintage now is done!
And black'ned with th' autumnal ſun
The grapes gay youths and virgins bear,
The ſweeteſt product of the year!
In vats the heavenly load they lay,
And ſwift the damſels trip away:
The youths alone the wine-preſs tread,
For wine's by ſkilful drunkards made:
Meantime the mirthful ſong they raiſe,
Io! Bacchus, to thy praiſe!
And, eying the bleſt juice, in thought
Quaff an imaginary draught.
Gaily, through wine, the old advance,
And doubly tremble in the dance:
In fancy'd youth they chant and play,
Forgetful that their locks are gray.

Through wine, the youth completes his loves;
He haunts the ſilence of the groves:
Where, ſtretch'd beneath th' embowering ſhade,
He ſpies ſome love-inſpiring maid:
On beds of roſy ſweets ſhe lies,
Inviting ſleep to cloſe her eyes:
Faſt by her ſide his limbs he throws,
Her hand he preſſes—breathes his vow
And cries, my love, my ſoul comply
This inſtant, or, alas! I die.
In vain the youth perſuaſion tries!
In vain!—her tongue at leaſt denies:
Then ſcorning death through dull deſpair,
He ſtorms th' unwilling willing fair;
Bleſſing the grapes that could diſpenſe
The happy, happy impudence.

ODE LIII. THE ROSE.

Come, lyriſt, tune thy harp, and play
Reſponſive to my vocal lay:
Gently touch it, while I ſing
The roſe, the glory of the ſpring.
To heaven the roſe in fragrance flies,
The ſweeteſt incenſe of the ſkies.
Thee, joy of earth, when vernal hours
Pour forth a blooming waſte of flowers,
The gaily-ſmiling graces wear
A trophy in their flowing hair.
Thee Venus queen of beauty loves,
And, crown'd with thee, more graceful moves.
In fabled ſong, and tuneful lays,
Their favourite roſe the muſes praiſe:
To pluck the roſe, the virgin-train
With blood their pretty fingers ſtain,
Nor dread the pointed terrors round,
That threaten, and inflict a wound:
See! how they wave the charming toy,
Now kiſs, now ſnuff the fragrant joy!
The roſe the poets ſtrive to praiſe,
And for it would exchange their bays;
O! ever to the ſprightly feaſt
Admitted, welcome, pleaſing gueſt!
But chiefly when the goblet flows,
And roſy wreaths adorn our brows!
Lovely ſmiling roſe, how ſweet
The object where thy beauties meet!
Aurora with a bluſhing ray,
And roſy fingers, ſpreads the day:
The graces more enchanting ſhow
When roſy bluſhes paint their ſnow;
And every pleas'd beholder ſeeks
The roſe in Cytherea's cheeks.
When pain afflicts, or ſickneſs grieves,
Its juice the drooping heart relieves;
And, after death, its odours ſhed
A pleaſing fragrance o'er the dead;
And when its withering charms decay,
And ſinking, fading, die away,
Triumphant o'er the rage of time,
It keeps the fragrance of its prime.
Come, lyriſt, join to ſing the birth
Of this ſweet offſpring of the earth!
When Venus from the ocean's bed
Rais'd o'er the waves her lovely head;

When warlike Pallas ſprung from Jove,
Tremendous to the powers above;
To grace the world, the teeming earth
Gave the fragrant infant birth,
And 'This,' ſhe cry'd, 'I this ordain
'My favourite, queen of flowers to reign!'
But firſt th' aſſembled gods debate
The future wonder to create:
Agreed at length, from heaven they threw
A drop of rich, nectareous dew;
A bramble-ſtem the drop receives,
And ſtrait the roſe adorns the leaves.
The gods to Bacchus gave the flower,
To grace him in the genial hour.

ODE LIV.—GROWN YOUNG.

When ſprightly youths my eyes ſurvey,
I too am young, and I am gay;
In dance my active body ſwims,
And ſudden pinions lift my limbs.
Haſte, crown, Cybæba, crown my brows
With garlands of the fragrant roſe!
Hence, hoary age!—I now am ſtrong,
And dance, a youth among the young.
Come then, my friends, the goblet drain!
Bleſt juice!—I feel thee in each vein!
See! how with active bounds I ſpring!
How ſtrong, and yet how ſweet, I ſing!
How bleſt am I! who thus excell
In pleaſing arts of trifling well!

ODE LV.—THE MARK.

The ſtately ſteed expreſſive bears
A mark imprinted on his hairs:
The turban that adorns the brows
Of Aſia's ſons, the Parthian ſhows:
And marks betray the lover's heart,
Deeply engrav'd by Cupid's dart:
I plainly read them in his eyes,
That look too fooliſh, or too wiſe.

ODE LVI.

Alas! the powers of life decay!
My hairs are fall'n, or chang'd to grey!
The ſmiling bloom, and youthful grace,
Is baniſh'd from my faded face!
Thus man beholds, with weeping eyes,
Himſelf half-dead before he dies.
For this, and for the grave, I fear,
And pour the never-ceaſing tear!
A dreadful proſpect ſtrikes my eye;
I ſoon muſt ſicken, ſoon muſt die.
For this the mournful groan I ſhed;
I dread—alas! the hour I dread!
What eye can ſtedfaſtly ſurvey
Death and its dark tremendous way?
For ſoon as fate has clos'd our eyes,
Man dies—for ever, ever dies!
All pale, all ſenſeleſs in the urn!
Never, ah! never to return.

ODE LXIV.—TO APOLLO.

Once more, not uninſpir'd, the ſtring
I waken, and ſpontaneous ſing:
No Pythic laurel-wreath I claim,
That lifts ambition into fame:
My voice unbidden tunes the lay:
Some god impells, and I obey.
Liſten, ye groves!—The muſe prepares
A ſacred ſong in Phrygian airs;
Such as the ſwan expiring ſings,
Melodious by Cäyſter's ſprings,
While liſtening winds in ſilence hear,
And to the gods the muſic bear.
Celeſtial muſe! attend, and bring
Thy aid, while I thy Phœbus ſing:
To Phœbus and the muſe belong
The laurel, lyre, and Delphic ſong.
Begin, begin the lofty ſtrain!
How Phœbus lov'd, but lov'd in vain;
How Daphne fled his guilty flame,
And ſcorn'd a god that offer'd ſhame.
With glorious pride his vows ſhe hears;
And heaven, indulgent to her prayers,
To laurel chang'd the nymph, and gave
Her foliage to reward the brave.
Ah! how, on wings of love convey'd,
He flew to claſp the panting maid!
Now, now o'ertakes!—but heaven deceives
His hope—he ſeizes only leaves.
Why fires my raptur'd breaſt? ah! why,
Ah! whither ſtrives my ſoul to fly?
I feel the pleaſing frenzy ſtrong,
Impulſive to ſome nobler ſong:
Let, let the wanton fancy play;
But guide it, leſt it devious ſtray.
But oh! in vain, my muſe denies
Her aid, a ſlave to lovely eyes.
Suffice it to rehearſe the pains
Of bleeding nymphs, and dying ſwains;
Nor dare to wield the ſhafts of love,
That wound the gods, and conquer Jove.
I yield! adieu the lofty ſtrain!
I am Anacreon once again:
Again the melting ſong I play,
Attemper'd to the vocal lay:
See! ſee! how with attentive ears
The youths imbibe the nectar'd airs!
And quaff, in lowery ſhades reclin'd,
My precepts, to regale the mind.

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR.

——— Superior to the pains below,
Your thoughts in ſoaring meditations flow,
In rapt'rous trance, on Virgil's genius dwell,
To us, poor mortals, his ſtrong beauties tell,
And, like Æneas, from your couch of ſtate,
In all the pomp of words diſplay the Trojan fate.

THE LIFE OF PITT.

CHRISTOPHER PITT was born at Blandford in Dorſetſhire, in 1699. His father was an eminent phyſician in that place, and related to the family of Pitt of Stratfield-ſea in Hampſhire.

At the age of fifteen, he was received as a ſcholar into Wincheſter College, where he was diſtinguiſhed by exerciſes of uncommon elegance.

In 1719, he was choſen to New College, Oxford; and at his removal, he preſented to the electors two volumes of MS. poems, the product of his private and voluntary ſtudies; one of which conſiſted of miſcellaneous pieces, and the other contained a complete verſion of Lucan, which he did not then know to have been tranſlated by Rowe.

The verſion was ſuppreſſed, perhaps from its being the production of early life, or from a conſciouſneſs of its inferiority to the verſion of Rowe, which was executed in the full vigour of his genius.

Such an inſtance, however, of early diligence deſerves well to be recorded; and the ſuppreſſion of ſuch a work, recommended by ſuch uncommon circumſtances, is to be regretted; for examples of early excellence are never ſuperfluous, and from this example, the danger is not great of many imitations.

When he had reſided three years at this College, he was preſented to the rectory of Pimpern near Blandford, in Dorſetſhire, 1722, by his friend and relation George Pitt, Eſq. of Stratfield-ſea in Hampſhire; and reſigning his fellowſhip, continued at Oxford two years longer, till he became Maſter of Arts. While he reſided at the univerſity, he was affectionately beloved by all who knew him, and particularly diſtinguiſhed by Young, who, with an engaging familiarity, uſed to call him his ſon, and to whom he addreſſed an Epiſtle in 1722.

He then retired to Pimpern, a place pleaſing by its ſituation, and therefore likely to excite the imagination of a poet, where he paſſed the reſt of his life.

At what time he compoſed his Miſcellaneous Poems, publiſhed 1727, is not eaſy to know: thoſe which have dates, appear to have been very early productions, and few of them riſe above mediocrity.

Of the panegyric on Lord Stanhope, the conqueror of Minorca, in particular, he was afterwards aſhamed. "I did write an idle thing," ſays he, in a letter to Mr. Duncombe, 1738, "on Lord Stanhope, the work of a day or two, which I have forgot, as I hope every body elſe has done. The lines, I believe, ſome at leaſt, were round and ſtrong; but, upon the whole, I own it was a raſh incorrect thing. I knew indeed very little of the ſubject; but as he was married to a relation [Lucy, daughter of Thomas Pitt, Eſq. of Stratford, Wilts], I fell to ſcribbling, without fear or wit, to ſhow my reſpect."

Probably about this time he publiſhed his tranſlation of Vida's Art of Poetry, which Pope's commendation, in his "Eſſay on Criticiſm," and Triſtram's ſplendid edition, had then made popular. This poem is perhaps the moſt perfect of Vida's compoſitions, and has the praiſe of being one of the firſt, if not the very firſt pieces of criticiſm that appeared in Italy ſince the revival of learning; for it was finiſhed in the year 1520.

In this tranſlation, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a ſtrict attention to the ſenſe of the original, the utmoſt elegance of verſification, and the ſkilful adaptation of his numbers to the images expreſſed; a beauty which Vida has with great ardour enforced and exemplified.

It was immediately on its publication very eagerly received by the readers of poetry. "I believe it was you," he writes Mr. Duncombe, "who gave a public teſtimony to the merit of the tranſlation of Vida," (if it has any) in the "Whitehall Evening Poſt;" when it made its firſt appearance in the world, which I ſuppoſe did not a little contribute to its reputation and ſale; for ſix or ſeven hundred were ſoon diſpoſed of."

The ſucceſs of his Vida animated him to a higher undertaking; and, in his thirtieth year, he publiſhed a verſion of the firſt book of the Æneid; which, being commended by his friends, he ſome time afterwards added three more, with an advertiſement, in which he repreſents himſelf as tranſlating with great indifference, and with a progreſs of which himſelf was hardly conſcious.

" I am glad," he writes Mr. Duncombe, 1736, " that the verſion pleaſed Meſſrs. Spence, Browne [I. Hawkins], Duncombe, Glover, Benſon, and ſome more of the beſt judges in town. If I may be allowed to judge in my own caſe, I think this laſt to be the beſt of my poetical performances; and I believe that you will agree with me, that the three laſt books have fewer grammatical inaccuracies than the firſt book. I cannot tell what to ſay to your compliment, ' that this verſion will be admired as long as the Engliſh language laſts;' but I am highly obliged to you for your partiality to me ever ſince the tranſlation of Vida."

He completed the entire tranſlation of the Æneid, June 2. 1738, which, without any further contention with his modeſty, or any awe of the name of Dryden, he publiſhed, in two volumes, 4to, 1740. " I propoſe a good deal of pleaſure," he writes Mr. Duncombe, " in correcting this large work, and hope that in time my friends will not be aſhamed of it, though I know; that in many reſpects Mr. Dryden's verſion muſt have the advantage." In another letter, he ſtyles Dryden's " a glorious tranſlation." " I believe," he adds, " in all my verſion, there are not above ſeven or eight borrowed lines. I could not help taking two together from Mr. Dryden in this paragraph, they are ſo very ſweet:

" All, all my life," replies the youth, " ſhall aim,
Like this one hour, at everlaſting fame.
Though fortune only this attempt can bleſs,
Yet ſtill my courage ſhall deſerve ſucceſs;
But one reward I aſk before I go,
The greateſt I can aſk, or you beſtow.
Of Priam's royal race my mother came,
And ſure the beſt that ever bore the name.
Such was her love, ſhe left her native Troy,
And fair Trinacria, for her darling boy;
And ſuch is mine, that I muſt keep unknown
From her the danger of ſo dear a ſon.
To ſpare her anguiſh, lo! I quit the place,
Without one parting kiſs, one laſt embrace!
By night, and that reſpected hand, I ſwear,
Her tender tears are more than I can bear.
For her, good prince, your pity I implore;
Support her, childleſs, and relieve her, poor.
Oh! let her find in you, when I am gone,
A friend, a ſpouſe, a guardian, and a ſon!
With that dear hope emboldened I ſhall go,
Brave every danger, and defy the foe."

He had certainly reaſon to be proud of theſe lines, it being ſcarce poſſible to find any ſuperior to them in any verſion; Dryden's of the ſame paſſage (" ſweet" as are the two lines he has taken), is much inferior in elegance and harmony.

The Engliſh Æneid is joined in this collection with his other poems, that the readers of poetry may have an opportunity of comparing the two beſt tranſlations that perhaps ever were produced, by one nation, of the ſame authur.

He did not enjoy the reputation which this great work deſervedly conferred; for he died in 1748, in the forty-eight year of his age; and lies buried under a ſtone at Blandford, on which is this inſcription:

In memory of
CHR. PITT, Clerk, M. A.
Very eminent
for his talents in poetry;
and yet more
for the univerſal candour of his mind, and the primitive ſimplicity of his manners.
He lived innocent,
and died beloved,
Apr. 13. 1748.
Aged 48.

His Original Poems, diſperſed in the " The Student," and other publications, were collected and publiſhed in the edition of " The Engliſh Poets," 1779.

His verſion of the Æneid was re-printed in a complete edition of "Virgil's works tranſlated into Engliſh," in 4 vols, 8vo, 1753. The tranſlation of the "Eclogues" and "Georgics," three eſſays "on paſtoral, didactic, and epic poetry," and "notes on the whole," were contributed by Dr. Warton, the preſent reſpectable maſter of Wincheſter ſchool; with diſſertations "on the VIth book of the Eneid," by Warburton; "on the ſhield of Æneas," by W. Whitehead; "on the character of Iapis," by Dr. Atterbury; and ſome new obſervations by Holdſworth, Spence, and others.

The amiable character of Pitt, tranſcribed from the ſtone that marks the place of his duſt, owes nothing to flattery. He was reverenced for his virtue, and beloved for the ſoftneſs of his temper, and the eaſineſs of his manners. Before ſtrangers, he had ſomething of the ſcholar's timidity and diſtruſt; but when he became familiar, he was in a very high degree cheerful and entertaining. His general benevolence procured him general reſpect; and he paſſed a life placid and honourable; neither too great for the kindneſs of the low, nor too low for the notice of the great.

As a poet, his compoſitions are characteriſed by ſplendour and elegance of diction, and the exquiſite poliſh and harmony of the verſification. Moſt of his original pieces are pleaſing and poetical; but his Vida and the Engliſh Æneid, are the chief foundation of his fame. His verſion of Vida is executed with ſo much exactneſs and general elegance, that there is little fear of its being ſupplanted by the verſion of Mr. Hampſon, publiſhed in 1793.

The excellence of his verſion of the Æneid, his greateſt work, is generally allowed; but the critics have been divided concerning the juſt proportion of merit which ought to be aſcribed to it, comparatively with that of Dryden. Some have aſſerted, that Pitt has done moſt juſtice to Virgil; that he ſhines in Pitt with a luſtre which Dryden wanted not power, but leiſure to beſtow. Pitt, no doubt, had many advantages above Dryden in this arduous undertaking. As he was later in the attempt, he had conſequently the verſion of Dryden to improve upon. He ſaw the errors of that great poet, and avoided them; he diſcovered his beauties, and improved upon them: and as he was not compelled by neceſſity, he had leiſure to reviſe, correct, and finiſh his excellent work. Yet it may be juſtly doubted whether, upon the whole, the verſion of Dryden is not the moſt vigorous and poetical performance.

A compariſon of the following paſſages may enable the reader to determine for himſelf, to whoſe tranſlation he would give the preference. The firſt is taken from Virgil's deſcription of Elyſium, which "is ſo charming," ſays Dr. Trapp, "that it is almoſt Elyſium to read it."

His demum exactis perfecto munera divæ,
Devenere locos lætos, et amæna vireta
Fortunatorum nemorum ſedeſque beatas
Largior hic campos æther et lumine veſtit
Purpureo: ſolemque ſuum, ſua ſidera norunt
Pars in gramineis exercent membra palæſtris
Contenduut ludo, et fulva luctantur arena;
Pars pedibus plaudunt choreas et carmina decunt
Nec non Threicus longa cum veſte ſacerdos
Obloquitur numeris ſeptem diſcrimina vocum,
Jamque eadem digitis, jam pectine pulſat eburno.——ÆNEID, Lib. VI. 639.

Theſe holy rites performed, they took their way
Where long extended plains of pleaſure lay.
The verdant fields with thoſe of heaven may vie,
With ether veſted, and a purple ſky;
The bliſsful ſeats of happy ſouls below,
Stars of their own, and their own ſuns they know.
Their airy limbs in ſports they exerciſe,
And on the green contend the wreſtler's prize.
Some in heroic verſe divinely ſing,
Others in artful meaſures lead the ring.
The Thracian bard, ſurrounded by the reſt,
There ſtands conſpicuous in his flowing veſt.
His flying fingers, and harmonious quill,
Strike ſeven diſtinguiſh'd notes, and ſeven at once they fill.——DRYDEN.

Theſe rites complete, they reach the flowery plains,
The verdant groves, where endleſs pleaſure reigns.
Here glowing ether ſhoots a purple ray,
And o'er the region pours a double day.

From ſky to ſky th' unwearied ſplendour runs,
And nobler planets roll round brighter ſuns.
Some wreſtle on the ſands, and ſome in play,
And games heroic, paſs the hours away.
Thoſe raiſe the ſong divine, and theſe advance,
In meaſur'd ſteps, to form the ſolemn dance.
There Orpheus, graceful in his long attire,
In ſeven diviſions ſtrikes the ſounding lyre.
Acroſs the chords the quivering quill he flings,
Or with his flying fingers ſweeps the ſtrings.——PITT.

In the celebrated deſcription of the ſwiftneſs of Camilla, in the VIIth Æneid, the ſuperiority of Dryden is more conſpicuous than in the foregoing paſſage.

Illa vel intactæ ſegetis per ſumma volaret
Gramina, nec teneras curſu læſiſſit ariſtas,
Vel mare per medium fluctu ſuſpenſa tumenti
Ferret iter; celeres nec tingeret æquore plantas.

——— the fierce virago fought—
Outſtrip'd the winds in ſpeed upon the plain;
Flew o'er the fields, nor hurt the bearded grain.
She ſwept the ſeas; and as ſhe ſkimm'd along,
Her flying feet, unbath'd, on billows hung.——DRYDEN.

She led the rapid race, and left behind
The flagging floods, and pinions of the wind;
Lightly ſhe flies along the level plain,
Nor hurts the tender graſs, nor bends the golden grain;
Or o'er the the ſwelling ſurge ſuſpended ſweeps,
And ſmoothly ſkims, unbath'd, along the deeps.——PITT.

It is evident from theſe paſſages, that Pitt's verſification, though more exquiſitely poliſhed, abounds more in ſuperfluous epithets and uneſſential images than that of Dryden, and is beſides leſs diſtinguiſhed by variety of pauſe and cadence. Alliteration is an inferior beauty, which is more remarkable in Pitt than Dryden. Benſon, who in a pamphlet of his writing, has treated Dryden's verſion with great contempt, was yet fond of the alliteration of Pitt, to a degree of enthuſiaſm. He once took occaſion, in converſation with Pitt, to magnify that beauty, and to compliment him upon it. Pitt thought it far leſs conſiderable than Benſon did; but ſays he, "Since you are ſo fond of alliteration, this couplet upon Cardinal Wolſey will not diſpleaſe you:

Begot by butchers, but by biſhops bred,
How high his honour holds his haughty head."

Benſon was no doubt charmed to hear his favourite grace in poetry ſo beautifully exemplified, which it certainly is, without any affectation or ſtiffneſs.

Spence, in his "Polymetis," has convicted Dryden, in ſeveral inſtances, of ignorance or negligence in tranſlating the ancient allegories. "Upon this," ſays Dr. Warton, "I was deſirous to examine Mr. Pitt's tranſlation of the ſame paſſages, and was ſurpriſed to find near fifty inſtances which Mr. Spence has given of Dryden's miſtakes of that kind, when Mr. Pitt had not fallen into above three or four."

To the eſtimate which Dr. Johnſon has given of the comparative merits of the rival verſions, the preſent writer has no great reaſon to object, as he is more diſpoſed to admire the amazing force of Dryden's genius, than induſtriouſly to dwell on his imperfections.

"Pitt engaging as a rival with Dryden, naturally obſerved his failures, and avoided them; and as he wrote after Pope's "Iliad," he had an example of an exact, equable, and ſplendid verſification. With theſe advantages, ſeconded by great diligence, he might ſucceſsfully labour particular paſſages, and eſcape many errors. If the two verſions are compared, perhaps the reſult would be, that Dryden leads the reader forward by his general vigour and ſprightlineſs; and Pitt often ſtops him to contemplate the excellence of a particular couplet: That Dryden's faults are forgotten in the hurry of delight, and that Pitt's beauties are neglected in the langour of a cold and liſtleſs peruſal; That Pitt pleaſes the critics, and Dryden the people: That Pitt is quoted, and Dryden read."

DEDICATION.

TO GEORGE PITT, Esq.

OF STRATFIELD SEA, IN HAMPSHIRE.

Sir;

Since you vouchsafe to be a patron to these sheets, as well as to their author, I will not make an ill use of the liberty you give me, to address you in this public manner, by running into the common topics of dedications. Should I venture to engage in such an extensive theme as your character, the world would judge the attempt to be altogether unnecessary, because it had long before been thoroughly acquainted with your virtues; besides I am sensible, that you as earnestly decline all praise and panegyric, as you eminently deserve them.

I hope, Sir, on another occasion, to present you with the product of my severer studies: in the mean time, be pleased to accept of this trifle, as one small acknowledgment of the many great favours you have bestowed on,

(Honoured Sir)

Your obliged humble servant,

Christopher Pitt.

PREFACE.

My translation of Vida's Art of Poetry having been more favourably received than I had reason to expect, has encouraged me to publish this miscellany of poems and select translations. I shall neither embarrass myself nor my reader with apologies concerning this collection; for whether it is a good or a bad one, all excuses are unnecessary in one case, and offered in vain in the other.

An author of a miscellany has a better chance of pleasing the world, than he who writes on a single subject; and I have sometimes known a bad, or (which is still worse) an indifferent poet, meet with tolerable success; which has been owing more to the variety of subjects, than his happiness in treating them.

I am sensible the men of wit and pleasure will be disgusted to find so great a part of this collection consist of sacred poetry; but I assure these gentlemen, whatever they shall be pleased to object, that I shall never be ashamed of employing my talents (such as they are) in the service of my Maker; that it would look indecent in one of my profession, not to spend as much time on the psalms of David, as the hymns of Callimachus; and farther, that if those beautiful pieces of divine poetry had been written by Callimachus, or any heathen author, they might have possibly vouchsafed them a reading even in my translation.

But I will not trespass further on my reader's patience in prose, since I shall have occasion enough for it, as well as for his good nature, in the following verses; concerning which I must acquaint him, that some of them were written several years since, and that I have precisely observed the rule of our great master Horace—Nonumque prematur in annum. But I may say more justly than Mr. Prior said of himself in the like case, that I have observed the letter more than the spirit of the precept.

RECOMMENDATORY POEMS

TO MR. CHRISTOPHER PITT.

ON HIS POEMS AND TRANSLATIONS.

Forgive th' ambitious fondneſs of a friend,
For ſuch thy worth, 'tis glory to commend;
To thee, from judgment, ſuch applauſe is due,
I praiſe myſelf while I am praiſing you;
As he who bears the lighted torch, receives
Himſelf aſſiſtance from the light he gives.
So much you pleaſe, ſo vaſt is my delight,
Thy, ev'n thy fancy cannot reach its height.
In vain I ſtrive to make the tranſport known,
No language can deſcribe it but thy own.
Could'ſt thou thy genius pour into my heart,
Thy copious fancy, thy engaging heart,
Thy vigorous thoughts, thy manly flow of ſenſe,
Thy ſtrong and glowing paint of eloquence;
Then ſhould'ſt thou well conceive that happineſs,
Which I alone can feel, and you expreſs.
In ſcenes which thy invention ſets to view,
Forgive me, friend, if I loſe ſight of you;
I ſee with how much ſpirit Homer thought,
With how much judgment cooler Virgil wrote;
In every line, in every word you ſpeak,
I read the Roman, and confeſs the Greek;
Forgetting thee, my ſoul with rapture ſwell'd,
Cries out, "How much the ancient bards excell'd!"
But when thy juſt tranſlations introduce
To nearer converſe any Latian muſe,
The ſeveral beauties you ſo well expreſs,
I loſe the Roman in the Britiſh dreſs!
Sweetly deceiv'd, the ancients I contemn,
And with miſtaken zeal to thee exclaim,
(By ſo much nature, ſo much art betray'd)
"What vaſt improvements have our moderns made!"
How vain and unſucceſsful ſeems the toil,
To raiſe ſuch precious fruits in foreign ſoil:
They mourn, tranſplanted to another coaſt,
Their beauties languid, and their flavour loſt!
But ſuch thy art, the ripening colours glow
As pure as thoſe their native ſuns beſtow;
Not an inſipid beauty only yield,
But breathe the odours of Auſonia's field.
Such is the genuine flavour, it belies
Their ſtranger ſoil, and unacquainted ſkies.
Vida no more the long oblivion fears,
Which hid his virtues from a length of years;
Ally'd to thee, he lives again; thy rhymes
Shall friendly hand him down to lateſt times;
Shall do his injur'd reputation right,
While in thy work with ſuch ſucceſs unite
His ſtrength of judgment, and his charms of ſpeech,
That precepts pleaſe, and muſic ſeems to teach.
Leſt unimprov'd I ſeem to read thee o'er,
Th' unhallow'd rapture I indulge no more;
By thee inſtructed, I the taſk forſake,
Nor for chaſte love the luſt of verſe miſtake;
Thy works that rais'd this frenzy in my ſoul,
Shall teach the giddy tumult to controul:
Warm'd as I am with every muſe's charms,
Since the coy virgins fly my eager arms,
* I'll quit the work, throw by my ſtrong deſire,
And from thy praiſe reluctantly retire.

G. Ridley.

DR. COBDEN TO MR. PITT.

On his having a Bay-Leaf ſent him from Virgil's Tomb.

Forgive me, Sir, if I approve
The judgment of your friend,
Who choſe this token of his love
From Virgil's tomb to ſend.
You, who the Mantuan poet dreſs
In pureſt Engliſh lays,
Who all his ſoul and flame expreſs,
May juſtly claim his bays.
Thoſe bays, which water'd by your hand,
From Vida's ſpring ſhall riſe,
And with freſh verdure crown'd, withſtand
The lightning of the ſkies.
Let hence your emulation fir'd
His matchleſs ſtrains purſue,
As from Achilles' tomb inſpir'd,
The youth a rival grew.

POEMS.

AN EPISTLE TO DR. EDWARD YOUNG,

AT EASTBURY IN DORSETSHIRE,

On the Review at Sarum, 1722.

While with your Dodington retir'd you ſit,
Charm'd with his flowing Burgundy and wit;
By turns relieving with the circling draught,
Each pauſe of chat, and interval of thought:
Or through the well-glaz'd tube, from buſineſs freed,
Draw the rich ſpirit of the Indian weed;
Or bid your eyes o'er Vanbrough's models roam,
And trace in miniature the future dome,
(While buſy fancy with imag'd power
Builds up the work of ages in an hour);
Or loſt in thought, contemplative you rove
Through opening viſtas, and the ſhady grove;
Where a new Eden in the wilds is found,
And all the ſeaſons in a ſpot of ground:
There, if you exerciſe your tragic rage,
To bring ſome hero on the Britiſh ſtage;
Whoſe cauſe the audience with applauſe will crown,
And make his triumphs or his tears their own:
Throw by the bold deſign; and paint no more
Imagin'd chiefs, and monarchs of an hour;
From fabled worthies, call thy muſe to ſing
Of real wonders, and Britannia's king. [train
Oh! hadſt thou ſeen him, when the gathering
Fill'd up proud Sarum's wide-extended plain!
Then, when he ſtoop'd from awful majeſty,
Put on the man, and laid the ſovereign by;
When the glad nations ſaw their king appear,
Begirt with armies, and the pride of war;
More pleas'd his people's longing eyes to bleſs,
He look'd, and breath'd benevolence and peace:
When in his hand Britannia's awful lord
Held forth the olive, while he graſp'd the ſword.
So Jove, though arm'd to blaſt the Titan's pride,
With all his burning thunders at his ſide,
Fram'd, while he terrify'd the diſtant foe,
His ſcheme of bleſſings for the world below.
This hadſt thou ſeen, thy willing muſe would raiſe
Her ſtrongeſt wing, to reach her ſovereign's praiſe.
To what bold heights our daring hopes may climb?
The theme ſo great! the poet ſo ſublime!
I ſaw him, Young, and to theſe raviſh'd eyes
Ev'n now his godlike figure ſeems to riſe:
Mild, yet majeſtic, was the monarch's mien,
Lovely, though great, and awful, though ſerene.
(More than a coin or picture can unfold;
Too faint the colours, and too baſe the gold!)
At the bleſt ſight, tranſported and amaz'd
One univerſal ſhout the thouſands rais'd,
And crowds on crowds grew loyal as they gaz'd.
His foes (if any) own'd the monarch's cauſe,
And chang'd their groundleſs clamours to applauſe:
Ev'n giddy faction hail'd the glorious day,
And wondering envy look'd her rage away.
As Ceres o'er the globe her chariot drew,
And harveſts ripen'd where the goddeſs flew;
So, where his gracious footſteps he inclin'd,
Peace flew before, and plenty march'd behind.
Where wild affliction rages, he appears
To wipe the widow's and the orphan's tears:
The ſons of miſery before him bow,
And for their merit only plead their woe.
So well he loves the public liberty,
His mercy ſets the private captive free.
Soon as our royal angel came in view,
The priſons burſt, the ſtarting hinges flew;
The dungeon's open'd, and reſign'd their prey,
To joy, to life, to freedom, and the day:
The chains drop off; the grateful captives rear
Their hands unmanacled in praiſe and prayer.
Had thus victorious Cæſar fought to pleaſe,
And rul'd the vanquiſh'd world with arts like theſe;
The generous Brutus had not ſcorn'd to bend,
But ſunk the rigid patriot in the friend;
Nor to that bold exceſs of virtue ran,
To ſtab the monarch, where he lov'd the man.
And Cato reconcil'd, had ne'er diſdain'd
To live a ſubject where a Brunſwick reign'd.
But I detain your nobler muſe too long
From the great theme that mocks my humble ſong,
A theme that aſks a Virgil or a Young.

ON THE APPROACHING

DELIVERY OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS,

IN THE YEAR 1721.—AN ODE.

Ye angels, come without delay;
Britannia's genius, come away.
Deſcend, ye ſpirits of the ſky;
Stand all ye winged guardians by;
Your golden pinions kindly ſpread,
And watch round Carolina's bed:
Here fix your reſidence on earth,
To haſten on the glorious birth;

Her fainting ſpirits to ſupply,
Catch all the zephyrs as they fly.
Oh! ſuccour nature in the ſtrife,
And gently hold her up in life;
Nor let her hence too ſoon remove,
To join your ſacred choirs above:
But live, Britannia to adorn
With kings and princes yet unborn.
Ye angels, come without delay;
Britannia's genius, come away.
Aſſuage her pains, and Albion's fears,
For Albion's life depends on her's.
Oh then! to ſave her from deſpair,
Lean down, and liſten to her prayer.
Crown all her tortures with delight,
And call th' auſpicious babe to light.
We hope from your propitious care,
All that is brave, or all that's fair.
A youth, to match his ſire in arms;
Or nymph, to match her mother's charms;
A youth, who over kings ſhall reign,
Or nymph, whom kings ſhall court in vain.
From far the royal ſlaves ſhall come,
And wait from him or her their doom;
To each their different ſuits ſhall move,
And pay their homage, or their love.
Ye angels, come without delay;
Britannia's genius, come away.
When the ſoft powers of ſleep ſubdue
Thoſe eyes, that ſhine as bright as you;
With ſcenes of bliſs, tranſporting themes!
Prompt and inſpire her golden dreams:
Let viſionary bleſſings riſe,
And ſwim before her cloſing eyes.
The ſenſe of torture to ſubdue,
Set Britain's happineſs to view;
That ſight her ſpirits will ſuſtain,
And give her pleaſure from her pain.
Ye angels, come without delay;
Britannia's genius, come away.
Come, and rejoice; th' important hour
Is paſt, and all our fears are o'er;
See! every trace of anguiſh flies,
While in her lap the infant lies,
Her pain by ſudden joy beguil'd,
She hangs in rapture o'er the child,
Her eyes o'er every feature run,
The father's beauties and her own.
There, pleas'd her image to ſurvey,
She melts in tenderneſs away;
Smiles o'er the babe, nor ſmiles in vain,
The babe returns th' auſpicious ſmile again.
Ye angels, come without delay;
Britannia's genius, come away.
Turn heaven's eternal volume o'er,
And look for this diſtinguiſh'd hour;
Conſult the page of Britain's ſtate,
Before you cloſe the books of fate:
Then tell us what you there have ſeen,
What æra's from this birth begin.
What years from this bleſt hour muſt run,
As bright and laſting as the ſun.
Far from the ken of mortal ſight,
Theſe ſecrets are involv'd in night:
The bleſſings which this birth purſue,
Are only known to heaven and you.

On the Marriage of the Prince of Orange, and the Princeſs Royal of England .

When Naſſau ey'd his native coaſts no more,
And firſt diſcern'd fair Albion's whitening ſhore;
In that bleſt moment, while the friendly gales
Wait on his courſe, and ſtretch the ſwelling ſails,
The deeps divide; and, as the waves uncloſe,
The genius of the Britiſh ocean roſe.
Looſe to the wind his ſea-green mantle flow'd,
And in his eyes unuſual pleaſure glow'd.
Awhile he paus'd, to mark on Naſſau's face
The well-known features of the godlike race;
Whoſe ſwords were ſacred to the generous cauſe
Of truth, religion, liberty, and laws:
Then ſpoke; the winds a ſtill attention keep,
And awful ſilence huſh'd the murmuring deep:
"Proceed, great prince, to our lov'd coaſt repair,
Where Anna ſhines the faireſt of the fair:
For thy diſtinguiſh'd bed the fates ordain
The royal maid, whom kings might court in vain;
The royal maid, in whom the graces join'd
Her mother's awful charms, and more than female mind.
The merits of thy race, the vaſt arrear
That Britain owes, ſhall all be paid in her;
In her be paid the debt for laws reſtor'd,
For England ſav'd by William's righteous ſword.
Immortal William!—At thy ſacred name
My heart beats quick, and owns its ancient flame.
Still muſt I call to mind the glorious day, [way,
When through theſe floods the hero plough'd his
To free Britannia from the tyrant's chain,
And bid the proſtrate nations riſe again.
Well-pleas'd I ſaw his fluttering ſtreamers fly,
And the full ſails that hid the diſtant ſky.
High on the gilded ſtern, majeſtic rode
The world's great patriot, like a guardian God.
This trident aw'd the tumults of the ſea,
And bade the winds the hero's nod obey:
Fond of the taſk, with this officious hand
I puſh'd the ſacred veſſel to the land;
The land of liberty, by Rome enſlav'd;
He came, he ſaw, he vanquiſh'd, and he ſav'd.
O may that hero, and thy Anna's fire
To nobleſt deeds thy generous boſom fire,
And with their bright tranſmiſſive virtues grace
The great deſcendants of thy princely race!
Still may they all their great example draw
From her Auguſtus, and thy own Naſſau!
May the fair line each happy realm adorn,
Bleſs future ſtates, and nations yet unborn!"

On the Marriage of Frederic Prince of Wales, and Princeſs Auguſta of Saxe-Gotha †.

When pious frauds and holy pride no more
Could hold that empire which ſo long they bore;

From fair Germania's ſtates the truth began
To gleam, and ſhed her heavenly light on man;
To Frederic † firſt, the Saxon prince, 'twas given,
To nurſe and cheriſh this beſt gift of heaven.
Its growth, whilſt young and tender, was his care,
To guard its bloſſoms from th' inclement air,
And dying, "May'ſt thou flouriſh!" was his prayer.
Again, when fair religion now had ſpread
Her influence round, and rais'd her captiv'd head;
When Charles and Rome their impious forces join'd
To quench its light, and re-enſlave mankind;
Another Frederic ‡ firſt appear'd in arms,
To guard th' endanger'd bleſſing from alarms.
Ye heavens! what virtues with what courage join'd!
But join'd in vain!—See, vanquiſh'd, and confin'd
In the deep gloom, the pious hero lies,
And lifts to heaven his ever-ſtreaming eyes.
There, ſpent with ſorrows, as he funk to reſt
(The public cauſe ſtill labouring in his breaſt),
Behold, in ſlumber, to his view diſplay'd,
Roſe the firſt Frederic's venerable ſhade!
His temples circled with a heavenly flame;
The ſame his flowing robe, his look the ſame.
"And art thou come? (the captive warrior cries)
What realms ſo long detained thee from our eyes?
After ſuch wars, ſuch deaths and honours paſt,
Is our great guardian chief return'd at laſt?
Say, from your heaven, ſo long deſir'd in vain,
Deſcends our hero to our aid again?
Now when proud Rome, her ſtandard wide unfurl'd,
Pours like a deluge o'er the trembling world;
Fierce, her diſputed empire to reſtore,
And ſcourge mankind for ten dark ages more?
Like me, religion wears the tyrant's chain;
Proſtrate like me, ſhe bleeds at every vein:
Oh! muſt we never, never riſe again?"
"Diſmiſs thy fears, (the reverend ſhade replies)
Be firm, be conſtant, and abſolve the ſkies.
Dark are the ways of heaven: let man attend:
Soon will the regular confuſion end.
Soon ſhall thy eyes a brighter ſcene ſurvey
(Lo, the fleet hours already wing their way!)
When, to thy native ſoil in peace reſtor'd,
Once more ſhall Gotha ſee her lawful Lord.
True to religion, each ſucceſſive ſon
Shall aid the cauſe their generous ſires begun.
Even now I look through fate. O glorious ſight!
I ſee thy offſpring as they riſe to light.

What benefits to man! what lights divine!
What heroes, and what ſaints adorn the line!
And oh! to crown the ſcene, my joyful eyes
Behold from far a princely virgin riſe!
This, this is ſhe, the ſmiling fates ordain
To bring the bright primeval times again!
The fair Auguſta!—Grac'd with blooming charms;
Reſerv'd to bleſs a Britiſh prince's arms.
Behold, behold the long-expected day!
Fly ſwift, ye hours, ye minutes, haſte away;
To wed the fair, O favour'd of the ſkies,
Riſe in thy time, thou deſtin'd hero, riſe!
For through this ſcene of opening fate, I ſee
A greater Frederic ſhall ariſe in thee!
Then let thy fears from this bleſt moment ceaſe,
Henceforth ſhall pure religion reign in peace.
Thy royal race ſhall Albion's ſceptre ſway,
And ſon to ſon th' imperial power convey:
All ſhall ſupport, like thee, the noble cauſe
Of truth, religion, liberty, and laws."
This ſaid, the venerable ſhade retir'd:
The wondering hero, at the viſion fir'd,
With generous rapture glows; forgets his pains,
Smiles at his woes, and triumphs in his chains.

THE FIRST HYMN OF CALLIMACHUS TO JUPITER.

While trembling we approach Jove's awful ſhrine,
With pure libations, and with rites divine;
What theme more proper can we chooſe to ſing,
Then Jove himſelf, the great, eternal king!
Whoſe word gives law to thoſe of heavenly birth;
Whoſe hand ſubdues the rebel ſons of earth.
Since doubts and dark diſputes thy titles move,
Hear'ſt thou, Dictæan and Lycæan Jove?
For here thy birth the tops of Ida claim,
And there Arcadia triumphs in thy name.
But Crete in vain would boaſt a grace ſo high,
Whoſe faithleſs ſons through mere complexion lie:
Immortal as thou art in endleſs bloom,
To prove their claim, they build the thunderer's tomb.
Be then Arcadian, for the towering height
Of ſteep Parrhaſia welcom'd thee to light;
When pregnant Rhæa, wandering through the wood,
Sought out her darkeſt ſhades, and bore the God;
The place thus hallow'd by the birth of Jove,
More than religious horror guards the grove:
The gloom all teeming females ſtill decline,
From the vile worm, to woman, form divine.
Soon as the mother had diſcharg'd her load,
She ſought a ſpring to bathe the recent god;
But ſought in vain: no living ſtream ſhe found,
Though ſince, the waters drench the realms around.
Clear Erymanthus had not learn'd to glide,
Nor mightier Ladon drove his ſwelling tide,
At thy great birth, where now Iäon flows,
Tall towering oaks, and pathleſs foreſts roſe.
The thirſty ſavages were heard to roar,
Where Cario ſoftly murmurs to the ſhore;
Where ſpreading Melas widely floats the coaſt,
The flying chariot rais'd a cloud of duſt,

With drowth o'er Cratis and Menope curſt,
The fainting ſwain, to aggravate his thirſt,
Heard from within the bubbling waters flow,
In cloſe reſtraint, and murmur from below.
Thou too, O earth, (enjoin'd the power divine)
Bring forth; thy pangs are leſs ſevere than mine,
And ſooner paſt; ſhe ſpoke, and as ſhe ſpoke
Rear'd high her ſcepter'd arm, and pierc'd the rock.
Wide to the blow the parting mountain rent,
The waters guſh'd tumultuous at the vent,
Impatient to be freed; amid the flood
She plung'd the recent babe, and bath'd the god.
She wrapp'd thee, mighty king, in purple bands,
Then gave the ſacred charge to Neda's hands,
The babe to nouriſh in the cloſe retreat,
And in the ſafe receſs, of diſtant Crete.
In years and wiſdom, of the nymphs who nurſt
The infant thunderer, Neda was the firſt;
Next Styx and Phyliré; the virgin ſhar'd
For her great truſt diſcharg'd a great reward:
For by her honour'd name the flood ſhe calls,
Which rolls into the ſea by Leprion's walls;
To drink her ſtreams the ſons of Arcas crowd,
And draw for ever from the ancient flood.
Thee, Jove, the careful nymph to Cnoſſus bore,
(To Cnoſſus ſeated on the Cretan ſhore)
With joyful arms the Corybantes heav'd,
And the proud nymphs the glorious charge receiv'd.
Above the reſt in grace Adraſte ſtood,
She rock'd the golden cradle of the god;
On his ambroſial lips the goat diſtill'd
Her milky ſtore, and fed th' immortal child:
With her the duteous bee preſents her ſpoils,
And for the god repeats her flowery toils.
The fierce Curetes too in arms advance,
And tread tumultuouſly their myſtic dance:
And, leſt thy cries ſhould reach old Saturn's ear,
Beat on their brazen ſhields the din of war.
Full ſoon, Almighty King, thy early prime
Advanc'd beyond the bounds of vulgar time.
Ere the ſoft down had cloth'd thy youthful face,
Swift was thy growth in wit and every grace.
Fraught was thy mind in life's beginning ſtage,
With all the wiſdom of experienc'd age:
Thy elder brothers hence their claims reſign,
And leave th' unbounded heavens by merit thine;
For ſure thoſe poets fable, who advance
The bold aſſertion, that capricious chance
By equal lots to Saturn's ſons had given
The triple reign of ocean, hell and heaven.
Above blind chance the vaſt diviſion lies,
And hell holds no proportion to the ſkies.
Things of a leſs, and equal value, turn
On the blind lot of an inverted urn.
Not chance, O Jove, attain'd heaven's high abodes,
But thy own power advanc'd thee o'er the gods,
Thy power that whirls thy rapid chariot on,
Thy power, the great aſſeſſor of thy throne.
Diſmiſt by thee, th' imperial eagle flies [ſkies:
Charg'd with thy ſigns and thunders through the
To me and mine glad omens may ſhe bring,
And to the left extend her golden wing.
Thou to inferior gods haſt well aſſign'd
The various ranks and orders of mankind;
Of theſe the wandering merchants claim the care;
Of thoſe the poets, and the ſons of war:
Kings claim from thee their titles and their reign
O'er all degrees, the ſoldier and the ſwain.
Vulcan preſides o'er all who bear the maſs,
Bend the tough ſteel, and ſhape the tortur'd braſs.
Diana thoſe adore who ſpread the toils;
To Mars the warrior dedicates his ſpoils.
The bard to Phœbus ſtrikes the living ſtrings,
Jove's royal province is the care of kings;
For kings ſubmiſſive hear thy high decree,
And hold their delegated powers from thee.
Thy name the judge and legiſlator awes,
When this enacts, and that directs the laws:
Cities and realms thy great protection prove;
Theſe bend to monarchs, as they bend to Jove.
Though to thy ſceptre'd ſons thy will extends,
The proper means proportion'd to their ends;
All are not favour'd in the ſame degree,
For power ſupreme belongs to Ptolemy;
What no inferior limitary king
Could in a length of years to ripeneſs bring,
Sudden his word performs; his boundleſs power
Completes the work of ages in an hour:
While others labour through a wretched reign,
Their ſchemes are blaſted, and their counſels vain.
Hail Saturn's mighty ſon, to whom we owe
Life, health, and every bleſſing here below!
Who ſhall in worthy ſtrains thy name adorn?
What living bard? what poet yet unborn?
Hail and all hail again; in equal ſhares
Give wealth and virtue, and indulge our prayers.
Hear us, great king, unleſs they meet combin'd,
Each is but half a bleſſing to mankind.
Then grant us both, that blended they may prove
A doubled happineſs, and worthy Jove.

THE SECOND HYMN OF CALLIMACHUS TO APOLLO.

Ha! how Apollo's hallow'd laurels wave?
How ſhakes the temple from its inmoſt cave?
Fly, ye profane; for lo! in heavenly ſtate
The power deſcends, and thunders at the gate.
See, how the Delian palms with reverence nod!
Hark! how the tuneful ſwans confeſs the god!
Leap from your hinges, burſt your brazen bars,
Ye ſacred doors; the god, the god appears.
Ye youth, begin the ſong; in choirs advance;
Wake all your lyres, and form the meaſur'd dance.
No impious wretch his holy eyes have view'd,
None but the juſt, the innocent, and good.
To ſee the power confeſt your minds prepare,
Refin'd from guilt, and purify'd by prayer.
So may you mount in youth the nuptial bed,
So grace with ſilver hairs your aged head;
So the proud walls with lofty turrets crown,
And lay foundations for the riſing town.
Apollo's ſong with awful ſilence hear;
Ev'n the wild ſeas the ſacred ſong revere:
Nor wretched Thetis dares to make her moan,
For great Apollo ſlew her darling ſon.
When the loud iö-Pæans ring around,
She checks her ſighs, and trembles at the ſound.

Fix'd in her grief muſt Niobe appear,
Nor through the Phrygian marble drop a tear;
Still, though a rock, ſhe dreads Apollo's bow,
And ſtands her own ſad monument of woe.
Sound the loud lö's, and the temple rend,
With the bleſt gods 'tis impious to contend.
In his audacious rage would brave the ſkies
He, who the power of Ptolemy deſies,
(From whence the mighty bleſſing was beſtow'd),
Or challenge Phœbus, and reſiſt the god.
Beyond the night your hallow'd ſtrains prolong,
Till the day riſes on the unfiniſh'd ſong.
Nor leſs his various attributes require,
So ſhall he honour, and reward the choir;
For honour is his gift, and high above
He ſhines, and graces the right hand of Jove:
With beamy gold his robes divinely glow,
His harp, his quiver, and his Lictian bow;
His feet how fair and glorious to behold!
Shod in rich ſandals of refulgent gold!
Wealth ſtill attends him, and vaſt gifts beſtow'd.
Adorn the Delphic temple of the god.
Eternal charms his youthful cheeks diffuſe;
His treſſes dropping with ambroſial dews,
Pale death before him flies, with dire diſeaſe,
And health and life are wafted in the breeze.
To thee, great Phœbus, various arts belong,
To wing the dart, and guide the poet's ſong:
Th' enlighten'd prophet feels thy flames divine,
And all the dark events of lots are thine.
By Phœbus taught, the ſage prolongs our breath,
And in its flight ſuſpends the dart of death.
To thy great name, O Nomian power, we cry,
Ere ſince the time when, ſtooping from the ſky,
To tend Admetus' herds thy godhead choſe,
On the fair banks where clear Amphryſus flows:
Bleſt are the herds, and bleſt the flocks, that lie
Beneath the influence of Apollo's eye.
The meads re-echo'd to the bleating lambs,
And the kids leap'd, and friſk'd around their dams;
Her weight of milk each ewe dragg'd on with pain,
And dropp'd a double offſpring on the plain.
On great Apollo for his aid we call,
To build th' town and raiſe th' embattled wall:
He, while an infant, fram'd the wondrous plan,
In fair Ortygia, for the uſe of man.
When young Diana urg'd her ſylvan toils,
From Cynthus' tops ſhe brought her ſavage ſpoils;
The heads of mountain-goats, and antlers lay
Spread wide around, the trophies of the day:
Of theſe a ſtructure he compos'd with art,
In order rang'd, and juſt in every part;
And by that model taught us to diſpoſe
The riſing city, and with walls encloſe;
Where the foundations of the pile ſhould lie,
Or towers and battlements ſhould reach the ſky.
Apollo ſent th' auſpicious crow before,
When our great founder touch'd the Lybian ſhore:
Full on the right he flew to call him on,
And guide the people to their deſtin'd town;
Which to a race of kings Apollo vow'd,
And fix'd for ever ſtands the promiſe of the god.
Or hear'ſt thou, while thy honours we proclaim,
Thy Boëdromian, or thy Clarian name?

(For to the power are various names aſſign'd
From cities rais'd, and bleſſings to mankind.)
In thy Carnean title I rejoice,
And join my grateful country's public voice.
Ere to Cyrene's realms our courſe we bore,
Thrice were we led by thee from ſhore to ſhore;
Till our progenitor the region gain'd,
And annual rites and annual feaſts ordain'd.
When at thy prophet Carnus' will, we rais'd
A glorious temple; and the altars blaz'd
With hecatombs of bulls, whoſe reeking blood,
Great king, they ſhed to thee their guardian god.
lö! Carnean Phœbus! awful power!
Whom fair Cyrene's ſuppliant ſons adore!
To deck thy hallow'd temple, ſee! we bring
The choiceſt flowers, and riſe all the ſpring:
The moſt diſtinguiſh'd odours nature yields,
When balmy zephyr breathes along the fields;
Soon as the ſad inverted year retreats,
To thee the crocus dedicates his ſweets.
From thy bright altars hallow'd flames aſpire;
They ſhine inceſſant from the ſacred fire.
What joy, what tranſport, ſwells Apollo's breaſt,
When at his great Carnean annual feaſt,
Clad in their arms our Libyan tribes advance,
Mix'd with our ſwarthy dames, and lead the dance.
Nor yet the Greeks had reach'd Cyrene's floods;
But rov'd through wild Azilis' gloomy woods;
Whom to his nymph Apollo deign'd to ſhow,
High as he ſtood on tall Myrtuſa's brow;
Where the fierce lion by her hands was ſlain,
Who in his fatal rage laid waſte the plain.
Still to Cyrene are his gifts convey'd,
In dear remembrance of the raviſh'd maid;
Nor were her ſons ungrateful, who beſtow'd
Their choiceſt honours on their guardian god.
lö! with holy raptures ſing around;
We owe to Delphos the triumphant ſound.
When thy victorious hands vouchſaf'd to ſhow
The wonders of thy ſhafts and golden bow;
When Python from his den was ſeen to riſe,
Dire, fierce, tremendous of enormous ſize;
By thee with many a fatal arrow ſlain,
The monſter ſunk extended on the plain;
Shaft after ſhaft in ſwift ſucceſſion flew;
As ſwift the people's ſhouts and prayers purſue.
lö, Apollo, launch thy flying dart;
Send it, oh! ſend it to the monſter's heart.
When thy fair mother bore thee, ſhe deſign'd
Her mighty ſon, a bleſſing to mankind.
Envy, that other plague and fiend, drew near,
And gently whiſper'd in Apollo's ear:
No poet I regard but him whoſe lays
Are ſwelling, loud, and boundleſs as the ſeas;
Apollo ſpurn'd the fury, and reply'd,
The vaſt Euphrates rolls a mighty tide;
With rumbling torrents the rough river roars;
But black with mud, diſcolour'd from his ſhores,
Prone down Aſſyria's lands his courſe he keeps,
And with polluted waters ſtains the deeps.
But the Meliſſan nymphs to Ceres bring
The pureſt product of the limpid ſpring;
Small is the ſacred ſtream, but never ſtain'd
With mud, or foul ablutions from the land.

Hail, glorious king! beneath thy matchleſs power
May malice ſink, and envy be no more!

TO SIR JAMES THORNHILL,

On his Excellent Painting, the Rape of Helen, at the Seat of General Erle in Dorſetſhire.

Written in the Year 1718.

Could I with thee, O Thornhill, bear a part,
And join the poet's with the painter's art,
(Though both ſhare mutually each common name,
Their thoughts, their genius and deſign the ſame!)
The muſe, with features neither weak nor faint,
Should draw her ſiſter-art in ſpeaking paint.
But while admiring thine and nature's ſtrife,
I ſee each touch juſt ſtarting into life,
From ſide to ſide with various raptures toſt,
Amid the viſionary ſcenes I'm loſt.
Methinks as thrown upon ſome fairy land,
Amaz'd we know not how, nor where we ſtand;
While tripping phantoms to the ſight advance,
And gay ideas lead the mazy dance:
While wondering we behold in every part
The beauteous ſcenes of thy creating art.
By ſuch degrees thy colours riſe and fall,
And breathing flueh the animated wall;
That the bright objects which our eyes ſurvey,
Raviſh the mind, and ſteal the ſoul away;
Our footſteps by ſome ſecret power are croſt,
And in the painter all the bard is loſt.
Thus in a magic ring we ſtand confin'd
While ſubtle ſpells the fatal circle bind;
In vain we ſtrive and labour to depart,
Fix'd by the charms of that myſterious art;
In vain the paths and avenues we trace,
While ſpirits guard and fortify the place.
How could my ſtretch'd imagination ſwell,
And on each regular proportion dwell!
While thy ſwift art unravels nature's maze,
And imitates her works, and treads her ways,
Nature with wonder ſees herſelf out-done,
And claims the fair creation for her own;
Thy figures in ſuch lively ſtrokes excel,
They give thoſe paſſions which they ſeem to feel.
Each various feature ſome ſtrong impulſe bears,
Wraps us in joy, or melts us all to tears.
Each piece with ſuch tranſcendent art is wrought,
That we could almoſt ſay thy pictures thought;
When we behold thee conquer in the ſtrife,
And ſtrike the kindling figures into life,
Which does from thy creating pencil paſs,
Warm the dull matter, and inſpire the maſs;
As fam'd Prometheus' wand convey'd the ray
Of heavenly fire to animate his clay.
How the juſt ſtrokes in harmony unite!
How ſhades and darkneſs recommend the light!
No lineaments unequally ſurpriſe;
The beauties regularly fall and riſe.
Loſt in each other we in vain purſue
The fleeting lines that cheat our wearied view.
Nor know we how their ſubtle courſes run,
Nor where this ended, nor where that begun.
Nor where the ſhades their utmoſt bounds diſplay,
Or the light fades inſenſibly away;
But all harmoniouſly confus'd we ſee,
While all the ſweet varieties agree.
Thus when the organ's ſolemn airs aſpire,
The blended muſic wings our thoughts with fire;
Here warbling notes in whiſpering breezes ſigh,
But in their birth the tender accents die;
While thence the bolder notes exulting come,
Swell as they fly, and bound along the dome.
With tranſport fir'd, each loſt in each we hear,
And all the ſoul is center'd in the ear.
See firſt the ſenate of the gods above,
Frequent and full amid the courts of Jove:
Behold the radiant conſiſtory ſhine,
With features, airs, and lineaments divine.
Hermes diſpatch'd from the bright council flies,
And cleaves with all his wings the liquid ſkies.
In many a whirl and rapid circle driven,
So ſwift, he ſeems at once in earth and heaven.
Oh! with what energy! what noble force
Of ſtrongeſt colours you deſcribe his courſe?
Till the ſwift god the Phrygian ſhepherd found,
Compos'd for ſleep, and ſtretch'd along the ground.
He brings the blooming gold, the fatal prize,
The bright reward of Cytherea's eyes.
The conſcious earth the awful ſignal takes,
Without a wind the quivering foreſt ſhakes;
Tall Ida bows; th' unwieldy mountains nod;
And all confeſs the preſence of the god.
Like ſhooting meteors, gliding from above,
See the proud conſort of the thundering Jove,
War's glorious goddeſs, and the queen of love;
Arm'd in their naked charms, the Phrygian boy
Regards thoſe charms with mingled fear and joy.
Here Juno ſtands with an imperial mien,
At once confeſt a goddeſs and a queen.
Her cheeks a ſcornful indignation warms,
Blots out her ſmiles, as conſcious of her charms.
But Venus ſhines in milder beauties there,
And every grace adorns the blooming fair.
While, conſcious of her charms, ſhe ſeems to riſe,
Claims, and already graſps in hope the prize;
Beauteous, as when immortal Phidias ſtrove
From Parian rocks to carve the queen of love:
Each grace obey'd the ſummons of his art,
And a new beauty ſprung from every part.
In all the terrors of her beauty bright,
Fair Pallas awes and charms the Trojan's ſight,
And gives ſucceſſive reverence and delight.
Nor thrones, nor victories, his ſoul can move;
Crowns, arms, and triumphs, what are you to love?
Too ſoon reſign'd to Venus, they behold
The glittering ball of vegetable gold.
While Jove's proud conſort thrown from her deſires,
Inflam'd with rage maliciouſly retires;
Already kindles her immortal hate,
Already labours with the Trojan fate.
While a new tranſport flueh'd the blooming boy,
Helen he ſeems already to enjoy,
And feeds the flame that muſt conſume his Troy.
Another ſcene our wondering ſight recalls;
The fair adultereſs leaves her native walls: [joy;
Her cheeks are ſtain'd with mingled ſhame and
Lull'd on the boſom of the Phrygian boy.

To the loud deeps he bears his charming ſpouſe,
Freed from her lord, and from her former vows.
On their ſoft wings the whiſpering zephyrs play,
The breezes ſkim along the dimpled ſea:
The wanton loves direct the gentle gales,
Sport in the ſhrowds, and flutter in the ſails.
While her twin-brothers * with a gracious ray
Point out her courſe along the watery way.
Th' exalted ſtrokes ſo delicately ſhine,
All ſo conſpire to puſh the bold deſign;
That in each ſprightly feature we may find
The great ideas of the maſter's mind,
As the ſtrong colours faithfully unite,
Mellow to ſhade, and ripen into light.
Let others form with care the ruddy maſs,
And torture into life the running braſs,
With potent art the breathing ſtatue mould,
Shape and inſpire the animated gold;
Let others ſenſe to Parian marbles give,
Bid the rocks leap to form, and learn to live;
Still be it thine, O Thornhill, to unite
The pleaſing diſcord of the ſhade and light;
To vanquiſh nature in the generous ſtrife,
And touch the glowing features into life.
But, Thornhill, would thy noble ſoul impart
One laſting inſtance of thy godlike art
To future times; and in thy fame engage
The praiſe of this and every diſtant age;
To ſtretch that art as far as it can go,
Draw the triumphant chief, and vanquiſh'd foe:
In his own dome, amidſt the ſpacious walls,
Draw the deep ſquadrons of the routed Gauls;
Their raviſh'd banners; and their arms reſign'd,
While the brave hero thunders from behind;
Pours on their front, or hangs upon their rear;
Fights, leads, commands, and animates the war.
Let his ſtrong courſer champ his golden chain,
And proudly paw th' imaginary plain.
To Aghrim's bloody wreaths let Creſſi yield,
With the fair laurels of Ramilia's field.
Next, on the ſea the daring hero ſhow;
To cheer his friends, and terrify the foe.
Lo! the great chief to famiſh'd thouſands bears,
The food of armies, and ſupport of wars.
The Britons ruſh'd with native virtue fir'd,
And quell'd the foe, or glorioufly expir'd;
Plunging through flames and floods, their valour broke
O'er the rang'd cannon, and a night of ſmoke,
Through the wedg'd legions urg'd their noble toil,
To ſpend their thunder on the towers of Liſle;
While by his deeds their courage he inſpires,
And wakes in every breaſt the ſleeping fires.
Thus the whole ſeries of his labours join,
Stretch'd from the Belgic ocean to the Boyne.
Then glorious in retreat the chief may read
Th' immortal actions of the noble dead;
And in recording colours, with delight,
Review his conqueſts, and enjoy the ſight;
See his own deeds on each ennobled plain;
While fancy acts his triumphs o'er again.
Thus on the Tyrian walls Æneas read,
How ſtern Achilles rag'd, and Hector bled;
But half unſheath'd his ſword, and grip'd his ſhield,
When he amidſt the ſcene himſelf beheld,
Thundering on Simois' banks, or battling in the field.

* Caſtor and Pollux.

PART OF THE SECOND BOOK OF STATIUS.

Now Jove's command fulfill'd, the ſon of May
Quits the black ſhades, and ſlowly mounts to day,
For lazy clouds in gloomy barriers riſe,
Obſtruct the god, and intercept the ſkies;
No zephyrs here their airy pinions move,
To ſpeed his progreſs to the realms above.
Scarce can he ſteer his dark laborious flight,
Loſt and encumber'd in the damps of night:
There roaring tides of fire his courſe withſtood,
Here Styx in nine wide circles roll'd his flood.
Behind old Laius trod th' infernal ground,
Trembling with age, and tardy from his wound;
(For all his force his furious ſon apply'd,
And plung'd the guilty faulchion in his ſide.)
Propt and ſupported by the healing rod,
The ſhade purſued the footſteps of the god.
The groves that never bloom; the Stygian coaſts,
The houſe of woe; the manſions of the ghoſts.
Earth too admires to ſee the ground give way,
And gild hell's horrors with the gleams of day.
But not with life repining envy fled,
She ſtill reigns there, and lives among the dead.
One from this crowd exclaim'd (whoſe lawleſs will
Inur'd to crimes, and exercis'd in ill,
Taught his prepoſterous joys from pains to flow,
And never triumph'd, but in ſcenes of woe)
Go to thy province in the realms above,
Call'd by the furies or the will of Jove:
Or drawn by magic force or myſtic ſpell,
Riſe, and purge off the footy gloom of hell.
Go, ſee the ſun, and whiten in his beams,
Or haunt the flowery fields and limpid ſtreams,
With woes redoubled to return again,
When thy paſt pleaſures ſhall enhance thy pain.
Now by the Stygian dog they bent their way;
Stretch'd in his den the dreadful monſter lay;
But lay not long, for, ſtartling at the ſound,
Head above head he riſes from the ground.
From their cloſe folds his ſtarting ſerpents break,
And curl in horrid circles round his neck.
This ſaw the god, and, ſtretching forth his hand,
Lull'd the grim monſter with his potent wand;
Through his vaſt bulk the gliding ſlumbers creep,
And ſeal down all his glaring eyes in ſleep.
There lies a place in Greece well known to fame,
Through all her realms, and Tænarus the name,
Where from the ſea the tops of Malea riſe,
Beyond the ken of mortals, to the ſkies:
Proud in his height he calmly hears below
The diſtant winds in hollow murmurs blow.
Here ſleep the ſtorms when weary'd and oppreſt,
And on his head the drowſy planets reſt:
There in blue miſts his rocky ſides he ſhrouds,
And here the towering mountain props the clouds;
Above his awful brow no bird can fly,
And far beneath the muttering thunders die.

When down the ſteep of heaven the day deſcends,
The ſun ſo wide his floating bound extends,
That o'er the deeps the mountain hangs diſplay'd,
And covers half the ocean with his ſhade:
Where the Tænarian ſhores oppoſe the ſea
The land retreats, and winds into a bay.
Here for repoſe imperial Neptune leads,
Tir'd from th' Ægian floods, his ſmoking ſteeds;
With their broad hoofs they ſcoop the beach away,
Their finny train rolls back, and floats along the ſea,
Here fame reports th' unbody'd ſhades to go
Through this wide paſſage to the realms below.
From hence the peaſants (as th' Arcadians tell)
Hear all the cries, and groans, and din of hell.
Oft, as her ſcourge of ſnakes the fury plies,
The piercing echoes mount the diſtant ſkies;
Scar'd at the porter's triple roar, the ſwains
Have fled aſtoniſh'd, and forſook the plains.
From hence emergent in a mantling cloud
Sprung to his native ſkies the winged god.
Swift from his face before th' ethereal ray,
Flew all the black Tartarian ſtains away,
And the dark Stygian gloom refin'd to day.
O'er towns and realms he held his progreſs on,
Now wing'd the ſkies where bright Arcturus ſhone,
And now the ſilent empire of the moon.
The power of ſleep, who met his radiant flight,
And drove the ſolemn chariot of the night,
Roſe with reſpect, and from th' empyreal road
Turn'd his pale ſteeds, in reverence to the god.
The ſhade beneath purſues his courſe, and ſpies
The well-known planets, and congenial ſkies.
His eyes from far, tall Cyrrha's heights explore,
And Phocian fields polluted with his gore.
At length to Thebes he came, and with a groan
Survey'd the guilty palace once his own;
With awful ſilence ſtalk'd before the gate,
But when he ſaw the trophies of his fate,
High on a column rais'd againſt the door,
And his rich chariot ſtill deform'd with gore,
He ſtarts with horror back; ev'n Jove's command
Could ſcarce controul him, nor the vital wand.
'Twas now the ſolemn day; when Jove, array'd
In all his thunders, graſp'd the Theban maid:
Then took from blaſted Semele her load,
And in himſelf conceiv'd the future god.
For this the Thebans revel'd in delight,
And gave to play and luxury the night;
A national debauch! conſus'd they lie
Stretch'd o'er the fields, their canopy the ſky.
The ſprightly trumpets ſound, the timbrels play,
And wake with ſacred harmony the day.
The matron's breaſt the gracious power inſpires
With milder raptures, and with ſoſter fires.
So the Biſtonian race, a madding train,
Exult and revel on the Thracian plain;
With milk their bloody banquets they allay,
Or from the lion rend his panting prey:
On ſome abandon'd ſavage fiercely fly,
Seize, tear, devour, and think it luxury.
But if the riſing fumes of wine conſpire
To warm their rage, and fan the brutal fire,
Then ſcenes of horror are their dear delight,
They whirl the goblets, and provoke the fight:
Then on the ſlain the revel is renew'd
And all the horrid banquet floats in blood.
And now the winged Hermes from on high
Shot in deep ſilence from the duſky ſky;
Then hover'd o'er the Theban tyrant's head,
As ſtretch'd at eaſe he preſt his gorgeous bed:
Where labour'd tapeſtry from ſide to ſide,
Glow'd with rich figures, and Aſſyrian pride.
Oh! the precarious terms of human ſtate!
How blind is man! how thoughtleſs of his fate!
See! through his limbs the dews of ſlumber creep,
Sunk as he lies, in luxury and ſleep.
The reverend ſhade commiſſion'd from above,
Haſtes to fulfil the high beheſts of Jove:
Like blind Tireſias to the bed he came,
In form, in habit, and in voice the ſame.
Pale, as before, the phantom ſtill appear'd,
Down his wan boſom flow'd a length of beard;
His head an imitated fillet wore,
His hand a wreath of peaceful olive bore:
With this he touch'd the ſleeping monarch's breaſt,
And in his own, the voice of fate expreſt.
Then canſt thou ſleep, to thoughtleſs reſt reſign'd?
And drive thy brother's image from thy mind?
Yon gathering ſtorm demands thy timely care,
See! how it rolls this way the tide of war.
When o'er the ſeas the ſweeping whirlwinds fly,
And roar from every quarter of the ſky;
The pilot, in deſpair the ſhip to ſave,
Gives up the helm, a ſport to every wave:
Such is thy error, and thy fate the ſame
(For know, I ſpeak the common voice of fame),
Proud in his new alliances, from far
Againſt thy realm he meditates the war;
Big with ambitious hopes to reign alone,
And ſwell unrival'd on the Theban throne.
New ſigns and fatal prodigies inſpire
His mad ambition, with his boaſted ſire;
And Argos' ample realms in dower beſtow'd,
And Tydeus reeking from his brother's blood,
League and conſpire to raiſe him to the throne,
And make his tedious baniſhment thy own.
For this, with pity touch'd, almighty Jove,
The ſire of gods, diſpatch'd me from above.
Be ſtill a monarch; let him ſwell in vain
With a gay proſpect of a fancy'd reign:
Still let him hope by fraud, or by the ſword,
To humble Thebes beneath a foreign lord.
Thus the majeſtic ghoſt; but e'er he fled,
He pluck'd the wreaths and fillets from his head.
For now the ſickening ſtars were chas'd away,
And heaven's immortal courſers breath'd the day.
Awful to ſight confeſt the grandſire ſtood.
Bared his wide wound, and all his boſom ſhow'd,
Then daſh'd the ſleeping monarch with his blood.
With a diſtracted air, and ſudden ſpring,
Starts from his broken ſleep the trembling king.
Shakes off amaz'd th' imaginary gore,
While fancy paints the ſcene he ſaw before:
Deep in his ſoul his grandſire's image wrought,
And all his brother roſe in every thought.

So while the toils are ſpread, and from behind
The hunter's ſhouts come thickening in the wind;
The tiger ſtarts from ſleep the war to wage,
Collects his powers, and rouſes all his rage:
Sternly he grinds his fangs, he weighs his might,
And whets his dreadful talents for the fight;
Then to his young he bears his foe away,
His foe at once the chaſer and the prey,
Thus on his brother he in every thought,
Waged future wars, and battles yet unfought.

ON THE DEATH OF A YOUNG GENTLEMAN.

With joy, bleſt youth, we ſaw thee reach the goal;
Fair was thy frame, and beautiful thy ſoul;
The graces and the muſes came combin'd,
Theſe to adorn the body, thoſe the mind;
'Twas there we ſaw the ſofteſt manners meet,
Truth, ſweetneſs, judgment, innocence, and wit.
So form'd, he flew his race; 'twas quickly won,
'Twas but a ſtep, and finiſh'd when begun.
Nature herſelf ſurpris'd would add no more,
His life complete in all its parts before;
But his few years with pleaſing wonder told,
By virtues, not by days; and thought him old.
So far beyond his age thoſe virtues ran,
That in a boy ſhe found him more than man.
For years let wretches importune the ſkies,
Till, at the long expence of anguiſh wiſe,
They live, to count their days by miſeries.
Thoſe win the prize, who ſooneſt run the race,
And life burns brighteſt in the ſhorteſt ſpace.
So to the convex glaſs embody'd run,
Drawn to a point the glories of the ſun;
At once the gathering beams intenſely glow,
And through the ſtreighten'd circle fiercely flow:
In one ſtrong flame conſpire the blended rays,
Run to a fire, and crowd into a blaze.

CHRIST'S PASSION,

From a Greek Ode of Mr. Martin's, formerly of New College.

AN ODE.

No more of earthly ſubjects ſing,
To heaven, my muſe, aſpire;
To raiſe the ſong, charge every ſtring,
And ſtrike the living lyre.
Begin; in lofty numbers ſhow
Th' Eternal King's unfathom'd love,
Who reigns the ſov'reign God above,
And ſuffers on the croſs below.
Prodigious pile of wonders! rais'd too high
For the dim ken of frail mortality.
What numbers ſhall I bring along!
From whence ſhall I begin the ſong?
The mighty myſtery I'll ſing inſpir'd
Beyond the reach of human wiſdom wrought,
Beyond the compaſs of an angel's thought,
How by the rage of man his God expir'd.
I'll make the trackleſs depths of mercy known,
How to redeem his foe God render'd up his Son;
I'll raiſe my voice to tell mankind
The victor's conqueſt o'er his doom,
How in the grave he lay confin'd,
To ſeal more ſure the ravenous tomb.
Three days th' infernal empire to ſubdue,
He paſs'd triumphant through the coaſts of woe;
With his own dart the tyrant death he ſlew,
And led hell captive through her realms below.

A mingled ſound from Calvary I hear,
And the loud tumults thicken on my ear,
The ſhouts of murderers that inſult the ſlain,
The voice of torment and the ſhrieks of pain.
I caſt my eyes with horror up
To the curſt mountain's guilty top;
See there! whom hanging in the midſt I view!
Ah! how unlike the other two!
I ſee him high above his foes,
And gently bending to the wood
His head in pity down to thoſe,
Whoſe guilt conſpires to ſhed his blood.
His wide-extended arms I ſee,
Transfix'd with nails, and faſten'd to the tree.

Man! ſenſeleſs man! canſt thou look on?
Nor make thy Saviour's pains thy own.
The rage of all thy pain exert,
Rend thy garments and thy heart:
Beat thy breaſt, and grovel low,
Beneath the burden of thy woe;
Bleed through thy bowels, tear thy hairs,
Breathe gales of ſighs, and weep a flood of tears.

Behold thy King with purple cover'd round,
Not in the Tyrian tincture dy'd,
Nor dipt in poiſon of Sidonian pride,
But in his own rich blood that ſtreams from every wound.
Doſt thou not ſee the thorny circle red?
The guilty wreathe that bluſhes round his head?
And with what rage the bloody ſcourge apply'd,
Curls round his limbs, and ploughs into his ſide?

At ſuch a ſight let all thy anguiſh riſe,
Break up, break up the fountains of thy eyes.
Here bid thy tears in guſhing torrents flow,
Indulge thy grief, and give a looſe to woe.
Weep from thy ſoul, till earth be drown'd,
Weep, till thy ſorrows drench the ground.
Canſt thou, ungrateful man! his torment ſee,
Nor drop a tear for him, who pours his blood for thee?

ON THE KING'S RETURN,

IN THE YEAR 1720.

Return, auſpicious prince, again,
Nor let Britannia mourn in vain;
Too long, too long, has ſhe deplor'd
Her abſent father and her lord.

To bend her gracious monarch's mind,
She ſends her ſighs in every wind:
Can Britain's prayer be thrown aſide?
And that the firſt he e'er deny'd!

Yet, mighty prince, vouchſafe to ſmile,
Return and bleſs our longing iſle;

Though fond Germania begs thy ſtay,
And courts thee from our eyes away.

Though Belgia would our king detain,
We know ſhe begs and pleads in vain;
We know our gracious king prefers
Britannia's happineſs to her's.

And lo! to ſave us from deſpair,
At length he liſtens to our prayer.
Dejected Albion's vows he hears,
And haſtes to dry her falling tears.

He hears his anxious people pray,
And loudly call their king away,
Once more their longing eyes to bleſs,
And guard their freedom and their peace.

They know, while Brunſwick fills the throne,
The ſeaſons glide with pleaſure on;
The Britiſh ſuns improve their rays,
Adorn, and beautify the days.

But ſee the royal veſſel flies,
Leſſening to Belgia's weeping eyes:
She proudly ſails for Albion's ſhores,
Guard her, ye gods, with all your powers.

O ſea, bid every wave ſubſide,
And teach allegiance to thy tide;
Thy billows in ſubjection keep,
And own the the monarch of deep.

Old Thames can ſcarce his joy ſuſtain,
But runs down headlong to the main,
His mighty maſter to deſcry,
And leaves his ſpacious channel dry.

Auguſta's ſons from either hand
Pour forth, and darken all the ſtrand;
Their eyes purſue the royal barge,
Which now reſigns her ſacred charge,

Th' unruly tranſport ſhakes the ſhore,
And drowns the feeble cannon's roar;
The nations in the ſight rejoice,
And ſend their ſouls in every voice.

But now amidſt the loud applauſe,
With ſhame the conſcious muſe withdraws,
Nor can her voice be heard amidſt the throng,
The theme ſo lofty, and ſo low the ſong.

ON THE MASQUERADES.

" Si Natura negant, facit indignatio verſum."

Well—we have reach'd the precipice at laſt;
The preſent age of vice obſcures the paſt.
Our dull foreſathers were content to ſtay,
Nor ſinn'd, till nature pointed out the way:
No arts they practis'd to foreſtal delight,
But ſtopp'd to wait the calls of appetite.
Their top-debauches were at beſt preciſe,
An unimprov'd ſimplicity of vice.
But this bleſt age has found a fairer road,
And left the paths their anceſtors had trod.
Nay, we could wear (our taſte ſo very nice is)
Their old caſt-faſhions fooner than their vices.
Whoring till now a common trade has been,
But maſquerades refine upon the ſin:
An higher taſte to wickedneſs impart,
And ſecond nature with the helps of art.
New ways and means to pleaſures we deviſe,
Since pleaſure looks the lovelier in diſguiſe.
The ſtealth and frolic give a ſmarter guſt,
Add wit to vice, and eloquence to luſt.
In vain the modiſh evil to redreſs,
At once conſpire the pulpit and the preſs:
Our prieſts and poets preach and write in vain;
All ſatyr's loſt both ſacred and profane.
So many various changes to impart,
Would tire an Ovid or a Proteus' art;
Where loſt in one promiſcuous whim we ſee,
Sex, age, condition, quality, degree.
Where the facetious crowd themſelves lay down,
And take up every perſon but their own.
Fools, dukes, rakes, cardinals, ſops, Indian queens,
Belles in tie-wigs, and lords in harlequins;
Troops of right honourable porters come,
And garter'd ſmall-coal-merchants crowd the room:
Valets adorn'd with coronets appear,
Lacqueys of ſtate, and footmen with a ſtar:
Sailors of quality with judges mix,
And chimney-ſweepers drive their coach and ſix.
Stateſmen ſo us'd at court the maſk to wear,
With leſs diſguiſe aſſume the vizor here.
Officious Heydegger deceives our eyes,
For his own perſon is his beſt diſguiſe:
And half the reigning toaſts of equal grace,
Truſt to the natural vizor of the face.
Ideots turn conjurers; and courtiers clowns;
And ſultans drop their handkerchiefs to nuns.
Starch'd quakers glare in furbelows and ſilk;
Beaux deal in ſprats, and ducheſſes cry milk.
But guard thy fancy, muſe, nor ſtain thy pen
With the lewd joys of this fantaſtic ſcene;
Where ſexes blend in one confus'd intrigue,
Where the girls raviſh, and the men grow big:
Nor credit what the idle world has ſaid,
Of lawyers forc'd, and judges brought to bed:
Or that to belles their brothers breathe their vows,
Or huſbands through miſtake gallant a ſpouſe.
Such dire diſaſters, and a numerous throng
Of like enormities, require the ſong:
But the chaſte muſe, with bluſhes cover'd o'er,
Retires confus'd, and will reveal no more.

ON A SHADOW.

AN ODE.

How are deluded humankind
By empty ſhows betray'd?
In all their hopes and ſchemes they find
A nothing or a ſhade.

The proſpects of a truncheon caſt
A ſoldier on the wars;
Diſmiſs'd with ſhatter'd limbs at laſt,
Brats, poverty, and ſcars.

The fond philoſopher for gain
Will leave unturn'd no ſtone;
But though they toil with endleſs pain,
They never find their own.

By the ſame rock the chemiſts drown,
And find no friendly hold,
But melt their ready ſpecie down,
In hopes of fancy'd gold.

What is the mad projector's care?
In hopes elate and ſwelling,
He builds his caſtles in the air,
Yet wants an houſe to dwell in.

At court the poor dependants fail,
And damn their fruitleſs toil,
When complimented thence to jail,
And ruin'd with a ſmile.

How to philoſophers will ſound
So ſtrange a truth diſplay'd?
"There's not a ſubſtance to be found,
"But every where a ſhade."

TO CÆLIA PLAYING ON A LUTE.

ODE.

While Cælia's hands fly ſwiftly o'er,
And ſtrike this ſoft machine,
Her touch awakes the ſprings, and life
Of harmony within.

Sweetly they ſink into the ſtrings,
The quivering ſtrings rebound,
Each ſtroke obſequiouſly obey,
And tremble into ſound.

Oh! had you bleſt the years of old;
His lute had Ovid ſtrung,
And dwelt on your's, the charming theme
Of his immortal ſong.

Yours, with Arion's wondrous harp,
The bard had hung on high;
And on the new-born ſtar beſtow'd
The honours of the ſky.

The radiant ſpheres had ceas'd their tunes,
And danc'd in ſilence on,
Pleas'd the new harmony to hear,
More heavenly than their own.

Of old to raiſe one ſhade from hell,
To Orpheus was it given:
But every tune of your's calls down
An angel from his heaven.

TO THE UNKOWN AUTHOR OF THE BATTLE OF THE SEXES.

The theme in other works, for every part,
Supplies materials to the builder's art:
To build from matter, is ſublimely great,
But gods and poets only can create;
And ſuch are you; their privilege you claim,
To ſhow your wonders, but conceal your name.
Like ſome eſtabliſh'd king, without controul,
You take a general progreſs through the ſoul;
Survey each part, examine every ſide,
Where ſhe's ſecure, and where unfortify'd.
In faithful lines her hiſtory declare,
And trace the cauſes of her civil war;
Your pen no partial prejudices ſway,
But truth decides, and virtue wins the day.
Through what gay fields and flowery ſcenes we paſs,
Where fancy ſports, and fiction leads the chaſe?
Where life, as through her various acts ſhe tends,
Like other comedies, in marriage ends.
What muſe but yours ſo juſtly could diſplay
Th' embattled paſſions marſhali'd in array?
Bid the rang'd appetites in order move,
Give luſt a figure, and a ſhape to love?
To airy notions ſolid forms diſpenſe,
And make our thoughts the images of ſenſe?
Diſcover all the rational machine, [within?
And ſhow the movements, ſprings, and wheels
But Hymen waves his torch, all diſcords ceaſe;
All parley, drop their arms, and ſue for peace.
Soon as the ſignal flames, they quit the fight,
For all at firſt but differ'd to unite.
From every part the lines in order move,
And ſweetly centre in the point of love.
Let blockheads to the muſty ſchools repair,
And poach for morals and the paſſions there,
Where virtue, like a dwarf in giant's arms,
Cumber'd with words, and manacled in terms,
Serves to amuſe the philoſophic fool,
By method dry, and regularly dull.
Who ſees thy lines ſo viſibly expreſs
The ſoul herſelf in ſuch a pleaſing dreſs;
May from thy labours be convinc'd and taught,
How Spenſer would have ſung, and Plato thought.

THE TWELFTH ODE OF THE FIRST BOOK OF HORACE, TRANSLATED.

What man, what hero will you raiſe,
By the ſhrill pipe, or deeper lyre?
What God, O Clio, will you praiſe,
And teach the echoes to admire?

Amidſt the ſhades of Helicon,
Cold Hæmus' tops, or Pindus' head,
Whence the glad foreſts haſten'd down,
And danc'd as tuneful Orpheus play'd.

Taught by the muſe, he ſtop'd the fall
Of rapid floods, and charm'd the wind;
The liſtening oaks obey'd the call,
And left their wondering hills behind.

Whom ſhould I firſt record, but Jove,
Whoſe ſway extends o'er ſea and land,
The king of men and gods above,
Who holds the ſeaſons in command?

To rival Jove, ſhall none aſpire,
None ſhall to equal glory riſe;
But Pallas claims beneath her ſire,
The ſecond honours of the ſkies.

To thee, O Bacchus, great in war,
To Dian will I ſtrike the ſtring,
Of Phœbus wounding from afar,
In numbers like his own I'll ſing.

The muſe Alcides ſhall reſound;
The twins of Leda ſhall ſucceed;
This for the ſtanding fight renown'd,
And that for managing the ſteed.

Whose star shines innocently still;
The clouds disperse, the tempests cease,
The waves obedient to their will,
Sink down, and hush their rage to peace.

Next shall I Numa's pious reign,
Or thine, O Romulus, relate:
Or Rome by Brutus free'd again,
Or haughty Cato's glorious fate?

Or dwell on noble Paulus' fame?
Too lavish of the patriot's blood?
Or Regulus' immortal name,
Too obstinately just and good?

These with Camillus brave and bold,
And other chiefs of matchless might,
Rome's virtuous poverty of old,
Severely season'd to the fight.

Like trees, Marcellus' glory grows,
With an insensible advance;
The Julian star, like Cynthia, glows,
Who leads the planetary dance.

The fates, O sire of human race,
Intrust great Cæsar to thy care,
Give him to hold thy second place,
And reign thy sole vicegerent here.

And whether India he shall tame,
Or to his chains the Seres doom;
Or mighty Parthia dreads his name,
And bows her haughty neck to Rome.

While on our groves thy bolts are hurl'd,
And thy loud car shakes heaven above,
He shall with justice awe the world,
To none inferior but to Jove.

THE TWENTY-SECOND ODE OF THE FIRST BOOK OF HORACE.

The man unsully'd with a crime,
Disdains the pangs of fear,
He scorns to dip the poison'd shaft,
Or poise the glittering spear.

Nor with the loaded quiver goes
To take the dreadful field:
His solid virtue is his helm,
And innocence his shield.

In vain the fam'd Hydaspes' tides,
Obstruct and bar the road.
He smiles on danger, and enjoys
The roarings of the flood.

All climes are native, and forgets
Th' extremes of heats and frosts,
The Scythian Caucasus grows warm,
And cool the Libyan coasts.

For while I wander'd through the woods,
And rang'd the lonely grove,
Lost and bewilder'd in the songs
And pleasing cares of love;

A wolf beheld me from afar,
Of monstrous bulk and might;
But, naked as I was, he fled
And trembled at the sight.

A beast so huge, nor Daunia's grove,
Nor Afric ever view'd;
Though nurst by her, the lion reigns
The monarch of the wood.

Expose me in those horrid climes,
Where not a gentle breeze
Revives the vegetable race,
Or cheers the drooping trees.

Where on the world's remotest verge
Th' unactive seasons lie,
And not one genial ray unbinds
The rigour of the sky.

On that uninhabitable shore,
Expose me all alone,
Where I may view without a shade,
The culminating sun.

Beneath th' equator, or the pole,
In safety could I rove;
And in a thousand different climes
Could live for her I love.

A PROLOGUE FOR THE STROLLERS.

Genteels, of old pert prologues led the way,
To guide, defend, and usher in the play,
As powder'd footmen run before the coach,
And thunder at the door my lord's approach.
But though they speak your entertainment near,
Most prologues speed like other bills of fare;
Seldom the languid stomach they excite,
And oftener pall, than raise the appetite.
As for the play—'tis hardly worth our care,
The prologue craves your mercy for the player;
That is, your money—for by Jove I swear,
White gloves and lodging are confounded dear.
Since here are none but friends, the truth to own,
Hasp'd in a coach our company came down,
But I most shrewdly fear we shall depart,
Ev'n in our old original, a cart.
With pride inverted, and fantastic power,
We strut the fancy'd monarchs of an hour;
While duns our emperors and heroes fear,
And * Cleomenes starves in earnest here:
The mightiest kings and queens we keep in pay,
Support their pomp on eighteen-pence a day.
Great Cyrus for a dram has pawn'd his coat,
And all our Cæsars can't command a groat;
Our Scipios, Hannibals, and Pompeys break,
And Cleopatra shifts but once a week.
To aggravate the case, we have not one,
Of all the new refinements of the town:
No moving statues, no lewd harlequins,
No pasteboard players, no heroes in machines;
No rosin to flash lightning—'twould exhaust us,
To buy a devil and a Doctor Faustus.
No windmills, dragons, millers, conjurers,
To exercise your eyes, and spare your ears;
No paper seas, no thunder from the skies,
No witches to descend, no stage to rise;
Scarce one for us the actors—we can set
Nothing before you but mere sense and wit.

* The Spartan Hero, a tragedy, by Mr. Dryden.

A bare downright old-fashion'd English feast,
Such as true Britons only can digest;
Such as your homely fathers us'd to love,
Who only came to hear and to improve:
Humbly content and pleas'd with what was dreſt,
When Otway, Lee, and Shakſpeare rang'd the feaſt.

PSALM VIII. TRANSLATED.

O King eternal and divine!
The world is thine alone:
Above the ſtars thy glories ſhine,
Above the heavens thy throne.

How far extends thy mighty name!
Where'er the ſun can roll,
That ſun thy wonders ſhall proclaim,
Thy deeds from pole to pole.

The infant's tongue ſhall ſpeak thy power,
And vindicate thy laws;
The tongue that never ſpoke before,
Shall labour in thy cauſe.

For when I lift my thoughts and eyes,
And view the heavens around,
Yon ſtretching waſte of azure ſkies,
With ſtars and planets crown'd;

Who in their dance attend the moon,
The empreſs of the night,
And pour around her ſilver throne,
Their tributary light:

Lord! what is mortal man? that he
Thy kind regard ſhould ſhare?
What is his ſon, who claims from thee
And challenges thy care?

Next to the bleſt angelic kind,
Thy hands created man,
And this inferior world aſſign'd,
To dignify his ſpan.

Him all revere, and all obey
His delegated reign,
The flocks that through the valley ſtray,
The herds that graze the plain.

The furious tiger ſpeeds his flight,
And trembles at his power;
In fear of his ſuperior might,
The lions ceaſe to roar.

Whatever horrid monſters tread
The paths beneath the ſea,
Their king at awful diſtance dread,
And ſullenly obey.

O Lord, how far extends thy name!
Where'er the ſun can roll,
That ſun thy wonders ſhall proclaim;
Thy deeds from pole to pole.

PSALM XXIV. PARAPHRASED.

Far as the world can ſtretch its bounds,
The Lord is king of all,
His wondrous power extends around
The circuit of the ball,

For he within the gloomy deeps
Its dark foundations caſt,
And rear'd the pillars of the earth
Amid the watery waſte.

Who ſhall aſcend his Sion's hill,
And ſee Jehovah there?
Who from his ſacred ſhrine ſhall breathe
The ſacrifice of prayer?

He only whoſe unſully'd ſoul
Fair virtue's paths has trod,
Who with clean hands and heart regards
His neighbour and his God.

On him ſhall his indulgent Lord
Diffuſive bounties ſhed,
From God his Saviour ſhall deſcend
All bleſſings on his head.

Of thoſe who ſeek his righteous ways,
Is this the choſen race,
Who baſk in all his bounteous ſmiles,
And flouriſh in his grace.

Lift up your ſtately heads, ye doors,
With haſty reverence riſe;
Ye everlaſting doors, who guard
The paſſes of the ſkies.

Swift from your golden hinges leap,
Your barriers roll away,
Now throw your blazing portals wide,
And burſt the gates of day.

For ſee! the King of glory comes
Along th' ethereal road:
The cherubs through your folds ſhall bear
The triumph of your God.

Who is this great and glorious King?
Oh! 'tis the Lord, whoſe might
Decides the conqueſt, and ſuſpends
The balance of the fight.

Lift up your ſtately heads, ye doors,
With haſty reverence riſe;
Ye everlaſting doors, who guard
The paſſes of the ſkies.

Swift from your golden hinges leap,
Your barriers roll away,
Now throw your blazing portals wide,
And burſt the gates of day.

For ſee! the King of glory comes
Along th' ethereal road:
The cherubs through your folds ſhall bear
The triumphs of their God.

Who is this great and glorious King?
Oh! 'tis the God, whoſe care
Leads on his Iſrael to the field,
Whoſe power controuls the war.

PSALM XXIX.

Ye mighty princes, your oblations bring,
And pay due honours to your awful King;
His boundleſs power to all the world proclaim,
Bend at his ſhrine, and tremble at his name.
For hark! his voice with unreſiſted ſway
Rules and controuls the raging of the ſea;

Within due bounds the mighty ocean keeps,
And in their watery cavern awes the deeps:
Shook by that voice, the nodding groves around
Start from their roots, and fly the dreadful ſound.
The blaſted cedars low in duſt are laid
And Lebanon is left without a ſhade.
See! when he ſpeaks, the lofty mountains crowd,
And fly for ſhelter from the thundering God:
Sirion and Lebanon like hinds advance,
And in wild meaſures lead th' unwieldy dance.
His voice, his mighty voice, divides the fire,
Back from the blaſt the ſhrinking flames retire.
Ev'n Cades trembles when Jehovah ſpeaks,
With all his ſavages the deſert ſhakes.
At the dread ſound the hinds with fear are ſtung,
And in the lonely foreſt drop their young.
While in his hallow'd temple all proclaim
His glorious honours, and adore his name.
High o'er the foaming ſurges of the ſea
He ſits, and bids the liſtening deeps obey:
He reigns o'er all; for ever laſts his power
Till nature ſinks, and time ſhall be no more.
With ſtrength the ſons of Iſrael ſhall he bleſs,
And crown our tribes with happineſs and peace.

PSALM XLVI. PARAPHRASED.

On God we build our ſure defence,
In God our hope repoſe:
His hand protects us in the fight,
And guards us from our woes.

Then be the earth's unwieldy frame
From its foundation hurl'd,
We may, unmov'd with fear, enjoy
The ruins of the world.

What though the ſolid rocks be rent,
In tempeſts whirl'd away?
What though the hills ſhould burſt their roots,
And roll into the ſea?

Thou ſea, with dreadful tumults ſwell,
And bid thy waters riſe
In furious ſurges, till they daſh
The flood-gates of the ſkies.

Our minds ſhall be ſerene and calm,
Like Siloah's peaceful flood;
Whoſe ſoft and ſilver ſtreams refreſh
The city of our God.

Within the proud delighted waves
Their wanton turrets play;
The ſtreams lead down their humid train
Reluctant to the ſea.

Amid the ſcene the temple floats,
With its reflected towers,
Gilds all the ſurface of the flood,
And dances to the ſhores.

With wonder ſee what mighty power
Our ſacred Sion cheers;
Lo! there amidſt her ſtately walls
Her God, her God appears.

Fix'd on her baſis ſhe ſhall ſtand,
And, innocently proud,
Smile on the tumults of the world,
Beneath the wings of God.

See! how, their weakneſs to proclaim,
The heathen tribes engage!
See! how with fruitleſs wrath they burn,
And impotence of rage!

But God has ſpoke; and, lo! the world,
His terrors to diſplay,
With all the melting globe of earth,
Drops ſilently away.

Still to the mighty Lord of hoſts
Securely we reſort;
For refuge fly to Jacob's God,
Our ſuccour and ſupport.

Hither, ye numerous nations, crowd,
In ſilent rapture ſtand,
And ſee o'er all the earth diſplay'd
The wonders of his hand.

He bids the din of war be ſtill,
And all its tumults ceaſe;
He bids the guiltleſs trumpet ſound
The harmony of peace.

He breaks the tough reluctant bow,
He burſts the brazen ſpear,
And in the crackling fire his hand
Conſumes the blazing car.

Hear then his formidable voice,
"Be ſtill and know the Lord;
"By all the heathen I'll be fear'd,
"By all the earth ador'd."

Still to the mighty Lord of hoſts
Securely we reſort;
For refuge fly to Jacob's God,
Our ſuccour and ſupport.

PSALM XC. PARAPHRASED.

Thy hand, O Lord, through rolling years
Has ſav'd us from deſpair,
From period down to period ſtretch'd
The proſpects of thy care.

Before the world was firſt conceiv'd,
Before the pregnant earth
Call'd forth the mountains from her womb,
Who ſtruggled to their birth;

Eternal God! thy early days
Beyond duration run,
Ere the firſt race of ſtarting time
Was meaſur'd by the ſun.

We die; but future nations hear
Thy potent voice again;
Riſe at the ſummons, and reſtore
The periſh'd race of man.

Before thy comprehenſive ſight
Duration fleets away;
And rapid ages on the wing
Fly ſwifter than a day.

As great Jehovah's piercing eyes
Eternity explore,
The longeſt æra is a night,
A period is an hour.

We at thy mighty call, O Lord,
Our fancy'd beings leave,

Rous'd from the flattering dream of life,
To sleep within the grave.

Swift from their barrier to their goal
The rapid moments pass,
And leave poor man, for whom they run,
The emblem of the grass.

In the first morn of life it grows,
And lifts its verdant head,
At noon decays, at evening dies,
And withers in the mead.

We in the glories of thy face
Our secret sins survey,
And see how gloomy those appear,
How pure and radiant they.

To death, as our appointed goal,
Thy anger drives us on,
To that full period fix'd at length
This tale of life is done.

With winged speed to stated bounds
And limits we must fly,
While seventy rolling suns complete
Their circles in the sky.

Or if ten more around us roll,
'Tis labour, woe, and strife,
Till we at length are quite drawn down
To the last dregs of life.

But who, O Lord, regards thy wrath,
Though dreadful and severe?
That wrath, whatever fear he feels,
Is equal to his fear.

So teach us, Lord, to count our days,
And eye their constant race,
To measure what we want in time
By wisdom and by grace.

With us repent, and on our hearts
Thy choicest graces shed,
And shower from thy celestial throne
Thy blessings on our head.

Oh! may thy mercy crown us here,
And come without delay;
Then our whole course of life will seem
One glad triumphant day.

Now the blest years of joy restore
For those of grief and strife,
And with one pleasant drop allay
This bitter draught of life.

Thy wonders to the world display,
Thy servants to adorn,
That may delight their future sons,
And children yet unborn.

Thy beams of majesty diffuse,
With them thy great commands,
And bid prosperity attend
The labours of our hands.

PSALM CXXXIX. PARAPHRASED.

IN MILTONIC VERSE.

O dread Jehovah! thy all-piercing eyes
Explore the motions of this mortal frame,
This tenement of dust: Thy stretching sight
Surveys th' harmonious principles that move
In beauteous rank and order, to inform
This cask and animated mass of clay.
Nor are the prospects of thy wondrous sight
To this terrestrial part of man confin'd;
But shoot into his soul, and there discern
The first materials of unfashion'd thought,
Yet dim and undigested, till the mind,
Big with the tender images, expands,
And, swelling, labours with th' ideal birth.
Where'er I move, thy cares pursue my feet
Attendant. When I drink the dews of sleep,
Stretch'd on my downy bed, and there enjoy
A sweet forgetfulness of all my toils,
Unseen thy sovereign presence guards my sleep
Wasts all the terrors of my dreams away,
Soothes all my soul, and softens my repose.
Before conception can employ the tongue,
And mould the ductile images to sound;
Before imagination stands display'd,
Thine eye the future eloquence can read,
Yet unarray'd with speech. Thou, mighty Lord!
Hast moulded man from his congenial dust,
And spoke him into being; while the clay,
Beneath thy forming hand, leap'd forth, inspir'd,
And started into life: through every part,
At thy command, the wheels of motion play'd.
But such exalted knowledge leaves below
And drops poor man from its superior sphere.
In vain, with reason's ballast, would he try
To stem th' unfathomable depth; his bark
O'ersets, and founders in the vast abyss.
Then whither shall the rapid fancy run,
Though in its full career, to speed my flight
From thy unbounded presence? which alone
Fills all the regions and extended space
Beyond the bounds of nature! Whither, Lord,
Shall my unrein'd imagination rove,
To leave behind thy spirit, and out-fly [spread,
Its influence, which, with brooding wings out-
Hatch'd unfledg'd nature from the dark profound.
If, mounted on my towering thoughts, I climb
Into the heaven of heavens, I there behold
The blaze of thy unclouded majesty!
In the pure empyrean thee I view,
High thron'd above all height, thy radiant shrine,
Throng'd with the prostrate seraphs, who receive
Beatitude past utterance! If I plunge
Down to the gloom of Tartarus profound,
There too I find thee in the lowest bounds
Of Erebus, and read thee in the scenes
Of complicated wrath: I see thee clad
In all the majesty of darkness there.
If, on the ruddy morning's purple wings
Upborne, with indefatigable course,
I seek the glowing borders of the east,
Where the bright sun, emergent from the deeps,
With his first glories gilds the sparkling seas,
And trembles o'er the waves; ev'n there thy hand
Shall through the watery desert guide my course,
And o'er the broken surges pave my way,
While on the dreadful whirls I hang secure,
And mock the warring ocean. If, with hopes,
As fond as false, the darkness I expect

To hide, and wrap me in its mantling ſhade,
Vain were the thought: for thy unbounded ken
Darts through the thickening gloom, and pries through all
The palpable obſcure. Before thy eyes,
The vanquiſh'd night throws off her duſky ſhrowd,
And kindles into day: the ſhade and light,
To man ſtill various, but the ſame to thee.
On thee is all the ſtructure of my frame
Dependant. Lock'd within the ſilent womb,
Sleeping I lay, and ripening to my birth;
Yet, Lord, thy out-ſtretch'd arm preſerv'd me there;
Before I mov'd to entity, and trod
The verge of being. To thy hallow'd name
I'll pay due honours: for thy mighty hand
Built this corporeal fabric, when it laid
The ground-work of exiſtence. Hence, I read
The wonders of thy art. This frame I view,
With terror and delight; and, wrapt in both,
I ſtartle at myſelf. My bones, unform'd
As yet, nor hardening from the viſcuous parts,
But blended with th' unanimated maſs,
Thy eye diſtinctly view'd; and while I lay
Within the earth, imperfect, nor perceiv'd
The firſt faint dawn of life, with eaſe ſurvey'd
The vital glimmerings of the active ſeeds,
Juſt kindling to exiſtence; and beheld
My ſubſtance ſcarce material. In thy book,
Was the fair model of this ſtructure drawn,
Where every part, in juſt connection join'd,
Compos'd and perfected th' harmonious piece,
Ere the dim ſpeck of being learn'd to ſtretch
Its ductile form, or entity had known
To range and wanton in an ampler ſpace.
How dear, how rooted in my inmoſt ſoul,
Are all thy counſels, and the various ways
Of thy eternal providence! The ſum
So boundleſs and immenſe, it leaves behind
The low account of numbers; and out-flies
All that imagination e'er conceiv'd,
Leſs numerous are the ſands that crowd the ſhores,
The barriers of the ocean. When I riſe
From my ſoft bed, and ſofter joys of ſleep,
I riſe to thee. Yet lo! the impious ſlight
Thy mighty wonders. Shall the ſons of vice
Elude the vengeance of thy wrathful hand,
And mock thy lingering thunder, which withholds
Its forky terrors, from their guilty heads!
Thou great tremenduous God!—Avaunt, and fly,
All ye who thirſt for blood.—For, ſwoln with pride,
Each haughty wretch blaſphemes thy ſacred name,
And bellows his reproaches to affront
Thy glorious Majeſty. Thy foes I hate
Worſe than my own, O Lord! Explore my ſoul,
See if a flaw or ſtain of ſin infects
My guilty thoughts. Then, lead me in the way
That guides my feet to thy own heaven and thee.

PSALM CXLIV. PARAPHRASED.

My ſoul in raptures riſe to bleſs the Lord,
Who taught my hands to draw the fatal ſword;
Led by his arm, undaunted I appear
In the firſt ranks of death and front of war.
He taught me firſt the pointed ſpear to wield,
And mow the glorious harveſt of the field.
By him inſpir'd, from ſtrength to ſtrength I paſt,
Plung'd through the troops, and laid the battle waſte.
In him my hopes I centre and repoſe,
He guards my life, and ſhields me from my foes.
He held his ample buckler o'er my head,
And ſcreen'd me trembling in the mighty ſhade:
Againſt all hoſtile violence and power,
He was my ſword, my bulwark, and my tower.
He o'er my people will maintain my ſway,
And teach my willing ſubjects to obey.
Lord! what is man? of vile and humble birth,
Sprung with this kindred reptiles from the earth,
That he ſhould thus thy ſecret counſels ſhare,
Or what his ſon, who challenges thy care?
Why does thine eye regard this nothing, man?
His life a point, his meaſure but a ſpan;
The fancy'd pageant of a moment made,
Swift as a dream, and fleeting as a ſhade.
Come in thy power, and leave th' ethereal plain,
And to thy harneſs'd tempeſt give the rein;
Yon ſtarry arch ſhall bend beneath the load,
So loud the chariot, and ſo great the God!
Soon as his rapid wheels Jehovah rolls,
The folding ſkies ſhall tremble to the poles:
Heaven's gaudy axle with the world ſhall fall,
Leap from the centre, and unhinge the ball.
Touch'd by thy hands, the labouring hills expire
Thick clouds of ſmoke, and deluges of fire;
On the tall groves the red deſtroyer preys,
And wraps th' eternal mountains in the blaze:
Full on my foes may all thy lightnings fly,
On purple pinions through the gloomy ſky.
Extend thy hand, thou kind all-gracious God,
Down from the heaven of heavens thy bright abode,
And ſhield me from my foes, whoſe towering pride
Lowers like a ſtorm, and gathers like a tide:
Againſt ſtrange children vindicate my cauſe,
Who curſe thy name, and trample on thy laws;
Who fear not vengeance which they never felt,
Train'd to blaſpheme, and eloquent in guilt:
Their hands are impious, and their deeds profane,
They plead their boaſted innocence in vain.
Thy name ſhall dwell for ever on my tongue,
And guide the ſacred numbers of my ſong;
To thee my muſe ſhall conſecrate her lays,
And every note ſhall labour in thy praiſe;
The hallow'd theme ſhall teach me how to ſing,
Swell on the lyre, and tremble on the ſtring.
Oft has thy hand from fight the monarch led,
When death flew raging, and the battle bled;
And ſnatch'd thy ſervant in the laſt deſpair
From all the riſing tumult of the war.
Againſt ſtrange children vindicate my cauſe,
Who curſe thy name, and trample on thy laws;
That our fair ſons may ſmile in early bloom,
Our ſons, the hopes of all our years to come:
Like plants that nurs'd by ſoftering ſhowers ariſe,
And lift their ſpreading honours to the ſkies.
That our chaſte daughters may their charms diſplay,
Like the bright pillars of our temple, gay,
Poliſh'd, and tall, and ſmooth, and fair as they.

Piled up with plenty let our barns appear,
And burſt with all the ſeaſons of the year;
Let pregnant flocks in every quarter bleat,
And drop their tender young in every ſtreet.
Safe from their labours may our oxen come,
Safe may they bring the gather'd ſummer home.
Oh! may no ſighs, no ſtreams of ſorrow flow,
To ſtain our triumphs with the tears of woe,
Bleſs'd is the nation, how ſincerely bleſs'd!
Of ſuch unbounded happineſs poſſeſs'd,
To whom Jehovah's ſacred name is known,
Who claim the God of Iſrael for their own.

JOB, CHAP. III.

Job curs'd his birth, and bade his curſes flow
In words of grief, and eloquence of woe;
Loſt be that day which dragg'd me to my doom,
Recent to life, and ſtruggling from the womb;
Whoſe beams with ſuch malignant luſtre ſhone,
Whence all my years in anxious circles run.
Loſt be that night in undetermin'd ſpace,
And veil with deeper ſhades her gloomy face,
Which crowded up with woes this ſlender ſpan,
While the dull maſs roſe quickening into man.
O'er that curs'd day let ſable darkneſs riſe,
Shrowd the blue vault, and blacken all the ſkies;
May God o'erlook it from his heavenly throne,
Nor rouſe from ſleep the ſedentary ſun.
O'er its dark face to ſhed his genial ray,
And warm to joy the melancholy day.
May the clouds frown, and livid poiſons breathe,
And ſtain heaven's azure with the ſhade of death.
May ten-fold darkneſs from that dreadful night
Seize and arreſt the ſtraggling gleams of light;
To pay due vengeance for its fatal crime,
Still be it baniſh'd from the train of time;
Nor in the radiant liſt of months appear,
To ſtain the ſhining circle of the year:
There through her duſky range may ſilence roam,
There may no ray, no glimpſe of gladneſs come,
No voice to cheer the ſolitary gloom.
May every ſtar his gaudy light with-hold,
Nor through the vapour ſhoot his beamy gold:
Nor let the dawn with radiant ſkirts come on,
Tipp'd with the glories of the riſing ſun;
Becauſe that dreadful period fix'd my doom,
Nor ſeal'd the dark receſſes of the womb.
To that original my ills I owe,
Heir of affliction, and the ſon of woe.
Oh! had I dy'd unexercis'd in pain,
And wak'd to life, to ſleep in death again!
Why did not fate attend me at my birth,
And give me back to my congenial earth?
Why was I, when an infant, ſooth'd to reſt,
Lull'd on the knee, or hung upon the breaſt?
For now the grave would all my cares compoſe,
Conceal my ſorrows, and inter my woes:
There wrapp'd and lock'd within his cold embrace,
Safe had I ſlumber'd in the arms of peace;
There with the mighty kings, who lie inroll'd
In clouds of incenſe, and in beds of gold:
There with the princes, who in grandeur ſhone,
And aw'd the trembling nations from the throne;
Afflicted Job an equal reſt might have,
And ſhare the dark retirement of the grave;
Or as a ſhapeleſs embryo ſeek the tomb,
Rude and imperfect from the abortive womb:
Ere motion's early principle began,
Or the dim ſubſtance kindled into man.
There from their monſtrous crimes the wicked ceaſe,
There labouring guilt is weary'd into peace;
There blended ſleep the coward and the brave,
Stretch'd with his lord, the undiſtinguiſh'd ſlave
Enjoys the common refuge of the grave.
An equal lot the mighty victor ſhares,
And lies amidſt the captives of his wars;
With his, thoſe captives mingle their remains,
The ſame in death, nor leſſen'd by their chains,
Why are we doom'd to view the genial ray?
Why curſt to bear the painful light of day?
Oh! with what joy the wretches yield their breath?
And pant in bitterneſs of ſoul for death?
As a rich prize, the diſtant bliſs they crave,
And find the glorious treaſure in the grave.
Why is the wretch condemn'd without relief,
To combat woe, and tread the round of grief,
Whom in the toils of fate his God has bound,
And drawn the line of miſeries around?
When nature calls for aid, my ſighs intrude,
My tears prevent my neceſſary food:
Like a full ſtream o'ercharg'd, my ſorrows flow,
In burſts of anguiſh, and a tide of woe;
For now the dire affliction which I fled,
Pours like a roaring torrent on my head.
My terrors ſtill the phantom view'd, and wrought
The dreadful image into every thought:
At length pluck'd down, the fatal ſtroke I feel,
And loſe the fancy'd in the real ill.

JOB, CHAP. XXV. PARAPHRASED.

Then will vain man complain and murmur ſtill?
And ſtand on terms with his Creator's will?
Shall this high privilege to clay be given?
Shall duſt arraign the providence of heaven?
With reaſon's line the boundleſs diſtance ſcan;
Oppoſe heaven's awful majeſty to man.
To what a length his vaſt dominions run?
How far beyond the journeys of the ſun?
He hung yon golden balls of light on high,
And launch'd the planets through the liquid ſky:
To rolling worlds he mark'd the certain ſpace,
Fix'd and ſuſtain'd the elemental peace.
Unnumber'd as thoſe worlds his armies move,
And the gay legions guard his realms above;
High o'er th' ethereal plains, the myriads riſe,
And pour their flaming ranks along the ſkies:
From their bright arms inceſſant ſplendours ſtream,
And the wide azure kindles with the gleam.
To this low world he bids the light repair,
Down through the gulfs of undulating air:
For man he taught the glorious ſun to roll,
From his bright barrier to his weſtern goal.
How then ſhall man, thus inſolently proud,
Plead with his Judge, and combat with his God?
How from his mortal mother can he come,
Unſtain'd from ſin, untinctur'd from the womb?
The Lord from his ſublime empyreal throne,
As a dark globe, regards the ſilver moon.

Thoſe ſtars, that grace the wide celeſtial plain,
Are but the humbleſt ſweepings of his train;
Dim are the brighteſt ſplendours of the ſky;
And the ſun darkens in Jehovah's eye.
But does not ſin diffuſe a fouler ſtain,
And thicker darkneſs cloud the ſoul of man?
Shall he the depths of endleſs wiſdom know?
The ſhort-liv'd ſovereign of the world below?
His frail original confounds his boaſt, [duſt.
Sprung from the ground, and quicken'd from the

THE SONG OF MOSES,

IN THE FIFTEENTH CHAPTER OF EXODUS, PARAPHRASED.

THEN to the Lord, the vaſt triumphant throng
Of Iſrael's ſons, with Moſes, rais'd the ſong.
To God our grateful accents will we raiſe,
And every tongue ſhall celebrate his praiſe:
Behold diſplay'd the wonders of his might;
Behold the Lord triumphant in the fight!
With what immortal fame and glory crac'd!
What trophies rais'd amid the watery waſte!
How did his power the ſteeds and riders ſweep
Ingulf'd in heaps, and whelm'd beneath the deep?
Whom ſhould we fear, while he, heav'n's awful Lord,
Unſheaths for Iſrael his avenging ſword?
His outſtretch'd arm, and tutelary care,
Guarded and ſav'd us in the laſt deſpair:
His mercy eas'd us from our circling pains,
Unbound our ſhackles and unlock'd our chains.
To him our God, our fathers God, I'll rear
A ſacred temple, and adore him there,
With vows and incenſe, ſacrifice and prayer.
The Lord commands in war; his matchleſs might
Hangs out and guides the balance of the fight:
By him the war the mighty leaders form,
And teach the hovering tumult where to ſtorm.
His name, O Iſrael, Heaven's Eternal Lord,
For ever honour'd, reverenc'd, and ador'd.
When to the fight from Egypt's fruitful ſoil,
Pour'd forth in myriads all the ſons of Nile;
The Lord o'erthrew the courſer and the car,
Sunk Pharaoh's pride, and overwhelm'd his war.
Beneath th' encumber'd deeps his legions lay,
For many a league impurpling all the ſea:
The chiefs, and ſteeds, and warriors whirl'd around,
Lay midſt the roarings of the ſurges drown'd.
Who ſhall thy power, thou mighty God, withſtand,
And check the force of thy victorious hand?
Thy hand, which red with wrath in terror roſe,
To cruſh that day thy proud Egyptian foes.
Struck by that hand, their drooping ſquadrons fall,
Crowding in death; one fate o'erwhelms them all.
Soon as thy anger, charg'd with vengeance, came,
They ſunk like ſtubble crackling in the flame.
At thy dread voice the ſummon'd billows crowd,
And a ſtill ſilence lulls the wondering flood:
Roll'd up, the cryſtal ridges ſtrike the ſkies,
Waves peep o'er waves, and ſeas o'er ſeas ariſe.
Around in heaps the liſtening ſurges hand,
Mute and obſervant of the high command.
Congeal'd with fear attends the watery train,
Rous'd from the ſecret chambers of the main.
With ſavage joy the ſons of Egypt cry'd,
(Vaſt were their hopes, and boundleſs was their pride)
Let us purſue thoſe fugitives of Nile,
This ſervile nation, and divide the ſpoil:
And ſpread ſo wide the ſlaughter, till their blood
Dyes with a ſtronger red the bluſhing flood.
Oh! what a copious prey their hoſts afford,
To glut and fatten the devouring ſword!
As thus the yawning gulf the boaſters paſs'd,
At thy command ruſh'd forth the rapid blaſt.
Then, at the ſignal given, with dreadful ſway,
In one huge heap roll'd down the roaring ſea;
And now the diſintangled waves divide,
Unlock their folds, and thaw the frozen tide.
The deeps alarm'd call terribly from far
The loud, embattled ſurges to the war;
Till her proud ſons aſtoniſh'd Egypt found,
Cover'd with billows, and in tempeſts drown'd.
What God can emulate thy power divine,
Or who oppoſe his miracles to thine!
When joyful we adore thy glorious name,
Thy trembling foes confeſs their fear and ſhame.
The world attends thy abſolute command,
And nature waits the wonders of thine hand.
That hand, extended o'er the ſwelling ſea,
The conſcious billows reverence and obey.
O'er the devoted race the ſurges ſweep,
And whelm the guilty nation in the deep.
That hand redeem'd us from our ſervile toil,
And each inſulting tyrant of the Nile:
Our nation came beneath that mighty hand,
From Egypt's realms to Canaan's ſacred land.
Thou wert their Guide, their Saviour, and their God,
To ſmoothe the way, and clear the dreadful road.
The diſtant kingdoms ſhall thy wonders hear,
The fierce Philiſtines ſhall confeſs their fear;
Thy fame ſhall over Edom's princes ſpread,
And Moab's kings, the univerſal dread;
While the vaſt ſcenes of miracles impart
A thrilling horror to the braveſt heart.
As through the world the gathering terror runs,
Canaan ſhall ſhrink, and tremble for his ſons.
Till thou haſt Jacob from his bondage brought,
At ſuch a vaſt expence of wonders bought,
To Canaan's promis'd realms and bleſt abodes,
Led through the dark receſſes of the floods.
Crown'd with their tribes ſhall proud Moriah riſe,
And rear his ſummit nearer to the ſkies.
Through ages, Lord, ſhall ſtretch thy boundleſs power,
Thy throne ſhall ſtand when time ſhall be no more:
For Pharaoh's ſteeds, and cars, and warlike train,
Leap'd in, and boldly rang'd the ſandy plain.
While in the dreadful road, and deſert way,
The ſhining crowds of gaſping fiſhes lay:
Till, all around with liquid toils beſet,
The Lord ſwept o'er their heads the watery net.
He freed the ocean from his ſecret chain,
And on each hand diſcharg'd the thundering main.

The loosen'd billows burst from every side,
And whelm the war and warriors in the tide;
But on each hand the solid billows stood,
Like lofty mounds to check the raging flood;
Till the blest race to promis'd Canaan past
O'er the dry path, and trod the watery waste.

THE THIRD ODE OF THE SECOND BOOK OF HORACE, PARAPHRASED.

Let the brave youth be train'd, the stings
Of poverty to bear,
And in the school of want be taught
The exercise of war.

Let him be practis'd in his bloom,
To listen to alarms,
And learn proud Parthia to subdue
With unresisted arms.

The hostile tyrant's beauteous bride,
Distracted with despair,
Beholds him pouring to the fight,
And thundering through the war.

As from the battlement she views
The slaughter of his sword,
Thus shall the fair express her grief,
And terrors for her Lord:

Look down, ye gracious powers, from heaven,
Nor let my consort go,
Rude in the arts of war, to fight
This formidable foe.

Oh! not with half that dreadful rage
The royal savage flies,
When, at the slightest touch, he springs,
And darts upon his prize.

How fair, how comely are our wounds,
In our dear country's cause!
What fame attends the glorious fate,
That props our dying laws!

For death's cold hand arrests the fears
That haunt the coward's mind;
Swift she pursues the flying wretch,
And wounds him from behind.

Bravely regardless of disgrace,
Bold virtue stands alone,
With pure unsully'd glory shines,
And honours still her own.

From the dark grave, and silent dust,
She bids her sons arise,
And to the radiant train unfolds
The portals of the skies.

Now, with triumphant wings, she soars,
Above the realms of day,
Spurns the dull earth, and groveling crowd,
And towers th' ethereal way.

With her has silence a reward,
Within the bless'd abodes,
That holy silence which conceals
The secrets of the gods.

But with a wretch I would not live,
By sacrilege profan'd,
Nor lodge beneath one roof, nor launch
One vessel from the land:

For, blended with the bad, the good
The common stroke have felt,
And heaven's dire vengeance struck alike
At innocence and guilt.

The wrath divine pursues the wretch,
At present, lame and slow,
But yet, though tardy to advance,
She gives the surer blow.

THE THIRD ODE OF THE FOURTH BOOK OF HORACE, PARAPHRASED.

Whom first, Melpomene, thy eye
With friendly aspect views,
Shall from his cradle rise renown'd,
And sacred to the muse.

Nor to the Isthmian games his fame
And deathless triumphs owe;
Nor shall he wear the verdant wreathe,
That shades the champion's brow.

Nor in the wide Elæan plains
Fatigue the courser's speed;
Nor through the glorious cloud of dust,
Provoke the bounding steed.

Nor, as an haughty victor, mount
The Capitolian heights,
And proudly dedicate to Jove
The trophies of his fights.

Because his thundering hand in war
Has check'd the swelling tide
Of the stern tyrant's power, and broke
The measures of his pride.

But by sweet Tyburn's groves and streams
His glorious theme pursues,
And scorns the laurels of the war,
For those that crown the muse.

There in the most retir'd retreats,
He sets his charming song,
To the sweet harp which Sappho touch'd,
Or bold Alcæus strung.

Rank'd by thy sons, Imperial Rome,
Among the poet's quire,
Above the reach of envy's hand
I safely may aspire.

Thou sacred muse, whose artful hand
Can teach the bard to sing;
Can animate the golden lyre,
And wake the living string:

Thou, by whose mighty power, may sing,
In unaccustom'd strains,
The silent fishes in the floods,
As on their banks the swans.

To thee I owe my spreading fame,
That thousands, as they gaze,
Make me their wonder's common theme,
And object of their praise.

If firſt I ſtruck the Leſbian lyre,
No fame belongs to me;
I owe my honours, when I pleaſe,
(If e'er I pleaſe) to thee.

ON THE

APPROACHING CONGRESS OF CAMBRAY.

WRITTEN IN 1721.

Ye patriots of the world, whoſe cares combin'd
Conſult the public welfare of mankind,
One moment let the crowding kingdoms wait,
And Europe in ſuſpenſe attend her fate,
Which turns in your great concils; nor refuſe
To hear the ſtrains of the prophetic muſe;
Who ſees thoſe councils with a generous care
Heal the wide wounds, and calm the rage of war;
She ſees new verdure all the plain o'erſpread,
Where the fight burn'd, and where the battle bled.
The fields of death a ſofter ſcene diſcloſe,
And Ceres ſmiles where iron harveſts roſe.
The bleating flocks along the baſtion paſs,
And from the awful ruins crop the graſs.
Freed from his fears, each unmoleſted ſwain,
In peaceful furrows cuts the fatal plain;
Turns the high bulwark and aſpiring mound,
And ſees the camp with all the ſeaſons crown'd.
Beneath each clod, bright burniſh'd arms appear;
Each furrow glitters with the pride of war;
The fields reſound and tinkle as they break,
And the keen faulchion rings againſt the rake;
At reſt beneath the hanging ramparts laid,
He ſings ſecurely in the dreadful ſhade.
Hark!——o'er the ſeas, the Britiſh lions roar
Their monarch's fame to every diſtant ſhore:
Swift on their canvas wings his navies go,
Wherever tides can roll, or winds can blow;
Their ſails within the arctic circle riſe,
Led by the ſtars that gild the northern ſkies;
Tempt frozen ſeas, nor fear the driving blaſt,
But ſwell exulting o'er the hoary waſte;
O'er the wide ocean hold ſupreme command,
And active commerce ſpread through every land;
Or with full pride to ſouthern regions run,
To diſtant worlds, on t' other ſide the ſun;
And plough the tides, where odoriferous gales
Perfume the ſmiling waves, and ſtretch the bellying ſails.
See! the proud merchant ſeek the precious ſhore,
And trace the winding veins of glittering ore;
Low in the earth his wondering eyes behold
Th' imperfect metal ripening into gold.
The mountains tremble with alternate rays,
And caſt at once a ſhadow and a blaze:
Streak'd o'er with gold, the pebbles flame around,
Gleam o'er the ſoil, and gild the tinkling ground;
Charg'd with the glorious prize, his veſſels come,
And in proud triumph bring an India home.
Fair concord, hail; thy wings o'er Brunſwick ſpread,
And with thy olives crown his laurel'd head.
Come; in thy moſt diſtinguiſh'd charms appear;
Oh! come, and bolt the iron gates of war.
The fight ſtands ſtill when Brunſwick bids it ceaſe,
The monarch ſpeaks, and gives the world a peace;
Like awful juſtice, ſits ſuperior lord,
To poiſe the balance, or to draw the ſword;
In due ſuſpenſe the jarring realms to keep,
And huſh the tumults of the world to ſleep.
Now with a brighter face, and nobler ray,
Shine forth, thou ſource of light, and god of day;
Say, didſt thou ever in thy bright career
Light up before a more diſtinguiſh'd year?
Through all thy journeys paſt, thou canſt not ſee
A perfect image of what this ſhall be:
Scarce the Platonic year ſhall this renew,
Or keep the bright original in view.

THE FABLE

OF THE YOUNG MAN AND HIS CAT.

A hapless youth, whom fates averſe had drove
To a ſtrange paſſion, and prepoſterous love,
Long'd to poſſeſs his puſs's ſpotted charms,
And hug the tabby beauty in his arms.
To what odd whimſies love inveigles men?
Sure if the boy was ever blind, 'twas then.
Rack'd with his paſſion, and in deep deſpair,
The youth to Venus thus addreſt his prayer.
O queen of beauty! ſince thy Cupid's dart
Has fir'd my ſoul, and rankles in my heart;
Since doom'd to burn in this unhappy flame,
From thee at leaſt a remedy I claim;
If once, to bleſs Pigmalion's longing arms,
The marble ſoften'd into living charms;
And warm with life the purple current ran
In circling ſtreams through every flinty vein;
If, with his own creating hands diſplay'd,
He hugg'd the ſtatue, and embrac'd a maid;
And with the breathing image fir'd his heart,
The pride of nature, and the boaſt of art:
Hear my requeſt, and crown my wond'rous flame,
The ſame its nature, be thy gift the ſame;
Give me the like unuſual joys to prove,
And though irregular, indulge my love.
Delighted Venus heard the moving prayer,
And ſoon reſolv'd to eaſe the lover's care,
To ſet Miſs Tabby off with every grace,
To dreſs, and fit her for the youth's embrace.
Now ſhe by gradual change her form forſook,
The roguiſh dimples next his heart beguile,
And each grave whiſker ſoften'd to a ſmile;
Unuſual ogles wanton'd in her eye,
Her ſolemn purring dwindled to a ſigh:
Sudden, a huge hoop-petticoat diſplay'd,
A wide circumference! intrench'd the maid,
And for the tail in waving circles play'd.
Her fur, as deſtin'd ſtill her charms to deck,
Made for her hands a muff, a tippet for her neck.
In the fine lady now her ſhape was loſt,
And by ſuch ſtrange degrees ſhe grew a toaſt;
Was all for ombre now; and who but ſhe,
To talk of modes and ſcandal o'er her tea;
To ſettle every faſhion of the ſex,
And run through all the female polities;
To ſpend her time at toilet and baſſet,
To play, to flaunt, to flutter, and coquet:
From a grave thinking mouſer, ſhe was grown
The gayeſt flirt that coach'd it round the town.

But see how often some intruding woe
Nips all our blooming prospects at a blow!
For as the youth his lovely consort led
To the dear pleasures of the nuptial bed,
Just on that instant from an inner house,
Into the chamber popt a heedless mouse.
Miss Tabby saw, and brooking no delay, [prey.
Sprung from the sheets, and seiz'd the trembling
Nor did the bride, in that ill-fated hour,
Reflect that all her mousing-days were o'er.
The youth, astonish'd, felt a new despair,
Ixion-like he grasp'd, and grasp'd but air;
He saw his vows and prayers in vain bestow'd,
And lost the jilting goddess in a cloud.

TO MR. POPE,

ON HIS TRANSLATION OF HOMER'S ILIAD.

'Tis true; what fam'd Pythagoras maintain'd,
That souls departed in new bodies reign'd:
We must approve the doctrine, since we see
The soul of godlike Homer breathe in thee.
Old Ennius first, then Virgil felt her fires;
But now a British Poet she inspires.
To you, O Pope, the lineal right extends,
To you th' hereditary muse descends.
At a vast distance we of Homer heard,
Till you brought in, and naturaliz'd the bard;
Bade him our English rights and freedom claim,
His voice, his habit, and his air the same.
Now in the mighty stranger we rejoice,
And Britain thanks thee with a public voice.
See! too the poet, a majestic shade,
Lifts up in awful pomp his laurel'd head,
To thank his successor, who sets him free
From the vile hands of Hobbes and Ogilby;
Who vext his venerable ashes more,
Than his ungrateful Greece, the living bard before.
While Homer's thoughts in thy bold lines are shown, [own;
Though worlds contend, we claim him for our
Our blooming boys proud Ilion's fate bewail;
Our lisping babes repeat the dreadful tale,
Ev'n in their slumbers they pursue the theme;
Start, and enjoy a fight in every dream.
By turns the chief and bard their souls inflame,
And every little bosom beats for fame.
Thus shall they learn (as future times will see)
From him to conquer, or to write from thee.
In every hand we see the glorious song,
And Homer is the theme of every tongue.
Parties in state poetic schemes employ,
And Whig and Tory side with Greece and Troy;
Neglect their feuds; and seem more zealous grown
To push those countries interests than their own.
Our busiest politicians have forgot [fought;
How Somer's counsel'd, and how Marlborough
But o'er their settling coffee gravely tell,
What Nestor spoke, and how brave Hector fell.
Our softest beaux and coxcombs you inspire,
With Glaucus' courage, and Achilles' fire.
Now they resent affronts which once they bore,
And draw those swords that ne'er were drawn before:
Nay, ev'n our belles, inform'd how Homer writ,
Learn thence to criticise on modern wit.
Let the mad critics to their side engage
The envy, pride, and dulness of the age:
In vain they curse, in vain they pine and mourn,
Back on themselves their arrows will return;
Whoe'er would thy establish'd fame deface,
Are but immortaliz'd to their disgrace.
Live, and enjoy their spight, and share that fate,
Which would, if Homer liv'd, on Homer wait.
And lo! his second labour claims thy care,
Ulysses' toils succeed Achilles' war.
Haste to the work; the ladies long to see
The pious frauds of chaste Penelope.
Helen they long have seen, whose guilty charms
For ten whole years engag'd the world in arms.
Then, as thy fame shall see a length of days,
Some future bards shall thus record thy praise:
" In those blest times when smiling heaven and fate
" Had rais'd Britannia to her happiest state,
" When wide around, she saw the world submit,
" And own her sons supreme in arts and wit;
" Then Pope and Dryden brought in triumph home
" The pride of Greece, and ornament of Rome;
" To the great task each bold translator came,
" With Virgil's judgment, and with Homer's flame; [soar,
" Here the pleas'd Mantuan swan was taught to
" Where scarce the Roman eagles tower'd before:
" And Greece no more was Homer's native earth,
" Though her seven rival cities claim'd his birth;
" On her seven cities he look'd down with scorn,
" And own'd with pride he was in Britain born."

SPECIMEN

OF A TRANSLATION OF THE ODYSSEY *.

The nurse all wild with transport seem'd to swim;
Joy wing'd her feet, and lighten'd ev'ry limb;
Then, to the room with speed impatient borne,
Flew with glad tidings of her lord's return
There bending o'er the sleeping queen, she cries,
Rise, my Penelope, my daughter, rise
To see Ulysses thy long absent spouse,
Thy soul's desire and lord of all thy vows:
Though late, he comes, and in his rage has slain,
For all their wrongs, the haughty suitor train,
Ah! Euryclea, she replies, you rave;
The gods resume that reason which they gave;
For Heaven deep wisdom to the fool supplies,
But oft infatuates and confounds the wise.
And wisdom once was thine! but now I find
The gods have ruin'd thy distemper'd mind.
How could you hope your fiction to impose?
Was it to flatter or deride my woes?
How could you break a sleep with talk so vain,
That held my sorrows in so soft a chain?

* Dr. Ridley was one of Mr. Spence's executors. Mr. Steevens assisted him in looking over the papers of the deceased; and transcribed this letter, &c. from the original.

A sleep so sweet I never could enjoy
Since my dear lord left Ithaca for Troy:
Curst Troy—oh! why did I thy name disclose?
Thy fatal name awakens all my woes:
But fly—some other had provok'd my rage *,
And you but owe your pardon to your age.
No artful tales, no studied lies, I frame,
Ulysses lives (rejoins the reverend dame)
In that dishonour'd stranger's close disguise,
Long has he pass'd all unsuspecting eyes,
All but thy son's—and long has he suppress
The well-concerted secret in his breast;
Till his brave father should his foes defeat,
And the close scheme of his revenge complete.
Swift as the word the queen transported sprung,
And round the dame in strict embraces hung;
Then, as the big round tears began to roll.
Spoke the quick doubts and hurry of her soul.
If my victorious hero safe arrives,
If my dear lord, Ulysses, still survives,
Tell me, oh tell me, how he fought alone:
How were such multitudes destroy'd by one?
Nought I beheld, but heard their cries, she said,
When death flew raging, and the suitors bled:
Immur'd we listen'd, as we sat around,
To each deep groan and agonizing sound.
Call'd by thy son to view the scene I fled,
And saw Ulysses striding o'er the dead!
Amidst the rising heaps the hero stood
All grim, and terribly adorn'd with blood.

 "This is enough in conscience for this time: besides, I am desired, by Mr Popè or Mr. Lintot, I don't know which, to write to Mr. Pope on a certain affair."

ON HIS MAJESTY'S PLAYING WITH A TIGER,

IN KENSINGTON GARDENS.

"Primâ dicte mihi, summâ dicende Camœnâ."

Amidst the den, the lions prey,
Seal'd up for death the prophet lay;
But couch'd the hungry monsters sit,
And fawning lick his sacred feet;
Swift shot an angel from above,
And chang'd their fury into love.
As swift did Britain's genius fly,
And for her charge stand trembling by;
When Brunswick, pious, brave, and wise,
Like him the favourite of the skies,
Play'd with the monster's dreadful teeth,
And sported with the fangs of death.
Genius of Britain, spare thy fears,
For know, within, our sovereign wears
The surest guard; the best defence;
A firm untainted innocence.
So sweet an innocence disarms
The fiercest rage with powerful charms,
So far rebellion it beguiles,
That faction bends: that envy smiles;
That furious savages submit,
And pay due homage at his feet.

* The words in Italic are copied by Pope.

Britain! by this example prove
The duty, loyalty, and love.
See! the fierce brutes thy king caress,
And court him with a mute address;
Well may'st thou own his gentle sway,
If tigers bend, and savages obey.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN A POET AND HIS SERVANT.

IN IMITATION OF HORACE, BOOK II. SAT. VII.

To enter into the beauties of this Satire, it must be remembered, that slaves, among the Romans, during the Feasts of Saturn, wore their masters Habits, and were allowed to say what they pleased.

Servant.

Sir,—I've long waited in my turn to have
A word with you—but I'm your humble slave.
P. What knave is that? my rascal!
S. Sir, 'tis I,
No knave nor rascal, but your trusty Guy.
P. Well, as your wages still are due, I'll bear
Your rude impertinence this time of year. [ever,
S. Some folks are drunk one day, and some for
And some, like Wharton, but twelve years together.
Old Evremond, renown'd for wit and dirt,
Would change his living oftener than his shirt;
Roar with the rakes of state a month; and come
To starve another in his hole at home.
So roy'd wild Buckingham the public jest,
Now some inholder's, now a monarch's guest;
His life and politics of every shape,
This hour a Roman, and the next an ape.
The gout in every limb from every vice,
Poor Clodio hir'd a boy to throw the dice.
Some wench for ever; and their sins on those,
By custom, sit as easy as their clothes.
Some fly, like pendulums, from good to evil,
And in that point are madder than the devil:
For they——
P. To what will these wild maxims tend?
And where, sweet sir, will your reflections end?
S. In you.
P. In me, you knave? make out your charge.
S. You praise low-living, but you live at large.
Perhaps you scarce believe the rules you teach,
Or find it hard to practise what you preach.
Scarce have you paid one idle journey down,
But, without business, you're again in town.
If none invite you, sir, abroad to roam,
Then—Lord, what pleasure 'tis to read at home:
And sip your two half-pints, with great delight,
Of beer at noon, and muddled port at night.
From "Encome, John comes thundering at the door,
With "Sir, my master begs you to come o'er,
"To pass these tedious hours, these winter nights,
"Not that he dreads invasions, rogues, or sprites."
Strait for your two best wigs aloud you call,
This stiff in buckle, that not curl'd at all,
"And where, you rascal, are the spurs," you cry;
"And O! what blockhead laid the buskins by?"

* The seat of John Pitt, Esq. in Dorsetshire.

On your old batter'd mare you'll needs be gone,
(No matter whether on four legs or none)
Splash, plunge, and stumble, as you scour the heath;
All swear at Morden 'tis on life or death;
Wildly through Wareham streets you scamper on,
Raise all the dogs and voters in the town;
Then fly for six long dirty miles as bad,
That Corse and Kingston gentry think you mad.
And all this furious riding is to prove
Your high respect, it seems, and eager love:
And yet, that mighty honour to obtain,
Banks, Shaftesbury, Doddington, may send in vain.
Before you go, we curse the noise you make,
And bless the moment that you turn your back:
As for myself, I own it to your face,
I love good eating, and I take my glass:
But sure 'tis strange, dear Sir, that this should be
In you amusement, but a fault in me.
All this is bare refining on a name,
To make a difference where the fault's the same.
My father sold me to your service here,
For this fine livery, and four pounds a year.
A livery you should wear as well as I,
And this I'll prove—but lay your cudgel by.
You serve your passions—Thus, without a jest,
Both are but fellow-servants at the best.
Yourself, good Sir, are play'd by your desires,
A mere tall puppet dancing on the wires.

P. Who at this rate of talking, can be free?

S. The brave, wise, honest man, and only he:
All else are slaves alike, the world around,
Kings on the throne, and beggars on the ground:
He, Sir, is proof to grandeur, pride, or pelf,
And (greater still) is master of himself:
Not to-and-fro by fears and factions hurl'd,
But loose to all the interests of the world:
And while that world turns round, entire and whole,
He keeps the sacred tenor of his soul;
In every turn of fortune still the same,
As gold unchang'd, or brighter from the flame:
Collected in himself, with godlike pride,
He sees the darts of envy glance aside;
And, fix'd like Atlas, while the tempest blow,
Smiles at the idle storms that roar below.
One such you know, a layman, to your shame,
And yet the honour of your blood and name,
If you can such a character maintain,
You too are free, and I'm your slave again.
But when in Hemskirk's pictures you delight,
More than yourself, to see two drunkards fight;
" Fool, rogue, sot, blockhead," or such names are mine:
Your's are, " a connoisseur," or " deep divine."
I'm chid for loving a luxurious bit,
The sacred prize of learning, worth, and wit:
And yet some sell their lands these bits to buy;
Then, pray, who suffers most from luxury?
I'm chid, 'tis true; but then I pawn no plate,
I seal no bonds, I mortgage no estate.
Besides, high living, Sir, must wear you out
With surfeits, qualms, a fever, or the gout.
By some new pleasures are you still engross'd,
And when you save an hour, you think it lost.
To sports, plays, races, from your books you run,
And like all company, except your own.
You hunt, drink, sleep, or (idler still) you rhyme;
Why?—but to banish thought, and murder time:
And yet that thought, which you discharge in vain,
Like a foul-loaded piece, recoils again.

P. Tom, fetch a cane, a whip, a club, a stone,—

S. For what?

P. A sword, a pistol, or a gun:
I'll shoot the dog.

S. Lord! who would be a wit?
He's in a mad, or in a rhyming fit.

P. Fly, fly, you rascal, for your spade and fork;
For once I'll set your lazy bones to work:
Fly, or I'll send your back, without a groat,
To the bleak mountains where you first were caught.

ODE TO JOHN PITT, ESQ.

Advising him to build a Banquetting-house on a Hill that overlooks the Sea.

From this tall promontory's brow
You look majestic down,
And see extended wide below
Th' horizon all your own.

With growing piles the vales are crown'd,
Here hills peep over hills;
There the vast sky and sea profound
Th' increasing prospect fills.

O bid, my friend, a structure rise,
And this huge round command;
Then shall this little point comprise
The ocean and the land.

Then you, like Æolus, on high,
From your aerial tower,
Shall see secure the billows fly,
And hear the whirlwinds roar.

You, with a smile, their rage despise,
Till some sad wreck appears,
And calls, from your relenting eyes,
The sympathizing tears.

Thus may you view, with proud delight,
While winds the deep reform,
(Till human woes your grief excite)
All nature in a storm.

Majestic, awful scene! when, hurl'd
On surges, surges rise,
And all the heaving watery world
Tumultuous mounts the skies.

The seas and thunder roar by turns,
By turns the peals expire;
The billows flash, and ether burns
With momentary fire.

But lo! the furious tempests cease,
The mighty rage subsides;
Old ocean hush'd, in solemn peace,
Has still'd the murmuring tides.

Spread wide abroad, the glassy plain,
In various colours gay,
Reflects the glorious sun again,
And doubly gilds the day.

Th' horizon glows from ſide to ſide,
And flames with glancing rays;
The floating, trembling, ſilver tide,
Is one continual blaze.

Your eyes the proſpect now command,
All uncontroul'd and free,
Fly like a thought from land to land,
And dart from ſea to ſea.

Thus, while above the clouds we ſit,
And innocently gay,
Paſs in amuſements, wine, or wit,
The ſultry hours away;

Sometimes, with pity, or diſdain,
In thought a glance we throw
Down on the poor, the proud, the vain,
In yonder world below.

We ſee, from this exalted ſeat,
(How ſhrunk, reduc'd, confin'd!)
The little perſon of the great,
As little as his mind.

See there—amidſt the crowds our view
Some ſcatter'd virtues ſtrike;
But thoſe ſo throng'd, and theſe ſo few,
The world looks all alike.

Yet, through this cloud of human-kind,
The Talbots we ſurvey,
The Pitts, the Yorkes, the Seckers find,
Who ſhine in open day.

ODE TO JOHN PITT, ESQ.

ON THE SAME SUBJECT.

O'ER curious models as you rove
The vales with piles to crown,
And great Palladio's plants improve
With nobler of your own;

O bid a ſtructure o'er the floods
From this high mountain riſe,
Where we may ſit enthron'd like gods,
And revel in the ſkies.

Th' aſcending breeze, at each repaſt,
Shall breathe an air divine,
Give a new brightneſs to the taſte,
New ſpirit to the wine.

Or theſe low pleaſures we may quit
For banquets more refin'd,
The works of each immortal wit,
The luxury of the mind.

Plato, or Boyle's, or Newton's page,
Our towering thoughts ſhall raiſe,
Or Homer's fire, or Pindar's rage,
Or Virgil's lofty lays.

Or with amuſive thoughts the ſea
Shall entertain the mind,
While we the rolling ſcene ſurvey,
An emblem of mankind.

Where, like ſworn foes, ſucceſſive all,
The furious ſurges run,
To urge their predeceſſor's fall,
Though follow'd by their own.

Where, like our moderns ſo profound,
Engag'd in dark diſpute,
The ſkuttles caſt their ink around
To puzzle the diſpute.

Where ſharks, like ſhrewd directors, thrive,
Like lawyers, rob at will;
Where flying-fiſh, like trimmers live;
Like ſoldiers, ſword-fiſh kill.

Where on the leſs the greater feed,
The tyrants of an hour,
Till the huge royal whale ſucceed,
And all at once devour.

Thus in the mortal world we now
Too truly underſtand,
Each monſter of the ſea below
Is match'd by one at land.

ON MRS. WALKER'S POEMS.

PARTICULARLY THAT ON THE AUTHOR.

BLUSH, Wilmot, bluſh; a female muſe,
Without one guilty line,
The tender theme of love purſues
In ſofter ſtrains than thine.

'Tis thine the paſſion to blaſpheme,
'Tis her's with wit and eaſe
(When a mere nothing is the theme)
Beyond thyſelf to pleaſe.

Then be to her the prize decreed,
Whoſe merit has prevail'd;
For what male poet can ſucceed,
If Rocheſter has fail'd?

Since Phœbus quite forgetful grows,
And has not yet thought fit,
In his high wiſdom, to impoſe
A ſalique law on wit;

Since of your thoughts he takes no care,
Ye Priors, Popes, and Gays;
'Tis hard!—but let the women wear
The breeches and the bays.

ON A FLOWERED CARPET.

Worked by the Young Ladies at Kingſton.

WHEN Pallas ſaw the piece her pupils wrought,
She ſtood long wondering at the lovely draught:
"And, Flora, now (ſhe cried) no more diſplay
Thy flowers, the triſling beauties of a day:
For ſee! how theſe with life immortal bloom,
And ſpread and flouriſh for an age to come!
In what unguarded hour did I impart
To theſe fair virgins all my darling art?
In all my wit I ſaw theſe rivals ſhine,
But this one art I thought was always mine:
Yet lo! I yield; their miſtreſs now no more,
But proud to learn from theſe I taught before.
For look, what vegetable ſenſe is here!
How warm with life theſe bluſhing leaves appear!
What temper'd ſplendours o'er the piece are laid!
Shade ſteals on light, and light dies into ſhade.
Through heaven's gay bow leſs various beauties
run,
And far leſs bright, though painted by the ſun,

See in each blooming flower what ſpirit glows!
What vivid colours fluſh the opening roſe!
In ſome few hours thy lily diſappears;
But this ſhall flouriſh through a length of years,
See unfelt winters paſs ſucceſſive by,
And ſcorn a mean dependence on the ſky.
And oh! may Britain, by my counſels ſway'd,
But live and flouriſh, till theſe flowers ſhall fade!
Then go, fond Flora, go, the palm reſign
To works more fair and durable than thine;
For I, ev'n I, in juſtice yield the crown
To works ſo far ſuperior to my own."

VERSES

ON A FLOWERED CARPET.

On this fair ground, with raviſh'd eyes,
We ſee a ſecond Eden riſe,
As gay and glorious as the firſt,
Before th' offending world was curſt.
While theſe bright nymphs the needle guide,
To paint the roſe in all her pride,
Nature, like her, may bluſh to own
Herſelf ſo far by art out-done.
Theſe flowers ſhe rais'd with all her care,
So blooming, ſo divinely fair!
The glorious children of the ſun,
That David's regal heir outſhone,
Where ſcarce like one of theſe array'd;
They died, but theſe ſhall never fade.

ON THE ART OF PREACHING.

A FRAGMENT.

In imitation of Horace's Art of Poetry.

" —— Pedent opera interrupta.——"

Should ſome fam'd hand, in this fantaſtic age,
Draw Rich, as Rich appears upon the ſtage,
With all his poſtures in one motley plan,
The god, the hound, the monkey, and the man,
Here o'er his head high brandiſhing a leg,
And there juſt hatch'd, and breaking from his egg; [piece,
While monſter crowds on monſter through the
Who could help laughing at a ſight like this?
Or, as a drunkard's dream together brings
" A court of coblers, or a mob of kings *;"
Such is a ſermon, where, confus'dly dark,
Join Sharp †, South, Sherlock, Barrow, Wake, and Clarke;
So eggs of different pariſhes will run
To batter, when you beat ſix yolks to one;
So ſix bright chemic liquors when you mix,
In one dark ſhadow vaniſh all the fix.
Full licence prieſts and painters ever had
To run bold lengths, but never to run mad;
For theſe can't reconcile God's grace to ſin,
Nor thoſe paint tigers in an aſs's ſkin.
No common dauber in one piece would join
The fox and gooſe—unleſs upon a ſign.

* Dryden.

† Another copy reads,

" Join Hoadly, Sharp, South, Sherlock, Wake, and Clarke."

Some ſteal a page of ſenſe from Tillotſon,
And then conclude divinely with their own.
Like oil on water, mounts the prelate up;
His Grace is always ſure to be at top:
That vein of mercury its beams will ſpread,
And ſhine more ſtrongly through a mine of lead.
With ſuch low arts your audience never bilk;
For who can bear a fuſtian lin'd with ſilk?
Sooner than preach ſuch ſtuff, I'd walk the town,
Without my ſcarf, in Whiſton's draggled gown;
Ply at the Chapter, and at Child's, to read
For pence, and bury for a groat a-head.
Some eaſy ſubject chooſe, within your power,
Or you can never hold out half an hour.
One rule obſerve: this Sunday ſplit your text;
Preach one part now, and t'other half the next.
Speak, look, and move, with dignity and eaſe,
Like mitred Secker, you'll be ſure to pleaſe.
But, if you whine like boys at country ſchools,
Can you be ſaid to ſtudy Cambray's rules?
Begin with care, nor, like that curate vile,
Set out in this high prancing ſtumbling ſtyle,
" Whoever with a piercing eye can ſee
" Through the paſt records of futurity—"
All gape—no meaning—the puff'd orator
Talks much, and ſays juſt nothing for an hour.
Truth and the text he labours to diſplay,
Till both are quite interpreted away:
So frugal dames inſipid water pour,
Till green, bohea, and coffee, are no more.
His arguments in ſilly circles run
Still round and round, and end where they began:
So the poor turn-ſpit, as the wheel runs round,
The more he gains, the more he loſes ground.
Surpris'd with ſolitary ſelf-applauſe,
He ſees the motley mingled ſcene he draws:
Dutch painters thus at their own figures ſtart,
Drawn with their utmoſt uncreating art.
Thus when old Bruin teems, her children fail
Of limbs, form, figure, features, head, or tail;
Nay though ſhe licks her cubs, her tender cares
At beſt can bring the bruins but to bears.
Still to your hearers all your ſermons ſort;
Who'd preach againſt corruption at the court?
Againſt church-power at viſitations bawl,
Or talk about damnation at Whitehall?
Harangue the horſe-guards on a cure of ſouls,
Condemn the quirks of chancery at the rolls,
Or rail at hoods and organ's at St. Paul's?
Or be, like David Jones, ſo indiſcreet,
To rave at uſurers in Lombard-ſtreet?
Ye country-vicars, when you preach in town,
A turn at Paul's to pay your journey down,
If you would ſhun the ſneer of every prig,
Lay by the little band and ruſty wig;
But yet be ſure your proper language know,
Nor talk as born within the ſound of bow;
Speak not the phraſe that Drury-lane affords,
Nor from 'Change-alley ſteal a cant of words:
Coachmen will criticiſe your ſtyle; nay, further,
Porters will bring it in for wilful murther:
The dregs of the Canaille will look aſkew,
To hear the language of the town from you;

Nay, my Lord-mayor, with merriment poſſeſt,
Will break his nap, and laugh among the reſt,
And jog the aldermen to hear the jeſt.

INVITATION TO MR. DODINGTON*.

In Alluſion to Horace, Book I. Ep. V.

If Dodington will condeſcend
To viſit a poetic friend,
And leave a numerous bill of fare,
For four or five plain diſhes here;
No coſtly welcome, but a kind
He and his friends will always find;
A plain, but clean and ſpacious room,
The maſter and his heart at home,
A cellar open as his face,
A dinner ſhorter than his grace;
Your mutton comes from Pimpern-down,
Your fiſh (if any) from the town;
Our rogues, indeed, of late, o'eraw'd,
By human laws, not thoſe of God,
No veniſon ſteal, or none they bring,
Or ſend it all to maſter King†;
And yet, perhaps, ſome venturous ſpark
May bring it, now the nights are dark.
Punch I have ſtore, and beer beſide,
And port that's good, though Frenchified.
Then, if you come, I'm ſure to get
From Eaſtbery ‡—a deſert—of wit.
One line, good Sir, to name the day,
And your petitioner will pray, &c.

MR. R. PITT, TO HIS BROTHER. C. PITT.

On his having a Fit of the Gout.

Among the well-bred natives of our iſle,
"I kiſs your hand, Sir," is the modiſh ſtyle;
In humbler manner, as my fate is low,
I beg to kiſs your venerable toe,
Not old infallibilities can have
Profounder reverence from its meaneſt ſlave.
What dignity attends the ſolemn gout!
What conſcious greatneſs if the heart be ſtout!
Methinks I ſee you o'er the houſe preſide,
In painful majeſty and decent pride,
With leg toſt high, on ſtately ſofa ſit,
More like a ſultan than a modern wit:
Quick at your call the trembling ſlaves appear,
Advance with caution, and retire with fear;
Ev'n Peggy trembles, though (or authors fail)
At times the anti-ſalic laws prevail.
Now, Lord have mercy on poor Dick! ſay I;
"Where's the lac'd ſhoe—who laid the flannel
" by?"
Within, 'tis hurry, the houſe ſeems poſſeſt;
Without, the horſes wonder at their reſt.
What terrible diſmay, what ſcenes of care!
Why is the ſooty Mintrem's hopeful heir §
Before the morning-dawn compell'd to riſe,
And give attendance with his half-ſhut eyes?
What makes that girl with hideous viſage ſtare?
What fiends prevent Ead's * journey to the fair†?
Why all this noiſe, this buſtle and this rout?
"Oh, nothing—but poor maſter has the gout."
Meantime, ſuperior to the pains below,
Your thoughts in ſoaring meditations flow,
In rapturous trance on Virgil's genius dwell,
To us, poor mortals, his ſtrong beauties tell,
And, like Æneas, from your couch of ſtate,
In all the pomp of words diſplay the Trojan fate.
Can nothing your aſpiring thoughts reſtrain?
Or does the muſe ſuſpend the rage of pain?
Awhile give o'er your rage; in ſickneſs prove
Like other mortals, if you'd pity move:
Think not your friends compaſſionate can be,
When ſuch the product of diſeaſe they ſee;
Your ſharpeſt pangs but add to our delight,
We'll wiſh you ſtill the gout, if ſtill you write.

AN EPITAPH,

*Inscribed on a Stone that covers his Father, Mother, and Brother.

Ye sacred spirits! while your friends distress'd
Weep o'er your ashes, and lament the bless'd;
O let the pensive muse inscribe that stone,
And with the general sorrows mix her own:
The pensive muse!—who, from this mournful hour,
Shall raise her voice, and wake the string no more!
Of love, of duty, this last pledge receive;
'Tis all a brother, all a son can give.

A POEM

ON THE DEATH OF THE LATE EARL STANHOPE.

Humbly Inscribed to the Countess of Stanhope.

"At length, grim fate, thy dreadful triumphs cease:
"Lock up the tomb, and seal the grave in peace."

Now from thy riot of destruction breathe,
Call in thy raging plagues, thou tyrant death:
Too mean's the conquest which thy arms bestow,
Too mean to sweep a nation at a blow.
No, thy unbounded triumphs higher run,
And seem to strike at all mankind in one;
Since Stanhope is thy prey, the great, the brave,
A nobler prey was never paid the grave.
We seem to feel from this thy daring crime,
A blank in nature, and a pause in time.
He stood so high in reason's towering sphere,
As high as man unglorify'd could bear.
In arms, and eloquence, like Cæsar, shone
So bright, that each Minerva was his own.
How could so vast a fund of learning lie
Shut up in such a short mortality?
One world of science nobly travell'd o'er,
Like Philip's glorious son, he wept for more.
And now resign'd to tears, th' angelic choirs,
With drooping heads unstring their golden lyres,
Wrapt in a cloud of grief, they sigh to view
Their sacred image laid by death so low:
And deep in anguish sunk, on Stanhope's fate,
Begin to doubt their own immortal state.
But hold, my muse, thy mournful transport errs,
Hold here, and listen to Lucinda's tears,
While thy vain sorrows echo to his tomb,
Behold a sight that strikes all sorrow dumb:
Behold the partner of his cares and life,
Bright in her tears, and beautiful in grief.
Shall then in vain those streams of sorrow flow,
Drest up in all the elegance of woe?
And shall the kind officious muse forbear
To answer sigh for sigh, and tell out tear for tear?
Oh! no; at such a melancholy scene,
The poet echoes back her woes again.
Each weeping muse should minister relief,
From all the moving eloquence of grief.

Each, like a Niobe, his fate bemoan,
Melt into tears, or harden into stone.
From dark obscurity his virtues save,
And, like pale spectres, hover round his grave.
With them the marble should due measures keep,
Relent at every sigh, at every accent weep.
Britannia mourn thy hero, nor refuse
To vent the sighs and sorrows with the muse:
Oh! let thy rising groans load every wind,
Nor let one sluggish accent lag behind.
Thy heavy fate with justice to deplore,
Convey a gale of sighs from shore to shore.
And thou, her guardian angel, widely spread
Thy golden wings, and shield the mighty dead.
Brood o'er his ashes, and illustrious dust,
And soothe with care the venerable ghost.
To guard the nobler relics, leave a while
The kind protection of thy favourite isle:
Around his silent tomb, thy station keep,
And, with thy sister-angel, learn to weep.
Ye sons of Albion, o'er your patriot mourn,
And cool with streams of tears his sacred urn.
His wondrous virtues, stretch'd to distant shores,
Demand all Europe's tears, as well as yours.
Nature can't bring in every period forth,
A finish'd hero, of exalted worth,
Whose godlike genius, towering and sublime,
Must long lie ripening in the womb of time:
Before a Stanhope enters on the stage,
The birth of years, and labour of an age.
In field, and council, born the palm to share,
His voice a senate, as his sword a war:
And each illustrious action of his life,
Conspire to form the patriot, and the chief:
On either side, unite their blended rays,
And kindly mingle in a friendly blaze.
Stand out, and witness this, unhappy Spain,
Lift up to view the mountains of thy slain:
Tell how thy heroes yielded to their fear,
When Stanhope rous'd the thunder of the war:
With what fierce tumults of severe delight
Th' impetuous hero plung'd into the fight.
How he the dreadful front of death defac'd,
Pour'd on the foe, and laid the battle waste.
Did not his arm the ranks of war deform,
And point the hovering tumult where to storm?
Did not his sword through legions cleave his way,
Break their dark squadrons, and let in the day?
Did not he lead the terrible attack,
Push conquest on, and bring her bleeding back?
Throw wide the scenes of horror and despair,
The tide of conflict, and the stream of war?
Bid yellow Tagus, who in triumph roll'd,
Till then his turbid tides of foaming gold,
Boast his rich channels to the world no more,
Since all his glittering streams, and liquid ore,
Lie undistinguish'd in a flood of gore
Bid his charg'd waves, and loaded billows sweep,
Thy slaughter'd thousands to the frighted deep.
Confess, fair Albion, how the listening throng
Dwelt on the moving accents of his tongue.
In the sage council seat him, and confess
Thy arm in war, thy oracle in peace:
How here triumphant too, his nervous sense
Bore off the palm of manly eloquence:

* Robert Pitt, A. M. his eldest brother.

The healing balm to Albion's wounds apply'd,
And charm'd united factions to his side:
Fix'd on his sovereign's head the nodding crown,
And propp'd the tottering basis of the throne,
Supported bravely all the nation's weight,
And stood the public Atlas of the state.
Sound the loud trumpet, let the solemn knell
Bid with due horror his great soul farewell.
Tune every martial instrument with care,
At once wake all the harmony of war.
Let each sad hero in procession go,
And swell the vast solemnity of woe.
Neglect the yew, the mournful cypress leave,
And with fresh laurels strew the warrior's grave.
There they shall rise, in honour of his name,
Grow green with victory, and bloom with fame.
Lo! from his azure throne, old father Thames
Sighs through his floods, and groans from all his streams:
O'er his full urn he droops his reverend head,
And sinks down deeper in his oozy bed,
As the sad pomp proceeds along his sides,
O'ercharg'd with sorrow, pant his heaving tides.
Low in his humid palace laid to mourn,
With streams of tears, the god supplies his urn.
Within his channels he forgets to flow,
And pours o'er all his bounds the deluge of his woe.
But see, my muse, if yet thy ravish'd sight
Can bear that blaze, that rushing stream of light;
Where the great hero's disincumber'd soul,
Springs from the earth, to reach her native pole.
Boldly she quits th' aband n'd cask of clay,
Freed from her chains, and towers th' ethereal way:
Soars o'er th' eternal sunds of hail and snow,
And leaves heaven's stormy magazines below.
Thence through the vast profound of heaven she flies,
And measures all the concave of the skies:
Sees where the planetary worlds advance,
Orb above orb, and lead the starry dance.
Nor rests she there, but, with a bolder flight,
Explores the undiscover'd realms of light,
Where the fix'd orbs, to deck the spangled pole,
In state around their gaudy axles roll.
Thence his aspiring course in triumph steers,
Beyond the golden circles of the spheres;
Into the heaven of heavens, the seat divine,
Where nature never drew her mighty line.
A region that excludes all time and place,
And shuts creation from th' unbounded space:
Where the full tides of light in oceans flow,
And see the sun ten thousand worlds below.
So far from our inferior orbs disjoin'd,
The tir'd imagination pants behind.
Then cease thy painful flight, nor venture more,
Where never muse has stretch'd her wing before.
Thy pinions tempt immortal heights in vain,
That throw thee fluttering back to earth again.
On earth a while, blest shade, thy thoughts employ,
And steal one moment from eternal joy.
While there, in heaven, immortal songs inspire
Thy golden strings, and tremble on the lyre,
Which raise to nobler strains th' angelic choir.
Look down with pity on a mortal's lays,
Who strives, in vain, to reach thy boundless praise:
Who with low verse profanes thy sacred name,
Lost in the spreading circle of thy fame.
Thy fame, which, like thyself, is mounted high,
Wide as thy heaven, and lofty as thy sky.
And thou, his pious consort, here below,
Lavish of grief, and prodigal of woe:
Oh! choke thy griefs, thy rising sighs suppress,
Nor let thy sorrows violate his peace.
This rage of anguish, that disdains relief,
Dims his bright joys, with some allay of grief.
Look on his dearest pledge, he left behind,
And see how nature, bountiful and kind,
Stamps the paternal image on his mind,
Oh! may th' hereditary virtues run
In fair succession, to adorn the son;
The last best hopes of Albion's realms to grace,
And form the hero worthy of his race:
Some means at last by Britain may be found,
To dry her tears, and close her bleeding wound.
And if the muse through future times can see,
Fair youth, thy father shall revive in thee:
Thou shalt the wondering nation's hopes engage,
To rise the Stanhope of the future age.

EPITAPH ON DR. KEIL.

THE LATE FAMOUS ASTRONOMER.

Beneath this stone the world's just wonder lies,
Who, while on earth, had rang'd the spacious skies;
Around the stars his active soul had flown,
And seen their courses finish'd ere his own:
Now he enjoys those realms he could explore,
And finds that heaven he knew so well before.
He through more worlds his victory pursued
Than the brave Greek could wish to have subdued;
In triumph ran one vast creation o'er,
Then stopp'd,—for nature could afford no more.
With Cæsar's speed, young Ammon's noble pride
He came, saw, vanquish'd, wept, return'd, and died.

HORACE, BOOK II. EPIST. XIX. IMITATED.

AN EPISTLE TO MR. ROBERT LOWTH*.

'Tis said, dear Sir, no poets please the town,
Who drink mere water, though from Helicon:
For in cold blood they seldom boldly think;
Their rhymes are more insipid than their drink.
Not great Apollo could the train inspire,
Till generous Bacchus help'd to fan the fire.
Warm'd by two gods at once, they drink and write,
Rhyme all the day, and fuddle all the night.
Homer, says Horace, nods in many a place,
But hints, he nodded oftner o'er the glass.
Inspir'd with wine old Ennius sung and thought
With the same spirit, that his heroes fought:
And we from Johnson's tavern-laws divine,
That bard was no great enemy to wine.
'Twas from the bottle King deriv'd his wit,
Drank till he could not talk, and then he writ.
Let no coif'd serjeant touch the sacred juice,
But leave it to the bards for better use:

* Late Bishop of London.

Let the grave judges too the glaſs forbear,
Who never ſing and dance but once a year.
This truth once known, our poets take the hint,
Get drunk or mad, and then get into print:
To raiſe their flames indulge the mellow fit,
And loſe their ſenſes in the ſearch of wit:
And when with claret fir'd they take the pen,
Swear they can write, becauſe they drink like Ben.
Such mimic Swift or Prior to their coſt,
For in the raſh attempt the fools are loſt.
When once a genius breaks through common rules,
He leads an herd of imitating fools.
If Pope, the prince of poets, ſick a-bed,
O'er ſteaming coffee bends his aching head,
The fools in public o'er the fragrant draught
Incline thoſe heads, that never ach'd or thought.
This muſt provoke his mirth or his diſdain,
Cure his complaint,—or make him ſick again.
I too, like them, the poet's path purſue,
And keep great Flaccus ever in my view;
But in a diſtant view—yet what I write,
In theſe looſe ſheets, muſt never ſee the light;
Epiſtles, odes, and twenty trifles more,
Things that are born and die in half an hour.
What! you muſt dedicate, ſays ſneering Spence,
This year ſome new performance to the prince:
Though money is your ſcorn, no doubt in time
You hope to gain ſome vacant ſtall by rhyme;
Like other poets, were the truth but known,
You too admire whatever is your own.
Theſe wiſe remarks my modeſty confound,
While the laugh riſes, and the mirth goes round;
Vext at the jeſt, yet glad to ſhun a fray,
I whiſk into my coach, and drive away.

TO MR. SPENCE.

PREFIXED TO THE ESSAY ON POPE'S ODYSSEY.

'Tis done—Reſtor'd by thy immortal pen,
The critic's noble name revives again;
Once more that great, that injur'd name we ſee
Shine forth alike in Addiſon and thee.
Like curs, our critics haunt the poet's feaſt,
And feed on ſcraps refus'd by every gueſt;
From the old Thracian * dog they learn'd the way
To ſnarl in want, and grumble o'er their prey.
As though they grudg'd themſelves the joys they feel,
Vex'd to be charm'd, and pleas'd againſt their will.
Such their inverted taſte, that we expect
For faults their thanks, for beauties their neglect;
So the fell ſnake rejects the fragrant flowers,
But every poiſon of the field devours.
Like bold Longinus of immortal fame,
You read your poet with a poet's flame;
With his, your generous raptures ſtill aſpire;
The critic kindles when the bard's on fire.
But when ſome lame, ſome limping line demands
The friendly ſuccour of your healing hands;
The feather of your pen drops balm around,
And plays, and tickles, while it cures the wound.
While Pope's immortal labour we ſurvey,
We ſtand all dazzled with exceſs of day,
Blind with the glorious blaze;—to vulgar ſight
'Twas one bright maſs of undiſtinguiſh'd light;
But, like the towering eagle, you alone
Diſcern'd the ſpots and ſplendours of the ſun.
To point out faults, yet never to offend;
To play the critic, yet preſerve the friend;
A life well ſpent, that never loſt a day;
An eaſy ſpirit, innocently gay;
A ſtrict integrity, devoid of art;
The ſweeteſt manners, and ſincereſt heart;
A ſoul where depth of ſenſe and fancy meet;
A judgment brighten'd by the beams of wit,
Were ever yours;—be what you were before,
Be ſtill yourſelf; the world can aſk no more.

* Zoilus, ſo called by the ancients.

IMITATION OF SPENSER.

A well-known vaſe of ſovereign uſe I ſing,
Pleaſing to young and old, and Jordan hight,
The lovely queen, and eke the haughty king
Snatch up this veſſel in the murky night:
Ne lives there poor, ne lives there wealthy wight,
But uſes it in mantle brown or green;
Sometimes it ſtands array'd in gloſſy white;
And eft in mighty dortours may be ſeen
Of China's fragile earth, with azure flowrets ſheen.

The virgin, comely as the dewy roſe,
Here gently ſheds the ſoftly-whiſpering rill;
The frannion, who ne ſhame ne bluſhing knows,
At once the potter's gloſſy vaſe does fill;
It whizzes like the waters from a mill.
Here frouzy houſewives clear their loaded reins;
The beef-fed juſtice, who fat ale doth ſwill,
Graſps the round-handled jar, and tries, and ſtrains,
While ſlowly dribbling down the ſcanty water drains.

The dame of Fraunce ſhall without ſhame convey
This ready needment to its proper place;
Yet ſhall the daughters of the lond of Fay
Learn better amenaunce and decent grace;
Warm bluſhes lend a beauty to their face,
For virtue's comely tints their cheeks adorn;
Thus o'er the diſtant hillocks you may trace
The purple beamings of the infant morn:
Sweet are our blooming maids—the ſweeteſt creatures born.

None but their huſbands or their lovers true
They truſt with management of their affairs;
Nor even theſe their privacy may view,
When the ſoft beavys ſeek the bower by pairs:
Then from the ſight accoy'd, like timorous hares,
From mate or bellamour alike they fly;
Think not, good ſwain, that theſe are ſcornful airs,
Think not for hate they ſhun thine amorous eye,
Soon ſhall the fair return, nor done thee, youth, to dye.

While Belgic frows acroſs a charcoal ſtove
(Repleniſh'd like the Veſtal's laſting fire) love,
Bren for whole years, and ſcorch the parts of
No longer parts that can delight inſpire,
Erſt cave of bliſs, now monumental pyre;
O Britiſh maid, for ever clean and neat,
For whom I aye will make my ſimple lyre,

With double care preſerve that dun retreat,
Fair Venus' myſtic bower, Dan Cupid's feather'd ſeat.

So may your hours ſoft fliding ſteal away,
Unknown to gnarring ſlander and to bale,
O'er ſeas of bliſs peace guide her gondelay,
Ne bitter dole impeſt the paſſing gale.
O! ſweeter than the lilies of the dale,
In your ſoft breaſts the fruits of joyance grow.
Ne fell deſpair be here with viſage pale,
Brave be the youth from whom your boſoms glow,
Ne other joy but you the faithful ſtriplings know.

EPISTLE TO J. PITT, Esq.

In Imitation of Horace, Epiſt. IV. Book I.

Dear Sir,
To all my trifles you attend,
But drop the critic to indulge the friend,
And with moſt Chriſtian patience loſe your time,
To hear me preach, or peſter you with rhyme.
Here with my books or friend I ſpend the day,
But how at Kingſton paſs your hours away?
Say, ſhall we ſee ſome plan with raviſh'd eyes,
Some future pile in miniature ariſe?
(A model to excel in every part Judicious Jones, or great Palladio's art)
Or ſome new bill, that, when the houſe is met,
Shall claim their thanks, and pay the nation's debt?
Or have you ſtudy'd in the ſilent wood
The ſacred duties of the wife and good?
Nature, who form'd you, nobly crown'd the whole
With a ſtrong body, and as firm a ſoul:
The praiſe is yours to finiſh every part
With all th' embelliſhments of taſte and art.
Some ſee in canker'd heaps their riches roll'd,
Your bounty gives new luſtre to your gold.
Could your dead father hope a greater bliſs,
Or your ſurviving parent more than this?
Than ſuch a ſon——a lover of the laws,
And ever true to honour's glorious cauſe:
Who ſcorns all parties, though by parties fought:
Who greatly thinks, and truly ſpeaks his thought:
With all the chaſte ſeverity of ſenſe,
Truth, judgment, wit, and manly eloquence.
So in his youth great Cato was rever'd,
By Pompey courted, and by Cæſar fear'd:
Both he diſdain'd alike with godlike pride,
For Rome and Liberty he liv'd——and dy'd.
In each perfection as you riſe ſo faſt,
Well may you think each day may be your laſt.
Uncommon worth is ſtill with fate at ſtrife,
Still inconſiſtent with a length of life.
The future time is ever in your power,
Then 'tis clear gain to ſeize the preſent hour;
Break from the ſerious thought, and laugh away
In Pimpern walls one idle eaſy day.
You'll find your rhyming kinſman well in caſe,
For ever fix'd to the delicious place.
Though not like L——with corpulence o'ergrown
For he has twenty cures, and I but one.

EPISTLE TO MR. SPENCE.

In Imitation of Horace, Epiſt. X. Book I.

Health from the hard who loves the rural ſport,
To the more noble bard that haunts the court:
In every other point of life we chime,
Like two ſoft lines when coupled into rhyme.
I praiſe a ſpacious villa to the ſky,
You a cloſe garret full five ſtories high;
I revel here in nature's varied ſweets,
You in the nobler ſcents of London ſtreets.
I left the court, and here at eaſe reclin'd,
Am happier than the king who ſtaid behind:
Twelve ſtifling diſhes I could ſcarce live o'er,
At home I dine with luxury on four.
Where would a man of judgment chooſe a ſeat,
But in a wholeſome, rural, ſoft retreat?
Where hills adorn the manſion they defend?
Where could he better anſwer nature's end?
Here from the ſea the melting breezes riſe,
Unbind the ſnow, and warm the wintery ſkies:
Here gentle gales the dog-ſtar's heat allay,
And ſoftly breathing cool the ſultry day.
How free from cares, from dangers and affright,
In pleaſing dreams I paſs the ſilent night!
Does not the variegated marble yield
To the gay colours of the flowery field?
Can the New-river's artificial ſtreams,
Or the thick waters of the troubled Thames,
In many a winding ruſty pipe convey'd,
Or daſh'd and broken down a deed caſcade,
With our clear ſylvan ſtreams in ſweetneſs vie,
That in eternal rills run bubbling by;
In dimples o'er the poliſh'd pebbles paſs,
Glide o'er the ſands, or glitter through the graſs?
And yet in town the country proſpects pleaſe,
Where ſtately colonades are flank'd with trees:
On a whole country looks the maſter down
With pride, where ſcarce five acres are his own.
Yet nature, though repell'd, maintains her part,
And in her turn ſhe triumphs over art;
The handmaid now may prejudice our taſte,
But the fair miſtreſs will prevail at laſt.
That man muſt ſmart at laſt whoſe puzzled ſight
Miſtakes in life falſe colours for the right;
As the poor dupe is ſure his loſs to rue,
Who takes a pinchbeck guinea for a true.
The wretch, whoſe frantic pride kind fortune crowns,
Grows twice as abject when the goddeſs frowns;
As he, who riſes when his head turns round,
Muſt tumble twice as heavy to the ground.
Then love, not grandeur, 'tis a ſplendid curſe;
The more the love, the harder the divorce.
We live far happier by theſe gurgling ſprings,
Than ſtateſmen, courtiers, counſellors, or kings.
The ſtag expell'd the courſer from the plain;
What can he do?—he begs the aid of man;
He takes the bit and proudly bears away
His new ally; he fights and wins the day;
But, ruin'd by ſucceſs, he ſtrives in vain
To quit his maſter and the curb again.
So from the fear of want moſt wretches fly,
But loſe their nobleſt wealth, their liberty;

To their imperious paſſions they ſubmit,
Who mount, ride, ſpur, but never draw the bit.
'Tis with your fortune, Spence, as with your ſhoe,
A large may wrench, a ſmall one wring your toe.
Then bear your fortune in the golden mean,
Not every man is born to be a dean.
I'll bear your jeers, if ever I am known
To ſeek two cures, when ſcarce I merit one.
Riches, 'tis true, ſome ſervice may afford,
But oftner play the tyrant o'er their lord.
Money I ſcorn, but keep a little ſtill,
To pay my doctor's, or my lawyer's bill.
From Encombe's ſoft romantic ſcenes I write,
Deep ſunk in eaſe, in pleaſure and delight;
Yet, though her gen'rous lord himſelf is here,
'Twould be one pleaſure more, could you appear.

INVITATION TO A FRIEND AT COURT.

If you can leave for books the crowded court,
And generous Bourdeaux for a glaſs of Port,
To theſe ſweet ſolitudes without delay
Break from the world's impertinence away.
Soon as the ſun the face of nature gilds,
For health and pleaſure will we range the fields;
O'er her gay ſcenes and opening beauties run,
While all the vaſt creation is our own.
But when his golden globe with faded light
Yields to the ſolemn empire of the night;
And in her ſober majeſty the moon
With milder glories mounts her ſilver throne;
Amidſt ten thouſand orbs with ſplendour crown'd,
That pour their tributary beams around; [ſight
Through the long levell'd tube our ſtrengthen'd
Shall mark diſtinct the ſpangles of the night;
From world to world ſhall dart the boundleſs eye,
And ſtretch from ſtar to ſtar, from ſky to ſky.
The buzzing inſect families appear,
When ſuns unbind the rigour of the year;
Quick glance the myriads round the evening bower,
Hoſts of a day, or nations of an hour.
Aſtoniſh'd we ſhall ſee th' unfolding race,
Stretch'd out in bulk, within the poliſh'd glaſs;
Through whoſe ſmall convex a new world we ſpy,
Ne'er ſeen before, but by a ſeraph's eye!
So long in darkneſs ſhut from human kind
Lay half God's wonders to a point confin'd!
But in one peopled drop we now ſurvey
In pride of power ſome little monſter play;
O'er tribes inviſible he reigns alone,
And ſtruts a tyrant of a world his own.
Now will we ſtudy Homer's awful page,
Now warm our ſouls with Pindar's noble rage:
To Engliſh lays ſhall Flaccus' lyre be ſtrung,
And lofty Virgil ſpeak the Britiſh tongue.
Immortal Virgil! at thy ſacred name
I tremble now, and now I pant for fame;
With eager hopes this moment I aſpire
To catch or emulate thy glorious fire;
The next purſue the raſh attempt no more,
But drop the quill, bow, wonder, and adore;
By thy ſtrong genius overcome and aw'd!
That fire from heaven! that ſpirit of a God!
Pleas'd and tranſported with thy name I tend
Beyond my theme, forgetful of my friend;
And from my firſt deſign by rapture led,
Neglect the living poet for the dead.

EPISTLE TO MR. SPENCE,

When Tutor to Lord Middleſex.

IN IMITATION OF HORACE, BOOK I. EPIST XVIII.

Spence, with a friend you paſs the hours away
In pointed jokes, yet innocently gay:
You ever differ'd from a flatterer more,
Than a chaſte lady from a flaunting whore.
'Tis true you rallied every fault you found,
But gently tickled, while you cur'd the wound:
Unlike the paultry poets of the town,
Rogues who expoſe themſelves for half a crown:
And ſtill impoſe on every ſoul they meet
Rudeneſs for ſenſe, and ribaldry for wit:
Who, though half-ſtarv'd, in ſpite of time and place,
Repeat their rhymes, though dinner ſtays for grace:
And as their poverty their dreſſes fit,
They think of courſe a ſloven is a wit;
But ſenſe (a truth theſe coxcombs ne'er ſuſpect)
Lies juſt 'twixt affectation and neglect.
One ſtep ſtill lower, if you can, deſcend,
To the mean wretch, the great man's humble friend;
That moving ſhade, that pendant at his ear,
That two-legg'd dog, ſtill pawing on the peer.
Studying his looks, and watching at the board,
He gapes to catch the droppings of my lord;
And, tickled to the ſoul at every joke,
Like a preſs'd watch, repeats what t'other ſpoke:
Echo to nonſenſe! ſuch a ſcene to hear!
'Tis juſt like Punch and his interpreter.
On trifles ſome are earneſtly abſurd,
You'll think the world depends on ev'ry word.
What, is not every mortal free to ſpeak?
I'll give my reaſons, though I break my neck.
And what's the queſtion?—if it ſhines or rains,
Whether 'tis twelve or fifteen miles to Staines.
The wretch reduc'd to rags by every vice,
Pride, projects, races, miſtreſſes, and dice,
The rich rogue ſhuns, though full as bad as he,
And knows a quarrel is good huſbandry.
'Tis ſtrange, cries Peter, you are out of pelf,
I'm ſure I thought you wiſer than myſelf;
Yet gives him nothing—but advice too late,
Retrench, or rather mortgage your eſtate,
I can advance the ſum,—'tis beſt for both;
But henceforth cut your coat to match your cloth.
A miniſter, in mere revenge and ſport,
Shall give his foe a paltry place at court.
The dupe for every royal birth-day buys
New horſes, coaches, clothes, and liveries;
Plies at the levee, and diſtinguiſh'd there
Lives on the royal whiſper for a year;
His wenches ſhine in Bruſſels and Brocade!
And now the wretch, ridiculouſly mad,
Draws on his banker, mortgages and ſails,
Then to the country runs away from jails:
There ruin'd by the court he ſells a vote
To the next burgeſs, as of old he bought;

Rubs down the ſteeds which once his chariot bore,
Or ſweeps the town, which once he ſerv'd before.
But, by this roving meteor led, I tend
Beyond my theme, forgetful of my friend.
Then take advice; I preach not out of time,
When good lord Middleſex is bent on rhyme.
Their humour check'd, or inclination croſs'd,
Sometimes the friendſhip of the great is loſt.
Unleſs call'd out to wench, be ſure comply,
Hunt when he hunts, and lay the fathers by:
For your reward you gain his love, and dine
On the beſt veniſon and the beſt French wine,
Nor to Lord  make the obſervation,
How the twelve peers have anſwer'd their creation,
Nor in your wine or wrath betray your truſt,
Be ſilent ſtill, and obſtinately juſt:
Explore no ſecrets, draw no characters,
For echo will repeat, and walls have ears:
Nor let a buſy fool a ſecret know,
A ſecret gripes him till he lets it go:
Words are like bullets, and we wiſh in vain,
When once diſcharg'd, to call them back again.
* * * * * * * * * * * * *
* * * * * * * * * * * * *
Defend, dear Spence, the honeſt and the civil,
But to cry up a raſcal—that's the devil.
Who guards a good man's character, 'tis known,
At the ſame time protects and guards his own.
For as with houſes' tis with people's names,
A ſhed may ſet a palace all on flames;
The fire neglected on the cottage preys,
But mounts at laſt into a general blaze.

'Tis a fine thing, ſome think, a lord to know;
I wiſh his tradeſmen could but think ſo too.
He gives his word—then all your hopes are gone:
He gives his honour—then your quite undone.
His and ſome women's love the ſame are found;
You rathly board a fire-ſhip, and are drown'd.
Moſt folks ſo partial to themſelves are grown,
They hate a temper differing from their own.
The grave abhor the gay, the gay the ſad,
And formaliſts pronounce the witty mad:
The ſot, who drinks ſix bottles in a place,
Swears at the flinchers who refuſe their glaſs.
Would you not paſs for an ill-natur'd man,
Comply with every humour that you can.
Pope will inſtruct you how to paſs away
Your time like him, and never loſe a day;
From hopes or fears your quiet to defend,
To all mankind as to yourſelf a friend,
And, ſacred from the world, retir'd, unknown,
To lead a life with mortals like his own.
When to delicious Pimperne I retire,
What greater bliſs, my Spence, can I deſire?
Contented there my eaſy hours I ſpend
With maps, globes, books, my bottle, and a friend.
There can I live upon my income ſtill,
E'en though the houſe ſhould paſs the Quakers bill:
Yet to my ſhare ſhould ſome good prebend fall,
I think myſelf of ſize to fill a ſtall.
For life or wealth let Heaven my lot aſſign,
A firm and even ſoul ſhall ſtill be mine.

VIDA'S ART OF POETRY.

To the Right Honourable

PHILIP, EARL STANHOPE, VISCOUNT MAHON, AND BARON ELVASTON,

THIS TRANSLATION IS DEDICATED, BY HIS LORDSHIP'S HUMBLE SERVANT AND CHAPLAIN, CHRISTOPHER PITT.

BOOK I.

GIVE me, ye ſacred muſes, to impart
The hidden ſecrets of your tuneful art;
Give me your awful myſteries to ſing,
Unlock, and open wide, your ſacred ſpring;
While from his infancy the bard I lead,
And ſet him on your mountain's lofty head;
Direct his courſe, and point him out the road
To ſing in epic ſtrains an hero or a god. [praiſe,
What youth, whoſe generous boſom pants for
Will dare with me to beat thoſe arduous ways?
O'er high Parnaſſus' painful ſteeps to go,
And leave the groveling multitude below:
Where the glad muſes ſing, and form the choir,
While bright Apollo ſtrikes the ſilver lyre,
Approach thou firſt, great Francis, nor refuſe
To pay due honours to the ſacred muſe;
While Gallia waits for thy auſpicious reign,
Till age completes the monarch in the man;
Mean time the muſe may bring ſome ſmall relief,
To charm thy anguiſh, and ſuſpend thy grief;
While guilty fortune's ſtern decrees detain
Thee and thy brother in the realms of Spain;
Far, far tranſported from your native place,
Your country's, father's, and your friend's embrace!
Such are the terms the cruel fates impoſe
On your great father, ſtruggling with his woes,
Such are their hard conditions:—they require
The ſons to purchaſe, and redeem the ſire. [ſtain,
But yet, brave youth, from grief, from tears ab-
Fate may relent, and heaven grow mild again;
At laſt perhaps the glorious day may come,
The day that brings our royal exile home;

When, to thy native realms in peace reſtor'd,
The raviſh'd crowds ſhall hail their paſſing lord;
When each tranſported city ſhall rejoice,
And nations bleſs thee with a public voice;
To the throng'd fanes the matrons ſhall repair;
Abſolve their vows, and breathe their ſouls in prayer.
Till then, let every muſe engage thy love,
With me at large o'er high Parnaſſus rove,
Range every bower, and ſport in every grove.
Firſt then obſerve, that verſe is ne'er confin'd
To one fix'd meaſure, or determin'd kind;
Though at its birth it ſung the gods alone,
And then religion claim'd it for her own;
In ſacred ſtrains addreſs'd the Deity,
And ſpoke a language worthy of the ſky;
New themes ſucceeding bards began to chooſe,
And in a wider field engag'd the muſe;
The common bulk of ſubjects to rehearſe
In all the rich varieties of verſe.
Yet none of all with equal honours ſhine
(But thoſe which celebrate the power divine)
To thoſe exalted meaſures, which declare
The deeds of heroes, and the ſons of war.
From hence poſterity the name beſtow'd
On this rich preſent of the Delphic god;
Fame ſays, Phæmonoe in this meaſure gave
Apollo's anſwers from the Pythian cave.
But ere you write, conſult your ſtrength and chooſe
A theme proportion'd juſtly to your muſe.
For though in chief theſe precepts are beſtow'd
On him who ſings an hero or a god;
To other themes their general uſe extend
And ſerves in different views to different ends.
Whether the lofty muſe with tragic rage
Would proudly ſtalk in buſkins on the ſtage;
Or in ſoft elegies our pity move,
And ſhow the youth in all the flames of love;
Or ſing the ſhepherd's woes in humble ſtrains,
And the low humours of contending ſwains:
Theſe faithful rules ſhall guide the bard along
In every meaſure, argument, and ſong.
Be ſure (whatever you propoſe to write)
Let the chief motive be your own delight,
And well-weigh'd choice;—a taſk enjoin'd refuſe,
Unleſs a monarch ſhould command your muſe.
(If we may hope thoſe golden times to ſee,
When bards become the care of majeſty!)
Free and ſpontaneous the ſmooth numbers glide,
Where choice determines, and our wills preſide;
But, at command, we toil with fruitleſs pain,
And drag th' involuntary load in vain.
Nor, at its birth, indulge your warm deſire,
On the firſt glimmering of the ſacred fire;
Defer the mighty taſk; and weigh your power
And every part in every view explore;
And let the theme in different proſpects roll
Deep in your thoughts, and grow into the ſoul.
But ere with ſails unfurl'd you fly away,
And cleave the boſom of the boundleſs ſea;
A fund of words and images prepare,
And lay the bright materials up with care,
Which at due time, occaſion may produce,
All rang'd in order for the poet's uſe.
Some happy objects by mere chance are brought
From hidden cauſes to the wandering thought;
Which if once loſt, you labour long in vain
To catch th' ideal fugitives again.
Nor muſt I fail their conduct to extol,
Who, when they lay the baſis of the whole,
Explore the ancients with a watchful eye,
Lay all their charms and elegancies by,
Then to their uſe the precious ſpoils apply.
At firſt without the leaſt reſtraint compoſe,
And mould the future poem into proſe;
A full and proper ſeries to maintain,
And draw the juſt connection in a chain;
By ſtated bounds your progreſs to controul,
To join the parts, and regulate the whole.
And now 'tis time to ſpread the opening ſails
Wide to the wanton winds and flattering gales;
'Tis time we now preſcribe the genuine laws
To raiſe the beauteous fabric with applauſe;
But firſt ſome method requiſite appears
To form the boy, and mould his tender years.
In vain the bard the ſacred wreath purſues,
Unleſs train'd up and ſeaſon'd to the muſe.
Soon as the prattling innocent ſhall reach
To the firſt uſe and rudiments of ſpeech,
Ev'n then, by Helicon he ought to rove,
Ev'n then the tuneful nine ſhould win his love
By juſt degrees.—But make his guide your choice
For his chaſte phraſe and elegance of voice;
That he at firſt ſucceſsfully may teach
The methods, laws, and diſcipline of ſpeech;
Leſt the young charge, miſtaking right and wrong,
With vicious habits prejudice his tongue.
Habits, whoſe ſubtle ſeeds may mock your art,
And ſpread their roots and poiſon through his heart.
Whence none ſhall move me to approve the wretch,
Who wildly borne above the vulgar reach,
And big with vain pretences to impart
Vaſt ſhows of learning, and a depth of art,
For ſenſe th' impertinence of terms affords;
An idle cant of formidable words;
The pride of pedants, the delight of fools;
The vile diſgrace, and lumber of the ſchools:
In vain the circling youths, a blooming throng,
Dwell on th' eternal jargon of his tongue.
Deluded fools!—the ſame is their miſtake,
Who at the limpid ſtream their thirſt may ſlake,
Yet chooſe the tainted waters of the lake.
Let no ſuch peſt approach the blooming care,
Deprave his ſtyle, and violate his ear;
But far, oh far, to ſome remoter place.
Drive the vile wretch to teach a barbarous race.
Now to the muſe's ſtream the pupil bring,
To drink large draughts of the Pierian ſpring;
And from his birth the ſacred bard adore,
Nurſt by the nine, on Mincio's flowery ſhore;
And aſk the gods his numbers to inſpire,
With like invention, majeſty, and fire.
He reads Aſcanius' deeds with equal flame,
And longs with him to run at nobler game.
For youths of ages paſt he makes his moan,
And learns to pity years ſo like his own;
Which with too ſwift, and too ſevere a doom,
The fate of war had hurried to the tomb.

His eyes, for Pallas, and for Laufus, flow,
Mourn with their fires, and weep another's woe.
But when Uryalus, in all his charms,
Is fnatch'd by fate from his dear mother's arms,
And as he rolls in death, the purple flood
Streams out, and ftains his fnowy limbs with blood,
His foul the pangs of generous forrow pierce,
And a new tear fteals out at every verfe.
Meantime with bolder fteps the youth proceeds,
And the Greek poets in fucceffion reads;
Seafons to either tongue his tender ears;
Compares the heroes glorious characters;
Sees, how Æneas is himfelf alone,
The draught of Peleus' and Laertes' fon;
How, by the poet's art, in one, confpire
Ulyffes' conduct, and Achilles' fire.
But now, young bard, with ftrict attention hear,
And drink my precepts in at either ear;
Since mighty crowds of poets you may find,
Crowds of the Grecian and Auſonian kind,
Learn hence what bards to quit or to purfue,
To fhun the falfe, and to embrace the true;
Nor is it hard to cull each noble piece,
And point out every glorious fon of Greece;
Above whofe numbers Homer fits on high,
And fhines fupreme in diftant majefty;
Whom with a reverend eye the reft regard,
And owe their raptures to the fovereign bard;
Through him the god their panting fouls inſpires,
Swells every breaft, and warms with all his fires,
Bleft were the poets with the hollow'd rage,
Train'd up in that and the fucceeding age:
As to his time each poet nearer drew,
His fpreading fame in juft proportion grew,
By like degrees the next degenerate race
Sunk from the height of honour to difgrace.
And now the fame of Greece extinguifh'd lies,
Her ancient language with her glory dies.
Her baniſh'd princes mourn their raviſh'd crowns,
Driven from their old hereditary thrones;
Her drooping natives rove o'er worlds unknown,
And weep their woes in regions not their own;
She feels through all her ftates the dreadful blow,
And mourns the fury of a barbarous foe.
But when our bards brought o'er th' Aonian maids
From their own Helicon to Tyber's fhades;
When firft they fettled on Hefperia's plains,
Their numbers ran in rough unpoliſh'd ſtrains.
Void of the Grecian art their meafures flow'd;
Pleas'd the wild fatyrs, and the fylvan crowd.
Low fhrubs and lofty foreſts whilom rung,
With uncouth verfe, and antiquated fong;
Nor yet old Ennius fung in artlefs ſtrains,
Fights, arms, and hofts embattel'd on the plains,
Who firft aſpir'd to pluck the verdant crown
From Grecian heads and fix it on his own.
New wonders the fucceeding bards explore,
Which ſtept conceal'd in nature's womb before;
Her awful ſecrets the bold poet ſings,
And fets to view the principles of things;
Each part was fair, and beautiful the whole,
And every line was nectar to the ſoul.
By ſuch degrees the verſe, as ages roll'd,
Was ſtamp'd to form, and took the beauteous mould.
Auſonia's bards drew off from every part
The barbarous dregs, and civiliz'd the art.
Till, like the day, all ſhining and ſerene,
That drives the clouds, and clears the gloomy ſcene,
Refines the air, and brightens up the ſkies,
See the majeſtic head of Virgil riſe;
Phœbus' undoubted ſon!—who clears the ruſt
Of the rough ancients, and ſhakes off their duſt.
He on each line a nobler grace beſtow'd;
He thought, and ſpoke in every word a god.
To grace this mighty bard, ye muſes, bring
Your choiceſt flowers, and rifle all the ſpring;
See! how the Grecian bards, at diſtance thrown,
With reverence bow to this diſtinguiſh'd ſon;
Immortal ſounds his golden lines impart,
And nought can match his genius but his art.
Ev'n Greece turns pale, and trembles at his fame,
Which ſhades the luſtre of her Homer's name.
'Twas then Auſonia ſaw her language riſe
In all its ſtrength and glory to the ſkies;
Such glory never could ſhe boaſt before,
Nor could ſucceeding poets make it more.
From that bleſt period the poetic ſtate
Ran down the precipice of time and fate;
Degenerate ſouls ſucceed, a wretched train,
And her old fame at once drew back again.
One, to his genius truſts, in every part,
And ſcorns the rules and diſcipline of art.
While this, an empty tide of ſound affords,
And roars and thunders in a ſtorm of words.
Some, muſically dull, all methods try
To win the ear with ſweet ſtupidity;
Unruffled ſtrains for ſolid wit diſpenſe,
And give us numbers, when we call for ſenſe.
Till from th' Heſperian plains and Tyber chas'd,
From Rome the baniſh'd ſiſters fled at laſt;
Driven by the barbarous nations, who from far
Burſt into Latium with a tide of war.
Hence a vaſt change of their old manners ſprung;
The ſlaves were forc'd to ſpeak their maſters tongue;
No honours now were paid the ſacred muſe,
But all were bent on mercenary views;
Till Latium ſaw with joy th' Aonian train
By the great Medici reſtor'd again;
Th' illuſtrious Medici, of Tuſcan race,
Were born to cheriſh learning in diſgrace,
New life on every ſcience to beſtow,
And lull the cries of Europe in her woe.
With pity they beheld thoſe turns of fate,
And propp'd the ruins of the Grecian ſtate;
For leſt her wit ſhould periſh with her fame,
Their care ſupported ſtill the Argive name;
They call'd the aſpiring youths from diſtant parts,
To plant Auſonia with the Grecian arts;
To baſe in eaſe, and ſcience to diffuſe,
And to reſtore the empire of the muſe;
They ſent to ravag'd provinces with care,
And cities waſted by the rage of war,
To buy the ancients works of deathleſs fame,
And ſnatch th' immortal labours from the flame;
To which the foes had doom'd each glorious piece,
Who reign and lord it in the realms of Greece.
But we, ye gods, would raiſe a foreign lord,
As yet untaught to ſheath the civil ſword!)

Through many a period this has been the fate,
And this the liſt of the poetic ſtate.
Hence ſacred Virgil from thy ſoul adore
Above the reſt, and to thy utmoſt power
Purſue the glorious paths he ſtruck before.
If he ſupplies not all your wants, peruſe
Th' immortal ſtrains of each Auguſtan muſe.
There ſtop—nor raſhly ſeek to know the reſt,
But drive the dire ambition from thy breaſt,
Till riper years and judgment form thy thoughts
To mark their beauties, and avoid their faults.
Meantime, ye parents, with attention hear,
And thus adviſ'd exert your utmoſt care;
The blameleſs tutor from a thouſand chooſe,
One from his ſoul devoted to the muſe;
Who, pleas'd the tender pupil to improve,
Regards and loves him with a father's love.
Youth, of itſelf to numerous ills betray'd,
Requires a prop, and wants a foreign aid;
Unleſs a maſter's rules his mind incline
To love and cultivate the ſacred nine,
His thoughts a thouſand objects will employ,
And from Parnaſſus lead the wandering boy.
So truſts the ſwain the ſaplings to the earth;
So hopes in time to ſee the ſprouting birth;
Againſt the winds defenſive props he forms,
To ſhield the future foreſt from the ſtorms,
That each embolden'd plant at length may riſe
In verdant pride, and ſhoot into the ſkies.

But let the guide, if e'er he would improve
His charge, avoid his hate, and win his love;
Leſt in his rage wrong meaſures he may take,
And lothe the muſes for the teacher's ſake.
His ſoul then ſlacken'd from her native force,
Flags at the barrier, and forgets the courſe.
Nor by your anger be the youth o'er-aw'd,
But ſcorn th' ungenerous province of the rod;
Th' offended muſes never can ſuſtain
To hear the ſhriekings of the tender train,
But ſtung with grief and anguiſh hang behind;
Damp'd is the ſprightly vigour of the mind.
The boy no daring images inſpire,
No bright ideas ſet his thoughts on fire:
He drags on heavily th' ungrateful load,
Grown obſtinately dull, and ſeaſon'd to the rod.

I know a pedant, who to penance brought
His trembling pupils for the lighteſt fault;
His ſoul tranſported with a ſtorm of ire,
And all the rage that malice could inſpire:
By turns the torturing ſcourges we might hear,
By turns the ſhrieks of wretches ſtunn'd the ear.
Still to my mind the dire ideas riſe,
When rage unuſual ſparkled in his eyes;
When with the dreadful ſcourge inſulting loud,
The tyrant terrify'd the blooming crowd;
A boy the faireſt of the frighted train,
Who yet ſcarce gave the promiſe of a man,
Ah! diſmal object! idly paſt the day
In all the thoughtleſs innocence of play;
When lo! th' imperious wretch inflam'd with rage,
Fierce, and regardleſs of his tender age,
With fury ſtorms: the fault his clamours urge:
His hand high-waving brandiſhes the ſcourge.
Tears, vows, and prayers, the tyrant's ears aſſail;
In vain;—nor tears, nor vows, nor prayers prevail.
The trembling innocent from deep deſpair
Sicken'd, and breath'd his little ſoul in air.
For him, beneath his poplar, mourns the Po;
For him the tears of hoary Serius flow;
For him their tears the watery ſiſters ſhed,
Who lov'd him living, and deplor'd him dead.
The furious pedant, to reſtrain his rage,
Should mark th' example of a former age;
How fierce Alcides, warm'd with youthful ire,
Daſh'd on his maſter's front his vocal lyre.
But yet, ye youths, confeſs your maſters ſway,
And their commands implicitly obey.

Whoever then this arduous taſk purſues,
To form the bard, and cultivate the muſe,
Let him by ſofter means, and milder ways,
Warm his ambition with the love of praiſe;
Soon as his precepts ſhall engage his heart,
And fan the riſing fire in every part,
Light is the taſk;—for then the eager boy
Purſues the voluntary toil with joy;
Diſdains th' inglorious indolence of reſt,
And feeds th' immortal ardour in his breaſt.

And here the common practice of the ſchools
By known experience juſtifies my rules,
The youths in ſocial ſtudies to engage;
For then the rivals burn with generous rage,
Each ſoul the ſtings of emulation raiſe,
And every little boſom beats for praiſe.
But gifts propos'd will urge them beſt to riſe;
Fir'd at the glorious proſpect of a prize,
With noble jealouſy the blooming bard
Reads, labours, glows, and ſtrains for the reward;
Fears leſt his happy rival win the race,
And raiſe a triumph on his own diſgrace.

But when once ſeaſon'd to the rage divine,
He loves and courts the raptures of the nine;
The ſenſe of glory, and the love of fame,
Serve but as ſecond motives to the flame;
The thrilling pleaſure all the bard ſubdues,
Lock'd in the ſtrict embraces of the muſe.
See! when harſh parents force the youth to quit
For meaner arts the dear delights of wit,
If e'er the wonted warmth his thoughts inſpire,
And with paſt pleaſures ſet his mind on fire,
How from his ſoul he longs, but longs in vain,
To haunt the groves and purling ſtreams again!
No ſtern commands of parents can controul,
No force can check the fallies of his ſoul.
So burns the courſer ſeaſon'd to the rein,
That ſpies his females on a diſtant plain,
And longs to act his pleaſures o'er again.
Fir'd with remembrance of his joys, he bounds,
He foams and ſtrives to reach the well-known grounds;
The goring ſpurs his furious flames improve,
And rouſe within him all the rage of love;
Ply'd with the ſcourge he ſtill neglects his haſte,
And moves reluctant when he moves at laſt;
Reverts his eye, regrets the diſtant mare,
And neighs impatient for the dappled fair.

How oft the youth would long to change his fate,
Who, high advanc'd to all the pomp of ſtate,
With grief his gaudy load of grandeur views,
Loſt at too high a diſtance from the muſe!

How oft he ſighs by warbling ſtreams to rove,
And quit the palace for the ſhady grove!
How oft in Tybur's cold retreats to lye,
And gladly ſtoop to cheerful poverty,
Beneath the rigour of the wintery ſky!
But yet how many curſe their fruitleſs toil,
Who turn and cultivate a barren ſoil?
This, ere too late, the maſter may divine
By a ſure omen and a certain ſign;
The hopeful youth, determin'd by his choice,
Works without precept, and prevents advice,
Conſults his teacher, plies his taſk with joy,
And a quick ſenſe of glory fires the boy.
He challenges the crowd;—the conqueſt o'er,
He ſtruts away the victor of an hour.
Then vanquiſh'd in his turn; o'erwhelm'd with care,
He weeps, he pines, he ſickens with deſpair;
Nor looks his little rivals in the face,
But flies for ſhelter to ſome lonely place,
To mourn his ſhame, and cover his diſgrace.
His maſter's frowns impatient to ſuſtain,
Streight he returns, and wins the day again.
This is the boy his better fates deſign
To riſe the future darling of the nine;
For him the muſes weave the ſacred crown,
And bright Apollo claims him for his own.
Not the leaſt hope th' unactive youth can raiſe,
Dead to the proſpect and the ſenſe of praiſe;
Who your juſt rules with dull attention hears,
Nor lends his underſtanding, but his ears,
Reſolv'd his parts in indolence to keep,
He lulls his drowſy faculties aſleep;
The wretch your beſt endeavours will betray,
And the ſuperfluous care is thrown away.

I fear for him who ripens ere his prime;
For all productions there's a proper time.
Oh! may no apples in the ſpring appear,
Out-grow the ſeaſons, and prevent the year,
Nor mellow yet till autumn ſtains the vine,
And the full preſſes foam with floods of wine.
Torn from the parent-tree too ſoon, they lie
Trod down by every ſwain who paſſes by.

Nor ſhould the youth too ſtrictly be confin'd,
'Tis ſometimes proper to unbend his mind;
When tir'd with ſtudy, let him ſeek the plains,
And mark the homely humours of the ſwains;
Or pleas'd the toils to ſpread, or horns to wind,
Hunt the fleet mountain-goat or foreſt-hind.
Meantime the youth, impatient that the day
Should paſs in pleaſures unimprov'd away,
Steals from the ſhouting crowd, and quits the plains,
To ſing the ſylvan gods in rural ſtrains;
Or calls the muſes to Albunea's ſhades,
Courts and enjoys the viſionary maids.
So labour'd fields, with crops alternate bleſt,
By turns lie fallow, and indulge their reſt;
The ſwain contented bids the hungry ſoil
Enjoy a ſweet viciſſitude from toil,
Till earth renews her genial powers to bear,
And pays his prudence with a bounteous year.

On a ſtrict view your ſolid judgment frame,
Nor think that genius is in all the ſame:
How oft the youth, who wants the ſacred fire,
Fondly miſtakes for genius his deſire!
Courts the coy muſes, though rejected ſtill,
Nor nature ſeconds his miſguided will:
He ſtrives, he toils with unavailing care;
Nor heaven relents, nor Phœbus hears his prayer.
He with ſucceſs perhaps may plead a cauſe,
Shine at the bar, and flouriſh by the laws;
Perhaps diſcover Nature's ſecret ſprings,
And bring to light th' originals of things.
But ſometimes precept will ſuch force impart,
That nature bends beneath the power of art.

Beſides, 'tis no light province to remove
From the raſh boy the fiery pangs of love;
Till, ripe in years, and more confirm'd in age,
He learns to bear the flames of Cupid's rage;
Oft hidden fires on all his vitals prey,
Devour the youth, and melt his ſoul away.
By ſlow degrees;——blot out his golden dreams,
The tuneful poets, and Caſtalian ſtreams;
Struck with a ſecret wound, he weeps and ſighs;
In every thought the darling phantoms riſe;
The fancy'd charmer ſwims before his ſight,
His theme all day, his viſion all the night:
The wandering object takes up all his care,
Nor can he quit th' imaginary fair.
Meantime his fire, unconſcious of his pain,
Applies the temper'd medicines in vain;
The plague, ſo deeply rooted in his heart,
Mocks every ſlight attempt of Pæan's art;
The flames of Cupid all his breaſt inſpire,
And in the lover's quench the poet's fire.

When in his riper years, without controul,
The nine have took poſſeſſion of his ſoul;
When, ſacred to their god, the crown he wears,
To other authors let him bend his cares;
Conſult their ſtyles, examine every part,
And a new tincture take from every art.
Firſt ſtudy Tully's language and his ſenſe,
And range that boundleſs field of eloquence.
Tully, Rome's other glory, ſtill affords
The beſt expreſſions and the richeſt words;
As high o'er all in eloquence he ſtood,
As Rome o'er all the nations ſhe ſubdu'd.
Let him read men and manners, and explore
The ſite and diſtances from ſhore to ſhore;
Then let him travel, or to maps repair,
And ſee imagin'd cities riſing there;
Range with his eyes the earth's fictitious ball,
And paſs o'er figur'd worlds that grace the wall:
Some in the bloody ſhock of arms appear,
To paint the native horrors of the war;
Through charging hoſts they ruſh before they write,
And plunge in all the tumult of the fight.
But ſince our lives, contracted in their date
By ſcanty bounds and circumſcrib'd by fate,
Can never launch through all the depths of arts,
Ye youths, touch only the material parts;
There ſtop your labour, there your ſearch controul,
And draw from thence a notion of the whole.
From diſtant climes when the rich merchants come,
To bring the wealth of foreign regions home;
Content the friendly harbours to explore,
They only touch upon the winding ſhore;
Nor with vain labour wander up and down
To view the land, and viſit every town;

That would but call them from their former road,
To ſpend an age in baniſhment abroad;
Too late returning from the dangerous main,
To ſee their countries and their friends again.
Still be the ſacred poets your delight;
Read them by day, conſult them in the night;
From thoſe clear fountains all your raptures bring,
And draw for ever from the muſes' ſpring.
But let your ſubject in your boſom roll,
Claim every thought, and draw in all the ſoul.
That conſtant object to your mind diſplay,
Your toil all night, your labour all the day.
I need not all the rules of verſe diſcloſe,
Nor how their various meaſures to diſpoſe;
The tutor here with eaſe his charge may guide
To join the parts and numbers, or divide.
Now let him words to ſtated laws ſubmit,
Or yoke to meaſures, or reduce to feet;
Now let him ſoftly to himſelf rehearſe
His firſt attempts and rudiments of verſe;
Fix on thoſe rich expreſſions his regard,
To uſe made ſacred by ſome ancient bard;
Toſt by a different guſt of hopes and fears,
He begs of heaven an hundred eyes and ears.
Now here, now there, coy nature he purſues,
And takes one image in a thouſand views.
He waits the happy moment that affords
The nobleſt thoughts, and moſt expreſſive words;
He brooks no dull delay; admits no reſt;
A tide of paſſion ſtruggles in his breaſt;
Round his dark ſoul no clear ideas play,
The moſt familiar objects glide away.
All fix'd in thought, aſtoniſh'd he appears,
His ſoul examines, and conſults his ears;
And racks his faithleſs memory, to find
Some traces faintly ſketch'd upon his mind.
There he unlocks the glorious magazine,
And opens every faculty within;
Brings out with pride their intellectual ſpoils,
And with the noble treaſure crowns his toils;
And oft mere chance ſhall images diſplay,
That ſtrike his mind engag'd a different way.
Still he perſiſts; regrets no toil or pain,
And ſtill the taſk, he tried before in vain,
Plies with unweary'd diligence again.
For oft unmanageable thoughts appear,
That mock his labour, and elude his care;
Th' impatient bard, with all his nerves apply'd,
Tries all the avenues on every ſide;
Reſolv'd and bent the precipice to gain;
Though yet he labours at the rock in vain;
By his own ſtrength and heaven, with conqueſt grac'd,
He wins th' important victory at laſt;
Stretch'd by his hands the vanquiſh'd monſter lies,
And the proud triumph lifts him to the ſkies.
But when ev'n chance and all his efforts fail,
Nor toils, nor vigilance, nor cares prevail;
His paſt attempts in vain the boy renews,
And waits the ſofter ſeaſons of the muſe;
He quits his work; throws by his fond deſires:
And from his taſk reluctantly retires.
Thus o'er the fields the ſwain purſues his road,
Till ſtopt at length by ſome impervious flood,
That from a mountain's brow, o'erchargd with rains,
Burſts in a thundering tide, and foams along the plains;
With horror chili'd, he traverſes the ſhore,
Sees the waves riſe, and hears the torrent roar;
Then griev'd returns; or waits with vain delay,
Till the tumultuous deluge rolls away.
But in no Iliad let the youth engage
His tender years, and unexperienc'd age:
Let him by juſt degrees and ſteps proceed,
Sing with the ſwains, and tune the tender reed:
He with ſucceſs an humbler theme may ply,
And, Virgil-like, immortalize a fly:
Or ſing the mice, their battles and attacks,
Againſt the croaking natives of the lakes:
Or with what art her toils the ſpider ſets,
And ſpins her filmy entrails into nets.
And here embrace, ye teachers, this advice;
Not to be too inquiſitively nice,
But, till the ſoul enlarg'd in ſtrength appears,
Indulge the boy, and ſpare his tender years;
Till, to ripe judgment and experience brought,
Himſelf diſcerns and bluſhes at a fault;
For if the critic's eyes too ſtrictly pierce,
To point each blemiſh out in every verſe,
Void of all hope the ſtripling may depart,
And turn his ſtudies to another art.
But if reſolv'd his darling faults to ſee,
A youth of genius ſhould apply to me,
And court my elder judgment to peruſe
Th' imperfect labours of his infant muſe;
I ſhould not ſcruple, with a candid eye,
To read and praiſe his poem to the ſky;
With ſeeming rapture on each line to pauſe,
And dwell on each expreſſion with applauſe.
But when my praiſes had inflam'd his mind,
If ſome lame verſe limp'd ſlowly up behind;
One, that himſelf, unconſcious, had not found,
By numbers charm'd, and led away by ſound,
I ſhould not fear to miniſter a prop,
And give him ſtronger feet to keep it up;
Teach it to run along more firm and ſure;
Nor would I ſhow the wound before the cure.
For what remains; the poet I enjoin
To form no glorious ſcheme, no great deſign,
Till free from buſineſs he retires alone,
And flies the giddy tumult of the town;
Seeks rural pleaſures, and enjoys the glades,
And courts the thoughtful ſilence of the ſhades,
Where the fair Dryads haunt their native woods,
With all the orders of the ſylvan gods.
Here in their ſoft retreats the poets lie,
Serene, and bleſt with cheerful poverty;
No guilty ſchemes of wealth their ſouls moleſt,
No cares, no proſpects, diſcompoſe their reſt;
No ſchemes of grandeur glitter in their view;
Here they the joys of innocence purſue,
And taſte the pleaſures of the happy few.
From a rock's entrails the barbarian ſprung,
Who dares to violate the ſacred throng
By deeds or words—The wretch by fury driven,
Affaults the darling colony of heaven! [eyes
Some have look'd down, we know, with ſcornful
On the bright muſe who taught them how to riſe,

And paid, when rais'd to grandeur, no regard
From that high ſtation to the ſacred bard.
Uninjur'd, mortals, let the poets lie,
Or dread th' impending vengeance of the ſky;
The gods ſtill liſten'd to their conſtant prayer,
And made the poets their peculiar care.
They, with contempt, on fortune's gift look down,
And laugh at kings who wear an envy'd crown.
Rais'd and tranſported by their ſoaring mind,
From their proud eminence they view mankind
Loſt in a cloud; they ſee them toil below,
All buſy to promote their common woe;
Of guilt unconſcious, with a ſteady ſoul,
They ſee the lightnings flaſh, and hear the thunders roll.
When, girt with terrors, heaven's Almighty Sire
Launches his triple bolts and forky fire,
When o'er high towers the red deſtroyer plays,
And ſtrikes the mountains with the pointed blaze;
Safe in their innocence, like gods, they riſe,
And lift their ſouls ſerenely to the ſkies.
Fly, ye profane;—the ſacred nine were given
To bleſs theſe lower worlds by bounteous heaven:
Of old, Prometheus, from the realms above,
Brought down theſe daughters of all-mighty Jove,
When to his native earth the robber came,
Charg'd with the plunder of ethereal flame.
As due compaſſion touch'd his generous mind,
To ſee the ſavage ſtate of human kind;
When, led to range at large the bright abodes,
And ſhare th' ambroſial banquets of the gods;
In many a whirl he ſaw Olympus driven,
And heard th' eternal harmony of heaven. [ears
Turn'd round and round the concert charm'd his
With all the muſic of the dancing ſpheres;
The ſacred nine his wondering eyes behold,
As each her orb in juſt diviſions roll'd;
The thief beholds them with ambitious eyes,
And, bent on fraud, he meditates the prize;
A prize! the nobleſt gift he could beſtow
(Next to the fire) on human race below;
At length th' immortals reconcil'd reſign'd
The fair celeſtial ſiſters to mankind;
Though bound to Caucaſus with ſolid chains,
Th' aſpiring robber groan'd in endleſs pains;
By which deterr'd, for ages lay ſupine
The race of mortals, nor invok'd the nine:
Till heaven in verſe ſhow'd man his future ſtate,
And open'd every diſtant ſcene of fate.
Firſt, the great father of the gods above
Sung in Dedona and the Libyan grove;
Next, to th' inquiring nations Themis gave,
Her ſacred anſwers from the Phocian cave;
Then Phœbus warn'd them from the Delphic dome
Of future time, and ages yet to come;
And reverend Faunus utter'd truths divine
To the firſt founders of the Latian line.
Next the great race of hallow'd prophets came,
With them the Sibylls of immortal fame,
Inſpir'd with all the god; who rapt on high
With more than mortal rage unbounded fly,
And range the dark receſſes of the ſky.
Next, at their feaſts, the people ſung their lays
(The ſame their prophets ſung in former days);
Their theme an hero, and his deathleſs praiſe.

What has to man of nobler worth been given,
Than this the heſt and greateſt boon of heaven?
Whatever power the glorious gift beſtow'd,
We trace the certain footſteps of a God;
By thee inſpir'd, the daring poet flies,
His ſoul mounts up, and towers above the ſkies;
Thou art the ſource of pleaſure, and we ſee
No joy, no tranſport, when debarr'd of thee;
Thy tuneful deity the feather'd throng
Confeſs in all the meaſures of their ſong.
Thy great commands the ſavages obey,
And every ſilent native of the ſea:
Led by thy voice, the ſtarting rocks advance,
And liſtening foreſts mingle in the dance.
On thy ſweet notes the damn'd rejoice to dwell,
Thy ſtrains ſuſpended all the din of hell;
Lull'd by thy ſound, the furies rag'd no more,
And hell's infernal porter ceas'd to roar.
Thy powers exalt us to the realms above,
To feaſt with gods, and ſit the gueſts of Jove:
Thy preſence ſoftens anguiſh, woe, and ſtrife,
And reconciles us to the load of life;
Hail, thou bright comfort of theſe low abodes,
Thou joy of men, and darling of the gods.
As prieſt and poet, in theſe humble lays,
I boldly labour to reſound thy praiſe;
To hang thy ſhrines, this gift I bring along,
And to thy altars guide the tender throng.

BOOK II.

Proceed, ye Nine, deſcended from above,
Ye tuneful daughters of almighty Jove;
To teach the future age, I haſten on,
And open every ſource of Helicon.
Your prieſt and bard with rage divine inſpire,
While to your ſhrine I lead the blooming choir.
Hard was the way, and dubious, which we trod,
Now ſhow, ye goddeſſes, a ſurer road;
Point out thoſe paths, which you can find alone,
To all the world but to yourſelves unknown;
Lo! all th' Heſperian youths with me implore
Your ſofter influence, and propitious power,
Who, rang'd beneath my banners, boldly tread
Thoſe arduous tracks to reach your mountain's head.
New rules 'tis now my province to impart;
Firſt to invent, and then diſpoſe with art;
Each a laborious taſk: but they who ſhare
Heaven's kinder bounty, and peculiar care,
A glorious train of images may find,
Preventing hope, and crowding on the mind.
The other taſk, to ſettle every part,
Depends on judgment, and the powers of art;
From whence in chief the poet hopes to raiſe
His future glory, and immortal praiſe.
This as a rule the nobleſt bards eſteem,
To touch at firſt in general on the theme;
To hint at all the ſubject in a line;
And draw in miniature the whole deſign.
Nor in themſelves confide; but next implore
The timely aid of ſome celeſtial power;
To guide your labours, and point out your road,
Chooſe, as you pleaſe, your tutelary god;
But ſtill invoke ſome guardian deity,
Some power, to look auſpicious from the ſky:

To nothing great ſhould mortals bend their care,
Till Jove be ſolemnly addreſt in prayer.
'Tis not enough to call for aid divine,
And court but once the favour of the Nine;
When objects riſe, that mock your toil and pain,
Above the labour and the reach of man;
Then you may ſupplicate the bleſt abodes,
And aſk the friendly ſuccour of the gods.
Shock not your reader, nor begin too fierce,
Nor ſwell and bluſter in a pomp of verſe;
At firſt all needleſs ornament remove,
To ſhun his prejudice, and win his love.
At firſt, you find moſt favour and ſucceſs
In plain expreſſion, and a modeſt dreſs.
For if too arrogant you vaunt your might,
You fall with greater ſcandal in the fight,
When on the niceſt point your fortune ſtands,
And all your courage all your ſtrength demands.
With gradual flights ſurpriſe us as we read;
And let more glorious images ſucceed
To wake our ſouls; to kindle our deſire
Still to read on, and fan the riſing fire.
But ne'er the ſubject of your work proclaim
In its own colours, and its genuine name;
Let it by diſtant tokens be convey'd,
And wrapt in other words, and cover'd in their ſhade.
At laſt the ſubject from the friendly ſhrowd
Burſts out, and ſhines the brighter from the cloud;
Then the diſſolving darkneſs breaks away,
And every object glares in open day.
Thus great * Ulyſſes' toils were I to chooſe,
For the main theme that ſhould employ my muſe;
By his long labours of immortal fame,
Should ſhine my hero, but conceal his name;
As one, who loſt at ſea, had nations ſeen, [men,
And mark'd their towns, their manners, and their
Since Troy was levell'd to the duſt by Greece;
Till a few lines epitomiz'd the piece.
But ſtudy now what order to maintain,
To link the work in one continued chain,
That, when the muſe diſplays her artful ſcheme,
And at the proper time unfolds the theme;
Each part may find its own determin'd place,
Laid out with method, and diſpos'd with grace;
That to the deſtin'd ſcope the piece may tend,
And keep one conſtant tenor to the end.
Firſt to ſurpriſing novelties inclin'd,
The bards ſome unexpected objects find,
To wake attention, and ſuſpend the mind.
A cold, dull order bravely they forſake;
Fix'd and reſolv'd the winding way to take,
They nobly deviate from the beaten track.
The poet marks th' occaſion, as he ſings,
To launch out boldly from the midſt of things,
Where ſome diſtinguiſh'd incident he views,
Some ſhining action that deſerves a muſe.
Thence by degrees the wondering reader brings
To trace the ſubject backward to its ſprings,
Leſt at his entrance he ſhould idly ſtay,
Shock'd at his toil, and dubious of his way;
For when ſet down ſo near the promis'd goal,
The flattering proſpect tempts and fires his ſoul;

Already paſt the treacherous bounds appear,
Then moſt at diſtance, when they ſeem ſo near;
Far from his graſp the fleeting harbour flies,
Courts his purſuit, but mocks his dazzled eyes;
The promis'd region he with joy had ſpy'd,
Vaſt tracts of oceans from his reach divide;
Still muſt he backward ſteer his lengthen'd way,
And plough a wide interminable ſea.
No ſkilful poet would his muſe employ,
From Paris' vote to trace the fall of Troy,
Nor every deed of Hector to relate,
While his ſtrong arm ſuſpended Ilion's fate;
Work for ſome annaliſt! ſome heavy fool,
Correctly dry, and regularly dull.
Beſt near the † end thoſe dreadful ſcenes appear;
Wake then, and rouſe the furies of the war.
But for his raviſh'd fair at firſt engage
Peleides' ſoul in unrelenting rage.
Be this the cauſe that every Phrygian flood
Swells with red waves, and rolls a tide of blood;
That Xanthus' urns a purple deluge pour,
And the deep trenches float with human gore.
Nor former deeds in ſilence muſt we loſe,
The league at Aulis, and the mutual vows,
The Spartan raging for his raviſh'd ſpouſe;
The thouſand ſhips; the woes which Ilion bore
From Greece, for nine revolving years before.
This ‡ rule with judgment ſhould the bard maintain,
Who brings Laërtes' wandering ſon again,
From burning Ilion to his native reign.
Let him not launch from Ida's ſtrand his ſhips,
With his attendant friends into the deeps;
Nor ſtay to vanquiſh the Ciconian hoſt;
But let him firſt appear (his comrades loſt)
With fair Calypſo on th' Ogygian coaſt.
From thence, a world of toils and dangers paſt,
Waft him to rich Phæacia's realms at laſt,
There at the feaſt his wanderings to relate,
His friends dire change; his own relentleſs fate.
But if the bard of former actions ſings,
He wiſely draws from thoſe remoter ſprings
The preſent order, and the courſe of things.
As yet unfold th' event on no pretence,
'Tis your chief taſk to keep us in ſuſpenſe.
Nor tell what § preſents Atreus' ſon prepares,
To reconcile Achilles to the wars;
Or ‖ by what god's auſpicious conduct led,
From Polyphemus' den Ulyſſes fled.
Pleas'd with the toil, and on the proſpect bent,
Our ſouls leap forward to the wiſh'd event.
No call of nature can our ſearch reſtrain,
And ſleep, and thirſt, and hunger, plead in vain.
Glad we purſue the labour we embrac'd,
And leave reluctant, when we leave at laſt.
See! how the bard triumphant in his art,
Sports with our paſſions, and commands the heart;
Now here, now there, he turns the varying ſong;
And draws at will the captive ſoul along;

Rack'd with uncertain hints, in every ſenſe
We feel the lengthen'd anguiſh of ſuſpenſe.
When * Homer once has promis'd to rehearſe
Bold Paris' fight, in many a ſounding verſe,
He ſoon perceives his reader's warm deſire
Wrapt in the event, and all his ſoul on fire;
The poet then contrives ſome ſpecious ſtay,
Before he tells the fortune of the day.
Till Helen to the king and elders ſhow,
From ſome tall tower, the leaders of the foe,
And name the heroes in the fields below.
† When chaſte Penelope, to gain her end,
Invites her ſuitors the tough bow to bend;
(Her nuptial bed the victor's promis'd prize)
With what addreſs her various arts ſhe plies!
Skill'd in delays, and politically ſlow
To ſearch her treaſures for her hero's bow.
None lead the reader in the dark along,
To the laſt goal that terminates the ſong;
Sometimes th' event muſt glance upon the ſight,
Not glare in day, nor wholly ſink in night.
'Tis thus Anchiſes to his ſon relates
The various ſeries of his future fates;
For this the ‡ prophets ſee, on Tyber's ſhore,
Wars, horrid wars, and Latium red with gore,
A new Achilles riſing to deſtroy
With boundleſs rage the poor remains of Troy;
But raiſe his mind with proſpects of ſucceſs,
And give the promiſe of a laſting peace.
This knew the hero when he ſought the plains,
Sprung § from his ſhips, and charg'd the embattled ſwains,
Hew'd down the Latian troops with matchleſs might,
(The firſt, auſpicious omen of the fight)
And at one blow gigantic Theron kill'd,
Bold, but in vain, and foremoſt of the field;
Thus too ‖ Patroclus with his lateſt breath
Foretold his unregarding victor's death:
His parting ſoul anticipates the blow,
That waits brave Hector from a greater foe.
Thou too, poor Turnus, juſt before thy doom,
Could'ſt read thy end, and antedate a tomb,
When o'er thy head the baleful fury flew,
And in dire omens ſet thy fate to view:
A bird obſcene, ſhe flutter'd o'er the field,
And ſcream'd thy death, and beat thy ſounding ſhield.
For lo! the time, the fatal time is come,
Charg'd with thy death, and heavy with thy doom,
When Turnus, though in vain, ſhall rue the day;
Shall curſe the golden belt he bore away;
Shall wiſh too late young Pallas' ſpoils unſought,
And mourn the conqueſt he ſo dearly bought.
Th' event ſhould glimmer through its gloomy ſhrowd,
Though yet confus'd, and ſtruggling in the cloud.
So, to the traveller, as he journies on
To reach the walls of ſome far diſtant town,
If, high in air, the dubious turrets riſe,
Peep o'er the hills, and dance before his eyes;

Pleas'd the refreſhing proſpect to ſurvey,
Each ſtride he lengthens, and beguiles the way.
More pleas'd (the tempting ſcene in view) to go,
Than penſively to walk the gloomy vales below.
Unleſs the theme within your boſom roll,
Work in each thought, and run through all the ſoul;
Unleſs you alter with inceſſant pain,
Pull down, and build the fabric o'er again;
In vain, when rival-wits your wonder raiſe,
You'll ſtrive to match thoſe beauties which you praiſe.
To one juſt ſcope with fixt deſign go on!
Let ſovereign reaſon dictate from her throne,
By what determin'd methods to advance,
But never truſt to arbitrary chance.
Where chance preſides, all objects wildly join'd,
Crowd on the reader, and diſtract his mind;
From theme to theme unwilling is he toſt,
And in the dark variety is loſt.
You ſee ſome bards, who bold excurſions make
In long digreſſions from the beaten track;
And paint a wild unneceſſary throng
Of things and objects foreign to the ſong;
For new deſcriptions from the road depart,
Devoid of order, diſcipline, and art.
So, many an anxious toil and danger paſt,
Some wretch returns from baniſhment at laſt;
With fond delay to range the ſhady wood,
Now here, now there, he wanders from the road,
From field to field, from ſtream to ſtream he roves,
And courts the cooling ſhelter of the groves.
For why ſhould Homer * deck the gorgeous car,
When our rais'd ſouls are eager for the war:
Or dwell on every wheel, when loud alarms,
And Mars in thunder calls the hoſts to arms?
When with his heroes we ſome daſtard † find,
Of a vile aſpect, and malignant mind;
His awkward figure is not worth our care;
His monſtrous length of head, or want of hair,
Not, though he goes with mountain ſhoulders by,
Short of a foot, or blinking in an eye.
Such trivial objects call us off too long
From the main drift and tenor of the ſong.
Drances ‡ appears a juſter character,
In council bold, but cautious in the war;
Factious and loud the liſtening throng he draws,
And ſwells with wealth and popular applauſe;
But, what in our's would never find a place,
The bold Greek language may admit with grace.
Why ſhould I here the ſtratagems recite,
And the low tricks of every little wit?
Some out of time their ſtock of knowledge boaſt,
Till in the pedant all the bard is loſt.
Such without care their uſeleſs lumber place;
One black, confus'd, and undigeſted maſs,
With a wild heap encumbers every part,
Nor rang'd with grace, nor methodis'd with art.
But then in chief, when things abſtruſe they teach,
Themes too abſtracted for the vulgar reach;

The hidden nature of the deities;
The secret laws and motions of the skies;
Or from what dark original began
The fiery soul, and kindled up the man;
Oft they in odious instances engage,
And for examples ransack every age,
With every realm; no hero will they pass,
But act against the rules of time and place.
Avoid, ye youths, these practices; nor raise
Your swelling souls to such a thirst of praise.
Some bards of eminence there are, we own,
Who sing sometimes the journies of the sun,
The rising stars, and labours of the moon:
What impulse bids the ocean rise and fall;
What motions shake and rock the trembling ball.
Though foreign subjects had engag'd their care,
The rage, the din and thunder of the war,
Through the loud field; the genius of the earth;
Or rules to raise the vegetable birth:
Yet 'tis but seldom, and when time and place
Require the thing, and reconcile to grace.
Those foreign objects necessary seem,
And flow, to all appearance, from the theme;
With so much art so well conceal'd they please,
When wrought with skill, and introduc'd with ease.
Should not * Anchises, such occasion shown,
Resolve the questions of his godlike son?
If souls depriv'd of heaven's fair light repair
Once more to day, and breathe the vital air?
Or if from high Olympus first they came,
Inspir'd with portions of ethereal flame,
Though here encumber'd with the mortal frame?
Tire not too long one subject when you write,
For 'tis variety that gives delight;
But when to that variety inclin'd,
You seek new objects to relieve the mind,
Be sure let nothing forc'd or labour'd seem,
But watch your time, and steal from off your theme.
Conceal with care your longing to depart,
For art's chief pride is still to cover art.
So † Mulciber, in future ages skill'd,
Engrav'd Rome's glories on Æneas' shield,
On the bright orb her future fame enroll'd,
And with her triumphs charg'd the rising gold;
Here figur'd fights the blazing round adorn,
There his long line of heroes yet unborn.
But if a ‡ poet of Ausonian birth
Describes the various kingdoms of the earth,
Wide interspers't; the Medes, or swarthy Moors;
The different natures of their soils explores,
And paints the trees that bloom on India's shores:
On his own land he looks with partial eyes,
And lifts the fair Hesperia to the skies;
To all the fair Hesperia he prefers,
And makes the woods of Bactria yield to her's,
With proud Panchaia; though her groves she boasts,
And breathes a cloud of incense from her coasts.

Hear then, ye generous youths, on this regard
I should not blame the conduct of the bard,
Who in soft numbers, and a flowing strain,
Relieves and reconciles our ears again.
When I the various implements had sung
That to the fields, and rural trade belong,
In sweet harmonious measures would I tell
How * nature mourn'd when the great Cæsar fell.
When Bacchus' curling vines had grac'd my lays,
The rural pleasures † next should share my praise.
The labour ended, and complete the whole,
Some bards with pleasure wander round the goal,
The flights and sallies of the muse prolong,
And add new beauties to the finish'd song;
Pleas'd with th' excursion of the charming strain,
We strive to quit the work, but strive in vain.
Thus, were the bees the subject of my muse,
Their laws, their natures, and celestial dews;
Poor ‡ Aristæus should his fate disclose,
His mother's counsel should assuage his woes;
Old Proteus here should struggle in his chain,
There in soft verse the Thracian bard complain
As Philomela on a popular bough
Bewails her young, melodious in her woe).
Pangæan steeps his sorrows should return,
And vocal Thrace with Rhodope should mourn;
Hebrus should roll low-murmuring to the deep,
And barbarous nations wonder why they weep.
Thus too the poets, who the names declare
Of kings and nations gathering to the war,
Sometimes diversify the strain, and sing
The wondrous change of the § Ligurian king.
While for his Phaëton his sorrows flow,
And his harmonious strains beguile his woe,
O'er all the man the snowy feathers rise,
And in a tuneful swan he mounts the skies.
Thus too ‖ Hippolitus, by Dian's care
And Pæan's art, returns to upper air.
The bards now paint the arms their heroes wield,
And each bold figure on the glittering shield.
Great ¶ Aventinus, great Alcides' son,
Wore the proud trophy which his father won;
An hundred serpents o'er the buckler roll'd,
And Hydra hiss'd from all her heads in gold.
Now blooming Tempe's cool retreats they sing,
And now with flowery beauties paint the spring.
Now with a sylvan scene the floods they hide;
Or teach the fam'd Eridanus to glide,
Or sport on fabled Achelous' side.
Or hoary Nereus' numerous race display,
The hundred azure sisters of the sea.
With them the nymphs that haunt their native woods,
And the long orders of the Sylvan gods.
With gay descriptions sprinkle here and there
Some grave instructive sentences with care,
That touch on life, some moral good pursue,
And give us virtue in a transient view;

Rules, which the future ſire may make his own,
And point the golden precepts to his ſon.
Sometimes on little images to fall,
And thus illuſtrate mighty things by ſmall;
With due ſucceſs the licens'd poet dares,
When to the * ants the Phrygians he compares,
Who leaving Carthage, gather to the ſeas;
Or the laborious Tyrians to the † bees.
But ſwarming ‡ flies, offenſive animals,
That buz inceſſant o'er the ſmoking pails,
Are images too low, to paint the hoſts
That roll and blacken o'er Auſonia's coaſts.
The loſty muſe who ſung the Latian war,
Would think ſuch trivial things beneath her care.
How from his majeſty would Virgil fall,
If Turnus ſcarce repell'd from Ilion's wall,
Retiring grimly with a tardy pace,
Had e'er been figur'd by the patient § aſs!
Whom unregarded troops of boys ſurround,
While o'er his ſides their rattling ſtrokes reſound;
Slow he gives way, and crops the ſpringing grain,
Turns on each ſide, and ſtops to graze again.
In every point the thing is juſt, we know,
But then the image is itſelf too low:
For Turnus, ſprung from ſuch a glorious ſtrain,
The vile reſemblance would with ſcorn diſdain.
With better grace the ‖ lion may appear,
Who, ſingly impotent the crowd to dare,
Repel or ſtand their whole embody'd war,
Looks grimly back, and rolls his glaring eye,
Deſpairs to conquer, and diſdains to fly.
Since fictions are allow'd, be ſure, ye youths,
Your fictions wear at leaſt the air of truths.
When ¶ Glaucus meets Tydides on the plain,
Inflam'd with rage, and reeking from the ſlain;
Some think they could not paſs the time away,
In ſuch long narratives, and cool delay,
Amidſt the raging tumult of the day.
But yet we hear fierce Diomed relate
The crime of bold Lycurgus, and his fate;
And Glaucus talks of brave Bellerophon,
Doom'd for a lawleſs paſſion not his own;
Sets forth the hero's great exploits to view,
How the bold chief the dire Chimæra ſlew,
The Solymæan hoſt, and Amazonian crew.
For thoſe ſurpriſing fictions are deſign'd
With their ſweet falſhoods to delight the mind;
The bards expect no credit ſhould be given
To the bare lie, though authoriz'd by heaven,
Which oft with confidence they vent abroad,
Beneath the needful ſanction of a god.
'Twas thus the  roaſted heifers of the ſun
Spoke o'er the fire with accents not their own;
'Twas thus †† Achilles' ſteed his ſilence broke,
And ‡‡ Trojan ſhips in human voices ſpoke;

As wrought by heaven theſe wonders they relate,
All airy viſions of the ivory gate!
Speak things but once, if order be your care,
For more the cloy'd attention will not bear,
And tedious repetitions tire the ear.
In this we differ from the Grecian train,
Who tell * Atrides' viſions o'er again.
'Tis not enough with them we know the cauſe
Why great Achilles from the war withdraws,
Unleſs the † weeping hero, on the ſhore,
Tells his blue mother all we heard before.
So much on punctual niceties they ſtand,
That, when their kings diſpatch ſome high command,
All word for word, th' embaſſadors ‡ rehearſe
In the ſame tenor of unvaried verſe.
Not ſo did § Venulus from Arpi bring
The final anſwer of th' Ætolian king.
Let others labour on a vaſt deſign,
A leſs, but poliſh'd with due care, be thine.
To change its ſtructure, be your laſt delight;
Thus ſpend the day, and exerciſe the night,
Inceſſant in your toil. But if you chooſe
A larger field and ſubject for your muſe;
If ſcanty limits ſhould the theme confine,
Learn with juſt art to lengthen the deſign
Beyond its native bounds; the roving mind
A thouſand methods to this end may find;
Unnumber'd fictions may with truths be join'd.
Nature ſupplies a fund of matter ſtill;
Then cull th' rich variety at will.
See! how the bard calls down th' embattled gods,
All rang'd in factions, from their bright abodes;
Who, fir'd with mutual hate, their arms employ,
And in the field declare for Greece or Troy;
Till Jove convenes a council to aſſwage
Their riſing fury, and ſuſpend their rage;
Though the bleſt gods, remov'd from human eyes,
Live in immortal eaſe within the diſtant ſkies.
And now th' infernal realm his theme he makes,
The reign of Pluto, the Tartarean lakes,
The furies dreadful with their curling ſnakes.
He gathers omens from each bird that flies,
And ſigns from every wing that beats the ſkies.
He now deſcribes a banquet, where the gueſt
Prolongs with narratives the royal feaſt.
Or at the glorious hero's tomb we read
Of games ordain'd in honour of the dead.
And oft for mercies in old times diſplay'd,
To their own gods their annual rites are paid.
For monſtrous Python ſlain, their praiſes riſe,
And lift the fame of Phœbus to the ſkies.
In hymns Alcides' labours they reſound.
While Cacus lies extended on the ground,
Alternate ſing the labours of his hands,
Enjoin'd by fierce Euryſtheus' ſtern commands;
The den of Cacus crowns the grateful ſtrain,
Where the grim monſter breathes his flames in vain.

Mark how ſometimes the bard without control
Exerts his fire, and pours forth all his ſoul;
His lines ſo daring, and his words ſo ſtrong;
We ſee the ſubject figur'd in the ſong:
When with the winds old * Ocean he deforms,
Or paints the rage and horrors of the ſtorms;
Or drives on pointed rocks the burſting ſhips,
Toſt on the Euxine, or Sicilian deeps.
Or ſings the † plagues that blaſt the livid ſky,
When beaſts by herds, and men by nations die;
Or the fierce flames ‡ that Ætna's jaws expire,
Her melted rocks, and deluges of fire,
When from her mouth the burſting vapour flies,
And, charg'd with ruin, thunders to the ſkies;
While driſts of ſmoke in ſooty whirlwinds play,
And clouds of cinders ſtain the golden day.
See! as the poet ſounds the dire alarms,
Calls on the war, and ſets the hoſts in arms;
Squadrons on ſquadrons driven, confus'dly die;
Grim Mars in all his terrors ſtrikes the eye;
More than deſcription riſing to the ſight,
Preſents the real horrors of the fight;
A new creation ſeems our praiſe to claim;
(Hence Greece derives the ſacred § poet's name;)
The dreadful clang of claſhing arms we hear;
The agonizing groan, the fruitleſs prayer,
And ſhrieks of ſuppliants thicken on the ear.
Who, when he reads a ‖ city ſtorm'd, forbears
To feel her woes, and ſympathize in tears?
When o'er the palaces the flames aſpire
From wall to wall, and wrap the domes in fire?
The fire, with years and hoſtile rage oppreſt!
The ſtarting infant, clinging to the breaſt!
The tender mother runs, with piercing cries,
Through friends and foes, and ſhrieking rends the ſkies.
Dragg'd from the altar, the diſtracted fair
Beats her white breaſt, and tears her golden hair.
Here in thick crowds the vanquiſh'd fly away,
There the proud victors heap the wealthy prey;
With rage relentleſs ravage their abodes,
Nor ſpare the ſacred temples of the gods.
O'er the whole town they run with wild affright,
Tumultuous haſte, and violence of flight.
Why ſhould I mention how our ſouls aſpire,
Loſt in the raptures of the ſacred fire?
For ev'n the ſoul not always holds the ſame,
But knows at different times a different frame.
Whether with rolling ſeaſons ſhe complies,
Turns with the ſun, or changes with the ſkies;
Or through long toil, remiſſive of her fires,
Droops with the mortal frame her force inſpires;
Or that our minds alternately appear
Now bright with joy, and now o'ercaſt with care.
No!—but the gods, th' immortal gods, ſupply
The glorious fires; they ſpeak the deity.
Then bleſt is he who waits th' auſpicious nod,
The warmth divine, and preſence of the god;
Who his ſuſpended labours can reſtrain,
Till heaven's ſerene indulgence ſmiles again.
But ſtrive, on no pretence, againſt your power,
Till time brings back the voluntary hour.

Sometimes their verdant honours leave the woods,
And their dry urns defraud the thirſty floods;
Nor ſtill the rivers a full channel yield,
Nor ſpring with flowery beauties paints the field:
The bards no leſs ſuch fickle changes find,
Dampt is the noble ardour of the mind;
Their wonted toil her wearied powers refuſe;
Their ſouls grow ſlack and languid to the muſe,
Deaf to their call; their efforts are withſtood;
Round their cold hearts congeals the freezing blood.
You'd think the muſes fled; the god no more
Would fire the boſom where he dwelt before,
No more return!—how often, though in vain,
The poet would renew the wonted ſtrain!
Nor ſees the gods who thwart his fruitleſs care,
Nor angry heaven relentleſs to his prayer.
Some read the ancient bards, of deathleſs fame,
And from their raptures catch the noble flame
By juſt degrees; they feed the glowing vein,
And all th' immortal ardour burns again
In its full light and heat; the ſun's bright ray
Thus (when the clouds diſperſe) reſtores the day:
Whence ſhoot this ſudden flaſh that gilds the pole?
The god, the god comes ruſhing on his ſoul;
Fires with ethereal vigour every part,
Through every trembling limb he ſeems to dart,
Works in each vein, and ſwells his riſing heart.
Deep in his breaſt the heavenly tumult plays,
And ſets his mounting ſpirits on a blaze.
Nor can the raging flames themſelves contain,
For the whole god deſcends into the man.
He quits mortality, he knows no bounds,
But ſings inſpir'd in more than human ſounds.
Nor from his breaſt can ſhake th' immortal load,
But pants and raves, impatient of the god;
And rapt beyond himſelf, admires the force
That drives him on reluctant to the courſe.
He calls on Phœbus, by the god oppreſt,
Who breathes exceſſive ſpirit in his breaſt;
No force of thirſt or hunger can controul
The fierce, the ruling tranſport of his ſoul.
Oft in their ſleep, inſpir'd with rage divine,
Some bards enjoy the viſions of the Nine:
Viſions! themſelves with due applauſe may crown;
Viſions! that Phœbus or that Jove may own.
To ſuch an height the god exalts the flame,
And ſo unbounded is their thirſt of fame.
But here, ye youths, exert your timely care,
Nor truſt th' ungovernable rage too far;
Uſe not your fortune, nor unfurl your ſails,
Though ſoftly courted by the flattering gales,
Refuſe them ſtill, and call your judgment in,
While the fierce god exults and reigns within;
To reaſon's ſtandard be your thoughts confin'd,
Let judgment calm the tempeſt of the mind.
Indulge your heat with conduct, and reſtrain;
Learn when to draw, and when to give the rein.
But always wait till the warm raptures ceaſe,
And lull the tumults of the ſoul to peace;
Then, nor till then, examine ſtrictly o'er
What your wild ſallies might ſuggeſt before.
Be ſure, from nature never to depart;
To copy nature is the taſk of art.
The nobleſt poets own her ſovereign ſway,
And ever follow where ſhe leads the way.

* Æneid. Lib. I. † Ibid. Lib. III. v. 137.
‡ Ibid. Lib. III. v. 571. § Ἀπὸ τοῦ ποιεῖν.
‖ Vid. Æneid. Lib. II.

From her the different characters they trace,
That mark the human, or the savage race,
Each various and distinct; in every stage
They paint mankind; their humours, sex, and age;
They show what manners the slow sage become,
What the brisk youth in all his sprightly bloom.
In every word and sentiment explain,
How the proud monarch differs from the swain.
I nauseate all confounded characters,
Where young Telemachus too grave appears,
Or reverend Nestor acts beneath his years.
The poet suits his speeches, when he sings,
To proper persons, and the state of things;
On each their just distinctions are bestow'd,
To mark a male, a female, or a god.
Thus when in * heaven seditious tumults rise,
Amongst the radiant senate of the skies,
The sire of gods, and sovereign of mankind,
In a few words unfolds his sacred mind.
Not so fair Venus; who at large replies,
And pities Troy, and counts her miseries,
Woes undeserv'd: but with contention fir'd,
And with the spirit of revenge inspir'd,
Fierce Juno storms amidst the blest abodes,
And stuns with loud complaints the listening gods.
When youthful † Turnus the stern combat claims,
His rising heart is fill'd with martial flames;
Impell'd by rage, and bent to prove his might,
His soul springs forward, and prevents the fight;
Rous'd to revenge, his kindling spirits glow,
Confirm his challenge, and provoke the foe,
The fugitive of Troy.—But while his rage
And youthful courage prompts him to engage,
On Latium's king incumbent it appears,
Grown old in prudence, piety, and years,
To weigh events, and youthful heat assuage,
With the cold caution and the fears of age.
In Dido's various character is seen,
The furious lover and the gracious queen:
When Troy's fam'd chief, commanded from above,
Prepares to quit her kingdom, and her love;
She raves, she storms with unavailing care,
Grown wild with grief, and frantic with despair.
Through every street she flies, with anguish stung,
And broken accents flutter on her tongue;
Her words confus'd and interrupted flow,
Speak and expres the hurry of her woe.
How in this Dido is that Dido lost,
Who late receiv'd the Trojans on her coast,
And bade them banish grief, and share her throne,
Dismiss their fears, and think her realms their own.
Next the great orators consult, and thence
Draw all the moving turns of eloquence;
That ‡ Sinon may his Phrygian foes betray,
And lead the crowd, as fraud directs the way;
That wise †† Ulysses may the Greeks detain,
While Troy yet stood, from measuring back the main.
Need I name § Nestor, who could talk to peace,
With melting words, the factious kings of Greece?

Whose soft address their fury could controul,
Mould every passion, and subdue the soul!
These soothing arts to * Venus sure were known,
To beg immortal arms to grace her son;
Her injur'd spouse each thrilling word inspires,
With every pang of love to second her desires.
With nicest art the fair adultress draws
Her fond addresses from a distant cause;
And all her guileful accents are design'd
To catch his passions, and ensnare his mind.
'Tis hence the poet learns in every part
To bend the soul, and give with wondrous art
A thousand different motions to the heart.
Hence, as his subject gay or sad appears,
He claims our joy, or triumphs in our tears.
Who, when he sees how † Orpheus' sorrows flow,
Weeps not his tears, and answers woe for woe?
When he his dear Eurydice deplores
To the deaf rocks, and solitary shores;
With the soft harp the bard relieves his pain,
For thee, when morning dawns, prolongs the strain,
For thee, when Phœbus seeks the seas again.
Or when the young ‡ Euryalus is kill'd,
And rolls in death along the bloody field;
Like some fair flower beneath the share he lies,
His head declin'd, and drooping as he dies;
The reader's soul is touch'd with generous woe,
He longs to rush with Nisus on the foe;
He burns with friendly pity to the dead,
To raise the youth, and prop his sinking head;
And strives in vain to stop the gushing blood,
That stains his bosom with a purple flood.
But if the bard such images pursues,
That raise the blushes of the virgin-muse;
Let them be slightly touch'd, and ne'er expreſt,
Give but an hint, and let us guess the rest.
If Jove commands the gathering storms to rise,
And with deep thunders rends the vaulted skies,
To the same cave together may repair
To the Trojan § hero and the Tyrian fair.
The poet's modesty must add no more;
Enough, that earth had given the sign before;
The conscious æther was with flames o'erspread,
The nymphs ran shrieking round the mountain's head.
Nor let young Troilus, unhappy boy,
Meet fierce Achilles in the plains of Troy;
But show th' unequal youth's untimely fall,
To great Æneas on the Tyrian wall;
Supine and hanging from his empty car,
Dragg'd by his panting courſers through the war.
This, from our bright examples you may trace,
To write with judgment, decency, and grace;
From others learn invention to increase,
And search in chief the glorious sons of Greece;
For her bright treasures Argos' realms explore,
Bring home triumphant all her gather'd store,
And with her spoils enrich the Latian shore.
Nor is the glory of translation less,
To give the Grecian bards a Roman dress.

If Phœbus' gracious ſmiles the labour crown,
Than if ſome new invention were your own.
Mincio's and Manto's glorious ſon behold,
Th' immortal Virgil, ſheath'd in foreign gold,
Shines out unſham'd, and towers above the reſt,
In the rich ſpoils of godlike Homer dreſt.
Let Greece in triumph boaſt that ſhe imparts
To Latium's conquering realms her glorious arts:
While Latium's ſons improve her beſt deſigns,
Till by degrees each poliſh'd labour ſhines,
While Rome advances now in arts, as far
Above all cities, as of old in war.
Ye gods of Rome, ye guardian deities,
Who lift our nation's glory to the ſkies;
And thou, Apollo, the great ſource of Troy,
Let Rome at leaſt this ſingle palm enjoy,
To ſhine in arts ſupreme, as once in power,
And teach the nations ſhe ſubdued before;
Since diſcord all Auſonia's kings alarms,
And clouds the ancient glories of her arms.
In our own breaſts we ſheath the civil ſword,
Our country naked to a foreign lord;
Which lately, proſtrate, ſtarted from deſpair, [war;
Burn'd with new hopes, and arm'd her hands for
But arm'd in vain;—th' inexorable hate
Of envious fortune call'd her to her fate,
Inſatiate in her rage; her frowns oppoſe
The Latian fame, and woes are heap'd on woes.
Our dread alarms each foreign monarch took,
Through all their tribes the diſtant nations ſhook;
To earth's laſt bounds the fame of Leo runs,
Nile heard, and Indus trembled for his ſons.
Arabia heard the Medicean line,
The firſt of men, and ſprung from race divine.
The ſovereign prieſt, and mitred king, appears
With his lov'd Julius join'd, who kindly ſhares
The reins of empire, and the public cares.
To break their country's chains, the generous pair
Concert their ſchemes, and meditate the war.
On Leo Europe's monarchs turn their eyes,
On him alone the weſtern world relies;
And each bold chief attends his dread alarms,
While the proud creſcent fades before his arms.
High on his ſplendid car, immortal Rome,
Thine eyes had ſeen the holy warrior come,
Lord of the vanquiſh'd world, in triumph home.
Thy ſtreams, old Tyber, ſwell'd with conſcious pride,
Had borne thy kindred warrior down thy tide;
While, crowded up in heaps, thy waves admire
The captive nations, and their ſtrange attire;
Behind his wheels ſhould march a numerous train
Of ſcepter'd ſlaves, reluctant to the chain,
Forget their haughty threats, and boaſt in vain.
Though the proud foe, of Jury's realm poſſeſt,
Has ſpread his wide dominion through the eaſt;
Sees his dread ſtandard there at large unfurl'd,
And graſps in thought the empire of the world;
And now (ye gods) increas'd in barbarous power,
His armies hover o'er th' Heſperian ſhore.
To ſee the paſſing pomp, the raviſh'd throng
Through every ſtreet ſhould flow in tides along;
The ſacred father, as the numbers roll'd,
Should his dear citizens again behold,
High o'er the ſhouting crowds enthron'd in gold;
Should ſhow the trophies of his glorious toils,
And hang the ſhrines with conſecrated ſpoils.
Piles of barbaric gold ſhould glitter there,
The wealth of kingdoms, and the pomp of war:
But, by your crime, ye gods, our hopes are croſt,
And thoſe imaginary triumphs loſt;
Interr'd with Leo, in one fatal hour,
Our proſpects periſh'd, as they liv'd before.

BOOK III.

What ſtyle, what language, ſuits the poet's lays,
To claim Apollo's and the muſes' praiſe,
I now unfold; to this laſt bound I tend,
And ſee my promis'd labours at an end.
Firſt then with care a juſt expreſſion chooſe,
Led by the kind indulgence of the muſe,
To dreſs up every ſubject when you write,
And ſet all objects in a proper light.
But leſt the diſtant proſpect of the goal
Should damp your vigour, and your ſtrength controul,
Rouſe every power, and call forth all the ſoul.
See! how the nine the panting youth invite,
With one loud voice to reach Parnaſſus' height;
See! how they hold aloft th' immortal crown,
To urge the courſe, and call the victor on;
See! from the clouds each laviſh goddeſs pours
Full o'er thy head a ſudden ſpring of flowers,
And roſes fall in odoriferous ſhowers;
Celeſtial ſcents in balmy breezes fly,
And ſhed ambroſial ſpirits from the ſky.
In chief avoid obſcurity, nor ſhroud
Your thoughts and dark conceptions in a cloud;
For * ſome, we know, affect to ſhun the light,
Loſt in forc'd figures, and involv'd in night,
Studious and bent to leave the common way,
They ſkulk in darkneſs, and abhor the day.
Oh! may the ſacred nine inſpire my lays
To ſhine with pride in their own native rays;
For this we need not importune the ſkies,
In our own power and will the bleſſing lies.
Expreſſion, boundleſs in extent, diſplays
A thouſand forms, a thouſand ſeveral ways;
In different garbs from different quarters brought,
It makes unnumber'd dreſſes for a thought;
Such vaſt varieties of hues we find
To paint conception, and unfold the mind!
If e'er you toil, but toil without ſucceſs,
To give your images a ſhining dreſs,
Quit your purſuit, and chooſe a different way,
Till, breaking forth, the voluntary ray
Cuts the thick darkneſs, and lets down the day.
Since then a thouſand forms you may purſue,
A thouſand figures riſing to the view,
Unleſs confin'd and ſtrengthen'd in your ſcheme,
With the ſhort limits of a ſcanty theme,
From theſe to thoſe with boundleſs freedom paſs,
And to each image give a different face.
The readers hence a wond'rous pleaſure find,
That charms the ear, and captivates the mind;
In this the laws of nature we obey,
And act as her example points the way,

* Perſius and Lycophron.

Which has on every different ſpecies thrown
A ſhape diſtinct and figure of its own;
Man differs from the beaſt that haunts the woods,
The bird from every native of the floods.
See how the poet baniſhes with grace
A native term to give a * ſtranger place!
From different images with juſt ſucceſs
He clothes his matter in the borrow'd dreſs:
The borrow'd dreſs the things themſelves admire,
And wonder whence they drew the ſtrange attire;
Proud of their raviſh'd ſpoils, they now diſclaim
Their former colour, and their genuine name,
And, in another garb more beauteous grown,
Preſer the foreign habit to their own.
Oft, as he paints a battle on the plain,
The battle's imag'd by the roaring main;
Now he the fight a fiery deluge names,
That pours along the fields a flood of flames;
In airy conflict now the winds appear,
Alarm the deeps, and wage the ſtormy war;
To the fierce ſhock th' embattl'd tempeſts pour,
Waves charge on waves, th' encountering billows roar.
Thus in a vary'd dreſs the ſubject ſhines,
By turns the objects ſhift their proper ſigns;
From ſhape to ſhape alternately they run,
To borrow others charms, and lend their own;
Pleas'd with the borrow'd charms, the readers find
A crowd of different images combin'd,
Riſe from a ſingle object to the mind.
So the pleas'd traveller, from a mountain's brow,
Views the calm ſurface of the ſeas below;
Though wide beneath the floating ocean lies
The firſt immediate object of his eyes,
He ſees the foreſts tremble from within,
And gliding meadows paint the deeps with green;
While to his eyes the fair deluſions paſs
In gay ſucceſſion through the watery glaſs.
'Tis thus the bard diverſifies his ſong,
Now here, now there, he calls the ſoul along.
The rich variety he ſets to ſight,
Cloys not the mind, but adds to our delight.
Now with a frugal choice the bard affords
The ſtrongeſt light and energy of words;
While humble ſubjects he contrives to raiſe
With borrow'd ſplendours, and a foreign blaze.
This, if on old tradition we rely,
Was once the current language of the ſky;
Which firſt the muſes brought to theſe abodes,
Who taught mankind the ſecrets of the gods.
For in the court of Jove their choirs advance,
And ſing alternate, as they lead the dance,
Mix'd with the gods; they hear Apollo's lyre,
And from high heaven the panting bard inſpire.
Nor bards alone, but other writers, reach
This bold, this daring privilege of ſpeech;
In chief the orators, to raiſe their ſenſe,
In this ſtrong figure dreſs their eloquence,
When with perſuaſive ſtrokes they plead a cauſe,
And bridle vice, and vindicate the laws;
Or on the dreadful verge of death defend,
And ſnatch from fate a poor devoted friend.

* The Metaphor.

Ev'n the rough hinds delight in ſuch a ſtrain,
When the glad harveſt waves with golden grain,
And thirſty meadows drink the pearly rain;
On the proud vine her purple gems appear;
The ſmiling fields rejoice, and hail the pregnant year.
Firſt from neceſſity the figure ſprung
For things, that would not ſuit our ſcanty tongue,
When no true names were offer'd to the view,
Thoſe they transferr'd that border'd on the true;
Thence by degrees the noble licence grew.
The bards thoſe daring liberties embrac'd,
Through want at firſt, through luxury at laſt:
They now to alien things, at will, confirm
The borrow'd honours of a foreign term.
So man, at firſt, the rattling ſtorm to fly,
And the bleak horrors of the wintery ſky,
Rais'd up a roof of oſiers o'er his head,
And clos'd with homely clay the ſlender ſhed:
Now regal palaces, of wond'rous ſize,
With brazen beams on Parian columns riſe,
That heave the pompous fabric to the ſkies.
But other writers ſprinkle here and there
Theſe bolder beauties with a frugal care;
So vaſt a freedom is allow'd to none,
But ſuits the labours of the bard alone,
Who in the laws of verſe himſelf reſtrains,
Ty'd up to time in voluntary chains.
Others, by no reſtraint or ſtop withheld,
May range the compaſs of a wider field;
The ſacred poets, who their labours fill
With pleaſing fictions, or with truths at will,
Their thoughts in bolder liberties expreſs,
Which look more beauteous in a foreign dreſs.
To all unuſual colours they impart,
Nor bluſh, if e'er detected in their art.
* Sometimes beyond the bounds of truth they fly,
And boldly lift their ſubject to the ſky;
When with tumultuous ſhouts the heavens rebound,
And all Olympus trembles with the ſound;
Or with repeated accents they relate
The fall of Troy, and dwell upon her fate;
† Oh fire! oh country, once with glory crown'd!
Oh wretched race of Priam, once renown'd!
Oh Jove! ſee Ilion ſmoking on the ground!
They now name Ceres for the golden grain,
Bacchus for wine, and Neptune for the main:
Or from the father's name point out the ſon;
Or for her people introduce a town:
So when alarm'd her natives dread their fates,
Pale Afric ſhakes, and trembles through her ſtates:
And ſome, by Achelous' ſtreams alone,
Compriſe the floods of all the world in one.
‡ Lo! now they ſtart aſide, and change the ſtrain,
To fancy'd converſe with an abſent ſwain;
To grots and caverns all their cares diſcloſe,
Or tell the ſolitary rocks their woes;
To ſcenes inanimate proclaim their love,
Talk with an hill, or whiſper to a grove.

* The Hyperbole.
† Hæc verba ex incerti nominis Poetâ citat Cicero.
‡ The Apoſtrophe.

On you they call, ye unattentive woods,
And wait an anſwer from your bordering floods.
† Sometimes they ſpeak one thing, but leave behind
Another ſecret meaning in the mind:
A fair expreſſion artfully diſpenſe,
But uſe a word that claſhes with the ſenſe.
‡ Thus pious Helen ſtole the faithful ſword,
While Troy was flaming, from her ſleeping lord.
§ So glorious Drances tower'd amid the plain,
And pil'd the ground with mountains of the ſlain;
Immortal trophies rais'd from ſquadrons kill'd,
And with vaſt ſpoils ennobled all the field.
‖ But now to mention farther I forbear,
With what ſtrong charms they captivate the ear;
When the ſame terms they happily repeat,
The ſame repeated ſeem more ſoft and ſweet.
This,  were Arcadia judge, if Pan withſtood,
Pan's judge, Arcadia, would condemn her god.
But though our fond indulgence grants the muſe
A thouſand liberties in different views,
Whene'er you chooſe an image to expreſs
In foreign terms, and ſcorn the native dreſs;
Yet be diſcreet, nor ſtrain the point too far,
Let the tranſition ſtill unforc'd appear,
Nor e'er diſcover an exceſs of care:
For ſome, we know, with awkward violence
Diſtort the ſubject, and disjoint the ſenſe;
Quite change the genuine figure, and deface
The native ſhape with every living grace;
And force unwilling objects to put on
An alien face, and features not their own.
A low conceit in diſproportion'd terms,
Looks like a boy dreſs'd up in giants arms;
Blind to the truth, all reaſon they exceed,
†† Who name a ſtall the palace of the ſteed,
Or graſs the treſſes of great Rhæa's head.
'Tis beſt ſometimes an image to expreſs
In its own colours, and its native dreſs;
The genuine words with happy care to uſe,
If nicely cull'd, and worthy of the muſe.
Some things alternately compar'd are ſhown,
Both names ſtill true, and mutually their own;
But here the leaſt redundance you muſt ſhun;
Tell us, in ſhort, from whence the hint you drew,
And ſet the whole compariſon to view;
Leſt, mindleſs of your firſt deſign, you ſeem
To lead the mind away, and rove from theme to theme.
But now purſue the method, that affords
The fitteſt terms, and wiſeſt choice of words.
Not all deſerve alike the ſame regard,
Nor ſuit the godlike labours of the bard;
For words as much may differ in degree,
As the moſt various kinds of poetry.
Though many a common term and word we find
Diſpers'd promiſcuouſly through every kind,
Thoſe that will never ſuit th' heroic rage,
Might grace the buſkin, and become the ſtage.

† The Irony.

†† The Catachreſis.

Their large, their vaſt variety explore
With piercing eyes, and range the mighty ſtore.
From their deep fund the richeſt words unfold,
With niceſt care be rich expreſſion cull'd,
To deck your numbers in the pureſt gold,
The vile, the dark degenerate crowd refuſe,
And ſcorn a dreſs that would diſgrace the muſe:
Then, to ſucceed your ſearch, purſue the road,
And beat the track the glorious ancients trod.
To thoſe eternal monuments repair,
There read, and meditate for ever there.
If o'er the reſt ſome mighty genius ſhines,
Mark the ſweet charms and vigour of his lines.
As far as Phœbus and the heavenly powers
Smile on your labours, make his diction your's:
Your ſtyle by his authentic ſtandard frame,
Your voice, your habit, and addreſs, the ſame.
With him proceed to cull the reſt; for there
A full reward will juſtify your care.
Examine all; and bring from all away
Their various treaſures as a lawful prey.
Nor would I ſcruple, with a due regard,
To read ſometimes a rude unpoliſh'd bard;
Among whoſe labours I may find a line,
Which from unſightly ruſt I may refine,
And, with a better grace, adopt it into mine.
How often may we ſee a troubled flood
Stain'd with unſettled ooze and riſing mud!
Which (if a well the bordering natives ſink)
Supplies the thirſty multitude with drink.
The trickling ſtream by juſt degrees refines,
Till in its courſe the limpid current ſhines;
And taught through ſecret labyrinths to flow,
Works itſelf clear among the ſands below.
For nothing looks ſo gloomy, but will ſhine
From proper care, and timely diſcipline;
If, with due vigilance and conduct, wrought
Deep in the ſoul, it labours in the thought.
Hence on the ancients we muſt reſt alone,
And make their golden ſentences our own.
To cull their beſt expreſſions claims our cares,
To form our notions, and our ſtyles on their's.
See! how we bear away their precious ſpoils,
And with the glorious dreſs enrich our ſtyles;
Their bright inventions for our uſe convey,
Bring all the ſpirit of their words away,
And make their words themſelves our lawful prey!
Unaſham'd in other colours to be ſhown,
We ſpeak our thoughts in accents not our own.
But your deſign with modeſt caution weigh,
Steal with due care, and meditate the prey.
Invert the order of the words with art,
And change their former ſite in every part.
Thus win your readers, thus deceive with grace,
And let th' expreſſion wear a different face;
Yourſelf at laſt, the glorious labour done,
Will ſcarce diſcern his diction from your own.
Some, to appear of diffidence bereſt,
Steal in broad day, and glory in the theft;
When with juſt art, deſign and confidence,
On the ſame words they graft a different ſenſe;
Preſerve th' unvary'd terms and order too,
But change their former ſpirit for a new:
Or, with the ſenſe of emulation bold,
With ancient bards a glorious conteſt hold;

Their richeſt ſpoils triumphant they explore,
Which, rang'd with better grace, they varniſh o'er,
And give them charms they never knew before.
So trees, that change their ſoils, more proudly riſe,
And liſt their ſpreading honours to the ſkies;
And, when tranſplanted, nobler fruits produce,
Exalt their nature, and ferment their juice.
So Troy's fam'd chief the Aſian empire bore,
With better omens, to the Latian ſhore;
Though from thy realm, O Dido, to the ſea
Call'd by the gods reluctantly away;
Nor the firſt nuptial pleaſures could controul
The fix'd, the ſtubborn purpoſe of his ſoul.
Unhappy queen! thy woes ſuppreſt thy breath;
Thy cares purſue thee, and ſurviv'd in death.
Had not the Dardan fleet thy kingdom ſought,
Thy life had ſhone unſully'd with a fault.

Come then, ye youths, and urge your generous toils;
Come ſtrip the ancients, and divide the ſpoils
Your hands have won—but ſhun the fault of ſuch,
Who with fond raſhneſs truſt themſelves too much.
For ſome we know, who, by their pride betray'd,
With vain contempt reject a foreign aid;
Who ſcorn thoſe great examples to obey,
Nor follow where the ancients point the way.
While from the theft their cautious hands refrain,
Vain are their fears, their ſuperſtition vain.
Nor Phœbus' ſmiles th' unhappy poet crown;
The fate of all his works prevents his own.
Himſelf his mouldering monument ſurvives,
And ſees his labours periſh while he lives:
His fame is more contracted than his ſpan,
And the frail author dies before the man.
How would he wiſh the labour to forbear,
And follow other arts with more ſucceſsful care.

I like a fair alluſion nicely wrought;
When the ſame words expreſs a different thought.
And ſuch a theft true critics dare not blame,
Which late poſterity ſhall crown with fame.
Void of all fear, of every doubt bereft,
I would not bluſh, but triumph in the theft.
Nor on the ancients for the whole rely,
The whole is more than all their works ſupply;
Some things your own invention muſt explore,
Some virgin images untouch'd before.

New terms no laws forbid us to induce,
To coin a word, and ſanctify to uſe;
But yet admit no words into the ſong,
Unleſs they prove the ſtock from whence they ſprung;
Point out their family, their kindred trace,
And ſet to view the ſeries of their race.
But where you find your native tongue too poor
Tranſport the riches of the Grecian ſtore;
Inform the lump, and work it into grace,
And with new life inſpire th' unwieldy maſs;
Till, chang'd by diſcipline, the word puts on
A foreign nature, and forgets its own.
So Latium's language found a rich increaſe,
And grew and flouriſh'd from the wealth of Greece;
Till uſe, in time, had rifled Argos' ſtores,
And brought all Athens to th' Heſperian ſhores.

How many words from rich Mycenæ come,
Of Greek extraction, in the dreſs of Rome?
That live with ours, our rights and freedom claim,
Their nature different, but their looks the ſame;
Through Latium's realms, in Latium's garb they go,
At once her ſtrangers, and her natives too.
Long has her poverty been fled, and long
With native riches has ſhe grac'd her tongue.
Nor ſearch the poets only, but explore
Immortal Tully's inexhauſted ſtore;
And other authors, born in happier days,
Shall anſwer all your wants, and beautify your lays.

Oft, in old bards, a verſe above the reſt
Shines, in barbaric ſpoils and trophies dreſt;
Thus Gaul, her victor's triumph to complete,
Supplies thoſe words that paint her own defeat;
And vanquiſh'd Macedon, to tell her doom,
Gives up her language with her arms to Rome.
Then can we fear with groundleſs diffidence
A want of words that ſhall expreſs our ſenſe?

But, if compell'd by want, you may produce
And bring an antiquated word in uſe;
A word erſt well receiv'd in days of yore,
A word our old forefathers us'd before:
Well-pleas'd the reader's wonder to engage,
He brings our grandſire's habit on the ſtage,
And garbs that whilom grac'd an uncouth age.
Yet muſt not ſuch appear in every place;
When rang'd too thick, the poem they diſgrace.
Since of new words ſuch numbers you command,
Deal out the old ones with a ſparing hand.
* Whene'er your images can lay no claim
To a fix'd term, and want a certain name;
To paint one thing, the licens'd bard affords
A pompous circle, and a crowd of words.

Two plighted words in one with grace appear;
When they with eaſe glide ſmoothly o'er the ear.
Two may embrace at once, but ſeldom more,
Nor verſe can bear the mingled ſhape of four;
No triple monſters dwell on Latium's ſhore.
When mix'd with ſmooth, theſe harſher ſtrains are found,
We ſtart with horror at the frightful ſound;
The Grecian Bards, in whom ſuch freedoms pleaſe,
May match with more ſucceſs ſuch words as theſe;
Heap hills on hills, and bid the ſtructure riſe,
Till the vaſt pile of mountains prop the ſkies.
What words ſoever of vaſt bulk we view,
One of leſs ſize may ſometimes ſplit in two;
Sometimes we ſeparate from the whole a part,
And prune the more luxuriant limbs with art.
Thus when the names of heroes we declare,
Names whoſe unpoliſh'd ſounds offend the ear;
We add, or lop ſome branches which abound,
Till the harſh accents are with ſmoothneſs crown'd.
That mellows every word, and ſoftens every ſound.
By ſuch an happy change, Sicharbas came,
To ſink his roughneſs in Sichæus' name.
Hence would I rather chooſe thoſe dire alarms
Of vaſt Enecladus, and heaven in arms.

---

* The Periphraſis.

And the bold Titan's battles to rehearſe,
Harmonious names, that glide into the verſe;
Than count the rough, the barbarous nations o'er,
Which Rome ſubdued of old from ſhore to ſhore.
Let things ſubmit to words on no pretence,
But make your words ſubſervient to your ſenſe;
Nor for their ſake admit a ſingle line,
But what contributes to the main deſign.
Through every part moſt diligently pierce,
And weigh the ſound and ſenſe of every verſe.
Unleſs your ſtricteſt caution you diſplay,
Some words may lead the heedleſs bard away;
Steal from their duty, and defert their poſt,
And ſculk in darkneſs, indolently loſt;
Or, while their proper parts their fellows ply,
Contribute nought but ſound and harmony.
This to prevent, conſult your words; and know
How far their ſtrength, extent, and nature go.
To all their charges, and their labours fit;
To all, their ſeveral provinces of wit.
Without this care, the poem will abound
With empty noiſe, and impotence of ſound;
Unmeaning terms will crowd in every part,
Play round the ears, but never reach the heart.
Yet would I ſometimes venture to diſperſe
Some words, whoſe ſplendor ſhould adorn my verſe;
(Words, that to wit and thought have no pretence,
And rather vehicles of ſound than ſenſe;)
Till in the gorgeous dreſs the lines appear,
And court with gentle harmony the ear.
Nor with too fond a care ſuch words purſue,
They meet your ſight, and riſe in every view.
Oft, from its chains the ſhackled verſe unlooſe,
And give it liberty to walk in proſe;
Then be the work renew'd with endleſs pain,
And join with care the ſhatter'd parts again;
The lurking faults and errors you may ſee,
When the words run unmanacled and free.
Attend, young bard, and liſten while I ſing;
Lo! I unlock the muſes' ſacred ſpring;
Lo! Phœbus calls thee to his inmoſt ſhrine;
Hark! in one common voice, the tuneful nine
Invite and court thee to the rites divine.
When firſt to man the privilege was given,
To hold by verſe an intercourſe with heaven,
Unwilling that th' immortal art ſhould lie
Cheap and expos'd to every vulgar eye,
Great Jove, to drive away the groveling crowd,
To narrow bounds confin'd the glorious road,
Which more exalted ſpirits may purſue,
And left it open to the ſacred few.
For many a painful taſk, in every part,
Claims all the poet's vigilance and art.
'Tis not enough his verſes to complete,
In meaſure, numbers, or determin'd feet;
Or render things, by clear expreſſion bright,
And ſet each object in a proper light:
To all, proportion'd terms he muſt diſpenſe,
And make the ſound a picture of the ſenſe;
The correſpondent words exactly frame,
The look, the features, and the mien the ſame.
His thoughts the bard muſt ſuitably expreſs,
Each in a different face, and different dreſs;
Left in unvary'd looks the crowd be ſhown,
And the whole multitude appear as one.
With rapid feet and wings, without delay,
This ſwiftly flies, and ſmoothly ſkims away:
That, vaſt of ſize, his limbs huge, broad, and ſtrong,
Moves ponderous, and ſcarce drags his bulk along.
This blooms with youth and beauty in his face,
And Venus breathes on every limb a grace:
That, of rude form, his uncouth numbers ſhows,
Looks horrible, and frowns with his rough brows,
His monſtrous tail in many a fold and wind,
Voluminous and vaſt, curls up behind:
At once the image and the lines appear
Rude to the eye, and frightful to the ear.
Nor are thoſe figures given without a cauſe,
But fixt and ſettled by determin'd laws;
All claim and wear, as their deſerts are known,
A voice, a face, and habit of their own.
* Lo! when the ſailors ſteer the ponderous ſhips,
And plough, with brazen beaks, the foamy deeps,
Incumbent on the main that roars around;
Beneath their labouring oars the waves reſound,
The prows wide-echoing through the dark profound:
To the loud call each diſtant rock replies,
Toſt by the ſtorm the frothy ſurges riſe;
While the hoarſe ocean beats the ſounding ſhore,
Daſh'd from the ſtrand, the flying waters roar,
Flaſh at the ſhock, and gathering in an heap,
The liquid mountains riſe, and overhang the deep.
See through her ſhores Trinacria's realms rebound,
Starting and trembling at the bellowing ſound;
High-towering o'er the waves the mountains ride,
And claſh with floating mountains on the tide.
But when blue Neptune from his car ſurveys,
And calms at one regard the raging ſeas;
Stretch'd like a peaceful lake the deep ſubſides,
And o'er the level light the galley glides.
The poet's art and conduct we admire,
When angry Vulcan rolls a flood of fire;
When on the groves and fields the deluge preys,
And wraps the crackling ſtubble in the blaze.
Nor leſs our pleaſure, when the flame divides,
And climbs aſpiring round the cauldron's ſides;
From the dark bottom work the waters up,
Swell, boil, and hiſs, and bubble to the top.
Thus in ſmooth lines, ſmooth ſubjects we rehearſe;
But the † rough rock roars in as rough a verſe.
If gay the ſubject, gay muſt be the ſong;
And the briſk numbers quickly glide along:
When the fields flouriſh; or the ſkies unfold
Swift from the flying hinge their gates of gold.
If ſad the theme, then each grave line moves ſlow,
The mournful numbers languiſhingly flow,
And drag, and labour, with a weight of woe:
If e'er the boding bird of night, who mourns
O'er ruins, deſolation, graves, and urns,
With piercing ſcreams the darkneſs ſhould invade,
And break the ſilence of the diſmal ſhade.
When things are ſmall, the terms ſhould ſtill be ſo:
For low words pleaſe us, when the theme is low,
But when ſome giant, horrible and grim,
Enormous in his gait, and vaſt in every limb,

* Moſt of theſe examples are drawn word for word from Virgil.

† ——"Sonat hæc de nare caninâ
Littera." Vid. Perſium.

Stalks towering on; the swelling words must rise
In just proportion to the monster's size.
If some large weight his huge arms strive to shove,
The verse too labours; the throng'd words scarce move
When each stiff clod beneath the ponderous plough,
Crumbles and breaks; th' encumber'd lines march slow.
Nor less; when pilots catch the friendly gales,
Unfurl their shrouds, and hoist the wide-stretch'd sails.
But if the poem suffers from delay,
Let the lines fly precipitate away.
And when the viper issues from the brake;
Be quick; with stones, and brands, and fire, attack
His rising crest, and drive the serpent back.
When night descends: or, stunn'd by numerous strokes,
And groaning, to the earth drops the vast ox;
The line too sinks with correspondent sound,
Flat with the steer, and headlong to the ground.
When the wild waves subside, and tempests cease,
And hush their roarings and their rage to peace;
So oft we see the interrupted strain
Stopp'd in the midst,—and with the silent main,
Pause for a space—at last it glides again.
When Priam strains his aged arm, to throw
His unavailing javelin at the foe;
(His blood congeal'd, and every nerve unstrung,)
Then with the theme compiles the artful song;
Like him the solitary numbers flow
Weak, trembling, melancholy, stiff, and slow.
Not so young Pyrrhus, who with rapid force
Beats down embattled armies in his course;
The raging youth on trembling Ilion falls,
Bursts her strong gates, and shakes her lofty walls;
Provokes his flying courser to his speed,
In full career to charge the warlike steed;
He piles the field with mountains of the slain;
He pours, he storms, he thunders through the plain.
In this the poet's justest conduct lies,
When with the various subjects he complies,
To sink with judgment, and with judgment rise.
We see him now, remissive of his force,
Glide with a low, and inoffensive course;
Stript of the gaudy dress of words he goes,
And scarcely lifts the poem up from prose:
And now he brings with loosen'd reins along
All in a full career the boundless song;
In wide array luxuriantly he pours
A crowd of words, and opens all his stores.
The lavish eloquence redundant flows,
Thick as the fleeces of the winter-snows,
When Jove invests the naked Alps, and sheds
The silent tempest on their hoary heads.
Sometimes the godlike fury he restrains,
Checks his impetuous speed, and draws the reins;
Balanc'd and pois'd, he neither sinks nor soars,
Ploughs the mid space, and steers between the shores,
And shaves the confines;—till all dangers past,
He shoots with joy into the port at last.
For what remains unsung; I now declare
What claims the poet's last and strictest care.
When all adventures past, his labours tend
In one continued order to their end;
When the proud victor on his conquest smiles,
And safe enjoys the triumph of his toils;
Let him by timely diffidence be aw'd,
Nor trust too soon th' unpolish'd piece abroad.
Oh! may his rash ambition ne'er enflame
His breast, with such a dangerous thirst of fame!
But let the terror of disgrace controul
The warm, the partial fondness of his soul;
And force the bard to throw his passion by,
Nor view his offspring with a parent's eye:
Till his affections are by justice crost,
And all the father in the judge is lost.
He seeks his friends, nor trusts himself alone,
But asks their judgment, and resigns his own;
Begs them, with urgent prayers, to be sincere,
Just and exact, and rigidly severe;
Due verdict to pronounce on every thought,
Nor spare the slightest shadow of a fault;
But, bent against himself, and strictly nice;
He thanks each critic that detects a vice;
Though charg'd with what his judgment can defend,
He joins the partial sentence of his friend.
The piece thrown by; the careful bard reviews
The long-forgotten labours of his muse:
Lo! on all sides far different objects rise,
And a new prospect strikes his wondering eyes,
Warm from the brain, the lines his love engrost;
Now in themselves their former selves are lost.
Now his own labours he begins to blame,
And blushing reads them with regret and shame.
He lothes the piece; condemns it; nor can find
The genuine stamp, and image of his mind.
This thought and that, indignant he rejects;
When most secure, some danger he suspects;
Anxious he adds, and trembling he corrects.
With kind severities, and timely art,
Lops the luxuriant growth of every part;
Prunes the superfluous boughs, that wildly stray,
And cuts the rank redundancies away.
Thus arm'd with proper discipline he stands,
By day, by night, applies his healing hands,
From every line to wipe out every blot,
Till the whole piece is guiltless of a fault.
Hard is the task, but needful, if your aim
Tends to the prospect of immortal fame.
If some unfinish'd numbers limp behind,
When the warm'd poet rages unconfin'd,
Then when his swift invention scorns to stay,
By a full tide of genius whirl'd away;
He brings the sovereign cure their failings claim,
Confirms the sickly, and supports the lame.
Oft as the seasons roll, renew thy pain,
And bring the poem to the test again.
In different lights th' expression must be rang'd,
The garb and colours of the words be chang'd.
With endless care thy watchful eyes must pierce,
And mark the parts distinct of every verse.
In this persist; for oft one day denies
The kind assistance which the next supplies;
As oft, without your vigilance and care,
Some faults detected by themselves appear.
And now a thousand errors you explore,
That lay involv'd in mantling clouds before.
Oft, to improve his muse, the bard should try,
By turns, the temper of a different sky.

For thus his genius takes a different face
From every different genius of a place.
The ſoul too changes, and the bard may find
A thouſand various motions in his mind.
New gleams of light will every moment riſe,
While from each part the ſcattering darkneſs flies.
And, as he alters what appears amiſs,
He adds new flowers to beautify the piece.
But here, ev'n here, avoid th' extreme of ſuch,
Who with exceſs of care correct too much:
Whoſe barbarous hands no calls of pity bound,
While with th' infected parts they cut the ſound,
And make the cure more dangerous than the wound.
Till, all the blood and ſpirits drain'd away,
The body ſickens, and the parts decay;
The native beauties die, the limbs appear
Rough and deform'd with one continued ſcar.
No fix'd determin'd number I enjoin,
But when ſome years ſhall perfect the deſign;
Reflect on life; and, mindful of thy ſpan,
Whoſe ſcanty limit bounds the days of man,
Wide o'er the ſpacious world, without delay,
Permit the finiſh'd piece to take its way;
Till all mankind admires the heavenly ſong,
The theme of every hand and every tongue.
See! thy pleas'd friends thy ſpreading glory draws,
Each with his voice to ſwell the vaſt applauſe;
The vaſt applauſe ſhall reach the ſtarry frame,
No years, no ages, ſhall obſcure thy fame,
And earth's laſt ends ſhall hear thy darling name.
Shall we then doubt to ſcorn all worldly views,
And not prefer the raptures of the muſe?
Thrice happy bards! who taught by heaven, obey
Theſe rules, and follow where they lead the way;
And hear the faithful precepts I beſtow'd,
Inſpir'd with rage divine, and labouring with the god.
But art alone, and human means muſt fail,
Nor theſe inſtructive precepts will prevail,
Unleſs the gods their preſent aid ſupply,
And look with kind indulgence from the ſky.
I only pointed out the paths that lead
The panting youth to ſteep Parnaſſus' head;
And ſhow'd the tuneful muſes from afar,
Mix'd in a ſolemn choir, and dancing there.
Thither forbidden by the fates to go,
I ſink and grovel in the world below.
Deterr'd by them, in vain I labour up,
And ſtretch theſe hands to graſp the diſtant top.
Enough for me, at diſtance if I view
Some bard, ſome happier bard, the path purſue;
Who, taught by me to reach Parnaſſus' crown,
Mounts up, and calls his flow companions on.
But yet theſe rules, perhaps, theſe humble lays,
May claim a title to a ſhare of praiſe;
When, in a crowd the gathering youths ſhall hear
My voice and precepts with a willing ear;
Cloſe in a ring ſhall preſs the liſtening throng,
And learn from me to regulate their ſong.
Then, if the pitying fates prolong my breath,
And from my youth avert the dart of death;
Whene'er I ſink in life's declining ſtage,
Trembling and fainting on the verge of age,
To help their wearied maſter ſhall they run,
And lend their friendly hands to guide him on;
Through blooming groves his tardy progreſs wait,
And ſet him gently down at Phœbus' gate,
The while he ſings, before the hallow'd ſhrine,
The ſacred poets, and the tuneful nine.
Here then in Roman numbers will we riſe,
And lift the fame of Virgil to the ſkies;
Auſonia's pride and boaſt; who brings along
Strength to my lines, and ſpirit to my ſong:
Firſt how the mighty bard tranſported o'er
The ſacred muſes from th' Aonian ſhore;
Led the fair ſiſters to th' Heſperian plains,
And ſung in Roman towns the Grecian ſtrains;
How in his youth to woods and groves he fled,
And ſweetly tun'd the ſoft Sicilian reed;
Next, how, in pity to th' Auſonian ſwains,
He rais'd to heaven the honours of the plains;
Rapt in Triptolemus's car on high,
He ſcatter'd peace and plenty from the ſky;
Fir'd with his country's fame, with loud alarms,
At laſt he rous'd all Latium up to arms;
In juſt array the Phrygian troops beſtow'd,
And ſpoke the voice and language of a god.
Father of verſe! from whom our honours ſpring;
See! from all parts, our bards attend their king;
Beneath thy banners rang'd, thy fame increaſe,
And rear proud trophies from the ſpoils of Greece.
Low, in Elyſian vales, her tuneful throng
Bow to thy laurels, and adore thy ſong:
On thee alone thy country turns her eyes;
On thee her poets future fame relies.
See! how in crowds they court thy aid divine
(For all their honours but depend on thine);
Taught from the womb thy numbers to rehearſe,
And ſip the balmy ſweets of every verſe.
Unrival'd bard! all ages ſhall decree
The firſt unenvy'd palm of fame to thee;
Thrice happy bard! thy boundleſs glory flies,
Where never mortal muſt attempt to riſe;
Such heavenly numbers in thy ſong we hear,
And more than human accents charm the ear!
To thee, his darling, Phœbus' hands impart
His ſoul, his genius, and immortal art.
What help or merit in theſe rules are ſhown,
The youth muſt owe to thy ſupport alone.
The youth, whoſe wandering feet with care I led
Aloft, o'er ſteep Parnaſſus' ſacred head;
Taught from thy great example to explore
Thoſe arduous paths which thou haſt trod before.
Hail, pride of Italy! thy country's grace!
Hail, glorious light of all the tuneful race!
For whom we weave the crown, and altars raiſe;
And with rich incenſe bid the temples blaze;
Our ſolemn hymns ſhall ſtill refound thy praiſe.
Hail, holy bard, and boundleſs in renown!
Thy fame, dependent on thyſelf alone,
Requires no ſong, no numbers but thy own.
Look down propitious, and my thoughts inſpire;
Warm my chaſte boſom with thy ſacred fire!
Let all thy flames with all their raptures roll,
Deep in my breaſt, and kindle all my ſoul!

THE LIFE OF BLAIR.

Of the perſonal hiſtory of Blair, few particulars are known; and thoſe few are ſuch as give little ſcope for amplification and embelliſhment.

The life of a country clergyman, conſtantly engaged in the duties of his profeſſion, the practice of the domeſtic virtues, and the occupations of literature, however reſpectable ſuch a character may be, can afford but ſlender materials for biography.

The facts ſtated in the preſent account, were communicated to the compiler of this collection, in converſation with his ſon, Robert Blair, Eſq., Solicitor General to his Majeſty for Scotland, and his couſin, the learned and amiable Dr. Blair, one of the miniſters of the High Church, and Profeſſor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, in the Univerſity of Edinburgh.

Theſe authorities are produced by the preſent writer with much pleaſure; as it gives him, at once, an opportunity of reflecting on the hereditary love of literature and diſtinguiſhed politeneſs of Mr. Solicitor General; and of recording his obligations to the venerable director of his youthful ſtudies; whoſe well-eſtabliſhed reputation can ſuffer no diminution from the teſtimony of a grateful pupil, to the merit of his "Academical prelections," which conſtitute an æra in the hiſtory of Scottiſh literature; nor eaſily receive addition from the higheſt praiſe he can beſtow on his "productions for the pulpit," which diſplay the powers of a wiſe, and the acquiſitions of a cultivated mind, in recommending the ſpirit of a pure and enlightened religion to every order of mankind; and exhibit to the literary world, a model of ſound and elegant inſtruction, and of ſimple and perſuaſive eloquence, unprecedented in the hiſtory of that ſpecies of compoſition in our country.

Robert Blair was the eldeſt ſon of the Rev. David Blair, one of the miniſters of Edinburgh, and Chaplain to the King. His mother was ——— Niſbet, daughter of ——— Niſbet, Eſq, of Carſin. His grandfather was the Rev. Robert Blair, one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed Scottiſh clergyman in the time of the civil wars; a deſcendent of the ancient and reſpectable family of Blair of Blair in Ayrſhire.

He was born about the beginning of this century; had the moſt liberal education in the Univerſity of Edinburgh, and afterwards was ſent abroad by his father for his improvement, and ſpent ſome time on the continent. After undergoing the uſual trials appointed by the church, he was ordained miniſter of Athelſtaneford, in the county of Eaſt Lothian, Jan. 5, 1731, where he paſt the remainder of his life.

As his fortune was eaſy, he lived very much in the ſtyle of a gentleman, and was greatly reſpected by Sir Francis Kinloch, Baronet, of Gilmerton, patron of the pariſh, and by all the gentlemen in that neighbourhood. He was a man both of learning, and of elegant taſte and manners. He was a botaniſt and floriſt, which he ſhowed in the cultivation of his garden; and was alſo converſant in optical and microſcopical knowledge, on which ſubjects he carried on correſpondence with ſome learned men in England. He was a man of ſincere piety, and very aſſiduous in diſcharging the duties of his clerical function. As a preacher, he was ſerious and warm, and diſcovered the imagination of a poet.

He married Iſabella Law, daughter of Mr. Law of Elvingſton, and ſiſter to the preſent ſheriff-depute of Eaſt-Lothian, a lady of uncommon beauty and amiable manners. With her father, who had been profeſſor of moral philoſophy, in the Univerſity of Edinburgh, who was his relation, and had been left one of his tutors, he had been long and intimately connected; and, upon occaſion of his death, which happened several years before his marriage with his daughter, he wrote and printed a funeral Poem to his Memory, which is thought worthy of being preserved; and is accordingly inserted in this collection.

By his lady, who survived him several years, he had five sons and one daughter; of these sons, Robert Blair, Esq., of Avington, Solicitor General to his Majesty for Scotland, is the fourth. His brother, Mr. Archibald Blair, was also a clergyman, and was settled in a parish near him in East Lothian. One of his sons, nephew to the poet, Robert Blair, M. D., is one of the Commissioners of the Sick and Wounded in London, and well known for his skill in optics and astronomy.

He died of a fever, on the 4th of February, 1746, in the 47th year of his age; and was succeeded in his living at Athelstaneford, by another poet, Mr. John Home, the celebrated author of "Douglas."

This is all that is known of Blair; an accomplished scholar, and an elegant poet, whose genius and virtue, though celebrated by some of the most eminent of his poetical contemporaries, have suffered such unmerited neglect, that his name is not to be found in any collection of literary biography.

Had the interesting correspondence of Watts been given to the world by his friend and biographer Dr. Jennings, it would probably have furnished many particulars relating to Blair, which might have gratified curiosity; though they could hardly have added to the honour which his talents and virtues have received from the esteem of a man, who has left behind him such purity of character, and such monuments of laborious piety.

The friends of Blair were the friends of science and of virtue; his love of poetry and polite literature, procured him the friendship of Watts, a polite scholar, and devout poet; no less remarkable for his genius and learning, than the mildness and fervency of his piety: And his passion for natural history, obtained him the correspondence of the famous naturalist, Henry Baker, Esq., Fellow of the Royal Society, an intelligent, upright, and benevolent man, who was particularly attentive to all the improvements which were made in natural science, and very solicitous for the prosecution of useful discoveries. Besides the papers written by himself in the "Philosophical Transactions," he was the means, by his extensive correspondence, of conveying to the Society, the intelligence and observations of other inquisitive and philosophical men. Like Blair, he was both a poet and a naturalist; and printed a volume of "Original Poems, serious and humorous," 8vo, 1725. He was the author likewise of "The Universe, a poem," which has been several times reprinted. But his principal publications are, "The Microscope made easy," 1742; and "Employment for the Microscope," which have gone through many editions, and are generally known. Having led a very useful and honourable life, he died Nov. 25, 1774, being then above seventy years of age. By his wife Sophia, youngest daughter of the celebrated De Foe, he had a son, David Erskine Baker, Esq., author of the "Muse of Ossian;" a dramatic poem, of three acts, performed at Edinburgh, 1763; and "The Companion to the Play House, 2 vols., 12mo, 1764, a work that has since been considerably improved by Mr. Reed, under the title of the "Biographica Dramatica," 2 vols. 8vo, 1781. His letters to Blair, are in the possession of Mr. Solicitor General.

With Dr. Doddridge, a man whose learning was respected by Warburton and Newton, and whose piety was venerated by Lyttleton and West, he also cultivated a correspondence; probably through the kindness of Watts, or the good offices of their common friend, Colonel James Gardiner, who was slain at the battle of Prestonpans, Sept. 21, 1745.; and affectionately commemorated by Dr. Doddridge, in "Some remarkable passages in his life," published in 1747.

The following letter, dated Athelstaneford, Feb. 25, 1741-2, and inserted in the "Epistolary Correspondence of Dr. Doddridge," published by the Rev. Mr. Stedman of Shrewsbury, 1790, exhibits an advantageous specimen of his temper and disposition, and contains some interesting information relating to the composition and publication of The Grave.

"You will be justly surprised with a letter from one whose name is not so much as known to you: nor shall I offer to make an apology. Though I am entirely unacquainted with your person, I am no stranger to your merit as an author; neither am I altogether unacquainted with your personal character, having often heard honourable mention made of you by my much respected and worthy friends, Colonel Gardiner, and Lady Frances. About ten months ago, Lady Frances did me the favour to tranſmit to me ſome manuſcript hymns of yours, with which I was wonderfully delighted. I wiſh I could, on my part, contribute in any meaſure to your entertainment, as you have ſometimes done to mine in a very high degree. And that I may ſhow how willing I am to do ſo, I have deſired Dr. Watts to tranſmit to you a manuſcript poem of mine, intituled The Grave, written, I hope, in a way not unbecoming my profeſſion as a miniſter of the goſpel, though the greateſt part of it was compoſed ſeveral years before I was clothed with ſo ſacred a character. I was urged by ſome friends here, to whom I ſhowed it, to make it public; nor did I decline it, provided I had the approbation of Dr. Watts, from whom I have received many civilities, and for whom I had ever entertained the higheſt regard. Yeſterday I had a letter from the Doctor, ſignifying his approbation of the piece in a manner moſt obliging. A great deal leſs from him would have done me no ſmall honour. But at the ſame time he mentions to me that he had offered it to two bookſellers of his acquaintance, who, he tells me, did not care to run the riſk of publiſhing it. They can ſcarce think (conſidering how critical an age we live in, with reſpect to ſuch kind of writings) that a perſon living three hundred miles from London, could write ſo as to be acceptable to the faſhionable and polite. Perhaps it may be ſo; though, at the ſame time I muſt ſay, in order to make it more generally liked, I was obliged ſometimes to go croſs to my own inclination, well knowing, that whatever poem is written upon a ſerious argument, muſt, upon that very account, be under peculiar diſadvantages; and, therefore, proper arts muſt be uſed to make ſuch a piece go down with a licentious age, which cares for none of thoſe things. I beg pardon for breaking in upon moments precious as yours, and hope you will be ſo kind as to give me your opinion of the poem."

The difficulties ſtated by Watts in the above letter, probably prevented the publication of The Grave during its author's lifetime. The earlieſt edition of it, which the preſent writer has ſeen, is that printed at Edinburgh, in 8vo, 1747. At the end is a tranſlation of a pious ode of Voluſenus; but of no value. The ſubſequent editions are too numerous to be ſpecified. To the edition in 8vo, 1786, is added Gray's "Elegy in a Country Church-yard," with "notes moral, critical and explanatory." The notes are in general trifling and inſipid. It is now, with the Poem to the memory of Mr. Law, received, for the firſt time, into a collection of claſſical Engliſh poetry.

The variations from the common editions, are printed from the original MS., 1741-2, in the poſſeſſion of Mr. Solicitor General, communicated for the uſe of this edition. The reading in the printed copies has in general ſo much the appearance of improvement, and ſo conſonant to the ſtyle of the poem, that it is probable it might be the reſult of a reviſion, ſubſequent to the date of the MS. Some verbal tranſpoſitions, of little importance, are not copied.

If Blair had written nothing elſe but this ſingle poem, it is alone ſufficient to entitle him to a claſſical diſtinction among the poets of our country. But the poem to the memory of Mr. Law, inſerted in this collection by the favour of Dr. Blair, is no inconſiderable addition to his fame. It is evidently a juvenile performance, the tribute of affection and eſteem to the merits of a friend; and juſtly chargeable, in ſome inſtances, with incorrectneſs of language, and incongruity of imagery: but the ſtyle is ſimple and beautiful; and the ſentiments, though ſometimes trite, are expreſſed with a tenderneſs and energy not unworthy of the author of The Grave. The apoſtrophe to Mrs. Law, in particular, is pathetic and pleaſing; and the abrupt tranſition to the final conflagration of the univerſe, approaches to ſublimity.

The Grave, his greateſt work, amply eſtabliſhes his fame. It is a production of real genius, and poſſeſſes a merit ſuperior to many pieces of the very firſt celebrity. It is compoſed of a ſucceſſion of unconnected deſcriptions, and of reflections that ſeem independent of one another, interwoven with ſtriking alluſions, and digreſſive ſallies of imagination. It is a ſeries of pathetic repreſentations, without unity of deſign, variegated with imagery and alluſion; which exhibit a wide diſplay of original poetry. The poet's eye is awake on the objects of creation, and on the ſcenes of human miſery; and he is alive to every feeling of compaſſion and benevolence. Through a ſhade of melancholy, which peculiar impreſſions of religion throw over the ſcenes he deſcribes, we always perceive an amiable and generous principle ſtruggling to overcome the degeneracy which it deplores. Whatever ſubject is either diſcuſſed or aimed at, he always endeavours to melt the heart, and alarm the conſcience, by pathetic deſcription and ſerious remonſtrances; and his ſentiments are always delivered in a novel and energetic manner, that impreſſes them ſtrongly on the mind. He is always moral, yet never dull; and though he often expands an image, yet he never weakens its force. If the ſame thought occurs, he gives it a new form; and is copious without being tireſome. He writes under the ſtrong impreſſion of Chriſtian and moral truths. Conviction gives force to imagination; and he dips his pen in the ſtream that religion has opened in his own boſom.

His imagination, excurſive and vigorous, ſometimes exceeds the bounds that criticiſm preſcribes. Poſſeſſing ſtrong powers of ridicule as well as fancy, he paſſes too ſuddenly from grave and ſerious deſcription, to irony and ſatire. Inſtances of this improper aſſociation too frequently occur, and the grave and ludicrous deſtroy one another.

But the defects of The Grave bear a very ſmall proportion to its beauties; and its beauties are of no common account. They are happily conceived and forcibly expreſſed. His language is the natural and unforced reſult of his conceptions. Anxious only to give each image its due prominence and relief, he has waſted no unneceſſary attention on grace or embelliſhment; the diction, therefore, though ſeldom ſplendid, is always vigorous and animated, and carries the thought home to the heart with inexpreſſible energy. His verſification is almoſt as ſingular as the materials upon which it is employed; ſometimes careleſs and proſaic, and ſometimes ſtrikingly elegant and harmonious; reſembling ſometimes the beſt manner of Shakſpeare and Rowe, and ſometimes that of Milton and Young; but without any marks of ſervile imitation. Amidſt ſuch a profuſion of beautiful and ſtriking paſſages that are to be found in this ſingular poem, it is difficult to confirm theſe general remarks by particular quotations.

After a ſolemn introduction, the following ſtriking paſſage appears.

> The wind is up: hark! how it howls! Methinks
> Till now I never heard a ſound ſo dreary:
> Doors creak, and windows clap, and night's foul bird,
> Rook'd in the ſpire, ſcreams loud: the gloomy aiſles
> Black plaſter'd, and hung round with ſhreds of 'ſcutcheons
> And tatter'd coats of arms, ſend back the ſound
> Laden with heavier airs, from the low vaults,
> The manſions of the dead.—Rous'd from their ſlumbers,
> In grim array the griſly ſpectres riſe,
> Grin horrible, and obſtinately ſullen,
> Paſs and repaſs, huſh'd as the foot of night.
> Again the ſcreech-owl ſhrieks: ungracious ſound!
> I'll hear no more; it makes one's blood run chill.

The following picture is very fine and natural:

> Oft, in the lone church-yard at night I've ſeen,
> By glimpſe of moon-ſhine chequering through the trees,
> The ſchool-boy with his ſatchel in his hand,
> Whiſtling aloud to bear his courage up,
> And lightly tripping o'er the long flat ſtones,
> (With nettles ſkirted, and with moſs o'ergrown,)
> That tell in homely phraſe who lie below.
> Sudden he ſtarts, and hears, or thinks he hears
> The ſound of ſomething purring at his heels;
> Full faſt he flies, and dares not look behind him,
> Till out of breath he overtakes his fellows;
> Who gather round, and wonder at the tale
> Of horrid apparition, tall and ghaſtly,
> That walks at dead of night, or takes his ſtand
> O'er ſome new open'd grave; and (ſtrange to tell!)
> Evaniſhes at crowing of the cock.

This pleaſing picture is finely contraſted by the affecting one, which immediately follows it:

> The new-made widow———————
> Sad ſight! ſlow moving o'er the proſtrate dead,
> Liſtleſs, ſhe crawls along in doleful black,
> While burſts of ſorrow guſh from either eye,

Faſt falling down her now untaſted cheek.
Prone on the lowly grave of the dear man
She drops; whilſt buſy meddling memory,
In barbarous ſucceſſion muſters up
The paſt endearments of their ſofter hours,
Tenacious of its theme. Still, ſtill ſhe thinks
She ſees him, and indulging the fond thought,
Clings yet more cloſely to the ſenſeleſs turf;
Nor heeds the paſſenger who looks that way.

In the above deſcription there are many minute ſtrokes, her now untaſted cheek—buſy meddling memory, &c., which mark the ſuperior poet.

From the apoſtrophe to Friendſhip, which immediately follows, the heart catches ſympathetic feelings; and the amiable poet leaves on it the impreſſion of all that is tender, generous, and endearing. There is beautiful deſcription, and much poetical enthuſiaſm in the following lines.

——— Oh! when my friend and I
In ſome thick wood have wander'd heedleſs on,
Hid from the vulgar eye, and ſat us down
Upon the ſloping cowſlip-cover'd bank,
Where the pure limpid ſtream has ſlid along
In grateful errors through the under-wood,
Sweet murmuring; methought the ſhrill-tongu'd thruſh
Mended his ſong of love; the ſooty blackbird
Mellow'd his pipe, and ſoften'd every note:
The eglantine ſmell'd ſweeter, and the roſe
Aſſum'd a dye more deep; whilſt ev'ry flower
Vied with its fellow plant in luxury
Of dreſs.——Oh! then, the longeſt ſummer's day
Seem'd too, too much in haſte: ſtill the full heart
Had not imparted half: 'twas happineſs
Too exquiſite to laſt.———

The following paſſage ſtrongly reminds us of Shakſpeare, and is equal to any of the moſt admired moral parts of that wonderful dramatiſt.

Dull grave! thou ſpoil'ſt the dance of youthful blood,
Strik'ſt out the dimple from the cheek of mirth,
And ev'ry ſmirking feature from the face;
Branding our laughter with the name of madneſs.
Where are the jeſters now? the men of health
Complexionally pleaſant? Where the droll,
Whoſe ev'ry look and geſture was a joke
To clapping theatres and ſhouting crowds,
And made ev'n thick-lip'd muſing melancholy
To gather up her face into a ſmile
Before ſhe was aware? Ah! ſullen now,
And dumb as the green turf that covers them.

The deſcription of a funeral, beginning, But ſee the well-plum'd herſe, &c. has the beauties and defects of the ſame admirable writer. The apoſtrophe to Beauty is a maſterly paſſage; as are thoſe on the death of the Strong Man, the Philoſopher, and the Phyſician. This expreſſion in the laſt reminds us of Milton.

———From ſtubborn ſhrubs
Thou wringſt their ſhy retiring virtues out,
And vex'd them in the fire———

The Sexton will be readily recogniſed as a relation of the grave-digger in Hamlet.

——— hoary-headed chronicle,
Of hard unmeaning face, down which ne'er ſtole
A gentle tear; with mattock in his hand

Digs through whole rows of kindred and acquaintance,
By far his juniors.——Scarce a ſkull's caſt up,
But well he knew its owner, and can tell
Some paſſage of his life.———

The following compariſon, applied to time, is happily imagined.

Yet treads more ſoft than e'er did midnight thief,
Who ſlides his hand under the miſer's pillow,
And carries off his prize———

The hand of Shakſpeare could not poſſibly have gone higher, or have touched a ſituation with greater nicety.

Few ſimiles can exceed the following for elegant ſimplicity. Among the various tenants of the grave, he enumerates

———The long-demurring maid,
Whoſe lonely unappropriated ſweets
Smil'd, like yon knot of cowſlips on the cliff,
Not to be come at by the willing hand.

Another ſimile, near the end of the poem, where he mentions the averſion even of the good to death, beginning, So have I ſeen upon a ſummer's eve, is natural and ſtriking.

In Blair, it is difficult to diſcover any material traces of imitation, or even to conjecture who were his favourites among the poets of his country. His ſtyle of compoſition is his own, and his verſification peculiar to himſelf. He undoubtedly, however, poſſeſſed a taſte for our elder poets, the ancient wells of Engliſh undefiled, from whom he probably learned the energy, character, and truth of compoſition, and the genuine language of verſe; particularly the frequent uſe of compound epithets, which are the life of a language, and in which our own is far from being deficient.

Blair, deſcribing the death of a good man, ſays:

By unperceiv'd degrees he wears away,
Yet like the ſun ſeems larger at his ſetting.

The laſt line is evidently borrowed from Quarles; a writer of true poetical genius, and of exemplary virtue, unjuſtly neglected.

Brave minds oppreſt, ſhould (in diſpight of fate)
Looke greateſt (like the ſunne) in loweſt ſtate.——Job. Milt.

The teſtimonies to the merits of Blair are few, when compared with his deſerts. The Grave, though it is written in a ſtyle that might well delight the learned, and deſerve the attention of the writers of verſe, yet has never been mentioned, till very lately, in any critical work, nor imitated in any poetical compoſition. "The Taſk" of Cowper, an ingenious and truly original performance, reſembles it only in the ſingular combination of pathetic deſcription, comic humour, and ſerious remonſtrance. Its popularity, however, muſt be allowed as an unqueſtionable authority in its favour; for by the judgment of the common, unprejudiced, unpedantic reader, the merit of every poetical compoſition muſt be ultimately decided.

Mr. Pinkerton, the learned and ingenious editor of the "Ancient Scottiſh Poems, &c." was the firſt who celebrated the merits of Blair, and ſubjected The Grave to the examination of criticiſm; which, though ſomewhat too general and indiſcriminate, merits attention.

"I know not, ſays Mr. Pinkerton," that he wrote any thing elſe; but The Grave is worth a thouſand common poems. The language is ſuch as Shakſpeare would have uſed; yet he no where imitates Shakſpeare, or uſes any expreſſion of his. It is frugal and chaſte; yet, upon occaſion, highly poetical, without any appearance of reſearch. It is unqueſtionably the beſt piece of blank verſe we have, ſave thoſe of Milton."

POEMS.

THE GRAVE.

The House appointed for all Living.——Job.

Whilst some affect the sun, and some the shade,
Some flee the city, some the hermitage;
Their aims as various, as the roads they take
In journeying through life;—the task be mine
To paint the gloomy horrors of the tomb;
Th' appointed place of rendezvous, where all
These travellers meet.——Thy succours I implore,
Eternal king! whose potent arm sustains
The keys of hell and death.——The grave, dread thing!
Men shiver when thou'rt nam'd: Nature appall'd,
Shakes off her wonted firmness.——Ah! how dark
Thy long-extended realms, and rueful wastes!
Where nought but silence reigns, and night, dark night,
Dark as was chaos, ere the infant sun
Was roll'd together, or had try'd his beams
Athwart the gloom profound.——The sickly taper,
By glimm'ring through thy low-brow'd misty vaults,
(Furr'd round with mouldy damps, and ropy slime)
Lets fall a supernumerary horror,
And only serves to make thy night more irksome.
Well do I know thee by thy trusty yew,
Cheerless, unsocial plant; that loves to dwell
'Midst skulls and coffins, epitaphs, and worms:
Where light-heel'd ghosts, and visionary shades,
Beneath the wan cold moon (as fame reports)
Embody'd, thick, perform their mystic rounds.
No other merriment, dull tree, is thine.
See yonder hallow'd fane;—the pious work
Of names once fam'd, now dubious or forgot,
And bury'd 'midst the wreck of things which were;
There lie interr'd the more illustrious dead.
The wind is up: hark! how it howls! Methinks
Till now I never heard a sound so dreary: [bird,
Doors creak, and windows clap, and night's foul
Rook'd in the spire, screams loud: the gloomy aisles
Black plaster'd, and hung round with shreds of 'scutcheons
And tatter'd coats of arms, send back the sound
Laden with heavier airs, from the low vaults,
The mansions of the dead.——Rous'd from their slumbers,
In grim array the grisly spectres rise,
Grin horrible, and obstinately sullen,
Pass and repass, hush'd as the foot of night.
Again the screech-owl shrieks: ungracious sound!
I'll hear no more; it makes one's blood run chill.
Quite round the pile, a row of reverend elms,
(Coeval near with that) all ragged show,
Long lash'd by the rude winds. Some rift half down
Their branchless trunks; others so thin a-top,
That scarce two crows could lodge in the same tree.
Strange things, the neighbours say, have happen'd here:
Wild shrieks have issued from the hollow tombs:
Dead men have come again, and walk'd about;
And the great bell has toll'd, unrung, untouch'd.
(Such tales their cheer at wake or gossiping,
When it draws near to witching time of night.)
Oft, in the lone church-yard at night I've seen,
By glimpse of moon-shine chequering through the trees,
The school-boy with his satchel in his hand,
Whistling aloud to bear his courage up,
And lightly tripping o'er the long flat stones,
(With nettles skirted, and with moss o'ergrown),
That tell in homely phrase who lie below.
Sudden he starts, and hears, or thinks he hears,
The sound of something purring at his heels;
Full fast he flies, and dares not look behind him,
Till out of breath he overtakes his fellows;
Who gather round, and wonder at the tale
Of horrid apparition, tall and ghastly,
That walks at dead of night, or takes his stand
O'er some new open'd grave; and (strange to tell!)
Evanishes at crowing of the cock.
The new-made widow, too, I've sometimes 'spy'd,
Sad sight! slow moving o'er the prostrate dead:
Listless, she crawls along in doleful black,
Whilst bursts of sorrow gush from either eye,
Fast falling down her now unrasted cheek.
Prone on the lowly grave of the dear man
She drops; whilst busy meddling memory,
In barbarous succession musters up
The past endearments of their softer hours,
Tenacious of its theme. Still, still she thinks
She sees him, and, indulging the fond thought,
Clings yet more closely to the senseless turf,
Nor heeds the passenger who looks that way.
Invidious grave!—how dost thou rend in sunder
Whom love has knit, and sympathy made one?
A tie more stubborn far than nature's band.
Friendship! mysterious cement of the soul;
Sweetner of life, and solder of society,
I owe thee much. Thou hast deserv'd from me,
Far, far beyond what I can ever pay.
Oft have I prov'd the labours of thy love,
And the warm efforts of the gentle heart,
Anxious to please.—Oh! when my friend and I
In some thick wood have wander'd heedless on,
Hid from the vulgar eye, and sat us down

The boast of story? Where the hot-brain'd youth;
Who the tiara at his pleasure tore
From kings of all the then discover'd globe;
And cry'd, forsooth, because his arm was hamper'd,
And had not room enough to do its work?
Alas! how slim, dishonourably slim,
And cram'd into a space we blush to name!
Proud royalty! how alter'd in thy looks!
How blank thy features, and how wan thy hue!
Son of the morning! whither art thou gone!
Where hast thou hid thy many-spangled head,
And the majestic menace of thine eyes
Felt from afar? Pliant and powerless now
Like new-born infant wound up in his swathes,
Or victim tumbled flat upon his back,
That throbs beneath the sacrificer's knife.
Mute, must thou bear the strife of little tongues,
And coward insults of the base-born crowd;
That grudge a privilege thou never hadst,
But only hop'd for in the peaceful grave,
Of being unmolested and alone.
Arabia's gums and odoriferous drugs,
And honours by the herald duly paid
In mode and form, ev'n to a very scruple;
Oh cruel irony! these come too late;
And only mock, whom they were meant to honour.
Surely there's not a dungeon-slave that's bury'd
In the high-way, unshrouded and uncoffin'd,
But lies as soft, and sleeps as sound as he.
Sorry pre-eminence of high descent,
Above the baser born, to rot in state.

But see! the well-plum'd herse comes nodding
Stately and slow; and properly attended
By the whole sable tribe, that painful watch
The sick man's door, and live upon the dead,
By letting out their persons by the hour,
To mimic sorrow, when the heart's not sad.
How rich the trappings! now they're all unfurl'd,
And glittering in the sun; triumphant entries
Of conquerors, and coronation-pomps,
In glory scarce exceed. Great gluts of people [ments
Retard th' unwieldy show; whilst from the case-
And houses tops, ranks behind ranks close wedg'd
Hang bellying o'er. But tell us, why this waste,
Why this ado in earthing up a carcase
That's fall'n into disgrace, and in the nostril
Smells horrible?——Ye undertakers, tell us,
'Midst all the gorgeous figures you exhibit,
Why is the principal conceal'd, for which
You make this mighty stir.——'Tis wisely done:
What would offend the eye in a good picture,
The painter casts discreetly into shades.
Proud lineage, now how little thou appear'st
Below the envy of the private man.
Honour, that meddlesome officious ill,
Pursues thee ev'n to death; nor there stops short,
Strange persecution! when the grave itself
Is no protection from rude sufferance.
Absurd to think to over-reach the grave,
And from the wreck of names to rescue ours.
The best concerted schemes men lay for fame
Die fast away: only themselves die faster.
The far-fam'd sculptor, and the laurell'd bard,
These bold insurancers of deathless fame,
Supply their little feeble aids in vain.
The tapering pyramid, th' Egyptian's pride,
And wonder of the world, whose spiky top
Has wounded the thick cloud, and long outliv'd
The angry shaking of the winter's storm;
Yet spent at last by th' injuries of heaven,
Shatter'd with age, and furrow'd o'er with years,
The mystic cone with hieroglyphics crusted,
At once gives way. Oh! lamentable sight:
The labour of whole ages lumbers down,
A hideous and mis-shapen length of ruins.
Sepulchral columns wrestle, but in vain,
With all-subduing time: her cank'ring hand
With calm delib'rate malice wasteth them:
Worn on the edge of days the brass consumes,
The busto moulders, and the deep-cut marble,
Unsteady to the steel, give up its charge.
Ambition, half convicted of her folly,
Hangs down the head, and reddens at the tale.
Here all the mighty troublers of the earth,
Who swam to sov'reign rule through seas of blood;
Th' oppressive, sturdy, man-destroying villains,
Who ravag'd kingdoms, and laid empires waste,
And in a cruel wantonness of power
Thinn'd states of half their people, and gave up
To want the rest; now, like a storm that's spent,
Lie hush'd, and meanly sneak behind the covert.
Vain thought! to hide them from the gen'ral scorn
That haunts and doggs them like an injur'd ghost
Implacable.——Here too the petty tyrant,
Whose scant domains geographer ne'er notic'd,
And, well for neighbouring grounds, of arm as short,

Who fix'd his iron talons on the poor,
And gripp'd them like some lordly beast of prey;
Deaf to the forceful cries of gnawing hunger,
And piteous plaintive voice of misery;
(As if a slave was not a shred of nature,
Of the same common nature with his lord);
Now tame and humble, like a child that's whipp'd,
Shakes hands with dust, and calls the worm his kinsman;
Nor pleads his rank and birthright. Under ground
Precedency's a jest; vassal and lord,
Grossly familiar, side by side consume.
When self-esteem, or others adulation,
Would cunningly persuade us we were something
Above the common level of our kind,
The grave gainsays the smooth complexion'd flatt'ry,
And with blunt truth acquaints us what we are.
Beauty—thou pretty play-thing, dear deceit,
That steals so softly o'er the stripling's heart,
And gives it a new pulse, unknown before,
The grave discredits thee: thy charms expung'd,
Thy roses faded, and thy lilies soil'd,
What hast thou more to boast of? Will thy lovers
Flock round thee now, to gaze and do thee homage?
Methinks I see thee with thy head low laid,
Whilst surfeited upon thy damask cheek
The high fed worm, in lazy volumes roll'd,
Riots unscar'd.——For this, was all thy caution?
For this, thy painful labours at thy glass?
T' improve those charms, and keep them in repair,
For which the spoiler thanks thee not. Foul feeder,
Coarse fare and carrion please thee full as well,
And leave as keen a relish on the sense.
Look how the fair one weeps!—the conscious tears
Stand thick as dew-drops on the bells of flow'rs:
Honest effusion! the swoll'n heart in vain
Works hard to put a'gloss on its distress.
Strength too—thou surly, and less gentle boast
Of those that loud laugh at the village ring;
A fit of common sickness pulls thee down
With greater ease, than e'er thou didst the stripling
That rashly dar'd thee to th' unequal fight.
What groan was that I heard?—deep groan indeed!
With anguish heavy laden; let me trace it:
From yonder bed it comes, where the strong man,
By stronger arm belabour'd, gasps for breath
Like a hard-hunted beast. How his great heart
Beats thick! his roomy chest by far too scant
To give the lungs full play.——What now avail
The strong-built sinewy limbs, and well-spread shoulders?
See how he tugs for life, and lays about him,
Mad with his pain!—Eager he catches hold
Of what comes next to hand, and grasps it hard,
Just like a creature drowning; hideous sight!
Oh! how his eyes stand out, and stare full ghastly!
While the distemper's rank and deadly venom
Shoots like a burning arrow cross his bowels,
And drinks his marrow up.—Heard you that groan?
It was his last.—See how the great Goliah,
Just like a child that brawl'd itself to rest,
Lies still—What mean'st thou then, O mighty boaster,
To vaunt of nerves of thine? what means the bull,
Unconscious of his strength, to play the coward,
And flee before a feeble thing like man;
That, knowing well the slackness of his arm,
Trusts only in the well-invented knife?
With study pale, and midnight vigils spent,
The star-surveying sage close to his eye
Applies the sight-invigorating tube;
And travelling through the boundless length of space,
Marks well the courses of the far-seen orbs
That roll with regular confusion there,
In ecstacy of thought. But ah! proud man,
Great heights are hazardous to the weak head;
Soon, very soon thy firmest footing fails;
And down thou dropp'st into that darksome place,
Where nor device nor knowledge ever came.
Here the tongue-warrior lies disabled now,
Disarm'd, dishonour'd, like a wretch that's gagg'd
And cannot tell his ails to passers by.
Great man of language,—whence this mighty change,
This dumb despair, and drooping of the head?
Though strong persuasion hung upon thy lip,
And sly insinuation's softer arts
In ambush lay about thy flowing tongue;
Alas! how chop-fall'n now! Thick mists and silence
Rest, like a weary cloud, upon thy breast
Unceasing.——Ah! where is the lifted arm,
The strength of action, and the force of words,
The well-turn'd period, and the well-tun'd voice,
With all the lesser ornaments of phrase?
Ah! fled for ever, as they ne'er had been,
Raz'd from the book of fame: or, more provoking,
Perchance some hackney hunger-bitten scribbler
Insults thy memory, and blots thy tomb
With long flat narrative, or duller rhymes,
With heavy halting pace that drawl along;
Enough to rouse a dead man into rage,
And warm with red resentment the wan cheek.
Here the great masters of the healing-art,
These mighty mock defrauders of the tomb,
Spite of their juleps and catholicons,
Resign to fate—Proud Æsculapius' son!
Where are thy boasted implements of art,
And all thy well-cramm'd magazines of health?
Nor hill nor vale, as far as ship could go,
Nor margin of the gravel-bottom'd brook,
Escap'd thy rifling hand;—from stubborn shrubs
Thou wrung'st their sky-retiring virtues out,
And vex'd them in the fire: nor fly nor insect,
Nor writhy snake, escap'd thy deep research.
But why this apparatus? why this cost?
Tell us, thou doughty keeper from the grave,
Where are thy recipes and cordials now,
With the long list of vouchers for thy cures?
Alas! thou speakest not.—The bold impostor
Looks not more silly, when the cheat's found out.
Here the lank-sided miser, worst of felons
Who meanly stole, (discreditable shift),
From back, and belly too, their proper cheer,
Eas'd of a tax it irk'd the wretch to pay

No frenzy half ſo deſperate as this. 431
Tell us, ye dead; will none of you, in pity
To thoſe you left behind, diſcloſe the ſecret?
Oh! that ſome courteous ghoſt would blab it out;
What 'tis you are, and we muſt ſhortly be.
I've heard, that ſouls departed, have ſometimes
Forewarn'd men of their death:—'Twas kindly done
To knock, and give the alarm.—But what means
This ſtinted charity?—'Tis but lame kindneſs
That does its work by halves.—Why might you not Tell us what 'tis to die? do the ſtrict laws 441
Of your ſociety forbid your ſpeaking
Upon a point ſo nice?—I'll aſk no more:
Sullen, like lamps in ſepulchres, your ſhine
Enlightens but yourſelves. Well, 'tis no matter;
A very little time will clear up all,
And make us learn'd as you are, and as cloſe.
Death's ſhafts fly thick:—Here falls the village-ſwain,
And there his pamper'd lord.—The cup goes round:
And who ſo artful as to put it by! 450
'Tis long ſince death had the majority;

VARIATIONS.

405. That makes her hooted at: ſhall the foul hand,
Acting the traitor's part, be crimſon'd o'er
With blood of its own lord? Forbid it, heaven!
Shall nature, ſwerving from her firſt command,
Be her own butcher? ſhall we on diſguſt
Preſume to ſet ourſelves at liberty
Without once aſking leave? Dreadful attempt, &c.

Yet ſtrange! the living lay it not to heart.
See yonder maker of the dead man's bed,
The Sexton, hoary-headed chronicle,
Of hard unmeaning face, down which ne'er ſtole
A gentle tear; with mattock in his hand
Digs through whole rows of kindred and acquaintance,
By far his juniors.——Scarce a ſkull's caſt up,
But well he knew its owner, and can tell
Some paſſage of his life.——Thus hand in hand
The ſot has walk'd with death twice twenty years;
And yet ne'er yonker on the green laughs louder,
Or clubs a ſmuttier tale:—When drunkards meet,
None ſings a merrier catch, or lends a hand
More willing to his cup.---Poor wretch! he minds not,
That ſoon ſome truſty brother of the trade
Shall do for him what he has done for thouſands.
On this ſide, and on that, men ſee their friends
Drop off, like leaves in autumn; yet launch out
Into fantaſtic ſchemes, which the long livers
In the world's hale and undegen'rate days
Could ſcarce have leiſure for.——Fools that we are,
Never to think of death and of ourſelves
At the ſame time: as if to learn to die
Were no concern of ours.---Oh! more than ſottiſh,
For creatures of a day in gameſome mood,
To frolic on eternity's dread brink
Unapprehenſive; when, for ought we know,
The very firſt ſwol'n ſurge ſhall ſweep us in.
Think we, or think we not, time hurries on
With a reſiſtleſs unremitting ſtream;
Yet treads more ſoft than e'er did midnight-thief,
That ſlides his hand under the miſer's pillow,
And carries off his prize.——What is this world?
What? but a ſpacious burial-field unwall'd,
Strew'd with death's ſpoils, the ſpoils of animals
Savage and tame, and full of dead men's bones.
The very turf on which we tread once liv'd;
And we that live muſt lend our carcaſes
To cover our own offſpring: In their turns
They too muſt cover theirs.——'Tis here all meet,
The ſhiv'ring Icelander, and ſunburn'd Moor;
Men of all climes, that never met before;
And of all creeds, the Jew, the Turk, the Chriſtian.
Here the proud prince, and favourite yet prouder,
His ſov'reign's keeper, and the people's ſcourge,
Are huddled out of ſight.——Here lie abaſh'd
The great negotiators of the earth,
And celebrated maſters of the balance,
Deep read in ſtratagems, and wiles of courts.
Now vain their treaty-ſkill:——Death ſcorns to treat;
Here the o'erloaded ſlave flings down his burden
From his gall'd ſhoulders;—and when the ſtern tyrant,
With all his guards and tools of power about him,
Is meditating new unheard-of hardſhips,
Mocks his ſhort arm,—and quick as thought eſcapes
Where tyrants vex not, and the weary reſt.

VARIATIONS.

494. And of all creeds, Jew, Turk, and Chriſtian.
500. Deep read in ſtratagem, and ſtateſmen's wiles.

Here the warm lover, leaving the cool ſhade,
The tell-tale echo, and the babbling ſtream,
(Time out of mind the fav'rite ſeats of love,)
Faſt by his gentle miſtreſs lays him down,
Unblaſted by foul tongue.——Here friends and foes
Lie cloſe; unmindful of their former feuds.
The lawn-rob'd prelate and plain preſbyter,
E'er while that ſtood aloof, as ſhy to meet,
Familiar mingle here, like ſiſter ſtreams
That ſome rude interpoſing rock has ſplit.
Here is the large-limb'd peaſant:—Here the child
Of a ſpan long, that never ſaw the ſun,
Nor preſs'd the nipple, ſtrangled in life's porch.
Here is the mother, with her ſons and daughters:
The barren wife, and long-demurring maid,
Whoſe lonely unappropriated ſweets
Smil'd like yon knot of cowſlips on the cliff,
Not to be come at by the willing hand.
Here are the prude, ſevere, and gay coquette,
The ſober widow, and the young green virgin,
Cropp'd like a roſe before 'tis fully blown,
Or half its worth diſclos'd. Strange medly here!
Here garrulous old age winds up his tale;
And jovial youth, of lightſome vacant heart,
Whoſe ev'ry-day was made of melody, [ſhrew,
Hears not the voice of mirth.——The ſhrill-tongu'd
Meek as the turtle-dove, forgets her chiding.
Here are the wiſe, the generous, and the brave;
The juſt, the good, the worthleſs, and profane,
The downright clown, and perfectly well-bred;
The fool, the churl, the ſcoundrel, and the mean,
The ſupple ſtateſman, and the patriot ſtern;
The wrecks of nations, and the ſpoils of time,
With all the lumber of ſix thouſand years.
Poor man!—how happy once in thy firſt ſtate!
When yet but warm from thy great Maker's hand,
He ſtamp'd thee with his image, and, well pleas'd,
Smil'd on his laſt fair work.—Then all was well.
Sound was the body, and the ſoul ſerene;
Like two ſweet inſtruments, ne'er out of tune,
That play their ſeveral parts.—Nor head, nor heart,
Offer'd to ache: nor was there cauſe they ſhould;
For all was pure within: no fell remorſe,
Nor anxious caſtings-up of what might be,
Alarm'd his peaceful boſom.—Summer ſeas
Show not more ſmooth, when kiſs'd by ſouthern winds
Juſt ready to expire—ſcarce importun'd,
The generous ſoil, with a luxurious hand,
Offer'd the various produce of the year,
And ev'ry thing moſt perfect in its kind.
Bleſſed! thrice bleſſed days!—But ah! how ſhort!
Bleſs'd as the pleaſing dreams of holy men;
But fugitive like thoſe, and quickly gone.

VARIATIONS.

511. Faſt by his miſtreſs' ſide now lies him down.
520. Nor preſs'd the nipple, founder'd in life's porch.
521. Here is the joyful mother of ſons and daughters.
526. Here are the prude, and frolicſome coquette.
550. to 554. Not in MS.
555. Whilſt the rich gen'rous ſoil, ſcarce importun'd,

Oh! slipp'ry state of things.—What sudden turns!
What strange vicissitudes in the first leaf
Of man's sad history!——To-day most happy,
And ere to-morrow's sun has set, most abject.
How scant the space between these vast extremes!
Thus far'd it with our sire:—Not long h' enjoy'd
His paradise.—Scarce had the happy tenant
Of the fair spot due time to prove its sweets,
Or sum them up, when strait he must be gone,
Ne'er to return again.——And must he go?
Can nought compound for the first dire offence
Of erring man?——Like one that is condemn'd,
Fain would he trifle time with idle talk,
And parley with his fate.——But 'tis in vain.
Not all the lavish odours of the place,
Offer'd in incense, can procure his pardon,
Or mitigate his doom.——A mighty angel,
With flaming sword, forbids his longer stay,
And drives the loiterer forth; nor must he take
One last and farewell round.—At once he lost
His glory, and his God.—If mortal now,
And sorely maim'd, no wonder.—Man has sinn'd.
Sick of his bliss, and bent on new adventures,
Evil he would needs try: nor try'd in vain.
(Dreadful experiment! destructive measure!
Where the worst thing could happen, is success)
Alas! too well he sped:—the good he scorn'd
Stalk'd off reluctant, like an ill-us'd ghost,
Not to return;—or if it did, its visits,
Like those of angels, short and far between:
Whilst the black dæmon, with his hell scap'd train,
Admitted once into its better room,
Grew loud and mutinous, nor would be gone;
Lording it o'er the man: who now too late
Saw the rash error, which he could not mend:
An error fatal not to him alone,
But to his future sons, his fortune's heirs.
Inglorious bondage!—Human nature groans
Beneath a vassalage so vile and cruel,
And its vast body bleeds through ev'ry vein.
What havoc hast thou made, foul monster, sin!
Greatest and first of ills.—The fruitful parent
Of woes of all dimensions!—But for thee
Sorrow had never been.—All-noxious thing,
Of vilest nature!—Other sorts of evils
Are kindly circumscrib'd, and have their bounds.
The fierce volcano, from his burning entrails
That belches molten stone and globes of fire,
Involv'd in pitchy clouds of smoke and stench,
Mars the adjacent fields for some leagues round,
And there it stops.—The big-swoln inundation,
Of mischief more diffusive, raving loud,
Buries whole tracks of country, threat'ning more;
But that too has its shore it cannot pass.
More dreadful far than those! sin has laid waste,
Not here and there a country, but a world:
Dispatching at a wide-extended blow
Entire mankind; and for their sakes defacing
A whole creation's beauty with rude hands;
Blasting the foodful grain and loaded branches,
And marking all along its way with ruin.

Accursed thing!—Oh! where shall fancy find
A proper name to call thee by, expressive
Of all thy horrors?—Pregnant womb of ills!
Of temper so transcendently malign,
That toads and serpents, of most deadly kind,
Compar'd to thee, are harmless.—Sickn'esses
Of every size and symptom, racking pains,
And bluest plagues, are thine.—See how the fiend
Profusely scatters the contagion round!
Whilst deep-mouth'd slaughter, bellowing at her heels,
Wades deep in blood new-spilt; yet for to-morrow
Shapes out new work of great uncommon daring,
And inly pines till the dread blow is struck.
But hold, I've gone too far; too much discover'd
My father's nakedness, and nature's shame.
Here let me pause, and drop an honest tear,
One burst of filial duty and condolence,
O'er all those ample deserts death hath spread,
This chaos of mankind.---O great man-eater!
Whose ev'ry day is carnival, not fated yet!
Unheard-of epicure! without a fellow!
The veriest gluttons do not always cram;
Some intervals of abstinence are sought
To edge the appetite: Thou seekest none.
Methinks the countless swarms thou hast devour'd,
And thousands that each hour thou gobblest up,
This, less than this, might gorge thee to the full.
But ah! rapacious still, thou gap'st for more:
Like one, whole days defrauded of his meals,
On whom lank hunger lays her skinny hand,
And whets to keenest eagerness his cravings.
As if diseases, massacres, and poison,
Famine, and war, were not thy caterers.
But know, that thou must render up the dead,
And with high int'rest too.—They are not thine
But only in thy keeping for a season,
Till the great promis'd day of restitution;
When loud diffusive sound from brazen trump
Of strong-lung'd cherub, shall alarm thy captives,
And rouse the long, long sleepers into life,
Day-light, and liberty.——
Then must thy doors fly open, and reveal
The mines that lay long forming under ground,
In their dark cells immur'd; but now full ripe,
And pure as silver from the crucible,
That twice has stood the torture of the fire
And inquisition of the forge.—We know
Th' illustrious deliverer of mankind,
The Son of God, thee foil'd.—Him in thy power
Thou could'st not hold:—self-vigorous he rose,
And shaking off thy fetters, soon retook
Those spoils his voluntary yielding lent:
(Sure pledge of our releasment from thy thrall!)
Twice twenty days he sojourn'd here on earth,
And show'd himself alive to chosen witnesses,
By proofs so strong, that the most slow assenting

Had not a ſcruple left.—This having done,
He mounted up to heav'n.—Methinks I ſee him
Climb the aerial heights, and glide along
Athwart the ſevering clouds: but the faint eye,
Flung backwards in the chaſe, ſoon drops its hold;
Diſabled quite, and jaded with purſuing.
Heaven's portals wide expand to let him in;
Nor are his friends ſhut out: As a great prince
Not for himſelf alone procures admiſſion,
But for his train.——It was his royal will,
That where he is, there ſhould his followers be.
Death only lies between.—A gloomy path!
Made yet more gloomy by our coward fears:
But nor untrod, nor tedious: the fatigue
Will ſoon go off.——Beſides, there's no bye-road
To bliſs.—Then, why, like ill-condition'd children,
Start we at tranſient hardſhips in the way
That leads to purer air, and ſofter ſkies,
And a ne'er-ſetting ſun?—Fools that we are!
We wiſh to be, where ſweets unwith'ring bloom;
But ſtrait our wiſh revoke, and will not go.
So have I ſeen, upon a ſummer's ev'n,
Faſt by the riv'let's brink, a youngſter play:
How wiſhfully he looks to ſtem the tide!
This moment reſolute, next unreſolv'd:
At laſt he dips his foot; but as he dips,
His fears redouble, and he runs away
From th' inoffenſive ſtream, unmindful now
Of all the flow'rs that paint the further bank,
And ſmil'd ſo ſweet of late.—Thrice welcome death!
That after many a painful bleeding ſtep
Conducts us to our home, and lands us ſafe
On the long-wiſh'd-for ſhore.—Prodigious change!
Our bane turn'd to a bleſſing!—Death, diſarm'd,
Loſes its fellneſs quite.——All thanks to him
Who ſcourg'd the venom out.——Sure the laſt end
Of the good man is peace!—How calm his exit!
Night-dews fall not more gently to the ground,
Nor weary worn-out winds expire ſo ſoft.
Behold him in the evening-tide of life,
A life well-ſpent, whoſe early care it was
His riper years ſhould not upbraid his green:
By unperceiv'd degrees he wears away;
Yet, like the ſun, ſeems larger at his ſetting.
(High in his faith and hopes), look how he reaches
After the prize in view! and, like a bird
That's hamper'd, ſtruggles hard to get away:
Whilſt the glad gates of ſight are wide expanded
To let new glories in, the firſt fair fruits
Of the laſt-coming harveſt.—Then, oh then!
Each earth-born joy grows vile, or diſappears,
Shrunk to a thing of nought.—Oh! how he longs
To have his paſſport ſign'd, and be diſmiſs'd!
'Tis done! and now he's happy!—The glad ſoul
Has not a wiſh uncrown'd.—Ev'n the lag fleſh
Reſts too in hope of meeting once again
Its better half, never to ſunder more.
Nor ſhall it hope in vain:——The time draws on
When not a ſingle ſpot of burial earth,
Whether on land, or in the ſpacious ſea,
But muſt give back its long-committed duſt
Inviolate:—and faithfully ſhall theſe
Make up the full account; not the leaſt atom
Embezzl'd, or miſlaid, of the whole tale.
Each ſoul ſhall have a body ready furniſh'd;
And each ſhall have his own.—Hence, ye profane!
Aſk not, how this can be?—Sure the ſame pow'r
That rear'd the piece at firſt, and took it down,
Can re-aſſemble the looſe ſcatter'd parts,
And put them as they were.—Almighty God
Has done much more; nor is his arm impair'd
Through length of days: And what he can, he will:
His faithfulneſs ſtands bound to ſee it done.
When the dread trumpet ſounds, the ſlumb'ring duſt,
Not unattentive to the call), ſhall wake:
And ev'ry joint poſſeſs its proper place,
With a new elegance of form, unknown
To its firſt ſtate.——Nor ſhall the conſcious ſoul
Miſtake its partner, but amidſt the crowd
Singling its other half, into its arms
Shall ruſh with all th' impatience of a man
That's new come home, and, having long been abſent,
With haſte runs over ev'ry different room,
In pain to ſee the whole. Thrice happy meeting!
Nor time, nor death, ſhall ever part them more.
'Tis but a night, a long and moonleſs night;
We make the grave our bed, and then are gone.
Thus, at the ſhut of ev'n, the weary bird
Leaves the wide air, and in ſome lonely brake
Cow'rs down, and dozes till the dawn of day,
Then claps his well-fledg'd wings, and bears away.

A POEM,

Dedicated to the Memory of the late Learned and Eminent
MR. WILLIAM LAW,
PROFESSOR OF PHILOSOPHY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

In ſilence to ſuppreſs my griefs I've try'd,
And keep within its banks the ſwelling tide;
But all in vain: unbidden numbers flow;
Spite of myſelf, my ſorrows vocal grow.
This be my plea—Nor thou, dear ſhade, refuſe
The well-meant tribute of the willing muſe,
Who trembles at the greatneſs of its theme,
And fain would ſay what ſuits ſo high a name.

Which, from the crowded journal of thy fame,
Which of thy many titles shall I name?
For, like a gallant prince, that wins a crown,
By undisputed right before his own,
Variety thou hast: our only care
Is what to single out, and what forbear.
Though scrupulously just, yet not severe;
Though cautious, open; courteous, yet sincere;
Though rev'rend, yet not magisterial;
Though intimate with few, yet lov'd by all;
Though deeply read, yet absolutely free
From all the stiffnesses of pedantry:
Though circumspectly good, yet never sour;
Pleasant with innocence, and never more.
Religion worn by thee, attractive show'd,
And with its own unborrow'd beauty glow'd:
Unlike the bigot, from whose watery eyes
Ne'er sunshine broke, nor smile was seen to rise;
Whose sickly goodness lives upon grimace,
And pleads a merit from a blubber'd face.
Thou kept thy raiment for the needy poor,
And taught the fatherless to know thy door;
From griping hunger set the needy free;
That they were needy was enough to thee.
Thy fame to please, whilst others restless be,
Fame laid her shyness by, and courted thee;
And though thou bade the flatt'ring thing give o'er,
Yet, in return, she only woo'd thee more.
How sweet thy accents! and how mild thy look!
What smiling mirth was heard in all thou spoke!
Manhood and grizzled age were fond of thee,
And youth itself sought thy society.
The ag'd thou taught, descended to the young,
Clear'd up th' irresolute, confirm'd the strong;
To the perplex'd thy friendly counsel lent,
And gently lifted up the diffident;
Sigh'd with the sorrowful, and bore a part
In all the anguish of a bleeding heart:
Reclaim'd the headstrong, and with sacred skill,
Committed hallow'd rapes upon the will;
Sooth'd our affections, and, with their delight,
To gain our actions, brib'd our appetite.
Now who shall, with a greatness like thy own,
Thy pulpit dignify, and grace thy gown?
Who with pathetic energy like thine,
The head enlighten, and the heart refine!
Learn'd were thy lectures, noble the design,
The language Roman, and the action fine;
The heads well rang'd, the inferences clear,
And strong and solid thy deductions were: [wrong,
Thou mark'd the bound'ries out 'twixt right and
And show'd the land-marks as thou went along.
Plain were thy reasonings, or if perplext
Thy life was the best comment on thy text;
For if in darker points we were deceiv'd,
'Twas only but observing how thou liv'd.
Bewilder'd in the greatness of thy fame,
What shall the muse, what next in order name?
Which of thy social qualities commend?
Whether of husband, father, or of friend!
A husband soft, beneficent and kind,
As ever virgin wish'd, or wife could find;
A father indefatigably true
To both a father's trust and tutor's too.
A friend affectionate and staunch to those
Thou wisely singled out; for few thou chose;
Few, did I say, that word we must recal,
A friend, a willing friend thou wast to all.
Those properties were thine, nor could we know
Which rose the uppermost, so all was thou.
So have I seen the many-colour'd mead,
Brush'd by the vernal breeze, its fragrance shed:
Though various sweets the various field exhal'd,
Yet could we not determine which prevail'd,
Nor this part rose, that honey-suckle, call,
But a rich bloomy aggregate of all.
And, thou, the once glad partner of his bed,
But now by sorrow's weeds distinguished,
Whose busy memory thy grief supplies,
And calls up all thy husband to thine eyes;
Thou must not be forgot. How alter'd now!
How thick thy tears! How fast thy sorrows flow!
The well known voice that cheer'd thee heretofore,
These soothing accents, thou must hear no more.
Untold by all the tender sighs thou drew,
When on thy cheek he fetch'd a long adieu.
Untold be all thy faithful agonies,
At the last anguish of his closing eyes:
For thou, and only such as thou, can tell
The killing anguish of a last farewell.
This earth, yon sun, and these blue-tinctur'd skies,
Through which it rolls, must have their obsequies:
Pluck'd from their orbits, shall the planets fall,
And smoke and conflagration cover all:
What then is man? The creature of a day,
By moments spent, and minutes borne away.
Time, like a raging torrent, hurries on;
Scarce can we say it is, but that 'tis gone.
Whether, fair shade! with social spirits, tell
(Whose properties thou once describ'd so well),
Familiar now thou heareſt them relate
The rites and methods of their happy state.
Or if, with forms more fleet, thou roams abroad,
And views the great magnificence of God,
Points out the courses of the orbs on high,
And counts the silver wonders of the sky;
Or if, with glowing seraphim, thou greets
Heav'n's King, and shouteſt through the golden streets,
That crowds of white-rob'd choristers display,
Marching in triumph through the pearly way?
Now art thou rais'd beyond this world of cares,
This weary wilderness, this vale of tears,
Forgetting all thy toils and labours past,
No gloom of sorrow stains thy peaceful breast.
Now 'midst seraphic splendours shalt thou dwell,
And be what only these pure forms can tell.
How cloudless now, and cheerful is thy day!
What joys, what raptures, in thy bosom play!
How bright the sunshine, and how pure the air!
There's no difficulty of breathing there.
With willing steps, a pilgrim at thy shrine,
To dew it with my tears the task be mine;
In lonely dirge, to murmur o'er thy urn,
And with new gather'd flowers thy turf adorn:
Nor shall thy image from my bosom part,
No force shall rip thee from this bleeding heart;
Oft shall I think o'er all I've left in thee,
Nor shall oblivion blot thy memory:
But grateful love its energy expres
(The father's gone) now to the fatherless.
